The Shawnee Rolling-Mill is located on Shawnee Run, in Columbia borough. It was built in 1854 by Smith, Bruner, Saurbeer, and others, to manufacture rails, and has been enlarged several times. There are sixteen puddling and four heating furnaces, four train rolls. Product, ship- and boiler-plate skelp iron. Capacity, fifteen thousand tons of iron per annum. These works were formerly called the Columbia Steel and Iron Company. The works are now owned by the Chestnut Hill Iron Ore Company.

The Susquehanna Rolling-Mill is located on the river front in the eastern section of Columbia borough. It was built in 1860 by a number of public-spirited citizens, who afterwards (1864) organized a company composed of the original members except the late Philip Gossler. The officers were George Bogle, president; J. G. Hess, treasurer; H. S. Hershey, secretary; Isaiah E. Richards, superintendent; Christian S. Kauffman, Ephraim Hershey, M. M. Strickler, and Robert Crane, in addition to the officers, were directors.

Although this company for many years made no money; it continued to run through periods of depression in business as well as of prosperity. Gen. William Patton, its manager, had faith in it, and he inspired the others who also came to believe in its future success. The company was reorganized ten or twelve years ago, and its name changed to the Susquehanna Iron Company. The officers now are Michael Schall (of York), president; Vernon Ellis, secretary and treasurer; William Patton, general manager; John Paine, superintendent. The capacity of the mill has been increased from time to time, and is now three or four times larger than the original mill. The stock of this company is selling for double its original amount, and is paying a large percentage. There are twelve single puddling and three heating furnaces, and three train rolls. Product, bar-iron; capacity, ten thousand tons per annum. The mill stands upon the Robert Barber tract, and the dwelling, built in 1760 by Robert Barber (No. 2), has been fitted up and is used for an office.

Forges and Bloomeries.—The Windsor Forges were located on the eastern branch of Conestoga Creek in Caernarvon township, about a mile south of Churchtown, upon a tract of four hundred acres of land located by John Jenkins in 1718. About the year 1742 these forges were erected by William Branson. In 1728 he entered into partnership with Samuel Nutt in the iron business on French Creek, in Chester County.

Before the organization of Lancaster County he sent out experts to different parts of the territory northwest of the Octorara and west of the Susquehanna River to discover iron ore. His iron interest became very large, and we find that many of the blacksmiths during the first decade after the organization of the county purchased iron at his store in Philadelphia.

William Branson's daughter, Rebecca, married Samuel Flower; another daughter married Bernhard Van Leer; Hannah married Richard Hockley, who was one of Penn's loan and land commissioners, and Elizabeth married Lynford Lardner, who was also one of the loan commissioners, and brother-in-law of Richard Penn. In 1744, Branson conveyed by deed to the first-named three daughters the Windsor Forges and lands in Lancaster County. A similar deed for one-fourth of his estate was made to his daughter, Elizabeth, in 1750. These deeds only vested a life estate in his daughters, after whose death it became the inheritance of their children. In 1750, Lynford Lardner removed to Windsor Forge, and took the management of the works for himself and the three sisters of his wife.

In the year 1758, David Jenkins, son of John, was clerk at Windsor Forges, and Mr. Turbitt was the general manager. After the death of Elizabeth Lardner, David Jenkins commenced to buy the respective shares of Branson's grandchildren, at the commencement of the Revolution, and about the close of the war he owned the entire property, including the four hundred acres purchased by his grandfather, and many hundred acres besides. The forges have not been in blast for many years.

Speedwell Forge was located on Hammer Creek, now in Elizabeth township, and about three miles and one-half west from Elizabeth Furnace. It was built by James Old and David Caldwell (a merchant of Philadelphia) about the year 1750. In the year 1762, James Old purchased the interest of David Caldwell for four thousand pounds. At this time there were seventeen hundred acres of land belonging to the forge property. James Old purchased Reading Furnace, and moved there before the Revolutionary war. In 1776, 1777, 1778, he cast a large number of cannon and shot for Washington's batteries.

The Pool Forge was built by James Old, who returned from Reading Furnace to Caernarvon township in 1779. He then owned a grist-mill on the Conestoga. Upon this tract he built the Pool Forge, which was located in Caernarvon township, about two miles west from Churchtown, and he also built another forge one mile farther down the creek. In 1785 he sold the Speedwell Forge property on Hammer Creek to Robert Coleman for seven thousand pounds. James Old came to America from Wales, and first worked as a puddler in the Windsor Forge. Cyrus Jacobs also came from Wales, and first worked at Windsor Forge. He married a daughter of James Old, moved to Hammer Creek, and managed Mr. Old's forges there. He also became part owner in one of the Hammer Creek forges.

After the death of Mr. Old, Mr. Jacobs came into possession of Pool Forge, and built Spring Grove Forge farther down the Conestoga. He became very wealthy, and one of the most successful iron-masters in the county. He left a large family, but little of the property remains in possession of his descendants. William Old owned a forge on Hammer Creek before the Revolution, and for several years after the close of that war.

The Colemanville Forge, Rolling-Mill, and Slitting-Mill were built in 1828 by Edward Coleman (son of Robert) upon the old Martie Forge property, and about two miles farther down the Pequea Creek, in Conestoga township. For many years the specialty of these works was the manufacture of nails. Maris Hoopes managed these works for thirty years. The pig-iron they used was hauled in wagons from Elizabeth Furnace. The works were idle for some years until a recent date. The ownership has passed out of the Coleman family to Edward S. Davies. William J. Rutter is the manager. There are three forge fires, one run-out fire, and one hammer. The product is charcoal blooms for boiler-plate. Annual capacity, five hundred tons. The water-power is one of the finest in the State.

Old Martie Forge, built by Thomas and William Smith in 1752-53, after passing through many hands, is now owned by Davies & Potts. There are four fires and two hammers. Product, charcoal blooms for boiler-plate made from pig-iron.

Pine Grove Forge was located on Octorara Creek, in Little Britain township. It was built in 1800 by Jonathan Webb, who, a few years later, erected a rolling-mill and flouring-mill. He died in 1824, and the works were carried on by his heirs, who sold to William and Enos Pennock. The works are not now in operation.

White Rock Forge was located on the west bank of White Rock Creek, the west branch of the Octorara Creek, in Little Britain township. It was built by Sproul, Alexander & Irvin.

Black Rock Furnace and Forge were located four miles farther up the stream, above White Rock Forge. They were built by Judge Clark, and owned for many years by J. Caldwell.

Sadsbury Forge was located on the east branch of the Octorara, and was built by — Sproul in 1800.

The manufacture of iron has oftener impoverished than enriched those engaged in it. Prior to the Revolutionary war, Great Britain controlled the iron market of the world, and did not encourage, but rather tried to prevent, the erection of slitting-mills in the provinces. During the Revolutionary war she could not export her iron to America, and hence there was great activity among the iron manufacturers here, and they made large profits. The same may be said of the war of 1812-15. After these wars were over, Great Britain flooded the market in America, and undersold our own manufacturers, causing great losses (and in many cases bankruptcy) to the iron-masters of Lancaster County, and to those of other sections of the State and Union.

CHAPTER XXV.

PUBLIC INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Common Roads—Turnpikes—River and Canal Navigation—Railroads.

Common Roads.—The first effort in the direction of public improvement after settlements were made in Pequea Valley, along the Conestoga and Susquehanna River (before the organization of Lancaster County), was to improve and extend public highways or roads, from New Castle and Philadelphia and Charleston, upon Northeast River at the head of Chesapeake Bay to the back settlements. These roads generally followed Indian paths, or the more direct ones made by the Indian traders, who traversed the forests with large trains of pack-horses. Among these may be mentioned the "Old Peter's road" (named from Peter Bizaillon, the Indian trader), which extended from Chester Valley, at Thomas Moore's mill, via the "Compass;" thence along the dividing line between Earl and Leacock and Hempfield townships; thence by old Donegal Church to Conoy Creek, near the Indian town. This road was laid out in 1718. Another one, called the Paxton road, extended from Chester Valley via Beartown, Blue Ball, Ephrata, Brickerville to Paxton at the Susquehanna. Another extending from New Castle on the Delaware to the Gap; thence in an almost straight line to the Conestoga and Indian Town, on Turkey Hill. Another extending from Charleston, on Northeast River, at the head of Chesapeake Bay, which was then the principal shipping port in Maryland. The Downingtown and Harrisburg Turnpike was afterwards built upon the bed of the Paxton road, and thenceforth it lost its name and identity. A few miles of the eastern part of "Old Peter's road," in Salisbury township, remains, and is known by that name to-day, but that part extending from Mount Joy borough to Conoy Creek via Donegal Meeting-House, has lost its name, but it remains as it was laid out more than one hundred and fifty years ago. The road leading from the Gap to Postlethwait's via Lampeter Square, was for many years called the "Devil's Lane." (David Miller, who resided in Lampeter Square, and was elected sheriff of the county in 1833, was called "Devil Dare Miller.") This name has been wisely dropped by the present generation.

The road leading from the Conestoga (now Lancaster City) to the Susquehanna, at Columbia, was thus named before the county was organized. The Paxton and Conestoga road followed the present Lancaster and Harrisburg Turnpike. And the "Great road" leading from Anderson's Ferry and Lancaster road is now occupied by a turnpike. There were many local roads leading from the settlements to the numerous grist- and saw-mills, and thence to the nearest navigable water.

When the permanent seat of the county was located at Lancaster, measures were at once taken to open roads in various directions from that place, which were called the "King's Highways," which were ordered to be laid out by the Governor and Council. The counties in colonial times had jurisdiction only over by-roads and private roads.

The first and most important one of the King's highways in Lancaster County was laid out in the year of 1730, in pursuance of an order of the board of councilors dated the 29th day of January, 1730. The "viewers" were Thomas Edwards, Edward Smout, Robert Barber, Hans Graaff, Caleb Pierce, Samuel Jones, and Andrew Cornish, of Lancaster County. Six others were named, who resided in Chester County, who were to view and lay out that part of the road which was to pass through that county. The commissioners commenced at the court-house in Lancaster, thence crossed Conestoga Creek at or near Witmer's Bridge, and from there proceeded in an almost straight line to the English Church, now generally known as St. John's Episcopal Church of Compassville, which is situated a few yards east of the division line between Lancaster and Chester Counties. This road was laid out sixty-six feet wide, although practically it was not more than twenty feet wide through the heavy timber tracts and meadows. It is known as the "Old Philadelphia road," and is said to be shorter than any other road leading from Lancaster to Philadelphia. It maintained its supremacy as the "great road" of the county for sixty years. During that period the rural population had not been seized with the mania to lay out "towns" along every public road as they did a few years later.

Between Lancaster and the Chester County line, on this road, there were eight public-houses of "entertainment for man and beast," some of which became known throughout the provinces. The martial tread of the soldier in his weary march from Philadelphia to Raystown and to Fort Augusta, to swell the armies of Gens. Forbes and Bouquet and to man the forts along the frontier, echoed through the forests which bordered this highway; and when the English king sent his minions to our shores and threatened to invade and despoil the soil of Pennsylvania, the militia and soldiers of the regular line from this county and detachments of cavalry hastened over this road to take part in the province at the threshold of her eastern boundary. In the year 1734 the king's highway was extended to Wright's Ferry. This extension was purely a county road, but one much traveled over. The second king's road laid out in the county was called the Paxton road. On the 23d of January, 1736, the Governor and Council issued an order to lay out a road from the Susquehanna River near the house of John Harris, in the township of Paxton, in the county of Lancaster, and from thence through the said county and part of the county of Chester, falling into the high-road leading from the town of Lancaster to the plantation of Edward Kennison, in Whiteland, Chester Co. The viewers appointed were Hans Graff (Earl township), John Davies (Caernarvon), John Frederick (Warwick), John Mendenhall (Earl), John Foster (Paxton), Samuel Osborne, Edward Nichols, James Eldridge, Rice Price, James Armstrong, Richard Buffington, Zachariah Butcher, surveyor; the first named six being of Lancaster County and the others residents of Chester. These viewers filed their report on the 17th day of June, 1736. They began at the river Susquehanna, at a tree near the shore, nigh the ferry of John Harris (now Harrisburg). From that point the road ran to a gap in the mountain at the head of Hammer Creek, a few miles west from Brickerville. After passing over the mountain the first point named was Middle Creek (now Erb's Mill) and Steinmetz's Store, in Clay township. From thence to Cocalico Creek, at the Dunkard settlement, it was thirteen hundred and sixty perches, and from thence to the Conestoga Creek (at Hinkeltown) it was one thousand and forty-six perches; thence to Cedar

Run (in East Earl) two thousand and thirty-four perches. Along this section there were two long stretches of straight road. From thence to Evan's Run (at or near Beartown) three hundred and thirty-nine perches; thence to the county line seven hundred and fifty-seven perches. At that time the computed distance from Harris' Ferry to the Chester County line over this road was fifty miles. The Downingtown and Harrisburg turnpike was built upon the bed of the old Paxton road.

The Seventh-Day settlement at Ephrata was the most prominent point of interest along this road. Before it was laid out a number of Germans settled along its route through the limestone valley in Cocalico township. Oswald Hostetter took up the land at "Erb's Mill." "Miller's Tavern," at the cross-roads half a mile west from Ephrata, Hinkel's, at Hinkeltown, at "Blue Ball" and the "Bear Tavern" (Beartown), were among the first and most famous taverns in colonial times. "Bauman's" and "Gross'," Ephrata, "Spread Eagle," between Hinkeltown and "Blue Ball," "Sorrel Horse," east from "Cedar Run," and "White Horse" tavern, east from Beartown, were also famous public-houses during and before the Revolution. From the battles of Brandywine, Germantown, and Paoli the sick and wounded soldiers were taken over this road to Ephrata and Lititz. This road was laid out sixty-six feet wide.

The old "Horse-Shoe road" was laid out in 1738. On the 25th day of January, in the previous year, a petition of sundry inhabitants of the county of Lancaster was presented to the Governor and Council, setting forth the want of a road from the town of Lancaster to "Coventry Iron-Works," on French Creek, in Chester County, with a branch to Reading Furnace, which was then just built. On the 7th day of October, 1737, the following-named persons were appointed to view and lay out said road, viz.: Thomas Edwards, Esq. (who resided near the route of this road, a few miles north of "Blue Ball"), Jacob Bear, Emanuel Carpenter, Esq., Hans Graff, Simon King, and John Mendenhall (all of Lancaster County, and residing within two or three miles of the proposed route of this road), and a like number of viewers named from Chester County. On the 4th of January, 1738, they made a return to the order. The road commenced

"at a hickory tree standing in the Lancaster High Road, at Benjamin Wittmer's, Sr., Lane [about one mile east of 'Wittmer's Bridge']; thence in a northeasterly direction 254 perches to a line in Benjamin Wittmer's, Jr., land; thence 690 perches to Jacob Heller's land [Heller's Lutheran Church]; thence 206 perches to George Linc's land; thence 216 perches to Andrew Mixell's land; thence 407 perches to Hans Goss's land; thence 631 perches to Phillip Shaver's land [now New Holland]; thence 676 perches to Casper Stever's land; thence 414 perches to Michael Rank's land; thence 224 perches to Jacob Weaver's land; thence 384 perches to David Evans' Run; thence 634 perches to John Mendenhall's land; thence 24 perches to a Run; thence 88 perches to Matthias Stouffer's land; thence 121 perches to Nathan Evans' land; thence 63 perches to Evan Hughes' land; thence 69 perches to the eastern branch of the Conestoga Creek; thence 673 perches to George Hudson's land; thence 244 perches to Thomas Williams' land; thence 148 perches to John Bowen's land; thence 274 perches to the land of Hugh Hughes; thence 112 perches to said east branch branch of Conestogos Creek, by the land of Thomas Morgan; thence along said creek 12 perches; thence 354 perches to Robert Ellis' land; thence 85 perches to Moses Martin's land; thence 334 perches to the division line between Lancaster and Chester Counties." . . .

The road passed over a number of the farms belonging to the old pioneer Welsh settlers in Caernarvon Valley. The most famous places which grew up along this road were "Heller's Church," New Holland, "Blue Ball," "Bangor Church Town," and "Morgantown." This was a 'king's highway,' and was laid out sixty-six feet wide.

In the fall of 1726 a petition of divers inhabitants about Pequea (near the centre of Salisbury township) was presented to the Council, setting forth that "by an order of Chester Court a Road has been laid out through the township of Pequea, over hills, swamps, and rocks, and almost half a mile about in the space of three miles, . . . which road leads from near Thomas Moor's Mill, towards the Township of Donegal." This was called "Peter's road." It was ordered that John Wright, George Aston, Samuel Blunston, Samuel Reet, John Musgrave, and Edmund Cartlidge view said road, and particularly that part passing through Pequea township, to make such alteration in the road "as to them shall seem most just." Under the order these men "viewed" the road and reported necessary alterations and straightenings, which were made, as were also several subsequent changes of route, which rendered the old road much more convenient, because less circuitous than it was at first laid out.

Among the numerous local roads laid out and petitioned for in the several townships from the time of the erection of Lancaster County to the year 1750 were those mentioned and referred to in the index to the first road book of the county, as follows:

Following the above, in the same book, mention is found of ninety-one other roads in the period extending from 1750 to 1765. To trace these and the great multitude of roads laid out in later years is of course impracticable. But it is to be borne in mind that to "lay out and establish" a road, particularly in the earlier years, was not equivalent to opening and making it ready for travel, but that in many instances years intervened between the time when a highway was laid out by the court or commissioners and the time when it was actually opened and made passable, and not unfrequently the roads which had been authorized and laid out were never opened. This was the case with some of those mentioned above.

Turnpikes.—The pioneer turnpike road of Lancaster County and of the State of Pennsylvania—as it is also said to have been the first in the United States of any considerable length—was one which was projected and built from the commercial metropolis of the State to the borough of Lancaster by the "Philadelphia and Lancaster Turnpike Road Company," which was incorporated on the 9th of April, 1792. During the year preceding the incorporation several meetings for the promotion of the enterprise and to devise means for its accomplishment had been held in Philadelphia and Lancaster by the most prominent men of the two counties, among whom were those named in the act of incorporation as commissioners to receive subscriptions to the capital stock, viz.: Elliston Perot, Henry Drinker, Jr., Owen Jones, Jr., Israel Whelen, and Cadwalader Evans, of Philadelphia; Gen. Edward Hand, John Hubley, Esq., Paul Zantzinger (merchant), and Matthias Slough (inn-keeper), of Lancaster borough; and Abraham Witmer, tavern-keeper at Conestoga Creek.

This turnpike road was laid out to run in almost a straight line from Conestoga Creek to the "Great Valley" in Chester County at Coatesville. It was finished in the year 1794, at a cost of four hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars. This turnpike was successful financially from the time of its completion until the opening of the Philadelphia and Columbia Railroad. A company was organized to carry passengers in stage-coaches from Philadelphia to Lancaster and points farther west, and from the time when Lancaster was made the State capital, in the fall of 1799, the travel over this road by the stage line and otherwise became enormous. Amos Slaymaker, one of the stage proprietors, built a large tavern on the road about fourteen miles east of Lancaster, at Salisburyville, where a change of horses was made and twenty minutes' time allowed passengers to dine. Slaymaker's tavern was justly celebrated as one of the best in the State, and was a favorite dining-place for passengers by the stage line. It was the only one known as a "stage house" on the turnpike within the county of Lancaster, though there were in all sixty taverns on the route between Lancaster and Philadelphia, or nearly one for every mile. Among them were the "Rising Sun," at the junction of the "Newport and Gap" turnpike with this road near the "Gap." It was owned and kept by Col. Kennedy, and was a well-known and popular house. Often large numbers of the famous "Conestoga wagons" were grouped at this tavern, and the business from this source was as great as that of any other public-house along the road. It is now used as the private residence of Col. Kennedy's grandson, Sylvester Kennedy.

The next wagon tavern was the "White Horse," kept by Samuel Hinkle, at "Williamstown." Leaman's, Ferree's, Buckwalter's, Forney's, and Abraham Witmer's were among the most prominent hostleries along this road.

The Lancaster and Susquehanna Turnpike Company was incorporated April 22, 1794. The names of the managers were Israel Whelen, James Miller, George Bickham, Francis Johnson, and Jonathan Jones, of Philadelphia; Gen. Edward Hand, John Hubley, Esq., Adam Reigart, Jr., and Paul Zantzinger, of Lancaster, and Maj. Thomas Boude, of Columbia.

The road was to be laid out fifty feet wide, twenty-one feet of which was to be artificial (covered with broken stone). Portions of this road were completed in 1805, and it was finished through to Columbia in 1807.

The Lancaster, Elizabethtown and Middletown Turnpike Company was incorporated on the 23d day of March, 1796. The managers were Alexander Berryhill, William Brown, William Crabb, Jasper Ewing, George Fisher, John A. Hanna, Christian Kunkle, Robert McKee, and Mordecai McKinney, of Dauphin County, and ten gentlemen of Lancaster County, viz., William Montgomery, Esq., John Norris, Paul Zantzinger, and Adam Reigart, Jr., of Lancaster borough; James Russel, Daniel Smith, Thomas Stubbs, William Nelson, John Swarr (miller, of Hempfield township), and Abraham Witmer, Jr. (iron-master), of Lancaster township. A new charter was granted to the Lancaster and Middletown Turnpike Company, March 5, 1804, and the following persons were named as managers: George Fry, William Crabb, James Hamilton, Elijah Green, Daniel Montgomery, of Middletown; George Redsecker (inn), Elizabethtown; John Carolus, John Pedan (inn), Rapho township; Adam Reigart, Jr., Samuel Humes, M.D., William Kirkpatrick (merchant), Christopher Myer (merchant), Lancaster; John Swarr (miller), Lancaster township; Peter Gonter (iron-master), Adam Weaver (merchant), Lancaster; Jacob Dickert, Abraham Witmer (iron-master), Lancaster township; William Montgomery, Esq., John Gundecker, Lancaster; William G. Latimer.

The Gap and Newport turnpike extended from the "Rising Sun Tavern," near the "Gap," to Newport, in the State of Delaware. The company was incorporated April 4, 1796. The managers were George Latimer, Robert Waln, Nathaniel Lewis, and Abijah Davis, of Philadelphia; Joshua Pusey, Jacob Findley, John McDowell, and James Boyd, of Chester County; and Abraham Carpenter, John Funk, Michael Wither, John Barr, Paul Zantzinger, Adam Reigart, Jr., and John Fry, of Lancaster County. This road was intended as a feeder to the Philadelphia and Lancaster turnpike, and to accommodate the trade which sought a market at Wilmington, Del.

The Downingtown, Ephrata and Harrisburg Turnpike Company was incorporated March 24, 1803. The managers in this county were Cyrus Jacobs (iron-master), Jacob Keller, and John Erb, miller, at Middle Creek. This turnpike was constructed on the route of the old "Paxton road."

The Falmouth and Elizabethtown Turnpike Company was incorporated March 15, 1810. The names of the managers were James Hopkins, Esq. (Lancaster), John Wolfley, Esq. (Elizabethtown), Jacob Gisch (Donegal), John Greer (Donegal), Abraham Gisch (Donegal), Michael Gundecker (merchant, Lancaster), Abraham Reigart (Lancaster), Richard Maris, William Guir (Donegal), Robert Ralston, and Joseph Smith. This turnpike was built to accommodate persons at the head of Conewago Falls, who brought produce down the river in keel-boats to the mouth of Conewago Creek. Trade left that place, and the turnpike was abandoned by the company. It was nicknamed the "Pumpkin-Vine Turnpike," from the fact that in many places these vines were allowed to run along or over the road-bed undisturbed.

The New Holland and Lancaster turnpike was incorporated March 20, 1810. The managers were Peter Diller, George Thompson, Jacob Ringwalt, Matthias Shirk, Christian Carpenter, George Bard, and John Landes.

The Marietta and Mount Joy turnpike was incorporated Jan. 18, 1813. The managers were Henry Sharer, miller; Henry Cassell, merchant, Marietta; Jacob Rohrer, Donegal; Christian Leib, James Mehaffey, lumber merchant, Marietta; James Patterson, Rapho; George Snyder, iron-master, Hempfield; Jacob Greybill, miller. The road was built with a branch running to Richland.

The Lancaster, New Haven and Waterford turnpike was incorporated about the year 1805, and built soon afterwards. It is now known as the Lancaster and Marietta Turnpike.

The Morgantown, Churchtown and Blue Ball turnpike was incorporated Feb. 25, 1814, and the company organized with the following managers: Christian Mast, George Jenkins, John Zell, Martin Ringwalt, Joseph Weaver, Richard Jacobs, George Weaver. This road was constructed on the bed of the old Horse-Shoe road, and extended from "Little Conestoga" to the Downingtown and Harrisburg turnpike at "Blue Ball." It was finished in 1819.

The Columbia and Marietta turnpike was incorporated Jan. 21, 1814. No effort was made to construct this road until the State commenced its system of internal improvements, in 1826-30, and constructed a canal along the river shore from Columbia along the east bank of the river to the Juniata. This road followed the canal level from Columbia to Chikis Rock, where it ascended and curved around a large rock, down to the face of Chikis Rock, thence along the canal level. This was one of the finest drives in the county, giving a fine view of the river and the hills beyond it.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company purchased the road-bed in 1851, and the turnpike company changed the route to pass up the ravine at Hogenogler's, crossing Chikis Hill, and down its northern slope to Chikis Creek near its mouth.

The Marietta and Portsmouth turnpike road was incorporated March 28, 1814. The managers were Henry Sharer, James Mehaffey, Matthias Rank, Alexander Boggs, John Longenecker, Henry Haldeman, Jacob Brubaker. Although this company erected toll-gates and collected tolls, they never macadamized the road-bed. The company abandoned it after the erection of the railroad.

River and Canal Navigation.—The Susquehanna is one of the largest and most important rivers in the State. At Conewago, and from Wright's Ferry to tide-water, a few miles above its mouth, the free navigation of the stream was originally obstructed by rocks and "rapids," which made it very dangerous for small craft, and but few that went down the stream were able to return by the same channel.

It became important as the settlements extended along the river and its branches that some concerted measures should be taken to open a channel from Wright's Ferry to the principal branches of the river above that point, and up those several branches also. On the 9th day of March, 1771, an act of the General Assembly was passed authorizing the appointment of commissioners to clear the Susquehanna of obstructions above Wright's Ferry. The following-mentioned persons were named in the act as commissioners: James Wright, of Wright's Ferry; George Ross, of Lancaster; Thomas Minshall, John Loudon,<sup>1</sup> Alexander Lowry, of Donegal township; William McClay, of Paxton township, now Dauphin County; Samuel Hunter, Jr., Upper Paxton township; William Patterson, Robert Callendar, of Cumberland County; Charles Stewart, Reuben Haines, Thomas Holt, and William Richardson. These were all prominent men, and were familiar with the river and the other streams named in the bill. Some of them were civil engineers.

After an examination of the obstructions to navigation, particularly Conewago Falls, they were appalled at the magnitude of the work and means required to clear the channel at that place. The result was that the money appropriated was applied elsewhere in the river. The people living along the river were urgent in their appeals for help to remove the obstructions in the river, and a public meeting was called, which met in Lancaster on the 17th day of August, 1789. They resolved to hold a convention on the 19th of October of the same year at the public-house of Archibald McCallister, in Paxton township. This meeting was duly held, and was composed of twenty-six of the leading men in the State. Those representing Lancaster County were Jasper Yeates, Esq., Paul Zantzing, Alexander Lowry, Sebastian Graff, Jacob Krug, Joseph Simons, Bartram Galbreath, Samuel Boyd, and Samuel Wright.

Committees were appointed to solicit subscriptions to insure a thorough survey of the river. The Legislature passed an act authorizing the appointment of a civil engineer and a commission of supervision, consisting of Samuel Boyd, Bartram Galbraith, and Thomas Hulings.

On the 30th day of January, 1790, the above committee reported that Conewago Falls, about fourteen miles above Wright's Ferry, "was the great obstruction and bar to the wealth and population of our Western country, and that the only safe and sure way was to build a canal around these falls." The distance was about one mile, with a fall of nineteen feet. They believed that a canal thirty-three feet wide and nine feet deep at the entrance would be sufficient for navigation, but that it would be too expensive to build it along the western side, because the hills ran to the bank of the river. They estimated the cost at five thousand pounds. They made no estimate for or mention of a lift-lock in the canal. They supposed that all river craft could descend or ascend through this channel, and that by deepening the canal at its head to nine feet sufficient water would go through to float any boat. They afterwards discovered that they were mistaken, and that such a canal, having no lift-lock, would be of little use.

An appropriation of five thousand two hundred and fifty pounds was made by the General Assembly to improve the channel of the river from Wright's Ferry to the Swatara. On the 3d day of July, 1792, Governor Thomas Mifflin entered into an agreement with the following-named persons: Robert Morris, William Smith, Walter Stewart, Samuel Meredith, John Steinmetz, Tench Francis, John Nicholson, John Donaldson, Samuel Miles, Timothy Matlack, David Rittenhouse, Samuel Powell, Alexander James Dallas, William Bingham, Henry Miller, Abraham Witmer, and Robert Harris, as a company, to construct a canal around Conewago Falls forty feet wide and four feet deep. Thereafter this was known as "The Conewago Canal Company."

A canal was built at a cost of one hundred and two thousand dollars, the locks alone having cost forty-five thousand two hundred and seventy-four dollars. James Brindley was the chief engineer. The work was completed in November, 1797. On the 27th of that month a committee of the Legislature and Dr. William Smith proceeded through the canal in flat-boats to inspect the works. The formal opening was to be celebrated in the afternoon of the same day, when the Governor was to be present. Holes were drilled in the granite bowlders to be used to fire salutes in honor of the event. The Governor and his attendants arrived unexpectedly at the eastern side of the river, in sleet and snow. Boats were sent over to bring the distinguished party, and when they arrived a number of salutes were fired. When the party passed through the canal they met at its head a number of keel-boats that came down from Middletown filled with people. When they returned to the foot of the canal five hundred people were there to receive the Governor, and rejoice with him on the successful completion of this great work. There were two locks or chambers, eighty feet long and twelve feet wide. When the Governor and his party entered the lower chamber and the gates were closed behind them, all were astonished to find the boat raised to the level above in a few minutes.

The design at first was to make this canal free for all boats, but the cost was so unexpectedly great that the Legislature afterwards authorized the collection of a toll of fifty cents for each boat.

About the same time, the Legislature of the State of Maryland chartered the Susquehanna Canal Company, which constructed a canal along the eastern bank of the river from the Lancaster County line to tide-water, a distance of eight or ten miles. This canal proved to be a profitable undertaking for more than thirty years. Fifty years ago more than fifteen hundred arks, rafts, and other craft passed through this canal during one spring freshet. A saw-mill was erected at the lower end of the Conewago Canal. It went to decay, and there is nothing remaining to mark the spot where it stood.

On the 13th day of February, 1805, an act of Assembly was passed authorizing the drawing of a lottery to raise twenty thousand dollars to improve the Susquehanna and its branches, five thousand five hundred dollars of which was to be expended in improving the river from Columbia to the Swatara, the remainder to be used upon the river and its branches above the latter point. The managers of this lottery were Maj. Thomas Boude, of Columbia; Christian Breneman, Columbia; Joseph Poolé, merchant, Columbia; John Evans, merchant, Columbia; William P. Beatty, postmaster, Columbia; Jacob Strickler, miller, etc., Columbia; Samuel Bethel, Esq., Columbia; Adam Reigart, Jr., Lancaster; William Ferree, Lancaster; Philip Diffenderfer, Lancaster; Michael Gundecker, Lancaster; Leonard Eicholtz, Lancaster. The net amount of revenue secured by this scheme for the river improvement has not been ascertained.

When the State commenced its vast system of internal improvements, a Board of Canal Commissioners was created to have entire control of their construction. In February, 1826, the sum of three hundred thousand dollars was appropriated for the construction of a portion of the eastern division of the canal along the Susquehanna, and John Barber, of Columbia, was appointed superintendent of that part extending from the Juniata River to Columbia. That portion of the eastern division of the canal, extending from Columbia to Chikis Creek, was finished and the water let in on the 17th day of December, 1830, when the event was duly celebrated at the canal basin in Columbia. The following, in reference to the opening ceremonies, is taken from the Columbia Spy of Dec. 23, 1830:

"On Thursday evening the Committee, having completed the preparations, issued the following notice:

"ORDER OF CELEBRATION.

"Two Boats laden with Flour will leave the Lock near Chicques at 10 o'clock and arrive at the Basin at 11 o'clock, A.M.

"The arrival of the Boats will be announced by the firing of a gun and the ringing of a Town Bell.

"The Citizens will meet at the corner of Front and Walnut Streets to 10 o'clock, A.M., and march in procession to the Basin to receive the Boats.

"An Address will be delivered by Dr. R. E. Cochran at the Basin, immediately on the landing of the Boats.

"The cargoes will then be placed upon the Rail Road Car and transported to the Warehouse.

"At 12 o'clock the Boats will proceed up the Canal, having the ladies on board, invited strangers, committee of arrangement, and other officers of the day, accompanied by a band of music.

"A dinner will be on the table at the house of Mr. Gossler at 3 o'clock, P.M., to which the citizens and others are cordially invited to subscribe.

"It is recommended to the Citizens to illuminate their houses in the evening.

"Mr. Joseph Jefferies has been appointed Chief, and Messrs. Joseph Mosher, John L. Wright, George C. Lloyd, and Peter P. Gonter, Assistant Marshals, who are to be respected accordingly.

"Agreeably, therefore, to the order of yesterday, the citizens met at 1 o'clock in the morning and marched in procession to the Basin to greet the Canal Boat 'JOHN BARBER,' commanded by Capt. Evans, and bearing the American Flag and the Pennsylvania Coat of Arms. She was laden with Flour from the mill of Joseph J. Strickler, Esq., and had on board our fellow-towneman, John Barber, Esq., the worthy Superintendent of the Canal. This was immediately followed by the 'EDWARD F. GAY,' bearing the tri-colored Flag, commanded by Capt. Cornwall, and loaded with Flour from the mill of the Messrs. Johnsons. Notwithstanding the severe cold of the preceding night had encrusted the Basin with ice, the Boats descended in fine style, amid the cheers & acclamations of the multitude assembled to witness the entrees of the first Boats upon this portion of the Canal. On their landing at the lower end of the Basin an able, eloquent, & appropriate address was delivered by Dr. R. E. Cochran, which was seconded by another from Gen. Porter; both were responded to by the continued cheers of the lively group assembled round. The Flour was then taken from the Boats and placed upon Mr. Jas. Wright's Self-adapting Rail-way Car, and transported to the Warehouse of C. Breneman, Esq., on a Railway of more than 400 feet in length, constructed by the committee for that purpose. The road was located by Mr. McCutchen, and owing to the ground in the vicinity of the Canal being covered with piles of lumber, it was necessary to make one curve of between fifty and sixty feet long, on a radius of thirty seven feet, and another of less than 250 feet, thus proving the facility of locating Rail-ways in the most obstructed and uneven districts of our country.

"The ladies, invited guests, strangers, band of music, committee of arrangement, and citizens, having embarked on board the Boats, proceeded up the Basin and Canal, and, although crowded, moved rapidly along; after having ascended to near Chicques, they returned. The procession again formed, the Superintendent taking his station beside the principal Engineer (the place assigned him by the committee), and returned to Mr. Gossler's. At 3 o'clock the company sat down to an elegant dinner, prepared by Mr. Gossler in his best style for the occasion. C. Breneman, Esq., presided, assisted by Jacob Strickler, Robert W. Houston, Wm. Dick, and C. Haldeman, Esqrs., Vice-Presidents; and Dr. Beatty and Geo. C. Lloyd, Esq., Secretaries."

There was much opposition in the Legislature to the extension of the canal below Middletown to Columbia. Gen. George B. Porter, a member of the Legislature from Lancaster City, and John Forry, Jr., a member from Columbia, by their energy and superior ability, succeeded in passing an act extending the canal to Columbia. It was a great triumph for them and the business men of Columbia, who sent one of their ablest members, Robert W. Houston, to Harrisburg to attend to their interests while the bill was pending before the Legislature. Col. Hamilton and Maj. Hambright, senators from this county, were in favor of the measure also, as were all of the members of the Lower House from the county. As there was no member from the county on the Committee on Canals, they had great difficulty in getting the members to amend the report of the committee when it came before the Assembly.

The first packet-boat which ran upon the canal between Columbia and Middletown was the "Red Rover," which was built at "Graff's Landing," at the head of the Conestoga slack-water navigation, on which it carried passengers from Safe Harbor to Lancaster. It was taken to the river, and after several days of toil, forced up the stream with "set poles," rope and windlass. It was finally taken to the Codorus slack-water navigation, and ran between York borough and the river.

At the Columbia end of the canal a basin or pool was erected, which was intended to accommodate a large number of boats while being filled with produce or merchandise, or the same being transferred to cars to be taken to Philadelphia. Large frame warehouses were built along the eastern side of this basin, with space enough between them to admit two or three canal-boats abreast.

The goods which came from Philadelphia via railroad were first stored in these warehouses, and transferred to boats as fast as boats could be brought to their doors. The business became so great that vast quantities of freight at times accumulated in these warehouses, and could not be handled without a delay of a day or two. David Teech & Co. established a freight line of transportation from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh. They built a large number of boxes which were placed upon car-trucks, and when filled with goods or produce at Philadelphia were taken to Columbia over the railroad, and when they arrived at the basin, the boxes were lifted bodily from the trucks without unloading, and placed in canal-boats. A few years later canal-boats were built in sections, which, when in the water, were coupled together, forming a boat similar to others. A slip or inclined plane being built at the basin, car-trucks were let down, and these sections of boats were floated over the trucks, which were then drawn up to and upon the railroad tracks, and thence taken to Philadelphia. These boat sections, when filled with freight and placed upon car-trucks, were very heavy, and in consequence the car-trucks were frequently broken, the bridges and railroad track were often injured, causing great delay and expense. This mode of transportation gradually grew into disfavor, and was abandoned altogether.

The warehouses at the canal-basin in Columbia were built and owned by private individuals or firms. A press of business, sometimes required many hours of continuous work, day and night, by the clerks and other employes. Many of the boatmen were rough and difficult to deal with, and it required courage and tact to manage them. Thousands of emigrants from Europe were brought to the basin in cars, and shipped in boats for the Western States. Packet-boats were built to carry first-class passengers to various points along the route of the canal above Columbia. Great rivalry existed between the masters and owners of these boats, not only to secure passengers, but to make the quickest time to the first lock, at Chikis lock, and get through the next level above. Whichever boat succeeded in doing this was able to keep in the advance for many miles.

From six to nine horses were hitched tandem to the towing-rope. When two or more boats started from the basin at the same time, passengers sometimes caught the excitement, and sprang to the tow-path, and taking hold of the towing-rope, helped their respective boats to the Chikis locks. Fights were frequent between rival crews in this, the first, level. When one boat attempted to pass another, "set poles" and sticks of wood were often used quite vigorously. Towing-ropes were cut, and every boat had at its bow a knife shaped like a sickle, which would catch and cut any towing-rope that did not pass under the hull of the boat. Sometimes large amounts of money were wagered by passengers and owners of rival boats as to which would first arrive at Chikis lock.

Upon one occasion the steersman of Capt. Thomas' packet-boat was supposed to have been bribed by a rival. When passing through Marietta he deliberately ran the bow of his boat against a wooden trestle which supported a foot-bridge at the hotel of James Stackhouse. The timbers of the bridge fell upon the deck of the boat, Capt. Thomas was thrown into the canal, and a child of Joseph Sirickler, in the arms of Miss Pratt, was killed.

At the basin outlet-locks were constructed, so that boats could pass out into the river and be unloaded along the river shore. A number of young men who were employed and trained at the collectors' office and warehouses at the Columbia basin were afterwards very successful in railroad management. Among the number were Thomas A. Scott, H. H. Houston, John J. Houston, Charles Francisus, Samuel Young, James Cowden, E. J. Sneider.

The Susquehanna and Tide-water Canal was incorporated April 15, 1835, and the company organized with the following-named managers: Robert McCurdy, Joseph M. Sanderson, Edward Coleman, Simon Gratz, Charles S. Boker, Henry White, George H. Hicking, of Philadelphia; Jeremiah Brown, James A. Caldwell, Evan Green, of Lancaster County; Charles A. Barnitz, York; Jacob M. Haldeman, Harrisburg; Simon Cameron, Middletown; James Hepburn and John C. Boyd, of Northumberland.

The projectors of this canal intended to construct it along the east bank of the river from Columbia to tide-water. James Wright, who owned property along the river-shore at Columbia, was opposed to this route, believing that it would ruin his property. Evan Green, one of the managers, and owner of a large lumber-yard along the shore in the southern part of the town, believing that the construction of a canal front would injure the property and lumber-trade along the river, opposed its location there, and his casting vote decided the matter, and the canal was constructed along the west bank of the river.

THE CONESTOGA NAVIGATION.

This change required the erection of a dam across the river at Columbia, to form a pool that would float a boat across at all stages of water. Stone piers were built on the south side of the Columbia bridge piers, and upon them was erected a bridge which was attached to the timbers of the old bridge. This was divided into an upper and lower floor, the latter of which was used for a tow-path. In the year 1863 it was destroyed by fire to prevent the Confederate force, which came to Wrightsville, from crossing. Boats are now towed across the river by a steamboat.

The Conestoga Navigation Company.—On March 17, 1805, an act of Assembly was passed authorizing William Webb, Esq., to improve the navigation of the Conestoga River. He resided on the Philadelphia turnpike, adjoining Abraham Witmer's on the west, and was anxious to make this stream navigable from its mouth to Witmer's bridge. He was a member of Assembly in 1805, and with other members visited Conewago Canal, which was then in successful operation, and thus from personal observation saw the great value of artificial canals; and as it was part of his plan to erect dams, with lift-locks, he doubtless discovered that the expense would be much greater than he had expected. Nothing was done under his charter, and it became inoperative.

The Conestoga Slack-Water Navigation Company owed its existence to the efforts of James Hopkins, Esq., a prominent lawyer of Lancaster, who had spent a large fortune in the construction of a canal around Conowago Falls, on the east side, which proved to be a failure. This, however, did not deter him from entering upon other public improvements, and on the 28th of March, 1820, he procured a charter from the Legislature to incorporate the Conestoga Slack-Water Navigation Company, having for its object the building of several dams between the mouth of the creek and Lancaster, and thus to form pools of slack-water for the navigation of boats. A lock was to be placed in each dam to lift the boats from the lower level to the upper, boats to be towed by horses traveling along a tow-path to be made along the edge of the water. Mr. Hopkins did nothing under this charter, and it became void.

The Conestoga Navigation Company was incorporated by an act passed March 8, 1825. The managers were Adam Reigart, Edward Coleman, George B. Porter, Jasper Slaymaker, John F. Steinman, George Louis Meyer, Hugh Maxwell, of Lancaster City; John Litner and George Haverstick, of Lancaster township.

At this time inland canals and slack-water navigation came to be better understood and their value more fully appreciated. In September, 1825, the construction of the requisite dams and locks was given by contract to Mr. Hamil, and on Monday, July 31, 1826, the first dam and lock were finished. On the 2d of August the board of managers, on the invitation of Mr. Hamil, the contractor, embarked on board the new boat "Edward Coleman," at the new bridge, and proceeded at the rate of about five miles per hour to the lock, having on board a band of music playing national airs. Upon reaching the lock they found there a committee of ladies from Lancaster, with Judge Molton C. Rogers and Dr. Samuel Humes. After the boat entered the lock Mrs. William Jenkins, on behalf of the ladies, addressed Mr. Hamil on his success and the favorable termination of his work thus far, and the great advantages to be derived by the county, and presented to him a flag, on the receipt of which Mr. Hamil responded in an appropriate speech. The ladies and their escort were then taken on board and the boat proceeded to Mr. Reigart's landing, at the head of navigation, a distance of two and three-fourths miles. Later in the afternoon the boat returned to the bridge, when the party disembarked returned to the city.

In May, 1826, Capt. John Mitchell built a packet-boat seventy feet long and twelve feet beam, with three cabins, one for ladies, one for gentlemen, one for dining-room, bar, pantries, etc. Similar packet-boats were introduced afterwards upon the Pennsylvania Canal.

In the year 1826, Samuel C. Slaymaker, Esq., one of the proprietors of the stage line between Lancaster and Philadelphia, had built a pleasure boat sixty feet long and twelve feet wide, which was drawn by two horses, and used on the first pool between Reigart's Landing and the first lock.

Edward F. Gay<sup>1</sup> was chosen chief engineer of the Conestoga navigation. In the winter of 1828 he reported that he expected that the entire navigation would have been completed by November, 1827, but for a disastrous freshet which occurred in the Conestoga River in October of that year, and which destroyed some of the dams already completed and damaged others, thus in a few hours sweeping away the work of many months. By the middle of December the dams were rebuilt and repairs completed. There were nine dams, which cost fifty-nine thousand eight hundred and thirteen dollars.

On the 5th of January, 1829, the stockholders elected the following named persons managers:

Adam Reigart, president; Edward Coleman, George B. Porter, John Reynolds, Henry Keffler, Jonas Derwert, F. A. Muhlenberg, Robert Evans, John R.

<sup>1</sup> He was afterwards chosen chief engineer of the Pennsylvania Canal, and subsequently of the Columbia and Philadelphia Railroad, and was also chief engineer of the Susquehanna and Tide-Water Canal. He had great experience in the construction of the public improvements, and stood high in his profession as a civil engineer. In the light of later experience, however, much of his work on the Juniata Division of the canal and the Columbia and Philadelphia Railroad proved to be a piece of defective engineering. Mr. Gay died in Lancaster a few years ago.

Montgomery, James Humes, and Abraham Gibbons. George Lewis Meyer was elected secretary and treasurer April 28, 1829. The company solicited further subscription to the stock of fifteen thousand dollars, in addition to the original stock of sixty thousand dollars.

In one day in May, 1829, there arrived at Lancaster one ark-load of coal for George L. Meyer and P. W. Reigart; one raft of boards for the same parties; one ark-load of coal for William Russell; one ark-load of wood for the same; two rafts of boards and logs for railroad; two arks, with one hundred and sixty thousand shingles and ten thousand feet of boards, brought by Mr. Reeves from the State of New York; one raft of boards for the same; one ark of boards and shingles for Levi Rogers; two rafts of boards and lumber for same; one ark-load of locust posts for Dr. A. Carpenter; one ark-load of boards for Israel Cooper. The fact that these were but the arrivals of a single day indicates the great amount of business done on the navigation.

On the 14th of May, 1829, the Council of the city of Lancaster issued a call for a town-meeting to take into consideration the propriety of authorizing a subscription of stock to the Conestoga Navigation Company. In accordance with this call, a meeting was held in the court-house May 16th, which authorized the Select and Common Councils of Lancaster to subscribe for two hundred shares of stock of the company. An ordinance was passed May 19, 1829, authorizing the mayor of the city to subscribe for said stock.

During the following two or three years business greatly increased, but not enough to relieve the company from their embarrassment. On the 1st of March, 1833, the "navigation, mills, and water-power" of the Conestoga Navigation Company were advertised to be sold by the sheriff. The property was sold June 1, 1833, at the public-house of Rosina Hubley. Subsequently to the sheriff's sale above named that officer sold all the remaining rights of the company in the navigation to William and Edward Coleman. They repaired the works, and built new packet-boats, which ran to Safe Harbor. When the Susquehanna and Tide-Water Canal was built in 1838, an outlet lock was constructed opposite the mouth of Conestoga Creek, and a dam was built across the river to form a pool sufficient to float boats across. They were towed over by steamboat. The entire length of the Conestoga slack-water navigation was seventeen miles and seventy-one chains, with a fall of sixty-four feet, making a valuable water-power at each of the locks.

After a few years of renewed prosperity the navigation again went down. On the 1st day of April, 1837, William and Edward Coleman received a new charter, under which the title was changed to "The Lancaster and Susquehanna Slack-Water Navigation Company." After the erection of iron-works at Safe Harbor, near the mouth of the creek, by Reeves, Abbot & Co., that firm purchased from Edward Coleman's heirs the franchises of this navigation company. Reeves & Co. sold the franchises to Jacob G. Peters and George Levan, who retained the most valuable of the water-power at the dams, and sold others. The navigation has not been used for more than twenty years.

Railroads.—Though Pennsylvania was not the first State in which railroads were constructed and put in successful operation, she followed closely after New York and Massachusetts in this particular, and after a very few years led all the other States. A few of her citizens who were in advance of the times urged the Legislature to take some action to encourage the system of internal improvements by the construction of railways. Through the efforts of John Stevens an act of Assembly was passed March 31, 1823, incorporating the "Pennsylvania Railroad Company," of which the names of the incorporators were John Connelly, Michael Baker, Horace Binney, Stephen Girard, and Samuel Humphreys, of Philadelphia; Emmor Bradley, of Chester County; Amos Ellmaker, Esq., of Lancaster City; John Barber and William Wright, of Columbia borough. John Stevens was appointed superintendent of the projected road, which was intended to be built between Columbia and Philadelphia. This was the first effort made in the State, and perhaps in the United States, to construct a railroad of such length, and antedates the construction of canals by the State of Pennsylvania.

The projectors of this railway did not have in view the probable construction of a canal with a terminus at Columbia, but they wished to divert the large and growing trade which found its way down the Susquehanna River to Columbia in keel-boats and arks from going to Baltimore. Mr. Stevens made a preliminary survey and estimate of the cost of construction, but nothing further was done under this charter. Several of those named in it had faith in its ultimate success, and did not give up all hope, but persevered and induced others to interest themselves to carry on the work.

On the 7th of April, 1826, the Legislature granted a charter for the Columbia, Lancaster and Philadelphia Railroad, the capital of the company to be thirteen thousand shares of stock of the value of fifty dollars per share, with the privilege of increasing the capital to one million dollars. The names of the incorporators were Richard Peters, Samuel Archer, Simon Gratz, and Levi Ellmaker, of Philadelphia; George B. Porter, James Buchanan, Amos Ellmaker, and Samuel Dale, of Lancaster; Jacob Strickler, John Barber, James Given, and James Clyde, of Columbia; and Joshua Hunt, Richard Thomas, Jr., and David Townsend, of Chester County. These were all prominent and representative men, and no better selection could have been made.

The State had appropriated large sums of money at various times for the improvement of navigation on the rivers, the erection of bridges, and construction of turnpikes, and had already embarked upon the construction of canals and the best system of inland navigation. The construction of a railroad of such length as from Columbia to Philadelphia was too great an undertaking for a private corporation, and it was thought best to appeal to the Legislature for aid. Canal commissioners had for several years before this time been appointed, and took control of and managed the funds devoted to the internal improvements of the State, and to them appeals were also made. On Jan. 29, 1828, Maj. Wilson, who had been employed to make the preliminary surveys and estimates, completed his estimate of the cost of a railway from Columbia to Philadelphia, which would amount, according to his calculation, to nine hundred and twenty thousand dollars, to which ten per cent. was to be added for superintending and contingencies, making the whole expense one million twelve thousand dollars. This estimate was forwarded to the Legislature, then in session.

On March 24, 1828, the Legislature passed an act authorizing the canal commissioners to extend the Eastern Division of the Pennsylvania Canal to the mouth of Conestoga Creek, and also examine the route from Columbia to Philadelphia, with the view of constructing a canal or railroad, if they deemed it most expedient. They reported in favor of a railroad, with an inclined plane at Schuylkill River and one at Columbia.

In May, 1828, the Canal Commissioners employed Maj. Wilson as principal engineer, to be assisted by Joshua Scott, of Lancaster City (who was considered one of the best civil engineers and draughtsmen in the State), Mr. Petit, of Philadelphia, and — Thompson, of Delaware, to locate the Columbia and Philadelphia Railroad, by which name it was thereafter known while owned by the State. On June 24, 1828, Maj. Wilson reported that he had located twenty miles of the road east from Columbia.

On Dec. 30, 1828, James McIlvaine, secretary of the Board of Canal Commissioners, advertised for proposals for grading twenty miles, beginning at Columbia and continuing thence eastward. The work was divided into seventy-nine sections, and let to various contractors on the 27th day of January, 1829. The act authorizing the commissioners to construct this road, contemplated running it in an almost straight line from Little Conestoga to Big Conestoga Creek (upon the route now occupied by the Pennsylvania Railroad). A lateral road was to be constructed from Lancaster City to intersect the main line near Big Conestoga. Many citizens of Lancaster thought it would injure the place to construct a railroad through the heart of the city, but after the surveys were made and a portion of the road graded on the north side of the town, they regarded it more favorably, and took measures to have the route changed. Afterwards the Legislature appropriated the sum of sixty thousand dollars to be paid to the city of Lancaster, provided the corporation graded and constructed the railroad through Lancaster City.

The undertaking was a heavy one. The route adopted made necessary one of the heaviest rock-cuts on the whole line, and the cost exceeded the sum appropriated by the Legislature. The bridge over Big Conestoga was fourteen hundred feet in length, and twenty-three feet in breadth, standing on two abutments and ten piers, and sixty-two feet above the surface of the water. It was supposed to be the highest bridge in the world. Mr. Campbell was the contractor, and Harry Wilton did the mason work.

The bridge over Little Conestoga Creek was a thousand feet in length, and was built by Mr. Moore, who, in connection with others, afterwards built the bridge over the river at Columbia. Both of these bridges were covered, and constructed on the "Burr plan." The height between the floor and the cross-beams above was not sufficient to allow a person to ride upon the top of a car, and the consequence was a number of persons were killed by being struck by the beams overhead. The bridge over Big Conestoga Creek was afterwards burned down, and a new one on the "lattice truss plan," without overhead roof, and much shorter than the other one, was built.

On the 1st of April, 1831, John Barber, of Columbia, was appointed superintendent of the Columbia and Philadelphia Railroad, and John Wilson principal engineer. The road between the foot of the inclined plane at Columbia to the canal-basin, a distance of one mile, ran along or near the river-shore. Long timbers were laid in the ground lengthwise of the road, and iron bars, fifteen feet long, two and one-fourth of an inch in breadth, and five-eighths of an inch in thickness, were spiked on top of these timbers, forming the rails upon which the cars ran. From the head of the inclined plane at Columbia to Lancaster, sandstone blocks twelve inches square were placed in the ground, and cast-iron chairs were fastened on their tops with iron spikes driven into holes drilled into the stone. These stone blocks were placed about two feet apart. Wrought-iron T-rails were purchased in England, which weighed forty pounds to the yard. They rested in the iron chairs, which had a groove into which the rail fitted. Iron wedges were driven between the rail and sides of the chair, to keep the former in place. Trackmen were constantly passing along the line driving these wedges, which were loosened by the jolting of the cars.

At the inclined plane at Schuylkill flat rails were spiked upon stone sleepers laid lengthwise. At the head of the inclined plane at Columbia large stationary engines were placed, which furnished the power to draw cars up the plane and let them down. A continuous rope passed over pulleys between the rails; a rope was attached to the car-bolt and the other end tied to the rope passing over the pulleys. The track was a double one at the plane, and cars could be drawn up and down it at the same time.

On Monday, March 31, 1834, three passenger-coaches, drawn by horses, arrived at Columbia from Lancaster. On Wednesday, April 2d, in the same year, the locomotive made its first trip on this part of the road, with a train of three passenger cars. April 16, 1834, was the day appointed for the opening of the road from Columbia to Philadelphia. At sunset on April 15, 1834, Governor Wolf, the canal commissioners, members of the Legislature, and a number of other distinguished persons arrived at Columbia via canal from Harrisburg. They were driven to the head of the plane at Columbia, where cars were in waiting with locomotive attached and with steam up. The cars were taken to Lancaster in one hour. When the distinguished party passed over the road from Lancaster to Philadelphia on April 16, 1834, they were met at every station with crowds of people, who came from their farms and work-shops to see the novel sight and rejoice. Both tracks of the railroad were completed to Philadelphia in 1835.

The long passenger-coach drawn by locomotives was not introduced upon the road until the fall of 1835. Lumber merchants at Columbia continued for several years to send their lumber to Lancaster and Philadelphia on cars drawn by horses. The cost of maintaining stationary steam-power at the Columbia inclined plane was found to be rather expensive, and the canal commissioners were instructed to take measures to construct a road from Columbia to avoid the plane. The work was commenced in 1837 and finished in 1839. The present road-bed of the Pennsylvania Railroad occupies the same ground. The intersection with the old road was made five miles and one-half east from Columbia.

This road was a great advantage to the business men of the State. Towns and villages along its line grew and prospered, and many persons were enriched thereby. But it was not a source of profit to the State. Each new administration changed the officers of the road. Every appointment made was a political one, and some of the appointees were incompetent, others dishonest. There was a constant clamor going up from the people, asking the Legislature to take measures to dispose of the public works to private parties. Both of the political parties were tired of the scramble for office, and desired to take this disturbing element out of the field of politics.

On the 8th day of May, 1855, an act of Assembly was passed "to provide for the sale of the Main Line of the Public Works." The Governor was required under this act to advertise the sale of these works in ten days after his approval of this act. The Columbia and Philadelphia Railroad was only a portion of the main line of the public works. The sum named in the act for the purchase was seven million five hundred thousand dollars, a sum much below their actual cost, but no sale of the public works was made under the above act.

On the 16th of May, 1857, another act was passed for the sale of the main line of the public works. The same valuation named in the former bill was also fixed in this one. There was a clause inserted in this act that if the Pennsylvania Railroad Company became the purchasers of the main line, they were to pay in addition to the sum named in the act of 1855 the further sum of one and a half million of dollars. The whole sum was not to be paid at the time of the purchase, but was made payable in installments extending over a long period of years, which will expire in the year 1896. In consideration of this sum, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and the Harrisburg, Portsmouth, Mount Joy and Lancaster Railroad Company were to be discharged forever from the payment of all taxes upon the tonnage or freight carried over said railroad. The Pennsylvania Railroad Company was also relieved from the payment of all State taxes or duties on its capital stock, etc. This company also became the lessees of the Harrisburg, Portsmouth, Mount Joy and Lancaster Railroad, which lease runs for a period of nine hundred and ninety-nine years. Since the old State road has passed into their hands, the road-bed has been greatly improved and straightened, a large depot erected in Lancaster City, a new and larger round-house, passenger and freight depots built in Columbia. The old frame bridges over Strickler's Run, Little and Big Conestoga Creeks, Mill and Pequea Creeks, have been torn down, and more substantial structures of iron have been substituted. They have also built a number of "over head" bridges of iron at the street-crossings in Lancaster and at the road-crossings at the northern boundary of the city. This company have already expended more money in these improvements than the original cost of the entire road.

The Harrisburg, Portsmouth, Mount Joy and Lancaster Railroad Company contemplated under their first charter the construction of a road between Lancaster and Portsmouth, at the mouth of the Swatara River, in Dauphin County. The charter was granted June 9, 1832, and construction of road commenced in 1834. On the 11th of March, 1835, an act was passed authorizing the company to extend their road to Harrisburg. There was much opposition to the construction of this road by friends of the State road; the company were unable to sell their stock, and the prospects of this road were dark and gloomy. On the 18th of December, 1833, a railroad meeting was held at the house of Maj. McLaughlin, in Elizabethtown, at which the following-named persons, elected as delegates, were present, viz.:

From Middletown.—Gen. Simon Cameron, Edward S. Kendig, John P. Farrington, Adolphus Fisher, Jacob Fishburn, George Lauman, John Blattenberger, Esq., Isaac Johnson, John McVey.

From Elizabethtown.—Adams Campbell, George Redsecker, Jr., Andrew Wade, Esq., William S. Campbell, W. M. Baxter, Dr. Isaac Bauman.

From Mount Joy.—Dr. Simon Meredith, William D. Slaymaker, Esq., S. S. Patterson, Thomas J. Patterson, James B. Ferree, Esq., Samuel R. Baukius, Okey Hendrickson, Esq., Abraham Harnley, Christian Cobick, John Zook.

William D. Slaymaker, Esq., was chosen president; George Redsecker, Jr., and John Blattenberger, Esq., vice-presidents; Samuel S. Patterson and Adams Campbell, secretaries. The meeting passed resolutions and adopted measures for promoting the construction of the road by stimulating subscriptions to its stock, and from this time more life was infused into the movement, and stock enough was subscribed to insure its success.

The company met great difficulties in the construction of a tunnel through Red Hill east of Elizabethtown. It was a great undertaking for a weak company. The tunnel caved in several times, and killed some of the workmen before its completion. This link in the line was the last to be completed. Cars were stopped at "Funk's Tavern," on the east, and passengers were first transferred to coaches and carried to the west end of the tunnel. Afterwards, a temporary railroad track was laid over the hill, and passengers were taken by horse-power to the west side.

The Strasburg Railroad Company was incorporated June 9, 1832, and books were opened for subscriptions to stock on the 15th day of January, 1834.

This road is four miles long, and intersects the Pennsylvania Railroad at Leaman Place. It was intended as a feeder to the State road, under the management of J. F. Herr, who owned the largest portion of the stock. It paid handsome dividends on its cost. It is now unprofitable, and but little business is done upon it.

The Marietta Railroad Company was incorporated in 1832, to construct a railroad from Marietta to a point on the Columbia and Philadelphia Railroad, about six miles east from Columbia. When the Legislature rechartered the United States Bank, that institution paid a bonus to the State of several thousand dollars. Henry Haldeman, a prominent citizen of Donegal, and who owned a great deal of property at Chikis, opposed the rechartering of this bank, and to neutralize his influence this bonus was taken and appropriated towards the construction of this road.

Surveys were made, and the line of the road was marked out along the face of Chikis Rock with red paint, twenty feet above the bed of the Pennsylvania Railroad. A portion of the road-bed, extending from the dwelling of Prof. S. S. Haldeman to Chikis Rock, a distance of two hundred feet, was constructed, but nothing more was done.

The Reading and Columbia Railroad was incorporated on the 19th of May, 1857. The names of the incorporators were Frederick Lauer, John S. Richards, and John McMannus, of Reading; James Myers, Samuel Shoch, J. G. Hess, William A. Martin, Amos S. Green, Hugh M. North, Samuel W. Mifflin, and M. M. Strickler, of Columbia; Joseph Konigmacher, Ephrata; I. Leitz, William C. Bradley, and Bartram A. Shaeffer, Esq., of Lancaster City.

Joseph Konigmacher, who owned the Ephrata Springs, a summer resort, was the first person to urge the construction of this road. He had been a member of the reform convention which framed a new Constitution of the State in 1837-38, also of Assembly and the Senate for a number of years, and became acquainted with many prominent and leading men in the State, who visited his springs. To them he urged the necessity of constructing a railroad through the northwest section of the county. Many of them became interested in the measure, but he died April 4, 1861, before the road was completed.

On the 24th of June, 1857, a few days after the charter was granted, a public meeting was held in the old town hall in Columbia for the purpose of urging the citizens to subscribe for the stock of this company. Gen. William Patton, Col. C. S. Kauffman, and Gen. Joseph W. Fisher made urgent appeals to the friends of the road, and subscriptions to the amount of twenty-five thousand dollars were taken. The road was completed at the close of the war of the Rebellion. A branch road was built from a point between Landisville and Manheim to Lancaster City. The road passed through the towns of Manheim, Lititz, and Ephrata. The Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company leased the road for a long term of years, and since that time business has greatly increased. Landisville and Petersburg, which were some distance away from the road, have been built up to it, and thriving villages have sprung up along the line. Extensive and costly coal chutes were erected at Columbia for the purpose of transshipping to canal-boats, which carried the coal to Baltimore.

The Lancaster, Lebanon and Pine Grove Railroad Company was incorporated March 28, 1846. Nothing was done under this charter for some years. A supplement to this act was passed March 17, 1863, and Christopher Hager, John Shaeffer, Jacob B. Tshudy, George M. Steinman, James L. Reynolds, John A. Hiestand, A. Bates Grubb, Peter Martin, S. W. P. Boyd, and William M. Wiley, of Lancaster County; John George, Levi Kline, John W. Killingor, Adam Grittinger, Jefferson Shirk, and George Dawson Coleman, of Lebanon County; John E. Graeff, John Kitzmiller, David Greenawalt, Henry Heil, George N. Eckert, John Hoch, and William Donaldson, of Schuylkill County, were appointed commissioners.

The road was intended to reach the Schuylkill coal-fields. To prevent it from being built the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company agreed to build a lateral branch road, running from Manheim to Lebanon County. They graded several miles of this road, and then abandoned it. After a lapse of ten or twelve years, through the efforts of the Colemans, that part of the road extending from Cornwall Furnaces to Mount Hope Furnace, in Penn township, was completed in the fall of 1883, with the expectation to extend and complete it from that point to Manheim in the spring of 1884.

The Columbia and Port Deposit Railroad Company absorbed the Columbia and Maryland Line Railroad Company, which was merged into the former April 4, 1864. More than sixty years ago charters were granted to turnpike companies proposing to construct roads from Columbia to Port Deposit along the river shore, but all were failures. When a charter was granted to the Susquehanna and Tide-Water Canal Company its projectors contemplated its construction from Columbia to the mouth of the river along its eastern bank. The hills, which were in many places very abrupt, ran to the water's edge. The Conestoga and Pequea Creeks, being large streams, would require expensive aqueducts to carry the water across, and the difficulties along the whole route were thought to be so great that both of these projects fell through. The canal was built along the western bank.

In 1853 a charter was granted by the Legislature to the Columbia and Octorara Railroad Company. Different routes were surveyed, one of which, located several miles east from the river at Turkey Hill, was selected. Several years later ground was broken, and it was thought that this road would be built, but this was never accomplished.

The Quarryville and Lancaster Railroad, extending from Lancaster to Quarryville, a distance of fifteen miles, was originally projected as an independent line of narrow-gauge road, and subsequently by lease of its franchises to the Philadelphia and Reading corporation became the Quarryville and Lancaster Branch of the Reading and Columbia Railroad, and its construction as an ordinary gauge road was completed under the terms of that lease. The late Maj. R. W. Shenk was unquestionably the projector of the enterprise, and it had its origin in an observation of the economy with which roads of three feet gauge could be built; and the heavier grades with which they could be operated for purposes of local traffic.

The original charter, drawn by Maj. Shenk, was secured May 10, 1871, to build a narrow-gauge road from Reading to Lancaster, with power to construct branches to points on the Susquehanna River. The first meeting to consider the organization of the company was held in Lancaster, June 8th of the same year, Hon. Thomas E. Franklin presiding, and Maj. R. W. Shenk secretary. R. W. Shenk, C. A. Bitner, H. G. Smith, John A. Hiestand, Sebastian Miller, Joseph Huyett, and Isaac McHisé were appointed a committee to examine the several routes embraced in the charter, and to report upon them. Upon their report being filed, Col. George H. Arms was appointed to make the surveys. Between that time and September 1st stock subscriptions were opened at various points along the proposed line and in other parts of the county. The first board of directors consisted of R. W. Shenk, president; H. G. Smith, secretary; C. A. Bitner, J. A. Hiestand, A. H. Peacock, O. J. Dickey, E. Billingsfelt, Sebastian Miller, John D. Skiles, T. E. Franklin, Henry Bushong, H. B. Grebbill, W. L. Peiper.

Soon afterwards the branch from Lancaster to Quarryville was projected, and inasmuch as it reached a section into which railroad enterprise had not before been directed, the practicability of this branch became so apparent that its construction first engaged the attention of the company. At the next election of directors Daniel Herr, of Reston, and George W. Hensel, of Quarryville, became members of the board. Early in 1872 subscriptions were reopened for this branch, and bids for its construction were received. After a series of meetings of the board, various changes in the proposals and modification of the route and surveys, on Oct. 28, 1872, a contract was made with Keller & Reilly to build the road. George H. Arms was appointed engineer, and three hundred and fifty thousand dollars in bonds were ordered to be issued to raise funds, in addition to eighty thousand dollars capital stock, to complete the road. The work of pushing it forward was accompanied with a series of difficulties, principal among which was the diversity of opinion as to the route to be taken, and the obstacles that arose to the ready raising of funds for the enterprise.

During the spring and summer of 1873 the work of construction progressed, but the financial panic of that year and other circumstances prevented the ready sale of the bonds of the company even at ninety cents. The directors had made themselves personally responsible for some fifteen or twenty thousand dollars indebtedness incurred, and the board felt compelled to suspend work on Jan. 1, 1874, until some arrangements for financial relief had been effected. On Jan. 5, 1874, the board of directors elected consisted of R. W. Shenk (president), A. H. Peacock, George W. Hensel, D. G. Swartz, W. L. Peifer, C. A. Bitner, W. H. Kemble, J. D. Skiles, Amos Hollinger, John Keller, Daniel Herr, Henry Carpenter, C. M. Hess.

About this time the financial difficulties of the corporation retarding the completion of the work, and an opening being offered by the lease of it to the Philadelphia and Reading Road to extend the system of the latter down into the city of Lancaster, negotiations were begun for an arrangement between the two companies by which a joinder of their interests could be effected. During the next few months these negotiations were consummated in a contract by which the Philadelphia and Reading Company leased the Quarryville section and undertook its completion, indorsing some three hundred and ten thousand dollars of the bonds yet to be issued, and raising thereon the necessary funds, changing the road to a full gauge, and making a contract to lease, operate, and maintain the road. This arrangement, first secured by an executive committee consisting of Messrs. Shenk, Hensel, Peacock, and Keller, and then approved by the full board, was finally ratified at a meeting of the stockholders held on March 9, 1874. With this the history of the original company practically ends, though it has ever since maintained its corporate existence as lessor of the road.

The work of completing the road was pushed forward rapidly by the Philadelphia and Reading Company. To this corporation, lessees of the Reading and Columbia Branch, large advantage was offered in buying its line from the outside of the city down through the very heart of it, establishing a passenger and express station at West King and Water Streets, and making connections with the cotton-mills, coal-yards, furnace, and other industrial establishments in the lower part of the city. To insure safety in passing the road over Water Street from Orange several squares southward, the large sewer running through that part of the street was taken up and entirely rebuilt, an enterprise costing the company about forty thousand dollars, and of great practical benefit to the city. On July 24, 1874, the first spike in the road was driven by President Shenk, in Water Street, between Walnut and Lemon, Lancaster. After more than three months' work on the Water Street sewer, the last keystone of the inclosing section of the arch was laid on Nov. 11, 1874. Track-laying, bridge-building, and other finishing-up work of the line were steadily kept up from this time on. On December 10th a train was run over the city section of the road from Water and Lemon Streets to the gas-works, thirty-two years after the first survey of the street for a railroad line had been made.

On March 17, 1875, the last spike was driven at Quarryville by George W. Hensel, and on May 11, 1875, the formal opening of the road took place. It was signalized by the running of three excursion trains from Lancaster to Quarryville, carrying the judges, City Councils, school board, Board of Trade, and five or six hundred citizens, representing professional and mercantile life, railroad officials, journalists, and others from all parts of the State. It was notable that so large a representation of the business men of Lancaster had never before gone out of the city on a single occasion, and the demonstration at Quarryville was such as had never been seen there.

A public meeting was organized in the town, presided over by James Collins, and speeches were made by George W. Hensel, Maj. R. W. Shenk, William McCormsey, George M. Steinman, W. U. Hensel, Samuel Dickey, W. W. Nevin, and W. A. Wilson.

In the more than eight years which have elapsed since then the operation of the road has more than justified all the hopes of its projectors and the expectations of its lessees. Its business in freight, passenger, and express traffic has grown steadily. Its connections with the Reading and Columbia have been of advantage alike to both, and the transfer of the central city station from its former location in Lancaster to King Street has been of great convenience to its patrons and of large advantage to the main line.

CHARLES AUGUSTUS BITNER, transporter and proprietor of the fast freight line from Lancaster to Philadelphia, is the son of Abraham and Elizabeth (Porter) Bitner, of Lancaster, and was born in that city Jan. 14, 1830. His business career began at the early age of fourteen, when he was characterized for industrious habits, self-reliance, and a disposition to mark out his own course through life. For two years he took contracts for grading and excavating for cellars in the city. At the age of sixteen, for one year, he was conductor of a freight line to Philadelphia for Robert Moderwell. In 1847, associated with his brother, John R. Bitner, they began the freight and forwarding business from Lancaster on their own account, the firm-name being John R. Bitner & Brother. Although dependent entirely upon their own resources for means to do business with, this firm gradually added to their beginning of one and two cars until they owned some thirty, and with a proportionately increasing business continued forwarding by their fast freight line from Lancaster to Philadelphia, and on other railroads in this and other States, until 1874, running their cars on the State Railroad, subsequently on the Pennsylvania Railroad tracks, and making the distance in eleven hours. The partnership was dissolved in the latter year, and for five years following Mr. Bitner was a dealer in leaf tobacco in Lancaster. In 1879 he opened an office and freight-house on the Reading Railroad in Lancaster and resumed the forwarding business, running his cars on the Reading Railroad tracks. His son Charles has been a partner with him in this business since January, 1882. Mr. Bitner has been closely identified with other various interests which have contributed to build up Lancaster. He was one of the stockholders of the first cotton-mills in Lancaster; of the Lancaster Manufacturing Company; of the Millersville Horse Railroad and a director for many years; one of the originators and a director of the Quarryville Railroad; of the Stevens House Company, which built the Stevens House, completed in 1877, a palatial hotel in Lancaster; of the Lancaster Bolt Company, and of the Lancaster Watch Company, for which he donated three acres of land upon which to erect a manufactory, and he was chairman of the building committee that built the Northern Market in Lancaster. He was a member of the Select Council of the city for two years, and of the Common Council for some five years. His life has been almost wholly devoted to business pursuits, and his main interests have been identified with enterprises that have contributed largely to the prosperity and growth of his native city. He married Rebecca Ibach, of Lancaster, who was a native of Birdsborough, Berks Co. Their children are Emma (wife of J. G. Zook, of Lancaster), Charles, Mary Margaret (deceased), Ann Rebecca, and Daisy Irene Bitner.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THAT Lancaster County, Pa., is the first agricultural county in the Union is due largely to the fact that there has dwelt within her borders for more than a century and a half the hardy descendants of the old German and Swiss Mennonites, whose quiet and unobtrusive religious belief has led them to dedicate their simple lives to that pursuit wherein they could find most congenial surroundings for their peculiar church discipline and devotional practices, which practices through all that period they have preserved with singular purity and with remarkable fidelity to the teachings of their great founder, Menno, of Friesland. A recent historian says, "The philologist who seeks to know something of the language of the primeval man of Europe finds amid the mountains of the Pyrenees the Basques, who have preserved down to the present time the tongue of these remote forefathers. The ethnologist studies the habits of prehistoric races not by the uncertain light of early legends, but by going to the islands of the South Pacific, where savage life still exists as it was before the dawn of civilization. The historian who, pursuing the same methods of investigation, would stand face to face with the Reformation need only visit the Mennonites of Lancaster County, Pa., where he can see still rigorously preserved the thought, the faith, the habits, the ways of living, and even the dress of that important epoch. The hymn-book in ordinary use by the Amish was written in the sixteenth century, and from it they still zealously sing about Felix Mantz, who was drowned at Zurich in 1526, and Michael Sattler, who had his tongue torn out and was then burned to death at Rottenburg in 1527. Whether we regard their personal history or the result of their teachings, the Mennonites were the most interesting people who came to America. There is scarcely a family among them which cannot be traced to some ancestor burned to death because of his faith. Their whole literature smacks of the fire. Beside a record like theirs the sufferings of Pilgrim and Quaker seem trivial. A hundred years before the time of Roger Williams, George Fox, and William Penn, the Dutch Reformer Menno Simons contended for the complete severance of Church and State, and the struggles for religious and political liberty which convulsed England and led to the English colonization of America in the seventeenth century were logical results of doctrines advanced by the Dutch and German Anabaptists in the one which preceded." This is a bold and sweeping claim for a place in history for the Mennonites, but let him who challenges it look well to the ground on which he stands.

The sixteenth century was a period of unrest in the Old World. Europe was at length standing at the foot of the long ascent which was to lead out of Middle Age superstition and servitude to false and degrading religious pretensions. When Luther threw down his gauntlet to the Vatican the peoples of the German blood were stirred to their depths by revolutionary impulses which had been arranging and rearranging themselves under many forms for the final conflict. In religion were the Waldenses, the Cathari, the Beghards, the Lollards, and many sects of Anabaptists. In politics existed the secret leagues of "The Poor Conrad," the "Bundschuh," the "Brothers of the Free Spirit." Of all the dreadful visitations to Europe in which this sixteenth century spirit sought expression, the Peasants' war of Germany was the worst. A hundred thousand of them fell in battle or were driven into exile, and their cause was stamped out in blood; not so, however, their ideas. The Middle Age spirit the brave peasants had challenged, and it must henceforth fight for its existence alongside of popery and whatever else men saw fit to condemn. When the smoke of the pillaged castles and ruined vineyards had ascended to heaven, and the earth had drunk up the blood from the hundred battle-fields, and the last remnant of the warlike Anabaptists had fallen under the mercenaries' heel or the headsman's axe, when the detonations of the fierce popular explosion had ceased longer to terrify, and the empire, surfeited with bloodshed, had begun to stay the hand of destruction, out of the vast chaos, the confusion of beliefs, the contempt for creed arose a new apostle with a new doctrine. And yet it was not new. The same fundamental belief had been promulgated by Waldus in the twelfth century and by Wickliffe in the fourteenth. It was Christianity in humility, and the apostle was Menno Simon.

Though his early history is somewhat wrapped in obscurity, we learn that he was born at Witmarsum, in West Friesland, about the year 1492, the same year in which Columbus discovered America, that he had been educated a priest, and installed as vicar of Pingium in 1524, when he began to be troubled in regard to the doctrine of transubstantiation, and to study the New Testament from his own stand-point. He is represented as a man of vigorous understanding, natural and persuasive eloquence, quiet and gentle de-meator, who drew to himself adherents from all classes by his probity and meekness, his uprightness and self-sacrifice, to which he added a zeal for the promotion of practical piety which made him a true and genuine leader for the scattered sectaries whom anarchy and persecution had left without direction, and almost without impulse. In 1531, Menno renounced popery altogether, and shortly after a number of persons came to him, whom he describes as of one heart and soul with himself, and these earnestly besought him to take upon himself the ministry of the word. In this little handful of believers we have the first Mennonite congregation and the first Mennonite pastor.

They were undoubtedly Waldenses who had survived the fires of persecution and the fury of the Peasant war. There are many things besides creed and religious practices, the implications of contemporary writers, and the direct testimony of the historians Van Bragt, Rooson, Mehrning, and others, that lead to this conclusion. The Waldenses had been the valley people of the Alpine fastnesses, almost the only places in Europe where the corroding influences of the church had failed to destroy the simplicity of primitive Christianity. Neander says, "They not only disapproved of oaths, but held it unchristian to shed blood," which are among the fundamental teachings of Menno. Frank, a very ancient writer, speaking of the Waldensian belief, says, "They reject infant baptism, they live a blameless Christian life, invoke no saints or any creature; they call upon God alone, they swear not at all, and maintain that no Christian is allowed to swear. They have no mendicant among them, but they help each other as brethren. These are the true Waldenses." Since they likewise opposed war and taking part in civil government, the stricter of them could not become Lutherans, Zwinglians, or Calvinists, and the inference is irresistible that they lost their identity in that sect which has preserved to our own day their practices and belief, and which here in Lancaster County, Pa., in the nineteenth century, exacts the rigid simplicity and stout self-denial which successfully resisted Roman absolutism in Europe during the fifteenth.

Of course the Mennonites inherited at the same time the terms of opprobrium with which the Papists had for centuries been pleased to stigmatize all those who differed with themselves. The followers of Menno have frequently been confounded with the Munsterites, or warlike section of the Anabaptists, among whom the enthusiasm of the Reformation led to frightful excesses. There is nothing in ecclesiastical history better authenticated than not only his lack of sympathy with, but his utter abhorrence and detestation of their practices, one of the first acts of Menno's ministry being the preparation of a work stigmatizing the Munster king and his "ungodly doctrine." With reference to the unjust confounding of these sects because they agreed in the visible act of repeating baptism, history is rapidly changing front, and the furious and fanatical are being separated from the gentle and pious, as it is being discovered and brought to light that these terms of opprobrium have been for centuries fastened upon great numbers of people whom history has dealt with unjustly and harshly, because historians were enemies or the tools of enemies, and because the learning of the period was sifted through bigotry and intolerance. A sect must be judged by its principles, not by its slanderers. Herzog's "German Encyclopedia," a high authority, thus treats of the great apostle: "The ground thought from which Menno proceeded was not, as with Luther, justification by faith, or, as with the Swiss reformers, the absolute dependence of the sinner upon God in the work of salvation. The holy Christian life in opposition to worldliness was the point whence Menno proceeded, and to which he always returned. In the Romish Church we see the ruling spirit of Peter; in the Reformed Evangelical, of Paul; in Menno we see arise again James the Just, the brother of the Lord."

Luther's conception undoubtedly was that of a State church. It was in accordance with the spirit of his times, the religious temper of his age, and grandly did the problem work itself out from the impulse he gave it. Menno Simon had a scheme equally grand, more devout, and of more exalted piety. He saw the north of Europe the home of hunted sects; he saw in these, or thought he saw, the outlines of the ancient religion, obscured and distorted, it is true, by the traditions in which it had been preserved, but consonant still with the teachings of Christ the Redeemer as He interpreted them to the multitude by the Sea of Galilee, and to the eleven on the Mount of the Ascension. To gather these sects, which under various names were becoming entangled in the dangerous heresies of the Reformation period, and unite them under one fold free alike from the plagues of Rome and the delusions of the world, was the work he set before himself. In order to accomplish this Menno insisted on the most careful attention to moral duties and exercised the severest discipline toward offenders, employing even the ban of excommunication from fellowship of the church. About Menno there grew up a large and flourishing sect. On questions of discipline after a time they became divided into the Flemings, or Flandrians, and the Waterlanders, from districts of Holland in which each resided. These divisions led to intestine discords, which were finally settled at a Synod held in Amsterdam in 1630. Their early history is a story of frightful persecutions endured with rare and heroic fortitude. Three thousand of them suffered martyrdom in Suabia, Bavaria, Austria, and the Tyrol; six thousand under the rule of Philip II. of Spain. Pennypacker says, "There were nearly as many martyrs among the Mennonites in the city of Antwerp alone as there were Protestants burned to death in England during the whole reign of Bloody Mary."

Menno himself, during the greater part of his ministry, went about with a price on his head. Malefactors were promised pardon and murderers absolution if they would deliver him up. Sometimes clad like a peasant, with an axe on his shoulder, to disarm suspicion, he would go into the depths of the forest to minister to his scanty flock assembled there; again in the caves of the earth he gathered his faithful ones, and when persecution was sorest they oftentimes held these Christian communions in the dead of the night, purposely avoiding the knowledge of each other's names, that, if apprehended and put to the rack or instrument of torture, no unguarded word in the awful extremity of the hour might escape their lips to betray one another. Of course their meetings and their practices were thus shrouded with an almost impenetrable obscurity, which was constantly taken advantage of by their enemies to proclaim them as plotters of sedition as well as practitioners of heresy. They were persecuted by Catholics and Protestants alike. In Switzerland, the land of William Tell and Ulrich Zwingli, when the Reformed Church was yet but five years old and its members were themselves still the subjects of persecution, the Protestant State Church inaugurated a frightful persecution of the Mennonites, to be followed during the next century and a quarter by every appliance of vengeance, until the persecution of 1659, exceeding all its predecessors in severity, almost totally annihilated the sect.

These Swiss persecutions of the Mennonites must ever stand as a blot on the pages of the Protestant Reformation, and more especially as they were perpetrated chiefly, by that church which they most closely resembled of all Protestant communions. We know there are excuses offered, but they are the excuses of cowardice. It is attempted to palliate the naked ugliness of these undertakings by saying that to have permitted their religious irregularities longer would have invoked the wrath of the powerful emperor, and perhaps subjected all the cantons to papal persecution and the destruction of their ancient liberties. The Mennonite persecutions were then a bid for political favor and protection? The extreme severity of the Swiss Protestants against the Mennonites sent a chill of horror through all Germany, and drew a memorable protest from the burgomasters and lords of Rotterdam. An ambassador went out from The Hague loaded with remonstrances, but they seem all to have been of no avail, for Swiss Mennonites, branded with the arms of the canton of Berne and chained to their seats, continued to pull galleys in the Mediterranean, to work on the fortifications of Malta, and to be sold to Barbary pirates, principally because they differed from their Protestant brethren as to whether a child should be held at the baptismal font as soon as it could be carried there by its nurse, or whether the age of discretion was the appropriate period to receive the holy ordinance.

But while the iron hold of persecution was tightening its grip at one end of the Rhine Valley, it was relaxing its hold at the other. Towards the close of the sixteenth century a grand and historic personage advanced upon the scene and became sponsor for the persecuted Mennonites. Mosheim says, "The Mennonites, after having been long in an uncertain and precarious situation, obtained a fixed and unmolested settlement in the United Provinces under the shade of a legal toleration procured for them by William Prince of Orange, the glorious founder of Belgic liberty. This illustrious chief, who acted from principle in allowing liberty of conscience and worship to Christians of different denominations, was moreover engaged by gratitude to favor the Mennonites, who had assisted him in the year 1572 with a comfortable sum of money when his coffers were almost exhausted."

He was frequently urged to persecute the Mennonites, and violently assaulted for his refusal to do so. His trusted friend, Saint Aldegonde, the distinguished patriot of the Netherlands, complained because he would not do it; and Peter Dathenus denounced him as an atheist for the same reason. Both civil magistrates and clergy made a long and obstinate opposition to his proclaimed toleration towards this people, an opposition not entirely conquered by him at the time of his death, but which on every occasion he resolutely discountenanced through his whole life.

In 1627, finding themselves studiously and persistently misrepresented and misunderstood, the Mennonites at length broke their long silence by publishing to the world their Confession of Faith at Amsterdam, which secured them absolute tranquillity in Holland ever after.

They, in common with all Holland, shared the advantages which the revocation of the Edict of Nantes brought to the Dutch nation, and grew rich and numerous. Many now became well educated, and occupied high social and commercial relations. The deft Flemish weavers, the rare lace-makers, the skillful artisans who made the Low Countries the home of superior trades found among their sect unrivaled craftsmen. The famous linens and silks of Crefeld were woven on Huguenot and Mennonite looms, and there was an entire class of fabric known at that time in the Dutch trade as Mennonite goods. Mosheim said of them at a little later period, "It is certain that the Mennonites in Holland at this day are, in their tables, their equipages, and their country-seats, the most luxurious of the Dutch nation. This is more especially true of the Mennonites of Amsterdam, who are numerous and exceedingly opulent."

We now come to where the widening influences of this people touch the rim of our own age and history. On the 4th of March, 1681, Charles II. of England granted William Penn a great tract of land in the New World. Penn was a Quaker. The Quakers may be called the Mennonites of England. Professor Oswald Seidensticker, an eminent German-American authority, thus treats their relationship: "The affinity between the religious principles of the Friends and the Mennonites is so obvious and in many respects so striking that an actual descent of the former from the latter has been hinted at as highly probable." "So clearly," says Barclay, "do their views (i.e., those of the Mennonites) correspond with those of George Fox that we are compelled to view him as the unconscious exponent of the doctrine, practice, and discipline of the ancient and stricter parties of the Dutch Mennonites." Arguments are cumulative on this point, but cannot be indulged in here.

It is certain that the two visits of William Penn to Holland and Germany, in the years 1671 and 1677, and his contact with the Mennonites there, had much to do with preparing his philanthropic mind for erecting an asylum for the persecuted of all classes in the New World. On the first of these visits he came in contact with the poor wretches who, stripped of everything but life, were fleeing from the Calvinistic persecutions of the cantons of Berne and Zurich; on the second the monuments of Turenne's heartless warfare stared him in the face; and on both he was confronted with the impossibility of these people, who resembled his own followers, except in language, ever obtaining rest in troubled Europe.

Penn was a business man. The Quakers of England, while they might be sufficient in number to justify emigration, were not sufficiently numerous for an extended scheme of colonization; but add to them the Mennonites of Holland and Germany, and Lord Baltimore on the one side of Penn's proposed grant, and the Duke of York on the other, could well look to their European laurels in the thrift and the industry that would bloom in the Quaker colony beyond the seas. Penn had peculiar qualifications for his work among the German and Dutch Mennonites. He was a good linguist, spoke fluently both Dutch and German; he carried in his person all manly graces, so that while he appealed with the fire of enthusiast, he charmed with the finish of courtier. And is it to be wondered that, from the impression he must have made by his zeal and candor, the Mennonites responded promptly to the earnest invitation Roosen says Penn gave them in 1683 to join his colony in America?

This was the Germantown colony. The Lancaster County immigration had its impulse at a later period, and in consequence of the Swiss intolerance, the ravages of the Palatinate, and the continuing disturbances on the French and German border lands. In spite of the harryings of the Swiss, the ravages of the cruel generals of Louis XIV., and the revocation of the French edict, these poor people, diminished in numbers, still had clung to their homes. Between seasons of persecution their friends in Holland would send them slight succor. "Meantime," says Bancroft, "the news spread that William Penn, the Quaker, had opened an asylum to the good and the oppressed of every nation, and humanity went through Europe gathering the children of misfortune." Out from their hiding-places in the forest depths and the mountain valleys, which the sun scarce penetrated, they came, clad in the coarsest homespun, their dialects unintelligible, their feet shod with wood, and set their faces toward that far-off land in which some strange prophecy had told them "the Mennonites would be prosperous and happy."

About the beginning of the eighteenth century the Holland Mennonites, whom, we have seen, had become rich and powerful, determined to erect an organized system of charity to assist their brethren in distant and hostile communities. This determination culminated in the formation of "The Committee on Foreign Needs," and the step was made necessary by the utter helplessness of the many refugees on the one hand, and by the shameful impositions of the Dutch and English trading firms who gave them passage on the other. It was under the direct supervision of this committee that the greater part of the Lancaster County Mennonite immigration was made. The story of this committee and its extensive labors in behalf of the early colonization of Pennsylvania is one of the interesting chapters of our history which yet remains to be written. It labored and pursued its valuable labors for eighty years and only ceased when persecution relaxed its rigors, and extortion was regulated by law.

The first authentic account we have of the Lancaster County settlement is that Hans Meylin, his son, Martin, and Hans Herr, John Rudolph Bundly, Martin Kendig, Jacob Miller, Martin Oberholtzer, Hans Funk, Michael Oberholtzer, Wendell Bowman, and others, with their families, came as far as the Conestoga in 1709, and there selected a tract of ten thousand acres to the north of Pequea Creek. The warrant for this was recorded, and the land surveyed to them Oct. 23, 1710. A very quaint account of them says, the sect came from a German Palatinate, at the invitation of William Penn. "The men wore long red caps on their heads. The women had neither bonnets, hats, nor caps, but merely a string passing around the head to keep the hair from the face. The dress both of female and male was domestic, quite plain, made of coarse material, after an old fashion of their own." Soon after their arrival at Philadelphia they took a westerly course, in pursuit of a location where they could all live in one vicinity. They selected a rich limestone country, beautifully adorned with sugar-maple, hickory, and black and white walnut, on the border of a delightful stream abounding in the finest trout. Here they raised their humble cabins. The water of the Pequea was clear, cold, transparent, and the grape-vines and clematis intertwining among the lofty branches of the majestic buttonwood formed a pleasant retreat from the noon-beams of a summer sun."

Rupp, who wrote in 1844, though commonplace and sometimes tiresome, alone, of all the earlier chroniclers of this people, has put us under obligations for the scanty details he has preserved in an historical form of the early colony. "On the 23d of October the land was surveyed and divided among the Meylins, Herr, Kendig, and others of the company. Having erected temporary shelters, some set about it and put up dwellings of more durableness. Martin Kendig erected one of hewed walnut logs on his tract, which withstood the storms and rain, the gnawings of the tooth of time, for more than one hundred and ten years, and might, had it not been removed in 1841, and its place taken up by one of more durable materials, have withstood the corroding elements for generations to come. They now began to build houses and add new acquisitions of lands to their first possessions. To depend upon their Indian neighbors for provisions was useless. The Indians depended mainly upon game and fish. Of course, the supplies of provisions were scanty, and what they had they were under the necessity to transport from a distant settlement for some time, till the seeds sown in a fertile soil yielded some thirty, others fortyfold. Fish and fowl were plenty in the wilds. The season of their arrival was favorable around them, they saw crowned the tall hazel with rich festoons of luscious grapes. After they had been scarce fairly seated they thought of their old homes, their country, and friends. They sighed for those whom they left for a season. They remembered them that were in bonds as bound with them, and which suffered adversity, and ere the earth began to yield a return in kindly fruits to their labors, consultations were held and measures devised to send some over to their Vaterland to bring the residue of some of their families—also their kindred and brothers in a land of trouble and oppression to their new home—into a land where peace reigned and abundance of the comforts of life could not fail. They had strong faith in the fruitfulness and natural advantages of their choice of lands, they knew these would prove to them and their children the home of plenty. Their anticipations have never failed.

"A council of the whole society was called, at which their venerable minister and pastor, Hans Herr, presided. And after fraternal and free interchange of sentiment, much consultation and serious reflection, lots, in conformity to the custom of the Mennonites, were cast to decide who should return to Europe for the families left behind and others. The lot fell upon Hans Herr, who had left five sons,—Christian, Emanuel, John, Abraham, and one whose name we have not learned. This decision was agreeable to his own mind, but to his friends and charge it was unacceptable. To be separated from their preacher could be borne with reluctance and heaviness of heart only. They were all too ardently attached to him to cheerfully acquiesce in this determination. Reluctantly they consented to his departure; after much anxiety manifested on account of this unexpected call of their pastor from them, their sorrows were alleviated by a proposal made on the part of Martin Kendig that, if approved, he would take Hans Herr's place. This was cordially assented to by all. Without unnecessary delay, Martin, the devoted friend of the colony, made ready, went to Philadelphia, and there embarked for Europe. After a prosperous voyage of five or six weeks he reached the home of his friends, where he was received with apostolic greetings and salutations of joy. Having spent some time in preliminary arrangements, he and a company of Swiss and some Germans bade a lasting adieu to their old homes, and dissolved the tender ties of friendship with those whom they left. With this company, consisting of the residue of some of those in America, and of Peter Yordea, Jacob Miller, Hans Tschantz, Henry Funk, John Houser, John Bachman, Jacob Weber, Schlegel, Venerick, Guldin, and others, he returned to the new home, where they were all cordially embraced by their fathers and friends. With this accession, the settlement was considerably augmented, and now numbered about thirty families. Though they lived in the midst of the Mingoe or Conestoga, Pequea, and Shawanese Indians, they were nevertheless safely seated, and had nothing to fear from the Indians. They mingled with them in fishing and hunting. The Indians were hospitable and respectful to the whites, and exceedingly civil. The little colony improved their lands, planted orchards, erected dwellings, and a meeting and school-house for the settlement, in which religious instruction on the Sabbath and during the week, knowledge of letters, reading and writing, were given to those who assembled to receive information." Other and more numerous groups of colonists followed these pioneers in 1711, 1717, and a large settlement was made in the more northern parts of Lancaster County and within the limits of Lebanon in 1727. Very scanty, indeed, are the details of these early Mennonite movements, but scanty as they are a little that may be regarded as authentic of the Lancaster County settlers has lately struggled into light through the labors of Professor Scheffer, of Amsterdam, among the old records of the "Dutch Committee on Foreign Needs."

"It is no wonder that half a year later the Committee on Foreign Needs cherished few hopes concerning the colony. [This evidently refers to the Germantown settlement.] They felt, however, for nine or ten families, who had come to Rotterdam, according to information from there under date of April 8, 1709, from the neighborhood of Worms and Frankenthal, in order to emigrate, and whom they earnestly sought to dissuade from making the journey. They were, said the letter from Rotterdam, 'altogether very poor men, who intended to seek a better piece of abode in Pennsylvania. Much has been expended upon them hitherto freely, and these people bring with them scarcely anything that is necessary in the way of raiment and provisions, and much less the money that must be spent for fare from here to England and from there on the great journey, before they can settle in that foreign land.' . . . The emigrants of April, 1709, accomplished their object, though, as it appears, through the assistance of others; at all events, I think they are the ones referred to by Jacob Telner, a Netherlander Mennonite, dwelling at London, who wrote, August 6th, to Amsterdam and Haarlem: 'Eight families went to Pennsylvania; the English Friends, who are called Quakers, helped them liberally.'

Barclay, in his "Religious Societies of the Commonwealth," says, "But not only did the leaders of the early Society of Friends take great interest in the Mennonites, but the Yearly Meeting of 1709 contributed fifty pounds (a very large sum at that time) for the Mennonites of the Palatinate, who had fled from the persecution of the Calvinists in Switzerland." This required the agreement of the representatives of above four hundred churches, and shows in a strong light the sympathy which existed among the early Friends for the Mennonites.

There can be little doubt that this was the group of Mennonites who appeared in the autumn of 1709 on the banks of the Pequea. The dates correspond exactly, as does also the number and the nationality of them.

The first Lancaster County settlement of Mennonites seems to have been composed of persons who had fled from the persecutions of the Swiss Cantons in the previous century, and remained for some time settled at various points on the Rhine, particularly in the Palatinate, the Elector of which at that time seemed kindly disposed. The group of 1717, however, who settled higher up on the Conestoga, came fresh from a new Swiss outbreak. Professor Scheffer says, "Fiercer than ever became the persecution of the Mennonites in Switzerland; the prisons of Bern were filled with the unfortunates, and the inhuman treatment to which they were subjected caused many to pine away and die. The rest feared from day to day that the minority in the Council, which demanded their trial, would soon become a majority. Through the intercession, however, of the states-general, whose aid the Netherland Mennonites sought, not without success, some results were effected. The Council of Bern finally determined to send the prisoners, well watched and guarded, in order to transport them from there in an English ship to Pennsylvania. On the 18th of March, 1710, the exiles departed from Bern; on the 28th, with their vessel, they reached Manheim, and on the 6th of April, Nimeguen; and when they touched Netherland soil their sufferings came to an end at last. They were free, and their useless guards could return to Switzerland. . . . Most of them went to the Palatinate to seek their kinsmen and friends, and before long a deputation of them came back here. On the 1st of May we find three of their preachers,—Hans Burchi or Burghalter, Melchoir Zaller, and Benedict Brechtbuhl,—with Hans Rub and Peter Donens, in Amsterdam, where they gave a further account of their affairs with the Bern magistracy, and apparently consulted with the committee as to whether they should establish themselves near the Palatinate brethren or on the land in the neighborhood of Campen and Gronigen, which was to be gradually purchased by the committee on behalf of the fugitives. The majority preferred a residence in the Palatinate, but they soon found great difficulty in accomplishing it. The Palatinate community was generally poor, so that the brethren, with the best disposition, could be of little service in insuring the means of gaining a livelihood. There was a scarcity of lands and farm-houses, and there was much to be desired in the way of religious liberty, since they were subject entirely to the humors of the Elector or, worse still, his officers.

For nearly seven years, often supported by the Netherland brethren, they waited and persevered, always hoping for better times. Then, their numbers being continually increased, they finally determined upon other measures, and at a meeting of their elders at Manheim, in February, 1717, decided to call upon the Netherlanders for help in carrying out the great plan of removing to Pennsylvania, which they had long contemplated, and which had then come to maturity." Hans Burghalter, the leader of this movement, is mentioned by Rupp in his list of early Mennonite preachers, and Pennypacker speaks of him as still preaching on the Conestoga in 1727. On the 20th of March, 1717, the Committee on Foreign Needs received information that over one hundred persons had set out, and soon afterwards they learned from Rotterdam that the number had been increased to three hundred souls.

In 1726 another movement began, and emigration started afresh and with renewed force from the Palatinate. This territory was subject to the whims and caprices of the Elector, and it seldom happened that two succeeding Electors embraced the same faith. Frederick II. was a Lutheran, Frederick III. a Roman Catholic, Ludovic again a Lutheran, his son and successor a Calvinist, who in turn was succeeded by a Catholic house. Every change of dynasty brought a change of treatment. Now the Lutherans, now the Catholics, now the Calvinists persecuted or were persecuted in turn, as the complexion of prince and court took ecclesiastical hue from the religion it practiced. The valley of the Rhine likewise lay between two powerful and belligerent rivals; for centuries it had been the path of conquest; from the days of Attila to the days of Adolphus, in almost every generation, it had shaken to the tread of marching armies.

Again, in 1726, the Elector was unfriendly, and again the clouds of impending war were gathering behind the Vosges. "On the 12th of April, 1727, there were one hundred and fifty ready to depart, and on the 16th of May the committee were compelled to write to the Palatinate that they 'ought to be informed of the coming of those already on the way, so that they could best provide for them,' and they further inquired 'how many would arrive without means, so that the society might consider whether it would be possible for them to arrange for the many and great expenses of the passage.' Some did not need help, and could supply from their own means what was required; but on the 20th the committee learned that forty-five more needy ones had started from the Palatinate. These, with eight others, cost the society 3271 f. 16st. Before the end of July twenty-one more came to Rotterdam, and so it continued. No wonder that the committee, concerned about such an outpouring, requested the community in Pennsylvania 'to announce emphatically from the pulpit that they must no more advise their needy friends and acquaintances to come out of the Palatinate, and should encourage them with the promise that if they only remained across the sea, they would be liberally provided for in everything.' If, however, they added, the Pennsylvanians wanted to pay for the passage of the poor Palatines, it would be their own affair. This the Pennsylvanians were not ready or in a condition to do. The committee also sent forbidding letter after letter to the Palatinate, but every year they had to be repeated, and sometimes, as for instance, May 6, 1733, they drew frightful pictures: 'We learn from New York that a ship from Rotterdam going to Pennsylvania with one hundred and fifty Palatines' wandered twenty-four weeks at sea. When they finally arrived at port nearly all the people were dead. The rest, through want of vivres, were forced to subsist on rats and vermin, and all are sick and weak. The danger of such an occurrence is always so great that the most heedless do not run the risk except through extreme want.' Nevertheless, the stream of emigrants did not cease."

The struggles of this good-natured committee and their endeavors to tighten their purse-strings when their hearts were wide open is one of the finest tributes in history to the genuine Dutch benevolence and Dutch liberality. One cannot help smiling as he reads over remonstrance after remonstrance and declaration after declaration that this was the last dollar they would pay, that their funds were exhausted and their patience too, and then finds a new shipload and a fresh cargo invoiced in their name from the land of trouble and tyranny to the land of peace and plenty. God bless "The Committee on Foreign Needs" of Holland! and may the people of Lancaster County learn the value of its friendship to their stricken and persecuted ancestry.

After 1733 we lose trace of any distinct Mennonite emigrations to this country, though Mennonites came through the entire remainder of the eighteenth century, during the latter part of which especially emigration became a great commercial factor, and enlisted the keen business competition of the English and Dutch trading firms, enabling them to build up enormous fortunes by bringing indigent emigrants by tens of thousands to our shores and selling their services to whoever would pay their passage-money. Likewise the great desirability of the Germans as colquists, on account of their thrift and sturdy habits, led Queen Anne to create a bounty for them, and George I. to keep an agent at the Court of Holland, whose exclusive business it was to recruit emigrants. In the life of Conrad Weiser we are told "Good Queen Anne, of England, offered a free passage to America, the fabled land of promise." And the wily old George I. addressed the poor Mennonites, who had been harried for centuries through Europe, with these seductive words, "Since it has been observed that the Christians called Baptists or Mennonites have been denied freedom of conscience in various places in Germany and Switzerland and endure much opposition from their enemies, so that with difficulty they support themselves scattered here and there, and have been hindered in the exercise of their religion,"—purely disinterested language, with a streak of philanthropy running through it. He then tells them of the glorious homes that can be had in his colonies in Pennsylvania, where they can, "without interference, exercise their religion in meetings, just as do the Reformed and Lutherans;" how the land is well watered and magnificently timbered, the soil fertile and inexhaustible, the woods hanging thick with white and purple grapes, the country full of cattle called buffaloes and elks, and likewise bears that will hurt nobody; how deer may be had for the shooting, and "Indian cocks and hens (wild turkeys) which weigh from twenty to thirty pounds each, wild pigeons more than in any other place in the world, partridges, pheasants, wild swans, geese, all kinds of ducks, and many other small fowls and animals."

Thus it happens that the earlier colonists, who were driven out by persecution, were succeeded by the later emigrants, who were drawn hither for different and less worthy motives. This will serve to explain the historical fact so often noticed that the first settlers were the sturdier and better educated, that the work they did was loftier and more earnest in its character than that which followed. It smacked more of the church and the school-house and principle, and was less controlled by that measure men call "success."

There is an address extant (it being a memorial of the Amish Mennonites to William Penn) which breathes the fervent spirit which animated them, and at the same time illustrates their principles and aims in the land of their adoption. It is dated May 20, 1718, the month and year in which Penn died:

"To the most worshipful and respectable Proprietor of the Province, William Penn, and his Deputy Governor:

"We came to Pennsylvania to seek an asylum from the persecution to which we had been subjected in Europe. We knew the character of William Penn, and rejoiced God had made such a man. We had been told that the Indian right to the soil had been extinguished by purchase, to enable the conscientiously scrupulous to settle and enjoy their religious opinions without restraint. It was with primitive notions like the Patriarchs of antiquity we removed to the land of promise, but to our grief and surprise and mortification the government neither respected the conscience of the proprietary nor the faith of the Amish. We were invited to settle in this land by William Penn.

"Listen to us; if you do not, who will? We are required to obey laws in whose making we cannot participate (the Amish differing from the other Mennonites at that time in not voting). We are governed by the laws of God, you by the laws of man. Those of human authority cannot control us in opposition to His will declared in the Holy Scriptures. We do not attend elections, we enter not your Courts of Justice, we hold no offices either civil or military. We did not object to the payment of our land, because it was purchased by William Penn, and you are entitled to remuneration, but we hold it to be a grievance that, entertaining nearly the same opinions as the respectable Society of Friends, we should like them be subjected to Military and Civil Jurisdiction, especially when it is recollected that the head and proprietor, whom we now have the honor through you to address, is himself a member of that society. The Society of Friends at least ought to have escaped such treatment. We are not a little people, for our neighbors, the Mennonites and the Tunkers, are also liable to be insulted by the tyranny of authority.

"We came to Pennsylvania to enjoy freedom of mind and body, expecting no other imposition than that declared by God. As we have been taught to hurt not our neighbors, so do we expect that our neighbors will do us no injury. As we cannot contract debts, we require no law for their recovery.

"If we should be so unfortunate as to have indigent neighbors, we shall provide for their wants. The same inclination that tends to the preservation of our children prompts to the care of every member of our flock. Conscience, the voice of God, deters us from the commission of crime. As we commit no crime, hard is it for us to suffer for those of others. We ought not to be compelled to pay for the maintenance of convicts.

"We ask you for permission to pass our lives in innocence and tranquillity. Let us pursue our avocations unmolested. We respect your rights, respect our customs. We ask nothing of you but what the Word of God can justify."

Here is a little of the lofty spirit of the first emigration; it is the spirit of the Swiss mountains. It brought the answer. The Deputy Governor sent orders to the judicial officers to mitigate the civil duties imposed upon the peace sects in the valley of the Conestoga, and they have been mitigated ever since. One cause for alarm all the peace sects shared in common, namely, the danger of being dragged into war measures against their conscientious scruples. The Quakers manfully resisted every attempt of the colonial government to this end, and the Mennonites profited by their firm and unalterable course. Sometimes the Governors were prudent and moderate men like Keith, under whom all apprehensions were allayed, again they were overbearing and jealous of their power, like Thomas, under whom the peace sects trembled for their security. The Quakers and the Mennonites usually had sufficient influence to give complexion to the character of the General Assembly of the colony, but sometimes the balances were very evenly poised. In 1737 a quarrel arose between Great Britain and Spain on account of injuries committed by the Spaniards to the English, who had been cutting logwood at Campoachy and gathering salt at Tortugas, in consequence of which war was declared in 1739. But the peace sects were sufficiently powerful to prevent the measure in the Assembly, by refusing to grant money for any such purpose. "We have ever esteemed it our duty to pay tribute to Cæsar and yield obedience to the powers God has set over us, so far as our conscientious persuasion will permit, but we cannot preserve good consciences and come into levying of money, and appropriating it to the uses recommended in the Governor's speech, because it is in opposition to the religious principles professed by the greater number of the present Assembly." As an indication of the powerful peace sentiment which prevailed in Pennsylvania at that time, due chiefly to the Quakers and Mennonites, we are told that so popular was this Assembly, because of its resistance of the war party, that all its members except four were returned at the next election.

The Mennonites of Pennsylvania, nevertheless, were apprehensive and uneasy. In 1742 they broke the silence which had for some time existed between themselves and the "Committee on Foreign Needs" of Holland by addressing a letter to the latter, asking them to procure an official intercession on part of their government to Great Britain, similar to that which upon a former occasion the States General had extended on behalf of the persecuted Swiss brethren. In 1745 they wrote another letter yet more urgent, in which they say, "As the flames of war appear to mount higher, no man can tell whether the cross and persecution of the defenseless Christians will not soon come."

During the administration of Governor Thomas, however, a most important act was passed in behalf of their religious scruples, entitled "An Act for naturalizing such Protestants as are settled, or shall settle, within the province who, not being of the people called Quakers, do conscientiously refuse the taking of an oath." By the act of 13th George II. it was provided that all persons residing for the space of seven years in his Majesty's colonies, having taken an oath or, if Quakers, an affirmation of allegiance and abjuration, and professing at the time the Christian religion, as it was prescribed by the first act of William and Mary, should henceforth be considered as natural born subjects. This did not include the Mennonites and kindred sects, who were equally strenuous with the Quakers in their opposition to oaths. To remedy this difficulty the foregoing act was passed in 1742.

The Mennonites had other misfortunes to meet as well as those which threatened their scruples. The Indians, goaded by many acts of injustice and oppression on the part of irresponsible whites, who followed their trails to make what they could out of the disturbances they fomented, sought revenge, and not unfrequently the tomahawk and scalping knife found their victims among the defenseless Christians. With the Conestogoes and the Mingoos, the Pequeas and Shawanese they lived on terms of perfect accord, but the distant tribes were fiercer and more uncivil, and in their incursions sometimes did bloody work. Thus Governor Denny, writing to the Proprietors in 1757, says, "I had a further mortification to hear of enemy Indians coming within thirty miles of the place of treaty, desolating a long tract of country, and killing and scalping many of the inhabitants. Four dead bodies, one of which was a woman with child, were brought to Lancaster from the neighboring frontiers, scalped and butchered in a most horrid manner, and laid before the door of the Court-House as a reproach to every one there, as it must give the Indians a sovereign contempt for the province. The poor Inhabitants where these daring murders were committed, being without militia or associates, and living among Mennonites, a numerous sect of German Quakers, came supplicating me for protection." In the Assembly that met in 1747 the old struggle was renewed between the peace and the anti-peace parties. The unprotected state of the Delaware attracted some of the Spanish privateers, who captured a number of English vessels. The Assembly was implored to adopt defensive measures, but they resolutely maintained the stand they had taken in the previous year. Gordon gives a very graphic description of their wranglings and the condition of public sentiment at the time: "The propriety of even a defensive war agitated and divided the people. The Quakers, the Moravians, Mennonites, and Schwenckfelders earnestly required the people to submit themselves entirely to the dispensations of the Deity, in whose hands they were, while the Episcopalians, Baptists, and Presbyterians as zealously advocated the necessity of employing those means of defense with which the Deity had already provided them. Both parties, the bellicose and the anti-bellicose, resorted to the press, which teemed with pamphlets in German and English on the subject. The clergymen from their pulpits taught the lawfulness of war and excited the people to arms. Among the ministers (shall we say of peace?) Mr. Gilbert Tennant was most distinguished for his zeal, learning, and industry. In three long sermons from Ezra xv. 5, 'The Lord is a man of war,' he sought to demonstrate that war is approved by God, and discriminated such as received his approbation."

The peace policy was by way of derision called the Quaker policy. It was now three-quarters of a century since William Penn had inaugurated his asylum on the shores of a new world. New and powerful interests, distinct from and at variance with the gentle purposes of the founder, were making themselves felt. That bond of amity which Voltaire declared was "the only treaty which has not been sworn to and which has not been broken" had long been discarded by his successors. With intercommunication between the Indians and the Europeans came to the former all the vices of civilization and few of its virtues.

The most shameful frauds were perpetrated upon the Indian, and a narrow and proscriptive policy had been inaugurated by the proprietary in all their dealings with him. Provoked and stung by the outrages to which he had been subjected, he retaliated with frightful savagery. It was at such times that the peace sects, who were all-powerful in the General Assembly of the province, stood out for their ancient privileges of conscience, and when the Governors of the proprietary reproached them for not taking arms and supporting war measures, they flung back the taunt by pointing out the bad faith which had provoked bloodshed, how the moderation and exact justice of Penn had held all these passions in abeyance, and how a return to them would make war unnecessary. Crimination and recrimination followed. In a distinguished controversy at that time it was charged upon the Quakers and their German allies of kindred belief that they were responsible for the French and Indian wars, and it was proposed on this account that the right of all Germans to vote for members of the Assembly should be suspended until they had acquired a competent knowledge of the English language and provincial constitution; that Protestant ministers and schoolmasters should be settled among them to reduce them into regular congregations, to instruct them in the nature of free government, the purity and value of the Protestant faith, and to bind them to the province by a common language and the consciousness of a common interest; that all law writings should be void unless made in the English tongue; that no newspapers, almanacs, or other periodical paper written in a foreign language should be printed or published unless accompanied by an English version, and further importations of Germans should be prohibited. Proud, who sets out at length the real causes of these Indian wars, attributes the quarrels with and alienations of the red men first to abuses committed in the Indian trade; second, their being unjustly deprived of their lands; third, to unjust punishment and imprisonment in times of peace; fourth, to instigations of the French; and then goes on not only to acquit the peace sects of any, even indirect, complicity, but to attribute to them the means by which final reconciliation was expected. "The Quakers," he says, "who had the least share in these public transactions, as to appearance, being, contrary to ancient custom, excluded from the proprietary agency, by which all public and private transactions in the province were managed, more especially respecting land affairs, which appeared to be the principal cause of the quarrel, were nevertheless in fact the prime movers of the peace. . . . They formed a society among themselves particularly for that good purpose, called the Friendly Association, for gaining and preserving peace with the Indians by pacific measures, constituted trustees, and had a treasurer, and by a voluntary contribution among themselves of many thousands of pounds, to which divers well disposed among the more religious Germans liberally contributed, which, with the Governor's consent or approbation first had, they applied in such prudent manner, by presents and redressing grievances, together with their way of friendly behavior and sincerity, which the Indians had long experienced, that they disposed them to hearken to terms of peace and reconciliation."

In spite of all threats and menaces the German peace sects remained the firm allies of the Quakers, and lost no opportunity to second the efforts of their early protectors and friends in the line of that policy which had distinguished them from the beginning of the province, and with them offered a stern and unyielding front to all innovations that sought to sweep away the guarantees to conscience, which they had received as a common legacy from the founder. So they stood shoulder to shoulder up to the outbreak of the Revolutionary war. Then they separated, differing not in kind, however, only in degree.

The peace sects could not take part in the Revolution without stultifying the professions upon which they existed, so they largely became neutral. People who refused to raise a weapon in their own defense and went smiling to the stake for a scruple could not certainly be called cowards. Of course, we would not at this distance of time even pass censure on some of the measures resorted to for the purpose of compelling their acquiescence in the war. We would only answer the severity of those measures by pointing to the severe exigencies of our own war, almost a century later, when conscientious opposition to bearing arms was treated with kindness and forbearance, not being regarded as subversive of patriotism, and not branding those who held it as enemies of the State. So far have we come in one hundred years, from the days of George Washington to the days of Abraham Lincoln.

We remarked the Quakers and the Mennonites entered the period of that struggle differing in degree. Gordon says, "The Quakers, who were most affected by coercion to military service, addressed the Legislature, setting forth their religious faith and practice with respect to bearing arms, the persecution sustained by their ancestors for conscience' sake, and the consequent abandonment of their native country and emigration to the wilderness in search of civil and religious liberty, and claiming exemption from military service by virtue of the thirty-fifth section of the laws agreed upon in England, and the first clause of the existing charter granted by Penn. By the first, 'No person living peaceably and justly in civil society can be molested or prejudiced by his religious persuasion or practice in matters of faith or worship;' 'nor,' by the second, 'be compelled to do or suffer anything contrary to his religious persuasion.' They contended, therefore, that they could not be legally required to do aught which their consciences forbade, and that the sincerity of their scruples should be judged by the Lord of their consciences only. They asserted that they entertained a just sense of the value of their religious and civil liberties, and had ever been desirous of preserving them by all measures not inconsistent with their Christian profession and principles; and, though they believed it to be their duty to submit to the powers which in the course of Divine Providence were set over them, yet where there was oppression or cause of suffering it became them with Christian meekness and firmness to petition and remonstrate against it, and to endeavor by just reasoning and arguments to assert their rights and principles in order to obtain relief. The Mennonites and German Baptists also addressed the Assembly with prayers for exemption from military service. But their views differed essentially from those of the Quakers. The latter not only refused personal military service, but they denied the lawfulness of commuting it for pecuniary consideration; while the former (the Mennonites) declared that though not at liberty in conscience to bear arms, it was a principle with them to feed the hungry and give the thirsty drink, and that they were always ready, pursuant to Christ's command to Peter, to pay tribute, that they might offend no man, and that they were ready to pay taxes and to render unto Cæsar the things which were Cæsar's." This was in 1775. The august events which precipitated the Revolution were crowding upon the heels one of another. Feeling ran high against the non-combatant sects. Counter petitions were poured upon the Assembly denouncing the principle of non-resistance "as unfriendly to the liberties of America, destructive of all society and government, and highly reflecting on the glorious revolution which placed the present royal family on the throne." One committee denied to the Assembly that the Old or New Testament furnished a single argument in support of this plea of conscience. "The safety of the people is the supreme law of the land," said they. "He who receives an equal benefit should bear an equal burden. The doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance is incompatible with freedom and happiness." Finally the Assembly spread upon its records this enactment as a solution to the vexed question: "Resolved that all persons between the ages of sixteen and fifty, capable of bearing arms, who do not associate for the defense of the province, ought to contribute an equivalent for the time spent by the associators in acquiring military discipline, ministers of the gospel of all denominations and servants purchased bona fide for valuable consideration only excepted."

If the Quakers had stopped where the Mennonites did, their relation to the Revolutionary struggle would not have been productive of the bitter and adverse comment which it subsequently evoked, but they kept on defining their position, denouncing the unhallowed nature of war, asserting their pacific policy, excommunicating their members who joined either side, until they lost the respect of both. Not so the Mennonites. They gave of their substance cheerfully and willingly whenever required so to do, and ultimately came to be looked upon as an indifferent and harmless sect who nourished a merciful but ridiculous idea of treatment for enemies. And in the darker hours of the war the provincial commissaries turned their eyes longingly towards their well-stocked farms, and it is to be feared not always preserved for them the privileges which their pecuniary contributions purchased. Col. Phillip Mart-seller wrote to President Reed in June, 1780:

"Your Excellency will please observe that many of the wealthy Mennonites and others who live in the neighborhood of Lancaster, Manheim, and Conestoga drive flocks of cattle over the mountains in the spring season, to the great distress of the poor inhabitants. These men undoubtedly have them to spare, otherwise they would keep them on their own farms, and therefore they ought to be taken from them; but this cannot be done without the assistance of ten or twelve men, which would be attended with extra charges. Therefore I await your Excellency's particular instructions in the premises." The different attitudes of the Mennonites and the Quakers to the Revolution is best explained by a difference in hereditary tendencies and race instincts. The German is phlegmatic and quiet; the Briton aggressive, opinionated, and self-asserting. The German peace sects had little regard as to what government protected them, so that their rights of conscience remained undisturbed and they were left unmolested in the pursuits which were congenial to their meagre wants and simple mode of life. Not so the Quaker, however. He stood as the successor of the first proprietor, maintaining his principles, defending his doctrines long after his rights had been extinguished and his exclusive privileges were curtailed. This British self-assertion and tenacity had served the purpose of wrenching from the king the original privileges: why might it not serve an equal purpose in maintaining them? But the age of William Penn was gone, the age of George Washington had come. Liberty had a new and wider significance than the mere right of unmolested religious performances. The Mennonites, more loosely wedded to civil traditions, appreciated it quickest, and consequently suffered least by the new order of things.

Rupp says, "The Mennonites never wasted money in rearing stately houses in which to dispense the word of life, or in erecting massive college edifices in which to impart useful knowledge, nor do they encourage theological seminaries. In this respect, like the Friends, the Mennonites of this country have been content to walk in the ways of their fathers, and to hear the word of life expounded by men of as simple tastes and habits as themselves. Let none, however, reproach them with hostility to useful learning,—learning for life, and not for the school. Holding peace principles, and taking little or no part in the affairs of government, they teach their young men that the first great duty of life is for each man to mind his own business. Practicing upon this maxim, they encourage industry by their own examples, and discourage ambition by a representation of the evils necessarily following in its train. They spurn alike the honors and emoluments of office, hence they deem an education beyond the rudiments of a very common one as superfluous among all their members of society. They have, therefore, no ministers, to use a common phrase, classically educated. This is not, however, the case in Europe." This was undoubtedly a very faithful picture when it was penned forty years ago. But the Mennonites of Lancaster County, to whom Rupp then alluded, occupy to-day a vastly different position from that of a generation or two back. Then they gave tone and color and complexion to the entire community, of which they composed the larger portion. Sheltered behind the barrier of a language which itself isolated them and their practices, they remained undoubtedly the most primitive community of all those who had sought the shores of the New World in the previous century. But conditions are changing. The owner of one farm has become the owner of several. Wealth has accumulated on their hands. The community is beginning to impinge upon them. The scale of their social life is changing, and their children demand more liberal educational advantages. The barrier of language has been broken over. While we cannot help but admire their steady adherence to their ancient belief and customs, their history in other lands tells us that important changes are likely soon to occur in this as well.

In Germany, in the very seats and ancient strongholds of the sect, to-day they have a paid ministry. Their ministers appear in the pulpit clad in sacred vestments of black, and read a service from the printed page. In Holland, at Amsterdam, they have a college nearly a century old, with a theological seminary attached, in which students receive a full ecclesiastical training, the lectures of which are delivered in Latin, and wherein are taught, besides, Hebrew, Greek, physics, ecclesiastical history, natural and moral philosophy. Some of its graduates are eminent for scholarly attainments, and rank high as theologians and teachers. "The names of Osterbann, Stinstra, and Hesselink are mentioned with pride as theologians of Holland, and not simply as Mennonite ministers, by every Dutchman." Their literature is exceedingly scanty, as they never concerned themselves about abstract religious speculations, but about moral laws and duties rather, carrying their asceticism to the extent of keeping no ordinary church records, believing public displays of such a character a vanity indicative of worldly-mindedness. One book they have, however, which is becoming famous in literature, and which they cherish next to the Bible,—it is their Historical Monument, a compendium of immense proportions, containing the sufferings and triumphs of their heroes and martyrs,—the quaint old "Martyrs' Mirror" of Tielman Jans Van Braht, a Mennonite theologian of Dordrecht. This ponderous work has passed through many editions, and a most interesting history is its introduction into this country. The Mennonites in America being without a copy, and being ill fitted both by lack of means and culture to undertake so momentous a task as its translation from Dutch into German, long and earnestly besought their friends in Holland to have an edition prepared for them, but their solicitations were received for some reason with a deaf ear.

At length the Ephrata monks, who, about 1745, had secured a hand printing-press, and who included among their number men of high attainments and rare culture, agreed to undertake the task for their Mennonite brethren. The agreement was a very beneficial and advantageous one for the Mennonites, since the monks undertook to translate the book and print it, and leave it to the generosity of the Mennonites to take the edition off their hands or not as they chose. To show the extent of the undertaking with the imperfect facilities they then possessed, it took fifteen brethren three years. Nine worked in the printing-office. Of these four were compositors, four pressmen, and one translator and proof-reader. The remainder worked in the paper-mill. The edition was thirteen hundred copies, and the price was twenty shillings per copy. This was the most conspicuous undertaking in book-making of the colonial period; indeed, the most conspicuous of the entire last century in America. A portion of this edition, however, had a singular accident befall it. The patriots standing greatly in need of paper to make cartridges, learned of the existence of large quantities of unbound sheets at the Ephrata cloister, and so the Ordnance Department confiscated the entire lot. One morning two wagons and six soldiers of the Continental army came and carried off the martyr books. Thus by an irony of fate the story of the defenseless Christians was made to envelop the powder and ball that was fired into the faces of the British soldiers at Brandywine and Germantown.

One characteristic of the Mennonites has exhibited itself wherever their lots have been cast,—their instinct for fine lands. They are the most patient farmers on the face of the earth, and as a community the best. Even when persecution was sorest they turned their faces towards the richer and more fertile parts of the valley of the Rhine, consecrated by nature to the husbandman's hand, and dedicated for centuries to the products of his best skill. In Germany the region in which they are most numerous to-day is the valley of the Vistula, "the garden spot of Prussia," where they are said to have supplemented a naturally rich soil with the most skillful farming in Europe. In Russia they dwell on the Dnieper, the Volga, and the Molotchna, where they have made the steppes to bloom, and the valleys to smile with fertility. Lancaster County, their principal home in the United States, is also its principal agricultural county. Half a century ago a traveler, looking in on the place of their adoption, wrote thus: "Lancaster County is chiefly indebted to the Germans for its present celebrity. This county possesses highly-cultivated and luxuriant valleys, solid and substantial stone houses and barns, large and excellent orchards, the choicest fruit, and the best cattle. Its scenery is not deficient, for it has wood and water, mountain and valley, hill and dale, all happily combining to attract the admiration of the traveler, 'come he from what delicious clime he may.'" What might this same traveler not exclaim if he chanced to visit the same scenes to-day?

The Mennonites have been gradually spreading from the parent society in Lancaster County until at this day they occupy much of the beautiful Cumberland Valley, where, already feeling crowded, their advance guards have passed the Potomac and reach far up the valley of the Shenandoah to the foot-hills of the Virginia mountains.

That this instinct for fine land is not all an instinct, but has been part of a well-defined policy among them even from their very existence, is evidenced by an historical fact. Almost as soon as William Penn threw open his province for settlement two agents, Christopher de Graffenreid and Louis Michelle, were sent out by the Mennonites of Switzerland with instructions to search for vacant lands in Pennsylvania, Virginia, or Carolina. Michelle spent much time among the Indians on the Conestoga, and is believed to have been instrumental in locating the first Mennonites in Lancaster County. Before the late Russian exodus twelve Mennonite delegates visited the best sections of the United States, and reported specifically on each to their brethren at home.

David Rittenhouse, the astronomer, was the great-grandson of the first Mennonite preacher in Pennsylvania, and many other illustrious men are numbered among their descendants. Christopher Dock, the schoolmaster of the Skippack, who died in 1771, is an historic personage. With the piety and thoroughness of Dr. Taylor, of Andover, and the gentleness and earnest purpose of Dr. Arnold, of Rugby, in his limited sphere he showed an enthusiasm for culture and education that make his quaint and delightful treatises on those subjects an inspiration to every teacher who shall live after him. The doctrines of the Mennonites have had a peculiar charm for a certain class of great minds that were capable of rising above the formulæ of creeds and dogmas. Benjamin Rush, the eminent physician, the signer of the Declaration of Independence, says, in his memorable work on the "Manners of the German Inhabitants of Pennsylvania," as its closing sentence, "Perhaps those German sects of Christians among us who refuse to bear arms for the shedding of human blood may be preserved by Divine Providence as the centre of a circle which shall gradually embrace all nations of the earth in a perpetual treaty of friendship and peace."

Thaddeus Stevens, the "great commoner," was always tender of the consciences of the Mennonites. In the Constitutional Convention of 1838, before he had made their home his home, he plead for a recognition of their scruples in the fundamental law. And again in the Congress of the United States, when it was sought to restrict their privileges and exemptions in the Conscription Act of 1863, Mr. Stevens said, "But there is one portion of this provision which I do not and cannot assent to. There are in all countries exemptions for conscience' sake, and it is right that there should be. In my own county a very large number of our best citizens, our most loyal men, are conscientiously opposed to bearing arms. They are willing to pay taxes; they would be willing to pay this amount to procure substitutes; but I do not believe that they should be forced to violate their conscientious and religious scruples, which have existed from their birth, and which have descended to them from a venerable ancestry."

Nothing can be purer and gentler than the inner motives of Mennonism. What thought so near the practices of the blessed Master, and so far from the acrimony and bitterness of men, as their scruple which makes all strife and warfare unchristian. And the iron purpose they have exhibited now for four centuries in maintaining their doctrine that the only genuine baptism could be that in which the matured consciousness of the individual took part? who dares to assail it as an inexorable prejudice? Then there is their brotherly charity, which counts it so unworthy to leave their poor to be cared for even by the public institutions which their toil most largely contributes to maintain. The trouble is, their drab clothing and peculiarly-fashioned garments have caught the eye of the gaping world. The visible peculiarities of dress, which, after all, are as harmless as they are meaningless when compared with that in them which is invisible, their strong Christian natures, earnest piety, deep devotion to principle, their unswerving fidelity to truth, their Christian conduct in secular affairs, their godliness in everyday life, and the charity that vaunteth not itself.

Hannibal is said to have complained that he made history, but the Romans wrote it. So the history of the subjects of this sketch has hitherto been written almost exclusively by their enemies. The Roman Catholics and the large Protestant denominations, the Lutherans, and the Reformed, and even the Episcopalians have been characterized by jealousy towards new sects. To this day the State churches of Europe look down with disdain upon "the Separatists." In the noisy clamor for worldly recognition the Mennonites have fared ill indeed. The story of the suffering Puritans, which at most extended over a few generations and a small area of territory, has been told and retold with almost distressing particularity. There is not an event or object from the departure at Delfhaven to the chair of Carver and the pot and platter of Miles Standish that has not been held up to veneration by poet, painter, and orator. Even the German school-boy is taught to regard these Pilgrim sacrifices of a handful of Englishmen as the noblest ever laid upon the altar of conscience and humanity. Yet if he but turned to the history of his own ancestors and read there the story of sufferings, persecutions, stout abnegation through eight centuries, in which cruel selfishness and heartless bigotry assumed the wardship of conscience, he would find the trials of these Puritans, great as they are, compared with the trials of his own people, but the waters of Marah beside the plagues of Egypt. And while New England to-day laments the loss of its sons, swept into the vortex of national life setting westward, in danger of losing her distinctive characteristics by the Teutonic and Celtic influences that are clambering into their places, complaining that her stony acres must soon be tilled by an alien race or left barren and valueless, the Mennonite lands of Eastern Pennsylvania still remain in the descendants of the first hardy stock, who hold them by ancient indentures, supplemented by grant from father to son, reaching backward in one ever-strengthening chain of titles to the original patents of Penn, implanting in a glorious commonwealth a true conservatism, and adorning it continually with renewed evidences of prosperity and thrift.

The Lutherans have a well-defined literature which preserves their achievements in Church and State. The Reformed Church of Germany and Switzerland points with pardonable pride to the triumphs of Calvin, Zwingle, and Ursinus, and a literature which has preserved the almost sacred teachings of their scholars and martyrs to our own time. The Presbyterian will show you in Edinburgh the monument of Margaret Wilson, who, fastened to a stake driven in the sands where the Galway overflowed by the tide, was sustained by her lofty enthusiasm until the waves drowned her prayers and the waters choked her songs, and who tasted this death unflinchingly for the faith that was in her.

The Moravians will tell you how the ashes of Huss were borne on the bosom of the Rhine to the Schelde, and on the bosom of the Schelde to the sea, fit type of the great missionary work they were to record in the annals of every tongue and people and clime.

But the poor Mennonites, in journeyings oftener, in perils of robbers, perils by their own countrymen, in perils by the heathen, in perils in the city, in perils in the wilderness, in perils in the sea, in perils among false brethren, in weariness and painfulness, in watchings, in hunger and thirst, in fastings, in cold and nakedness, the thousandth part of which can never be known, who have gone through the centuries their silent and uncomplaining way, believing that the glory of this world was but the mammon of unrighteousness, that it was enough for Him to know their deeds, by whom the hairs of the head are numbered, and without whose knowledge the sparrow falls not to the earth,—their story is yet untold.<sup>1</sup>

CHAPTER XXVII.

CHURCHES OF THE MENNONITES, DUNKERS, REFORMED MENNONITES, RIVER BRETHREN, AND AMISH.

THE history of the religious organizations of the sects mentioned in the title of this chapter is here made a part of the general history of the county, instead of being embraced in the histories of the boroughs or townships where their meeting-houses are located (the method pursued with regard to all other religious denominations), for the reason that their organizations are bishoprics, each covering a larger territory, extending in many cases into several townships, and embracing the congregations worshipping in several different meeting-houses, often at long distances from each other.

Mennonites.—This sect has in Lancaster about three thousand five hundred members, worshipping in forty-one meeting-houses, and served by forty-seven ministers, of whom eight are (by election) bishops, whose duties, in addition to the preaching of the gospel (in which the other ministers are their assistants) are, to preside at the communion of the Lord's Supper, and to administer the rites of baptism in the respective districts, or bishoprics, under their charge. Of the eight bishoprics in Lancaster County, the following accounts are given, embracing, as nearly as can now be ascertained, the names of bishops and ministers (former and present), with dates and other facts relating to the building of their meeting-houses.

Rohrerstown or Millersville District.—Benjamin Hershey, a bishop in a Mennonite Church in Switzerland, emigrated to this country with the colony who came over about 1708. He settled on a section of land, the homestead of which is now owned and occupied by John L. Herr, on the Lancaster and Marietta Turnpike, one mile west of the city of Lancaster. Soon after his arrival he, with others, organized a church, now known as that of Rohrerstown. He served as bishop till his death, and was succeeded by his son, Benjamin Hershey, who also served till his death.

Bishop Benjamin Hershey, Jr., was succeeded by Jacob Brubaker, of Hempfield township. He was ordained minister in 1780, and in 1788 was ordained bishop, in which office he remained and ministered till his death, Oct. 17, 1831. His son, John Brubaker, succeeded to the bishopric, and served till his death, April 30, 1842.

On the 25th of November, 1838, Henry Shenk, of Conestoga township, was ordained minister, and on the 5th of June, 1843, he was ordained bishop in place of Bishop John Brubaker, deceased. On the 8th of January, 1864, Joseph Burkholder, of Pequea township, was chosen assistant bishop, and succeeded to the bishopric upon the death of Bishop Shenk in the following year. He served till his death, July 3, 1875. On the 25th of November, in the same year, Jacob K. Brubaker, of Manor township, was ordained bishop, and served till his death, March 15, 1879. On the 10th of February, 1876, Amos Shenk, nephew of Bishop Henry Shenk, was ordained minister, and on the 25th of September, 1879, was chosen bishop to succeed Bishop Jacob K. Brubaker. He is still the bishop in charge of the district.

Benjamin Hershey, third son of the second Bishop Benjamin Hershey, was ordained as a deacon; served many years, and in 1823 removed to Ohio. David Herr, of Lancaster township, succeeded him, and served till his death, Jan. 6, 1873. Before 1780, Andrew Kauffman, of Lancaster township, was ordained minister, and officiated till his death, May 2, 1845. John Shenk, also of Lancaster township, was ordained minister in 1835, and served till his death, Nov. 2, 1857. On the 4th of September, 1842, Christian Herr, of Lancaster township, was ordained minister. He died Aug. 26, 1880, serving the church as minister till his death. At the same time (Sept. 4, 1842) and place, David Herr (fuller), of Lancaster township, was ordained deacon, and became assistant to David Herr. He served in this capacity till his death, July 28, 1850. Joseph Burkholder was ordained to the ministry March 27, 1846, and later became bishop. On the 17th of January, 1855, John K. Brubaker, of East Hempfield township, was ordained deacon, assistant to David Herr. He at present serves the church as deacon. On the 1st of January, 1858, Jacob K. Brubaker, son of Bishop John Brubaker, was ordained minister, and in 1875 was ordained bishop. Dr. John K. Brubaker was ordained a minister Nov. 8, 1879, and Benjamin Hartzler, on the 12th of May, 1881.

The names of the present houses of worship in the Rohrerstown district are Brubaker's, Millersville, Lancaster City, Habecker's, Bachman's, J. Miller's, Stone House, and Byerland. The ministers are Amos Shenk (bishop), John K. Brubaker, Benjamin Hertzler, John K. Brubaker, Abraham Witmer, Benjamin Lehman, Ephraim Rohrer, Isaac Kauffman, John Harnish, Abraham Herr, David Hess.

For several years after the organization of the district, services were held in dwelling-houses. The first meeting-house was built of logs, on land of Benjamin Hershey, about the year 1730. This was in use until 1791, at which time it was removed to lands of Peter, Christen, and Abraham Brubaker, of Hempfield township. Services were held at this place in this house until 1854, when it was torn down, and the present brick building, thirty-eight by forty-eight, was erected. At this place the annual conference has been held since the erection of the first house. A school-house was also erected at this place, and a school taught therein.

About the year 1756 the log meeting-house at Millersville was erected, and also a school-house near it. This log house was used for worship until 1848, when it was taken away and a brick house thirty-five by sixty-nine feet was erected near the old site, but within the limits of Lancaster township.

The meeting-house in Lancaster City was built in 1879.

The first meeting-house at Habecker's was built of logs, and about 1830 was replaced by the present brick structure, thirty-five by forty-five feet, which is still in use.

The first meeting-house built at what is now known as Bachman's, was built of stone about one hundred years ago, and is still used.

The Miller's meeting-house, located about one mile south of Conestoga Centre, was built of logs many years ago, and later was torn down and replaced by one of stone. In 1882 a stone church forty-two by sixty feet was erected and is now in use.

About 1747 the Byerland meeting-house was erected of logs, and remained in use until about 1840, when a stone church was erected in its place. In 1879 this was taken down and the present brick building was erected, forty-two by sixty feet in dimensions.

The Stone meeting-house is about a mile from New Danville. The first building was of logs, but about 1755 a stone house was erected. It was enlarged and improved in 1855, and in 1878 was entirely rebuilt of stone, forty-two by sixty feet.

These meeting-houses and their congregations are in three sub-districts known as Rohrerstown, Conestoga and Pequea, and Manor districts, all forming the one Bishop District of Rohrerstown or Millersville, as before mentioned. The number of communicants in the district is about six hundred.

Strasburg District.—Hans Herr, one of the colony of Mennonite emigrants who came to this country in 1709, was previously a bishop of the church, and continued in the office after his settlement here. In the year 1719, Christian Herr, his son, built a substantial sandstone dwelling-house (which is still standing) near the big spring in West Lampeter township, and in this house the church held regular worship. Among the first ministers in the county before 1725 were Ulrich Brecktell, Hans Tachantz, Hans Burkholter, Christian Herr, Benedict Hershey, Martin Barr, and Johannes Bowman. In 1740, John Herr,<sup>1</sup> also a Mennonite preacher, built a dwelling-house about a mile southwest of Strasburg, now occupied by John Kerner, in which the upper story was arranged for public worship. In this house, and in other dwellings in the vicinity, services were held for many years. In 1804 the society built a stone meeting-house, forty by sixty feet, near the village of Strasburg, where regular service has been held to the present time. It was enlarged and improved in the year 1879.

In the year 1766 a wooden church, about twenty-five by thirty feet, was erected near Providence, and during the Revolution American soldiers were quartered there. In 1860 a brick church, forty by fifty feet, was built, which is still in use.

Herr's Church, sometimes called Willow Street, was erected of brick, forty by fifty feet, in the year 1850, near the sandstone dwelling-house of Christian Herr, built in 1719.

The house now known as Mellinger's meeting-house was built of stone in 1767, a log house standing near having been used for worship many years. An addition was made in 1855, otherwise the church remains in its primitive condition.

The Stumptown meeting-house was erected in 1846, and rebuilt of the same material (brick) in 1882.

The first meeting-house in what is known as Hershey's was erected of brick in 1837. In 1862 it was enlarged, and in 1879 it was taken down and a new brick house, forty-five by sixty-five, was erected on the site.

The meeting-house known as "Old Road" was erected of stone in 1841. Prior to that time services were held in a school-house at Springville.

At Paradise an old building was used for many years, and in 1847 a brick meeting-house, thirty-one by forty-three, was erected, which is still in use.

Bishop Hans Herr served many years, and was succeeded by his grandson, John Herr, who also served in that office for many years. After his death Bishops Benedict Hershey and Jacob Brubaker, of another district, officiated until the appointment of Peter Eby as bishop, between 1810 and 1815. He remained bishop until his death, April 6, 1843. Christian Herr, of Pequea, was ordained deacon in 1823, minister in 1835, and bishop in 1840. His death occurred in 1852. In 1848, Joseph Hershey was ordained bishop, and died April 12, 1856. Benjamin Herr, son of Christian Herr, of Pequea, was ordained to the ministry in 1838, and bishop in 1856, to succeed Bishop Joseph Hershey. He is still bishop of the district.

Isaac Eby was ordained minister Nov. 9, 1876, and assistant bishop June 6, 1878. Jacob Dentling was ordained to the ministry in 1847. Amos Herr was ordained minister in 1850. He was the first of the Mennonite ministers in Lancaster County, who conducted religious services in the English language.

Several of their ministers in this county now preach in English.

Elias Groff was ordained to the ministry in 1869, and Abraham Brubaker in 1874. The following-named ministers are at present serving in the Strasburg district, viz.: Benjamin Herr (bishop), Amos Herr, Elias Groff, Abraham Brubaker, J. Dentlinger, David Buckwalter, John L. Landis, Henry Heller, Isaac Eby, Jacob Hershey, Sr., Jacob R. Hershey, John Rank, Jonas Wenger.

The number of communicants in the Bishop District of Strasburg is one thousand and seventy-five. The meeting-houses in the district are Strasburg, Providence, Herr's, Mellinger's, Stumptown, Hershey's Old Road, Paradise.

The Hammer Creek District, now presided over by Bishop Christian Bomberger, was first formed about 1838. In that year Christian Bomberger (father of the present bishop) was ordained bishop, he having been ordained a minister Feb. 20, 1831. He served as bishop until April, 1849, when he removed to Cumberland County. From that time to 1860 the churches were supplied by the bishops from the other districts. On the 12th of June in that year Christian Bomberger (third of the name) was ordained bishop of the district, and has presided until the present time.

In the year 1738, Christian Bomberger, a member of the Mennonite congregation, came to this country. His son Christian became the first minister in what is now known as the Hammer Creek District. John Bear, Jacob Myer, and Christian Frantz were appointed ministers before the present century; the latter served till his death in January, 1828. Abraham Brubaker was appointed assistant to John Bear. About 1800, Christian Risser and John Hess were ordained ministers, and served during their lives. The former died Aug. 18, 1826; the latter, Nov. 27, 1830. Abraham Brubaker (2d), son of Abraham Brubaker, was ordained minister in 1810, and served till Sept. 15, 1850, when he died. Andrew Miller was ordained minister in 1820, and died in 1832. Martin Myer was ordained to the ministry in January, 1832, as successor of Christian Frantz. He served till failing health compelled him to retire, and died Oct. 4, 1878. In 1833, Benjamin Eby was ordained minister. He officiated till March, 1866, when he removed to Maryland.

On the 21st of December, 1848, Christian Bomberger (3d) was ordained a minister, and in 1860 was chosen bishop. Charles Hostetter was appointed to the ministry June 4, 1852, as assistant to Martin Myer, and he is still in service. On the 21st of April, 1851, John Risser was ordained to the ministry, and served till his death, Nov. 20, 1878. John Hess, a grandson of John Hess (1st), was ordained Jan. 28, 1866, and is now in the service. He was appointed as successor to Benjamin Eby, and assistant to Bishop Bomberger and John Risser. In November, 1868, Jacob Zimmerman was ordained as assistant to Charles Hostetter, and is still a minister. On the 6th of April, 1874, Christian Risser was ordained, and is now serving. Following are the names of the present ministers of the district, viz.: Christian Bomberger (bishop), John Hess, Christian Risser, Jonas W. Bucher, David Brubaker, Jacob Zimmerman, Charles Hostetter, David Lehman.

The meetings for religious worship, within what is now the Hammer Creek Bishop District, were first held at the houses of the members. The first of which anything can be obtained was about the year 1740, when services were held at the house of Kaspar Sherks, on the farm now owned by Daniel S. Steametz, a short distance east of the hamlet of Schoeneck. A little later meetings were held at the houses of Christian Wenger (now Adam Royer), near Union Station, and Henry Hershberger (now Christian Martin). Early in the nineteenth century, meetings were held alternately at the houses of Daniel Brubaker (now Edwin Brubaker), Moses Bomberger (now John B. Erb), Christian Eby (now Henry H. Brubaker), Jacob Wissler (now Levi Wissler), Daniel Burkholder (now John Gible), and at Oberholtzer's (now Jacob Bollenger). The church increased in numbers, and in a few years after 1800 a log house was built in the Oberholtzer woods for a place of worship and for school purposes. In the spring of 1819 a tract of land was purchased from Martin Bolmer, on the road leading from Brunnersville to Claysville, where they erected a brick house that is known as the Hammer Creek meeting-house. In the latter part of the same year a tract of land was bought lying on the road leading from Claysville to the Indian Creek. Near the latter place a small stone church was erected and called the Indiantown meeting-house; this was used till 1879, when a larger frame house was built.

In 1856 a small lot of land was purchased of John Hess, near the road leading from Warwick to Rothville, and on this lot a brick house was erected that is known as the Hess meeting-house. From this time the people who had been worshiping in the little church near Rothville, worshiped in this Hess meeting-house.

About the year 1862 a Union meeting-house was erected by several denominations at Schoeneck.

In the Reading Road District, in the early part of the present century, three log houses were erected for worship and for school purposes. One was near Roseville, one a half-mile south of Oregon village, and one a mile west of Millport.

In 1847 the Reading Road Church was erected of brick, thirty-two by forty-two feet, and is still in use. The meeting-houses of the Hammer Creek District are Hammer Creek, Hess', Indiantown, Swamp, Reading Road.

About the same time (1790) a house was erected at what is now Landisville, which was also used till the present one was erected in 1855.

Martin served as bishop during the remainder of his life. He died April 27, 1825, at the age of eighty-four years. His successor was Jacob Zimmerman, who had been an assistant for a few years. Zimmerman served till his death, Sept. 14, 1856, and was succeeded by George Weaver, elected in 1854. Weaver died Jan. 22, 1883, having been twenty-nine years a bishop. His successor is Jonas H. The first Bowmansville house of worship was of sandstone, built in 1794. In 1874 the present frame structure was erected. At Grossdale the first house was built of logs in 1755. The present meeting-house is of stone, and was built in 1823.

Lichty's meeting-house was erected of stone in 1840, and that of Churchtown (a frame building) was built in 1878.

The meeting-house at Metzler's (a frame building) was built in 1827, and enlarged in 1864 to its present size.

The Zimmerman meeting-house (stone) was built in 1854.

The Root District, now under charge of Bishop Martin Root, was under the charge of Bishop Peter Risser, in the latter part of the eighteenth century. Jacob Hershey was bishop here from about the year 1800 till his death, in 1819, at the age of seventy-two years. He was succeeded by Christian Nissley, of Mount Joy township, who died in 1831. The bishops who have served from that time have been John Mumma, Peter Ebersole, Nathaniel Shope, and Martin Root, the present bishop.

John Lehman, John Risser, and Benjamin Lehman were ministers in the early part of the present century. Christian Nissley, of Rapho, was ordained minister in 1831, and died in 1882, at the age of eighty-seven years, having been pastor fifty years. Peter Nissley was ordained to the ministry in 1836, and is still living, at the age of eighty-one years. Jacob, Peter, and David Ebersole were ministers. In 1869 Peter Ebersole, Jr., was ordained to the ministry, and in 1874 Levi Ebersole was ordained. The meeting-houses under the jurisdiction of Martin Root are as follows: Krabill's, East Donegal; Bassler's, West Donegal; Good's, Conoy; Risser's, Mount Joy; Overholtzer's, Dauphin County; Strickler's, Swatara, Dauphin Co.; Mumma's, Shopes, Dauphin Co.

The first meeting-house (stone) was erected at Risser's (Mount Joy township) in 1760, and enlarged in 1865. In 1811 a house (brick) was erected at Bassler's; this was used till 1881, when it was rebuilt. At Good's a meeting-house (frame) was built in 1814, and rebuilt in 1879. In 1812 a log house was erected on the farm of Peter Krabill. After being enlarged several times, it was torn down in 1869, and the present brick edifice, forty by sixty feet, was erected.

The Dunkers.—This sect had its beginning in Germany, under the leadership of Alexander Mack, in the year 1708. In 1719 twenty families of them came to Pennsylvania, where most of them settled at Germantown, Skippack, Montgomery Co., Oley, in Berks, and Conestoga, in what is now Lancaster County. Their religious leader was Peter Becker, who had been a minister under Alexander Mack at Schwartzenau, Germany. In 1723, Becker made a missionary tour through the upper settlements, and organized a church at Conestoga with thirty-six members. In the next year, as is learned from an old manuscript record, "The church agreed to hold an election for an assistant to Peter Becker. The choice fell on Conrad Beisel for minister and John Hildebrand for deacon, both to serve at Conestogoe, . . . but Beisel, being wise in his own conceit, soon caused a trouble in the church in regard to the Sabbath. He had an idea that Saturday was the Lord's day, so he and some of the members held Saturday for the Sabbath, and did work on Sunday." The result was that in 1729, when Alexander Mack came here from Germany, the question of the Sabbath was put to vote in the Conestoga Church, and being decided against Becker's ideas by a large majority, he, with a few others, withdrew from the Conestoga Church, and "did organize at Ephrata as Seventh-Day Baptists."

The Conestoga Church at its organization embraced the settlements within the present territory of Lancaster, Dauphin, Lebanon, and Berks Counties, over all of which Peter Becker had charge until the arrival of Alexander Mack, who then assumed the office of bishop, with Becker as his assistant. Becker served until his death in 1734. Mack died in the following year.

Michael Frantz, a minister, was elected successor of Bishop Mack in 1736, and served until 1747, when he removed to Virginia and organized a church in that State. After his departure Michael Pfautz was ordained bishop, and served till his death, May 14, 1769, at the age of sixty years. Ten days before his death he assisted at the laying of hands on Christian Longenecker at his ordination as bishop. The Conestoga Church increased in numbers, and was served by ministers appointed for that purpose. In 1772 it was agreed to divide the territory of the Conestoga Church into three church districts, viz., Conestoga, White Oak, and Swatara. At this time the ministers resident within the district of the new Conestoga Church were Peter Eizelberger and Jacob Stall. The latter died in 1822, aged ninety-two years.

In 1823, Abraham Zug and Jacob Pfautz were ordained bishops. Jacob Pfautz served until his death, in 1864, aged eighty-seven years, five months, and twenty-five days, having served the church forty-nine years. During his labors six hundred and forty persons were baptized. Abraham Zug remained as bishop over this church for several years, when he moved to Swatara, Lebanon Co., and lived there till his death, July 18, 1841.

On the 5th of October, 1841, the churches of Conestoga and White Oak agreed to establish a church in Lebanon County. At a council held in 1842 it was decided to set off all the members of Conestoga, White Oak, and part of Swatara Churches who resided in Lebanon County, to a new church to be formed at Tulpehocken, and that John Zug should be the minister.

On the 4th of June, 1831, Christian Bomberger was ordained minister, and was ordained bishop June 4, 1862. In 1864, Conestoga Church was divided into three districts, viz., East Conestoga, West Conestoga, and Ephrata. At this time the ministers of West Conestoga Church were Christian Bomberger, Jacob Reinhold, and Christian Brubaker.

Christian Bomberger took charge of this church as bishop. He served until his death, May 21, 1880, at the age of seventy-nine. Jacob Hockman was ordained bishop in 1879, and assisted Bishop Bomberger till his death, when he assumed entire charge, and is still the bishop. The present number of members in the different churches of the district is about two hundred.

The White Oak Church at the time of the division in 1772 was ministered to by John Zug and Christian Bomberger. The latter was chosen bishop, and served as such till his death. He was succeeded by Abraham Zug, who officiated during his life, after which, in 1841, Daniel Fretz and Jacob Haller were chosen bishops. They were succeeded by Christian Longenecker, grandson of Bishop Longenecker. He had been for several years assistant to Bishops Fretz and Haller. He served till 1855, when he died, at the age of sixty-three years. His successor was David Gerlach, who served till his death in July, 1879. J. S. Newcomer, the present bishop of the Mountville Church, succeeded him, and is now in charge of both the White Oak and Mountville Churches. They have a membership of about two hundred and fifty.

The Mountville Church was set off from White Oak in the fall of 1882, in charge of Bishop J. S. Newcomer. The church has a membership of one hundred and forty.

The East Conestoga Church was set off in the division of Conestoga Church in 1864, with about one hundred and seventy-five members, under the charge of Christian Rupp, who was at that time a minister. The territory was embraced in the district of Bishop Bomberger until 1874, when Christian Rupp was chosen bishop, and is now in charge. The church has a present membership of about two hundred.

The Church of Ephrata was set off from Conestoga Church at the division in 1864, with about two hundred members, and placed under the care of Israel Meyers, who was the resident minister. Samuel Harley was soon after chosen bishop, and still presides. The church has a membership of about three hundred.

The Chikis Creek Church was set off from the White Oak Church in 1868. The resident ministers at that time were Phillip Ziegler, Jacob Rider, and Samuel R. Zug. The former was chosen bishop, and served until his labors were closed by death in 1874.

He was succeeded by Jacob Ryder, who is the present bishop. This church has at present three houses of worship,—at Chikis Creek, Elizabethtown, and Green Tree,—which embrace a membership of about two hundred.

The first meeting-house built in this district was the Chikis, in Rapho township, in 1855, and rebuilt in 1882. The next was at Green Tree, in Mount Joy township, in 1869, and in 1875 a school-house was purchased in Elizabethtown and fitted up for a meeting-house.

The meeting-houses at Ephrata, West Conestoga, and Chikis Creek are built fifty by eighty feet, with basement and altar for purposes of annual love feasts of their districts. Love feasts are held in all the districts, in some annually and in others semi-annually. A list of the meeting-houses of this sect in Lancaster County is here given, showing the number and location of houses of worship in each district, viz.:

The Reformed Mennonites.—The causes that brought this church into existence lie far back in the latter part of the eighteenth century, and have been the subject of considerable bitter discussion. Suffice it to say that a few years after Francis Herr withdrew from the Mennonite Church he held public meetings at his house, at which he freely exhorted and instructed those who assembled. He did not assume to be a minister of the gospel, and always remained seated during his exhortations. Many of his neighbors who sympathized with his views had belonged to the Mennonite Church, and withdrew to associate themselves with him. Among them were Abraham Landis and Abraham Groff. John Herr, the son of Francis Herr, followed in the footsteps of his father, and carried on the work begun by him. In 1812 the little flock who were gathered together unanimously elected John Herr to be their pastor and bishop, and agreed in the appointment of Abraham Landis to administer to him the rite of baptism.

On the 30th of May in that year, Abraham Landis baptized John Herr, after which Herr baptized Abraham Landis and Abraham Groff. The former was soon after elected deacon, and later became a minister. On the 10th of October, in the same year, John Landis was appointed to the ministry, and preached his first sermon October 31st. The meeting at which the organization was perfected and first baptism administered was held at the house of John Herr, in Strasburg township. Soon after the organization twenty-five persons were baptized at the house of David Buckwalter, now in East Lampeter township. A little later sixteen persons were baptized at Jacob Weaver's, in West Lampeter township.

Meetings were first held in private houses, but in the fall of the year 1812 a meeting-house was built on the road leading from Strasburg to Lancaster, near John Longenecker's. It is still known as the Longenecker meeting-house. John Herr, in his notes, says, "November 7th the first meeting was held in the new meeting-house at John Longenecker's."

Christian Frantz, of Norwich township, was chosen assistant bishop, and later removed to Franklin County, Pa., where he gathered a congregation who have since been known as Frantzites. After his removal (about 1830) Henry Bowman was appointed assistant bishop, who, after the death of John Herr, became bishop.

John Kohr was elected to the ministry in 1845, and to the bishopric in the spring of 1853, and is at present bishop of the churches of Lancaster County. Daniel Musser was chosen assistant bishop in 1863, and died in 1877. John Harnish, of Hempfield, was appointed to the ministry about 1832, and subsequently removed to Clark County, Ohio, where he was soon after appointed bishop, and where he died in 1870. The ministers who served the church and passed away were Abraham Landis and John Landis, Christian Resh, and Christian N. Witmer, of East Lampeter; Abraham Snively, of Pequea; and Jacob Bowman, of Strasburg township.

The meeting-houses of this church in the county of Lancaster are known by the following names: Longonecker's, West Lampeter; Strasburg, Strasburg borough; Bowman's, Providence township; Lampeter, Lampeter Square; Stumptown, New Danville; Pequea Manor, Manor township; Lancaster, Lancaster City; Landisville, East Hempfield; Mount Joy, Mount Joy township; Schoeneck, West Cocalico.

The church in this county numbers about seven hundred members. Their ministers are John Kohr (bishop), Manheim; Samuel Hershey, Mount Joy borough; Abraham Horst, Mount Joy borough; Henry Weaver, Strasburg; Elias H. River Brethren<sup>1</sup>—(also known as "Brethren in Christ").—A little more than a century since Jacob Engle, who came in his infancy from Switzerland, and who lived in Conoy township, near Bainbridge, was a member of the old Mennonite Church. He became convinced that the members of that denomination lacked religious vitality, and, in connection with his brother John and several others, established a stated prayer-meeting for their mutual benefit. This little flock gradually increased in numbers, and after a time enjoyed the ministrations of a clergyman. The first place of worship was the house of the founder of the sect, now the residence of his grandson, Jacob M. Engle.

At first they had no design of organizing a separate sect, but as time went on other societies sprang up in their vicinity, and about 1776 a regular organization was effected.

It is not necessary to speak here of the peculiar doctrines or practices of this sect. From their similarity in many respects they are popularly supposed to be a branch of the sect commonly known as "Dunkers," but they are rather an offshoot from the Mennonites, if from any sect. The name "River Brethren" was given to them because the place of their origin was near the Susquehanna River, and here they are more numerous than elsewhere. The number in Lancaster County is about five hundred, and in the neighboring counties they are quite numerous.

The first bishop of the River Brethren was Jacob Engle, the founder of the sect. When they became more numerous Abraham Brubaker was elected an additional bishop. After the death of the founder, his son, Jacob Engle, Jacob Hershey, and John Shitz were elected, Bishop Brubaker having become infirm by reason of age, and the sect having still further increased. None of these lived to a great age. At about the time of their death the increase in the number of the Brethren, and the greater area over which they were spread, necessitated the division of this area into different fields of labor or bishoprics, and the three districts, now known as Donegal District, including Conoy and the Donegals; the Rapho District, consisting of Rapho and Mount Joy; and the Conestoga District, embracing the southern townships in the county, were formed. At that time John Gish, in Donegal, and Jacob Hostetter, in Conestoga District, were chosen, and subsequently the present bishops, John M. Engle, in Donegal; Jacob M. Graybill, in Conestoga; and Benjamin Shelly, in Rapho District, were elected. Bishop Hostetter is still living at a very advanced age.

The bishops are elected by a general vote, but they exercise their functions mainly in their respective districts. The lower orders of the clergy, preachers and deacons, are chosen within their respective districts. All are elected for life or during good behavior.

The fundamental doctrines of Christianity are held by these Brethren. They are strictly non-resistant, and quiet lives are inculcated by them.

The preachers in the Donegal District are David Engle, John Wolgamuth, John Longnecker, Jacob S. Engle; in the Rapho District, Abraham Hostetter, Joseph Wolgamuth, David Wolgamuth, Daniel Wolgamuth; in the Conestoga District, Henry Engle, John Breneman, Simon Graybill, Henry Heisey.

The Amish are Mennonites, being really a sect within the sect. They take their name from Jacob Amen, a Swiss Mennonite, who settled in Alsace about the year 1673, and there originated a community who followed with greater strictness the doctrines of the old Flemings. Their descendants are still to be found in France and on the borders of Switzerland. The main differences between themselves and other Mennonites relate to dress and discipline. They still rigidly adhere in common with all Mennonites to the confession of faith which was adopted by the Synod of Dordrecht in 1632.

Some authorities fix their earliest arrivals in this country at about 1717, others contend that they did not begin to come until 1737. The first is, however, generally accepted as the time of their appearance in Pennsylvania, and this is corroborated by a declaration of grievances published in 1718, and addressed to William Penn himself. Their increase in this country, owing to the rigidity of their discipline, has been very slow. Their worship has usually been in private houses, and without a regular minister. They have, however, bishops. At present there are in Lancaster County about one thousand of the sect. These are in ten congregations in the townships of Earl, East Earl, West Earl, Upper Leacock, Leacock, East Lampeter, West Lampeter, Paradise, Salisbury, and Caernarvon. They are under charge of four bishops, viz.: Eli Zook, West Lampeter; Christian King, Leacock; John K. Stoltzfus, Earl; and Christian Umble, of Salisbury, each of whom has charge of two districts. The only meeting-houses in the county are in the townships of Caernarvon and Salisbury. They are a very exemplary and thrifty people.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

AGRICULTURE<sup>1</sup>—AGRICULTURAL SOCIETIES—TOBACCO CULTURE IN LANCASTER COUNTY—POPULATION OF THE COUNTY.

THE ground or soil forms the foundation for all agricultural operations, as agriculture itself is the foundation of all other pursuits. Loudon calls it the parent of manufactures and commerce, and truly says that without it there could be neither civilization nor population. To the soil, therefore, farmer-like, we must turn briefly for a proper and intelligent beginning of our subject.

The soils of the county are principally four kinds, named after the rocks which underlie them. That covering the mica-schist and gneiss belt, comprising, according to a recent geological survey, the greater portion of the six southern townships, is considered by geologists to be the oldest formation of the county. Gneiss is a stratified granite that admits of being split and crumbled. Mica-schist is a gneiss rock consisting largely of mica in small particles. The soil being formed partly by the crumbling of these rocks, brought about by the action of frost and heat, aided by cultivation, is filled with sparkling fragments of mica. A chance observer might pronounce it sandy, and yet it differs materially from the hard round flinty sand that composes the tops of some of the higher ridges and the sandstone belt along the northern boundary. The surface is very rolling; not in long, regular ridges, but made up of hills and dales placed promiscuously, without regard to size or direction.

The soil is inferior to limestone in its producing capacity, and has hitherto received less thorough cultivation, more of it having remained under timber or been used for grazing purposes. Recently greater attention has been given to the raising of grain and tobacco, with encouraging success. The average rainfall, since a record was kept of it, has been greater here than in the central portion of the county.<sup>2</sup>

The limestone soil, which lies immediately north of the gneiss belt, occupies the central basin or basins between the interior ridges, and contains three hundred square miles. The rocks underlying it are considered the second oldest formation of the county, while the soil itself is supposed to be a deposit formed while this part of the county was under water. It is the most valuable for agricultural purposes on account of its great producing and sustaining capacity, and is generally level, except where the rocks underneath have been thrust upward, forming abrupt, detached ridges, and outcropping or low, rolling surfaces. Brick-clay is found in this soil, and formerly there were many small ponds in the woodlands filled with water in all seasons. Sink-holes abound, and in several localities the brooks that come down from the shale ridges lose themselves in these, and pursue their underground courses for considerable distances.

Here the ash-tree, elm, shellbark, and black-walnut, contending with the oaks for the richness of the soil, send their roots deep among the limestones, and rear correspondingly massive trunks and lofty coronals. Here, too, the fountains, fewer in number than on the more elevated lands, well up through clefts in the rocks their deeper and darker waters from subterranean reservoirs.

Next we have the shale soil, commonly called slate, and sometimes improperly termed gravel. It is the soil, with few exceptions, of the interior ridges, and is composed of crumbled shale rock, which it overlies, mixed with clay and a vegetable mould, the deposits of forests that at one time flourished here. It is lighter and more easily worked than any of the other soils, yet has a compact and retentive subsoil, and can be made profitable and productive by proper tillage and manuring. It seems to be particularly adapted for fruit culture, and is the native place of the chestnut and the adopted home of the cherry,<sup>3</sup> while the raspberry, blackberry, and other small fruits grow wild everywhere, often to the annoyance of the tidy farmer. Forest trees do not attain to the same size as in the limestone bottoms, but comprise more varieties and form finer grained and tougher wood.

These shale belts are lifted somewhat above the adjacent country into a wholesome and exceedingly pleasant atmosphere. They present a diversified surface, varying from one to three miles in width and extending in some places many miles in length. Among the little hills and valleys issue delightful springs of the purest water, forming small brooks that in earlier days watered native meadows of sweet-scented grasses, while varied tree, plant, and bush upon the hillside kept the air fragrant from early spring till late in autumn.

<sup>2</sup> The greater average rainfall in this region has been attributed by some to the fact that it lies nearer to the river and bay, and because it had more timber-land. Since the forests have been more extensively cleared greater droughts have been experienced, followed by hail-storms, such as were unusual in that section before.

The sandstone soil is spread over the mountain that forms the northern barrier of the county, and extends in a belt, generally of a mile or more in width along its base, the entire length east and west. It is not of uniform depth, but is crowded in some places between the piled up rocks, and in others fails to cover the naked boulder on the hillside.

It is principally composed of a hard, round-grained sand of various shades of color from a deep red to a pale yellow and cream-white. The farmer has found it a rather stubborn subject to deal with, being full of rocks, heavy to work, and wanting in the clay or loamy subsoil necessary to hold fertilizers. Still, by dint of hard work and patient cultivation, with the application of lime and the raising and plowing down of red clover, good crops have been obtained. And it is worthy of notice that while the yield was less per acre, the grain was heavier than that grown on limestone land, owing, no doubt, to the very siliceous nature of the soil.

As a general rule, however, the farmer lost the greater part of this kind of land in the ownership and control of the iron-master, who obtained from its forests the charcoal needed to supply his furnaces and forges, which roared and hammered in the near vicinity during the pre-anthracite period.

There remains yet to be noticed the presence of trap rock and iron ore, which in some localities serve to color the soil, but do not seem to have any perceptible effect one way or another upon its fertility.

The earliest farming in the county was done by the Indian squaws in a very primitive manner. They cleared patches of land by girdling and burning down the trees, scratched the ground with crooked sticks, and hoed it with shells and sharp stones. They raised corn and beans; and in the fall, when their scanty crops were gathered and the cornstalks sufficiently dry, they were set on fire and burned to the ground, together with the weeds that had sprung up with them.

In this way the corn-patches were kept clear of all the forest trees except one kind of scrub-oak which the fires did not kill. These, by the alternate burning and sprouting, formed thick, knotted clumps at the surface of the ground, which the white settlers afterwards grubbed out when they began to till the land. The portions not taken into cultivation after the burning stopped were soon overrun by young forests. These places received the name of "Grub-land," from the word "grub," signifying, in the German, "a small tree."

There were a number of such Indian fields in the county, one immediately west of Litiz, and another, the largest of any, in Ephrata township, between the Middle Creek and Cocalico. On these the young forests afterwards became so dense that cattle straying into them were very hard to find; hence it became the custom of that time to put bells on some of the herd to tell their whereabouts. Even horses had to wear these musical appendages about their necks when turned to pasture over night for the same reason.

There also existed natural meadows, where the grasses, in all probability, had at an early day matted themselves into a sod too close for the seeds of trees to find lodgment. These were the deer pastures of the Indians, subsequently enlarged and turned into irrigated meadows by the whites.

Such, according to the most reliable accounts, was the condition of the county at the time the first settlers came,—heavy timber upon most of the limestone land, with occasional meadows and swamps; lighter woods covering the southern belt, shale and sandstone ridges, while some few exposed places may have been entirely barren of trees and verdure.

The honor of breaking ground for the first farms in Lancaster County, we believe, belongs to the Swiss Mennonites, a small colony of whom came about the year 1706 or 1707,<sup>1</sup> soon to be followed by more of their own countrymen, and by Scotch-Irish, Germans, English, and people of other nationalities.

The Scotch-Irish, so called because they had removed from Scotland to the north of Ireland some time before they came to America, it is said, selected their homes in the hill country, because it was easier cleared of the lighter forest, and because it reminded them somewhat of their native land.

The Swiss and Germans, who had felt the scarcity of wood and the severity of the forest laws in Europe, on the contrary, marked off their future farms among the heavy timber and upon the richest meadows in the limestone basins, "because," said they, "where the wood grows heaviest the soil must be best."

The Swiss Mennonites, or, as they were called, the Palatinates, like their Scotch-Irish contemporaries, had many of them left their native country on account of religious troubles, and lived for some time in the Palatinate and at other places along the Rhine before they finally came to America. Here they were brought in contact with the German and French farmers, and saw and no doubt worked on some of the best-conducted farms in that agricultural region. They afterwards drifted down the Rhine into Holland, and took passage with their families in some of the English vessels that sailed from the Dutch ports for America. They had in this journey opportunity to see and learn much that was useful in farming and housekeeping, and with the knowledge and experience already acquired in their native Switzerland, at that early day noted for the thrift and industry of its inhabitants, they came all the better prepared to grapple with the difficulties and hardships of establishing homes in a new country.

Friendly counsels, kind words of encouragement, and seeds for their new farms and gardens were brought with them from many of the people they passed on the way. Attachments also were formed between some of the young who thus met that ripened into promises, sometimes fulfilled before the vessel sailed, or which afterwards brought over a German or Huguenot wife or husband for an adventurous Swiss youth or maiden who had come before.

Landed on this side, there was a brief stay in one of the settlements already existing in and around Philadelphia and Germantown. Here were got together such outfits and supplies as might be needed or could be had. Meanwhile a few of the most prudent of their number were sent to examine the country, and if found satisfactory to select places for their future homes. Upon their return with favorable reports, application would be made to the proprietary government to have the tracts selected surveyed off for them, but as this could not always be done immediately, and time was precious, the parties pushed forward with their families to the destined places in the interior.

Let us attempt a brief sketch of one of these early movings. Two or more families generally started out together on what was then a journey of several days. Their household goods, prominent among which were large iron-bound chests filled with stuffs spun and woven in their homes across the water, farming implements, feed, and provisions, all packed and loaded in covered wagons, generally drawn by a team of horses, some of them the joint property of the parties, others hired for the trip. Occasionally only an ox-team formed part of the train, for, as a general rule, the German people of this county always preferred heavy horses for draught.

The small children were placed in the wagons, while the grown and half-grown went on foot. Several of the most active marched in advance with axes, piloting the train along the best route and clearing away obstructions. There were fallen trees and hanging vines to be removed, streams to ford, marshes to be avoided or crossed, so that stoppages were frequent and progress slow. With all these precautions, team and wagon sometimes sank into morasses and became stalled. In such event the horses would be removed, chains and ropes attached to the wagon so as to reach solid ground, the team hitched to the far end, and the wagon pulled out.

After arriving at the place selected, which was always convenient to some spring, because springs were plenty and there was no time to dig wells, the covered wagons served as a home for the children and females, while the men and boys put up temporary shelters for themselves until a log cabin could be built. To do this the men at once went busily to work.

"Then was heard the sound of the settler's axe, Signal of a mighty change."

Plainly-dressed men, with coats off, bare arms, and sweated brows, swung old-fashioned axes, and dealt blow after blow into the trunks of the century-old forest trees until they trembled and tottered and came down with great crashes that frightened the wild fowls from the neighboring stream and startled the Indian squaw upon its banks who had come to gather willow twigs to be made into baskets.

The trunks of the fallen trees were cut into the required lengths, split into proper thickness, and dragged by the teams to the place wanted. Here they were notched and built into a log house, a primitive but solid structure, subsequently to be chinked and daubed and covered with oaken shingles.

Meanwhile the women, in their homespun dresses and plain white caps, were not idle. The open air was their kitchen. A wall of hastily-collected stones served for a hearth. Pots and kettles were strung by chains and iron hooks to cross-poles, gipsy fashion. Perhaps a temporary roof of poles and branches was put up to cover the heads of those that did the cooking, and to prevent the rain putting out the fire. Here the meals were prepared and served on a table consisting of the end-gate of the wagon nailed upon the stump of a tree cut at the proper height.

At meal-times the men ate first, the women and children afterwards. Grace was said silently; there was but little levity and no profanity. The forest air was invigorating, labor sharpened the appetites, and the simple fare was without doubt enjoyed.

Busy children foraged the woods for whatever could be found new or attractive, and brought water from the spring, always receiving the admonition of their elders not to venture far into the forest for fear of the Indians or other unknown dangers. A chance shot by some of the boys added an occasional wild fowl or squirrel to the larder, or a visit to the neighboring stream brought in a string of fish.

Before the men had the roof on the house the women had started a vegetable garden, and the seeds and bulbs brought from across the ocean were showing green sprouts in the beds prepared by them with spade and hoe.

The logs not needed for the house, and if not enough others added, were split into rails, and a worm-fence built around the cleared ground. The underwood was grubbed up, and, together with branches and tree-tops not fit for firewood, were rolled and dragged into heaps and fired. The season was pressing, and before the smouldering ashes had time to cool, the old-fashioned wooden plow, drawn by the heavy team, tore deep furrows through the blackened mould. There were many and strong roots to encounter and immovable stumps in the way, and the labor was hard, but the men were in earnest; early and late the work went on until the ground was ready for the first seeding. They may have had no harrow, so a bundle of brushwood chained together served instead, and the grain suitable for the season was harrowed in, the ground smoothed over, and the party moved off to begin similar work for the next neighbor, because it was found advantageous for them to work together instead of singly and alone.

By midsummer most of the log cabins would be up and the families moved in. These houses were still without cellars or floors, the windows had no glass, and the doors swung on wooden hinges, and were fastened by wooden bars. These wants could be supplied in due time. A more pressing need was to secure in time a sufficient store of provender for their horses for the coming winter. The natural meadows and deer-parks already mentioned served them to good purpose in this respect. On many of these they made their first crop of hay, and continued to mow them in subsequent years.<sup>1</sup>

While the summer crops were growing, the time was well employed in putting up temporary stabling for the horses. The building of the Swisser barn, which was considered the most important structure on the farm, had to be postponed for a more convenient season, when due preparation could be made. Lesser improvements were added, generally a turf-covered cellar was built into the hillside, and a bake-oven put up. The acre from which the timber was taken to build the stable was also cleared of the undergrowth and got ready for fall seeding.

It was noticed that in the forest there would be plenty of acorns by the time frosts came, so orders were sent to the eastern settlements for pigs. It may be presumed that these came in due time, and increased rapidly, from the fact that our ancestors soon became great pork eaters.<sup>2</sup>

The question of introducing cows by the early farmers depended upon the possibility of their procuring the needed supply of grass and hay. To this end their attention was at once directed to the enlargement of such patches of natural meadows as they possessed. Ditches were dug, and through these the water of the brooks was diverted from the original channel and distributed over larger spaces of ground, generally along the hill-sides. By such irrigation the growth of the grasses was greatly increased.

<sup>1</sup> It is said that even at a later day the Hostetters, who lived in Manor township, where the land was then covered with timber, would go a distance of some ten miles to make hay on the natural meadows in the vicinity where Manheim borough is now located; that subsequently one of them moved up near to the place where some of his descendants still reside.

<sup>2</sup> There are at least eight different ways in which pig can be served up at a Lancaster County table, while there is hardly a pie, dumpling, or cake that goes on it, baked or fried, in the preparation of which lard is not used.

These meadows (wässer wiesen) soon became very valuable appurtenances to the farms, and when the original tracts came to be divided, the rights thereto were carefully set forth in the title-deeds, generally giving the use and control of the stream to the owners of the several tracts a certain number of days in each week alternately.

Early in the summer the children had found wild strawberries along the edges of the meadows, and later in the season they were bringing baskets full of blackberries and huckleberries from the neighboring uplands to be dried for winter use.

The trio of fowls had by careful management of housewife and children increased to a little flock. The woods seemed an excellent place for them to scratch for insects and to roost. And the barking of the house-dog frightened away the foxes and opossums.

Oats, corn, spelt, and buckwheat comprised the summer crop of grain. The former could be fed to the horses in the straw. The corn was husked and the ears hung up or laid away to dry, the tops and blades carefully gathered and stored for winter use; spelt and buckwheat was cut and left to dry on shocks, then threshed and winnowed by hand on sheets spread upon the ground. There was a crop of late turnips between the corn-rows to be added to the vegetables in the garden.

Of fall work there was more than enough. A second crop of hay was to be made, more ditches to be dug, stones to be quarried, fire-wood to be cut, the fall seeding to be finished, acorns to be gathered, and over and always (between times) trees to be felled, rails split, and logs to be hewed for the barn that was soon to be built.

Trips had also to be made to the eastern stores for supplies, and to the mills for flour, or to have grists ground. These would take several days, as the nearest mills were then on the Schuylkill and Brandywine. Several of the men would go together, each carrying a bag of grain on horseback, and return with the flour or meal in the same manner.<sup>3</sup>

Thus passed in quick succession spring, summer, and autumn of the first year with our first settlers. Too busy with the present to think much of the past, <sup>3</sup> An interesting account of one of these trips is given by a Mr. Hoernley, in which his grandfather participated. Some eight or ten of the neighbors started together from what is now Penn township, each with his bag of wheat or rye on horseback for the mills at Downingtown, a distance of about forty-five miles. Their route was a bridle-path leading through forests and dense growths of young timber, so that they had to ride in single file most of the way.

These inconveniences fortunately did not continue long; both grist-mills and saw-mills were at an early day built in the interior of the county, and so multiplied did they become in numbers that the second and third generations saw a mill or factory of some kind for every mile or two along all the streams of the county wherever there was water enough to turn a wheel.

too resolute to give way to homesickness, or to despair of the future. Their lot was cast, their hands had literally been put to the plow, and they would not look back. A wide ocean separated them from a fatherland, to which they might only return and live by yielding up what to them was more precious than life itself, the privilege of worshipping God according to their own faith and belief.

It was when winter had set in, out-door employments were fewer, the household crowded within the narrow limits of the primitive log house, and many of the comforts not to say necessities of life wanting, that their isolated condition began to be keenly felt and the ordeal became more trying. In these extremities they turned for encouragement and consolation to their Bible and the promises it contained.

No one can write a truthful history of these people and overlook the serious religious spirit that pervaded their lives and governed and guided their every thought and action. Through it they resisted successfully the allurements and blandishments of office and worldly honors that might have awaited them in other pursuits, and kept themselves and their descendants down to the humbler occupation of farmers. They were by no means insensible to what was pleasant and enjoyable in life and beautiful and attractive in art and nature, some of the older people being well educated; but as they considered these things too closely connected with the lusts of the eye and sinful pride, they discarded them. Music and the dance, purple and fine linen, found neither place nor encouragement in their homes.

During the winter preparations were made for the coming spring. More land was cleared, a barn-yard fenced in, farming implements put in order, and new ones added. The horse and pigs amply bedded in leaves brought from the woods were being safely carried through the cold weather with fodder to spare. The only events interrupting the quiet of the household were occasional vague rumors of impending danger from the Indians, which fortunately proved unfounded, or the unexpected appearance of a few wild deer in the newly-fenced grain-field and their sudden departure. Several coon and musk-rat skins nailed up against the stable showed the doings of the young; the elders did not encourage hunting or trapping, however.<sup>1</sup>

On the second and subsequent years some Swiss barns were built. By that time saw-mills had been <sup>1</sup> They had a saying which they would repeat for the benefit of such as showed any undue tendency to becoming hunters or trappers, which ran as follows:

"Wer sich ernähret mit fischen und jagen, Der musz zerriessene kleider tragen."

Who by fishing and hunting would earn his fare,
Tattered clothing is forced to wear.

Notwithstanding this, many of the young farmers became expert marksmen.

erected on the neighboring streams, where logs could be converted into plank and sawed timber needed for their construction. Whether these buildings were patterned after the barns that stood against the hillsides of Switzerland, as their name would indicate, or whether, as has been suggested, the plan of the original was changed to admit of improvements which the builders saw during their sojourn in the Palatinate and Holland, has not been definitely settled. The fact remains that the English and Scotch-Irish, as well as the German farmers in the county, soon adopted it as the plan for all their barns.

These well-known structures, which form such prominent objects in the landscape of the county, are two stories high, with pitched roof, built sufficiently large and strong to enable heavy farm-teams to drive into the upper story to load or unload grain. During the first period they were mostly built of logs, afterwards of stone, frame, or brick, from sixty to one hundred and twenty feet long, and from fifty to sixty feet wide; the lower story containing the stables, with feeding passages opening on the front. The upper story was made to project eight or ten feet over the lower in front, or with a forebay attached, to shelter the entries to the stables and passageways. It contained the threshing floors, mows, and lofts for the storing of hay and grain. The most complete barns of the present day have in addition a granary on the upper floor, a cellar under the driving-way, a wagon-shed, with corn-crib and horse-power shed all attached.

The early farmers cultivated spelt, barley, oats, and buckwheat for summer crops, and rye for a winter crop. Wheat was not then extensively raised: it was considered of too delicate a growth and uncertain yield, except in some few favored localities. The wheaten loaf was only served on Sundays and special occasions. Rye, or mixed rye and spelt, formed the daily bread.<sup>2</sup>

Besides this, the straw of rye was used for many purposes. Beehives, bread-baskets, cask-lids, and the roofs of barns and other farm buildings were made of it. To make a good thatch roof was in that day quite an art. The long, flail-threshed rye straw was first tied into small bunches, neatly trimmed, called "sackels," and these were firmly fastened to the laths with bands of twisted straw, in consecutive rows overlapping each other from eave to peak, after the manner of a shingle roof. The comb or peak was closed by a row of untied straw laid crossways, and held in place by poles fastened with wooden hooks.

A well-made, neatly-kept straw roof lasted many years, and was not an unsightly object. Cool in summer, warm in winter, it gave a modest, comfortable air to the old barns that is wanting in many of our modern slate-covered structures. Straw-roofed barns held their place with some of our well-to-do farmers as late as 1850.

Flax and hemp were also cultivated, and manufactured into linen and wearing apparel for home use, the strength and durability of which became proverbial. The seed was sold to the oil-miller.

By the second and subsequent years cows and sheep were added to the live stock. The former supplied the much-needed articles of the dairy, while the latter were kept almost exclusively for their fleece. Our German ancestors were no great mutton eaters.

The favored breed of cows was a large-sized, clean-limbed animal, with smooth, thin but rather long horns hooked backward; many of them brindled in color, with white breasts and udders. They were good milkers and excellent foragers.

Short horns were introduced about 1825-30, Devons after them, and the Jerseys still later (about 1860).

The sheep were of the long-wooled kind, some of the males having immense horns. Merino rams were imported from Spain as early as 1810, by which no doubt the home-breed was improved, but the purely fine-wooled never came into general favor, because their short fleece was less serviceable and more difficult to work.

The raising of heavy draft-horses received early attention in the county. Numerous stallions were kept for breeding purposes, and the walls of the roadside taverns and blacksmith-shops were at certain seasons profusely placarded with horse-bills, setting forth pedigree and desirable points of the animal, and illustrated with spirited wood-cuts, supposed to represent the different candidates for patronage among the neighboring farmers.

After having provided himself with a barn, the farmer set about the erection of a suitable house to take the place of the first log cabin. The preparation for this took several years. Stones had to be quarried, lumber sawed and allowed to season, so that the second generation assisted in the erection, and oftentimes were married, and some of them moved into the new mansion along with the parents.

These houses were generally built of stone, some of them with dressed corners, two stories high, with pitched roof, and with cornices run across the gables and around the first story. A large chimney in the middle, if modeled after the German pattern, and with a chimney at either gable-end if built after the English or Scotch idea. Many of them were imposing structures, having arched cellars underneath, spacious hallways, with easy stairs, open fireplaces in most of the rooms, oak-paneled partitions, and windows hung in weights. Some of these houses are still standing, greatly disfigured, it is true, by unsuitable modern alterations, but with walls still as solid as they were on the day when the masons put the finishing touches to them.

The old builders of these houses greatly honored themselves by giving due honor to their wives, partners and helpmates in the work. High and conspicuous in the front wall, or gable, they caused to be placed a stone into which was cut, in lasting letters, their names and the names of their wives, with date of the building.

This may be considered the age of the sickle, German scythe, and flail, those being the harvesting implements of the period.

The fields were plowed in lands, a certain number of furrows being thrown together, leaving two uncovered furrows between the lands, as is still done in wet soils. In harvesting, two reapers would take a land. Young women who could be spared in the house helped, many of whom did a full day's work. Generally they were placed on a land with a strong and skillful male harvester, who would gallantly take a little more than his half, and lighten the labors of his female partner. They would reap through, laying the handfuls of grain into sheaves and bind them returning.

The German scythe, being shorter and broader in blade than the English, was better suited for mowing the meadows. It was malleable, and sharpened by hammering the edge on a small anvil, and the whetstone used was carried by the mower with a horn containing water, sometimes mixed with vinegar.

The meadows were mowed earlier than the uplands, and the hay dried by spreading and turning it in the field during fair weather, and by putting it on weather-cocks over night or at the approach of rain. The men did the mowing, but boys and girls joined in the lighter work of drying and housing it. Often on these occasions, as well as in harvest-time and apple-gatherings, there were merry parties of young people at work among their staid and grave seniors.

Corn was in that day, and even in later years, often topped and bladed, leaving the ears to ripen on the stalk. This was supposed to improve the grain, and made the fodder better and easier to handle. Threshing was done with the flail or by tramping it out by horses,—a labor that lasted through the greater part of winter, and was cold and tedious work.

About the year 1800 the grain-cradle was introduced. This consisted of a broad scythe, with a light frame of four wooden fingers attached corresponding in shape and nearly of the same length. With this the grain could be cut and at the same time gathered, and by a dexterous turn to the left the reaper could throw it in a swath, ready to be raked and bound into sheaves.

The sickle thenceforth continued to be used only occasionally in badly-lodged grain, and was finally altogether laid aside.

About this time, or soon after, red-clover and timothy began to be sowed. These could be grown on the uplands, and were mowed with the English scythe,—also about that time first introduced. The farmer was now no longer altogether dependent on his irrigated meadows for hay, and the German scythe found a place of past usefulness in the loft of the old log cabin along-side of the sickle. The flail held its position for a while longer, and its not unmusical rat-tat-tat continued to be heard on the barn-floor.

The raising of spelt and barley was gradually superseded by the old red, and later (in about 1818-20) by the red- and blue-stem wheat, which it was found could be successfully grown. The wheaten loaf, mixed only with a little rye, became the daily bread.

Acres of cleared land had by this time been added each year to the farm. The herds had increased, and by dint of unceasing industry of the housewife and her busy maidens the fleece of the flocks had been carded, and spun and woven and knitted into woollens that defied the cold of winter; and the oaken chests and closets became filled with treasures manufactured out of the flax and hemp grown during the preceding years.

The orchards planted were beginning to yield fruit. There were barrels of cider on the shady side of the house, red and russet apples in the cellar, fragrant dried fruit, gathered seeds, and sweet herbs in the garret. The granary and the mows in the barn did not get altogether empty between harvests. The manure pile grew large and fat; and still there remained stacks of hay over from last year. As the substantial comforts of the farmer thus multiplied other and new cravings and wants began to be felt, and he and his household needed more than ever the stern warnings from their ministers against the lusts of the eye and the pride of life,—more the earnest supplications for deliverance in their prosperity than in the day of their adversity.

The well-cultivated soil yielded more than the live-stock could reasonably consume; the market was distant, and the prices comparatively low; so the farmer sold his surplus grain to the miller, who ground and sold it, to be distilled into whiskey. This was less bulky, easier transported, and found a ready market and consumption. Still-houses became numerous; the coarser grains of rye, corn, and barley were converted into liquor. Upon one or two occasions did an audacious distiller make whiskey out of the more precious wheat, to the great horror and outcry of all right-minded people.

The wheat was made into flour, and like the whiskey, hauled by the farm-teams to the eastern markets at Newport and Philadelphia, bringing in return store-goods, salt, and land-plaster. The hauling was mostly done in the winter, when the horses were not needed on the farm. Some farmers had teams on the road all the year, hauling goods between Philadelphia and Pittsburgh. These were the famed "Conestoga Teams," known far and wide, sometimes called "The Ships of Inland Commerce." They were stately objects in those times, in which owner and driver alike took pride and kept neat and trim.

The team consisted of either five or six heavy horses, well fed and curried, wearing good harness, and sometimes adorned with bows of bells fitted so as to form an arch above the collars. These bells were carefully selected to harmonize or chime, from the small trebles on the leaders to the larger bass upon the wheel-horses.

The wagon and body was necessarily built stanch and strong, but by no means clumsy. Upon them the wheelwright and blacksmith expended their utmost skill and good taste, and oftentimes produced masterpieces of work, both in shape and durability. The wagon was invariably painted red and the body blue. The cover was of stout white linen or hempen material, drawn tightly over shapely bows fitted to the body, lower near the middle and projecting like a bonnet in front and at the back, the whole having a graceful and slight outline. It was said that the best wagons and finest traces were made at Loudon, Pa.<sup>1</sup>

Taverns sprung up thickly along all the main roads to accommodate the many teams. There was scarcely a miller or distiller that had not also his farm. Whiskey was plenty and freely drank. The bottle was in the field during haymaking and harvest, and set out three times a day for the workmen all the year round. Fortunately, the liquor for home consumption was all rectified and reduced in strength, so that its excessive use was less injurious on that account. There was then no accurate mode of testing its strength, and it is said many distillers profited by mixing water with that sent to market.

Times seemed prosperous. But not satisfied to let well enough alone, the Legislature in 1814 chartered forty State banks at one session, five of them in Lancaster County. The German Governor, Simon Sny-

There was then considerable prejudice against railroads entertained even by the more sober-minded. They believed after the roads were built there would be no longer a market for horses, whereas the contrary has proved to be the case, horses now selling for three times their former prices.

Some of the old ballads which used to be popular with the teamsters, express these sentiments in language more forcible than elegant. The concluding verses of one ran as follows:

"May the d— I get the man that first invented the plan
To make a railroad or dig a canal;
For they ruin our plantations wherever they do cross,
And they spoil our markets that you can't sell a horse."
(Chorus).—"Can't sell a horse."

"Now come all you bold wagoners that have got good wifes, Go home to your farms and there spend your lives;
When your harvest is over and your corn in the crib,
You have nothing else to do but to curse the railroad."
(Chorus).—"Curse the railroad."

The reader may well picture to himself the scene when a chorus of teamsters were singing this ballad to an old air similar to "Wearing of the Green," in the bar-room of a wayside tavern where they were stopping over night.

der, vetoed the bill, but the two Houses passed it over his objections, and speculation in everything soon went wild. Farm-land rose in price to two hundred dollars an acre and over. Five hundred dollars an acre was refused for timber-land, and a cord of hickory wood brought ten dollars in Lancaster City.

A few years' time fully vindicated the foresight of Governor Snyder, and showed the danger of rashly interfering with the finances of a State. Many of the banks failed, a panic ensued, farm-land fell in price to fifty dollars an acre, and other things came down at corresponding rates.

Such as had purchased or accepted farms at the high rates without the means to pay for them became bankrupt. The sheriff gathered a rich harvest, and the jail was filled with debtors. Only those who refused to be drawn into the vortex of speculation and pursued the even tenor of their farm-life weathered the storm.

There should be noticed a different kind of farming carried on by a few during this and previous years. New lands were taken up or purchased by them, the timber cut and put into market or sold to the iron-master, to be converted into charcoal. The land cultivated for several years, until exhausted, and then abandoned. A number of such barren tracts existed in the county, and were by many supposed in later years never to have had any timber upon them. The plow of those who afterwards reclaimed these lands, however, turned up the dark mould, showing conclusively not only that forests once covered them, but also the places where the timber was coaled.

During this period land-plaster was most extensively used, sown broadcast on the grass fields in early spring and sprinkled on the young corn and garden vegetables.

From the best accounts attainable lime, which superseded plaster, was begun to be used on land about 1820. Joseph Brubaker, Sr., and Frederick Keller, near Littitz, Andrew Hoerner, above Manheim, and Samuel Pfautz, near Middle Creek, are said to have been some of the first who practiced extensive and systematic liming of their lands in the northern part of the county.<sup>1</sup> The visible good effects which attended their experiments soon induced many others to follow their example, and the use of lime as a manure was rapidly introduced throughout the county. Nowhere could the good effects so plainly be seen as on light, sour, or worn-out lands. Many such were reclaimed principally by its judicious application. It sweetened the sour and stale soils, and formed a starting-point for the production of red clover, to be succeeded by corn and wheat. Still, above every other fertilizer the Lancaster County farmer valued good barnyard manure. A fat manure pile and large straw stack in the barnyard are still considered some of the best evidences of good farming, particularly if the former is enriched by the fattening of cattle.

The rotation of crops, finally adopted about this time, and with few exceptions still adhered to, is as follows: Two years in grass, of mixed clover and timothy, one year in corn, one year in oats, then a heavy coat of barnyard manure plowed down, and two years in wheat, to be followed again by grass. Accordingly many farms were divided into six fields, receiving a coat of manure once every sixth year, and an application of lime once in the same time, generally on the corn land, from fifty to one hundred bushels per acre, slacked and evenly spread on the land after it was plowed and shovel-harrowed in. Since tobacco is being more extensively cultivated, this rotation is somewhat interfered with.

In 1832 or 1833, William Kirkpatrick began the manufacture of portable threshing machines in the county. A few stationary machines had been in use a short time before, one of them at Pool Forge. There were also some portable machines brought about this time from Milton, Northumberland Co., made by a Mr. Meixel. All these had spiked cylinders, working into spiked concaves, connected by strap and pulley with a horizontal cast-iron geared horse-power, to which four or more horses could be attached. Straw carrying and separating attachments were subsequently added.

There was also introduced at one time a beater machine from Maine, having a cylinder and concaves of iron bars in place of spikes. These could not successfully compete with the spike machines, and never came much into use.

Threshing machines were a great innovation of the old methods, doing in a few days what used to be half a winter's work for the farmer and his hired men. Several conscientious farmers at first declined to use them, saying, it would be virtually taking the bread out of the poor man's mouth. It was not long, however, until the laboring man himself spoke in favor of their introduction. This has proved to be the case with most of the labor-saving implements since that time introduced. By shortening the time required to do the work, the wages could be increased.

The left-handed plow has held his place in fields of the county up to the present time without a successful rival. It has from time to time been greatly improved, until now we have a light, easy-running implement, with smooth-ground, chilled-iron, and steel-working parts, instead of the cumbersome drag with wooden mould-board and heavy coulter of our ancestors.

The double-toothed tumbling grain-rake in use between 1830 and 1850 was a great improvement on the simple horse-rake, and the immediate predecessor of the modern wire-toothed sulky-rake, with which one man and a horse can pleasantly do the work it took six men to do the old way in the same time.

Wheat-ground used to be twice plowed, the second time not very deep. It was then seeded broadcast, and harrowed the same direction as plowed the last time. This would bring the grain in rows, and made it less liable to freeze out.

About 1842-43 the grain-drill was introduced, which answered the same purpose even better, and second plowing was no longer practiced. The ground being put in order for seeding by repeated working with improved cultivators, harrows, and rollers.

One of the latest and greatest triumphs in agricultural labor-saving machinery undoubtedly is the reaper and mower. In 1851 the first McCormick reapers were brought into the county, and John B. Erb, Esq., then of Clay township, became the agent for their introduction and sale. There was a different patterned machine, an odd-looking concern, here a few years previous, but it met with no success. From the time of the introduction of the McCormick, the use of reapers and mowers became an established fact in the county. Farmers did not like to do without them, and laboring men found no objection to their use in place of the old-fashioned cradle. Other machines soon appeared to compete with the original McCormick for possession of the harvest fields. Improvements upon all of them were speedily made; the wooden cutter-bar was replaced by one of iron; self-rakers of all imaginable devices were added; and, as though not yet satisfied, the fertile brain of the inventor has at last, as it were, infused a portion of his own intellect into wood and iron, and crowned the already admirable machine with an attachment that gathers and binds the cut grain into equal-sized sheaves, and lays them at the feet of the farmer with a dexterity and precision amounting to almost human intelligence.

Looking on what has already been done by way of the improved implements mentioned, to which may be added patent hay-forks, steam thresher and separators, by which the crops can now be seeded, harvested, threshed, cleaned, and placed in bags ready for market, there is no telling what may not be accomplished in the future, if we are not overtaken by unforeseen calamities, or sink under political corruption and individual extravagance.

Above all, however, there was and always will be needed that watchful care and personal direction of the work by the farmer himself which no machinery can supply. "Eternal vigilance is the only price of success." In this respect, fortunately, the farmers of Lancaster County have not been found wanting. Neither visionary nor widely experimental in their ways, they are yet quick to perceive and ready to try any improvement that promises success. Industrious and persevering, they never hesitated to battle with the obstacles they encountered, and never despaired of finding some way out of the difficulties which beset them. These were not a few. After their farms had been cleared of trees and stumps, there were weeds and insects without number to combat.

To give only a few instances: At one time the granary weevil (Sitophilus granarius) became very numerous and destructive in many barns, eating out the grain after it was housed. There was no remedy except to starve them. To accomplish this the farmers stacked their wheat in the fields for a number of years, keeping the barns empty until entirely rid of the pests. In later times the potato-beetle was met with an equally decided resistance by oft-repeated doses of Paris green. When one kind of grain or vegetable seemed to have run out, others were tried until the proper one was found. In like manner with fruits. When the apple and plum became a partial failure, the strawberry, pear, and improved native grape supplied their place. Western wheat being brought into competition with that raised at home, tobacco is extensively and successfully cultivated, and the profits of the farm are further increased by the products of the dairy, poultry-yard, and truck-patch. These products are carried to our home markets in cities and towns, some of them a distance of over ten miles, once and twice a week, a work in which the wives and daughters of the farmer assist, often leaving home several hours before daylight and returning by noon.

Light, easy-running, one-horse, spring market-wagons, with oil-cloth tops, drawn by active, well-fed trotting-horses, have now taken the place of the heavy, white-covered, four-horse wagons that used to come to market once and twice a year in the olden time.

Briers and weeds still continue an abomination in the eyes of our farmers, and find neither peace nor rest. Plow and harrow turn them under and tear them; fire and the scythe follow them relentlessly wherever they lift their heads.

It must be noticed, however, that since the labor of farmers has been lightened, they and their families seem less inclined to hard work. On this account more farms have passed into the hands of tenants, so that the eye and hand of the master are no longer constantly present, and many seeming trifling things, which in the aggregate amount to a great deal, remain unattended to, and the farms, while rented, assume a less tidy appearance.

Prior to 1880 very few farmers enjoyed the luxury of a pleasure carriage. Only grand persons rode in old-fashioned gigs. Common well-to-do people went on business, or visited their friends, on horseback. Children would be taken along in front of them on a pillow, and infants were carried on the arm, tightly wrapped in a shawl or quilt.

Women became skillful and daring riders, so that it was not unusual for a mother to undertake a journey of ten and fifteen miles alone on horseback, with an infant on her arm. Boys and girls became accustomed at an early age to be about horses. Maidens of sixteen and seventeen would take butter and eggs to the country stores, and canter home with goods received in exchange.

When a farmer's daughter became of an age to go into company, she received a handsome saddle and bridle, and was allowed the use of a farm-horse to go to church-meeting or singing-school. Girls wore close-fitting riding-coats and scoop-bonnets or beaver hats.

The representative farmer may be thus described: At first a shy, rosy-faced lad, driving the cows, carrying water to the men in the fields, hunting the eggs, taking the horses to the smith-shop, and doing errands about the farm. Secondly, a youth, splitting firewood, cleaning the stables, beginning to plow, and learning to do the lighter farm-work during summer; in winter feeding the stock and going to school; during school-hours busy with his arithmetic, on the play-ground allowing others to outshine him in jest and repartee, but sending his balls straight to the mark with a force that made them felt. He studied to learn and played to win. At seventeen or eighteen the recipient of a new saddle and bridle, at nineteen and twenty he had charge of the farm-team, led the men in harvest, and selected the finest and best-groomed colt to carry him "a-courting."

Generally marrying young, on the day of the wedding he brought home his wife, riding by her side at the head of a company of merry friends, followed by the teams loaded with her goods and house-furniture, while the cows she got from home, with a noisy party of drivers, brought up the rear.

"The boy was father to the man." At the head of his own household, he applied himself to his newly-assumed duties with renewed energy, he and his patient, industrious partner living plainly, working early and late, and saving all that was possible to pay for their farm.

At the birth of a child they rejoiced as so much help added to the family. If a boy, they considered themselves a hundred pounds richer; if a girl, fifty pounds.

Settling down soon after marriage to thoughtful manhood and womanhood, they usually became members of their church, attended to their own business, refrained from meddling in the affairs of others, accumulated enough to assist their children materially in their start in life, avoided display, shunned worldly honors, and lived and died useful, worthy, and respected people.

Such, briefly and imperfectly summed up, were the representative farmer and his wife, who helped to make Lancaster County what it is. Long be their memories revered and their examples imitated!

Agricultural Societies.—In the old files of the newspapers published at Lancaster there appears a call for a meeting of an agricultural society as early as 1787. And a premium was offered by another society, of which Dr. F. A. Muhlenberg was president and J. McKissick, secretary, in 1800, for the best sample of flax raised in the county.

From 1848 to 1856 there was a society that held annual and semi-annual meetings in Lancaster, at which addresses were delivered and questions discussed pertaining to agriculture. The veteran farmers, Jacob B. Garber and John Miller, were among its active members, and Judge Patterson acted as secretary. This society never ventured to hold an exhibition.

In October, 1852, the Pennsylvania State Agricultural Society held its annual exhibition on grounds in the eastern part of the city, which proved a grand success. The committee of arrangements were D. W. Patterson, John Miller, Benjamin Eshleman, Jacob B. Garber, Robert C. Walker, Christian B. Herr, Lightner Sharp, and Joseph Konigmacher.

Subsequently there was organized the Lancaster County Agricultural and Mechanical Society, of which Joseph Konigmacher and Judge Ferree Brinton were respectively the presiding officers, and D. G. Eshleman, Esq., secretary. This society held four successful annual exhibitions upon its grounds in the western part of the city in 1857, '58, '59, and '60. When the civil war broke out the society gave its ground as a camping-place for the volunteer soldiers; the buildings and sheds were partly destroyed and the association passed out of existence.

After the war the present existing Lancaster County Agricultural and Horticultural Society was organized, and at a later day the Lancaster Park Association was formed, and held several creditable fairs, at which there was a department allotted to agricultural exhibits.

Lancaster County Agricultural and Horticultural Society.—No one of the agricultural or horticultural predecessors of this society has uninterruptedly continued its organization longer than the present one.

A short period after the downfall of the Southern Rebellion, in September, 1867, this society was instituted by a number of the most progressive and intelligent farmers and fruit-growers of the county, and it has continued its organization, without interruption, down to the present time, a period of sixteen years.

Its successive presiding officers have been L. S. Reist, H. M. Engle, Johnston Miller, Calvin Cooper, Joseph F. Whitmer, and Henry G. Rush (the present incumbent). Owing to the fact that a quasi agricultural organization already existed in the county of Lancaster, it confined its specialties mainly to horticulture, but some years later agriculture was super-added.

The society was incorporated by the Court of Common Pleas of Lancaster County. It holds its meetings on the first Monday of each month, on the third floor of the City Hall, Lancaster, but has the power, under its constitution, of meeting elsewhere a certain number of times each year.

The present officers are: President, Henry G. Rush; Vice-Presidents, H. M. Engle and J. B. Garber; Recording Secretary, John C. Linville; Corresponding Secretary, Calvin Cooper; Treasurer, M. D. Kendig; Managers, W. H. Brosius, Calvin Cooper, E. H. Weaver, Casper Hiller, and Cyrus Neff; Librarian, S. P. Eby, Esq.; Chemist, Dr. J. H. Musser; Entomologist, S. S. Rathvon; Botanist (vacant).

Mr. H. M. Engle represents the society as its delegate in the State Board of Agriculture, and it usually is represented by a large delegation in the State Horticultural Society (formerly the Pennsylvania Fruit-Growers' Society), and also in the State Agricultural Society.

From the early history of this society it has, at irregular periods, held public exhibitions, and so far as relates to special fruits, vegetables, and flowers, they have been creditable and reasonably successful; but it never has attempted a general exhibition of all the agricultural and collateral interests of the county, mainly through a conflict in views as to what should be encouraged and what prohibited. There is, for instance, a largely predominating religious element among the farming portion of the county which seems to be committed against any exhibition that approximates a horse race, a trial of speed, or any other display of a similar character; and that element, it seems, will not or cannot co-operate with those who favor such pageantries; and without the latter there appears to be an insufficient attraction to the masses which make agricultural exhibitions financially successful. It seems remarkable how distinctly the line is drawn, in this respect, between Lancaster County and the counties of Berks and York on the north and southwest of it.

There is not the shadow of a doubt but that the Lancaster County Agricultural and Horticultural Society has been an effective school to the limited number who have actively participated in its operations. Many have become better speakers and debaters than they would otherwise have been, and also better farmers. Many have been elected to responsible public offices; but whether that has been any advantage to them is a matter upon which people may entertain different opinions. The abuse, however, of talents and opportunities is no argument against their use, and this use has been amply diffused by this society.

Tobacco Culture in Lancaster County.<sup>1</sup>—It is about two hundred and seventy years since tobacco was first grown for commercial purposes. From the few thousand pounds raised in the youthful colony of Virginia in 1616, the culture of this article has extended into almost every country. To-day the production of the world reaches 1,500,000,000 pounds, and 700,000,000 of people, one-half the entire number of the inhabitants of the earth, use it in some form. There is, perhaps, no other instance on record where an article not absolutely necessary to the needs of the human family has gained such a wide introduction among men in so brief a period. It almost seems to indicate that some mild narcotic is essential to the comfort and enjoyment of mankind.

I purpose briefly to give some of the more interesting facts and details concerning this important industry in Lancaster County, where, during the brief period of fifty years, it has reached a remarkable development and become one of the leading crops. At first there was a good deal of prejudice, arising from moral considerations, on the part of many farmers against growing tobacco, but this has gradually worn off, although there are still a few who never plant the crop. But, aside from the reason just given, there was another important consideration with the farmers which did much to interfere with its more general introduction. This was the well-known exhaustive character of the crop. It was well known that tobacco is a ravenous feeder, and that the tendency was to impoverish the soil. Prudent farmers were unwilling to exhaust their lands by growing a crop that has converted thousands of acres in other States into worn-out and barren lands. But they soon learned this was the result of careless farming. Any crop will exhaust the soil unless care is taken to revive its fertility by the liberal use of fertilizers. By careful attention to this fact they have been enabled to grow successive crops of tobacco without any deterioration of their farms. But a limited area is set out each year. Three or four per cent. of the farm's acreage is deemed enough. The result has been that instead of growing poorer in consequence of growing tobacco, its productiveness has been steadily increasing. Better crops of every kind are grown in Lancaster County to-day than when tobacco-growing was still unthought of. More cattle are kept and fattened by the farmers, and more manure is produced. The result is that while tobacco grounds make heavy demands upon the manure-heap, the rest of the farm is not left without its due share. Should at any time, from whatever cause, tobacco-growing in this locality prove unprofitable, or it be found expedient from other causes to give up its culture, the farms will be found, we confidently venture to say, as well prepared for the growth of other crops as they have at any time within a hundred years.

Nearly two hundred years ago tobacco-culture was extensively carried on in the newly-founded colony of Penn. In 1689 no fewer than fourteen vessels sailed from Pennsylvania loaded with tobacco. Of course they were small craft compared with the ships of to-day, but the fact nevertheless indicates to what extent the culture of this product was carried on at that early day. It seems to have died out, however, as little is heard of it until the first quarter of the present century, when it was again taken up in a few places, but nowhere so extensively as in Lancaster County. About the years 1825-30 the farmers once more began growing it in a small way. There was not much of a market for the product, and the custom was for the grower to have it made up into cigars for his own use, and the surplus, if any, was sold to the local cigar dealers. Those were halcyon times for smokers and manufacturers. There was no special license required to deal in the article, and no internal revenue tax. The cigars made were principally of two kinds, common and half-Spanish. The former were sold at four for a cent, while the latter and more aristocratic article was smoked by the better-to-do class in the community, and retailed at two for a cent. The wholesale price of the former was from sixteen to twenty cents per hundred; that of the latter about twice as much. The amount of tobacco grown in the State increased slowly but regularly. The first authentic estimate of the crop was made in 1850, when 3500 cases, or 1,400,000 pounds, were produced. The best grade was sold at that time for twelve and fourteen cents, and the inferior ones proportionately lower.

Upon the revival of the industry in 1825, Lancaster County took the lead, a pre-eminence it has maintained to the present hour. The soil seems especially adapted to the growth of this crop. Most of it is limestone, but even whorlslate and sandstone prevail good tobacco crops are grown. It may be as well to remark right here that all the tobacco raised in the Northern States, from Connecticut to Wisconsin, is known in the market as "seed-leaf," and is used almost exclusively in the manufacture of cigars, part for wrappers and the rest for fillers. Tobacco possessing certain indispensable qualities is required for this purpose. The wrapper leaf must be soft, pliant, silky, and elastic, not light nor flimsy, but thin and tough, with veins so small as not to show above the level of the leaf, and only a moderate amount of nicotine, and, above all, it must be handsome in appearance and of pleasant flavor. All these requisites are met in Lancaster County tobacco, to which may be added the rich dark-brown color so much affected by smokers at the present day, and the adhesive white ash which results when the cigar is smoked. These several qualities have made this tobacco a favorite with manufacturers and have stimulated the production to its present extraordinary extent. There is seed-leaf tobacco grown elsewhere in the United States that possesses some or most of the above-mentioned qualities, but none other, perhaps, that possesses them all. Lancaster City is the largest seed-leaf market in the country, except New York.

This is not the place, nor will space allow of any extended remarks on the cultivation of the crop. This portion can be referred to only briefly. As soon as the frost is out of the ground in the spring, the tobacco seed is sown in beds specially prepared for that purpose in favorable localities. Open-air beds are preferred, as the plants are hardier, although canvas-covered ones are meeting with favor because they exclude the minute flea-beetles (Halticidæ) which frequently attack the young plants. When the plants have developed three or four leaves, the largest equal in size to a silver dollar, they are transplanted into the fields prepared to receive them. Here they are set in rows from three and one-half to four feet apart, the plants themselves being placed from twenty to thirty inches from each other in the rows. The richness of the soil and the variety of tobacco govern this matter. No sooner are the plants set out than insect enemies assail them. The cut-worms come first. They cut down the tender plants, and the planter must visit his fields every few days to replace these. In exceptional years the replanting amounts to more than the original labor.

After a few days the cultivation of the crop must be commenced, and this must be continued at intervals of a few days until the plants have attained such a size that the passage of a horse and shovel-plow between the rows is no longer possible without injuring the leaves. Meanwhile another enemy has come along in the shape of the "hawk-moth" (Sphinx quinquemaculatus), a nocturnal enemy that lays its numerous eggs upon the leaves, where they are hatched into the formidable "tobacco worms." These latter, unless at once removed, soon eat large holes in the leaves and render them unfit for cigar wrappers. At a certain stage of its growth the plant must be topped. The upper portion is removed, only as many leaves being left as the plant will be able to mature. When this has been done suckers or shoots are at once thrown out, which must also be broken off, as they draw to themselves the strength and vigor necessary to the full development of the leaf. When the plants are matured they are either cut or sawed off, hung upon temporary scaffolds in the fields to wilt for several days, and then carried on specially constructed tobacco-wagons to the sheds or barns, where they are finally hung up to cure. After being left there for several months the crop is taken down, stripped from the stalks, and prepared for the inspection of buyers.

The art of realizing large profits out of the tobacco crop does not consist alone in the production of large leaves. The after-handling of the crop is a most important feature, and on this its future value will depend. The larger the experience and the sounder the judgment, the better the crop will be. When to top, when to cut, how to hang it in the barns, how to regulate the light and ventilation are all important factors, and in proportion as the grower understands them will be the value of the product he sends to market.

Most of the varieties of tobacco known to the cigar trade have at different times been tried by our farmers. The tropical sorts, Cuban and Orinoco, have from time to time engaged their attention. These have not proved so profitable as what are known as home varieties, although the different kinds are now so mixed and hybridized that it is not easy to determine the origin of any of the sorts now grown. At the present time the principal varieties of tobacco grown in Lancaster County are the "Pennsylvania seed-leaf" and the "Glessner," both attaining a remarkable development of leaf, and producing in favorable seasons very heavy yields to the acre. Leaves from forty-five to fifty inches long, and twenty-two to twenty-eight inches wide, are not unusual in the growing season, and cured ones twenty by forty inches are not uncommon. Not only the size of the crop but its value also is largely dependent on the season. When the latter is favorable from fifteen hundred to two thousand five hundred pounds of tobacco are grown on an acre; two thousand pounds is by no means an unusual crop. The price varies from season to season, as do all other farm products, being governed, however, mainly by the quality.

Tobacco is generally assorted into three grades, known as "wrappers," "seconds," and "fillers;" in average years the first named sells at from fifteen to thirty cents, the seconds at from six to twelve cents, and the fillers at from three to five cents. In 1879 a tobacco-grower set out 15,800 plants on three acres of ground; he got 7681 pounds of cured tobacco, slightly more than half a pound per plant, and at the rate of 2560 pounds to the acre. The crop was sold at twenty-five cents "through," realizing $1920.25, or $640.08 per acre. The same man sold in March, 1881, his crop of the previous year, 8668 pounds, grown from 17,000 plants, which was at the rate of 2800 pounds to the acre, perhaps the largest authenticated yield ever recorded in the United States. Senator Cameron is an extensive tobacco-grower. In 1880 he grew on twenty acres eighty-five cases, or 84,000 pounds, an average of 1700 pounds to the acre, which was sold at fourteen and one-half cents, realizing him about $5000. It was a good average yield for so large an acreage, but the price at which it was sold was only moderately good. A farmer residing two miles beyond the city limits sold to a California cigar manufacturing firm the product of nine acres, at the uniform price of twenty-five cents, receiving therefor the very handsome sum of $5558, or at the rate of $617 per acre. Two years ago a wide-awake tobacco-grower bought seven acres of land lying on a bluff of the Conestoga Creek for $125 per acre. It was steep, stony, and rough, and seemed to defy cultivation, but the plucky purchaser removed the largest stones, cleared off the underbrush, and in some way managed to turn the soil and put in a crop of tobacco. He found a place sufficiently level, on which he built a tobacco-barn. The season was propitious; he raised a heavy crop, sold it at twenty-four cents per pound, realizing enough to pay for the land and tobacco-barn, and had seven hundred dollars in his pocket besides as the reward of his thrift and pluck.

The cost of growing tobacco depends for the most part upon the planter himself. As manure is the costliest item, the liberality with which this fertilizer is applied governs the cost of the crop to a large extent. Some manure much more liberally than others, and for this reason estimates as to the cost per acre run all the way from one hundred to one hundred and eighty dollars. The following may be taken as a fair average:

Rent of land (interest on value).....	$12.00
Making seed-bed.....	5.00
Plowing one acre twice.....	4.00
Manure, and hauling same.....	60.00
Planting.....	5.00
Harrowing and hoeing three times.....	10.00
Topping, worming, and suckering.....	10.00
Harvesting.....	8.00
Use of barn, wagon, lath, etc.....	5.00
Taking down and stripping.....	20.00
Taking to market.....	3.00
Total.....	$142.00

It is not an easy matter to get at the average money value per acre of the Lancaster County tobacco crop. Perhaps two hundred and fifty dollars would be near the mark, although there are hundreds of instances every year where three hundred, four hundred, and five hundred dollars are realized. The net profit per acre seldom falls below one hundred dollars in an average year with a careful planter, while very frequently it is two or three times that sum. True, it is in one sense a very precarious crop, liable to destruction by late frosts in spring and early ones in autumn, and to insect destroyers and hail, rain, and wind storms between, but, on the whole, during the past twenty years the tobacco crop has not been oftener a failure than the usual ones grown on the farm. The labor in season is almost constant, but much of it can be done by the juvenile members of the farmer's family, and therefore inexpensively. There is seldom a money outlay; manure is sometimes purchased, but most of the labor is supplied on the farm, while the returns are generally prompt and large. During the last four years the value of the Lancaster County tobacco crop has run from $1,500,000 to $3,500,000. All this money has come into the county from abroad, and has remained here. Hundreds of laboring men who have farmed tobacco on shares, as is very generally done, have earned comfortable homes as well as a living.

In the early days of tobacco-growing, before the business was understood or the farmers prepared to handle their crops properly, the house-garret, the wagon-shed, and even the hennery were laid under contribution for room in which to hang up and cure the tobacco crop. But experience soon taught the farmers that the handling of the crop was all important, and that this could only be properly done in buildings specially constructed. Then came the era of tobacco-barns. To-day they are found on every farm, large, capacious structures, with cellar underneath and stripping-room, where the work of preparing can be done in all weathers. These structures are of all sizes, from those twenty-five feet square to the more imposing ones forty feet wide and one hundred and fifty feet long, costing from four hundred to four thousand dollars. It is estimated that in a single year the cost of tobacco barns built has been as much as two hundred thousand dollars.

So far as the writer is aware there are no reliable statistics to show the amount of tobacco grown in Lancaster County between 1850 and 1860. From the latter date, however, we find ourselves on firm ground and are enabled to present the following tables :

Year.	Cases.	Pounds.

This seems an almost incredible amount of tobacco to have been grown on so limited an area in so short a time. Estimating the average value of the crop in the growers' hands at only ten and a half cents during the past twenty-two years, they received more than $25,000,000 for this single agricultural product. The crop of 1879 was not only one of the largest, but also one of the best ever grown. The average per acre was about fifteen hundred pounds. Lancaster County grew more than one-half the entire product of the State. If the entire county was planted in tobacco, the product in an average year would be double that now grown in the whole United States. The 18,000,000 pounds yield of 1879 has never been equaled by any county in the Union. Christian County, Ky., approaches most nearly: with 12,577,574 pounds, grown on 18,475 acres, while our 18,000,000 pounds were grown on 18,500 acres.

Mr. John S. Gable, of Lancaster City, was the first regular tobacco-packer in the county. He began operations as early as 1830, and remained in the business until the time of his death in 1881. The first regular tobacco warehouse in the county was built by Mr. I. H. Kauffman in 1867, in the village of Mountville. Prior to that time he had used an old distillery for the purposes of a tobacco warehouse. To-day there must be more than a hundred specially-built tobacco warehouses throughout the county.

More than one hundred firms are engaged in buying and packing tobacco in this county. Not only do they buy and pack the crop of Lancaster County, but three-fourths of all grown in the State is brought here, as well as some from Connecticut, New York, and Wisconsin. To handle such an amount of goods requires great facilities, and these are found here. There are in Lancaster City alone about seventy-five packing warehouses, some of them immense structures, from two to four stories high, and from fifty to two hundred feet long, with a capacity of storing from two hundred to five thousand cases of tobacco each. There must be more than one hundred packing warehouses throughout the county.

Most packers have certain days of the week for receiving tobacco, known as "receiving days." On such days Lancaster presents a sight to be seen nowhere else in the world. Wagons of every kind, from the slight one-horse affair to the ponderous Conestoga wagon with its six heavy draught horses, begin to come into town as early as ten o'clock on the previous evening, all anxious to get favorable places, that they may unload early on the following day. The streets in the neighborhood of the warehouses, especially where three or four of the latter are near together, as they are on "Tobacco Avenue," are completely blockaded; as many as eighty-nine teams of every size have been counted in a single block. Six hundred wagon-loads were delivered on Jan. 10, 1880, and as many more on the 17th of the same month. These delivered 1,500,000 pounds. Some were compelled to remain until the following day before they could discharge their cargo. A single firm has received as many as 148,000 pounds in one day, a number of others 100,000 pounds. Tobacco is paid for on delivery. Frequent investigations show that the banks pay out on large receiving days from one hundred and fifty thousand to two hundred thousand dollars to farmers on the checks of the tobacco-buyers. On one of the dates given above the amount reached two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

The foregoing sketches the tobacco industry of the county only in outline; much more might be added. Whatever may be its future, the past is at least secure. It has been a veritable mine of wealth to the county. No other single agricultural product has brought so much wealth to the people in the same period of time. This has all been realized on a very limited area of territory, say from ten to thirteen thousand acres,—hardly more than two per cent. of the superficial area of the county. In addition to the great source of revenue to the growers, it must not be forgotten that the tobacco crop has been an invaluable boon to thousands of others. Not only does it afford employment to persons of every age while standing in the field, but even after it has been harvested. During the winter and spring, when other kinds of labor are scarce, work on the tobacco crop is in constant progress. The stripping in the country continues during the fall and winter, and no sooner is it delivered at the packing-houses than these become veritable hives of industry. Gangs of assorters and packers are required numbering from ten to seventy-five to each warehouse, and during the winter and spring these find remunerative employment, this, too, at a season when other work is not to be had. It has also stimulated a kindred industry to unusual proportions. Throughout the county hundreds of cigar factories are established, whose product runs into many millions of cigars, principally of the cheaper grades. These manufactories in turn give steady employment to thousands of persons of both sexes through the entire year. It is safe to say that but for the unusual development of tobacco-growing in the county this allied industry would never have attained its present proportions among us. In one form or another the tobacco industry employs more persons than any other of the numerous agricultural interests of the county, and must therefore to that extent and in that way be regarded as the most generally beneficial.

JACOB L. FREY. manufacturer of and dealer in tobacco, was born where he now resides in Lancaster City, July 29, 1825. He had no assistance financially in starting out in life, but enjoyed the advantages of the public schools of the city during his boyhood. He is said to be the first man who exposed for sale Lancaster grown tobacco in another market, and in 1846 he went to New York, taking with him four cases for sale. After six months he returned and assisted his father in the office of the State Railroad. In 1848 he again went to New York, and for seven years was connected with his brother in importing toys, etc., from France and Germany, giving his own time largely to the tobacco trade, making sales of Lancaster grown tobacco in that city. This interest in the county gradually developed, and Mr. Frey recollects when it was grown only in small quantities in the county, and its cultivation confined to a few farmers. Year by year its cultivation has steadily increased until it has assumed vast proportions, and in 1882 from three to four million dollars' worth of tobacco is grown annually, and of a quality equal to any produced in this country. Returning to Lancaster in 1855, he began the manufacture of cigars and to deal largely in leaf tobacco, and was the first man in this district to take out a license for the manufacture of cigars. His place of business has been upon the same site on West King Street where his father and grandfather carried on mercantile operations, and his business increased gradually until it amounted annually to one hundred thousand dollars. In 1874 his son-in-law, John L. Weidner, became his partner,—Frey & Weidner,—as dealers in leaf tobacco, but he continued the manufacture of tobacco into cigars alone until 1878.

Mr. Frey is the oldest dealer in tobacco in Lancaster County, and has given his active business life to the interest. He has been twice elected to the Common Council of the city. He married, in 1851, Caroline, daughter of Joseph Hanum, of Lancaster. Their children are Cecelia, wife of John L. Weidner; Mary, wife of George F. Rathvon, a merchant of Lancaster; Anna M., wife of William H. Voorhees, of Milltown, N. J.; Emma C., wife of John Schaefer, of Lancaster; Charles H., William D., Ellen May, James Frederick, and Lillie Skiles Frey.

His paternal grandfather, Jacob, a native of Lancaster, was one of its early merchants, and an elder in the German Reformed Church, whose father, with a brother, came from Germany, both settling here. His father, Jacob, a merchant in Lancaster, died in his seventy-seventh year. Jacob Frey's wife, Maria Haverstick, a daughter of William Haverstick, a merchant of Philadelphia, who died in her eighty-third year, bore him the following children: Catharine, wife of Jacob King, of Lancaster; William H., a merchant and an importer of New York; Anna, wife of Isaac Diller, a merchant in Lancaster; Jacob L., subject of this sketch; Maria, wife of John B. Markley, of Lancaster; Amanda, widow of the late Henry Zink, of Lancaster; Emma, wife of John D. Skiles, a dealer in tobacco in Lancaster; James B., of the firm of Skiles & Frey, dealers in tobacco in Lancaster; and Adaline, wife of Rev. Frederick E. Gast, Professor of Theology in Franklin and Marshall College.

Population of the County.—In the year 1790 Lancaster County contained 86,147 inhabitants, and in 1800, 49,403. The population of the county at the end of each decade, from 1810 to 1880, inclusive, is given below by townships and boroughs, as shown by the reports of the several United States censuses taken within the period indicated:

CHAPTER XXIX.

CITY OF LANCASTER.

Location of the County-Seat.—The shire town has always been an object of interest, and the citizens of a county take an honest pride in its prosperity. Before the seat of justice of the county was located at Lancaster, its geographical position, through which the roads from Harris' and Wright's Ferries, upon the Susquehanna River, ran to the Conestoga and met within the limits of the place, attracted the attention of emigrants. There was an abundance of running water, and the gentle undulation of the land, together with its apparent richness, made it a desirable locality in which to live.

The following letter, written by James Steel, the surveyor-general, indicates when and by whom the land was taken up. The plan of the town as it appeared upon a draft drawn from a preliminary survey, and hereto annexed, shows the different locations of the settlers:

"PHILAD. 27th 7 mo. 1717.

"To frd Is Taylor.

"John Funk and Christian Heer applied yesterday, on behalf of their Countrymen that are lately arrived for several parcels of land near their settlements, but before I could have the consent of the Commissioners the time is so far spent that I cannot get the Warrants ready, being just taking horse for Duck Creek, however thy design of being upon surveying thereabout in so little time as thou mentioned when here. Thou may lay out for the following persons the several tracts of land under-mentioned (viz.):

"for Peter Leman & Henry Funk.....	5 or 600 acres.
Abraham Heer.....	3 or 400 "
Hans Pupather.....	4 or 500 "
Hans Pupather, Jacob Pupather, & Peter Suear.....	1000 "
Christian Hearsey.....	400 "
Hans Tuber.....	300 "
Woolrich Houser.....	200 "
Hans Burkholder.....	700 "
Michael Shank.....	700 "
Henry Pare.....	500 "

"The Warrants for ye above lands will be ready in the office, and it is again ordered by the Commissioners that no Return or Surrej be made to any body without their Bonds taken at the same time.

"J. Logan says his coming up will be very uncertain, so wishing thee health and success in the woods when there.

"I remain thy Loving friend,

"JAMES STEEL.

"Thou need not insist on those mens bonds, because they are to pay down their money without delay."

This postscript shows that the persons named were men of substance, and came to stay.

The Brubakers, Swarr, Hershoy, Tuber, Houser, and Burkholder settled along the Little Conestoga, and some of their land ran to the town. Peter Leman settled near what was afterwards the eastern boundary of the town. Shank and Bare in the southern part. In the same year Hostetter and Greider took up several hundred acres adjoining Shank's and Bare's land. In the same year Theodorus Eby took up three hundred acres, which his heirs, in 1730, sold to Hans Musser.

Many of these parties neglected to take out patents for their land, a fact discovered by James Hamilton, who afterwards took advantage of the circumstance, to his own profit.

On Feb. 6, 1729, the back settlers presented a petition to the Council, asking for a division of Chester County.

On February 7th the Council approved of the prayer of the petitioners, and they asked the Governor to acquaint the Assembly, then in session, of the matter. Action was promptly taken, and after passing through various stages, the act for the erection of the county was approved by the Governor on May 10, 1729.

The place for a permanent county-seat was not named in the act of Assembly creating the new county, and the matter was left open, subject to the convenience of the inhabitants, and to be determined by those persons living in the new county.

John Postlethwait, an Indian trader, who also kept an "ordinary" near the Conestoga, and on the great road which led from the Gap to the Indian town in the manor, who was a very intelligent and influential settler, at once saw the importance of securing the county-seat. He invited the magistrates and some of the prominent settlers to meet at his "ordinary," and provided temporary quarters in which to hold court. Robert Barber, who lived at Wright's Ferry, and was the first sheriff, hoped also to secure the county-seat. The matter was discussed between the magistrates, jurors, and others, but the former moved cautiously, and they appear to have been governed entirely by what seemed to them the best interests of the inhabitants. Taking into consideration the character of those who owned the land, and looking at the matter in the light of subsequent events, it does not seem probable that they personally desired or sought to influence the commissioners in any way. The action of Mr. Hamilton was taken subsequently to the report of the commissioners. And he did not take measures to secure the land, until he discovered that much of it was not patented.

John Wright, Caleb Pearce, Thomas Edwards, and James Mitchell had been named in the act for the erection of the new county, as commissioners to purchase for the use of said county a convenient piece of land, to be approved by the Governor, and thereon to build a court-house and prison. Any three of them were empowered to effect the purchase.

On Feb. 19, 1730, they (Edwards excepted) reported that they had agreed upon a lot of land for the use aforesaid, lying on or near a small run of water, between the plantations of Rudy Moyer, Michael Shank, and Jacob Imble. In the square on the southeastern section of Hamilton's land, as shown upon the plan, is the place then selected for the court-house and jail. For some reason not known Thomas Edwards, one of the commissioners, did not sign the certificate.

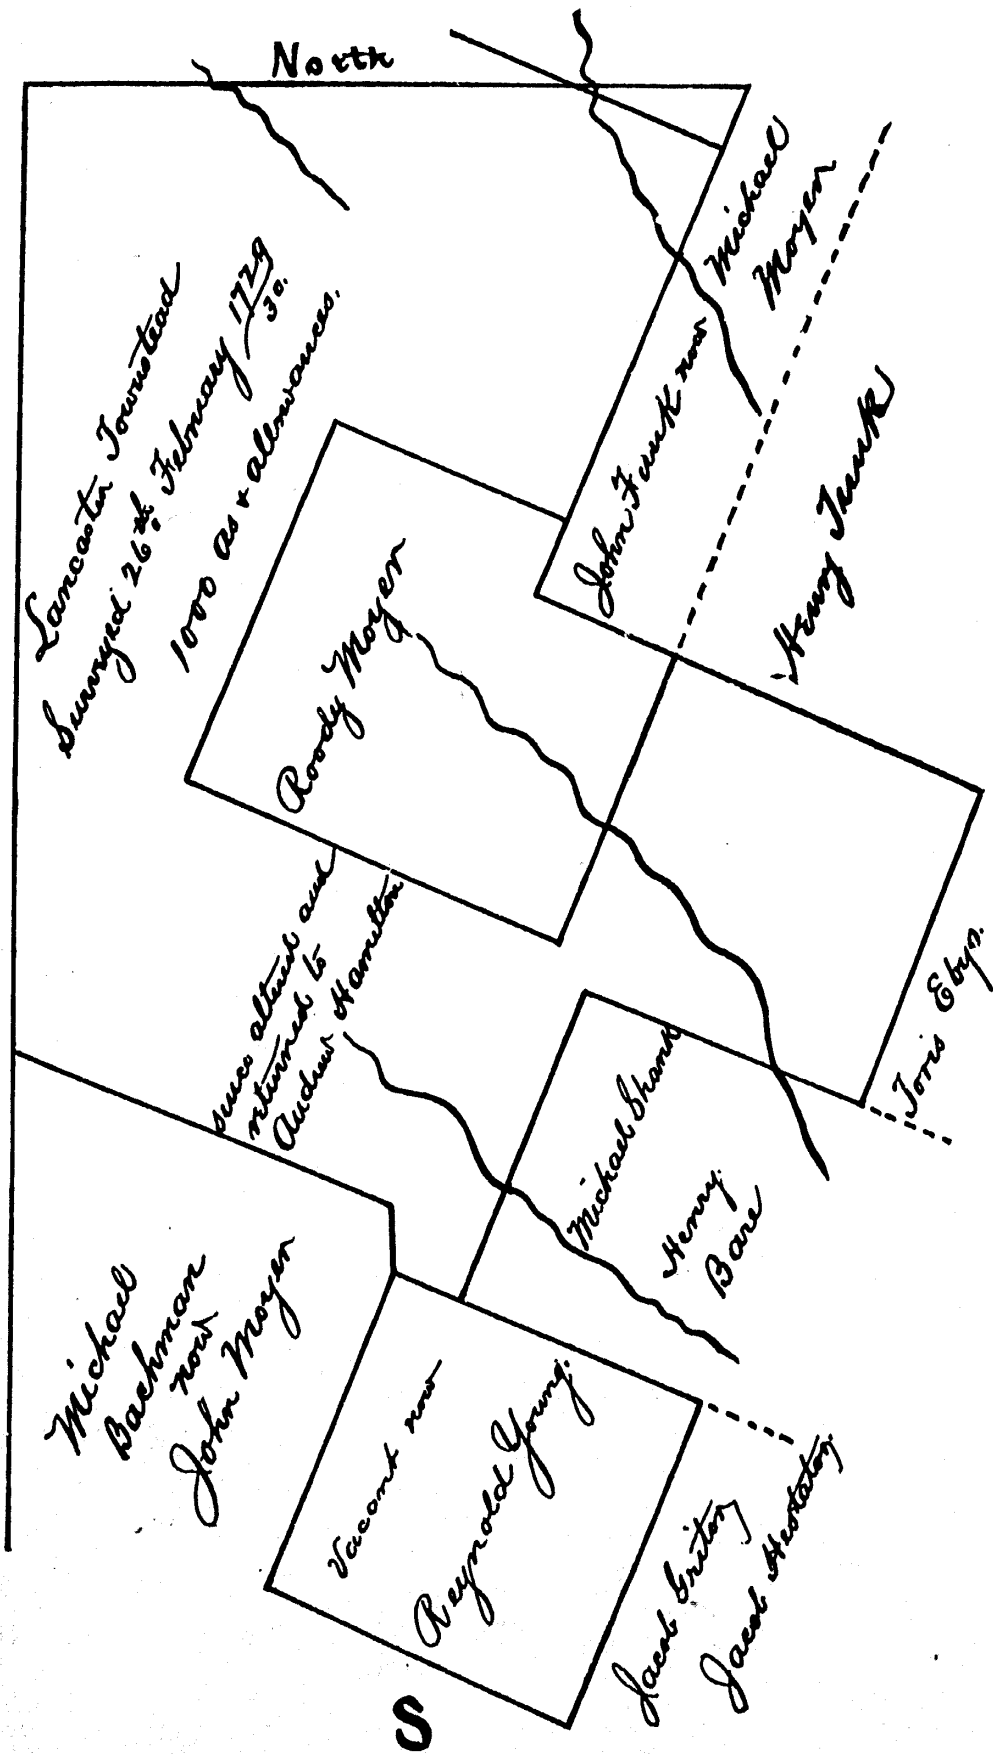

When the commissioners made their report the Governor and Council questioned them, and wanted to know in whom the title to the land rested, and they replied that they had not investigated the matter, and did not know. The report was not then approved, and the Governor sent for Mr. Hamilton, the attorney-general, to make a thorough investigation of the titles to the land in question. The confirmation of the report was postponed, and was not confirmed until May 1, 1730. In a week after they filed their report, John Jones surveyed the land, and laid out "Lancaster Townstead." In March, 1730, from this draft a town plot was laid out by James Hamilton, and this composed the central portion of the present city of Lancaster. It was laid out two miles square, and the main streets ran north and south, and east and west.

Titles to the Town Site.—On the 12th or 13th day of April, 1682, William Penn granted to Richard Wooler, then of Goldinghane, London, five hundred acres of land within the province of Pennsylvania. There was one shilling quit-rent on every hundred acres. Dawson Wooler, son and heir of Thomas Wooler, who was the only child of Richard Wooler, conveyed the land to Samuel Arnold, of London, on May 27 and 28, 1714. This land had never been located.

On the 7th day of February, 1732, James Steel, then surveyor-general of the province of Pennsylvania, for £31 10s. purchased from Samuel Arnold the patent for this land. The money was paid by David Barkley. On the 7th of February, 1732, the date of the above conveyance, Mr. Steel declared that the money paid belonged to Andrew Hamilton, and that the name James Steel was inserted in the patent at the request of Mr. Hamilton. On May 3, 1733, a warrant was granted to resurvey in right of said purchase this together with other lands adjoining, and the lands were resurveyed on the 10th day of August, 1733. The land was described as "Beginning at a marked black oak at corner of Roddy Moyer's land; thence by John Moyer, John Shank, Jacob Hostetter, Jacob Greiter, John Lane, and the lands of Samuel Bethel; thence by the lands of Theodorus Eby (dead) and Michael Moyer, containing five hundred acres." On the first day of May, 1734, Andrew Hamilton and James Steel conveyed the land to James Hamilton for the nominal sum of five shillings. When this land was conveyed to Hamilton the courthouse, jail, and several other buildings had already been built upon it. The plan shows that the land had been occupied previous to the location of the county-seat by some persons not named, who transferred or sold their interest to Andrew Hamilton, whose name appears upon the draft dated 26th of February, 1730. This tract embraced the heart of the city, and the northwestern section. The former part was divided into lots, which were subject to ground-rent. The fee in the land remained in the Hamiltons. The ground-rents were trifling. Mechanics of every kind flocked to the place, and built small but comfortable homes, some of which are at this day to be seen on West King Street, serving to remind one of the time these unpretentious pioneers located in the place.

The northwestern section of the town was not divided into building-lots until a period of nearly one hundred and forty years had elapsed. It would probably have remained in the same condition until the present time, but for the progressive spirit which impelled some of the younger members of the City Council, ten or more years ago, to assess a tax upon the vacant land equal to other sections of the city. Finding it unprofitable to hold the unimproved land subject to high taxes, the heirs of the Hamilton estate sold it. It is now being built up with great rapidity with fine residences, and is as beautiful as any portion of the city.

On Nov. 13, 1717, Thomas and Richard Penn issued to Henry Funk, a Swiss Mennonite, a patent for three hundred and fifty acres of land, in what was then called "New Strasburge." Two hundred acres of this land Funk gave to his son, Henry, who died and left seven children, of whom one daughter, Barbara, married Michael Moyer, and another, Frena, married Joseph Musser.

On the 8th day of October, 1735, they released their interest to their oldest brother, Henry, who made his will Oct. 7, 1736, and gave one hundred and twenty acres to his oldest son, John. In the year 1747 it was discovered that Henry Funk was an "allan" at the time the patent was granted to him, and could not, according to the laws of Great Britain and this province, take and have a legal title to the land; hence John Funk got a confirmation deed for his land in 1747 from the Penns. This tract embraced the southeastern section of the city.

A portion of the three-hundred-acre tract, patented in 1717 by Theodorus Eby, is also in the city, and forms the parts quite commonly called Musserstown and Adamstown. Eby's heirs sold the land to Hans Musser in 1739, and Dr. Adam Simon Kuhn<sup>1</sup> purchased fifteen acres from Musser's heirs, Hans and Frena Musser, Sept. 17, 1744. This piece of land which extended up to East King Street, then called the Provincial road, and along Middle Street, was laid out by Kuhn into forty-six lots. These lots, with the exception of three reserved by the owner, were put up at lottery and about three-fourths of them disposed of in November, 1744, each subject to an annual quit-rent of either seven shillings or fifteen shillings. James Hamilton, who owned the central and northwestern parts of the town, purchased of Dr. Kuhn, March 7, 1749, the ground-rents of that part of the plat laid out by him in 1744, paying therefor the sum of four hundred pounds. The yearly rents which were still retained by Kuhn amounted to eighty-five pounds.

Hans Musser laid out a portion of his land adjoining Adamstown in lots, and it was called Musserstown.

Samuel Bethel bought of Michael Shank, Dec. 13, 1717, the same day that the latter had it patented, a tract of land on which that part of the town known as Bethelstown was laid out and built.

Beginnings of Settlement, Prominent Early Residents of the Town, and Notable Events.—As has been shown, Hamilton laid out the first and central portion of the town in 1730. Settlements had been made here in 1721 or 1722, and by 1730 the little cluster of houses is said to have attained a population of two hundred souls. The locality was known as the Indian Field and Gibson's Pasture. George Gibson kept a tavern here when Hamilton platted the town, and had probably been located for several years. His tavern was called "the Hickory Tree," probably from a tall hickory which stood near the public road, and which was said to have been a favorite one with the Indians, the place of their rendezvous for many years, and the centre of one of their small villages. "A swamp lay in front of Gibson's," we are told, "and another to the north." The one in front of Gibson's, nearly in the centre of the site of the present city, was the Dark Hazel Swamp, which was drained and cleared of wood in 1745. The other was the Long Swamp, extending beyond the limits of the town-plat toward the northeast. Gibson's tavern is supposed to have stood about where the Slaymaker Hotel now does. His pasture, afterwards Sanderson's pasture, was rented by Mr. Hamilton about 1748, to Adam Reigart. The same year that the town was laid out, Stephen Atkinson, says Rupp, built a fulling-mill at great expense, but the inhabitants of the upper part of the creek assembled and pulled down the dam on the Conestoga, as it prevented them from rafting and getting their usual supply of fish.

Although Mr. Hamilton laid out the town of Lancaster in 1730, he did not obtain the ownership of all the lands included in the plat until 1734, and consequently it was not until after that time that lots were sold and ground-rents laid. The first purchasers of lots were Nicholas Bierly, Richard Marsden, Henry Hunt, and Samuel Bethel, the first three named becoming owners of property on King Street near the Centre Square, and Bethel of a lot on Queen Street. This was on May 20, 1735. For some reason unknown, but few lots were sold during the next five years, but in 1740 they began to go off more rapidly, and in 1742 the town had increased to such an extent that petition was made for a charter, which was granted.

The leading men of the town at that time were Thomas Cookson, George Gibson, Sebastian Graff, Michael Bierly, Edward Shippen, Matthias Young, John Fouke, Peter Worrall, John Dehuff, Abraham Johnston, Samuel Bethel, George Sanderson, Michael Hubley, Jacob Loughman, George Hoffman, Joseph Pugh, Robert Thompson, James Webb, Caspar Shaffner, and a few others.

Of these men, Thomas Cookson came from Sunderland, in the county of Durham, England, to Lancaster County in 1740. He was appointed justice of the peace and register of the county in 1745, and he was also a surveyor for the Proprietaries. He was one of the constituent members of St. James Episcopal Church, and was an active man in the settlement in nearly all the phases of its life. He resided on Orange Street, and died in 1753, leaving a wife and two children. The widow married George Stevenson, the surveyor, who laid out York and Carlisle. Hannah, one of the daughters, married Joseph Galloway, of Maryland, who removed to Philadelphia. He was for many years Speaker of the Assembly, and later became a noted Tory. Margaret, the other daughter, died in her minority. Thomas Cookson became a large landholder in Lancaster, York, and Cumberland Counties. Most of this vast property went to a daughter of Mary Lindsey, the only sister of Thomas Cookson.

Edward Shippen was a grandson of the Edward Shippen who came to Boston from Yorkshire, England, in 1668; was persecuted there, and removed to Philadelphia in 1693. His son, Joseph, was born at Boston in 1678. He married in that city in 1702, and two years later moved to Philadelphia. Edward, the eldest son of Joseph Shippen, was born at Boston, July 9, 1703, and was married to Sarah Plumley, at Philadelphia, Sept. 20, 1725. He was brought up as a merchant by James Logan, of Philadelphia, and in 1732 became a partner, and in 1749 was in the fur trade with Thomas Lawrence. He was elected councilman of the city Oct. 3, 1732, and served many years, and in 1744 was elected mayor. In May, 1752, he removed to Lancaster, where he was appointed prothonotary, and continued as such till 1778. He was chosen paymaster for supplies for the British and Provincial forces, and managed his business very successfully. He was made a county judge under the Provincial and State governments. In 1746 and 1748 he was one of the founders of the College of New Jersey, located at Princeton, and was one of its trustees, a position which he resigned, after twenty years' service, in 1767. His life was thoroughly in-wrought with the history of the time in which he moved, and as an account of it is given elsewhere, it is not necessary to make further notice of it in this connection. He lived to an advanced age, died at Lancaster, and lies in the churchyard of the St. James Episcopal Church. His son, Edward Shippen, studied law under Tench Francis, Esq., and in 1791 was appointed one of the judges of the Supreme Court, and in 1799 was appointed chief justice of the Supreme Court of the State. One of his daughters became the wife of Benedict Arnold.

Joseph Shippen, the second son of Edward Shippen, of Lancaster, entered the Provincial army in 1753, rose to the rank of colonel, and served in Gen. Forbes' expedition, which resulted in the capture of Fort Duquesne. He returned to Philadelphia in 1761, and in 1762 was appointed secretary of the province. He was appointed judge of Lancaster Court in 1789, and died in 1810.

Sarah, a daughter of Edward Shippen, became the wife of Col. James Burd. =

Sebastian Graff moved into Lancaster several years prior to the incorporation of the borough, and was one of the first assistant burgesses, and for many years was prominent in the management of borough affairs. He owned and lived on land where now is the Lancaster Cemetery. He died in 1791, and left provision in his will that a part of the land should be laid out into fourteen lots by his executors, Paul Zantzinger and Adam Reigart. The house, still standing on the corner of North Queen and Orange Streets (now Shober's Hotel), was built by the Graffs in 1757, as a stone in the front of the building testifies.

Michael Bierly, one of the purchasers in 1735, was one of the assistant burgesses in 1742. He was regulator of the streets for several years, and his name appears in the records many times.

Roger Hunt, also one who bought in 1735, was elected treasurer of the county in 1738-89.

Peter Worrall, a Quaker, was a resident of Lancaster soon after 1735, and owned a house and lot on Centre Square, which he sold to Edward Smout, one of the justices of the peace about 1741. After the death of Samuel Bethel, in 1740, he married his widow and moved to the Bethel tavern (on the site of the Cross-Keys Hotel), where he lived till his removal to another part of the country. He was commissioned justice of the peace in 1746, and served for three years, and elected to the Legislature in 1747, where he served till 1754, when he resigned because he was conscientiously opposed to levying a tax to support military operations.

The first that is known of Samuel Bethel is that in the year 1717 he met Michael Shank in the office of the register-general and purchased of him a tract of land, for which Shank took out a patent, upon the Conestoga Creek, consisting of about one hundred acres. The land lay between the Millersville pike and Hoffman's Run, adjoining Lancaster City. Michael Shank had the land surveyed, and his patent and transfer to Bethel are both dated Dec. 13, 1717, and recorded in the register's office for Philadelphia, in patent-book "A," vol. v. page 275. Shank bought land and was in the county in 1710. He kept tavern in 1729 and 1730. Samuel Bethel was a single man, and may have traded with the Indians until the county was laid out. He built and lived in a log house upon the King's Highway, which afterwards adjoined the property of Adam Simon Kuhn, on West King Street, when Hamilton laid out the town of Lancaster. In 1730 he was licensed to keep a public-house (where the Cross-Keys now stands), and kept a public inn until he died, in the spring of 1740. It was at his house the Blunstons, Wrights, and other Quakers and settlers upon the western borders of the county stopped when passing that way or attending court. Thus he became acquainted with Sarah Blunston, a niece of Samuel Blunston, who resided with him, and was one of his legatees, to whom he was married in 1729 or 1730. His tavern must have been especially favored by the court and county officers, as frequent mention is made in the minutes of the county commissioners of adjournments to Samuel Bethel's tavern, to meet the constables from the various townships, who furnished a list of the taxable inhabitants in their respective districts, from which the rate of taxation was levied. He was elected county treasurer for the years 1737 and 1738. He had a brick-yard upon his land, adjoining the borough of Lancaster, for the commissioners' minutes mention that he furnished brick to pave the new court-house, as well as other material. He left a wife and two children,—Samuel and Mary.

The property in Lancaster came to Samuel. He died in Lancaster June 30, 1775, leaving a widow, one son, Samuel, and six daughters. Samuel married Sarah, the daughter of Gen. Edward Hand. He was in the Legislature in 1808-9, lived in Columbia, and died in 1819.

Mary, the daughter of Samuel Bethel, first married Samuel Boude, a physician and apothecary. She received from her father's estate forty-four acres of land along Conestoga Creek. Mr. Boude had an office in the borough, and was chief burgess in 1757-58 and 1761.

Caspar Shaffner, whose name is mentioned in the records first in 1744, was a "blue dyer," and carried on business in the borough. He was prominent many years as assistant burgess, and filled other important offices. His son, Caspar Shaffner, was clerk of the Council from 1761 to 1775, and from 1788 to 1796. He was also clerk of the board of auditors many years, and was noted for fine penmanship.

Michael and Bernard Hubley were natives of Germany, and emigrated to this country with their father in 1782. About 1740 they came to Lancaster, where they passed the remainder of their lives. Bernard was the elder. He learned the trade of a tanner with Valentine King, who kept a tannery on Water Street, where now the Stevens House stands. He was an assistant burgess in 1750, and chief burgess in 1759 and 1760. He was appointed barracks-master in 1778. He died Jan. 29, 1803.

Michael Hubley, the brother of Bernard, was active in affairs of the borough, and was burgess in 1764 and 1765. He was appointed justice of the peace and of the Court of Common Pleas in 1777. He was also barrack-master during the Revolution for several years. He had two sons who were active in civil and military matters. He was a member of the Trinity Lutheran Church, and died on the 17th of May, 1804. His wife, Rosina, died the year previous.

Adam Hubley, a son, entered the Revolutionary army Oct. 27, 1775, as first lieutenant in the First Pennsylvania Battalion, Col. Phillip De Haas. In 1776 he was promoted to the rank of major of another regiment, and on the 5th of June, 1779, he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the "New Eleventh" Pennsylvania Line, to rank from Feb. 3, 1779. He retired from the army Jan. 1, 1781. He served in the Pennsylvania Legislature from 1783 to 1787, and was chosen a member of the Senate in 1790. In 1793 he was appointed auctioneer at Philadelphia, and died of yellow fever the same year.

John Hubley, another son, was born at Lancaster on the 25th of December, 1747. He read law with Edward Shippen, and was admitted to the bar in 1769. He was a member of the convention of July 15, 1776, which framed the first Constitution of the State, and served during the same year upon the General Committee of Safety; was appointed commissary of Continental stores Jan. 11, 1777; and on the 5th of April following, prothonotary of the Court of Common Pleas, clerk of Orphans' Court, clerk of Quarter Sessions, and also recorder of deeds, part of which offices he held for upwards of twenty years. In 1787 he was a member of the State convention that ratified the Federal Constitution. He died at Lancaster, Jan. 21, 1821. The descendants of the family were prominent in later years, and are still residents of Lancaster.

Ulrich Reigart, a native of Germany, came to this country and settled in Lancaster in 1742. In that year he purchased two lots on South Queen Street, and in 1747 others adjoining. He had two sons,—Adam and Christopher. A house was built on these lots, and a few years later the Fountain Inn was built and opened as a tavern by Christopher (often written Stophel). In 1758 Adam and Stophel both had stalls in the market which were kept up for many years. About the same time Christopher opened the Fountain Inn, Adam Reigart purchased the tavern stand for many years known as the Grape Hotel. The accounts of these old taverns will be found in another place. He was active in the Revolutionary war and was lieutenant-colonel of a regiment under command of Col. George Ross, and went with his regiment to Amboy, N. J. He was a member of the Assembly in 1780. In 1785 he established the wine store on East King Street, which is still well known. His later life was comparatively quiet. He died in 1818. His son Emanuel Reigart was a tanner, and carried on an extensive business on South Queen Street on part of the original property. He was in the Legislature from 1818 to 1817, and in 1821 was sheriff of the county. Emanuel C. Reigart, son of Emanuel, was born in 1797, read law with Amos Ellmaker, and became prominent in all general movements. The descendants of these families are numerous in Lancaster. Adam Reigart, Jr., was a son of Adam Reigart, Sr., and brother of Emanuel Reigart. He succeeded to his father's business, and was prominent in all social and political affairs.

Christopher Reigart, the brother of Adam, died in 1788, leaving a widow and a son, Henry. He was a coppersmith, and carried on business for many years. A daughter of Ulrich Reigart married Peter Gonter, who for several years kept tavern in the borough.

In 1744, Adam Simon Kuhn, a physician, lived on West King Street, and practiced medicine. He laid out "Adams town" in that year. He was chief burgoess from 1750 to 1756.

George Gibson was a resident of the settlement before the town was laid out, and owned property on Prince Street. His son, Gen. John Gibson, was born here May 23, 1740. His career in connection with the French and Revolutionary wars is well known, and to him, it is said, the celebrated speech of Logan was delivered.

Michael Hook settled in Lancaster soon after the town was laid out. He was a wheelwright, and had a shop on East King Street. He was succeeded by his son Anthony. A son of Anthony had a shop at the corner of Duke and Orange Streets, where the St. Paul's Reformed Church now stands. D. A. Altick, a grandson, started business on the same site in 1848, and so the three generations followed the same occupation. The descendants are quite numerous in this region. Michael Hook was a Catholic, and was prominent in the organization of the Catholic Church here in 1741-42.

There were many others here at this date of whom but little is known. As time went on and the people felt the necessity of erecting churches, James Hamilton granted certain lots for church purposes, and also for other uses. A list is given below. To the German Reformed Church, Lot 76 on Orange Street, Oct. 6, 1741; Lot 75 on Orange Street, Nov. 10, 1746.

To the Moravian Society, Lots 212, 213, and part of 218, in 1746. The first two lots are in use as the cemetery, and are situated on Prince Street. The part of Lot 218 became a part of the present church property.

To the St. James Episcopal Society, Lots 84, 85, 86, on Duke Street, corner of Orange Street, the present property.

To the Lutheran congregation, 1742, Lots 49, 50, 51, and part of Lot 48, on Duke Street, the present lots.

To the Roman Catholic congregation, Lots 235, 236, and 237, present property, on the corner of Duke and Vine Streets.

To the Quakers, Lots 138 and 139, on Queen Street, now the Odd-Fellows' Hall.

To the Presbyterian congregation, Lots 19 and 491. The former is the present property, the latter was on Lime Street, and was sold in 1810.

To the Methodist Society, Lots 97, 98, the present property of the Duke Street Methodist Episcopal Church.

Lots 654, 655 were set aside for magazine lots.

Nos. 669 and 670, in 1799, were granted to the trustees of Franklin College as academy lots.

Lots 273, 274, on the corner of King and Water, were prison lots, and where the jail stood for many years. This property, however, was deeded to the county in 1730 by Andrew Hamilton. The deeds to some of these church properties were not made out till several years after the grant was made.

In the month of June, 1744, an event occurred in the borough of Lancaster that was of much moment to the States of Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia. A treaty was held by the honorable the Lieutenant-Governor of the province, and the honorable the commissioners for the provinces of Virginia and Maryland, with the Indians of the Six Nations. There were present the Hon. George Thomas, Lieutenant-Governor of the province, the Hon. Thomas Lee, Esq., and Col. William Beverly, commissioners of Virginia, the Hon. Edmund Jennings and Philip Thomas, Esqs., commissioners of Maryland, Col. Robert King and Col. Thomas Calvil, the deputies of the Onondagoes, Senecas, Cayugas, Oneidas, and Tuscaroras, and Conrad Weiser as interpreter. The treaty was held at the court-house. The chiefs were welcomed by the Governor, wine and punch were prepared, and healths were drunk. The council or treaty lasted two weeks, and resulted in important adjustments of claims and the making of various peace provisions.

Isaac Whitelock, a Quaker, was a resident here before 1745, and built a brewery on Prince Street. On the 15th of February, 1769, he advertised in the Pennsylvania Chronicle, published in Philadelphia, that he had for sale "a lot of ground in the borough of Lancaster, whereon is erected a large house convenient for manufacturing pot ashes." The brewery lot contained a spring, the water of which, in about 1768, was conducted in pipes to the tan-yard of Caspar Singer, which was afterwards owned by Valentine King, and later by George Krug. When the Stevens House was built these old pipes were found still there. In 1752, Isaac Whitelock was burgoess, and later was treasurer of the city.

Jacob Eichholtz became a resident of Lancaster a few years after its organization as a borough, and purchased a lot where the Exchange Hotel now stands. In 1750-52 he was assistant burgess. He died before 1765, and in that year his widow, Catharine Eichholtz, took out a license to keep tavern, which was kept by the family for nearly a century at the sign of the Bull's Head. They had two sons, Jacob and Leonard. The latter succeeded to the tavern. Jacob was born in 1776, and learned the tin and coppersmith business, and opened a shop which he continued many years. His early tendencies were towards art, and much of his spare time was devoted to drawing. An account of his meeting with Sully is given in Dunlap's "History of the Arts of Design." Sully was called upon to paint the portrait of Governor Snyder. Eichholtz, hearing of it, invited the Governor to allow the sittings to be made in his parlor, which was granted, and when Mr. Sully came he was invited there. It is also stated that Sully, seeing the interest of his host in art, kindly gave him some instructions and left him a few colors and brushes. His efforts to this time were not very successful. Later in life, as he improved by study and practice, his portraits gave more satisfaction. A visit to Gilbert Stuart was of use to him, and he copied pictures by Stuart and followed him as a master. His career as a coppersmith was closed, and he followed the profession of an artist till his death, in 1842. Late in life he opened a studio in Philadelphia and met with good success. The many portraits of the citizens of Lancaster that were painted by him bear witness to his success, and also to his close study of the works of Stuart. His sons are residents of Lancaster. Leonard, his brother, kept the tavern many years, and was succeeded by his widow and son.

Jacob Slough came to this county in 1747, and on the 6th of March, in that year, purchased the lots on Centre Square where for so many years the old Swan tavern stood. He built this old tavern stand and opened it about 1754. His son, Matthias, soon after succeeded to the tavern, and in 1756 was an assistant burgess. He kept the tavern many years, and until about 1804, with the exception of a few years, when he was a merchant in the borough. He was coroner of the county from 1755 to 1768, and held the inquest on the bodies of the Conestoga Indians who were killed in the old jail on the corner of Prince and King Streets by the Paxton boys in 1768. He was active in the Revolution, serving as general agent for supplies, and also in the army, having command of a battalion. He was in the Legislature in 1774-83. He died at Harrisburg in 1812.

William Henry became a resident of the borough of Lancaster about the year 1750, but his name first appears in an assessment-roll of the borough in 1754, where he is mentioned as being a tenant of Leonard Bender. Four years later, in 1758, his son, John Joseph, was born here. He was a mechanic of great skill, and was chief armorer with Braddock in 1755, and with Forbes' campaign in 1758. In 1765 he was assistant burgess, and in 1766 burgess. His time was now devoted to mechanical pursuits and chemical experiments, for which he had great fondness. In 1772 he was appointed with John Lukens, surveyor-general, and David Rittenhouse to survey the Susquehanna and Lehigh Rivers to ascertain the best location for a canal to be built through the interior of the State. He was a member of the Committee of Correspondence of Lancaster County in the time of the Revolution, when it was first formed, in June 15, 1774, and in the next year was appointed commissary of the army, then at Reading, and was employed by the Committee of Safety of the province to purchase, manufacture, and keep in repair the arms of the Continental forces. He was made a member of the Council of Safety of the Province by act of Assembly, Oct. 18, 1777, appointed justice of the peace and of the Court of Common Pleas, and acted as president of that body from 1781 to 1786; member of Continental Congress from 1784 to 1786; treasurer of the county of Lancaster from 1777 till 1786. He was in business with Joseph Simon at the southeast corner of East King Street and Centre Square, and his house was the first east from the store. As early as 1771 he invented the screw auger. Samuel Boyd, an ingenious mechanic of the borough, was one of the workmen who were engaged in the manufacture. In the latter part of 1772, Henry Rauch, of Lititz, an apt worker in iron, perfected the auger, and became a partner in its manufacture. It was manufactured at the store until 1777. The house of Mr. Henry was the resort of men of culture, and in the summer and winter of 1777, Thomas Paine, David Rittenhouse (then State treasurer), and John Hart, a member of the Supreme Executive Council, were lodging there. At this time Paine occupied a room at the left of the stairs, on the second story, where he is said to have written No. 5 of "The Crisis," over the signature of "Common Sense." David Rittenhouse occupied the front room, where the office of the State treasury was kept. It was about 1752 that Benjamin West, the artist, then fourteen years of age, was at Lancaster, painting portraits, and lodged at the house of Mr. Henry. He was persuaded by him to attempt a historical picture, and suggested as a subject, "The Death of Socrates." The story was read, a model found in a young man in the workshop of Mr. Henry, and West made his first study of the human figure. Mr. Henry was in active life to the last days of his life, and departed Dec. 15, 1786, leaving several sons and daughters. William removed to Philadelphia. John Joseph lived and died in Lancaster; his history will be found more at length in the "Bench and Bar."

George Ross, signer of the Declaration of Independence, settled here in 1751, or the following year, and entered the practice of law, for which he appears to have been most admirably fitted both by education and nature, for he achieved a high degree of success. He was made prosecutor for the crown soon after coming to Lancaster. He took an active part in advancing the best interests of the town, and his services in this line and his mental attainments being recognized by his neighbors, he was honored by election to the Assembly in the year 1768. By successive elections he was continued in that position until 1774, when he was elected to Congress. He had been one of a committee to whom was referred the patriotic communication of the House of Burgesses of Virginia, recommending a Congress of the colonies for the purpose of resisting British arbitrary enactments, and in Congress he consistently furthered those measures which finally led to American independence. He remained in Congress until 1777, serving so perfectly to the approbation of his constituents that at a meeting of citizens held in the borough he was voted the sum of £150 "as a testimony from this county of their sense of his attendance on the public business to his great private loss," or if he chose it, "a genteel piece of plate," but he declined the present. After varied and valuable labors in the service of the colonies and of Pennsylvania, he was appointed a judge of the Court of Admiralty in April, 1779. His death occurred without warning in July of the same year, while he was serving in that capacity. George Ross had married, soon after locating in Lancaster, Miss Ann Lawlor. His son, James Ross, in 1775, raised in Lancaster a company of men of which he was made captain, and which was attached to Col. Thompson's regiment. He rose to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and after the war was appointed a judge in Louisiana Territory. He died in 1808.

George L. Mayer was a native of Ulm, Germany, and emigrated to this country with his wife, and settled in Lancaster in 1762. He built a one-story house on Vine Street, between Queen and Duke Streets, where he lived till his death, in 1793. He was prominent in the affairs of the Trinity Church, and active in all departments of life. He left nine children, who, with the exception of the eldest, were all born in Lancaster.

Christopher B. Mayer, the eldest son of George L., was born in 1766, and became a merchant, which business he continued many years. He built a large stone house at the corner of Duke and Orange Streets, where he lived. He was prominent in the political affairs of the State, and for some years was in the State Senate. He died in 1816, and left six sons and six daughters, whose descendants are numerous.

Col. George Mayer, a son of George L. Mayer, and half brother of Christopher B., was born in this borough in 1781. He became a prosperous hardware merchant, and continued the business many years in the place, now occupied by Isaac Diller. He was the inventor of the Mayer butt-hinge, which he never patented. In 1812 he joined the militia forces, and served as acting adjutant of a battalion which went from Lancaster County to the relief of Elkton, Md.,

May 13, 1813. On the 1st of August, 1814, he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of the Sixty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania militia, and commanded a battalion which marched to Baltimore. He died in this city in 1862, and left two sons and daughters. His descendants are still here.

John Christopher Hayne was a tinsmith in the borough in 1754, on the site now owned by the Steinmans. John Frederick Steinman succeeded to the business in 1785, having learned the trade of Hayne, who after the death of Mr. Christopher Steinman married his widow, the mother of John Frederick. The business has continued in the Steinman name to the present time.

William Bausman came to this borough in 1754 from an adjoining township, and purchased lots on East King Street, where he kept a tavern. He was assistant burgess in 1760, and chief burgess in 1774-75, active in the management of affairs of Committee of Observation and Correspondence, and master of the barracks in time of the Revolution. He died in 1784. His two sons, William and John, succeeded to his property. William was register of the county from 1809 to 1818. John in 1814 removed to Maryland.

In 1754, the year that Bausman arrived here, the town had, according to Governor Pownall, who passed through it, about three hundred houses, and a population of two thousand. He spoke of it as "a growing town, and making money." Another writer says that when the Governor visited Lancaster there "was not one good house in it." They were "chiefly of frame, filled in with stone, of logs, and a few of stone." The same writer says that the town "was too large at an early period in proportion to the population of the surrounding country."

Philip Shreiner, the father of Martin Shreiner, the first of that name who were clockmakers, came from Germany to this county about 1760, and purchased a lot on the south side of Queen Street, just north of the present Grape Hotel. Here his son, Martin, who was born in 1767, about 1790 opened a shop. Later he manufactured fire-engines, for which he became famous. He was many years a member of the Council, and an active member of the Lutheran Church. He died in 1866, and is buried in the cemetery which bears his name. His son, Martin, was in business at the old stand till his death, in 1879.

Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg was the third son of Henry Melchoir Muhlenberg, of Germany. He was the brother of the Rev. Dr. Henry Ernst Muhlenberg, many years pastor of the Lutheran Church of this place. He came to this county shortly before the Revolution. "Animated by a warm attachment to the Revolution, and by a corresponding zeal for the great Republican institutions of his country, he acquired the confidence of his fellow-citizens. By their suffrages he was repeatedly called to aid in the councils of Independent America, and as further testimonies of their respect for his character he was promoted to stations of great dignity, both in the National Legislature and that of Pennsylvania. A large portion of his life was employed in the public service."

He was a member of the Continental Congress in 1779, and Speaker of the First Congress, 1789, and Third Congress in 1793, and at the time of his death, June 4, 1801, he was receiver-general of the land-office of Pennsylvania, and lived at Lancaster. He left a wife and six children, who in later years removed from Lancaster. The Rev. William Augustus Muhlenberg, several years rector of St. James' Episcopal Church, of this city, was a grandson.

On the 1st of May, 1760, James Hamilton conveyed to James Webb lots Nos. 534, 535, 536, and 537, having a frontage of two hundred and fifty-seven feet on Duke Street, and two hundred and forty-five feet on Walnut Street, upon which it was specified barracks should be built to lodge such soldiers as should pass through the county or be stationed in it. It was undoubtedly intended that these barracks should be constructed for use in the French and Indian war, but they do not appear to have been, and, indeed, that war came to a close soon after the action was taken. They were built and used, however, during the war of the Revolution. It was resolved by the Council of Safety, Feb. 6, 1777, "that the powder magazine and other military storehouses be built in or near the borough of Lancaster for the use of the State, and that John Hubley, commissary, provide material, employ workmen, and see the same finished with all possible dispatch, and that he take up on ground-rent or purchase such grounds as are necessary for the said buildings." Lots 654 and 655 on the west side of North Street were rented, as were also corresponding lots on the opposite side of the street, and the barracks were built on the lots originally set apart for that purpose in 1760. Hubley received pay for the store buildings in April, 1779, and it is probable that the others were completed about that time. The barracks were occupied by British prisoners in January, 1782, and Gen. Hazen and his regiment were ordered here to guard them. The officers of this regiment were quartered at the stone tavern known as "the Cat" (which is still standing), then kept by John Barnitz.

Caleb Cope, a Quaker, and a plasterer by trade, was a resident of Lancaster several years before 1774. In that year he was elected burgess. He was a trustee of the Friends' meeting-house, and an active member. It is stated that Maj. André was among the prisoners sent to Lancaster who were captured by Gen. Montgomery, Nov. 3, 1775, and that he, with other officers, became inmates of the house of Caleb Cope. Mr. Cope lived here till about 1813, when he moved to Burlington, N. J. He left five sons and two daughters.

Brig.-Gen. Jeremiah Mosher, a native of Roxbury, volunteered as a minute-man in 1774, and in April, 1775, was at the battle of Lexington. He followed the fortunes of war, and participated in many battles. In 1777 he was ordered to Lancaster for winter quarters, and in 1778 was in camp at Valley Forge, and in that year was wounded and sent back to Lancaster. He was discharged in 1780, and remained in Lancaster. He was a blacksmith by trade, and followed the business many years. He lived till March 8, 1830, when he died in his seventy-seventh year, and was buried with military honors.

John Light came to this borough about 1783, after the Revolution. He was one of the minute-men of New Jersey in 1775. In the spring of 1776 he went to Canada, and was at the battle of Three Rivers, suffered privations with the soldiers at the river Sorel, and was on the retreat from Canada to Ticonderoga, at the battle of Lake Champlain, defended Ticonderoga, was at Princeton, and at Brunswick when the enemy retreated from it. He fought at Somerset Court-House, Germantown, Monmouth Court-House; was of the light dragoons who guarded Burgoyne's prisoners from New Jersey to the Potomac, and at the capture of Cornwallis in 1781. He kept public-house in this borough from 1783 many years, and was nominated for Assembly in 1800. He died in 1834 in this city, and was buried with military honors. Dr. John L. Atlee is a grandson.

There were many other early settlers who were prominent in the affairs of Lancaster whose names either do not appear in this connection or are merely mentioned, but they will be found to have places in the legal and medical chapters of this work, or in the biographical department.

Gen. Lafayette's visit was an event in the history of the city which cannot be passed unnoticed. Citizens of Lancaster met Sept. 13, 1824, at the court-house to express their approbation of the Council in inviting Lafayette to visit the city. Resolutions were passed, the first of which was "that the citizens of Lancaster cordially unite with the Select and Common Councils in their invitation given to Gen. Lafayette to visit the city." A committee was appointed to proceed with a committee from the Council to Philadelphia and present the resolution to the marquis. The joint committee of Council and citizens consisted of Gen. George B. Porter, Milton C. Rogers, Esq., Capt. Frederick Hambright, Capt. John Reynolds, Jasper Slaymaker, Emanuel C. Reigart, and Benjamin Grimler, Esqs. As early as Aug. 20, 1824, resolutions of Council were passed. A letter from Lafayette, dated Washington, Feb. 5, 1825, was read by the mayor, in which he expressed pleasure at the invitation to visit Lancaster, and regretted that he could not visit the city on his late excursion to Harrisburg, and hoped that he might yet meet the people of this place. On July 26, 1825, the committee of arrangements announced that Lafayette would visit Lancaster on Wednesday, the 27th. He arrived, as was expected, being met at Philson's tavern, fourteen miles west of West Chester, by the committee from Lancaster, who had four coaches-and-four, with out-riders and attendants. Great crowds assembled at the villages through which the general and his escort passed, and greeted him with enthusiasm. At Mount Vernon he made a brief address. Thence the party moved on to Grove's field, about two miles east of the city, where there was an immense concourse of people and several battalions of militia drawn up in line, with two troops of horse. A great civic and military procession attended the distinguished friend of the republic on his way to the city, which he entered about half-past five. After moving through the principal streets the procession halted at Slaymaker's hotel, which had been designated as the general's place of reception, and beautifully fitted up. Here Lafayette was addressed by Burgess Lightner, and made an appropriate response. On the next day he was introduced to many Revolutionary soldiers, visited his friends George Ross and Mrs. Brien, the daughter of his former friend, Gen. Edward Hand, and spent considerable time in inspecting the schools.<sup>1</sup> In the afternoon a sumptuous dinner was given in his honor at the court-house by Mr. John Stehman, and in the evening he attended a party at Masonic Hall, where were "many of the most respectable and fashionable ladies of the city." Early the next morning Lafayette took his departure, being escorted out of town by the city battalion, and as far as Port Deposit by a committee.

The ground-rents of Lancaster commenced in the year 1735. The tract of five hundred acres came into the possession of James Hamilton in 1734, and on the 20th of May, 1735, the first lots were sold on which ground-rents were laid. Among those who purchased at this time were Michael Bierly, Lots 220-225; Richard Marsden, Lot 226; Henry Hunt, Lot 221. These were all on King Street. Samuel Bethel, the same date, purchased Lot 134 on Queen Street. Lots 225-226 were taxed fourteen shillings, while the others were laid at seven shillings. It was provided in all deeds that the purchaser "should make, erect, build, and finish on each and every lot, at their own cost and charge, a sufficient dwelling-house, of the dimensions of sixteen feet square at least, with a good chimney of brick or stone to be laid with lime and sand." In case of neglect to erect such buildings within two years, the lots were to revert to the Hamiltons. On the 7th of March, 1749, James Hamilton purchased the ground-rents of Adamstown of Dr. Adam Simon Kuhn for four hundred pounds; the annual rents at that time were eighty-five pounds. Lots were sold by James Hamilton as late as 1773. He left no direct descendants, and in 1783, William Hamilton, of Philadelphia, a nephew, had the care of selling lots and collecting rents. The property had been held by the law of entail, and title in fee simple could not be made until about the year 1815, when, under the tenure of James Hamilton, also a nephew, succeeded by the law of common recovery, in freeing the property, since which time all property sold was in fee simple, with rents. Upon the death of James Hamilton, the greater portion of the property was left to his heirs, and to whom the remaining rents are paid. In the year 1818, Joshua Scott, a civil engineer, was employed to make a map of the lots of the city for the Hamilton estate, in which the number of the lots are given. An index was made, recording the name of the person to whom the grant was made, with date and amount of ground-rent. The roll or index is among the Hamilton papers in the prothonotary's office.

From the year 1825, for several years, certain individuals were sending notices to the inhabitants of the city, stating that they were authorized to collect the Hamilton ground-rents. This became so general that on the 30th of May, 1831, a public meeting was held at the market-house. It was ascertained at this meeting that the gross amount called for by these different parties exceeded one hundred thousand dollars. A committee of twelve were appointed to consult counsel and resist such action. What was the result of this proceeding is not known, but the excitement died away after a time. John Beauclere Newman, of Philadelphia, became the trustee of the estate, and Emanuel C. Reigart, of this city, was appointed agent. After the death of Mr. Newman, Jacob M. Long was appointed trustee and also acted as agent until his death. On the 27th of December, 1832, Henry Sively became trustee and agent, and is still acting.

At the present time there are four hundred and sixteen rentals, aggregating about five thousand dollars. The lowest ground-rent is three cents; the largest is $22.22. In early time the ground-rents could be extinguished by the payment of fourteen years' rent, which in later years was increased to twenty years.

Samuel Bethel in 1717 purchased a tract of land of Michael Shank, a part of which in later years became the southwest portion of the borough of Lancaster. He commenced the sale of lots when the borough began to increase, and ground-rents became a part of the sale in the same manner as the Hamilton property and subject to the same conditions. Mr. Bethel died in 1740, and left his property to his wife and two children, Mary and Samuel. The latter received the Bethel's town tracts, and received a good income from the ground-rents of that place. Samuel died in Columbia in 1819. In later years the management of the affairs was in the hands of Emanuel C. Reigart, and for the past twenty years has been in the management of William P. Brinton.

Early Trades and other Occupations.—Aside from the simple trades and crude manufactures common to all towns both in their pioneer and later days, aside from the toil of the smiths and the workers in wood, the earliest mechanical industry that extensively engaged the energy of Lancaster artisans seems to have been the manufacture of guns. It was only natural that Lancaster, being a frontier town, should offer to the pioneer and trader and woodsman what he most needed, and hence it became a prominent market for rifles and powder and ball.

Governor Pownall, visiting Lancaster in 1754, notes in his journal: "A manufactory is here of guns." How many years previous to this time the making of guns had been carried on we do not know. After the Revolutionary war broke out the manufacturers of guns were fully employed, and their wares were used in sterner hunts than they had been on the frontier. They were first engaged to make guns by the Committee of Safety. At a meeting of this committee on Oct. 7, 1775, the question was asked whether the gunsmiths residing in the borough of Lancaster should not be immediately sent for to give their reasons to this committee why they have not set about making the arms directed by the Honorable House of Assembly, to be made in the county of Lancaster, agreeable to the application of the commissioners and assessors of the said county. The gunsmiths were sent for, but it does not appear that they came before the committee until a meeting held Nov. 10, 1775, at which time Christian Isch and Peter Reigart agreed to set to work on Monday, the 20th of November instant, and make muskets and bayonets for this county at the Philadelphia prices, and to confine themselves to that work entirely to the 1st day of March next, and furnish as many as they could possibly complete in the time, and deliver the same to the commissioners of the county or the Committee of Safety. Michael Withers also agreed to set himself and his workmen at the task of making muskets and bayonets. At this same meeting it was resolved that any gunsmiths in the county who, upon application by members of the committee, should refuse to make firelocks and bayonets, within two weeks from the time of the application, should "have their names inserted in the minutes of the committee as enemies of their country, and be published as such, and their tools should be taken from them, and they should not be permitted to carry on their trade."

Prior to this, in May, 1774, a number of residents of the county had agreed with the committee of observation to furnish powder and lead in certain quantities at fourteen pounds to fifteen pounds per hundredweight for the former, and forty-five pence for the latter. Among those who thus engaged were Charles Hamilton, Josiah and Robert Lockhart, Matthias Slough, Mr. Simons, Mr. Graff, and others.

Quite an excitement was caused in 1774 by the report that Joseph and Robert Lockhart, shopkeepers, mentioned in the foregoing list, had in their possession a quantity of tea on which had been paid duty under the obnoxious act passed a short time before. The matter coming before the Provincial Committee, they were required to put in an immediate appearance to answer the charge. Upon investigation it was found that they had a quantity of Bohea weighing three hundred and forty-nine pounds, but that it was a part of a seizure made at the custom-house at Philadelphia, and the Lockharts were therefore allowed to sell it.

Paul Zantzinger did a large business in the manufacture of clothing for the soldiers during the Revolutionary war. His workshop, in which he must have employed quite a number of tailors, was on North Queen Street. In 1777 he furnished Anthony Wayne's men with six hundred and fifty suits of uniform. In April, 1778, he reported that since November preceding, he had furnished five hundred and fifty coats, two hundred waistcoats, three hundred and eighty pairs of breeches, three hundred and eighty pairs of stockings, about one hundred pairs of shoes, and several hundred hats.

Returning to the ante-Revolution period we find that as early as 1760, Christian Frederick Steinman was carrying on the trade of a coppersmith and selling general hardware. This business has been handed down from father to son for three generations, and is now carried on by a descendant of its early founder.

The sale of tobacco and snuff (the latter then used far more extensively than now) was begun in 1770 by Christopher Demuth, who carried it on uninterruptedly for nearly fifty years, being succeeded by his son in 1816. The business has ever since been conducted by the family.

As early as 1772, Caspar Singer had a tannery in operation on King Street, and Isaac Whitelock a brewery on the same street, near Water.

The manufacture of rope was begun in 1780 by George Martin, and is to-day one of the industries of Lancaster, carried on by one of his descendants who bears his full name.

The following directory of Lancaster in 1780, compiled from the assessment-roll of that year, gives a complete view of the business interests and trade occupations of the time:

John Eberman engaged in clock and watchmaking some time during the Revolution, for in 1783 he was paid a bill of £20 for keeping the court-house clock in order for five years. He had charge of the town clock for many years. Gottlieb Eberman was also engaged in the trade as early as 1782.

Carl Heinrich Heinitsh established a drug-store in 1782 near the place where his grandson now carries on the business. He died in 1803, but the business has been without intermission in the hands of his descendants ever since.

In 1785 Adam Reigart opened Reigart's old wine store, which he kept for more than half a century. Martin Shreiner was a clock-maker, and learned his trade of John Eberman. About 1787 he opened a shop in a building first north of the present Grape Hotel, and kept there until 1829. There are many of the tall clocks he made still in use throughout the county. In that year his son, Martin, succeeded him in that business and continued till 1879, when he died. His grandson is yet in the same business. In 1829, Mr. Shreiner commenced the manufacture of fire engines on the site of Mr. Lewis Holdy's marble-yard.

In 1790, Christian Mayer established a general hardware store, which he carried on for many years.

Gun-making was still one of the leading industries in 1795, and for many succeeding years. At the time mentioned Jacob Dickert, who had "forty years' experience," and Abraham Henry were in the business, and in 1797 Charles Bulow advertised "double-bridled gun-locks from Germany." Christopher Gumph was here in 1798, and Peter Brong in 1800, while in 1808 Daniel Sweitzer & Co. announced the opening of their "gun-lock manufactory, west of the court-house, on the road to Millerstown."

In 1795, William P. Atlee advertised that he had commenced as "a coppersmith and tinplate worker" on Queen Street, and Phillip Schaeffer announced that he had a "general assortment of ironmongery, cutlery, saddlery, etc., at the sign of the mill-saw on Queen Street." He also carried on a nail manufactory.

Drugs were advertised by George Moore, at the sign of the marble mortar, north of the court-house, on Queen Street; by John Moderwell, near the former, and by John Rose on the south side of King Street and east of the court-house.

General merchandise was kept this year, according to advertisements in the Lancaster Journal, by Dickert & Gill, at their store "in the well-known dwelling-house of said Dickert on Queen Street;" by William Crawford, who opened a store on Queen Street, northwest of the court-house, and next door to Adam Weaver's tavern; by John Morris, who kept next door to Diffenderfer's tavern, and by George Moore, Jr., and William Henry, on King Street, while Jacob Schaeffer advertised "large and elegant looking-glasses at his store on King Street," which was, presumably, also a general store.

At this time (1795) Ludwick Nagel had a candle- and soap-factory, and a number of other mechanical industries were in operation.

In 1796 George Brungard was one of the leading carpenters, and did considerable work, as is shown by the fact that he advertised for three journeymen and three apprentices. John Kerr was then manufacturing nails on Orange Street, and a large tannery was in operation on Water Street.

An advertisement, indicating the increased wealth and the development of luxurious tastes, appeared in 1796, Peter Getz, "goldsmith and jeweler, opposite Mr. Slough's tavern, on Queen Street," announcing that he had on hand a "large assortment of useful ornaments, gold and silver watches, etc." This was the first goldsmith's advertisement, in all probability, that appeared in the Lancaster papers. Prior to this time they had been simply silversmiths, and these had not been so common as the tin and coppersmiths. Another goldsmith, William Haverstick, advertised in 1798, but he had also at his place of business, on King Street, dry-goods and groceries.

In the summer of 1797, Schaeffer & Badecker advertised that they had erected a chocolate manufactory, where they proposed to carry on business in "an extensive manner."

In 1798, Egbert Taylor was carrying on a boot and shoe manufactory, and Robert Dawson, who had come the year before from Wilmington, carried on the manufacture of his patent bolting cloth. He died in 1807, and William Boys rented the establishment.

The first advertisement of a music-store appeared in April, 1800, the store being opened on King Street, below the market, by Christian Jacob Rutter. The next year Julia Logan started a store for the sale of millinery and haberdashery, on West King Street, and Michael Dubony, who had formerly kept groceries on the corner of Queen and Orange Streets, advertised that he had removed to a new building on Queen Street, and opened "a coffee-house, where he kept all kinds of wine, brandy, Jamaica spirits, porter and beer, mead, and a variety of syrups," with ice cream, "to be had every Saturday,"—another indication of growing luxury. The first intimation of the existence of a book-store appears in the advertisement of "William Kneass, engraver," in 1802. He informed the people that he had "literary productions, stationery, etc.," at Mrs. App's, on West King Street. The same year George Keiss opened a book-store on East King Street, opposite Messen-cope's tavern. Thus gradually new branches of merchandise and new trades were established, until the town was well provided both in the number and variety of its business houses. The second book-store mentioned was carried on for a number of years, and reopened in 1826 by C. Hager, two doors east of the Cooper House. Many of the business houses of which we have given the origin were carried on for long terms of years, and developed into very important institutions; others failed after a short period of activity, and not a few are to-day in existence, carried on by the descendants of their founders. Some of the earliest manufactories established subsequently to those we have mentioned, and which are still pursued in the city, are brush-, comb-, and gun-making. The first of these was started in 1812, by the father of the present manufacturer, James Sansom. Peter P. Voorhis commenced the manufacture of combs in 1824, and it has been passed down from one to another to Dana Graham, the present proprietor. After the time of the early gun-makers who have been mentioned at the beginning of this article, others engaged in the business, among them Melchor Fordrey, in 1828, and Christopher Gompf, James Gompf, John Dreppard, and Henry Gibbs, subsequently. In 1834, Henry Lemman established gun-works with improved machinery, which ultimately became quite extensive. They are fully described in a sketch of their founder, which appears in this work, and of the other later and still existing manufactories in the city accounts are given in another portion of this chapter.

Borough Incorporation.—The charter of the borough of Lancaster, a part of which is hereafter recited, shows the causes that led to its incorporation. This charter was granted May 1, 1742, and signed by George Thomas, Lieutenant-Governor under John Penn, Thomas Penn, and Richard Penn, Esquires, Proprietaries.

"George the Second by the Grace of God, of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all to whom these Presents shall come Greeting. Whereas our loving Subject, James Hamilton, of the city of Philadelphia, in the Province of Pennsylvania, Esq., owner of a tract of land whereon the Town of Lancaster, in the same Province, is erected, hath, on the behalf of the Inhabitants of the said Town, represented unto our trusty and well-beloved Thomas Penn, Esq., one of the Proprietors of the said Province, and George Thomas, Esq., with our Royal Approbation, Lieut. Gov. thereof under John Penn, the said Thomas Penn and Richard Penn, Esquires, true and absolute Proprietors of the said Province and the counties of New Castle, Kent, and Sussex, upon Delaware the great Improvements and Buildings made and continuing to be made in the said Town by the great Increase of the Inhabitants thereof, and hath humbly besought them for our Letters Patent under the Great Seal of the said Province to erect the said Town of Lancaster into a Borough according to certain Limits and Bounds hereinafter described. . . .

"Therefore Know Ye, That we, favoring the Application of the said James Hamilton on behalf of the said Freeholders and Inhabitants and willing to promote Trade, Industry, Rule, and good order amongst all our subjects of our special grace, certain knowledge and mere motion, have erected, and by these Presents do erect, the said Town of Lancaster into a Borough forever, hereafter to be called by the name of Lancaster, which said Borough shall extend, be limited, and bounded in the manner it is now laid out, pursuant to the Plan thereof hereunto annexed."

The charter nominates and appoints Thomas Cookson and Sebastian Graff to be burgesses, and Michael Bierly, Matthias Young, John Dehuffe, John Folkes, Abraham Johnson, and Peter Worrall as assistants. It was granted to the burgesses, freeholders, and inhabitants "to have, hold, and keep within the said borough two markets in each week, that is to say, one market on Wednesday and one market on Saturday in every week of the year for ever in the lot of ground already agreed upon for that purpose and granted for that use by Andrew Hamilton, Esq., late of Philadelphia, deceased. . . ."

The boundaries of the city were referred to a plan which mentioned the limits as one mile each way from the centre of Centre Square. In accordance with the charter the burgesses and assistants of Lancaster assembled on the 13th of August, 1742. The first business after organization was to return thanks to James Hamilton, Esq., for his services in procuring the charter, and to "request him to return the thanks of the corporation to his Honor the Governor (in the absence of the Proprietaries) for the same."

The first ordinance passed was as follows: "It is ordered that no Tradesman, Artificer, Workman, Laborer, or other person whatsoever, shall do or exercise any worldly business or work of their ordinary calling (works of necessity or charity only excepted) on the Sabbath day, therein called the first day, upon pain that every offender [shall pay] Twenty Shillings to the use of the Poor." It was provided in the ordinance that butchers were allowed to kill and sell on that day in the months of June, July, and August before the hour of nine in the morning and after five in the afternoon.

At subsequent meetings ordinances were passed concerning markets, against the burning of charcoal and the firing of guns in the streets, prohibiting the playing of ball at the court-house, and prescribing the manner in which blacksmith-shops should be built to be reasonably safe from catching fire.

At the meeting of burgesses Feb. 7, 1763, "It was agreed unanimously that a petition should be drawn and sent to the House of Assembly for the erection of a work-house in this borough, and accordingly a petition was sent in pursuance thereof, signed by the greater part of the inhabitants of this borough."

The request was acceded to, an act passed, and the work-house built on the jail-lot in the spring of the year by the county of Lancaster. It was on the 27th of December, 1763, that the Indians who had been placed in the work-house for safety were barbarously murdered by the "Paxton Boys," as elsewhere narrated.

On Oct. 3, 1772, we find distinguished names mentioned in the records, "the thanks of the corporation" being "given to Emanuel Carpenter and George Ross for their services as Representatives in the General Assembly."

At a meeting of the burgesses March 16, 1774, "was taken into consideration the many services Mr. Atlee had done for the corporation in penning and preparing the above law to be laid before the Assembly, drawing the draught of the borough, waiting on the Assembly with the bill and other services, and he refusing to accept a draught on the treasurer or any other satisfaction for the same. It is therefore unanimously agreed (he having retired at the request of the other gentlemen present), that Messrs. Henry, Lowman, and Hopson have some piece of plate made such as agreeable to Mrs. Atlee, genteel and not too expensive, and present the same to her as a testimony of their approbation of Mr. Atlee's conduct in serving the borough."

Mr. Atlee was at this time chief burgess. The act of Assembly referred to was "for regulating the buildings, keeping in repair the streets, lanes, and alleys, highways, &c., in the borough of Lancaster." The plate referred to was purchased and is mentioned in the treasurer's report made June 29, 1775, as follows: "May 16, By Cash to Charles Hall for a Silver Tea Sett as a present to Mr. Atlee, for his trouble relative to the Borough Law, £14 5s. 0d."

When allegiance to the mother-country was thrown off, measures were taken to organize under the new government, and on June 19, 1777, an act was passed by the Assembly re-establishing the borough, with all of the rights of the old charter and all acts supplementary to it. The old seal, bearing the insignia of royalty, was ordered to be destroyed and a new one substituted for it.

From this time to the incorporation of the city of Lancaster the borough underwent no change or modification. It was chartered as a city March 20, 1818. The charter was amended April 5, 1867, dividing the city into nine wards, and again amended March 16, 1868, and March 22, 1869.

Public Improvements.—The streets of Lancaster, laid out in March, 1730, as is shown by James Hamilton's plan, were for many years worked only as common country roads, and it was not until 1771, nearly thirty years after the town was incorporated, that any definite action was taken for their improvement. On February 5th of that year the commissioners and assessors of the county, in view of the necessity for a better passage-way across the low lands on the west end of King Street, near Water, ordered that "a bridge should be built over the rivulets that flow across King Street to the westward of the Prison Wall." This action was confirmed by the grand jury, and a contract was made with George Musser, a Lancaster tavern-keeper, to build the required structure. A committee was appointed to superintend the work and see that it was properly performed, consisting of John Carpenter, Caspar Shaffner, Jr., Samuel Bane, and Valentine Brenneman, of the commissioners, and William Henry, William Atlee, and Christopher Reigart, of the borough of Lancaster. The bridge, the first within the bounds of Lancaster City of which we have any record, was built according to contract, but the borough authorities ordered considerable additional work upon it. On the 1st of July, 1771, the burgesses ordered "grates for openings in the arches, to secure the water from the Gutters, and battlements of brick to be placed at each end, with neat piers, to be covered with Warwick stone." Thus it will be seen beauty as well as utility was a matter for consideration at the very beginning of the era of public improvement in Lancaster. Another bridge must have been built about the same time as the one of which we have written, for under the same date that the improvements were ordered on the King Street bridge we find record of an order for "a Battlement of Stone, of proper height, to be placed at each end of the bridge lately erected across Queen and Vine Streets." This work was placed in charge of William Henry.

We find record of the next step taken in the direction of public improvements in an act passed by the Assembly in 1774, "for regulating the Buildings and keeping in repair the Lanes, Alleys, and Highways of the Boro of Lancaster." . . . In conformance with the provisions of this act, on the 16th of March of the year stated, Caleb Cope, Caspar Shaffner, and George Musser were appointed "Surveyors or Regulators of the Streets." From this time on these officers were appointed each year.

On the 11th of September, 1790, William Reichenbach presented an account for services "in surveying and assisting to regulate" the different streets and alleys in the borough; also for two maps of the borough with the adjacent country, exhibiting a square of ten miles or one hundred square miles. One of these maps was retained in Lancaster, and now hangs upon the wall of the Linnæan Society's hall. The other one was sent to Congress, the object being to present to that body the claims of Lancaster as an available and advantageous site for the capital of the United States. The people of the borough at that early day are thus shown to have possessed not only the desire to secure beautiful and useful improvements, but to have entertained grand aspirations for the future glory and importance of the town.

Early in the year 1797 it was represented to the Pennsylvania Assembly that the Philadelphia and Lancaster and the Lancaster and Susquehanna turnpikes were completed nearly to the borough, leaving spaces or gaps of road through the borough which were unimproved, and for the improvement of which no provision had been made. The inhabitants of Lancaster, with these facts in view, petitioned for authority to raise twenty thousand dollars by means of a lottery, for the purpose of paving those streets in the borough which formed the connecting links between the two finished portions of each of the turnpikes. In accordance with this petition an act was passed in March, 1797, authorizing the lottery, and on the 5th of August an advertisement appeared in the Lancaster Journal stating the fact and announcing the scheme of the proposed drawing, which was as follows: There were to be 20,000 tickets at $8, which would make the aggregate receipts if all were sold $160,000; the blanks were to number 13,723, and the prizes 6263, ranging in value from $10 to $10,000, and aggregating $160,000. All prizes were to be paid immediately after the drawing, subject to a deduction of fifteen per cent., which was to constitute the fund for the use of the borough, and pay the expenses of the lottery. The commissioners appointed in the act to superintend the lottery were Edward Hand, Paul Zantzinger, Abraham Witmer, Matthias Slough, Adam Reigart, Jr., Jacob Graeff, Jacob Krugh, John Miller, George Musser, James Crawford, Caspar Shaffner, John Huber, Adam Weaver, and John Habling.

The lottery was made and drawn, and on the 1st of May, 1802, the following notice appeared in the Lancaster Journal:

"For Paving the Streets.—Proposals will be received by the managers of the Lancaster Street Lottery from any person who is desirous to contract for the delivery of any quantity of paving-stone in the borough of Lancaster. The proposals to be in writing, expressing the price per perch and quantity which the person will engage to deliver."

It will be seen by the representations in the following extracts from the petition presented to the judges of the Court of Quarter Sessions and the Grand Inquest at the November term, 1802, that the work was well advanced that year. The petitioners, after setting forth "the construction and completion of the turnpike from the east end of King Street to Philadelphia" and the "establishment of a similar road (now nearly completed) from the west end of the same street to the town of Columbia, on the Susquehanna," alluding to the fact that the "interval ground running through the principal street of the borough of Lancaster had been unprovided for" until the citizens "had obtained legislative sanction for a lottery for the purpose of enabling them to accomplish so desirable and, indeed, so necessary an undertaking, as well as to pave another principal street," which work they had seen progressing favorably during the year, and which they hoped to complete in the coming summer, prayed that the Honorable Court and the Grand Inquest would "be pleased to grant to the corporation of the borough of Lancaster, out of the county stock, such sum of money (not exceeding — dollars) as may be sufficient to pave the court-house square and in front of the city buildings in the said borough." A petition from the burgesses of the borough was presented to the same court asking for the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars to pave the court-house square, and stating that the funds raised by the lottery "were exclusively granted for the pavement of the streets." The petition was signed by the burgesses, assistants, high constable, and town clerk. The court granted fifteen hundred dollars, with privilege to apply for more if necessary. It did seem to be necessary, for at the August term of court, 1803, a petition was presented by the burgesses asking for six hundred dollars to complete the work, and the court granted five hundred dollars. This petition stated that the greater part of the court-house square "had now been paved."

The lottery instituted for raising funds for the pavement of the streets was divided into three classes and drawn in different "schemes" at different times during several years. "Class No. 3" was offered in the summer of 1803 in connection with the Lancaster races, and was drawn in December of that year. This "scheme" contained 5500 tickets at $5 each. There were 1937 prizes, amounting to $27,500, and 3563 blanks. Some tickets must have been sold on credit, as on the 5th of July, 1805, the commissioners, by advertisement, called upon the public to settle, stating that they were "anxious to commence operations upon the streets,"—that is, to complete that portion that was planned to be executed with the proceeds of "scheme No. 3." On the 4th of January, 1807, Michael Pigeon, secretary of the Lancaster Lottery, advertised that suits would be brought for payment against all ticket-holders who did not settle by February 1st. This was the last appearance of the street lottery in the affairs of Lancaster for several years.

On the 24th of March, 1808, complaint was made to the burgesses by inhabitants of North Queen Street of the condition of that highway, and it was stated "that at certain seasons of the year it was impassable to wagons, carts, etc." The supervisors and regulators were instructed to examine it and make an estimate of the cost of paving the street. At the next meeting they reported that "the probable expense of paving and turnpiking four squares on North Queen Street and two squares from Queen to Prince Street would be $3385, exclusive of digging away the earth and leveling the streets, calculated at $1000 more." This amount was thought too burdensome by the inhabitants, and they agreed with the supervisors to lay a rate or assessment, not to exceed $2500, for the purpose. On the 29th of August, 1811, an additional tax of $500 was ordered laid to complete the work begun. In the year 1812 $3000 was ordered to be raised for general street and highway purposes.

In 1813 the method of raising funds by a lottery was again resorted to, an act being passed by the Assembly January 28th of that year which was supplementary to the old act of March 9, 1797, authorizing a lottery in Lancaster, the proceeds of which were to be devoted to paving the streets. James Haines, William Montgomery, Emanuel Reigart, John Gundaker, John Hoff, Samuel White, Jonas Metzgar, John Swar, Christian Hoover, John Bomberger, Benjamin Shaw, and Abraham Witmer were added to the surviving members of the old board of commissioners, and authorized to devise a scheme for the fourth class in lieu of one approved prior, and not to exceed $5000.

About 1816, Joshua Scott was employed by the Hamiltons to make a map of the borough for their use in connection with ground-rents, and on May 13, 1817, Mr. Scott offered to make a draft of the borough "from actual survey, four feet square, upon which should be designated streets, lanes, alleys, numbers of lots, and table or index of names of original grantees, date of deeds, yearly ground-rent, etc." The Council accepted the offer, and the map was completed and presented to the burgesses on the 13th of November, and ordered to be placed in the care of the town clerk, subject to the inspection of citizens. It was also resolved at this time that "the ancient draughts of the Borough of Lancaster having lately been found, it is agreed that the same be likewise deposited in the office of the town clerk."

The next year, 1818, when Lancaster became a city, was not a fruitful one in the matter of public improvements, and not much was accomplished from that time until the year 1823, when, upon the 3d of June, the following ordinance was passed:

"From and after July 1st it shall be the duty of the inhabitants of the city of Lancaster to pave their sidewalks with brick as follows:

"King Street, from Ann to Charlotte; Queen Street, from James to Church; Orange Street, from Plum to Charlotte; Prince Street, from Vine to James; Duke Street, from Vine to Chestnut; and from the north side of Vine Street to the Catholic Church."

From this time onward every year witnessed improvements within the present city limits. The records contain very frequent mention of contracts ordered into for building bridges and arches over runs, grading, turnpiking, and paving streets. Orders were also issued quite numerous for the extension of streets, and the various actions of the authorities steadily kept up have resulted in giving Lancaster as good a system of streets, and keeping them in as fine condition as can be found in any of her sister cities. One of the notable actions concerning the streets was a resolution adopted March 3, 1846, in favor of the appointment of a joint committee of the two Councils "to consider the propriety of altering the names of the streets of the city, so as to give them more of an American or republican stamp." No change in names was effected, and Lancaster undoubtedly has to-day more relics of the era of royalty in the names of its principal thoroughfares—King, Queen, Prince, and Duke Streets—than any other American city.

Markets and Market-Houses.—These useful and convenient establishments, which afford the meeting-ground for farmer and city resident, and assist materially in maintaining the equilibrium between supply and demand, have in Lancaster an early and interesting history. The first step towards providing a market-house was taken almost as far back as the origin of the town. Upon May 15, 1730, we find that Andrew Hamilton and his wife, for five shillings, granted to Caleb Pearce, John Wright, and James Mitchell, three of the commissioners, three lots in the town of Lancaster, one for a court-house, one for a market-house, and one for a jail lot. The market-house lot is described in the deed as follows:

"Beginning at a post on High (now King) Street; thence by the said street east three degrees north one hundred and twenty feet to a post by the public square; by the same and other lands of Hamilton north three degrees west one hundred and twenty feet; thence by other lands of said Hamilton west three degrees south one hundred and twenty feet; then by other lands of Hamilton south three degrees, one hundred and twenty feet to place of beginning, containing fifty-three perches."

No information concerning the establishment of markets upon the above-described or any other ground prior to the incorporation of the borough has been handed down through the long years to the historian. But preserved in the borough records, which begin with the year 1742, are frequent allusions and specific statements which furnish the points necessary for a correct outline history of the markets. While the first of these found, under date of Sept. 13, 1742, is not particularly valuable as throwing light upon the matter of the early markets, it is none the less interesting. "It was ordered," reads the record of the burgesses' meeting, "that no persons except freemen and inhabitants within this corporation shall presume to set up stalls within the same for the sale of their goods, save at the times of the fairs, under the penalty of five pounds." This action was taken for the reason that "Chapmen licensed to travel with goods for supplying the country" were in the habit of setting up stalls in the corporation, which was considered an infringement of the rights of the shop-keepers, and to the great discouragement of trading people serving the borough. The next entry gives more definite information upon the subject. At the meeting of the burgesses Oct. 22, 1742, it was ordered that the clerk of the market erect or cause to be erected stalls for Chapmen at the time of the fairs in the market-places, in the following manner, viz.: six stalls, eight feet each in front and five feet back.

On Feb. 8, 1743, as the interest of the market was much defeated by the country people hawking from house to house their provisions for sale, and the butchers not bringing out their meat into the market, "it was ordered that all provisions and goods for sale brought in on market-days and intended for sale shall be exposed to sale in the public market, and in no other place or parts of the town till two o'clock in the afternoon, under the penalty of ten shillings, . . . and that if any butcher inhabiting this corporation shall neglect or refuse to keep the market and expose his meat for sale in the time for keeping market above limited, and shall afterwards on that day, or the next day after, expose any meat to sale in his private house or shop, it shall be deemed a breach of this order, and he shall be subject to the fine above."

May 30, 1743, it was ordered that "every person who shall erect a stall or standing for the sale of any goods whatsoever in the said corporation on the days of the fairs, and shall not write their names and pay for the same to the clerk of the market, shall pay two shillings and sixpence each."

The borough authorities were particularly active about this time in making regulations for the market and doing away with abuses. On Oct. 24, 1748, it being stated "that the practice of the butchers within this corporation blowing their meat by pipes, in order to blow up the same, renders it more subject to taint and infection, and having other ill tendencies," it was ordered by the burgesses and assistants "that all beef, mutton, and other meat which should be blown up by pipes or otherwise, and exposed for sale by any butchers or others in this corporation, the same being proved or made appear before one of the Burgesses, it shall be seized by the clerk of the market, and become entirely forfeited." Upon the same date that this regulation was passed George Hovey was appointed clerk of the market for the ensuing year.

Upon Jan. 25, 1745, we find that complaint was made "of the market being forestalled and the provisions and other commodities brought to market by the country people being immediately bought up by some particular persons in order to retail them out at an advanced price, very much to the prejudice of the market and of the inhabitants." At the next meeting, February 1st, action was taken upon this complaint, it being ordered that "no retailer of any provisions or commodities brought to market within this borough, or any other person under any pretense whatsoever, by themselves or their servants, shall be at liberty to purchase any provisions or other commodities brought to market in gross or greater quantities than for the use of his, her, or their respective families, . . . under the penalty of twenty shillings, . . . to be levied on the goods and chattels of the offenders upon conviction before the burgesses, and in default of such goods and chattels that the offender be sent to the workhouse and kept to hard labor for any term not exceeding ten days, nor less than three, at the discretion of the burgesses."

In the records for 1752 we find entries which indicate considerable improvement in the market and the existence of more thorough system than we have hitherto discovered trace of. On May 30th of that year the price of stalls was regulated, the rental "of the first five on each side of the market-house" being fixed "at seven shillings and sixpence each." On Oct. 15, 1757, an ordinance was passed imposing a fine of fifteen shillings upon butchers who should thereafter refuse to sell meat in the market and expose it for sale elsewhere at this time. Eleven butchers had stalls in the market-house, for which they paid rentals varying from £1 10s. down to 15s. Their names were Frederick Yeizer, Michael Fordine, Jacob Eichholtz, Engelhard Yeizer, Hoppel Reigart, Hans Ferreo, Andrew Sprichen, Fritrich Crenner, Martin Berntheiser, Jacob Fissel, John Flaggetawiller. The following report of market-house receipts and expenditures for 1760 (dated June 17th) is of interest in this connection:

"Matthias Bough, high constable, exhibited his account (also on oath) of the moneys received by him at the June fair of 1760 for the use of the corporation, arising as well from the hire of the stalls under the market-house to the butchers as from the fair, amounting to the sum of £82 14s. 10½d., out of which was allowed an account against the borough, composed of several items, aggregating £14 8s., of which £8 2s. was paid Matthew Bough for building one hundred and eight stalls, leaving £48 11s. 10½d.

In 1773 and 1774 a number of improvements were made in and about the market-house, it being ordered, June 16th of the former year, that a new roof should be put on the north side of the house, "to be done of oak shingles;" and it was ordered, in the fall of 1774, that the market-place should be paved. In 1790 a temporary market-house was built adjoining the permanent structure, for the greater convenience of country people.

With all of the improvements made there came a time when the needs of the people demanded a new market-house. This need seems to have been first realized in 1796: Upon March 4th of that year Messrs. A. Reigart, J. Jacks, and M. Mussor were appointed a committee "to consult with the commissioners of the county of Lancaster concerning the extent, plan, spot, and estimate of the cost attending the building of the new market-house." Not much progress was made towards the carrying out of the project until March 2, 1798, when there occurred a consultation between the burgesses and a committee from lodge

No. 48 (Freemasons) as to a superstructure upon the market-house for the use of the lodge. This shows that some preparation had previously been made for building by the borough authorities. Plans were now drawn and agreed upon by the burgesses and the Masonic committee, and a stipulation was jointly signed by them March 22, 1798, that the market-house should "be built agreeably to proposals this day signed." A contract was made April 5th "with George Peters, brickmaker; Jacob Albright, mason and brickmaker; and Gottlieb Schrier, carpenter, as workmen and persons to procure materials for said building, agreeably to the contract signed by them." The 30th of January, 1799, was appointed as the day on which the butchers should select their stalls, and fourteen of them did so. There were twenty-four stalls in all, but the corporation reserved Nos. 1, 2, and 3. The others rented for £3 each per annum. Business was commenced in the new market on the day that the stalls were selected and let, and has since been carried on there on a large scale until comparatively recent years, and a portion of the building is used for market purposes even now. The offices of the mayor and city treasurer are in the building, and the front portion has been occupied by the post-office since 1855.

Nothing worthy of note appeared concerning the markets in the period between 1799 and 1835, but in September of the latter year we find that a committee was appointed to ascertain what improvements were necessary, and upon October 6th a resolution was passed in favor of building an addition to the market-house, and authorizing that proposals for the work should be advertised for. "The committee took into consideration the situation of the citizens residing back of the market-house, and for the purpose of interfering as little as possible with their comfort, agreed to place the piers of the contemplated building back so as to range with the second pier in the wing, leaving a space about the breadth of the other streets between the new building and the houses of the citizens, with sufficient room at the east end to drive round with wagons. A contract for erecting the building was made with Joshua Jack. The committee was also authorized to confer with Mrs. Reichenbach as to the price of property which she owned adjoining the market-house, and reporting that it could be bought for twelve thousand dollars, one-fourth cash. The Councils determined to purchase, and, by an ordinance passed December 21st, authorized a loan for the total amount necessary. The purchase was not consummated, owing to difficulties arising from the fact that Mrs. Reichenbach was not the sole owner of the property, and no further action was taken concerning the market until 1845, when another profitless effort was made to secure, at a fair consideration, a suitable piece of ground, and the matter was dropped, and no measures resorted to until 1854. In that year another committee was appointed to inquire as to property for a market-house, and their examinations led to the purchase of the following lots now occupied by the market-houses north of old market-house square. A lot with two-story brick house from J. Jungling for $6250, lot and dwelling-house from Sarah Wolf for $3300, lot from Christopher Hager for $3000, from John W. Forney $3700, and from G. W. Reichenbach's property at $16,600, making a total outlay for ground of $32,850. A contract was at once made with Stoner & Evans, in the sum of $8042.92, which resulted in the erection of the present building. J. Siner was appointed superintendent of the work. From the time this building was completed until the present, the city has done nothing more than to keep the market in repair, and the demand for new markets has been met by private enterprise.

In the fall of 1868 the Farmers' Northern Market Company was chartered, and on Sept. 30, 1871, a lot measuring ninety-six by two hundred and forty-five feet on the corner of North Queen and Walnut Streets was purchased of David M. Hess for twenty-two thousand dollars, and in 1872 the present commodious market-house, eighty by two hundred and forty feet in dimensions, was erected, at a cost of sixty-seven thousand dollars. This market contained originally two hundred and fifty stalls, but the west end having been diverted to other uses it now has only two hundred and thirty-eight. The company is controlled by nine directors, of whom Christian Zecker is president, and Joseph Sampson, secretary. The Central market controlled by the city was inclosed and otherwise improved in 1876-77, at a cost of ten thousand dollars, as the result of an agitation which was commenced in 1872.

The increasing demand for markets led to the incorporation of the Farmers' Eastern and the Farmers' Western Market Companies in 1882. The property known as the "Indian Queen" tavern was purchased by the Farmers' Eastern Market Company, in April, from Dr. Henry Carpenter, and a large market-house is now in process of construction where the old tavern stood. It will contain one hundred and sixty-eight farmers' stalls and twenty-three butchers' stalls. The president of the company is Martin Kreider, and the secretary is Allen A. Herr. The Farmers' Western Market Company purchased at a cost of eight thousand dollars land on the corner of West Orange and Pine Streets, on which a commodious house is building which will contain one hundred and eighty stalls. The president of the company is John Hager, and the secretary Henry R. Fulton.

The Water-Works.—The initial effort to secure the benefit of a regular water supply for the inhabitants of the town was made in 1822. In April of that year the Legislature passed an act "to supply the city of Lancaster with pure water." The work of exploring for an adequate source of good water was entered upon by the Councils, who from time to time appointed committees for that purpose. Under date of November 9th, in the treasurer's account appears an item of $161.43 paid S. Slaymaker as "expenses on account of searching for water to introduce into the city of Lancaster;" and again on December 6th there occurs an item of $85.94 paid to the water committee. From this time onward to the summer of 1826 efforts were occasionally made under the direction of the city authorities to discover a water supply. On May 18th of the latter year the water committee, Frederick Hambright and J. Longnecker, were paid $148.07, "for searching for water." Nothing was, however, accomplished for several years.

The Lancaster Water Company was incorporated by act of April 23, 1829. The act appointed George L. Mayer, Robert Evans, John Longnecker, Henry Keffer, and Phillip W. Reigart as commissioners, limited the capital stock to $60,000 in shares of $50 each, and authorized the Councils of the city of Lancaster to subscribe for such number of shares as they saw fit, not exceeding one thousand. That nothing was accomplished under this corporation is obvious from the fact that a petition was presented to the Council by a number of progressive and public-spirited citizens on Jan. 4, 1881, urging the formation of a new company and the trial of a new plan for the realization of their important object. The petitioners dwelt upon the need that existed of introducing running water into the city, and suggested the propriety of calling a town meeting to ascertain more fully the public opinion in regard to the expediency of the city undertaking and completing the said work. "But as owing to the difficulty of accomplishing it," they say, "from our local situation, and other causes, all attempts heretofore made have proved unavailing, it is believed that the only practicable mode of accomplishing the work would be by procuring an act of Legislature authorizing the issue of stock, with the proviso that the city of Lancaster shall have the privilege at any time within a given number of years of redeeming said stock." A committee was appointed in pursuance of the desire of the petitioners to present the case to the Legislature, asking for the incorporation of a stock company for the purpose of introducing running water into the city of Lancaster. Mr. Longnecker, of this committee, reported Feb. 1, 1881, that an act of Assembly was passed April 23, 1829, incorporating the Lancaster Water Company, and asked the Council to examine it and ascertain if it would answer all purposes now wished for.

A town-meeting was held on February 12th, at which it was voted that the Council should be requested to appropriate a sum of money to employ a competent engineer to ascertain the best manner of introducing water into the city and the probable cost of the same. Some further action was taken, but about this time considerable excitement arose concerning a contemplated change in the railroad route, and the subject of water-works was dropped out of consideration, not to be seriously taken up for five years.

On Jan. 5, 1886, the question of water supply again arose, and a joint committee of Councils was appointed to ascertain the most practicable place for bringing water into the city, and the probable cost of the same. At a subsequent meeting, in the same month, the Councils received a communication, signed by a number of citizens, expressing their satisfaction that the Council were giving the subject proper attention, and suggesting that various points along the Conestoga, from which water could be obtained, should be examined; that a committee should visit the water-works of Philadelphia and Wilmington to ascertain the best improvements, and also to take into consideration the question whether the work of providing water-works could be best accomplished by a stock company or by the city through a loan. A committee was appointed in compliance with the suggestion of the citizens, and on Feb. 8, 1886, they reported that they had employed Gen. Mitchell to prepare an estimate of the cost of procuring water from five different localities. On March 20th the water committee reported that Mr. Erdmann, of Philadelphia, had examined several points, and thought that it was most feasible to conduct water from the vicinity of Swan's Mill, and that the best site for a reservoir was on the high ground at Cross' Corner. The cost of constructing the works was estimated at a little less than thirty thousand dollars, but the expense which it was necessary to incur for land made the total cost more than double that amount.

On March 30, 1886, an ordinance was passed authorizing the mayor to borrow seventy thousand dollars for the purpose of carrying into effect the supplement of an act entitled an act to incorporate the city of Lancaster. The water committee bought of Edward Parker, for sixteen hundred dollars, eight acres of land at the east end of King Street as a site for a reservoir, and entered into contract with the executors of John Swan for the purchase of the mill-property, on the Conestoga, at thirty-eight thousand five hundred dollars, the purchase being approved by Councils. Contracts were now made for building a dam, furnishing pipe, and pumping machinery. Mr. F. Erdmann was elected engineer at a salary of twelve hundred dollars, and operations were at once commenced and pushed forward with energy. Trenches were dug through the streets for the purpose of laying pipes in August and September, 1886, and in December of that year the water committee reported that the reservoir was nearly completed. Water was introduced into the city Feb. 22, 1887, and the first rents paid for the period from May 11, 1887, to April 1, 1888, by the following persons, viz.: Zeph. McLonigan, Charles Sheaff, M. McGraun, Jacob Griel, Henry Flick, Henry Rogers, R. Frazer, Farmers' Bank, Mrs. Fahnstock, Dr. William Fahnstock, Abraham W. Brenneman, George H. Bomberger, Samuel Dale, John F. Long,

J. & P. Long, Benjamin Champneys, William Norris, George Ford, John Myers, the Office of Discount and Deposit, Catharine Yeates, and Margaret Yeates. The aggregate was $187.96, which was a small beginning in receipts for an institution which had cost $104,168.41, as the water-works did when completed. This amount, however, covered the cost of a farm purchased in connection with the Swan Mill, which the city subsequently sold for $16,908.15. From the completion of the works until 1851 nothing was done upon the water-works but making small repairs and extending the main pipes throughout the city. In 1851 the reservoir was found inadequate, and another one was built adjoining it at an expense of thirteen thousand seven hundred dollars, which had a capacity of 4,500,000 gallons. This was subsequently somewhat reduced, and the total reservoir capacity is about 6,000,000. From time to time since extensive improvements have been made and costly pumping machinery added, the repairs and additions in 1870 including a turbine wheel and pump, alone costing $27,000. Notwithstanding improvements made in 1873 and 1875 the pumping capacity of the works was found in 1878 to be inadequate, and a contract was entered into with Henry R. Worthington, of New York, for a compound condensing pumping engine at a cost of $17,450. This engine was and is capable of pumping 8,000,000 gallons of water in twenty-four hours, but the authorities having the works in charge contemplate increasing the capacity to twice that amount. In 1882 a stand-pipe was erected in the centre of the western reservoir for the purpose of serving the higher parts of the city with water, and with this last valuable improvement the Lancaster water-works may be considered as reasonably satisfactory and effective.

Various Actions of the Borough Authorities on Fire Protection.—The earliest mention of fire implements in the borough is a reference to the condition of the ladders, hooks, and buckets, which occurs under date of 1744, and indicates that these articles had been provided at some former time, probably as early as 1742. There is some reason to believe that as early as 1761 an engine-house, or place for keeping such primitive fire implements as were in the borough, stood upon Lot 379 on West King Street, between Water and Mulberry. The earliest positive knowledge we have upon this matter, however, is that of action taken in 1765. It was "considered and agreed by the burgesses," in July of that year, "that a house be forthwith erected fit to contain three fire-engines at least, in and on the northwest corner of the market-house, to take up in length of the market-house three pillars, and not to take up any more than four feet of the inside of the market-house, and Mr. John Feltman and Mr. Jacob Felter are hereby appointed to erect the aforesaid house as they think most advantageous to the corporation."

The first action taken by the borough authorities to secure or provide a water supply to serve as a protection against fire was upon Sept. 14, 1772. Under this date the following appears in the records of the burgesses:

"It being represented that Casper Singer, of this borough, Tanner, hath lately obtained permission from Isaac Whitelock, of the said borough, to take and lead the water of a certain spring which rises in the ground of the said Isaac Whitelock, near his Brew-House, into Water Street, to the intent that the said Casper Singer may by pipes or other proper conduits carry and convey the water thereof to building and tanyards of him, the said Casper Singer, in King Street, in the same Borough, and the said Casper Singer, now requesting the privilege of laying pipes and conduits for the purpose aforesaid along Water Street, and to break the ground to fix them properly, and he engaging in return and satisfaction for the privilege aforesaid to have a stock or jet d'eau fixed in such a pipe or conduit at such place as the Burgesses or Assistants of the Borough shall direct in King Street aforesaid where such pipe or conduit shall cross the said street so that the public (in cases of fire and at such other times as it shall not be injurious to the said Casper Singer to be deprived of the said water) may be supplied with water from the same, and that, at his own expense, that he, his heirs and assigns, shall and will maintain and keep in good order and repair such stock or jet d'eau at his and their expense. Upon consideration had upon the premises, the privilege aforesaid of breaking the ground in the said streets, and of laying pipes, trunks or conduits in and through the streets aforesaid for taking and conveying the water as aforesaid is granted unto the said Casper Singer, his heirs and assigns, forever. He and they in laying and fixing such pipes or conduits, and in keeping them in good order and repair from time to time, taking care to cover them as not to obstruct or hinder the easy and convenient passage in and through the said streets, and that expeditiously and without unnecessary delay, and he and they, from time to time, and at all times, fixing and keeping the said stock or jet d'eau in good order and repair for the use and benefit of the inhabitants of the said Borough at the time and seasons before mentioned."

There is no account of the purchase of the first engine, but it appears to have been in the possession of the borough for some time prior to 1764, for in August of that year William Henry was paid £7 10s. for repairing it. About this time the inhabitants of the borough subscribed money for the purchase of another engine, and in accordance with the suggestion made by the committees of the three fire companies,—the Sun, Union, and Friendship,—one was imported from London, England, through the agency of William West, merchant, of Philadelphia. This engine, which was a small affair, was kept in use for many years, and finally sold to the borough of Manheim. It was not until 1790 that another engine was purchased for the public use. The cost of this engine was £720, and £4 10s. was paid to Henry Pinkerton for hauling it from Philadelphia.

The borough authorities appear, from various entries in their records, to have taken in early days pretty good care of the engine and other apparatus. On May 22, 1776, we find that Charles Hall, jeweler, was paid, "for taking care of and repairing the fire-engine in this borough for two years and six months," the sum of £7 10s.

On March 9, 1789, it was resolved that E. Hand, Esq., Mr. Frey, and Mr. Reigart be a committee to view the market-house to determine the repairs necessary for the preservation of the ladders, hooks, etc., belonging to the fire engine, and also the repairs necessary to be made on the fire-engine-house.

Other measures to insure public safety were resorted to from time to time. In the borough records of Dec. 19, 1791, appeared the following: "Upon the application of a committee jointly appointed by the Union and Sun Fire Companies in this borough, it is resolved that a petition be drawn and presented to the Legislature, praying for a law to enable the inhabitants of this borough, by a tax to be levied upon them, to support a nightly watch, street lamps, public pumps, etc." A memorial was prepared and sent to the Assembly in April, 1792, but the measures for public safety were not put into execution until December, 1796, and then continued only until August, at which time the appropriation of £300 was exhausted. From that time until 1799 the services of night watchmen were practically dispensed with. In March, 1799, a number of the inhabitants sent a petition to the Legislature asking for a repeal of the law, and the burgesses prepared a memorial in the form of a counter-petition. The law remained operative, and most of its provisions were enforced.

On May 30, 1806, a proposal was made by Christopher Mayer, Esq., to contribute towards a public well, at or near the court-house. No action was taken by the burgesses upon this measure until 1810, when, upon Oct. 20, a committee was appointed "to fix upon a suitable place and have a well dug in the first square in King Street." The committee reported the following month that Mr. Mayer "agreed to have the whole of the work done and to pay one-half the expense." It was finished in the summer of 1811.

The first work of the "Fire Bug" of which there is any record was undertaken on the night of Nov. 21, 1810, when some scoundrel attempted to set fire to the stable of Conrad Schwartz by throwing combustible matter into the hay-loft. A public meeting was held the next evening, which resulted in the offering of a reward of two hundred dollars for information that would lead to the conviction of the guilty person. The night watchmen were on duty, but it was ordered that in addition four men from each ward should turn out and act as patrol. On the 1st of December, 1810, information was given to the corporation that another attempt had been made to set fire to buildings by putting brimstone matches, paper, etc., into the house of Messrs. Frey and Morrow. Upon this an excited town-meeting was held, at which it was resolved that sixteen men be immediately appointed to act as patrol, and that measures be taken for continuance of their services until Jan. 10, 1811.

The several items we have gleaned from the records show that the borough authorities and citizens were active and public-spirited, and made the best efforts within their power to defend the town from fire. But for all that, and in spite of frequent improvements in the fire apparatus, the means which Lancaster employed to fight the destroying element were very crude and ineffective, as will appear from the following communication, which was contributed by an observing stranger to the Lancaster Journal of Feb. 15, 1811:

"MR. HAMILTON: There was an alarm of fire last evening, which, as a thing of course, made me inquire how the people of this borough were prepared to meet such an event.

"Have you any engines? Yes, we have four of them.

"Very well! Have you a sufficient quantity of buckets, ladders, fire-hooks, etc? Yes, we have four or five companies, as many ladders, and I believe as many hooks. Some of these companies are large, and every member of a fire company is provided with at least two buckets.

"Have you any hose? No.

"No hose! Is it possible! In a place so compactly built with so many deep back buildings, where, in many instances, your engines cannot act with advantage on the fire!

"Mr. Hamilton: I would advise the people of this place (if I could possibly think they were not able to buy some hose) to sell two of their engines and supply themselves with hose.

"Except the fire would break out in several places at once, you could do more execution with two engines, supplied each with twenty or thirty yards of hose, than with half a dozen bare engines. Perhaps some think hose is only useful in Philadelphia, and places similarly situated for water, where they can be screwed to the hydrants. But this is not the case. Unscrew the tube of your engine, and on the other end of the hose screw the tube, and go as near to the fire as the case will admit, and you will, with one-half or one-fourth of the water, time, and labor, subdue the dangerous element. A STRANGER."

A fire-engine company without hose would, at this day, be regarded very much in the same light as a gun without a barrel or a wagon without wheels.

As the progress made in methods of protection against fire was chiefly brought about by and through the several volunteer companies, three of which had an existence of more than a century, we continue the subject of fire matters by giving the history of those organizations.

Friendship Fire Company.<sup>1</sup>—The minutes of the organization, which have been carefully kept, show that the company "began the 10th day of December, Anno Domini 1763." Although the company was comparatively deficient in implements for extinguishing fires, it had a complete organization and very stringent rules. The articles of association set forth that the company was limited to a membership of thirty, each one of whom was to furnish himself with buckets, a basket, and a bag, the former to carry water to the fire and the latter to convey goods from it. The meetings were held monthly at the different public-houses of the borough, and each member was fined one shilling for non-attendance. The only elective or permanent officer of the company was the treasurer, who was chosen annually and compelled to give bond in double the amount of "stock," as the fund in his keeping was called. Each member in turn acted as clerk and served at only one meeting. The following is a list of the original members of the company, who signed the articles of association at the first meeting Dec. 10, 1763: James Bickham, George Ross, Robert Thompson, Michael Hubbley, John Craig, Jacob Glatz, Frederick Stone, Jacob Fetter, Land-

George Ross, whose name is second in the foregoing list, was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence. He appears to have been an active member during the early period of the company's history, popular, and at one time a subject of the sympathy of his fellow-members, as we find by the minutes of their first stated meeting (held on Jan. 2, 1764) that a collection of thirty-five shillings was taken up and "put into the hands of George Ross for his use, he having been wounded by the Indians." Rev. Thomas Barton, whose name appears in the list, was the rector of St. James' (Episcopal) Church, and was known as "the preacher fireman." He and George Ross are named on most of the important committees prior to the suspension of the company at the beginning of the Revolution. The next meeting of the company after the one at which the names of the members were enrolled was held at the house of Michael Hubley, on Dec. 29, 1763, at which all of the members were present. Ludwick Morton was elected secretary, and it was agreed that as the company then had no "stock," the treasurer need not furnish a bond. The Rev. Thomas Barton, George Ross, and Michael Hubley were appointed a committee "to confer with similar committees from other companies." They reported, at the next meeting in January, 1764, that they had agreed upon several articles, one of which was to the effect that "an engine, larger than the one in use, should be made by William Henry." This Henry was a Lancaster mechanic of some celebrity, an intimate friend of David Rittenhouse, and an active participant in the Revolutionary troubles. It does not appear that he ever completed the engine. In the proceedings of this meeting we have the first indications of that undercurrent which was at work in the public mind against "the tyranny of King George" and his colonial minions. There appears to have been a magistrate who, of course, derived the "brief authority" in which he was clothed from the crown. He, no doubt, was not slow to exercise his authority, for we find a measure for self-government resorted to when the members resolved "to put it to vote whether any person, being a magistrate and member of the company, taking advantage of accidental, loose, or idle expressions of one of the company, ought not to have his name erased." The record shows that all agreed to it except one. In February, 1764, the emblem of the company, which was ever retained, was adopted. It was resolved "that a chockolate color with grasped hands should be the color and device for the buckets."

In February, 1765, ladders were procured and other necessities provided, the company apparently being aroused to more than usual activity by the fact that there had been a fire a short time previous to their meeting at Joseph Simon's house.

The last meeting of the Friendship Fire Company prior to the Revolution occurred on July 12, 1768, and the minutes for that date were written up by the Rev. Thomas Barton, and concluded with "Finis Veteris Libri."

On the next page of the record-book after that on which the meeting of 1768 is chronicled we find the following, after an interregnum of twenty-three years: "Transactions of the Friendship Fire Company, renewed Dec. 31, 1791. Regeneration is the beginning of a new life. (Signed) William Reichenbach." The meeting was held at the house of Christian App. It would appear from the manner in which the proceedings are recorded that there had been some preliminary meeting, for the minutes state that the company met, and twenty-six members answered to their names, as follows: George Hoff, Christian App, Edward Hand, Esq., Peter Hoofnagle, Daniel Franck, Peter Boyer, George Reitzel, Michael Bender, Caspar Shaffner, Christopher Reitzel, Peter Beer, Frederick Swentzel, Jacob Weaver, Phillip Brussel, Jacob Shaeffer, Caspar Fordney, Henry Gross, John Lechler, Jacob Backinstoss, Jacob Mayers, Jacob Kehler, Michael Hershey, William Hentzel, William Reichenbach, Jacob Young, John Burg.

Nine members were absent, viz.: Jacob Joad, George Moore, George Lindenberger, John Eberman, John Messenkop, Lewis Peters, Philip Eberman, and John Lind.

It will be seen that only a few of the members who formed the company in 1763 were present at its reorganization. Most of the old members had taken an active part in the trying and exciting scenes of the preceding years, and many of them had passed away. At this meeting the articles of association of the old Friendship Fire Company were readopted as "the rule and guide of this company," except that no bags were to be made, and that the company was to consist of thirty-five instead of thirty members. It was "agreed that Edward Hand, Esq., and Caspar Shaffner be a committee to join the other fire company committees to erect houses for the engines, also that the buckets of the company should be painted a Spanish-brown color, with the member's name and the name of the company on each, and that every member should provide himself with two buckets and a basket within four months of that date." The next meeting was held at the house of Henry Gross, Jan. 21, 1792, when all the members were present except John Messenkop and Lewis Peters, and the company again assembled on February 18th, when but four members were absent. At this meeting an action was taken which goes to show that the identity of the company of 1763 was preserved, notwithstanding the twenty-three years' suspension. Edward Hand, Caspar Shaffner, and William Reichenbach were appointed a committee to demand of the executors of the late Sebastian Graeff (deceased) the funds of the company (£7 15s. 10d.) which he held at the time of its suspension in 1768. The same committee was authorized "to confer with other companies." A similar committee from the Active Company was present at this meeting, to lay before the Friendship Company their articles or rules, and to inform them that it was the wish of the Active Company "to consult with them on any business tending to the good of the companies or the general safety of the inhabitants of the borough." The committee of the Friendship subsequently visited the Active, Union, and Sun Companies. The next meeting was held on March 17, 1792, on which occasion Jacob Rockinshoss presented the company with a fire-hook. This was regarded as a present of some importance, and Messrs. Hoff and App were appointed a committee to thank the donor. From this time onward to and after 1800 the history of the company shows no important or interesting event until comparatively recent years. The period was one of slow but sure and substantial growth. Some time after 1800 the hand-engine was purchased. It was of the Button make, and considered in its day a great engine, a machine that the boys were proud to run with. On the introduction of water into the city from the Conestoga in 1837, the Friendship was organized as a hose company, but it was again organized as an engine company in 1858, and an agitation was begun in favor of procuring a fire-engine. On April 16th a committee was appointed to receive proposals for enlarging the engine-house, and they were also ordered to purchase a new engine of Mr. Button for thirteen hundred dollars. The enlargement of the house was effected in the spring of 1868, and the engine received in the summer. On July 16, 1866, a special meeting was held to take into consideration the purchase of a steam fire-engine, and on August 27th a committee was appointed to visit New York, Trenton, Jersey City, and Newark to examine steam-engines and report. This action resulted in the purchase of a steamer for four thousand six hundred dollars in January, 1867. In 1869 a hose-carriage was bought for five hundred dollars, and in the fall of 1870 the first movement was made for a new engine-house. Subscriptions were received in 1871, and the building erected during the years 1873 and 1874, at a cost of nearly six thousand dollars, by Daniel McLaughlin, contractor. Upon the organization of the City Fire Department this company, like the other volunteer organizations, retired from active service, and it will doubtless disband after the sale of its real estate and other property. The presidents of the company from 1861 have been John G. Gable, 1862-68; D. P. Rosenmiller, May 8, 1871; John G. Gable, Dec. 15, 1871; John H. Baumgardner, June 1, 1882; and the secretaries were as follows:

Charles R. Fralley, 1861-62; Charles F. Gould, 1863-67; D. P. Rosenmiller, Jr., Jan. 17, 1868; Thomas F. McElligott, July, 1869; John S. Wein, Dec. 16, 1870; S. Smith, Aug. 21, 1874; Jacob Reese, Jan. 21, 1876; George B. Landis, June 1, 1882; W. Y. Haldey, November, 1882.

The Sun Fire Company.<sup>1</sup>—This company and the Union both claim to antedate in origin the Friendship, and dispute the honor of priority between themselves. The Sun undoubtedly was in existence as early as 1768, and it is mentioned by name in the records of the Friendship in 1764. The earliest records of the company cannot now be found. The oldest entry now remaining is a minute of the meeting of Jan. 20, 1798. The members of the company in 1798 were Adam Weber, Jacob Deckert, Jacob Frey, Conrad Haus, William Bausman, George Messersmith, Frederick Stinman, Peter Gonter, Gotlieb Nauman, Michael Gross, Jacob Stahl, Andrew Keiss, John Bausman, Caspar Erman, Samuel Humes, Henry Lechler, Jacob Lahn, Frederick Frick, Frederick Weltley, Philip Kline, Henry Stouffer, Philip Diffenderfer, Michael Gundaker, Christopher Mayer, Christian Neff, Henry Pinkerton, John Light, Joseph Weaver, John Hambright, Gerhard Bubach, John Wein, Benjamin Shaum, Jacob Gross, Peter Pretzman, John Gillard, Peter Reed, Henry Wolf, George Brentzel, Charles Heintsh, Christian Petrie, Michael Kline, John Bomberger, Andrew Leibley, Phillip Shaeffer, Jacob Shaeffer, Archibald McLonegan, Jacob Schott, and Jacob Lindy. The original articles of association copied into the book, which has been preserved, show that the company was not to consist of more than thirty-five members, each one of whom was to provide himself with two leather buckets, one convenient basket, and one bag made of good Osnaburg or wide linen, containing at least three yards, with a running string at the mouth, all marked with the word "Sun." At the time the records commence to be full, in 1798, the apparatus consisted of an engine, of axes, ladders, buckets, etc.,—all of the articles except hose. In those early days each member of the company had his station for work. Three assisted the owner of the house which might be on fire in taking care of and securing the household goods; four took charge of the goods when brought out; four were directors of the engines; four were to assist in playing it; four were to assist in keeping the people in order in handing the buckets; four to assist in carrying the ladders; four to carry the fire-hooks; five to work on the roof; two assisted with axes, and the rest were to work the engine; but wherein their duty differed from that of those who were to "assist in playing it" we cannot discover. At that day Samuel Humes was the treasurer of the company. On Aug. 17, 1798, the clerkship was made a permanent office, and John Light was elected to fill it. From that day down at least as far as 1857 the office was in his hands or those of his descendants. He retained it by successive elections until 1824, when he resigned, and his grandson, John L. Atlee, M.D., was elected in his place. He, in turn, gave place to his son, John L. Atlee, Jr., who remained in office until 1866. His successors were Michael McCullom, John H. Doak, Thomas C. Burr, Henry G. Elias, F. H. Kilburn, and William F. Shiley, L. S. Fink, J. A. Carpenter, J. G. Thackara.

A gambling spirit seemed to have been rife in the company, for in 1802 it took ten tickets in "the Lancaster Street Lottery," the expense being $175, the proceeds $116.20, and the loss, therefore, $58.80. In 1807 the company took chances in "the Lutheran Church Lottery," and in November, 1813, in "the English Episcopal Church Lottery."

Where the engine-house originally stood is not known. It was removed in 1808 to Lime Street, in 1819 to the English Episcopal churchyard, and in 1837 to East King Street, near Lime. A hose-house was then built on the German Reformed church lot on Orange Street. In 1841 the house was again on Lime Street. Both the hose- and engine-houses remained in these situations until February, 1852, when, the company having purchased a lot from the heirs of Jacob Eichholtz, erected a house upon it.

In September, 1816, appears the first indication of a distinguishing badge, a member appearing at the meeting with seventy tin disks, on each of which was painted a representation of the sun. In 1837 black hats were procured, bearing the emblem of the company on their fronts, and a black cape adopted, on the back of which the name of the company was displayed in large letters. A uniform of red shirt and belt was adopted in 1844, and the subsequent changes in dress do not appear upon the minutes.

Although a committee was appointed in 1820 "to see about hose," it does not appear that they made any report, and it is probable that hose was not used until 1836, when the sum of $200 was appropriated for its purchase. In December of that year a hose-carriage was also bought from "the Northern Liberties" of Philadelphia.

In November, 1825, one person was chosen from each of the companies to constitute a board for the government of the companies, control of engines at fires, etc. The late Judge Dale was the member from this company, and doubtless filled the office until 1832, when it was abolished. In February, 1836, an axe, hook and ladder company was organized, and the hooks and ladders and axes of this company were lent to them, to be retained until the company should disband, which was probably in November, 1836. In February of this year a committee was appointed to confer with the Friendship in regard to merging the two companies, but they were discharged at the next meeting, and the Sun still shone alone.

In April, 1824, the articles of association were so amended as to make a president one of the standing officers of the company, and in May George Lewis Mayer was elected to the office. He retained it until his death in 1837, and Christopher Hagar, who was then elected, remained president until 1839, when he resigned. Robert McClure was then elected to fill the vacancy, and presided over the meetings of the company until 1852, when bad health compelled him to resign. Then John F. Long and Peter McConomy were successively elected, but both refusing to serve, William F. Schuler was chosen, and continued president until 1866, when Isaac E. Heister was elected. John M. Amweg followed him in 1871, and was succeeded by Jacob Gable in 1875. Samuel Humes was the first treasurer of whom there is any record, having been in the office in 1798, and possibly earlier. He appears to have held it until 1822, when he resigned, and Archibald McLenegan became his successor. Jacob Demuth followed him, being elected in 1829, and held the office until his death in 1842. Ely Parry, M.D., was then chosen, and he had charge of the finances until 1855, when he was succeeded by William August Atlee.

In 1842 forty-three young men joined the company at one time. Upon these young men the active work of the company chiefly devolved during the next score of years. The engine in the possession of the company in 1798 remained in their hands until 1830. In 1822 a resolution was passed that it should be sold, but it was not carried into effect for several years. In 1827 the committee to whom was intrusted in 1827 the duty of examining into the expediency of buying a new engine reported favorably, and a committee was then appointed to take up subscriptions for the purpose. In November, 1829, the company decided to procure an engine from Martin Schreiner, of this city, at a cost not to exceed eight hundred dollars. The engine was duly constructed by that gentleman, proved satisfactory, and remained in the possession of the company for twenty-six years without material alteration or improvement, and at the end of that period, in 1856, was rebuilt by a Lancaster mechanic, Samuel Cox. The old hose-carriage having been found unnecessarily heavy, was in 1850 replaced by a new one of lighter and more convenient construction, manufactured by Cox & Suydam.

In 1852 the company met with misfortune which seemed particularly hard. That an organization laboring zealously to protect the people from fire should itself be the victim of that element and sustain heavy loss appears contrary to poetic justice, but such was the bad fortune of the Sun. During the early part of 1852, while the company's new house was in process of construction, much of its property was laid away in a building back of the store of a Mr. Lane. This building was with others destroyed by fire, and all of the goods and implements of the company stored in it were consumed. A committee appointed to investigate the loss reported that over four hundred feet of hose and much other property, worth in the aggregate four hundred dollars, had been destroyed.

On Jan. 19, 1866, a committee previously appointed reported the purchase of a lot on the southwest corner of East Orange and the alley one-half square east of North Queen Street, at a cost of $2750. A committee was appointed to plan for the immediate erection of a building. On June 22d of the same year the question of buying a steam fire-engine came up for discussion, and a committee was appointed to confer with the manufacturers and report. They reported in August that having visited several manufacturers in New York, Paterson, Newark, and Philadelphia, they had decided it best to buy an engine in Philadelphia for $4500. An engine was bought and duly delivered in April, 1867. At a special meeting Dec. 24, 1870, a committee of five was appointed to make investigations in regard to a building lot, and in July, 1871, another was appointed to collect money to build an engine- and hose-house. Slow progress was made. In July, 1874, a committee reported that the cost of such a house as it was thought best to build would be $4500, and on May 21, 1875, the contract for building was let to Philip Dinkleberg for $3050. The building was finished Jan. 21, 1876, and immediately occupied by the company. The Sun Fire Company went out of active existence on the organization of the paid fire department in 1882.

The Union Fire Company.<sup>1</sup>—"The precise time of the organization of the company," says its historian, "cannot be exactly arrived at, but from the earliest records extant it was in existence in August, 1760." While no positive evidence is given that this was the case, it is very likely true. The company was unquestionably in existence in 1764, as it is mentioned by name in the Friendship's records of that year, and it is almost absolutely sure that it was in existence in 1768, as in the Friendship's records for that year "other companies" are referred to. The little volume by Alfred Sanderson upon the history of the Union contains the statement that "the oldest minute-book, from which a number of the first pages are missing, shows that there had been previous meetings, and that the company was organized for some time at least before 1764."

At a meeting on the 25th of August, 1764, Matthias Slough "paid into the treasurer's hands the sum of one pound two shillings, which were collected by him; also five shillings, which is his fine for neglecting to summon the company to meet in June last, agreeable to the articles. Christian Voght, the present clerk, paid into the hands of the treasurer the sum of fourteen shillings, fines collected by him."

The membership of the company is exhibited by the minutes of this meeting. There were present William Dehuff, Robert Fulton (father of the steam-boat inventor), Joseph Simons, Anthony Snyder, Christian Voght, John Stone, Christopher Crawford, Samuel Boyd, John Hopton, Matthias Slough, Henry Dehuff, John Eberman, Matthias Dehuff, Adam Reigart, Charles Klugh, George Graeff, Abraham Riblet, Godlip Klein, George Burkhart, and the absent members were Adam Simon Kuhn, William A. Atlee, Christ. Ginther, Isaac Whitelock, Edward Shippen, Leonhart Klein, Lodwick Stone, Christ. Reigart, John Postlethwait, Caleb Sheward, and James Peters.

In those days, and for many years, the company was not allowed to consist of more than forty members, and when one died, resigned, or was expelled another person was immediately chosen in his place. Each member was required to take his turn monthly as secretary, or "clerk," as it was often called, and was subject to a fine of five shillings should he neglect to do so.

At a meeting held Dec. 9, 1764, after taking some action regarding the purchase of an engine with money subscribed by the inhabitants of the borough, it was "agreed that Anthony Snyder shall provide immediately four fire-ladders at the expense of this company, to wit, two long ones and two short ones, with proper hooks, and two poles for fire-hooks, and render his account for them at the next meeting, to be allowed and paid by the treasurer. At least seventy years before the first water-works reservoir was built in Lancaster one was proposed by this company. At its meeting Aug. 30, 1766, "the members of the General Committee belonging to this company" were "instructed to request a meeting of the rest of the committee" (it was composed of representatives from the several companies), and to let them know it is the opinion of this company that a reservoir be made in the run in Queen Street, and that if there is not already money enough in the hands of the committee they are willing to pay their proportion of the deficiency."

On the 28th of October, 1769, the members voted to make a loan of twenty pounds to the Juliana Library, the same to be paid at the expiration of one year with interest.

During the Revolution the company maintained its organization, but little of interest occurred, the members having their attention absorbed by more important affairs. For two years, 1777 and 1778, no meetings were held, many of the Union men being absent in the service of the Revolutionary army. Notwithstanding the apparent apathy, measures were taken, in conjunction with the Sun Company, to care for the engines which had been purchased by the borough, and which were intrusted jointly to the companies. The war having reached its close and the pursuits of peace resumed, we find the Union again showing a progressive spirit. On the 11th of December, 1784, the following minute is recorded: "It being proposed, and it is unanimously agreed to, that three Ladders be provided for the use of this company, and paid for out of their Stock, one of forty-five feet in length, with hooks and rollers to accommodate the Roof of a House, and also a Tackle Rope and Basket for letting down Persons in distress during fire. And Messrs. Adam Reigart and Jacob Krug be requested to provide the same forthwith. The Ladders to be painted, and the word UNION be put thereon."

About 1788 the company began an agitation for securing a new engine for the protection of the town, which resulted in the purchase of one by the county in 1790, and in 1791 they urged the co-operation of the Sun in erecting new houses for the fire-engines.

The first banquet of the Union Company was held in 1791, and was the initial one in a long series of convivial gatherings. The quaint notice of this "supper," as it was modestly called, reads as follows:

"We, the subscribers, members of the Union Fire Company in the Borough of Lancaster, do agree to Sup together once every Quarter of a year, the first supper to be at Mr. Slough's at the next meeting, and the next to be the last Saturday in the month, three months after, at the house of the next Innkeeper on the Fire Company List, and so on. The club not to exceed five Shillings each, and whether absent or present, we agree to be accountable, and to pay that sum towards the expense of the same as long as we continue members.

•About 1830 yearly banquets were instituted to take place of the quarterly suppers, and were kept up for a number of years.

In 1823 the company thought it necessary to get a new engine, and therefore, on the 19th of April, Daniel Reigart, George H. Krug, A. D. Warren, John Carroll, John Mathiott, John Bachman, William White, and John Eberman were appointed to collect subscriptions for that purpose. On the 21st of June following Adam Reigalt, John Eberman, and John Myer were appointed a committee to make the purchase at a cost not less than six hundred dollars or greater than eight hundred dollars. The new engine was built by John Agnew, a then noted engine-builder of Philadelphia.

The first hose-carriage was procured in 1837. The following entry upon this subject occurs in the minutes of a meeting held at the hotel of John H. Duchman, Jan. 14, 1837: "The committee to secure subscriptions for hose, etc., reported that the amount subscribed in the several wards was $526.84, of which $466.84 had been collected and paid over to the company. Mr. John Ehler reported that, agreeably to his instruction, he had proceeded to Philadelphia; that he had purchased the Good Intent hose-carriage and bells for $260; that he had engaged six hundred feet of hose, with the necessary screws, a trumpet, pipe, a spanner, and two half-spanners, the whole of which would cost $523, and would be ready for delivery in February next." Mr. Ehler also stated "that before leaving home for Philadelphia, William Coleman, Esq., had generously agreed to give $350 for the purchase of the hose-carriage to present to the company." Whereupon Mr. Coleman was given a vote of thanks. This hose-carriage was in use until 1851, when a new one was built by Cox & Suydam to take its place. This carriage was sold in 1865 to the Union Fire Company of Hamburg, Berks Co., has since been resold, and is now doing duty in the Black Hills, Dakota.

The Union took part in the first firemen's parade in Lancaster, March 27, 1837, a demonstration in honor of the introduction of water on the 22d of February preceding, and also in the great parade of May 3, 1838, and was on that occasion presented with a beautiful banner painted by Jacob Eichholtz.

On June 28, 1838, it was "resolved to have a new building erected on Mr. Reichenbach's lot, back of the market-house, so as to admit of the engine and hose-cart being put in abreast. This building was finished and occupied on October 14th of the same year, and used until 1854, when it was removed to make room for the present market-house. On July 14, 1854, it was agreed to purchase a lot at the corner of Market and what is now called Grant Street from Mr. Frederick Cooper, for which the sum of one thousand dollars was paid. Upon this lot the present engine-house was begun and completed the same year. In 1857 the company sold its old engine to the Humane Fire Company, and purchased a new one from the manufactory of Mr. L. Button, Waterford, N. Y. On the 8th of September the members of the company, accompanied by the Lancaster Fencibles band, went to Philadelphia to receive the new engine, were handsomely entertained by the Diligent Company, of that city, and Col. John W. Forney, and, returning home, was honored with a parade of the other companies, the American taking charge of the new Button engine and hauling it through the streets. On the following day the engine was tried in the presence of the builder, and threw a stream of water over two hundred feet. It was also exhibited at the agricultural fair held in October, and attracted much attention. This engine was kept and used until 1865, when, with other apparatus, it was sold to the Town Council of Hamburg, Berks Co., for fifteen hundred dollars, and duly delivered there by the company, who made quite a demonstration on that occasion. In the mean time a steamer had been ordered from Mr. Button, and it was received on Sept. 8, 1865. In honor of its arrival the American and Shiffler Companies united with the Union in a parade, which was conducted by Chief Marshal Dr. J. T. Baker, of the American. The steamer was given a trial, and a few days later another, and a more thorough one under the direction of the builder, when it threw water to a distance of two hundred and twenty-six feet. This engine, rebuilt in 1868, is the one now in use. A new and very elegant hose-carriage was purchased in 1870, and a horse hose-cart was bought in 1878.

The principal change which the Union underwent as an organization was in 1813. On the 16th of January of that year the articles of the company were revised, the number of members increased to fifty, and the first regular election of officers held. Previous to that time there were only temporary presiding officers and secretaries, and the office of treasurer was the only elective one. On this occasion Adam Reigart, Jr., was made president. In 1837 the company was incorporated by the Legislature, and the act was signed by Governor Ritner August 14th. The corporate name was changed on Dec. 24, 1865, by a decree of the Court of Quarter Sessions, to "The Union Steam Fire-Engine and Forcing Hose Company No. 1."

James Buchanan, fifteenth President of the United States, was an active member of the company from 1813 to 1839, and an honorary member subsequent to the latter year. Upon his death, June 1, 1868, the company passed resolutions of respect and regret, and the members attended his funeral in a body.

The most interesting and important event in the history of the company was its centennial celebration in 1860. Arrangements for this were initiated on the 3d of February, 1860, the time set being August 14th. This of course implied that the company was organized in August, 1760. The festivities of the centennial began on the 14th of August with a parade in which many of the members of the Sun, American, and Shifler Companies joined the Union. The engine of the latter company was drawn by four large gray horses, each attended by a colored groom, and the hose-carriage by two black horses. Both the engine and hose-carriage were tastefully decorated with flowers and flags. One of the events of the day was the presentation of a fine silk American flag by Aldus J. Neff, Esq., on behalf of a number of ladies. A brilliant ball was given in the evening at Fulton Hall, which was beautified with garlands and flowers for the occasion. On the evening of August 15th the centennial banquet was given at the same hall, President Henry E. Slaymaker presiding. The one hundred and sixteenth anniversary of the organization (counting from 1760) was commemorated Aug. 14, 1876, by a fine street parade in the evening and a banquet at the hall of the Lancaster Mænnerchor.

The officers of the Union have been as follows: Presidents, Adam Reigart, Jr., 1813-44; John Ehler, 1844-48; Newton Lightner, 1848-55; Henry E. Slaymaker, 1856-. From the organization to 1813 the secretaries served only for one meeting each. Since 1813, those elected have been: John Eberman, 1813-18; George Beckel, 1818-23; Henry R. Reed, 1823-41; John W. Hubley, 1841-42; John Brown, 1842-49; J. B. Kaufman, 1849-52; George K. Reed, 1852-62; Frank L. Calder, 1862-63; Edwin F. Snyder, 1862-69; George W. Kendrick, 1869-75; Robert Clark, 1875-76; George W. Kendrick, 1876-77; G. Edward Hegener, 1877-79. Treasurers, Christopher Crawford, 1764; James Burd, 1765-66; Henry Dehuff, 1766-69; Adam Reigart, 1789-1813; John Eberman, 1813-18; George Beckel, 1818-23; Henry R. Reed, 1823-41; John W. Hubley, 1841-42; John Brown, 1842-49; J. B. Kaufman, 1849-52; George R. Reed, 1852-66; Charles A. Heinitsh, 1866-79.

The Active Fire Company.—This company, which was in existence for many years, was organized on a plan similar in all respects to those of the Sun, Union, and Friendship. It doubtless had its origin in January, 1792, or possibly in 1791. The earliest of its papers—the record of the appointment of a committee to confer with the several other fire companies for purposes of general good, and also to lay before them a copy of its by-laws—is dated the third Saturday of January, 1792. The committee referred to consisted of Samuel Boyd, Samuel Turbett, Matthias Barton, Louis Lauman, and Caspar Shaffner. The company was limited to sixty members, and had at the start fifty-two, viz., Jacob Rieger, Henry Dering, Samuel Boyd, Jeremiah Mozier, Jacob Flubacher, William Musser, Louis Sauman, Peter Shindle, George Thomas, John Reitzel, Jacob Shindle, Jacob Martin, David Hall, George Trisler, Peter Getz, Christian Trisler, Lewis Walter, Christian Long, Robert Willson, Adam Wilhelm, Peter Brunner, Philip Shaum, John Albright, Robert Reed, John Roberts, Gottlieb Sehner, John Fordney, Caspar Shaffner, Jr., Martin Shreiner, Henry Zehmer, Amos Brumfield, David R. Barton, Philip Dean, George Weitzel, Emanuel Reigart, Samuel Turbett, Christian Lenhard, Peter Bier, John Ewing, John Moore, Lewis Heck, Matthias Barton, John Gundaker, Nicholas Cole, John Frey, Jacob Leman, Christopher Brenner, Caspar Brunner, John Gillard, John Sener, John Stone, John Jordan.

This company, as will be seen from the following item, which appeared in the Lancaster Journal Dec. 2, 1797, procured a fine engine. The article reads: "The ingenious Mr. Peter Getz, of this borough, has completed an engine for the Active Fire Company. This is the second he has made, and we may venture to assert that for nicety of workmanship and power of action it is equal, if not superior, to anything of the kind in Europe or America. Mr. Getz has made several improvements on the plan heretofore in practice. The use of metal instead of leather valves has been expedient on account of their firmness and durability. The Active engine contains two hundred gallons, and will empty itself in one minute, throwing the water to the immense height of ninety or one hundred feet. By removing the mouth-piece from the branch or pipe, it will throw double the quantity of water in the same time over a common three-story house." In the same issue of the paper in which the foregoing appeared Mr. Getz advertised that he intended "to carry on the engine-making and repairing in all of its branches," and he probably did so.

The Washington Fire Company.—The meeting at which this company was organized was held at the house of John Landis, March 4, 1820, and forty-one of the persons who had signed the call and were desirous of forming a new fire company were present. Jacob Albright was elected president, Christian Blackman secretary, and Henry Longnecker treasurer, and Messrs. Christopher Bachman, John Zimmerman, Jacob Bundle, William Albright, Joseph Tripple, Michael Gross, Jr., and Jacob Ackerman were appointed a committee to draw up rules and regulations. At this meeting several names were proposed for the organization, among them "The Lancaster Vigilant Fire Company," and "The Mechanics' Fire Company of Lancaster," and the latter was adopted, but "Washington" was substituted for it by a unanimous vote at the next meeting. At the third meeting, held March 18, 1820, committees were appointed to solicit funds from the citizens wherewith to purchase an engine. Subsequently the president was appointed as a committee of one to go to Philadelphia and make arrangements for the construction of an engine especially for the company, the price not to exceed six hundred dollars. After making the visit he reported that he had contracted with Messrs. Perkins & Bacon for a first-class double chamber engine. It was received in August.

Prior to its arrival steps had been taken towards providing a suitable house, and Mr. Henry Lechler having tendered the use of a lot, all of the carpenters in the company, viz., Jacob Dorwart, George Roth, Henry Flick, Abraham Bitner, William Russell, John and Jacob Sener, John Kreiner, Ephraim Zeller, and S. Kreider were, on August 8th, appointed a committee to buy material for an engine-house and to build the same. At this time the Washington Company was offered and accepted a sum of money as a loan from the Sun Company. The house was finished in 1822 and handsomely painted and ornamented. In this year and during several subsequent ones the company took a prominent part in urging upon the authorities the importance of bringing water into the town. When that measure had been consummated, the several fire companies united in making a great parade on March 27, 1837, the Washington taking part under Marshal Grabill Diller, elected for the occasion.

In this year the company procured from Philadelphia seven hundred feet of hose and had built a good hose-tender or cart. The expense was partially met by an appropriation of two hundred dollars voted by the Councils. In 1838 the company adopted a uniform of drab hats and capes. Prior to that time the distinctive insignia had been merely a leather or oil-cloth front on a citizen's hat, bearing a representation of Washington and the name of the company.

In view of the fact that nearly all the original members of the company had become too old to perform active duty, the following persons, all young men, were elected members at a meeting held April 15, 1843: John Zellers, Jeremiah McLaughlin, Henry Barnitz, William Frailey, Andrew Reese, Jacob Hartman, William Glatz, David Reese, Samuel Hooper, William Merrett, Henry Sauers, Henry Donnoughy, Henry Flick, George Glatz, Jacob White, Frederick Schaum, Jacob Musketness, John Fritz, Christopher McGinniss, John Nixdorf, Philip Poutz, Leonard Keiser, George Fryer, James Jones, Frederick Nagle, Jr., Guardus Emanuel, George Lutz, Jesse Mayers, Frederick Dorwart, Jacob Auflebaue, Hiram West, William Shaner, Jacob H. Kauffman, and Jacob Westhaeffer. In 1844 the company secured a stable owned by Daniel Heitshue and fitted it up for an engine- and hose-house; but this was used only for a short time, and property then purchased on North Queen Street for the sum of $400.

In 1858 the company purchased a lot on North Queen Street from William McComsey for $900, and built thereon, according to the plans of John Sener, Jr., a handsome new engine and hose-house, at an expense of from $3500 to $4000. The building committee was composed of Martin Sheaffer, William Gornecht, G. Sener, H. M. White, and Conrad Gast. In 1866 the project of procuring a steam fire-engine was agitated, and a contract was made with Rainey & Neafie, of Philadelphia, for the construction of one. It was received Feb. 5, 1867, the Philadelphia Hose Company, No. 1, acting as escort, and arriving in Lancaster with the steamer on that day. This company, the Washington, and the Empire Hook and Ladder Company, headed by the City Cornet Band, formed a procession, and marched through the streets in jollification of the event. On Oct. 17, 1867, the company took part in the great firemen's festival and parade in Lancaster, ninety-three of its members appearing in the procession, under their marshal Dana Graham, and making a very handsome appearance. The Washington served a collation after the parade, to which the visiting companies were invited. The company maintained an active and useful existence up to 1881-82, when it was, like the others, superseded by the paid fire department. The city then bought of the Washington Company its engine-house, engine, and other apparatus.

Following are the principal officers of the Washington Fire Company from 1820 to 1880:

Presidents.—Jacob Albright, 1820-22; John Longnecker, 1822-30; Christian Bachman, 1831-43; Bonum Samson, 1843-50; Gottlieb Sener, 1850-53; Martin Schoffer, 1853-60; Dana Graham, 1860-68; John F. Hartman, 1868-80.

Vice-Presidents.—Philip Metzger, 1839-41; Bonum Samson, 1841-43; Gottlieb Sener, 1843-50; Jacob Zecher, 1850-52; Michael Yoger, 1850-53; Joseph Samson, 1853-57; Frederick Sener, 1857-58; Joseph Sampson, 1858-80.

Secretaries.—Christian Bachman, 1820-30; Michael Carpenter, 1831-43; Henry M. White, 1843-68; Charles F. Eberman, 1868-80.

Treasurers.—Henry Longnecker, 1820-38; Bonum Samson, 1838; Gottlieb Sener, 1838-43; Philip Metzger, 1843-58; Gottlieb Sener, 1858-77; J. Fred. Sener, 1877-80.

American Fire-Engine and Hose Company.—

A call for a meeting of those favorable to the formation of a new fire company was published in the Lancaster Journal, Dec. 19, 1834. Pursuant to this call a meeting was held at the house of John Michael, Jr., on the 27th of the same month, and the preliminaries for the organization of a company were arranged. At a subsequent meeting, on the 7th of January, 1835, the organization, under the above name, was effected by the adoption of a code of by-laws, and the election of George B. Kerfoot, president; Julius A. Keffer, secretary; and Washington L. Atlee, treasurer. The number of members at the organization was seventy-four. The first engineers chosen were Henry Markley, Martin Shreiner, and Philip Shreiner.

Contributions from the citizens, the insurance companies doing business in Lancaster, the Councils and the county commissioners were solicited for the company's outfit, and in response to these solicitations the commissioners appropriated one-half of the amount necessary for the purchase of an engine. Contributions were made by others, and on the 20th of February, 1836, an engine was purchased from Martin Shreiner for eleven hundred dollars, and the necessary hose and other fixtures were procured. The company was incorporated by a decree of the Supreme Court in June, 1836. In May, 1838, it was resolved to erect an engine-house on ground granted for that purpose from the vestry of the Lutheran congregation, and James Damant, John L. Benedict, Michael Hartley, Arthur Armstrong, William B. Reed, Martin Shreiner, William Frick, Jacob Sener, and Lancelot Fairer were appointed a building committee. The building was completed and first occupied in December, 1838. Its cost was $906.48.

In 1846 the Lutheran Church terminated the lease of the ground and the house was sold. During several years efforts were from time to time made for the purchase of a site and the erection of an engine-house, without success. A house was rented in 1850. During the same year a lot on Church Street, on which to erect an engine-house, was purchased.

Early in 1852 the company was reorganized by the adoption of a new constitution and by-laws, and the election of S. H. Price president; A. D. McGlim, vice-president; J. G. Kleiss, secretary; and H. Young, treasurer. In the early part of 1853 a new engine-house was completed, at a cost of about one thousand dollars.

In 1869 the company procured a steam fire-engine, for which five hundred dollars were contributed by the City Councils, and the balance was raised by the efforts of members of the company. The old engine that had done service so long and such apparatus and fixtures as were not suitable for use with their new engine were disposed of. The cost of the steamer was four thousand two hundred and fifty dollars, and it was received by the company on the 24th of August, 1869. It was resolved that additional ground in the rear of the engine-house be purchased and the building be extended to meet the necessity for more room to house the steamer.

On the 21st of March, 1882, the company leased its property to the city for the term of eighteen months, and stipulated that if within that time the city should elect to purchase it at two thousand five hundred dollars it should have that privilege. The agreement also provided for the selection from this company of such members as should be required for service with the steamer in the fire department, which the city then organized.

On the 1st of April, 1883, the city purchased the property in accordance with the terms of the contract, and at a meeting on the 2d of July, 1883, the company resolved to pay to each member of the company in good standing (ninety in number) the sum of eighteen dollars, for past services.

The presidents of the company have been: George B. Kerfoot, 1835; William Frick, 1837; George Musser, 1838; Martin Shreiner, 1841; M. Huber, 1845; Martin Shreiner, 1845; S. J. J. Reilly, 1849; S. H. Price, 1852; W. G. Evans, 1860; Jesse Landis, 1862; G. F. Breneman, 1863; Dr. G. F. Barker, 1865; E. C. Reigart, 1867; S. H. Price, 1869; Henry C. Demuth, 1872; S. F. Rathvon, 1874; J. K. Barr, 1876; S. H. Price, 1883.

The Humane Fire Company.—This company was incorporated by act of the Assembly bearing date March 13, 1839, and was limited by that act to forty members. Soon after the organization the company bought a hose-cart from a company in Philadelphia. They kept it for a time in a building on Water Street, then moved it to a lot which they rented on West King Street, between Charlotte and Concord Alley, and finally bought a lot on Manor Street, where they fitted up a hose-house in 1853. The minutes of this company prior to 1857 have been lost, and hence but little can be said concerning the most interesting period of its history. In May, 1857, this company purchased a fire-engine from the Union Company for three hundred dollars, and in June of that year effected a reorganization, with thirty-eight members, under the name of the "Humane Fire Company, No. 6, of Lancaster." The company began making improvements in their house, and in September, 1859, appointed a committee to call upon the citizens to aid them in purchasing a new fire-engine. The project appears not to have been successful, for we find that in the fall of 1865 another committee was appointed for a similar purpose. It was now proposed to secure a steamer, and on Jan. 2, 1867, a committee was appointed to visit Philadelphia and purchase one, which they did. The steamer arrived in Lancaster in the following summer. The company soon after this began to decline, though meetings were still held, and its life was only saved by a reorganization, which gave it new blood and a new impetus of life. The rehabilitated company took the name of the "Humane Steam Fire-Engine and Forcing Hose Company, No. 6," on Jan. 3, 1876, H. R. Fulton being elected president. A lot on West King Street was purchased in the fall of 1877 for $2100, and an engine-house, of which the corner-stone was laid Oct. 12, 1878, soon arose upon it, the old house and lot being sold to John Rutledge. The total cost of the new engine-house was $5290.76, and in January, 1883, after the retirement of the company from service, consequent upon the organization of the paid fire department, it was sold for $4750 to C. A. Bitmer.

The officers from 1856 have been as follows:

Presidents.—1857, D. M. Train; 1859, Gen. B. A. Schaeffer; 1866, Geo. W. Brubaker; 1870, B. C. Kready; 1875, Hugh R. Fulton; 1877, John Lorentz; 1883, A. F. Oblender.

Secretaries.—1857, Edward E. Snyder; 1861, C. H. Shufflebottom; 1868, Joseph W. Guire; 1870, C. H. Shufflebottom, William D. Lowrant, J. M. Wilhelm.

Shiffler Fire Company, No. 7.<sup>1</sup>—On a summer evening in the month of June, 1852, the boys who made the old dirt bank at the corner of Middle and Rockland Streets their play-ground conceived the idea of organizing themselves into a fire company. The thought crystallized into an organization. The membership was restricted to those who were between the ages of twelve and sixteen years. The boys called their company "The Shiffler," in honor of George Shiffler, a young blacksmith, who was the first person killed in the Catholic riots at Philadelphia, on the 6th of May, 1844. The first apparatus was a small carriage built by a negro named Smith, upon which the boys carried small hydrant-hose. An old barn at the foot of Thaddeus Stevens' house lot served as an engine-house. As winter approached their headquarters were transferred to the old Sun House, on Lime Street. Owing to the strong prejudice of the Catholic element of the city antagonizing their efforts, the name was changed to "Independent," and in a few weeks to "Fulton." The boisterous behavior of the boys at fires became notorious, and they were regarded in the eyes of the public as a nuisance, and the vigilance of the constabulary was often taxed to its utmost in restraining them from going to fires.

The boyish enthusiasm soon died out, and for over a year the hose-carriage—a good one which had been substituted for the first—stood neglected.

In the spring of 1854 several of the boys, then young men, had the carriage hauled out, put in order, reported to the city fire committee as ready for service, and drew their first annual appropriation. The membership was soon increased by the accession of a number of older men, and the name was changed to "Conestoga." The younger men, who had insisted upon taking up the old name of Shiffler, now withdrew. For a year the company led a very precarious life, changing from one place to another until June of 1855, when the young men came back into the organization. On September 14th the name of Shiffler was readopted.

The Hon. Thaddeus Stevens was now elected a member, and the following January was unanimously elected president of the company, a position which he filled with much pleasure until his death. Mr. Stevens presented the company with a lot of ground on Strawberry Street, near South Queen, and a substantial two-story brick house erected upon it was occupied on the 16th of May, 1856.

In November, 1859, the company purchased the hand-engine of the Howard Company of Baltimore for $500. During the war the company had some difficulty in maintaining its organization, one hundred and ten members being in the field. On Aug. 20, 1867, the company received its charter of incorporation. In 1868 they built their handsome edifice on South Queen Street below Andrew, at a cost of $5400. In 1871 they were the recipients of two splendid hose-carriages as gifts from the Shiffler, No. 32, and Spring Garden, No. 36, of Philadelphia, besides numerous trumpets, axes, and banners. In 1874 they had built for them by Cole Brothers, Pawtucket, R. I., a third class steam fire-engine at a cost of $3500. Upon the death of Mr. Stevens the Hon. O. J. Dickey, his successor in Congress, succeeded him as president of the company, and at his death he was succeeded by George M. Franklin, Esq., president of Select Council. When the ordinance creating the paid department was finally adopted and the new department inaugurated, the company was perfectly equipped, with no indebtedness, $800 in its treasury, and two hundred and twelve active members on its roll. The house was sold to J. G. Goodman, George Wall, and George M. Franklin, who resold it to the city in July of 1883. The engine was sold to the Ocean Grove Camp-Meeting Association of New Jersey.

On Jan. 16, 1883, the last meeting of the company was held, the funds distributed equally among its members, and, under the presidency of John Fritz, the Shiffler Fire Company peacefully passed out of existence. Through its years of adversity and prosperity its members never forgot the principles for which Shiffler died, and remembered well their motto, "We honor the memory of him whose name we bear."

Empire Hook-and-Ladder Company, No. 1.—On the 12th of June, 1856, a number of citizens assembled at the National House, and the meeting being called to order by Christian Widmyer, chairman, a preamble and resolutions were read in favor of forming a hook-and-ladder company. After the appointment of a committee to draw up a constitution and by-laws, and also to make inquiry in regard to the cost of apparatus, the meeting adjourned. On June 19th the same body of men were again assembled, and the constitution being adopted, they proceeded to the election of a president, which resulted in the choice of W. G. Hendrick. A committee was then appointed to solicit subscriptions for a hook-and-ladder outfit and to secure a proper house. The company having received a report recommending the purchase of the truck of the Empire Hook-and-Ladder Company of Philadelphia, ordered it bought for the sum of $450. This truck was procured and was placed temporarily in White's ten-pin alley, which was rented for the purpose, and subsequently it was housed in a building on South Duke Street, rented of S. B. Cox for three years. Charles M. Howell was elected president on Sept. 9, 1858, and has since retained that position. On Nov. 4, 1858, the company resolved to add to their apparatus a steam fire-engine, and a committee was appointed to obtain aid from the people for that object. The citizens, however, could not at that time be induced to subscribe liberally enough, and the project was abandoned. About this time there was an inclination to merge the company with some of the other organizations or disband it, but such measures were vigorously opposed by some of the members, and a healthy reaction followed, which soon put the Empire upon a solid foundation and led to prosperity. On May 14, 1860, a committee reported that a lot of ground on North Duke Street had been donated by the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. A building was erected upon this lot, and the hook-and-ladder truck removed to it on March 6, 1861. The company was incorporated in May, 1861, and its constitution and by-laws were materially altered in October, 1865. In June, 1866, a fair was held, from which was realized a clear profit of $2047.42. The old truck was then sold to a company in Altoona for $500, and a new one purchased for $1650. This was accompanied to the city, Dec. 17, 1866, by forty-five members of the Empire Hook-and-Ladder Company of Philadelphia, who were here given a grand reception. The meeting-room of the company, in the second story of the truck-house, was tastefully furnished in the winter and spring of 1867, and formally opened to the public on the 19th and 20th of June. The building was further perfected for the purpose it was to serve by the erection of a hose-tower in 1869. This company still remains in existence, but will doubtless soon disband.

The Paid Fire Department.—A radical change in the method of providing protection against fire was brought about in 1882, a paid city fire department being substituted for the volunteer fire companies. The old system had to some extent fallen into disrepute and become inefficient. The ordinance creating the new system was approved Dec. 21, 1881, and actual organization was commenced in February, 1882, by the appointment of Henry N. Howell as chief engineer. The engine-houses, engines, and hose-carts of the American and Washington Fire Companies were purchased, and also the engines of the Union and Sun Companies and the house of the Humane. The department was in working order in April, 1882, and has since then been constantly undergoing improvement.

Noteworthy Fires of Early and Recent Times.—The first fire of any consequence in Lancaster, and of which authentic information has been preserved in the records as well as tradition, was that which early in the month of June, 1784, destroyed the historic court-house on Centre (now Penn) Square. As this fire is mentioned elsewhere in this volume,<sup>1</sup> we will pass to the description of the second fire of note.

This occurred on the night of March 1, 1811, and has rarely been equaled in extent in the city. It burned from the spot where the Franklin House now stands down to Shober's corner, and back to what is now Market Street. The Lancaster Journal of March 8th gives the following account of the fire:

"About midnight on Friday last, March 1st, the citizens of this borough were alarmed by the cry of fire. It broke out in the back building of Mr. Philip Klein, on North Queen Street, and before the progress of the flames could be stopped four dwellings, a blacksmith-shop, a barn, and other buildings were burned:

"1. The two-story stone house at the northwest corner of Orange Street and North Queen, the property of Mr. Peter Shindle, with some personal property belonging to his son.

"2. The adjoining two-story brick house and printing-office of Mr. William Dickson (the old Lancaster Intelligencer), together with many books, a quantity of paper, part of his printing materials, and household furniture.

"3. The dwelling-house adjoining to Mr. Philip Klein, with a smith-shop, some working tools, a barn, a horse, and a cow.

"4. The tavern-house belonging to Mr. John Hatz, kept by Mr. George Koenig. Mr. Koenig lost his liquors in his cellar, many other articles, and several hundred dollars in cash.

"Mr. Frederick Klein, who had lately commenced business as a victualer, lost two horses, some hogs, and almost everything he possessed.

"Several others suffered by this most distressing calamity. We have not obtained a particular list.

"The sorry condition of some of the engines did no credit to the borough, nor was the spirit and activity of many of the citizens as we have seen it on former occasions. There was too many commanders, which, at least, produced confusion in obedience.

"The gentlemen of the Legislature generally exerted themselves with a zeal that did them honor, and greatly entitles them to the gratitude of the inhabitants of Lancaster.

"The alarm-office not having been given until the flames had made considerable progress, shows that there is something required from the police."

In the published history of the Union Fire Company, from which the greater part of this article is taken, we find that "among the most active firemen were Mr. William P. Atlee, father of Dr. John L. Atlee, Sr., and Col. Moser, who had long poles, and kept the ranks formed and in order. Col. Moser was particularly strict, even 'poling' the lookers-on into service, and making them help pass the buckets to and fro. The women also lent a helping hand, and rendered efficient service."

On the 18th of October, 1825, occurred the third great fire in the history of the city. It originated in the livery-stable of William C. Hull, at the corner of West King and Water Streets, and destroyed half a block of buildings before it could be subjugated. These buildings were owned by Mr. Hull, Jacob Frey, and Jacob Lindley. The old jail was in imminent danger, but was saved. The Journal, in a brief item on this fire, says, "Great and praiseworthy exertions were made by the citizens to arrest the progress of the flames, but, unfortunately, the scarcity of water much retarded their efforts. A number of gentlemen from Marietta, Maytown, Columbia, and from other parts of the county exerted themselves with a zeal which greatly entitles them to the gratitude of the inhabitants."

A distillery owned by George King was the next substantial food of the flames. The fire was in the evening of Oct. 22, 1832. The building, which was on the corner of Ann and Orange Streets, was quickly enveloped in the devouring element, and the hogsheads of spirits inside bursting, their contents made rivers of fire down the gutters.

In the evening of November 1st of the same year, Samuel R. Slaymaker & Co.'s stage barn, on the north-east corner of Duke and Chestnut Streets, caught fire and was totally destroyed. All of the sound horses were got out alive, but many of them were injured, and eleven disabled animals in what was called "the hospital" were burned to death.

What was called the Armstrong or Wentz fire occurred Jan. 14, 1836, and was the work of an incendiary. It broke out in Nauman's livery-stable, at the corner of East Orange and Christian Streets, and destroyed the building and an adjoining dwelling-house.

Another incendiary fire occurred on the morning of January 23d, in the stable belonging to James Evans. There having been two incendiary fires within a fortnight, the citizens held a meeting to take measures for the prevention of others, and appointed patrols.

Two fires in April, 1837, destroyed the stables of Mr. Logan and Dr. Peter Bier; and two others in the same year, respectively on December 3d and 27th, destroyed Diffenbach's stable and the stable of Miss Catharine Yeates. In connection with the former Demuth's snuff-factory, an establishment which had been in existence since 1770, was in imminent danger.

The first large fire after the erection of the water-works broke out in the evening of May 30, 1838, in Mrs. Hoff's stable, in the alley back of the Cooper House. Five stables were burned besides that in which the fire originated. At this fire the great value and utility of the water-works were demonstrated, much valuable property being saved in consequence of the good water supply.

On the night of June 20, 1838, two one-story frame houses belonging to John Martin were destroyed. They were occupied respectively by John Landis and a Mr. Rook. Landis and his wife were so completely bewildered that they neglected to carry their two children out, and they perished in the flames.

On Sunday, March 19, 1843, the Sunday-school building of St. James' Episcopal Church, on North Duke Street, was found to be in flames, and was completely destroyed. The morning was bitterly cold, there was from eighteen inches to two feet of snow on the ground, and four horses were needed to draw the engine to the scene of the fire.

Keiffer's foundry was burned on the evening of Feb. 17, 1858, the building being almost totally destroyed, and valuable machinery and patterns rendered worthless, entailing a loss of $40,000, upon which there was an insurance of only $13,000.

The effectiveness of the steam fire-engine was fully demonstrated by a fire which occurred on the night of June 16, 1866, in the engine-room of cotton-mill No. 2, on Prince Street. The great building was saved, and it was almost universally conceded that it would have been totally destroyed but for the steamer.

The Inquirer printing-office, then located in the rear of Maj. J. Rohrer's liquor-store, on Christian Street, was found to be on fire on the morning of Sunday, Jan. 20, 1867. It was an intensely cold night, the water froze in the hose, and all that the firemen could do was to save the adjoining buildings. The loss was about fourteen thousand dollars. On January 31st another alarm of fire startled the citizens, and it was found that St. Mary's Catholic Church, on West Vine Street, was in flames. The building was saved by the prompt arrival and energetic work of the firemen, but it required an outlay of twenty thousand dollars to restore the interior to its former condition.

On the night of Nov. 19, 1870, between ten and eleven o'clock, the Conestoga Cork-Works, in the alley in the rear of the Express building, on South Queen Street, caught fire, and the building and its contents were entirely consumed. Four firemen were quite seriously injured at this fire by the falling of a wall.

A fire was discovered in the tea-store of Hunter Brothers, East King Street, about midnight of Jan. 9, 1877. There had been a heavy snow, and much difficulty was experienced in getting the engines to the fire. The fire-plugs were frozen, and after they were thawed out and water secured it froze in the pipes. Owing to these disadvantages the flames made rapid headway, and three buildings were burned, the first occupied by Messrs. Hunter and Mr. H. H. Hessel, latter, the second by High & Stirk, china and glass-ware, and the third by Foose & Stirk, house-furnishing goods. The loss was about twenty thousand dollars, fully covered by insurance.

On the 5th of January, 1879, a fire which caused considerable damage occurred in the Diffenderfer building, on North Queen Street.

Old-Time Taverns and Later-Day Hotels.—The early-day taverns were the centres of even greater interest than the modern hotels. The newspaper and the telegraph in our day have relieved the traveler of the burden of news-bearing, and he is no longer besieged by the citizens of the places in which he tarries for food and rest and compelled to recite the latest happenings in the East or West, as he was a hundred years ago. This is one reason why there is to-day a less general interest in the public-houses than was felt three or four generations ago. But even among travelers themselves there is probably a less warm and friendly feeling for the luxurious hotels now open to them in every city and almost every village in the land than was once entertained for the humbler and simpler taverns. As travel has been made easier, respite from it has naturally enough come to be less desired and less appreciated. However, an interest will always attach to these places of sojourn for the "wayfarer and the stranger," and they will ever command a place in the pages of the antiquarian and the historian.

The first record we have of a tavern within the bounds of Lancaster City is the statement by Rupp that one was kept by Gibson as early as 1722, at the sign of "The Hickory-Tree." It was situated on the old road from Philadelphia to Wright's Ferry, which was on the original plot of the town, called, as it now is, King Street. The site was for many years occupied by Slaymaker's Hotel, later by Benjamin Champney's residence, and is now covered by the building in which is High & Martin's crockery-store.

At the session of the Court of Quarter Sessions of Lancaster County for August, 1729, nine persons were licensed to keep public-houses in the county. Gibson's name does not appear, and it is probable that he had by that time removed from the county. Otherwise, with the prestige of priority, he would have doubtless remained a candidate for the patronage of the public. Among the names of the nine men who received licenses only one, John Ffank, is recognized as that of a Lancaster village resident, and it is not now known in what part of town his tavern was located. Upon May 5th of the next year (1730) Samuel Bethel was licensed and became the third tavern-keeper at this point, and the second one legally authorized. His house, known as the "Cross-Keys," was a prominent one, and together with its proprietor demands more than mere mention in these pages. Bethel came to this region before the county was organized, and may have been engaged in trading with the Indians. He built and lived in a log house upon the King's Highway, which afterwards adjoined the property of Adam Simon Kuhn, on West King Street, when Lancaster was laid out. He kept tavern from the time of his license in 1730 until his death, in the spring of 1740. It was at his house the Blunstons, Wrights, and other Quakers stopped when passing that way or when attending court. He thus became acquainted with Sarah Blunston, whom he afterwards married. His tavern must have been especially favored by the court and county officers. He was evidently a man of high character and active, energetic business habits.

While Bethel kept the "Cross Keys," in March, 1738, an Indian outrage occurred there, which Samuel Blunston reported to the Provincial Council soon after. On a Sunday night two Indians, one of whom had a large unsheathed knife in his hand, came to the house and asked for rum. Bethel's wife (he being in bed), after some difficulty, persuaded them to go out, when she quickly fastened the door. The Indians then thrust a large board through the window, and the noise made by the crashing of the glass awaking two men, Daniel Southerland and John Judson, who were in the tavern, they went out to prevent their doing further mischief, whereupon the Indian who had the knife assaulted Southerland, stabbing him in the abdomen so severely that his bowels protruded from the wound. He then turned upon Judson and stabbed him in the breast, but not fatally. On the following day a party of men went from Lancaster after the offending Indians, and securing one of them, lodged him in jail to await the outcome of his crime. The men recovering, he was subsequently released.

After Bethel's death his widow married Peter Worrall, a prominent Quaker, who lived on Penn Square (now Centre Square). Worrall, after his marriage, sold his mansion on the square to Edward Smout, and removed to the "Cross-Keys," for which he took out a license in 1741 or the following year. He was a justice of the peace in 1746-48, and a member of the Legislature from 1747 to 1754, resigning his seat in the latter year because he was conscientiously opposed to levying a tax for the purpose of carrying on military operations. He left Lancaster about 1755. It is believed that after the Revolution Joseph Jeffries came from Columbia and kept this notable tavern until the year 1797. In October, 1797, it is known to have been kept by Christopher Brenner, and at that time a meeting was held there for the relief of sufferers by the yellow fever in Philadelphia. Brenner was succeeded in 1804 by Hugh Wilson, and he, in 1810, by Samuel J. Atlee. He was succeeded, in April, 1811, by John Neff, who soon gave place to Brenner, who was still the owner of the property. On the 19th of September, 1818, Michael Gundaker became proprietor. Ten years later the "Cross Keys" was kept by William Hambright, and in 1834 by Benjamin Witmer. After some other changes in landlords it came into the possession of the present proprietor, Mr. Smith.

In 1741, John Harris obtained a license and opened, on the lot which, in 1769, was bought by Adam Reigart at sheriff's sale, the tavern that has passed into history under the still enduring name and device of "The Grape." The tavern-site was shifted from the original to the adjoining lot, but it was as easy to transfer the name as to change the site, and so it is borne to-day by one of the Lancaster hotels. The original "Grape" occupied the site of Bowers & Hurst's store, on North Queen Street. The lot which Adam Reigart bought in 1769 had upon it one brick messuage and stables, and was bounded on the north by Conrad Schwartz's lot, and on the south by Michael Fordney's. As Reigart was licensed in 1765, he may have kept tavern here before he bought the house. He continued to keep "The Grape Hotel" until March 3, 1794. During the time of the Revolution this tavern became historic through several associations. The Committee of Observation of the county met there March 30, 1775. Charges were made on that occasion against several of the borough merchants that they had sold tea contrary to "the association of the Continental Congress," and they were notified to appear before the committee. The committee met at "The Grape" again on April 27, 1775, when the news was received that Gen. Gage had attacked the inhabitants of Massachusetts Bay, and the report that the Parliament of Great Britain had determined, by force of arms, to compel the colonies to submission was confirmed. Again, in May, the same body of men, of which Adam Reigart was a member, assembled at the tavern to deliberate upon the question of providing powder for the county. It is also a matter of history that "The Grape" was honored with the dignified presence of the Supreme Executive Committee in the momentous year 1775. John Michael, who superseded Reigart as "mine host" of this tavern in 1794, had previously kept a public-house in the borough. He was landlord until May 5, 1821, and in 1804, ten years after he took possession, put out the new sign "Conestoga Waggon," which, however, did not entirely supersede the use of the old name. The burgesses met at the house in 1805-6. John Michael, Jr., was the successor of his father, receiving the property by purchase. He kept the house until 1839, restoring the original name. The wrought-iron bunch of grapes now hanging in front of the hotel was made for, and used by, Adam Reigart. On March 29, 1839, John Michael, Jr., purchased the lot adjoining "The Grape" tavern on the north of the executors of William Kirkpatrick, and fitting up a building upon it suitable for a public-house, removed his tavern and the old familiar sign to it, and opened business on the site of the present hotel, which has been known ever since either by the old name or that of the Michael House.

"The Lancaster County House" dates back to 1754, and William Bausman is given on the assessment-roll of that year as its landlord. It is recited in a deed made by Michael Gross in January, 1757, that he sold a lot of ground on King Street, one hundred and twenty-eight by two hundred and fifty-two feet, to William Bausman, innholder. This same tavern-keeper was a prominent and popular man in the community. He was elected an assistant burgess in 1760 and several subsequent years, and was chief burgess in 1765. In 1775 he was a member of the Committee of Observation, and in 1777 he was appointed barracks-master at Lancaster, and had in charge about five hundred men. The tavern which he kept was a small house built by him where the Lancaster County House now stands, and he remained its landlord until his death early in 1784, when he devised the property to his sons, William and John, the latter of whom kept the house until about 1814, when he removed to Maryland. The burgesses met at his house many times from 1803 to 1813. He sold to James Buchanan, the deed conveying "a three-story brick house which stood on the lot whereon was formerly a wooden tenement." Buchanan rented the property for tavern purposes, and it was subsequently carried on under many landlords, among whom were Jacob Rathoon, Sharp, Levi Swobe, David Esbenshade, Benjamin Laut, Daniel Swobe, Sechtel, — Sharp, and — Smith, the present landlord. It is related that during the campaign of 1840, while Levi Swobe was landlord, this house was the Whig headquarters, and was called Fort Meigs. At one time during the election excitement the Democrats formed a procession near Middle Street, marched down King Street, and on reaching Fort Meigs a shower of stones was hurled at the house, the action probably being induced by some taunt, and nearly every pane of glass in the front was broken. The proprietor would not repair the damage until after the election, when Fort Meigs rejoiced in the victory of Harrison.

The hotel to-day known as Shober's, on the corner of Orange and Queen Streets, was built in the year 1757 by, as the stone in the front informs us, "Johan Greff Catharina, Mar Greffin." It was kept as a tavern from a very early date. It was kept in 1830 by George Danner, in 1839 by Philip Reitzel, in 1848 by Emanuel von Causman. In 1850 it was purchased and later improved by Emanuel Shober.

"The Fountain Inn," which was one of the notable early taverns, has existed since about the middle of the last century. The lot on which the inn or hotel stands is one of three purchased by Ulleric (or Ulrich) Reigart from Henry Steiger. These lots were granted to Steiger by William Hamilton, Aug. 15, 1740, and he sold two of them to Reigart, Dec. 23, 1742, and the remaining one June 4, 1767. Reigart had two sons and one daughter,—Christopher, Adam, and Susannah,—all of whom were tavern-keepers. Christopher opened the Fountain Inn in 1758, kept it through the trying times of the Revolution and until his death in 1783, and his wife, Susannah (who married Thomas Edwards), then conducted the tavern until her death in 1805. During the last years of Reigart's control of the house, and the first in which his widow kept it, the court-house was in process of construction on Penn Square, and the court met in the Fountain Inn several terms. Bills were presented to the county treasurer for the use of the house for the November session, 1781; June and October, 1782; May, 1783 and 1784; and for the use by the Supreme Court in 1785. Upon Mrs. Edwards' death the tavern became the property of her son, Henry Reigart, who, on March 26, 1806, advertised that he "had opened a house of entertainment on South Queen Street, at the sign of the Fountain Inn, the house formerly kept by Susannah Edwards;" and he also announced that he would continue there to work at his trade (coppersmithing). He kept the tavern until April 1, 1811, when he sold out to John Whitesides, "formerly of 'The Lion,'" who died in 1830. In July, 1811, a theatre was advertised at "Mr. Whiteside's Fountain Inn," of which one of the old bills is now hanging in the hotel. It announces the "Last night but two. Mrs. Jeffries' Benefit, Saturday evening, July 27, 1811, Tale of Mystery, accompanied with music! The Festival Dance! A farce in one act, called 'Sylvester Daggerwood; or, the Mad Actor!' to which will be added a comedy, 'The Weathercock!' Tickets, Box 50 cts., Gallery 25 cts. To be had at the bar of Mr. Whitesides." After Whitesides' death Robert King became landlord. The succession of proprietors since his time have been Jacob Hoover, Christian Shank, William Wright, Frank Eckert, Samuel Fagan, and George Hastings, the present proprietor.

"The Swan" was one of the most prominent and popular of the early taverns. The lot on which the house was located was known on the original map as No. 128, situated on Queen Street, bounded north by Penn (Centre) Square. It was granted by James Hamilton to Henry Bostler in 1736, and sold by him to Jacob Slough, March 6, 1747. Henry Bostler was licensed to sell beer in 1741, but it is not certain that he dispensed it here, as he owned several other lots in town. Matthias Slough is found mentioned in the various records as keeping the Swan as early as 1761. On the 23d of June of that year the burgesses of the borough met there. In a letter from Edward Shippen, Esq., to the Governor, dated Dec. 27, 1763, he says that "between two and three o'clock this afternoon upwards of a hundred armed men from the westward rode very fast into town, turned their horses into Mr. Slough's (an innkeeper's yard), and proceeded with the greatest precipitation to the work-house, where they stove open the door and killed all the Indians." . . . This body of men were known as the "Paxton Boys." Matthias Slough was a member of the Committee of Observation of the borough of Lancaster in 1774, and a member of the Legislature from 1774 to 1783. He was coroner from 1755 to 1768 inclusive. He continued in the tavern, under the sign of the "White Swan," until 1806, when advancing years led him to retire from active duty, and his son Jacob, who had been keeping tavern in Columbia, and on October 24th took charge of the "Swan." Matthias Slough died in Harrisburg, Sept. 12, 1812, in his seventy-ninth year, having been for sixty years a resident of Lancaster. His son continued to "speed the parting, and cheer the coming, guest" until 1824, when he gave place to John Stehman. Edward Parker became landlord in 1828, and kept the house under the name of "The Golden Swan." After Parker the house was successively under charge of Rosina Hubley, Edward S. Hubley, Henry Kendig, Henry S. Shank, Hiram Kendig, who kept it during the war, and closed in 1865, and J. M. Johnston, who was landlord until 1869. At this time the building began to be occupied by the Inland Insurance Company and other institutions, and private individuals for office purposes, and lost its distinctive character as an hostelry. The office of the New Era now occupies the upper part of the building fronting on Queen Street and the Square. A newspaper contributor says that "the 'Swan' was noted, as far back as Revolutionary times, for its good fare and genial hosts, among whom were Slough, Parker, Stehman, and others. It was the house that before the era of railroads attracted wealthy and influential travelers, who journeyed in their own conveyances from the east and south to arrive over the macadamized road leading to Philadelphia. If a modern hotel register had been kept, the guests of the 'Swan' would be found to have comprised many historical names, especially when the Continental Congress halted in the old town in its flight from Philadelphia at the time of its capture by the British army. Among the frequent guests of the house were the distinguished jurists John B. Gibson, William Tilghman, Moulton C. Rogers, Thomas Duncan, and Charles Huston, all members of the Supreme Court."

In the year 1765 we find that no less than fifty-three persons were licensed to keep tavern in the borough, which had been incorporated only twenty-three years before, and quite a number in addition had obtained the permission of the court to "sell rum by the small." The names of several at that time licensed were long perpetuated and made familiar by tavern-keeping by themselves and their sons. Among them were Michael Hubley, Matthias

Slough, William Montgomery, John Messenkop, Lodowyck Stone, Frederick Stone, Adam Reigart, Michael Diffenderfer, and Catharine Eichholtz.

In 1765, Michael Diffenderfer, a tavern-keeper in Manor township, came to Lancaster and purchased, October 1st of that year, a lot of ground on the north side of King Street and east side of Duke Street. He was licensed the same year, and so "The Leopard," which still exists, had its origin. Diffenderfer kept the tavern until his death, in 1788. His son David, who was in the colonial army, was taken prisoner at the battle of Monmouth in 1777, and removed to New York. A Mr. Miller, a Hessian and commissary in the English army, was in this part of the country, and lodging at the house of Mr. Diffenderfer, became interested in the old landlord and the fortune of his son. He promised to assist him on his return to New York, and when he departed, Diffenderfer sent by him to David four Johannes, which reached him in course of time, much to his satisfaction. After the death of Michael Diffenderfer the tavern was kept by Philip Diffenderfer, to whom the property was deeded by the heirs Aug. 24, 1795. He sold to Jacob Duchman, June 29, 1805, who kept long after 1813, and was finally succeeded by his son John. Among the other landlords were Gen. Witner, Lewis, John, and Solomon Sprecher, George Sencnig, Thomas Rowe, Jacob S. Smith, and Samuel Martin, the present proprietor.

"The Black Horse" was a famous old-time "place of feast for man and beast," which only passed out of existence in 1883, in obedience to the demand for progress and improvement, its site on North Queen Street being needed for other purposes. While the workmen were engaged in tearing the old building down, they found in the wall at the southeast corner, considerably below the grade of the street, a red sandstone measuring about twelve by eighteen inches, on which were cut the figures "1717." Some people conjectured that the old tavern was erected at that time, but it was not quite so ancient. The stone had undoubtedly done service in another and earlier erected building, perhaps one which stood upon the site of "The Black Horse," and when this tavern was erected the stone was transferred to its walls. The records show that James Hamilton, proprietor, conveyed Lot 169, on the west side of North Queen Street, to Henry Bostler, on the 24th of November, 1736; that he conveyed it in 1742 to Conrad Schwartz, who, after retaining it until 1747, sold it, with the dwelling-house upon it, to Lodowyck Stone. On the 14th of October, 1759, Stone, by his attorney, Frederick Stone, conveyed the northern half of the lot, with appurtenances, to Michael Zeigler. Lodowyck Stone is mentioned as an innkeeper from 1765 until his death, in 1782, but it does not appear that he kept upon this part of the lot. Zeigler sold to Christian Wertz June 13, 1764; Wertz to Lawrence Herbert Nov. 22, 1777; he to Frederick Frick in 1778, and Frick to Adam Weaver on March 23, 1779, by whom the house was opened as a tavern, and so kept by him until his death, May 13, 1810, when the property came into possession of his son, George, who, in April, 1814, sold to John Bachman, who kept the house for twenty years. In 1839, Christian Bachman, administrator of John Bachman, conveyed it to Abraham Ditlow, since whose time have come in succession Henry Erb, Abraham Hostetter, John Shaeffer, Abraham W. Russell, Jesse Lutz, and A. C. Keppler. A fine three-story building is to occupy the site of the old "Black Horse," the lower story of which will be the post-office.

"The Bull," known later as "The Bull's Head," had its origin as early as 1765, when Catharine Eichholtz was licensed to keep tavern and opened one on East King Street, where now the Exchange Hotel stands. The license was for several years in her name, but in 1771 her son, Leonard Eichholtz, became landlord. On the 24th of June, 1795, lodge No. 43, I. O. of A. M., held the festival of St. John at this house, in which their lodge-room was located for several years. Eichholtz kept the tavern until his death, in 1817, and his son Leonard then became "mine host," and remained in that position until his demise, in 1828, after which his widow Charlotte kept it for a time, being succeeded by her son Henry in 1834. One Rohrer kept it then as the "Jefferson House," and was succeeded by Christian Shertz. In 1850 the building was torn down, and the Exchange Hotel was erected.

Michael Hubley was licensed in 1765, and in 1769 purchased a half lot of land on East King Street of Jacob Eichholtz, and the year previous bought a lot on Queen Street; where he kept a tavern is not known. In 1784-86 a tavern was kept by Frederick Hubley, and the courts were held in his house during those three years.

In 1765, John Messenkop was licensed as a tavern-keeper. In 1796, Adam Messenkop advertised that he had opened a public-house in the building previously occupied by Jacob Wilhelm, deceased, at the sign of "The Unicorn," below Mrs. Edwards' and next door to Jacob Graeff's. Mrs. Edwards at that time kept the "Fountain Inn." The next year Messenkop moved from "The Unicorn" to the sign of "The Sorrel Horse," on King Street, in the house belonging to George Moore. He died in 1802, and was succeeded by his son John. This tavern was kept by Dr. George Moore as early as 1775. On the 1st of March, 1796, he advertised to let the tavern, and it was doubtless in answer to that advertisement that Messenkop took the house.

The "Indian Queen" was as noted and nearly as old a tavern as the "Black Horse," and, like that hostelry, it has in this year (1883) been demolished, that an establishment of a different character may take its place. The "Indian Queen," which stood on the south side of East King Street, just above Church, gives way to the erection of a huge market-house, rendered necessary by the growth of the city. It appears that the lot of ground on which this tavern stood was purchased from James Hamilton by Adam Simon Kuhn on the 1st of September, 1760. The stone building was probably erected by Mr. Kuhn, and occupied by him as a residence, as the records show that Simon Kuhn, et al., sold the property, including the "messuage," to Michael Lightner, Nov. 10, 1778. The records of the court show that Michael Lightner was a licensed tavern-keeper in 1777. He probably occupied the premises as a tenant, and bought the property the year following. On the 3d of January, 1785, the property was purchased from Michael Lightner by Gottlieb Eberman, watchmaker. At the time the deed was made Lightner's wife was absent, whereupon Michael and John Lightner bound themselves in the sum of four hundred dollars to protect the purchaser and to secure the wife's signature within six months. During Gottlieb Eberman's ownership the property fell into the hands of the sheriff, John Miller, who sold it at sheriff's sale to Michael Bartgis, giving him a deed for it dated Sept. 4, 1787. Bartgis was an old tavern-keeper, and we find that he owned property on South Queen Street, near Centre Square, where he kept tavern as early as 1773, and for many years afterwards. On purchasing the "Indian Queen" he removed thither and kept the place as a tavern until the time of his death. His wife, Catherine, succeeded him and kept the place until 1798. On the 17th of March of that year she offered for sale "that noted tavern and the other large stone house adjoining, situated in King Street, at the corner of Middle Street, or the beginning of Adamstown." John Wein was the purchaser, and the property remained in the possession of his family until Dec. 15, 1834, when his administrators, George Musser et al., sold it to George Mussor, who, on the 27th of the same month, deeded it to Dr. Samuel Humes. Dr. Humes owned the property at the time of his death, which, we believe, occurred in 1851. His executor, Dr. Carpenter, sold the property to Dr. John Levergood, and executed him a deed for it on the 1st of April, 1864. On the 18th of October, 1865, Dr. Carpenter purchased the property from Dr. Levergood, and it remained in his possession until a few weeks ago, when it was sold to the Eastern Market Company. The "Indian Queen," probably built by Adam Simon Kuhn shortly after he purchased the lot from Hamilton, in 1760, was a substantial stone structure two stories high, exclusive of a good basement and a finished attic. There is a tradition that during a visit made by Gen. Washington to Lancaster long before he was President of the United States he stopped at the "Indian Queen."

The old stone house now standing on Prince Street, near James, was in the days of the Revolution kept as a tavern by the name of "The Cat." At this tavern Gen. Hazen and the troops who were guarding the prisoners were quartered.

The house now known as the "Manor Hotel," kept by Frank Fritsch, was built by Jacob Stoffts in 1778. In 1798, Jacob Gross advertised that he had opened tavern in the house of his late step-father, Jacob Stoffts. The building was burned down in 1825, and replaced by the present one.

Gottlieb Nauman was licensed in 1780, and kept tavern in what was then Adamstown, now a part of the city.

Francis Hager was licensed to keep tavern in 1781, and Christopher Hager soon afterwards. The latter opened a tavern at the sign of "The Buck," on East King Street, where the Lancaster National Bank now stands, and entertained travelers and citizens there until 1808, when he rented the property to Daniel Herr. The use of the building for tavern purposes was discontinued in 1816. A few years later he began keeping store two doors east of the Cooper House, where his grandsons are now engaged in business.

"The Sign of the Ship" was opened on East King, in 1784, by Maj. John B. Light, who came here a year or so before, bearing the honor of having acquitted himself gallantly in several battles of the Revolution. He kept "The Ship" until July 20, 1803, when he was succeeded by his son-in-law, William P. Atlee. Later the house was kept by Barton Henderson, and in April, 1823, Stephen St. John became the landlord. The name was changed to "The Anchor." This old hostelry was located on the northwest corner of East King and Lime Streets, and the property is now owned by one of Maj. Light's descendants, Dr. John L. Atlee.

In April, 1793, William Geer kept tavern on the northwest corner of Market Square, or Centre Square, in a two-story brick house, and continued as landlord until about 1800. He was interested with Matthias Slough in a line of stages.

Daniel Witmer kept tavern on West King Street prior to September, 1796, as in that year he removed to Conestoga Bridge, where he managed the house of his brother Abraham. In 1806 he returned to the borough and opened the tavern at the sign of "The Golden Fleece," on West King Street, lately owned by Joseph Jeffries. In 1818 he rented "The Golden Swan" (now "The Lancaster County House"), and in 1816 the "Lancaster Hotel," at the corner of Queen and Orange Streets.

"The King of Prussia" tavern had been in existence some time prior to 1796, but the earliest authentic record we have of it was in that year, when George Fisher informed his friends by advertisement that he had become landlord there. The building was a large three-story brick. It was kept by Henry Shepler in 1800. Fisher kept tavern at various times and places, and in 1808 removed to Harrisburg, where he kept the "Black Bear."

William Ferree was a stage proprietor, and in 1797 kept tavern on East King Street, at the sign of "Gen. Washington," which was in existence many years.

Numerous as are the taverns of which we have already given sketches, they were by no means all that existed in the borough. We have, as a rule, selected only the most prominent ones and those which had peculiar historic interest. We now give a complete list of those persons licensed to keep tavern in Lancaster during 1799:

The total number of persons licensed was forty-two, but, as will be seen, in three instances two men had licenses during the year for the same tavern, one perhaps receiving it in February, and then selling or renting to another man, who obtained a new license in August. The whole number of taverns is thus shown to have been thirty-nine, or fourteen less than in 1765. While the taverns were fewer than they were thirty-four years previous, it is probable that they offered much more extended accommodations.

In August, 1799, John Hatz, whose name appears in the foregoing, kept tavern opposite John Michael's inn, at the sign of "The Pennsylvania State Arms." John Whitesides succeeded him, and in 1805 gave place to Gustavus Stoy. In 1809, Thomas Wentz assumed charge, and remained until 1813. In 1801, Mr. Hatz kept tavern on the site of the present Franklin House, at the sign of "Dr. Franklin." The building was destroyed by fire in 1811, and the present one erected in 1813. Thomas Wentz rented it for some time, since which the landlords have been John Hatz, Nathan Schofield, Jacob Sener, Emanuel Van Kaufman, Reuben Weidler, Benjamin Kaufman, and George Schlott, the present proprietor.

"The Bear" was the sign of another tavern of 1799, kept on King Street, east of the court-house.

In 1800, John Wentz kept tavern at the sign of "The Rainbow," in Adamstown, now included in the city of Lancaster, and in May of that year removed to the house of Gerhard Bubach, on North Queen Street, where he had the same sign. His wife, Susannah, continued business at the old "Rainbow," and was succeeded by her son Christopher.

Henry Slaymaker was keeping a tavern on the north side of East King Street, two doors from Penn Square, in 1800. His sign was the State arms. Samuel Slaymaker was landlord in 1815, and also in 1825, when Lafayette was entertained there. In 1828 it was kept by John Graeff, and later by one Parker, who was its last landlord, the tavern being closed and the building converted to other uses.

Jacob Frey kept tavern prior to 1800 at the sign of "The Wagon," on East King Street, and was succeeded in 1804 by Ulrich Danner, whose descendants still own the ground on which the house stood, now occupied by Steinman's hardware-store.

"Willow Grove Tavern" was kept in 1800 by Samuel Boyd.

"The Bird-in-Hand" was kept on East King Street in 1801, and in 1802 kept the sign of "The Harp," while in 1803 "The Flying Angel" was a prominent sign. Angels and harps would seem to indicate that at this period the tavern-keepers were turning their thoughts from earthly to heavenly things.

John Whitesides, in April, 1803, advertised that he had opened a tavern in the borough of Lancaster, on Queen Street, a few doors north of the State-House, at the sign of "The Lion," and in April, 1811, he opened a tavern on West King Street, next door to the market-house.

In the naming of the early taverns Mad Anthony Wayne was not forgotten, for we find that John Miller kept a good tavern on the west side of Queen Street, between King and Orange, over which was the sign "Gen. Wayne." John Riddle was the proprietor of this house in 1804, just ten years after the victory which added the last laurels to the general's fame.

In 1806 "The Indian King" was in quite flourishing condition on South Queen Street.

A tavern, with the decidedly agricultural title "The Plough and Wheat-Sheaf," was opened in 1807, two doors north of "The Black Horse," then kept by Adam Weaver.

In 1808, or before, down to 1838, Henry Dissenbaugh kept "The William Pitt" or "Earl of Chat-ham," the sign of which was a portrait of the earl painted by Jacob Eichholtz. At this house was held the first anti-Masonic meeting in Lancaster.

Christian Rohrer was an innkeeper before the year 1808, on the site of the present Rohrer House. He kept hotel in 1833. William C. Hull, for many years prior to 1834, had kept a stage-office, and in that year opened a public-house at the sign of "The Globe," northwest corner of North Queen Street, at the intersection of the Philadelphia and Columbia Railroad. He advertised a comfortable railroad-car to run from Lancaster twice a day, but still continued to operate his stage line.

When the first "Lamb" was kept is not known; but that there was such a tavern prior to 1810 is certain, for in March of that year Hugh Wilson advertised that he had purchased the house formerly occupied by Daniel Witmer, sign of "The Lamb," and had erected "large and commodious buildings for the accommodation of travelers." He was succeeded in 1820 by William Hambright, who in 1828 removed to the "Cross-Keys," giving place to John Stehman. In 1834 this house was known as the "Golden Lamb." There was another "Lamb" tavern in 1823 on South Queen Street.

On Oct. 6, 1788, John Michael advertised in the Lancaster Newspaper and Reporter, a paper published in German in this borough, that he has opened a tavern at the sign of "Prince Ferdinand," in King Street, not far from the jail. This tavern-stand was kept before this time by John Feldman, and stood on the present site of the Cooper House.

"The Cooper House" was built in 1812, and in May, 1813, William Cooper, who had been licensed as early as 1808, advertised that he had "removed to his large and commodious new building on West King Street, where he has commenced tavern-keeping at the sign of the "Red Lion." He kept the house until his death, when his son Frederick became the landlord, who was followed by William J. Cooper. The house is still owned by the family. Since the house was kept by a representative of the third generation of the Coopers, it has had as landlords A. Heistand and C. D. Tripple, and the present genial hosts Weise & Smith, who took possession in February, 1883. In 1830 the large ball-room of this hotel was fitted up for a theatre, and opened May 18th by Mr. J. Jefferson with the "favorite comedy of the 'Birthday,'" the performance concluding with "the favorite operatic farce called 'Turn Out.'"

The Western Hotel was opened at the sign of "The Wagon," corner of West Orange and Water Streets, in June, 1814, by John Landis. It was formerly owned by Dr. Rieger, and was kept later by Nathan C. Scofield, and in 1828 by Christopher Brenner.

The hotel now known as "The Swan," at the corner of South Queen and Vine Streets, was erected by Dr. Clarkson Freeman about 1824, and opened as a tavern April 9th of that year by Archibald D. Warren as the Lancaster City or County Hotel. He was succeeded by Leonard Eichholtz, Jr., whose father kept "The Bull's Head." Others who conducted the tavern were George Bechel, Joseph Hubley, and his widow, Rosina Hubley.

At the east end of King Street was an old tavern-stand known as the "Olympic Garden," subsequently changed to the Union Hotel, which was owned by Henry Kesser in 1828, and kept in 1830 by Thomas Logan under the sign of "The White Horse."

A tavern was kept at an early day at the sign of the "Compass," and in 1830 conducted by one Eberman. A circle of flying-horses in the back-yard formed a strong attraction to the young people from the country.

"The General Washington Hotel" was kept in 1834 by David Miller. It was on East King Street, adjoining the Farmers' Bank. During the same year the North American Hotel, now known as the Hiester House, was opened by Joseph Howitt, and has ever since been kept as a hotel.

An old wagon stand, known as the "Pittsburgh Wagon," was situated on East King Street in 1834, and kept at that time by John Fisher.

"The Botanic Garden" was kept in 1837, but more as a place of resort than a regular tavern. It was located on the corner of Prince and James Streets. In the summer of the year mentioned the proprietor, J. Frederick Heckler, advertised as attractions summer-houses, flowers, ornamented grounds, and a band of music from Philadelphia.

The most recently-built and the largest of the Lancaster hotels is the Stevens House. A stock company, of which Francis Shroder was president and J. B. Martin secretary, was organized in the spring of 1873, with a capital of seventy-one thousand dollars, which was deemed a sufficient sum for the enterprise of building a first-class hotel, though it was afterwards found inadequate and increased. The Krugh property on the southwest corner of West King and Prince Streets was purchased at a cost of twenty-five thousand dollars, and the erection of the building immediately commenced. It was finished at a cost of one hundred and forty thousand dollars, and opened on the 1st of October, 1874. W. H. Wilson & Sons were the first landlords, and conducted the house until Dec. 1, 1879, when the present landlord, Abraham Heistand, assumed charge.

Stage Lines.—The first mention of stages in Lancaster is found in the journal of Governor Pownall, of New Jersey, who passed through here in 1754. He says "it is a stage town." It is evident from this statement that stage lines were established at or before this date. The first mention of the establishment of a stage line from Lancaster to Philadelphia is an advertisement of Frederick Shaeffer in 1784. The Philadelphia and Lancaster turnpike was commenced in 1792, and completed in 1796. In 1793 a stage line, called the Philadelphia, Lancaster, Middletown, Harrisburg, Carlisle, and Shippensburg line, was organized and commenced running from Lancaster to Philadelphia. In 1796, the turnpike having been completed and much encouragement extended to the company, their facilities were much increased, and a stage started from Lancaster for Philadelphia Monday, Wednesday, and Friday, returning Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday. The managers at this date were Matthias Slough, John Dunwood, and Hunt Downing.

At this same date Matthias Slough and William Geer advertised that they had extended a stage line from Lancaster to Shippensburg through Middletown, Harrisburg, and Carlisle, and from and after the commencement of the running of the stages from Lancaster to Philadelphia in a day, they would run the stages on this line twice a week.

John Reily advertised April 15, 1796, that "a four-horse stage will start from Mr. Edward's (Fountain Inn), in Lancaster, every Monday at five o'clock A.M., and run by way of Strasburg and Westchester, arrive in Philadelphia the next day about the hour of one o'clock P.M. Start from George Weeds, Philadelphia, on every Thursday morning at 6 o'clock, and arrive at Lancaster on Friday." The fare for passengers was $3.00, with an allowance of fourteen pounds baggage. Baggage to the amount of one hundred and fifty pounds was the same rate as for a passenger. This line was known as that of the "Westchester, Strasburg and Lancaster Stage."

The firm of Slough & Geer dissolved in January, 1797, Slough retiring. Geer united with Reily, Weed & Witmer, who owned another line. In July, 1797, William Geer advertised fares as follows: Lancaster to Harrisburg, $2.00; Harrisburg to Carlisle, $1.00; Carlisle to Shippensburg, $1.00.

In September, 1797, William McClellan and Samuel Spingler opened the "Lancaster, York and Baltimore Stage Line." The trip was to be made in two days, and was to start from the house of William Ferreo, in Lancaster, on Monday. Fare for way-passengers five and a half cents per mile.

On the 7th of May, 1800, William Scott, as proprietor, advertised the Lancaster and Fredericktown stages.

On the 16th of September, 1801, Michael Knatcher advertised "that his mother, Barbara Knatcher, has erected a stage which is to be conducted by him, and will start from the Public House of Daniel Glein, sign of the 'King of Prussia,' Harrisburg, on every Monday and Friday morning, breakfast at Mr. Crobbs, in Middletown, dine at Mr. Cochran's, Big Chikis, and arrive at Mr. Bausman's [now, 1883, Lancaster County House], in Lancaster, on the same day."

About the same time the stage "Good Intent" was running daily from Philadelphia to Lancaster. Robert Erwin, Amos and Henry Slaymaker, and John Tomlinson were proprietors.

In June, 1800, Henry Shepler announced that he "has erected a stage to run from Harrisburg to Lancaster, by way of Middletown and Elizabethtown, twice a week," starting from his house, at the sign of the "King of Prussia," in Lancaster.

David Barnum & Co. advertised in April, 1809, that they had completed arrangements for a new line of stages, to commence running the 1st of May, from Lancaster to Philadelphia, through Strasburg and West Chester. Stages were to start the first time from the house of John Bausman, sign of the "Golden Swan" (now, 1883, Lancaster County House), Lancaster, Monday morning, May 1st, at five o'clock, and arrive at David Barnum's "Shakespeare Hotel," corner of Sixth and Chestnut Streets, Philadelphia, the same afternoon. This firm dissolved partnership Jan. 12, 1810, and the business was discontinued.

A new line of stages was placed on the road from Wilmington to Lancaster in 1817. Stages commenced running May 19th in that year, making the trip one way in a day. The stage-office in Lancaster was at the house of John Welch. The office of this company in August, 1828, was at "Slaymaker's Hotel."

A line of stages was established by William Hull in July, 1826, between Lancaster and Reading. The office in this city was at John Michael's tavern. About the same time a line was started from Philadelphia to Lancaster, by way of New Holland, Churchtown, Morgantown, Yellow Springs, Kimbertown, and Valley Forge. The office was at Jacob Duchman's tavern, and Sept. 30, 1828, was removed to the "Red Lion," William Cooper's.

The Baltimore Steamboat Line and Lancaster and Port Deposit Mail Stage commenced running regularly March 8, 1828, leaving the "Red Lion" at Lancaster every Saturday morning at seven o'clock. William C. Hull was the proprietor, and kept a stage-office for many years after. In 1834 he opened a public-house, sign of the "Globe," in connection with his office at the northeast corner of North Queen Street and Chestnut. He continued his stages, and had charge also of passenger cars from Lancaster to Columbia on the Pennsylvania Railroad. This was discontinued when the railroad was completed its entire length.

The stage-office at Slaymaker's Hotel on East King Street was continued several years after this line, and was kept in a part of the hotel on the site of the grocery-store of Mr. Bursk. Railroads superseded stages. They had their day and gait.

Post-Office and Postmasters.—It is not known definitely at what time the post-office was established at Lancaster, or who were the postmasters prior to 1796. On the 20th of August, in that year, Henry Willcocks, one of the editors of the Lancaster Journal, advertised a list of letters remaining in the office. Lists of letters from a column to a column and a half in length were advertised in 1795 and 1796. On the 11th of August, 1796, the proprietor of the stage-lines from Lancaster to Philadelphia advertised they had made arrangements to carry the mails, and after the 14th of August would deliver the Philadelphia mail at the post-office in this city (Lancaster) Tuesday, Thursday, and Saturday evenings, and take mails to Philadelphia Monday, Wednesday, and Friday mornings. Also mails to and from Fort Pitt (Pittsburgh), Yorktown, Carlisle, and Shippensburg.

On the 26th of August, 1796, William Hamilton, also an editor of the Lancaster Journal, advertised mail notice. On the 23d of September in that year Mr. Hamilton signed as postmaster. Prior to this time they were deputies under the Postmaster-General. On the 2d of September, 1796, it was advertised that the post-office and the printing-office of the Lancaster Journal would be removed to the building directly opposite Mr. Stoft's new houses (now, 1883, known as the "Manor House," on West King Street). The office was one door below the "King of Prussia" tavern.

In 1797, Matthias Slough, who kept the Swan Hotel, where the New Era office now stands, appears as "D.P.M.;" May 19, 1798, Dr. George Moore as postmaster advertised a list of letters. At that time he kept a drug-store just above John Michael's tavern, which at that time was where Bowers & Hurst's store and Shreiner's jewelry-store now stand. The office was kept by him until his death, which occurred April 20, 1809. He was succeeded by his widow, who kept a store. After his death the office was removed to the house of Christopher Mayer, Esq., northeast corner of Centre Square. April 3, 1813, it was removed to the house next door east of Mr. Dissenbaugh's tavern. It was again removed, July 31, 1827, to the house next door east of William Hambricht's tavern, on West King Street, and again, April 1, 1828, was moved to the "house lately occupied by William Frazer, Esq." Mrs. Moore resigned the office of postmistress in April, 1829. She was succeeded by Mrs. Mary Dickson (the widow of William Dickson), by whom the post-office was removed to the Lancaster Intelligencer book-store about April 21, 1829, where it was kept till her death.

The Postmaster-General, William T. Barry, passed through this city Oct. 17, 1831, and took lodgings at Groeff's Hotel, where now stands High & Martin's crockery-store. An invitation was extended to him by the mayor and citizens to partake of a public dinner. His time did not permit of its acceptance, but he was called upon by many of the citizens. Mrs. Dickson was succeeded by George W. Hammersly; the office under his administration was where the harness and trunk-shop of Mr. Haberbush now is. He was succeeded by Henry M. Reigart, who served from about 1853 to the spring of 1857, when he died. He was succeeded by Hiram B. Swarr, 1857 to 1861; John J. Cochran, 1861 to 1869; Henry W. Hager, May 4, 1869, to December, 1872, when he died. He was succeeded by his widow, who served until Jan. 27, 1876, when James H. Marshall was appointed, who still holds the position.

When the office was in the charge of Henry M. Reigart it was removed to the City Hall, where it remained until the fall of 1883. The increased business of the office demanding more room, arrangements were made in the spring of 1883 with A. C. Kepler for the first floor in the new building then erecting on the site of the old Black Horse tavern, on North Queen Street. This is fitted up by Mr. Kepler in accordance with plans furnished by the department at Washington.

The new office will be more than twice as large as the old one, and superior in every way. It will be thirty-six feet in width and one hundred and fifteen feet deep. The front will be almost wholly of French plate-glass, with two front doors and four front windows, and above the doors and windows will be transoms of stained glass. The interior will be fitted up with all the conveniences of first-class post-offices. A largely-increased number of boxes with the Yale lock will be put in, and the office will be so arranged that box-renters can call at the office at any hour of day or night and get their mails.

JAMES H. MARSHALL was born in Lancaster City Sept. 12, 1838, and obtained his early education in the city public schools and at the parish school of St. James' Episcopal Church. At the age of seventeen he began learning the trade of printer in the Examiner and Herald office in Lancaster, where he worked for three years. The next year he was pressman in the Patriot office at Harrisburg. In 1859 he went to Nashville, and for a time was there employed in the Baptist Publishing House. Returning to Lancaster, he was foreman in the Examiner and Herald office until Oct. 5, 1861, when he enlisted, and was mustered into service, Company K, Seventy-ninth Pennsylvania Infantry, the regiment becoming a part of the Western army. At the expiration of his three years' service, after a short furlough, he re-enlisted, and did service in the army until he was honorably discharged at the close of the war, and mustered out July 12, 1865. He was with his regiment throughout the entire war, and was engaged in the more important battles of "Perryville," "Stone River," "Chickamauga," and was in "Sherman's March to the Sea." He was appointed commissary-sergeant Feb. 12, 1862; first lieutenant by Governor Curtin, Jan. 20, 1865; and quartermaster of the regiment by the commanding officer at the same time, holding the latter rank until his discharge.

Returning to Lancaster at the close of the war, he was for a time in business, and for a few months working at his trade at Coatesville. In 1867 he was appointed United States deputy marshal at Lancaster, and subsequently served for eight years in the post-office department of the city, being among the first letter-carriers appointed under the free-delivery law. He was appointed assistant postmaster at Lancaster, under Mrs. Hager, and at the expiration of her term, Jan. 26, 1876, he was appointed postmaster, which position, by reappointment, he holds in 1883. He married, May 26, 1863, Catherine W., daughter of William McCaskey, of Lancaster. Their children are Maggie S., William Lincoln, Bertha Pearsol, Harry Hager, and Maud Wilson Marshall. His father, William Marshall (1810-81), was a native of Lancaster, and a shoemaker, and his grandfather was of Irish birth, and the progenitor of the family in Lancaster. His mother, Elizabeth Sowers, a daughter of Henry Sowers, was born in 1812, and is of German descent. His surviving brother and sisters are William A., lieutenant United States navy; Mary Jane; Elizabeth, wife of John Keffer, of Harrisburg; Emma Louisa; and Alice Marshall.

Lancaster Schools from the Primitive to the Present.—In the year 1752 the Governor of Pennsylvania, Chief Justice Allen, Mr. Peters, secretary of the Land-Office, Messrs. Turner, Benjamin Franklin, and Conrad Weiser were appointed trustees and managers of the public schools, and authorized to establish such institutions in the province. Schools had, however, been brought into existence in Lancaster prior to this time. In 1746 the German Reformed Synod of Amsterdam sent out one of its ministers, the Rev. Michael Schlatter, as a kind of an educational missionary, and Lancaster was one of the prominent points in his field of labor. It is probable that the trustees appointed did little more in Lancaster than to lend their encouragement to the schools they already found planted here. There is little doubt that the Lutherans, soon after the establishment of their church in 1734, and the German Reformed denomination, soon after the founding of theirs in 1756, took steps to secure educational advantages for their children.

In 1748 it is authentically stated the Rev. John Fred. Handshuh, a Lutheran minister, established a school in Lancaster, of which Jacob Loeser was the teacher.<sup>1</sup> This school was soon crowded with English, Irish, and German pupils. In 1761 the pupils are mentioned as taking part in the laying of the cornerstone of a new building—whether school-house or church does not appear. In 1762 the school had ninety pupils and was crowded to its utmost capacity. A report made to the Synod of Philadelphia (of the Lutheran Church) in the year last mentioned, says of this pioneer educational institution, "During the summer the German school is attended by about fifty or sixty children, and during the winter by eighty to ninety. The schoolmaster, Jacob Loeser, is an able and gifted man, who would well be able to render more service. It is, however, to be regretted that on account of the want of room and better regulations it cannot be rendered more efficient."

Loeser continued his school work during the pastorate of the Rev. Handshuh, through that of the Rev. Geroch Helmuth, and remained for some time after the Rev. H. E. Muhlenberg assumed charge of the church. He was formerly schoolmaster in the New Hanover congregation, when the elder Muhlenberg was pastor there. It was upon his recommendation that he came to Lancaster. He arrived in January, 1749, and at once began his important and responsible work. In 1776, Mr. Loeser's son, Valentine, assisted him, especially by playing upon the organ, a service for which he annually received a remuneration of twelve pounds in Pennsylvania currency. Jacob Loeser was a busy man and not overpaid. In addition to teaching school in 1781, "he played the organ, led the singing during the regular church exercises and at funerals, opened and closed the church, and had charge of the graveyard," for all of which he received "a free dwelling in part of the school-house, had the free use of a part of the school lot, received ten cords of wood, half being hickory, and the sum of ten pounds in silver." This school of Loeser's, which was the first of which we have any authoritative account, was evidently larger and of more importance than the early schools usually were, and was a credit to the denomination which established and controlled it. It is mentioned in the charter<sup>2</sup> granted to the Reformed Church Feb. 16, 1771, that the society had, at a very considerable expense, already built one church on the south side of Orange Street, and one school-house and parsonage on the east side of Duke Street. It is mentioned in the records of the church, under date of May 5, 1766, that the ministers met in the school-house and arranged a programme for the dedication of the new church. It was decided that first in the procession upon that occasion should be "Mr. Jacob Loeser, accompanied by all the children that attend the school." Loeser died in 1793, in the seventieth year of his age. It had become evident in 1786 that Mr. Loeser could no longer satisfactorily discharge the duties of his office, because of failing health, and a Mr. Machold was elected to the position of schoolmaster and organist. The school was continued by the denomination for many years, and had a patronage from outside the church, which helped materially to support it.

In 1802, Mr. John Jacob Strine, of Northampton County, was called as teacher, and given thirty pounds and ten cords of wood per year, free dwelling-house, etc., and this pay was increased two years later to fifty pounds per year and twelve cords of wood. The school had at this time one hundred and twelve scholars, who were taught in English as well as German. As early as 1785, Rev. Gotthilf Henry Ernest Muhlenberg had advocated the introduction of an English class in the school, and also the establishment of a German High School (Hohe Schule), and his advocacy of the latter measure led to the incorporation, in 1787, of Franklin College, of which the history is given in this chapter under its present name, Franklin and Marshall College.

The Moravians and German Reformed Congregations also had early schools in Lancaster.

Prior to the movement which resulted in establishing the "Hohe Schule," and ultimately Franklin College, another advanced school came into existence. This was the Lancaster Academy. In Rupp's history the following account is given of it:

"About the year 1780, Jasper Yeates, Esq., Casper Shaffner, Esq., Col. George Ross, Charles Holl, Esq., and other gentlemen of the place, finding that the existing schools under the charge of the Lutheran and German Reformed congregations, as also the one established a number of years previous by the Moravians, and conducted upon the same plan, were inadequate to the growing wants of the people, and incapable of teaching the higher branches, engaged the services of a teacher of recommended abilities to conduct a select academy for the education of their male children. This academy continued in existence for several years as the high school of the place, until, owing to the violent temper of the teacher and the many indignities which he offered to the pupils under his charge, it was finally suspended."

A. Brown was in charge of the academy in 1782. In the Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer of June 24th in that year, he advertised that he had "held a public examination;" also that a meeting had been held on the 22d of June, at which "the following gentlemen were unanimously chosen directors and entitled the Curators of Lancaster Academy in Pennsylvania, viz.: the Rev. Mr. Muhlenberg, the Hon. William A. Atlee, Esq., Joseph Yeates, Esq., John Hubley, Esq., William Henry, Esq., and Matthias Slough, Esq." In the issue of the same paper on April 28, 1788, Andrew Brown advertised that he had employed a French teacher. In August, 1788, Mr. Brown removed to Philadelphia.

The schools which sprang up between 1795 and the third or fourth decade of the present century were very numerous, and we can do little more than merely mention the important and give brief accounts of the larger and longer-lived ones.

Under date of May 20, 1795, we find an advertisement which reads, "A grammar school will be opened on Thursday, the 21st of May, in the house adjoining the south end of the Calvinist churchyard, by David Doyle (having separated from the Rev. Mr. Heath by mutual consent), where youths will be instructed in English grammar, writing, arithmetic, book-keeping, and the Latin and Greek languages." This school was removed in the summer of 1796 "to the house next westward of Mr. Stofft's tavern, in King Street," and had increased so much that its teacher was obliged to employ an assistant.

John Porter opened a school for young ladies in "The Yellow House, in Queen Street," in June, 1795. He had previously opened an evening school at the same place.

In August of the same year as the above, Elisha Rigg advertised that he would open the Female Academy again on its original plan on September 1st following. This would imply that Rigg had formerly conducted the school, but how long before the date we have given there is no means of deciding. Mr. Rigg, who was rector of St. James' Church, was undoubtedly a popular teacher, for we find that in the spring of 1796 he advertises to open the academy "on a plan more extensive than that on which it has hitherto been conducted," and he further states, "the house into which the pupils will be received is spacious, and stands in a part of the town particularly airy and pleasant," a circumstance which was probably not without effect in making it necessary to open the school on a "more extensive scale" than it was formerly conducted upon.

Hannah Brown informed "the public and her friends" by advertisement Sept. 3, 1796, that she "had opened a school in Queen Street, opposite to Esquire Graeff's," for the instruction of young ladies in reading, plain sewing, marking, and the different kinds of needle-work.

In the fall of 1796 two schools were opened of a kind which are not usually classified as educational institutions,—they were dancing-schools, one conducted by George Eisher, and the other by one Hervey.

Oct. 5, 1799, George Carruthers advertised to open a school in the next house south of Samuel Humes, upon the 7th of the coming October, in which he proposed to teach reading, writing, arithmetic, grammar, geography, the use of the globes, and all of the useful branches. One Bradley opened a school about the same time, next door to Hager's tavern.

In the year 1800 several new schools were opened in various parts of the town. Francis and Leah Gallagher, who had previously taught in the borough, established a school on the north end of Queen Street, and Patrick Farrelly opened one on Duke Street opposite the German Lutheran Church, in which he taught the advanced branches as well as the rudimentary ones. A school for instruction in drawing and painting was opened by James Cox, who had been fifteen years in Philadelphia, according to his advertisement. In the fall, September 17th, James Ross advertised that having for more than thirty years practiced the teaching of the Latin and Greek languages in several established institutions, he proposed to open an academy here. In 1802 the academy was removed to a building on North Queen Street (appropriated to the use of Franklin College).

Ross advertised that students could be accommodated with boarding, lodging, washing, and mending in very respectable families for forty-five pounds per annum. Thomas B. Barton was another teacher of the year 1800. He opened rooms on Duke Street, opposite Dr. Muhlenberger's, in October.

In December, 1801, an English school, of which the teacher's name is not given in the old advertisement, was opened in the house adjoining Henry Herbst, on West King Street; another was established in March, upon the same street, near Frey's tavern, by John A. Kenney, who announced that in addition to the common branches he would teach book-keeping, surveying, and navigation. In April one was opened by Colin McLachlan, "in the school-house lately occupied by Mr. Rowan, in Queen Street. Expedition in progress, accuracy in education, and the morals of his pupils" were, in the language of the advertisement, "strictly attended to."

In February, 1802, William Reichenbach announced that he would open a mathematical school in his house on Duke Street. John Barber advertised that he intended opening a school on April 18th, on third square north of Queen Street, and about the same time John Riddle, who was "the late teacher of the academy at Hagerstown," informed the public that he would open a select school in the borough. In 1803 he seems to have had as an assistant James McCullough. They conducted a public examination of their pupils on June 30th of that year, in making the announcement of which they added, "Some of the pupils will exhibit specimens of oratory by candle-light the same evening." These exercises, we are told, "were attended by a crowded audience, among whom were the Governor of the commonwealth and the principal officers of the government, all of whom expressed the highest satisfaction." This was the first "last day" entertainment of which we have any record.

A school for teaching the following branches of needle-work, viz.: "Tambore-work in shading and in gold and silver; embroidery in all its branches; also, Shenel-work, Felagree-work, open-work, plain sewing, and sampler work; also, painting and drawing," was announced in September, 1802, by Mrs. Elliott, who lived on East King Street. In those times sewing and other domestic work was often taught in connection with literary branches, but it was rarely the case that a lady devoted her attention entirely to instruction in the ladies' industrial employments as did Mrs. Elliott.

The principal school in 1804 concerning which we have trustworthy information, was one of considerable importance. It was established by John Gibbons, whose name first appeared in the newspaper on April 6, 1804, in an advertisement. He says that "he has arrived from Carlisle, and proposes to open an academy in a few days for the instruction of young ladies." He was "to be conversed with at Mr. Henry Slaymaker's, near the court-house." On April 14th he advertised that his school would be opened at the stone house at the corner of King and Church Streets. A card in the Lancaster Journal of Aug. 10, 1804, reads as follows: "The liberal subscriptions of the ladies and gentlemen of Lancaster borough for the laudable purpose of repairing the stone house, so as to render it a comfortable place for the accommodation of the several schools now taught in it, has induced the committee to engage workmen, who have already commenced the work of repair and improvement. Should the citizens to whom the subscription has not been handed be disposed to afford the like generous support, the whole of the lower story will be completely finished, the lots fenced, and other necessary buildings erected before the cold season commences." Mr. Jacob Shenk, now living in Lancaster, attended school in the stone building in 1814, and says that a few years after that date it was made the office of Wyant's tannery.

In 1805 a number of names of new school-teachers appear. One of the earliest to announce himself was Matthias Stevenson, who advertised that he would open a school at the house of Archibald McLenegan. It is probable that he continued to carry on this school until his death, which occurred in 1808. William Armstrong was another pedagogue who taught during this year. He was assisted by his wife, who gave instruction in all kinds of sewing. John Husband, who was clerk of the English Church, taught at his house on Prince Street. The Young Ladies' Academy was at this time in charge of the Rev. Mr. Latta. The academy which James Ross had opened in 1802 was now in charge of Thomas Poole, late from the French Seminary of Baltimore.

In the fall of 1806, Mr. Cezurón, who had taught dancing-school for some time in the borough, advertised that he would open a French school at his home on South Queen Street.

The year 1807 witnessed the establishment of quite an important school under the name of the Franklin Academy. Thomas Poole, of whom mention has heretofore been made, and who had been teaching in the borough since 1805, advertised in September, 1806, that he would open an advanced school for instruction in all branches of classical education and mathematics in a new building soon to be finished. The school was duly opened in January, 1807, on South Queen Street. A committee was engaged to visit the academy from time to time and examine the progress of the pupils, consisting of Rev. Henry Muhlenberg, D.D., Rev. Colin McFarquhar, Matthias R. Snowden, V.M.D., Charles Smith, William Montgomery, T. M. Thompson, William Barton, Andrew Ellicott, George Duffield, Matthias Barton, George Ross, and James Hopkins.

In 1808, J. Turbill opened a morning-school for young ladies; Robert Scott, a day-school for boys; John Hamilton, a night-school on West King Street;

Mrs. Ash, a children's school on South Queen Street, "nearly opposite the Friends' meeting-house;" and "Paul Boggs, from Ireland," who came highly recommended, succeeded to Mr. Stephenson's school, and taught Latin and Greek.

In 1809 there was one new name among the teachers of the borough: B. F. Schipper opened an academy on the 18th of September in Franklin College, permission being granted by the trustees. In this school Latin and Greek were taught.

Two new names appeared in 1810. Samuel Bacon opened in February at Judge Yeates' house what he called "the Lancaster Tyrocinium," a school in which he "taught everything from a, b, c to the dead languages." He had as assistant H. Bullard. John Gallagher advertised in February that he should remove his school to the Friends' meeting-house. This gentleman taught school in Lancaster until his death, in January, 1820.

In 1811, William Rankin opened a school at Mr. McLenagan's school-room, on East King Street. A Mr. Metcalf succeeded him, and in December becoming assistant at Mr. Bacon's Tyrocinium, John A. Kenney took his place.

In 1814 we find the Misses Henry conducting an institution for young ladies, and in the following year we note as a new name that of Daniel J. Snow, who taught school on East King Street.

Passing for the present the "Lancasterian school" of 1816, which was the beginning of a new system and era of education in the borough, we make note of the union schools which were established in succeeding years. Terrence McGinghan established a classical school in Franklin College in 1817. Two schools appear in 1818, with teachers who have not heretofore been mentioned. The first, a French and English school, was opened on East King Street in January by Mr. and Mrs. Quinan, the "latter educated since infancy in Paris." A. Thomas was teaching in the Friends' meeting-house in April, and had taught before, but just when we have no means of deciding. He advertised that "children learning the rudiments will be taught upon the Lancasterian system at three dollars and a half per quarter, if desired by their parents, but no attempts will be made to teach those who are advanced by that system, as A. Thomas has made a sufficient number of experiments in the course of two years' teaching upon that plan to satisfy him that it cannot be extended with advantage to any but those learning the rudiments." John Webb and Augustus M. Hey opened schools in 1819, the former on North Queen Street, and the latter on East King Street, at the house of Charles Rysinger. James Cox followed in April, 1820, and Sarah H. Armstrong returned to the city and opened a school in April, 1821. In the fall of the same year Ashbel Steele taught in the academy lately occupied by Jacob Albright. In 1822, Peter Rixecker established a school in the Moravian building, and in the following year Edward Clarke and A. Varian had a night-school. The latter gentleman was afterwards in charge of the Lancasterian school, and Clark continued teaching this school until 1825.

There were many private and select schools in existence after 1822, when education became a matter of public expense and the Lancasterian system was adopted, but lack of space precludes the possibility of giving details of their history. The only new name which we meet among the teachers of 1825 is Michael P. Gallagher, who taught in the Friends' meeting-house. For subsequent years the principal teachers not heretofore mentioned, and not including those in the Lancaster County Academy or Lancasterian schools, were as follows: 1826, Mr. Kelly, from Philadelphia, and F. McCreedy, from Baltimore, associated in management of a school on South Queen Street, also Clark & Randall, on East King Street; 1827, F. McCreedy alone; about this time Mrs. and Miss Marcelus, in the Lancaster Boarding-School for ladies; 1828, Mr. and Mrs. Klug, in charge of the Moravian Academy, and Thomas Yarroll; 1829, William Girling; 1830, David H. Haehman, Jr., Girling and George Hathorne, who kept the Hall of Instruction; 1832, William B. Reed, Henrietta Reigart, treasurer of the Infant School Society, by which a school was carried on in Franklin College with one hundred pupils, and Dr. James Power; 1833, J. G. O'Brien; 1834, J. F. Flood, J. Clarke, directors of female seminary on Lime Street; 1838, the Lancaster Female Seminary was incorporated this year, with Alexander L. Hays, Samuel Bowman, Oristus Collins, Emanuel C. Reigart, Amos Ellmaker, George Ford, Jr., George W. Hamersley, Benjamin Champneys, John F. Steinman, John R. Montgomery, and William Norris, trustees.

The Lancaster County Academy.—Although it does not here come in chronological order, we give a brief history of the Lancaster County Academy, which was quite an important educational institution, before taking up for consideration the Lancasterian schools, which were only superseded by the public schools as organized upon the present system. The Lancaster County Academy was incorporated by act passed April 14, 1827, in which the following gentlemen and their successors were appointed trustees, viz.: Rev. William Ashmead, Rev. Joseph Clarkson, Rev. Christian Endress, Adam Reigart, George B. Porter, Edward Coleman, William Jenkins, John Reynolds, George Musser, Frederick A. Muhlenberg, Samuel Dale, George W. Krug, George L. Mayer, and Jasper Slaymaker. The first meeting of the trustees was held in the office of William Jenkins, on May 8d, and proposals for building were advertised for. On July 17th a contract was entered into for the erection of a building on the lot at the northeast corner of Orange and Lime Streets.<sup>1</sup> Until the 1st of January, when the edifice was completed, the school was held in the house of Mrs. Kuhn, having been opened Sept. 11, 1827. The academy trustees received a grant of three thousand dollars from the State, and two thousand dollars was raised by private subscription. In consideration of the aid extended by the State, poor children, not to exceed at any time four, were to be educated free. The trustees endeavored to secure the services of Rev. Mr. Barr as principal, but were unable to do so, and employed James P. Wilson, Jr., son of the Rev. Dr. Wilson, of Philadelphia, who was the first teacher in the institution. He remained in charge until September, 1829, when he resigned, and was succeeded by J. Erwin, who, after only a month's service, gave place to Robert Birch, A.B. On Oct. 25, 1831, J. B. Patterson became principal, and was succeeded by Dr. James Power, on June 8, 1832, who, in turn, gave place, Aug. 16, 1833, to John Keenan. Rev. A. A. Marcellus was principal in 1837, and engaged J. J. Van Antwerp to assist him in the mathematical and scientific departments. It is probable that these gentlemen were the last teachers of the institution, for the school was closed in 1839, and by an act of Assembly passed May 15th the trustees were authorized to convey the buildings and grounds to the trustees of Franklin College, which about that time went into operation upon a new plan.

The Lancasterian Schools and the Act of 1822.
—Previous historians not having done their duty by way of explaining, the majority of the people in this city and county have very naturally fallen into the error of supposing that the Lancasterian system of schools was so called after the town of Lancaster. As a matter of fact the name was derived from the man who devised and first put in operation the system, Joseph Lancaster, of England. This gentleman, who was an enthusiast upon educational matters, and particularly upon the plan of instruction and discipline which he originated, came to America in 1820 or 1821, and succeeded in establishing the Lancasterian schools in several cities, but did not attain success commensurate with his expectations. In some localities his ideas and peculiar system of schools were adopted before he made his advent in this country. Lancaster was one of these places, for as early as December, 1816, we find that A. G. Boner advertises the discontinuance "of his Lancasterian school for a few days, in consequence of his disappointment in not getting the necessary apparatus." How long he had taught by this method prior to the foregoing date we do not know. A. Thomas, of whose school mention has been made, stated in an advertisement inserted in the papers in 1818, that he had experimented with the system for two years. He and Boner were undoubtedly the pioneers of the Lancasterian schools in Lancaster, and they were, with the exception of A. Varian, the only ones of whom we have any record prior to the passage of the public school act of 1822 and the adoption of the system.

Under the school law of 1809 all children of the poor whose parents were sufficiently poor in spirit to allow them to take advantage of the opportunity were educated at the expense of the county. They were commonly called "pauper schools," and so much odium attached to those who attended them that many people preferred that their children should remain ignorant, or attain only the crudest education at home, rather than suffer the humiliation to which they were subjected if they had their tuition paid by the county. There was a constant and invidious distinction between the children of the rich and the poor under the old system, and education under it was, at the best, very limited. Many of the teachers were incompetent, and it was as a rule only the children of the well-to-do who were able to attend the better class of private schools, who received instruction worthy of the name. The inadequacy and expense of this system led the people to apply to the Legislature for one which would secure better and more equal advantages. The act passed April 1, 1822, provided for the education of children at the public expense within the city of Lancaster and incorporated boroughs of the county of Lancaster, which were to constitute "the Second School District of the State of Pennsylvania." The act provided that "the Court of Common Pleas of the county, at the regular term in April, and the April term in each succeeding year, shall appoint twelve citizens residing within the city of Lancaster to be directors of the public school or schools in the city of Lancaster, which shall be called the first section of the Second School District." The directors were to have power to erect school-houses, appoint teachers, provide books, stationery, and all things necessary for maintaining and supporting the school. It was provided that they might admit into the schools all orphan children, and children of indigent parents, to be supported at the public expense as they think proper; also to admit children whose parents or guardians are in circumstances to pay for their tuition, either in whole or in part, and the directors were at liberty to charge in each individual case any sum which might be agreed upon between the parties.

The act continues: "The principles of Lancaster's system of education in its most approved state shall be adopted and pursued in all the public schools within the district." It was further specified that the directors were to "have power to draw from the county treasury the money necessary in erecting, establishing, and maintaining the schools within the first section."

1839, his widow executed a quit-claim deed. On the 12th of August, 1840, the trustees of the academy deeded the property to the trustees of Franklin College. This lot was mentioned in the deeds as "No. 501" (old number), consisting of sixty-eight feet on Orange and two hundred and forty-five feet on Lime Street. It is now owned by William D. Speicher, George Sensenig, G. L. Lytle, Adolph Allcott, and Mrs. Jacob Diechman.

The Court of Common Pleas, in pursuance of this act, appointed as directors for Lancaster, Christian Endress, William August Muhlenberg, William Ashmeade, John Risdell, Adam Reigart, Caspar Shaffner, Jr., Phillip Benedict, George Musser, John Reynolds, Edward Coleman, George B. Porter, and Frederick August Muhlenberg. On May 25th these directors advertised for a lot of ground "in the central part of the city, and conveniently adapted for the erection of a large and commodious building not less than thirty-two feet in front by seventy-five feet in depth, and which shall be so calculated as to admit light on both sides and in the front and rear without any possibility of obstruction by the erection of a contiguous building . . . for the purpose of erecting a public school thereon." On June 22d the directors advertised that, having agreed upon a plan for the proposed building, they would receive proposals from builders, and on November 14th advertised that would proceed to the election of teachers for the male and female departments on November 30th.

On Jan. 21, 1823, the directors made their first report, in which they stated that "they purchased a lot lying on the corner of Prince and Chestnut Streets . . . for one thousand dollars;" that "proposals were received and contract entered into for the erection of a building with Alexander Miller, of this city, who has undertaken to complete the same for the sum of four thousand five hundred dollars. The house," they stated, "is eighty-five feet deep by thirty-five feet in width, roofed with slate, furnished with a neat cupola, and accommodated to the instruction of five hundred children on the Lancasterian plan, and is nearly finished." Teachers had by this time been engaged, and on April 22, 1823, Christian Endress, president of the board, gave notice that "the public schools of Lancaster would be formally opened on the following day at two o'clock with an appropriate address to the public, who are hereby invited to attend."

The report of the directors submitted to the people on March 2, 1824, gives a very good idea of the working of the schools during the first year, and we append the more valuable portions of it:

"The schools have been in operation under competent teachers since the beginning of April last. The number of scholars will be seen from the following statement:

"Number of scholars admitted up to the present time: boys, 395; girls, 260; total, 655. Number now on the rolls: boys, 278; girls, 182; total, 460.

"The rooms will accommodate nearly five hundred scholars. A large portion of the above are free scholars. A great number pay a small compensation. The directors find that by accepting a very moderate sum for tuition many children are brought within the walls of the school whom their parents would not send as free scholars, and who, but for these accommodating terms, would grow up in ignorance. Others, again, pay the full charge for tuition, which, however, is no more than sufficient to raise the income necessary for the support of the schools, the appropriation of the Legislature from the county funds being inadequate to the object.

"It is needless to add that this system of public education has already proved itself incomparably superior to that pursued under the old law. The children of the poor, instead of the negligent and inefficient manner in which they were formerly instructed, are now receiving all the advantages of an elementary education under the most auspicious circumstances. The many and gratifying instances of improvement, both in morals and learning, which have come under the notice of the directors warrant them in presenting the Lancasterian school to their fellow-citizens as an institution likely to prove an extensive blessing to society.

"As much has been said of the expense incurred by the establishment, the directors submit a calculation which must at once remove all dissatisfaction on that score. The number of children in the city entitled to gratuitous education is at least three hundred. It is true that so many have never been schooled at one time by the commissioners, but the directors, from what they have observed, are confident that there are not fewer than the above number within the bounds of the city who, if they are not taught gratuitously, will receive no learning at all. Such some within the views of the State Constitution on the subject, and certainly have a right to free education. The tuition, then, of these three hundred children under the old law, at two cents per day, would cost the county annually about eighteen hundred dollars. The present annual appropriation to the Lancasterian school is eight hundred dollars, and the interest of the first cost about five hundred dollars, thus allowing the annual expense of the school to be thirteen hundred dollars. Thus the city draws from the county treasury eight hundred dollars less than it would have done under the system which has been superseded. Let it only be granted that the poor children of the city ought to be educated, and it may be demonstrated that the system now in operation is the most economical that could possibly be pursued, the actual expense of the schools to the county being now limited to eight hundred dollars per annum, considerably less than the average expense of tuition in the city for the last ten years."

This report showed, among other items of expense, one quarter's salary, $150, paid to A. Varian, and $75 to Ann Jamieson. The lot was shown to have been purchased from William Kirkpatrick. The whole amount paid out, according to this report, for building, furniture, supplies, well, fences, printing, salaries, etc., from Aug. 13, 1822, to Nov. 1, 1823, was $3406.73.

There being some dissatisfaction with the school on account of its quasi pauper features, and because the county was called upon to support it, an act was passed March 29, 1824, "to provide more effectually for the education of the poor gratis, and for laying the foundation of a general system of education throughout this commonwealth." Section 8 excepted the city and county of Philadelphia and the city of Lancaster from the provisions of the act, and the directors in the first section of the Second School District (Lancaster) "were not to draw any orders upon the treasury of the county for any sum or sums of money for the support of the public school established by the act of April, 1822, . . . but it shall be the duty of the Select and Common Councils of the city to provide adequate funds for the support and maintenance of said school, and the directors of the school for the time being shall have the same power to draw upon the city treasury . . . as they now have upon the county treasury."

The third report of the directors, made in February, 1825, showed the average number of pupils to be about three hundred and twenty, two hundred of whom were boys.

"In the fall the institution suffered a loss in the death of Miss Ann Jamieson, teacher of the female department, . . . and the department is now conducted by Miss Augusta Musser.

"In consequence of a late memorial to the Legislature complaining that the members of the German Lutheran and German Reformed congregations are 'not benefited, with the rest of their fellow-citizens, by the Lancasterian school,' the directors feel called upon to state that the majority of their scholars, since the commencement of the institution, have always been the children of German Lutheran and German Reformed parents. At present the number of such is upwards of one hundred and sixty. If any portion of the community has been benefited more than another by the operation of the public school it is unquestionably the above-named congregations.

"In their former reports the directors have adverted to the salutary effects of public education, and they might now abundantly confirm what they have said by the relation of interesting facts which have come within their own experience. Suffice it to say that they have accomplished all that could have been reasonably expected. The moral operation of the school has been particularly gratifying. At a late examination of the progress of the scholars in reading, writing, arithmetic, grammar, geography, and the girls in needle-work, convinced the spectators that the school is second to none in Lancaster. On this head the directors are gratified in being able to refer to the late report of the Grand Jury, which thus concludes: 'The grand Inquest individually and collectively recommend to the proper authorities and their fellow-citizens this public school, which they cannot avoid viewing as the commencement of a system fraught with inestimable benefits to our country.'"

A memorable day in the history of the school was July 28, 1825, when Gen. Lafayette honored teachers and pupils with his presence. Of this event the following interesting account has been preserved:

"About eleven o'clock the general visited the Lancasterian school. On getting out of the carriage he was received by the teachers (Miss Musser and Mr. Varian), and conducted into the female department, where the children of both schools to the number of three hundred and twenty or three hundred and thirty were assembled. The boys were arrayed in blue sashes, were arranged on the right, each having been furnished with a bunch of laurel. The girls dressed in white, with pink sashes, each holding a beautiful bouquet of wild flowers, were seated on the left. A number of white banners bearing the revered names of Washington, Lafayette, and many of the most distinguished statesmen of Pennsylvania, among which Franklin and Penn are conspicuous, were displayed by the children on each side of the room. The side seats were occupied by nearly one hundred and thirty ladies. The windows were neatly decorated with festoons of evergreen. The east end of the room presented three splendid full-length transparencies,—the Genius of Liberty standing on America, supported by Washington and Lafayette. When the general reached the door of the apartment, all, rising from their seats, greeted him by joining in the chorus,—

'Hero, hail! all hail to thee, Champion of our Liberty!'

accompanied with instrumental music by a number of gentlemen. . . . Upon the general's reaching the seat prepared for him upon the platform, a little boy between nine and ten years of age delivered an address of his own composition, in which, after giving the general a cordial welcome in the name of his school-fellows, and recommending the cause of education generally, and the Lancasterian system particularly, to his attention, he slightly adverted to the services the illustrious visitor had rendered to our country, and concluded by wishing him a safe return to his native land. Lafayette, in a short and feeling reply, assured the speaker and the audience generally that he should ever remember with the most grateful sensations 'The Children's Welcome.' He besought them, in return for their kindness, to accept the blessings of an old Revolutionary soldier.

"When the general had concluded the music struck up 'Lafayette's Welcome,' in the chorus of which the children and most of the audience joined with the utmost enthusiasm, the former waving their bunches of laurel and flowers (which until then had been concealed) in time to the words,—

'Huzza, huzza, huzza, to hail the nation's guest!'

"The effect was truly magical. Many of the audience could not refrain from tears, whilst the great, the good, the philanthropic Lafayette appeared almost overcome by the intensity of his feelings."

After the excitement of this event subsided, a youth, formerly a member of the school, addressed the general, who appropriately replied. He was then conducted around the room by the teachers and introduced to the ladies and gentlemen present. On his return to the platform he addressed the company, and expressed great satisfaction that "a system of education at once so rational and equitable was gaining ground in this enlightened country. He observed that two of his grandchildren were now educating in Paris in a school upon the Lancasterian plan, where the languages and some of the higher branches of education were taught with the most promising success." He then, after wishing all before him future prosperity, bade them farewell, and was conducted to his carriage.

On the 8th of August, 1826, the directors advertised that being "desirous of introducing an improved system of education into the public schools of this city, they propose to receive into the school seven or eight youths to act as honorary monitors or tutors, who will be required to assist the principal teacher but two hours each day, in return for which service they will receive, free of expense, instruction in the higher branches of English education."

In December, 1826, the grand jury of the county, after visiting the school, presented a report to the court, in which they stated that "they had been somewhat disappointed in not finding it in that order they had expected, and was of opinion that improvement might be made in conducting it." Upon this Mr. A. Varian, teacher of the male department, addressed a letter to the president and directors of the school, calling their attention to this action, and expressing the opinion that there never was a time since the establishment of the institution when he "would have been more disposed than at present to invite a rigid and minute scrutiny of the system of instruction through all its branches." This letter led the directors to petition the court—Hon. Walter Franklin, president, and Samuel Dale and John Lightner, Esqs., associate justices—"to appoint five, seven, or nine intelligent and respectable men, not residents of the city of Lancaster, to examine the scholars and the improvement made by them since entering the school, and to report thereon to the next session of your honorable court, and they are willing to rest the reputation and the character of the school upon the issue." Signed by Adam Reigart, L. Silliman Ives, F. A. Muhlenberg, John L. Atlee, William Ashmeade, John Risdell, G. B. Porter, George Musser, Philip Benedict, John Reynolds, William Cooper, and G. Louis Mayer, directors. In accordance with this memorial the court appointed as a visiting committee Rev. Joseph Barr, of Strasburg township; Rev. William Beates, of Elizabeth; Rev. Francis A. Latta, of Drumore; William Gibbons, of Leacock; Gardner Furness, of Little Britain; William Hiester, of New Holland; Col. R. R. Hiester, of Cocalico; Jacob Rohrer, of Mount Joy; and James Clyde, of Columbia borough.

We have no record of the report of this committee; but find that the grand jury of 1832 reported very favorably upon the school, as did also that of 1833.

Upon Jan. 3, 1828, Daniel Fuller, Esq., was appointed teacher of the male department, vice Alexander Varian, resigned.

Notwithstanding the school had many warm advocates, and was nominally free, there was serious opposition to the pauper feature on the part of the community. Several attempts were made to repeal the act establishing this school, and upon one occasion Dr. John L. Atlee and John Reynolds were appointed by the board to visit Harrisburg to prevent its repeal.

The school remained in operation until 1838, when it was supplanted by the free schools organized under the law of 1834.

The Common School System.<sup>1</sup>—"The common school law was passed in 1834,<sup>2</sup> but it was not until June 2, 1838, that the board appointed by the court under the Lancasterian system, and consisting of the following members, viz.: President, George Musser; Adam Reigart, George H. Krug, William Cooper, Dr. Muhlenberg, Rev. Samuel Bowman, Rev. T. Marshall Davis, Rev. Barnhard Keenan, Dr. Hume, Mr. Benedict, Mr. Montgomery, Judge Shaeffer, Dr. John L. Atlee, and Mr. Zimmerman, president of Common Council, met in the Lancasterian school building, with Rev. Samuel Bowman in the chair, the object of the meeting being to take into consideration the acts passed by the Legislature in relation to the schools of this district, and the election of twelve additional directors to serve until the first Tuesday of May, 1839. The following gentlemen, who were recommended to the board by the citizens at the town-meeting, held the evening previous, were unanimously elected, namely: Samuel Dale, Esq., John F. Steinman, C. Hager, Louis C. Yunglerich, John Bear, Henry Keffer, John Eberman (cashier), Peter McConomy, David Cockley, John K. Findlay, John Rohor, and Peter G. Eberman. George Musser was appointed by the board to attend the election on the common school system, which was to be held on the following Monday. June 9th the board met to consider the result of the election. Judge Dale was called to the chair, and the result made known. Five hundred and seventy-four votes had been cast in favor of the common school system, and but one against it. This was the last meeting ever held under the Lancasterian system.

<sup>2</sup> A strong effort was made in the Pennsylvania House in 1835 to repeal the free school law, and it is worthy of note that the repealing bill was defeated through a speech made by the Hon. Thaddeus Stevens, of Lancaster. "The real point of the speech that carried the House," says a writer who remembered its delivery, "was not its eloquence and vehement delivery, but an arithmetical calculation in the body of the speech, proving by a dollar-and-cent argument that the free schools were cheaper, financially, than the pauper system they supplanted. This was an argument that the plain, unlettered men of the House could understand, and one that they could stand on before their constituents, and gained votes that Stevens' classic allusions could never have reached."

"On the 14th day of June, 1838, the board of directors of the common school system of the city of Lancaster met in the old court-house for the first time to organize a new system of schools that was to be free to all, to the rich and poor alike. The following officers were elected: President, Adam Reigart; Secretary, John K. Findlay; Treasurer, George Musser; Collector, John Yost; and Messenger, Matthias Zahn.

"From the organization of the board, June 14th, to the opening of the schools, September of the same year, thirteen meetings were held. To inaugurate a new system of schools that was to meet the wishes of the public, and to overcome the prejudices of those who were opposed to the education of the masses, and more particularly to meet the wishes of those who were opposed to being taxed for the support of all who might wish to attend school, were difficulties not easily to be overcome. Yet, while opposition was but the natural result incidental to the inauguration of a new system, we question if the common schools were ever started anywhere under more favorable circumstances. Whether this success was owing to the great dissatisfaction on the part of the community with the old Lancasterian system or to the high character and superior intelligence of the gentlemen who constituted the board, we shall not determine.

"The following extract from the report of a committee, of which John F. Steinman was chairman, appointed to report what changes should be made in the Lancasterian system of teaching, may determine to a certain extent the success or failure of a system that for eighteen years was the only one in operation in this city. The report reads,—

"That they have had the subject under serious consideration, that on the score of economy, and where the main object is to educate a large number of children at the least possible expense, the committee do not doubt that the Lancasterian system has the advantage of every other, but where thorough and complete instruction is sought for, they are constrained to believe that other and more successful methods are to be found, and believing that the Board will consider the quality rather than the cheapness of the schools which they are about to establish, the Committee do not hesitate to recommend the abandonment of a system which they are constrained to believe is incurably defective and superficial. It is not the management of the system, but the system itself to which they object, and which they are now persuaded must everywhere, and in all hands, prove, as they have said, defective and superficial. The opinion which they have adopted is sustained by the judgment of those who have had large and personal acquaintance with the actual working of the Lancasterian system."

"Perhaps the most difficult problem the new board had to solve was that of providing 'ways and means' to carry on the school. The treasury was empty, and the law for the laying and collecting of taxes vague and difficult to understand. One of the first acts of the board was to call a meeting of the taxable inhabitants of the city to decide by ballot whether a sum of twelve hundred dollars should be raised for school purposes during the year. As the only school building in possession of the board was the old high school on the corner of Prince and Chestnut Streets, rooms belonging to the Lutheran congregation, on South Duke Street, were rented, with rows of long desks and benches, but no sooner had the schools commenced than the number of pupils began to increase so rapidly that four additional rooms had to be provided, and the following rooms rented: The school-room of the German Reformed congregation, the Presbyterian session-room, the Moravian Sunday-school rooms, and the Episcopal school-rooms. Seven hundred and four children were reported in attendance at the end of the first week. The committee appointed to contract for the purchase of a lot, and to issue proposals for the erection of a building, reported that they had found opposing the performance of that duty obstacles which they conceived to be insurmountable, and therefore referred the matter again to the board.

"But it soon became evident to the board that the rapidly-increasing wants of the city demanded better and more suitable school-room accommodations. In view of this, plans and specifications were prepared during the year 1840 for the erection of new school buildings in each of the four wards of the city, according to a specific plan adopted by the board, and which was strictly adhered to until the seventeen school-houses had been completed. During the year 1841 a lot of ground on the corner of Duke and German was purchased from V. B. Palmer for $1050. On a portion of this plot three double houses were built the same year, at a cost of $2914. These were the first public school-houses ever built in this city under the public school system. Two years later, in 1843, the two additional buildings were erected, at a cost of $2100. In the year 1847 the board purchased from Joshua Shufflebottom a lot on Mulberry Street for $450, on which a double house was built the same year for $1571, and in the following year the additional house was built at a cost of $1605. During 1849 a lot fronting on West Vine Street was purchased from Miss Yeates for $300, on which three double houses were built in 1850, at a total cost of $3127. During this year a lot was purchased on East Lemon Street for $550.25, and two double houses erected at a cost of $2027. In 1852 two building lots, one on West Chestnut and the other on East Orange Street, were purchased for $550 and $443, respectively. On these two lots four houses were built during 1852, at a cost of $4198. During 1855 another school building was erected on West Chestnut Street, at a cost to the board of $1136, making the last of the seventeen school-houses erected nearly thirty years ago, at a total cost to the city not exceeding $22,000. During 1849 the board disposed of one hundred and fifty feet of the Duke Street plot, fronting on German Street, for $1000. Thus it will be seen that the whole amount expended for the ground on which the above buildings are located did not exceed $2450.

"The schools were divided into primary and secondary, the principals of the primary schools being required to select a certain number of the larger scholars to act as assistants in teaching the a-b-c pupils. Previous to the opening of the schools one thousand handbills, under the signature of the president, were ordered to be printed and circulated, giving notice of the opening of the schools and the places where children were to be sent.

"George James, on behalf of the colored population, presented a communication to the board, stating that there were fifty-two colored children ready and willing to attend school as soon as the board should provide suitable accommodations. This school was not opened, however, until the following year.

"To speak of the early history of the public schools without referring to the schoolmaster would be like playing Hamlet with Hamlet left out. The mention of their names will no doubt be a sufficient introduction to many of our citizens. We may lose sight for the time being of passing events, but we can never entirely forget the early impressions and old associations of our boyhood days, impressions made at times upon the heart, at other times upon the hand, but impressions, nevertheless, which we would not forget if we could.

"At a meeting of the board held Aug. 10, 1838, the following teachers, recommended by the committee, of which Rev. Samuel Bowman was chairman, were elected for one year: Gad Day, salary, $800; Mr. Butler, salary, $350; Mr. Rhoades, salary, $300; Mr. Clark, salary, $500; Mr. Thomas Yarrel, salary, $500; Jacob Price, salary, $500; Miss C. Musser, salary, $300; Mr. Reed, salary, $300; Miss Frazer, salary, $250; Miss Gill, salary, $175; Miss Diller, salary, $175; Miss White, salary, $175; Miss McGee, salary, $175; Miss Helfenstine, salary, $150; Miss Robinson, salary, $175; Miss Smith, salary, $150. These were the pioneers of the early common schools of this city. From sixteen, in 1838, the number had increased to sixty-five in 1878. Of this number but one is in the employ of the board at the present time, the others having long since retired from the school-room, many of whom have passed away forever.

"To Mr. Price belongs the credit of having opened the first night-school at his own expense. Being a scholar and mathematician, he was often called on by directors to examine teachers in various parts of the county, and being well versed in the classics, he taught many private classes at different times at his own house. He taught in the different schools of the city for a term of fifteen years, or until his death, in 1853. While all the teachers named were prominent in their day, none stood higher in the estimation of the board than Gad Day. He was the oldest of four sons of a New England Yankee, their names being Gad, Asa, Ira, and Dan, the combined letters of the four names not exceeding twenty-four letters. Gad was, during the greater part of the first year, principal of a secondary school, and was perhaps the most prominent teacher in the employ of the board. To such an extent did they rely on his ability as a teacher, that seldom were any new departures made without first consulting with Mr. Day and getting his views. Early in the session a committee was appointed to confer with Mr. Day and ascertain his plan for facilitating the business of teaching in the public schools of the city. An extract from the report of the committee to the board reads,—

"That having witnessed the practical operation of this scheme, we believe it important to introduce it into those departments of the schools concerned in the instruction of the youngest and least advanced scholars. Cards are suspended, upon which the alphabet or syllables of two or more letters and words of two or more syllables are printed in large letters, so that the attention of the whole class may be easily directed to every part of the card. There is a twofold advantage in this method. The principal is greatly relieved, so much so that one of the teachers who has never taught before is able, with great ease, to instruct in the alphabet and spelling of one and two syllables more than eighty young pupils, divided into four or five classes. The classes are severally called up, and the teacher, pointing with a rod to the card, the scholars all pronounce the letter or spell the syllables or word. The alphabet is commenced at the beginning and the rod passes from letter to letter to the last, then the course is reversed, after which the teacher points to the letters promiscuously, and the whole class pronounces them. Lastly, the rod is placed in the hands of some one or more of the class, who are required to point out such letters as the teacher may name. Mr. Day declares that he can teach a dozen or twenty by this method, and sooner and better than by the ordinary plan, and that a number together sooner than a single pupil alone."

"This seems to have marked the beginning of a new era in the schools of this city, for we find that sets of charts and cards of syllables and words of spelling were ordered for all the primary schools.

"At a subsequent meeting Mr. Day was elected general superintendent for all the schools in the city of Lancaster. His position as superintendent, however, did not last long, as he was elected principal of the high school the following year, and the office of superintendent no doubt abolished. But even at this early day of the superintendency things did not work smoothly. Mr. Thomas Yarrel, who was a genuine old-fashioned school-master, wasn't so easily converted to Gad Day's new methods of instruction. He rebelled and refused to obey the superintendent. He was accordingly notified to appear before the board to answer the charge of insubordination. This was an insult to the professional dignity of Thomas Yarrel, and a short time afterwards he sent in his resignation as teacher.

"Among the many faithful teachers who have from time to time taught in the public schools of this city there is one deserving of special recognition. For a period of nearly thirty years Miss Christie Musser was one of our most conscientious and devoted teachers.

"One of the old customs which prevailed under the Lancasterian system, but which was abolished at the beginning of the fourth year of the common schools, was to require the children to appear in procession or in church on the first day of May, in regular uniform dress or badge. Holidays were not as frequent then as they are at present, the schools being open during eleven months in the year, closing on the second Monday in July and opening on the second Monday of August. The schools were closed only on the afternoon of Saturday and on the Friday preceding Easter Sabbath.

"As no system of schools would be complete without the text-book, we have collected a partial list of such books as were in use during the first year, namely: Cobb's and Emmerson's Spelling-Book, Emmerson's Primer and Reader, Emmerson's Arithmetic, Smith's Grammar, Parley's Geography, Frost's History of the United States, Blair's Rhetoric, Colburn's Algebra, Bible or Testament.

"As many of our most intelligent citizens are of the opinion that the public school system was originally designed to instruct pupils in reading, writing, spelling, and arithmetic, to the exclusion of certain other branches, and as proof refer to the branches taught when they were boys, we here present the curriculum as adopted by the board forty-two years ago: Primary department: reading, writing, spelling, history, geography (connected with map-drawing), arithmetic, and the globes. Secondary department: reading, writing, grammar, arithmetic, history, geography, composition, algebra, rhetoric, mensuration, trigonometry, natural philosophy, exegetical exercises, and in addition the boys in the male secondary school were to be instructed in book-keeping. Vocal music was introduced to be taught as a separate branch in all the schools.

"During the first year several members of the board resigned their seats, the first of whom was Adam Reigart, who sent in his resignation June 22, 1838, as president of the board (to which position he had been elected at its organization), and also as a member of that body. A committee of three, consisting of John L. Atlee, Judge Hayes, and George H. Krug, was appointed to convey to the late president the high sense which the members of the board entertained for the services which he had heretofore rendered the cause of education. Judge Dale was unanimously elected president in place of Mr. Reigart, and Judge Hayes was elected to fill the vacancy in the board. At the next meeting Mr. Montgomery resigned, and Christian Keefer was elected to his place. Before the close of the year, John K. Findlay, having been elected president of Common Council, handed in his resignation as a member of the board as elected by the people, but retaining it as ex officio member. At the same meeting John W. Porney was unanimously elected to the position made vacant by the resignation of Mr. Findlay, and at a subsequent meeting of the same year was elected secretary of the board. Of the twenty-nine gentlemen who were members of the board during the first year the common schools were in operation in this city the following have long since passed away, namely: Judge Dale, Judge Hayes, Judge Sheaffer, George H. Krug, George Musser, William Cooper, Dr. Muhlenberg,

Rev. Samuel Bowman, Rev. J. T. Marshall Davie, Rev. Barnhard Keenan, Dr. Hume, Mr. Montgomery, Henry Keffer, Mr. Benedict, C. Hager, John Baer, John Eberman, Peter McConomy, David Cockley, John Rohrer, and Peter G. Eberman. Those who are still living are John F. Steinman, John K. Findlay, Louis C. Jingerich, Dr. John L. Atlee, John W. Forney, John Zimmerman, and Christian Keefer.

"Of the above list of Lancaster's most distinguished early educators not one is at present a member of the board, the last one of that noble band, Peter McConomy, having passed away in 1878, while still a member of that body, after having held the position continuously for forty years. Of those directors now living, Dr. John L. Atlee has held the position of director for a greater period, perhaps, than any other member of the board. A director under the Lancasterian system in 1822, he continued a director until 1866, or about forty-four years, when he resigned his position. What an array of names for the historian!"

To the foregoing history of the schools we add the following:

The new high school building on West Orange Street, near Mulberry, which is ninety-two by fifty-two feet in dimensions and ninety-two feet in height from base to top of tower, was designed by C. L. Stiles, of Chicago, and built under the direction of H. E. Slaymaker, J. W. Jackson, C. Zucker, E. J. Erisman, and Robert A. Evans, building committee of the Board of Education; Daniel McLaughlin was the superintendent of construction. On the occasion of the dedication of this building, Jan. 8, 1876, the teachers and pupils of the Girls' High School, teachers and pupils of all the lower public schools, and school directors met at the old high school building, and marched to the corner of Prince and Chestnut Streets, where they met the teachers and pupils of the Boys' High School. The two bodies joining in procession, and augmented by a considerable number of representatives of Franklin and Marshall College, the State Normal School of Millersville, with the judges of the courts, the mayor and members of the City Council, and county officials, and many others, marched to the new building. An address was delivered by Dr. Greenwald, and remarks made by Professor Edward Brooks and Dr. John L. Atlee, who had been a director for a period of forty-four years.

Other recently-built school-houses were the Rockland Street building, erected in 1875; those on Lemon and James Streets, in 1880; on Manor and New, in 1882; and on Ann, in 1888. From a finance report made on the first Monday in June, 1888, the values of grounds, buildings, furniture, etc., were given as follows: High School, $42,000; Rockland Street School property, $10,000; Lemon, $81,250; James, $12,750; Prince, $10,000; Strawberry, $8000; New, $18,250; Duke (three buildings), $25,000; Vine (three buildings), $16,750; Orange (two buildings), $6000; Chestnut (three buildings), $15,000; Manor, $12,500; Ann, $12,500. The total assets according to this report were $207,437.11; receipts, $71,785.79; liabilities, $47,000.

The report of the city superintendent shows the number of pupils enrolled to be: in high school, 201; in secondary, 915; in primary, 1823; total, 2939.

The Yeates Institute of Lancaster was incorporated Aug. 18, 1857, having for its object "the education of young men in all the customary branches of a thorough academical course of learning;" the preparation of students for mercantile pursuits, for universities and higher colleges, and also for holy orders, if desired; the trustees of the institution to be seven in number, including, ex officio, the rector of St. James' parish, Lancaster, and six others to be elected from time to time by that vestry.

The corporation was liberally endowed by Miss Catharine Yeates, from whom it takes its name, and the fund, by careful management, is now (1888) sufficient to secure an adequate support to the master and assistants, and insure the permanence of the school.

The property now owned by Thomas E. Franklin was purchased, and a school was held therein for several years. Afterwards the school declined, the property was sold, the money invested and reinvested till it reached the sum of fifty thousand dollars. About 1879 the present lot, on the northwest corner of North Duke and East Walnut Streets, was purchased, and in 1880 the present brick structure was erected and soon after occupied. The school was reopened on the 1st of September, 1878, in a building south of the Duke Street Methodist Episcopal Church, where it was held until the new building was completed. The institute has at present about forty-five students, under the charge of the Rev. L. M. Hardy. The present board of trustees are Rev. C. F. Knight, D.D., president; William Aug. Atlee, George Calder, Jr., John S. Messersmith, M.D., George Nauman, Samuel H. Reynolds, Evan Shippen.

Franklin and Marshall College.—Franklin and Marshall College, with its associated institutions, occupies an eminence in the northwestern part of the city of Lancaster. The "campus" contains about twenty acres, of which a considerable part is occupied by choice trees and shrubbery. On either side of the main college building, whose lofty tower may be seen from a great distance, stand the halls of the Diognothian and Goethean Literary Societies. At some distance are Harbaugh Hall, used for rooming and boarding students, and the Academy, occupied mainly by the Preparatory Department. The residences of several of the professors of the Theological Seminary are also situated on the "campus," which is certainly one of the most beautiful places in the vicinity of Lancaster.

As its name indicates, Franklin and Marshall College was formed by the consolidation of two older institutions. It therefore becomes necessary to trace the history of each of these components before considering the institution as at present constituted.

On the 10th of March, 1787, the General Assembly of Pennsylvania passed an act entitled "An Act to incorporate the German College and Charity School in the borough of Lancaster." In the preamble it is stated that "the citizens of this State of German extraction have eminently contributed, by their industry, economy, and public virtues, to raise the State to its present happiness and prosperity," and that "a number of citizens of the above description, in conjunction with others, from a desire to increase and perpetuate the blessings derived to them from the possession of property and a free government, have applied to this House for a charter of incorporation;" . . . "whereas the preservation of the principles of the Christian religion and of our Republican form of government in their purity depend, under God, in a great measure on the establishment and support of suitable places of education, for the purpose of training a succession of youth, who, being enabled fully to understand the grounds of both, may be led the more zealously to practice the one and the more strenuously to defend the other." Dr. Benjamin Rush says, in an essay written in 1789, "A college has recently been founded by the State in Lancaster, and committed chiefly to the care of the Germans of all sects, for the purpose of diffusing learning among their children. In this college they are to be taught the German and English languages, and all those branches of literature which are usually taught in the colleges of Europe and America."

According to its title, the new institution was not only a college but a charity school. We take it for granted that it was, in a certain sense, based on the charity school which had been founded in Lancaster as early as 1754. It is therefore proper to give some account of the earlier movement in behalf of the establishment of charity schools among the Germans of Pennsylvania.

In 1751 the celebrated missionary Michael Schlatter, who had been previously sent to this country by the Synods of Holland, visited Europe to solicit financial aid for the Reformed Churches and schools of Pennsylvania. There can be no doubt that the condition of the latter was in many respects deplorable. The people were generally poor, and the number of ministers and teachers was exceedingly small. Schlatter issued an appeal for aid, which elicited a favorable response. A large sum of money was collected, and from the fund thus created the Reformed Churches and schools of Pennsylvania for many years received liberal contributions.

The success which had attended the labors of Schlatter in Holland and Germany suggested an extensive educational movement in England in behalf of the Germans of Pennsylvania. Rev. David Thomson translated Schlatter's appeal into English, and a number of philanthropists organized a "Society for the Promotion of the Knowledge of God among the Germans." In order to attract attention to the scheme, the condition of these Germans was grossly exaggerated. They were not only represented as ignorant beyond comparison, but as fast becoming "like unto wood-born savages." It was even suggested that unless their children received an English education they might prove rebellious; and Archbishop Herring declared it would be a dreadful thing if the Germans should come under the influence of the French and Jesuits, and finally drive the English out of America. It was in consequence of these imputations that the Lutherans, in 1754, and the Reformed, in 1756, adopted resolutions expressing their indignation at such insinuations and their loyalty to the king.

Even at this early period this charitable movement had to some extent become political. A very large sum of money was collected, said to have amounted to £20,000, which was placed in the hands of trustees in Pennsylvania, in trust for the establishment of "charity schools" among the Germans. These trustees consisted mainly of the colonial aristocracy, who made no secret of their intention to employ the schools as a means of breaking the alliance which had hitherto subsisted between the Germans and the Quakers. No doubt, when they rode about in their coaches to establish schools, they did not do much to conciliate the recipients of their bounty.

Charity schools were established in Reading, York, Easton, Lancaster, New Hanover, and Skippack. Schlatter was persuaded to become superintendent of schools, but he was powerless in the face of the opposition that had been aroused against them. Christopher Saur (Sower), the celebrated printer, denounced them in his paper, insisting that they were an attack on the German language, and that they were intended to prepare the way for the establishment of the Church of England. The Germans were consequently greatly excited, and held meetings, in which they resolved not to patronize the charity schools. This may seem to have been the extreme of folly, but yet it must be confessed that they had some reason to be dissatisfied. Though they had founded a parochial school in close connection with almost every one of their churches, they were stigmatized as hopelessly ignorant. No wonder that Christopher Saur was not willing to rest quietly under this imputation of ignorance when, at his great establishment at Germantown, he was printing more books than any other publisher in the American colonies. The conduct of the Germans in refusing to avail themselves of the benefits of the charity fund was perhaps unwise, but it is not surprising that they were incensed at being represented in the Old and New Worlds as proper subjects to be bribed and civilized by a foreign charity. "It was," says Dr. Harbaugh, "in a measure at least, a just indignation, and we feel disposed first to blame them somewhat for a lack of humanity, and then to praise them more for their manliness and sense of honor."

The trustees soon withdrew their support from the charity schools, and some of them ceased to exist within a year after their organization. The schools at Lancaster and several other places, however, continued to exist, being partly supported by private liberality. In 1769, according to a report made by Provost Smith, the school at Lancaster was attended by sixty-five scholars. How long it was sustained we have no means of knowing. There is no record of any appropriation after 1762, but it is not impossible that it may have existed as a private school almost, if not quite, to the time of the founding of Franklin College.

What finally became of the charity funds it is impossible to say. As the interest alone could be applied to the schools, it would seem as though the principal must have remained intact. "Those who had control of the fund," says Dr. Harbaugh, significantly, "no doubt found some more promising object to which to apply the capital." There is no proof that any portion of the fund was ever applied to the support of Franklin College; but the official title of the latter institution plainly indicates that it was in some sense a continuation of the charity school of Lancaster. It is not impossible also that some school furniture or other property may in this way have passed into the possession of the new institution. This supposition is strengthened by the fact that the trustees of Franklin College were required by their charter to reserve one-sixth of their income for the support of a "charity school" in connection with the institution.

According to Rupp ("History of Lancaster County," p. 446), there was a classical academy in Lancaster about the year 1780, but "owing to the violent temper of the teacher and the many indignities which he offered to the pupils under his charge it was finally suspended." "This school," continues the same writer, "suggested the idea of establishing another, but upon a surer basis, . . . and ultimately begat the application to the Legislature for the incorporation of Franklin College." It is probable that the leading citizens of Lancaster were in this way prepared to take an interest in the new institution, but it is certain that it was not intended to be merely a local interest, and that the ideas of its founders were far more comprehensive than this statement would seem to indicate.

The early ministers of the Lutheran and Reformed Churches keenly felt the necessity of establishing a literary institution. They could not expect to receive a constant supply of educated ministers from Germany, and to send young men to the Fatherland to be educated was dangerous and expensive. "Of what use, too," they inquired, "was it to establish schools for the German people so long as it was impossible to secure the services of competent teachers?" In the hope of meeting this want Rev. Dr. J. C. Kunze, of the Lutheran Church, of Philadelphia, established a classical school, which was finally superseded by the German Department of the University of Pennsylvania. The latter school was prosperous until the organization of Franklin College, when it rapidly declined, and was soon discontinued.

The beginning of the year 1787 was believed to be especially auspicious for the foundation of a literary institution of a more comprehensive character. The country had to a great extent recovered from the Revolution, and was about to adopt a Federal Constitution. Many ancient prejudices had passed away, and there was especially a kindly feeling towards the Germans of Pennsylvania for their patriotism during the war of independence. The leading ministers of the Lutheran and Reformed Churches, the most prominent German denominations, were on terms of affectionate intimacy; and it was believed that by their co-operation an important work could be performed for the literary advancement of the German people. Having determined that the time had come for an earnest effort in this direction, these ministers had no difficulty in securing the earnest co-operation of the foremost men in the State, and an application was made to the Assembly for an act of incorporation. It was, of course, never intended to establish a purely German institution, but it was believed that by the proper cultivation of both languages it might be possible to bring the German and English citizens more closely together, and thus to advance the literary and social interests of the whole people.

Benjamin Franklin, the most eminent citizen of Pennsylvania, was instrumental in the establishment of many philanthropic institutions. Among these we may mention the Philadelphia Library, the Pennsylvania Hospital, the American Philosophical Society, and the University of Pennsylvania. It would be ungracious, we think, to refuse to recognize him as the founder of Franklin College. Though advanced in years he took a deep interest in the new institution, and was the largest individual contributor to its endowment. In the charter the title is set forth as follows: "From a profound respect for the talents, virtues, and services to mankind in general, but more especially to this country, of His Excellency Benjamin Franklin, Esq., President of the Supreme Executive Council, the said college shall be and hereby is denominated Franklin College."

It was expected by the friends of the proposed institution that the Legislative Assembly would make a considerable appropriation towards its endowment. In this expectation they were disappointed. By the incorporating act ten thousand acres of land lying within the boundaries of the present counties of Lycoming, Tioga, Bradford, and Venango were granted to the college, the expenses of surveying to be paid out of the treasury of the State. The writer has in his possession an original order directed to Dr. Benjamin Rush, and signed by John Buchanan, directing the former to pay on May 1, 1787, one hundred and six pounds and ten shillings, for "surveying and returning into the land-office five thousand acres of land." This document is indorsed by Benjamin Rush, Henry Helmuth, and Peter Muhlenberg. At the bottom there is the following note, also signed by John Buchanan: "This order shall not amount to more money than £60, providing the trustees may not be able to procure £46 10s. from the treasury." It seems, therefore, that there was some difficulty in obtaining from the State the amount necessary for surveying the lands included in the donation.

On the 27th of February, 1788, an act was passed for "vesting the public store-house and two lots of ground in the borough and county of Lancaster in the trustees of Franklin College for the use of said institution." This store-house was situated on North Queen Street, near James. It was long employed as a college building, but was finally divided into dwellings, and is now known as "Franklin Row."

There was some dissatisfaction because the gifts of the Assembly did not include an appropriation in money. The lands were at that time unsalable, and the old store-house required extensive alterations before it could be made available as a college building. The friends of the college, however, went to work, and a considerable sum was collected for its endowment. It is to be regretted that we have no account of the sums secured in this way. Among the papers of the Hon. Jasper Yeates there was found an undated account, giving a list of some of these subscriptions. It is believed to include only the sums which had been paid at the time of the laying of the corner-stone of the first college building. The following is a copy of this interesting paper:

"The following Gentlemen have paid their subscription towards Franklin College in Lancaster:

That some of the subscriptions were not immediately paid is evident from the following memorandum, also found among the Yeates papers:

"At a meeting of the Trustees of Franklin College on the Twentieth Day of February, 1792.

"On Motion, The Honorable Jasper Yeates, Esquire, The Honorable William Bingham, Esq., and Phillip Wager, Esquire, are appointed a Committee to procure the Deeds for the Lands granted by the Commonwealth for the Benefit of the College. And also to collect Such outstanding subscriptions as yet remain unpaid in the City of Philadelphia.

"Extract from the Minutes.

"JOSEPH HUBLEY, Secretary."

Beyond these notices the writer has no knowledge of the amount of money collected for the endowment of Franklin College. It is evident, however, that it was utterly inadequate to its intended purpose. Many years had to pass before the land, which had been granted by the Legislature, became sufficiently valuable to be sold to advantage, and thus to furnish the nucleus of a respectable endowment.

Though the Assembly had granted the public store-house for a college building, it required extensive alterations, and in all probability an addition was at this time made to the original structure. The laying of the corner-stone was performed by Benjamin Franklin, and was one of his latest official acts. On this occasion he was accompanied by a French author, Hector St.-Jean Crèvecoeur, who, in his book ("Voyage dans la Haute Pennsylvanie"), has preserved a record of the event. He says, "In the year 1787 I accompanied the venerable Franklin, at that time Governor of Pennsylvania, on a journey to Lancaster, where he had been invited to lay the corner-stone of a college which he had founded there for the Germans." The author then proceeds to give an account of a conversation with Franklin concerning the origin of the American Indians. It is a pity that he did not rather speak at length of the exercises attendant upon the laying of the corner-stone.

When the college building was ready to be occupied, the institution was formally opened in the most dignified and impressive manner. Several copies of the programme are still extant, one of which is in the possession of the writer. It was printed both in English and German on the same sheet. The English version is as follows:

By Jehovah's care protected
The Fairer gains a height sublime;

All its base and dark attendants,
Superstition,
Pride and Discord fly from Truth.

2. Antistrophe.

All in the glorious work assisting,
We build on Christ the corner-stone;

The procession to return to the court-house in the foregoing order.

The German programme includes several beautiful original hymns which were probably composed by Rev. Dr. Helmuth. The German sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. H. E. Muhlenberg, and the English by Rev. Joseph Hutchins, rector of the Episcopal Church. Both sermons were published in pamphlet form, the latter not until 1806, nineteen years after its delivery. In his discourse Mr. Hutchins took occasion to recommend that the new institution should be prevailingly English. "As the limited capacity of man," he said, "can seldom attain excellence in more than one language, the study of English will consequently demand the principal attention of your children." However innocent such utterances may now appear to have been, they were hardly prudent under the circumstances. It would have been better to employ language like that of Benjamin Rush in his "Essay on the Germans," written two years later: "Do not contend with their prejudices in favor of their language. It will be the channel through which the knowledge and discoveries of the wisest nations in Europe may be conveyed into our country."

The first board of trustees of Franklin College, as indicated in the charter, consisted of the following gentlemen: Hons. Thomas Mifflin and Thomas McKean, Revs. John H. C. Helmuth, Casper Weiberg, Henry Muhlenberg, William Hendel, Nicholas Kurtz, George Troidiener, John Herbst, Joseph Hutchins, Frederic Weyland, Albertus Helfenstein, W. Ingold, Jacob Van Buskirk, Abraham Blumer, Frederic Dalecker, O. E. Shultz, F. V. Meltzheimer, Messrs. John Hubley, Joseph Hiester, Casper Schaffner, Peter Hoofnagle, Christopher Crawford, Paul Zantzinger, Adam Hubley, Adam Reigart, Jasper Yeates, Stephen Chambers, Robert Morris, George Clymer, Phillip Wagner, William Bingham, William Hamilton, William Rawle, Lewis Farmer, Christopher Kucher, Phillip Groenwaldt, Michael Hahn, George Stake, Sr., and John Musser.

This was a very intelligent and distinguished body. The clergymen named were generally the foremost men in the Lutheran and Reformed Churches. Included in the list were a number of distinguished Revolutionary officers and at least four of the signers of the Declaration of Independence.

The charter as granted by the Legislature appears at first sight to have been sufficiently liberal and comprehensive. The faculty and board of trustees were authorized to grant such degrees in science and the liberal arts "as are usually granted in other colleges in America and Europe." The college was authorized to hold property and to receive bequests, "provided always the same do not exceed in the whole the yearly value of ten thousand pounds, valuing one Portugal half Johannes, weighing nine penny-weight, at three pounds."

Though apparently so liberal, the charter was, however, in some respects cumbrous and defective. Fifteen of the trustees were required to be members of the Lutheran Church, fifteen of the Reformed, "the remainder to be chosen from any other society of Christians." The president of the college was to be forever chosen alternately from the Lutheran or Reformed Churches, unless the trustees should "unanimously agree to elect and appoint two or more persons in succession of the same religious denomination, or some suitable person of any other society of Christians." In guarding the various interests represented various minute regulations concerning meetings and elections were introduced into the charter, which subsequently interfered materially with the successful working of the institution.

Rev. H. E. Muhlenberg, D.D., was the first president of Franklin College. He was a son of Rev. Dr. H. M. Muhlenberg, "the patriarch of the Lutheran Church in America." For thirty-five years he was pastor of Trinity Lutheran Church, Lancaster, and he is celebrated as one of the foremost of American botanists. It is probable that his presidency was rather a position of honor than of labor, and that from the beginning the actual duties of the office devolved principally on the vice-presidents. It is, however, known that he taught in the college, and that he refused to accept a compensation for his services.

Rev. Frederick Valentine Melsheimer was the first vice-president and second president of the institution. He was a distinguished scientist, and is called "the father of American entomology." The college having been divided into two sections on the question of languages, Mr. Melsheimer took special charge of the German department. Subsequently he became pastor of the Lutheran Church of Hanover, York Co., where some of his descendants still reside.

Professor Stewart, a native of Ireland, had charge of the English department, but we know nothing further concerning his personal history.

Rev. Joseph Hutchins, of the Episcopal Church, was also for a short time a professor in Franklin College, as appears from a letter to Hon. Jasper Yeates, written in 1788.

John C. W. Reichenbach was the first professor of mathematics. He published a book called "Agathon," and was a frequent contributor to the periodicals of the day. He was also treasurer of the faculty, as appears from the following document, of which the original is in the possession of the writer:

"JASPER YEATES, Esq.

Dr. to FRANKLIN COLLEGE.

This paper is indorsed by Judge Yeates; W. Reichenbach, treasurer

James Ross, the author of the celebrated Latin grammar, is often referred to as one of the earliest professors, but he really did not enter upon the duties of his office as Professor of Ancient Languages until 1801. His term of service extended until about 1808, during which period he composed his grammar, which was for many years almost exclusively used in American colleges. In 1804 he composed his Latin ode to the memory of Dr. Nisbet.

There is no evidence that Franklin College ever formally graduated students or conferred degrees in the liberal arts. This was probably due to the exalted ideas of the faculty concerning the proper requirements of academic distinction. It was, however, customary for many years to hold an annual festival, which in many respects resembled a modern commencement.

In the Lancaster Neue Unpartheyische Zeitung for Nov. 5, 1788, we find a communication giving an account of the earliest of these festivals. It purports to be an extract from a letter addressed by a gentleman in Lancaster to a friend in Philadelphia, and was probably written by a member of the Muhlenberg family. The following is a translation:

"You inquire concerning the annual examinations of Franklin College, and whether it is worth while further to sustain the institution. On this subject I can give full information, as I was from the beginning to the end an interested spectator, and am glad to announce that the exercises were equally honorable to teachers and students. They commenced at 9 o'clock, A.M., Oct. 17th, and continued until 1 P.M. Dr. Muhlenberg opened with prayer. Immediately afterward two young orators invoked the interest and attention of the audience and recommended the institution to their favor. This was done for the German students by Henry Muhlenberg, of Philadelphia, and for the English by Samuel Bethel. After these speeches the German class was examined. The pupils read slowly and distinctly, and replied very satisfactorily to sundry questions in Christian doctrine. After this Peter Roth, of Northampton, delivered a German oration to the effect that arts and sciences are conducive to rational advancement, and John Yeates recited an English ode to the Deity.

"Next the class in English reading was examined. I was curious to observe whether our German boys could pronounce English well, and I cannot say that I discovered the slightest difference in this respect between them and those who were English born, except that the Germans read more slowly and distinctly.

"This exercise was followed by two orations,—one in English, by Edward Hubble, and another in German, by Abraham Hendel,—on the theme, 'How literary institutions may best be established.' Then the German students were examined in history and geography, particularly in those of the United States. You know how important this subject is, and you will approve of the fact that an hour is daily devoted to it in the college. The ready answers showed that it was a subject of interest. Immediately afterwards the pupils of the English class were examined in English grammar, and they answered very freely.

"Next came a young Latin orator, John Neuman. Whether it was the Latin language that affected me, or his gentle, cultured manner, I cannot tell. His beautiful discourse, based on Proverbs III. 13-14, interested me exceedingly. I am told that he is a young man who is distinguished by industry, talents, and good manners, but he is the son of a poor widow. If I were connected with the German Society of Philadelphia I would venture to recommend him to its good offices. The worthy members of that society have done much for the youth of Philadelphia: would they not be willing to extend their hand a little further?

"Besides this oration, another discourse in Latin, pronounced according to the English dialect, was delivered by Henry Moore. You are probably aware that the English patrons are permitted to have their children instructed in English-Latin by the English professor, the German professor teaching the language with the German pronunciation. The great difference between these two methods of pronunciation I observed during the examination of the pupils. The German Latinists translated a passage and freely answered questions in Grammar, Antiquities, and History; and I believe every unprejudiced Judge must have acknowledged that, considering the time employed in study, the students had made remarkable progress. The English-Latinists were of various degrees of proficiency, and translated from Virgil down to the simplest exercise. I am not sufficiently familiar with their dialect to give judgment concerning their scholarship. They answered every question freely.

"After these examinations there were exercises in declamation. Barton Zantinger and Henry Schlauch recited English verses, and the exercises concluded with two pleasantly-written dialogues. The subject of the first was 'The Advantage of Education to Mechanics.' John Schaffner and George Hendel spoke on this subject to the great satisfaction of the audience. The second dialogue treated the question, 'Why do so few Germans give their children a good education?' This dialogue was spoken by Frederick Muhlenberg, of Philadelphia, Jacob Miller, and George Frick, and this concluded the examination.

"The attention of the audience and their pleased expression of countenance were certain signs of their satisfaction, and I feel assured that our college will receive their future support.

"After the examination Dr. Hendel, in the name of the trustees, thanked the professors, Messrs. Melsheimer and Stewart, expressed equal satisfaction with the students, gave the latter some wholesome advice, and commended the institution to the providence of God.

"As all this was done in German, a similar address was made in English by the Rev. Mr. Horst, pastor of the Moravian Church. Possibly I may soon send you copies of some of the orations and addresses, which I am sure you will read with pleasure. I trust you will continue to be a faithful friend of Franklin College."

In the following year, 1789, the closing exercises were held on the 3d of July. From an article, which we have not room to quote, we learn that there had been "evident improvement since the last examination." Orations were delivered in English by Messrs. Moore and Roth, in German by John T. Faber, Jr. (afterwards an eminent Reformed minister), and in Greek by John Neuman. The writer says, "The Greek classes are still rather weak. The English students translated passages from the New Testament, and the Germans rendered extracts from Lucian and from a small Greek Chestomathy, which has been introduced into the institution." In conclusion the writer says, "When we consider the brief time that has elapsed since the founding of the school it must be acknowledged that much has been done, and it certainly deserves our warmest sympathy and support. It would be a great pity if, as has been suggested, the institution should finally fail for lack of funds. I am not willing to give up the hope that the German national spirit will finally awake, and that Franklin's school will be properly supported. If this does not speedily occur, the Germans of Pennsylvania will fail to know the things that belong to their peace, and who knows but that their neglect will be followed by a tardy repentance which a little effort might have so easily averted."

The chief difficulty with which the young institution was forced to contend was not lack of patronage. From an appeal issued by Professor Melsheimer, Feb. 27, 1788, and published in the Neue Zeitung, it appears that there were at that time one hundred and five students, of whom about twenty received instruction in the higher branches. To extend the advantages of the institution the rates of tuition had, however, been fixed at the lowest possible rate, 20 shillings per session for German, 50 shillings for German and English, and £4 for all branches. The receipts from tuition for the first session were only £40, and for the second, £70. There were three salaried teachers who received about £410. It is not surprising, therefore, that the treasurer, John Hubley, Esq., at the end of the first year reported a deficit of £244. In a letter to Dr. Benjamin Rush, of Philadelphia, the treasurer says, "I wrote to you some time ago how poorly our college stands, and how far we are in arrears; these arrears are increasing daily, and unless you gentlemen in Philadelphia will put your shoulders to the wheel we must inevitably perish, and that soon."

In the Neue Zeitung for March 12, 1788, a correspondent suggests that "the professors might bridge over the financial difficulty by accepting an annual salary of £100 instead of £200, as they have private means." The next number of the paper contains a reply, which states that the professors are doing the very thing that has been suggested. "One of them is working for one-fourth of what had been promised him, and all are willing to make every possible sacrifice."

It is evident, therefore, that the chief trouble was financial. Professor Melsheimer writes, "If the Germans will take an interest and increase the endowment, the institution will soon be among the most prosperous in the State." The German papers of the day contain many appeals for aid, as well as bitter complaints against the German people for their lack of interest in this important enterprise. The fact is, the time for success on so extensive a scale had not yet arrived. A large portion of the German population of Lancaster County was not favorable to higher education, and even the Lutherans and Reformed were not generally enthusiastic. They were warmly attached to their native language, and feared that the new institution would make the English language more prominent than the German. If either of the Synods had possessed supreme control, it is probable that arrangements would have been made to meet the deficiencies of income by special contributions from the churches, but as it was neither body was properly conscious of its responsibility, and each depended upon the other. Franklin College was therefore neglected, and the trustees could discover no way of preventing utter ruin than by contracting its operations. It has been assumed by some writers that the college was closed, but this is a mistake. Rev. Dr. F. A. Muhlenberg,<sup>1</sup> who was himself a professor at a comparatively recent period, says concerning it, "The school, it must be admitted, was constantly kept open, so that parents resident in that vicinity seldom stood in need of a place where their children could receive, at least, a respectable classical education." Sometimes, however, there was but a single professor, who received a small stipend from the board, but depended in great measure on the fees received for tuition. As the entire building was not needed for this purpose, rooms were frequently let by the trustees for the use of private schools and academies. This is evident from the following abstracts of advertisements which appeared in local papers:

"Feb. 28, 1801. Mr. Doyle's Seminary will continue the ensuing summer and fall in Franklin College, as usual."

Aug. 10, 1804. The ladies of Lancaster advertise for subscriptions to repair the store house, "to render it a comfortable place for the accommodation of the several schools now taught in it."

Sept. 30, 1808. Nathaniel R. Snowden advertises that the trustees are finishing the room for the accommodation of the Latin and Greek students in the college, and that he expects to move his school to that place in October.

Sept. 12, 1809. B. F. Shippen advertises to open an academy the 13th instant "in Franklin College, permission being granted by the trustees."

Prominent among the early professors of Franklin College, besides those we have already mentioned, were Rev. Dr. Brownlee, Professor Schiffer, and Thor T. Norr, a native of Denmark, who was very highly esteemed by the community.

On the 14th of April, 1827, the Legislature of Pennsylvania passed an act incorporating the Lancaster County Academy. It will be remembered that about this time similar institutions were established in a number of counties of the commonwealth. The new institution received from the State a donation of three thousand dollars, and with this fund and other subscriptions a lot of ground was purchased on the east side of North Lime Street, between Orange and Chestnut, and in the year 1828 a commodious school building was erected. The first principal was Mr. James P. Wilson, who was afterwards president of Newark College, and subsequently became professor in the Union Theological Seminary in New York. The institution is said to have been well conducted, but was not very successful. At this period, however, Franklin College was brought to its lowest ebb, though by careful management its funds were increasing in value. It was therefore resolved to make an effort to re-establish the latter institution by purchasing the property of the academy, and on the 15th of May, 1839, in pursuance of an act of Assembly authorizing the transfer, its buildings were conveyed to the trustees of Franklin College. In the succeeding year these buildings were remodeled, and the institution reopened under the new arrangement.

As thus reorganized, Franklin College became a very excellent school. "In 1840, F. A. Muhlenberg, Jr., now professor in the University of Pennsylvania, and James Regan were elected teachers. In 1841 an English department was added to the classical and mathematical, and Mr. T. Day was elected teacher. This arrangement lasted four years, until April, 1845, when the last-named gentleman resigned. After the resignation of Mr. Day the two teachers previously mentioned continued in the service of the board until July 1, 1846, when Mr. James Regan resigned. At this period F. A. Muhlenberg, Jr., was unanimously elected Professor of Languages, and Rev. J. Chapman, Professor of Mathematics, and a union was effected with the public schools of the city of Lancaster, by virtue of which those pupils of these public schools who were sufficiently qualified were permitted to pass through the two departments of Franklin College free of expense, in consideration of the payment of the salary of one of the teachers by the board of school directors, though the management of the institution was in the hands of the board of trustees of Franklin College. This arrangement continued until September, 1849" (Dr. Muhlenberg, in Evangelical Review). About this time the Lancaster High School was established, and a great part of its local patronage was withdrawn from Franklin College. It was, therefore, resolved to erect a new building for the accommodation of students from abroad, and about seven thousand dollars had been subscribed for the purpose, besides five thousand dollars which had been appropriated for this purpose from the college treasury, when operations were suspended in consequence of a proposal for union received from the trustees of Marshall College, then located at Mercersburg, Pa.

The Lutheran and Reformed Churches had not forgotten their interests in Franklin College. In 1818 the Reformed Synod had declined a proposition from the Reformed (Dutch) Church to unite in the establishment of a literary institution, "because the German Reformed Church already has an interest, in common with other Germans of Pennsylvania, in an institution founded by the Legislature for the benefit of the Germans of this State." A communication from the Reformed Synod to the Lutheran led to a series of consultations, which produced no tangible results, except that each Synod voted an appropriation of one hundred dollars to the relief of Franklin College, on condition that the other Synod would do the same. In the same year a joint committee determined upon a course of study for the college. The plan was left for execution in the hands of Rev. Dr. Endress and Rev. J. H. Hoffmeier, pastors of the Lutheran and Reformed Churches of Lancaster, but they failed to agree, and the whole subject was indefinitely postponed. The subject was frequently brought up in the Synods, but it came to be felt that the interests of each denomination required a separate institution that should be under its exclusive care, and for whose prosperity it would be directly responsible.

Colleges were founded at Gettysburg and Mercersburg, and naturally claimed the affection of the churches that had established them. It consequently came to be acknowledged, even in Lancaster, that if Franklin College should be re-established on its original basis it would be difficult to secure the patronage of the churches, without which it could not hope to prosper. But two ways appeared to be open. One of these was to divide the funds of Franklin College between the colleges at Gettysburg and Mercersburg, and this seemed impracticable, as but two-thirds of the endowment belonged to the Lutheran and Reformed Churches. The other plan was to remove one or the other of these institutions to Lancaster, for the purpose of uniting it with Franklin College. So far as we know, the authorities of Pennsylvania College, at Gettysburg, manifested no disposition to remove; but the trustees of Marshall College were inclined to give the subject favorable consideration. After much private discussion the matter culminated at a series of meetings of the trustees of Franklin College, held during the winter of 1849-50. It was finally agreed that "one-third of the money belonging to Franklin College should be transferred to the trustees of Pennsylvania College, at Gettysburg, to endow with it the 'Franklin Professorship'; the remaining two-thirds to be retained at Lancaster, and given to the trustees of Marshall College on condition of its removal to Lancaster and its carrying on its collegiate operations there under the name of Franklin and Marshall College." The act of the Legislature confirming the action of the trustees was approved by the Governor April 19, 1850. The amount paid, according to agreement, to the trustees of Pennsylvania College for the Lutheran interest in Franklin College amounted to $17,169.61. This sum was collected in the Reformed Churches, and the endowment of Franklin College thus remained intact. The Lutheran Synod, at its meeting in Pottsville in 1850, "heartily approved" of the arrangement. Some time was, however, required to raise the required amount, and it was not until 1853 that the union of the colleges was actually consummated.

At this point it seems proper to give a brief sketch of Marshall College before its removal to Lancaster.

This institution, like most other American colleges, was founded in the special service of the church. The course of instruction pursued in theological seminaries is necessarily technical, and does not suffice to convey the broad, liberal culture which is necessary to the highest success in the ministry. It was the conviction of this fact that gave birth to Harvard, Yale, and the College of New Jersey.

Marshall College was founded in 1835. It developed out of the High School of the Reformed Church, which, in 1831, had been founded at York, Pa., where the Theological Seminary was at that time located. As the High School became prosperous there was a general desire to raise it to the rank of a college. At this time the trustees of Franklin College made liberal offers for the removal of the High School to Lancaster, but as the institution would, at that place, have been under the control of several denominations, and as the connection of a theological seminary with Franklin College was not desired, the invitation was respectfully declined. Proposals were received from the citizens of Mercersburg, and at the Synod of Chambersburg, in 1835, these proposals were accepted. The literary institution was at once removed to Mercersburg, but the seminary remained two years longer in York, under the care of Rev. Dr. Mayer. A charter for the college was obtained from the Legislature, which at the same time voted an appropriation of twelve thousand dollars to its endowment. The institution was named in honor of Chief Justice John Marshall, who was then at the zenith of his fame, but died in the same year.

Rev. F. A. Rauch, Ph.D., who had previously been principal of the High School, became the first president of Marshall College. He was born in Hesse-Darmstadt in 1806, and had been thoroughly educated at the University of Marburg. For a short time he was professor extraordinary at Giessen, but came to America in 1831, on account of political complications in his native land. After serving for some time as Professor of German in Lafayette College, he was called by the Reformed Church to take charge of its classical institution. He continued in this position until his death, which occurred March 2, 1841. In 1840 he published his work on "Psychology," which may be said to have introduced the science to the attention of American students. A more extensive work on "Ethics" was left unfinished. A volume of his sermons, entitled "The Inner Life of the Christian," was subsequently edited and published by Rev. Dr. E. V. Gerhart. Dr. Rauch's remains were removed from Mercersburg to Lancaster in 1859, and were solemnly re-interred in Lancaster Cemetery. A handsome monument to his memory has been erected in front of the college building.

Rev. John Williamson Nevin, D.D., LL.D., who had in the previous year become professor in the Theological Seminary, succeeded Dr. Rauch as president of Marshall College in 1841, and held this position until the removal of the college in 1853. Dr. Nevin is at present a resident of Lancaster County. As one of the foremost theologians and philosophers in this country, he naturally gave the institution over which he presided a high degree of prominence; and there are few preceptors anywhere who have possessed in so high a degree the respect and affection of their students.

The following gentlemen at various times held professorships in Marshall College: Samuel W. Budd, Jr., Thomas D. Bair, Esq., Theodore Appel, D.D., Joseph F. Berg, D.D., Albert Smith, William M. Nevin, LL.D., Philip Schaff, D.D., Traill Green, M.D., and Thomas C. Porter, D.D.

The village of Mercersburg is magnificently situated among the mountains of Franklin County. No one can make his home in the midst of such imposing scenery without learning to love it. The retirement of its situation was favorable to study, and it is therefore not surprising that the removal of the institution should have been accomplished with difficulty. There were, however, many reasons which rendered this advisable, if not unavoidable. Mercersburg was too far distant from the centre of the Reformed Church, and it seemed impossible to awaken the proper degree of interest in the endowment of the college. Agents were frequently sent out, but though many friends made personal sacrifices to sustain the institution, there were no large donations, and the funds increased slowly. The members of the faculty received very small salaries, and most of them were compelled to eke out their living either by teaching in the Theological Seminary or by preaching for neighboring churches. At the time of the removal the invested funds of Marshall College did not exceed sixty thousand dollars, a sum which was utterly inadequate to the establishment of the institution on a permanent basis. For these and other reasons the authorities of Marshall College were disposed to listen favorably to the proposed union with Franklin. It was, we think, an important movement, and one which has led to the happiest results. Hitherto the tendency in this country has been to multiply colleges and to isolate them. It would be a great advance in the cause of liberal education if many of our literary institutions could be united, and thus strengthened for a higher order of usefulness.

As we have seen, the act authorizing the union of the two colleges was passed in 1850, but it was not until May, 1853, that they were actually united. The formal opening took place on the 7th of June, in Fulton Hall. Addresses were delivered on this occasion by Hon. A. L. Hayes, Rev. Dr. J. W. Nevin, and the Right Rev. Alonzo Potter, D.D., Protestant Episcopal Bishop of the Diocese of Pennsylvania. Until 1856 the exercises of the college were conducted in the building on Lime Street, originally belonging to Franklin College, but in the mean time a fund of twenty-five thousand dollars was raised by the friends of the institution in the city and county of Lancaster, and the present college building erected on grounds purchased for that purpose. This building originally cost nineteen thousand dollars, but it has since been improved and extended. It was dedicated on the 16th of May, 1856. Addresses were delivered by Rev. Dr. E. V. Gerhart and Emlen Franklin, Esq.

According to the charter granted by the Legislature, Dec. 21, 1852, the united institution is possessed of all the rights and privileges formerly held by the two colleges of which it was constituted. One or more German professorships must always be maintained. By a supplement approved Feb. 16, 1867, the election of trustees is vested in the Synod of the Reformed Church in the United States. At least two-thirds of the trustees must be members of the Reformed Church, but it has been usual, as a matter of courtesy, to choose the remaining one-third from other denominations and the community in general.

At the time of the removal the presidency was tendered to Rev. Dr. Phillip Schaff, of Mercersburg.

He declined the call, and the office was vacant for more than a year. Rev. E. V. Gerhart, D.D., was elected in the fall of 1854, and entered upon his duties in the spring of the following year. He was president until 1866, when he was succeeded by Rev. Dr. J. W. Nevin, who had been president of Marshall College before its removal. Dr. Nevin's second term of service continued until 1876. He was succeeded by Rev. Thomas G. Apple, D.D., professor in the Theological Seminary, who is the present incumbent. The following gentlemen have held professorships in the institution: E. V. Gerhart, D.D., John W. Nevin, D.D., LL.D., William M. Nevin, LL.D., Theodore Appel, D.D., Thomas C. Porter, D.D., Adolphus L. Koeppen, A.M., John L. Atlee, M.D., Frederick A. Gast, D.D., John S. Stahr, Ph.D., Charles H. Budd, M.D., Daniel M. Wolf, A.M., Walter E. Krebs, A.M., Nathan C. Schaeffer, Ph.D., Joseph H. Dubbs, D.D., Frederick K. Smyth, A.B., John B. Kieffer, A.M., and Jefferson E. Kershner, A.M. Professors in the Theological Seminary have also occasionally taught in the college, and there have been many tutors, who were engaged for a limited term and were not entitled to a seat in the faculty.

The Diognothian and Goethean Literary Societies were organized on the 12th of June, 1835, in one of the rooms of the Classical Institution, in York, Pa., before the removal to Mercersburg and the organization of Marshall College. There had previously been a debating society connected with the school, which was now divided, mainly through the instrumentality of Rev. Dr. Samuel R. Fisher, in order that the two bodies might encourage each other by generous rivalry. Since that time the societies have been maintained with great spirit and enthusiasm. In Mercersburg they built commodious halls at a cost of about twelve thousand dollars. These they were compelled to leave at the removal; but they set to work again, and, mainly by means of contributions received on the personal solicitations of members, erected the present beautiful halls, at a cost of about eighteen thousand dollars. They were formally opened on Tuesday, July 28, 1857.

The students take great pride in their beautiful halls, which are handsomely furnished at their own expense. They have valuable libraries and cabinets which they endeavor to increase. At their meetings there are orations, essays, debates, and other literary exercises, and the business is conducted with the strictest regard for propriety and parliamentary usage. The training which students thus voluntarily impose upon themselves in their literary societies is regarded as an important part of their collegiate course.

This institution has been founded mainly for the purpose of preparing students for admission to the freshman class in college; but arrangements are made for the instruction of those who desire to become prepared for business, and do not desire to study the classics. The rector is appointed by the Board of Trustees, which exercises a general supervision over the institution, but practically the operations of the academy are conducted separately from those of the college. It occupies a comparatively new and commodious building, situated north of Harbaugh Hall.

Franklin and Marshall College has no enormous endowments such as it has been the good fortune of some other institutions to receive, but its financial condition has steadily improved. In 1873, Mr. Lewis Audenreid, of Philadelphia, bequeathed to the college the sum of thirty-five thousand dollars, which was until that time the largest amount it had ever received from a single individual. The more recent donation of the Wilhelm family, of Somerset County, consists to a great extent in real estate, so that it is impossible to form an exact estimate of its value. It has, however, already been of great advantage to the institution. The financial condition of the college may therefore be regarded as encouraging. It has no debt, and its property is daily increasing in value. Tuition may be regarded as virtually free, in consequence of the large number of certificates of scholarship—granting free tuition to any one whom the holder may designate—which are now in the hands of private individuals. The receipts from tuition are therefore trifling, but the income of the endowment has been hitherto sufficient to meet the wants of the institution.

It should be remembered that Franklin and Marshall College is a classical institution in the old sense of the term. It has no irregular or mixed classes. Though it might be easy to increase the number of students by establishing scientific or elective courses, it has been felt that to do so under present circumstances would be to cripple the classical course, without otherwise benefiting the institution.

In its requirements for admission and in its course of instruction throughout the college maintains a high standard, as may be seen by examining its catalogue. The faculty as at present constituted is as follows: Rev. Thomas G. Apple, D.D., president and Professor of Mental and Moral Science, Æsthetics, and the Philosophy of History; William Marvell Nevin, LL.D., Alumni Professor of English Literature and Belles-Lettres; Rev. John S. Stahr, Ph.D., Professor of Natural Science, Chemistry, and the German Language; Rev. Joseph Henry Dubbs, D.D., Audenried Professor of History and Archæology; J. B. Kieffer, A.M., Professor of Ancient Languages; Jefferson E. Kershner, A.M., Professor of Mathematics; John L. Atlee, M.D., LL.D., Emeritus Professor of Anatomy and Physiology; Alfred B. Horn, tutor. In the year ending June 21, 1883, there were in the college proper, not counting students of the Theological Seminary and the Academy, ninety-six undergraduates, viz.: seniors, twenty-five; juniors, twenty-two; sophomores, twenty-six; and freshmen, twenty-three.

The college is under the fostering care of the Reformed Church, but its course of instruction is in no sense denominational. There is a regularly-organized congregation, consisting principally of the professors and their families, with such students as may desire to be connected with it, which holds regular services in the college chapel; but students whose parents belong to other denominations are permitted to worship elsewhere, as their parents may direct. There is also a course of Biblical instruction on Sunday morning, and a morning service in the chapel. In short, the institution is Christian, but its religious teachings are not sectarian, and are solely intended to aid the student in the formation of a virtuous character.

We believe the time has come when the friends of Franklin and Marshall College should make an earnest effort to extend its usefulness. The foundations are firmly laid, and there is every inducement to earnest and unremitting labor. Every addition to its endowment can now be made to tell powerfully in the cause of higher education. The labors of a century have not been in vain. Many of the alumni, who now number nearly seven hundred, occupy prominent positions in church and state, and the high standard which is maintained by the institution is everywhere recognized and respected. We believe that the time has come to extend its operations, and thus to secure for it the position and influence to which it is justly entitled.

JOHN WILLIAMSON NEVIN, D.D., LL.D., was born in Franklin County, Pa., Feb. 20, 1808. He is descended from Scotch-Irish ancestry, and one conspicuous in statesmanship and literature. His paternal grandmother was a sister of the distinguished Hugh Williamson, LL.D., one of the framers of the United States Constitution, and a man noted in the republic of letters, from whom he derives his middle name. By birth and blood a Presbyterian, the venerable doctor, when a boy, was brought up carefully in the Christian faith by pious parents under the strict Old-School Presbyterian régime which at that time pervaded the whole community, and was especially prominent in the old Middlespring Church, which the family attended. His father, though a farmer, was a graduate of Dickinson College, and at an early day placed the Latin grammar in the hands of his son, which in due time he followed with the Greek, and gave him a drill so thorough, if not even severe, that more than one Franklin and Marshall boy felt the effects of it full fifty years afterwards.

In the fall of 1817 he was matriculated as a student in Union College, New York, then under the able presidency of Dr. Eliphalet Nott, and although the youngest in his class, was graduated with honor in 1821. On his way to college he met in New York City his patriarchal kinsman, Dr. Hugh Williamson, to whose advice may be partly due his correct habits, and life-long opposition to the use of tobacco and spirituous liquors. During his college life he professed a change of heart through the preaching of Mr. Nettleton, a revivalist, and united with the church. Bodily prostration for two years followed his classic career, which time he mostly spent in the fields and woods on the homestead, and acquired for a time a taste for botanical pursuits. Upon the return of his health he resumed the studies of Cicero, Homer, and the sweet-flowing language of Fenelon and Bossuet, for which he had an especial taste, with greater zeal than ever. Martial ardor also coming in for a share of youthful recognition, he united himself to a military company, and was chosen orderly sergeant.

In the fall of 1828 he entered the theological seminary at Princeton, and in the regular theological course took a special interest in Oriental and Biblical literature, reading the whole Bible in Hebrew, and thereby securing the flattering distinction of being universally admitted the best Hebrew scholar in the institution. This distinction may be regarded as forming the turning-point in his life, and contributed to mould his whole subsequent career. In 1826 he was invited to temporarily supply the chair of Oriental and Biblical literature, made vacant by Dr. Hodge, who was sent to Europe on a two-years' tour for his health, during which time he wrote his "Biblical Antiquities," a hand-book which has obtained an extensive circulation both in America and Europe. In October, 1828, he was licensed by the Presbytery of Carlisle, held at Philadelphia, to preach the gospel, and about the same time invited to the chair of Biblical Literature in the new theological seminary then being established by the General Assembly at Allegheny, Pa. In December, 1829, then in the twenty-seventh year of his age, he assumed his duties in connection with this institution, then laboring under the disadvantages of no buildings, no library, no endowment, no prestige from the past, and all uncertainty for the future, the East naturally clinging to Princeton, while the West was largely disaffected, leaving the young institution to draw its patronage largely from Western Pennsylvania. Here Dr. Nevin labored for ten years, preached as supply at many places, and regularly at "Braddock's Field," besides being busy with his pen—which never grew rusty—as a correspondent of the Presbyterian Christian Herald, and editor of The Friend, in the interest of the "Young Men's Society of Pittsburgh and vicinity."

The Western Theological Seminary, now a power in the Presbyterian Church, owes much of its prosperity to the assiduity and ability of the subject of this notice. About the same time of his election to the chair in this seminary, he received a pressing invitation to return to Princeton and become a writer of books for the Sunday-School Union, and in his sermons, lectures, and with his pen, while at Pittsburgh, he was the unreserved opponent of slavery, infidelity, fashionable amusements, ladies' fairs, and theatrical entertainments. In May, 1840, through the earnest solicitation of a committee appointed by the Synod of the Reformed Church in the United States, he accepted and was inducted into the professorship of theology in the Theological Seminary of that church, then located at Mercersburg, Pa. This change of position was not considered to be of itself any change of denominational faith, only a transition from one section of the general Reformed confession to another, and took place accordingly with the full approbation and favor of the friends of Dr. Nevin in the Presbyterian Church, and under the advice of Dr. Archibald Alexander, his former theological instructor at Princeton. During his connection with the Western Seminary he began the study of German, in order to reach the contents of the theological and philosophical works of the deep thinkers of Germany, the land of profound erudition and ripe scholastic attainment. This new position widened his view of the proper constitution and history of the Reformed Church, enlarged the range of his German studies, and brought him into a new and closer communication with the theological life of the Lutheran Confession, and in this way made room in his mind more and more for a sense of the catholic, the historical, the objective in Christianity, which may be taken as the key to the whole course of his thinking and working in the church afterwards down to the present time.

At Mercersburg Dr. Nevin was associated with the well-known German scholar, Frederick Augustus Rauch, then president of Marshall College, in the same place. The death of Dr. Rauch, March 2, 1841, made it necessary for Dr. Nevin to assume the temporary presidency of the college, which was afterwards made permanent, and which position he filled for ten years, without any salary. In 1843 he became involved in what has been known as the "anxious bench controversy," through the publication of his tract called "The Anxious Bench," directed against the use of certain means and methods employed extensively at the time among different denominations in the service of religious revivals, which has been regarded as the beginning of the movement since spoken of as the Mercersburg Theology.

In 1844 he received as his colleague in the seminary, Dr. Philip Schaff, of Germany, since famous throughout the world for his theological learning and as an honored professor in the Presbyterian Theological Seminary of New York. His inaugural address at Reading, in that year, in the German language, a truly able discussion of the distinctive, original, and fundamental meaning of the great reformation of the sixteenth century, Dr. Nevin translated and published in 1845, under the title of "The True Principle of Protestantism as related to the Present State of the Church," together with an introduction from his own pen, and by Dr. Schaff's particular desire, with the appendage also of a sermon on "Catholic Unity," preached by Dr. Nevin the previous year before a convention of the Dutch and German Reformed Churches in Harrisburg, the whole forming a volume of over two hundred pages.

In 1846 Dr. Nevin published "The Mystical Presence, a Vindication of the Reformed or Calvinistic Doctrine of the Holy Eucharist;" the same year "The Church," a sermon preached at the opening of the German Reformed Synod at Carlisle, came from his pen; in 1847, "The History and Genius of the Heidelberg Catechism;" and in 1848, a tract entitled "Antichrist, or the Spirit of Sect and Schism." From January, 1849, to January, 1853, he edited the Mercersburg Review, published by the Alumni Association of Marshall College, being its chief contributor, and he has written largely since for the same periodical, as well as for the Reformed Church Messenger. He resigned his professorship in the seminary in 1851, and the presidency of Marshall College in 1853, upon its removal to Lancaster and consolidation with Franklin College of this city. Although proffered the presidency of the new institution, he withdrew to private life, being nearly worn out in body and mind, but delivered, by special request, a baccalaureate address to the first graduating class of the new college on Aug. 31, 1853, which was published as a tract under the title of "Man's True Destiny." For one year after his resignation, Dr. Nevin resided at Carlisle, for one year in Lancaster City, from 1856 to 1858 at Windsor Forges, near Churchtown, the old mansion property of his wife's father, and since that time at "Caernarvon Place," in the immediate neighborhood of Lancaster City. Through those years he still continued to preach frequently and also to perform occasional work with his pen. He had much to do in particular with the long and difficult task of bringing to completion the new "liturgy" which engaged for so many years the best energies of the Eastern Synod of the German Reformed Church.

In the fall of 1861 he yielded to the desire of the faculty, and undertook partial service as professor in particular of History and Aesthetics, and in 1866 became once more president of the institution,—Franklin and Marshall College,—which position he resigned in 1876, and retired from all work of public instruction. Among his more important publications are the following: 1. "The Doctrine of the Reformed Church on the Presence of Christ in the Lord's Supper," an extended answer to Dr. Hodgo's review of "The Mystical Presence," in 1848; 2. "The Apostles' Creed: its Origin, Constitution, and Plan," 1849; 3. "Early Christianity," 1851; 4. "Cyprian," 1852; 5. "The Dutch Crusade," 1854; 6. "Review of Dr. Hodgo's Commentary on the Ephesians," 1857; 7. "The Liturgical Question," 1862; 8. "Christ and Him Crucified," a concio ad clerum, preached at the opening of the first General Synod of the German Reformed Church in Pittsburgh, 1868; 9. "Vindication of the Revised Liturgy," 1867; 10. "Answer to Professor Doener, of Berlin, Germany," 1868; 11. "Once for All," based on a sermon preached before the Synod at Danville, Pa., 1869; 12. "Revelation and Redemption," opening sermon before the Synod at Mechanicsburg, Pa., 1870; 13. "The Revelation of God in Christ," anniversary discourse before the Theological Seminary at Mercersburg, 1871; 14. "Christ and His Spirit," 1872; 15. "Baccalaureate Discourse, John iii. 13," 1872.

"Dr. Nevin, as a theologian, is one of no ordinary cast. His strong dialectic acumen has led him far beyond the range of mere theology, and has enabled him to unravel the mazes that metaphysical subtlety has drawn around the Christian faith. His own mind is a deeply metaphysical one, and his profound inquiries into this department have led him to scan the whole range of philosophy, and to investigate it on the metaphysical side from Aristotle to Hegel, as well as on the metaphysico-theological side from Plato to Schleiermacher. The argumentations and reasonings of an Origen, an Augustine, an Anselm, and an Aquinas are to him no longer mysteries. The thoughts of these world-renowned thinkers he has made his own. Although an American, he has made himself familiar with ancient forms of thought, and, after grasping the results of the Kantian problems, kept pace with the latest developments of the German mind.

"Like Jonathan Edwards, unfavored with European university culture, who by his own innate strength of intellect could grasp and solve the problems of the philosophers of whom he had never heard, and who ranks as the first metaphysician of his century, the subject of our notice has also probed the depth of the human understanding, and to his comprehensive mind metaphysical difficulties retire, and faith and reason stand harmonized in gospel revelation. To Dr. Nevin will history also accord, if not the highest niche in the temple of the metaphysical fame of the century, at least a very high one."<sup>1</sup>

His wife, Martha J., a woman of education and refinement, whom he married Jan. 1, 1835, is the second daughter of Hon. Robert Jenkins (1760-1848), member of Congress in 1809 to 1811, previously a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature, served in the insurrection of "Fries," soon after the Revolutionary war, and the well-known iron-master of Windsor Place, Caernarvon township, being a descendant of David Jenkins, who came from Wales in 1700, whose son John settled there in 1719. Her mother, Catherine Carmichael, a woman of great accomplishments, born in 1774, was married in 1799. Dr. Nevin's father was John (1776-1829) and his mother Martha McCracken (1779-1859), whose father, William (1758-1803), came from Scotland. Their eight children are: Dr. John W., William M., professor of Belles-Lettres in Franklin and Marshall College; Rev. Daniel E. Nevin, a

The Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church in the United States.—The Reformed Church in the United States is the American representative of the Reformed Church of Germany and Switzerland. It derives its origin from the Reformation of the sixteenth century. Among its founders and early leaders were Zwingle, Calvin, and Ursinus. Its confession of faith is the Heidelberg Catechism.

The earliest German Reformed Churches in Pennsylvania were founded about the year 1720. During the colonial period they were closely connected with the church in the Fatherland, and were supplied with ministers mainly through the zeal and liberality of the Synods of Holland. Subsequently a number of the most intelligent American ministers undertook to prepare young men for the pastoral office, and this method of perpetuating the ministry was continued until the establishment of the Theological Seminary.

After several unsuccessful attempts an institution for the instruction of candidates for the ministry was opened on the 11th of March, 1825, at Carlisle, Pa. This was done in consequence of a proposition from the trustees of Dickinson College, then under the care of the Presbyterian Church, to furnish rooms for the seminary, on condition that the Professor of Theology should teach history and German in the college. Rev. Lewis Mayer, D.D., was the first professor. The first class of students numbered five, of whom Rev. John G. Fritchey, of Lancaster, is the sole survivor.

Soon afterwards Rev. James R. Rely, one of the most zealous friends of the seminary, visited Germany to solicit contributions towards an enterprise that was so intimately related to the welfare of emigrants from the Fatherland. He was very kindly received, especially in Holland, Prussia, and Switzerland, and collected $6700, in money and books. One of the most liberal contributors was His Majesty, Frederick William III., King of Prussia, and many volumes presented by him are still in the library of the seminary. About the same time Rev. J. C. Beecher, of Shep-herdstown, Va., succeeded in this country in collecting a handsome sum for the endowment of the seminary, and thus, it is said, saved it from financial ruin.

The arrangement with Dickinson College not proving satisfactory, the seminary was in 1829 removed to York, Pa. Here it remained until 1837, when it followed the classical institution to Mercersburg. During all this time it was in charge of Dr. Mayer, who was, in 1831, assisted by Rev. Daniel Young, and subsequently by Dr. Rauch. As Dr. Mayer at first declined to remove to Mercersburg, the seminary was for one year in sole charge of Dr. Rauch. In 1838, Dr. Mayer was re-elected Professor of Theology, but he held the position only one year, and then retired finally from the institution. The vacant chair was filled by the election of Rev. John Williamson Nevin, D.D., then professor in the Western Theological Seminary of the Presbyterian Church at Allegheny. He entered upon his duties in the spring of 1840. For one year Drs. Nevin and Rauch were associated, but this pleasant relation was ended by the death of the latter in March, 1841. Then for three years, Dr. Nevin, assisted only by a teacher of Hebrew, had sole charge of the theological seminary. There was, however, an earnest desire in the church to aid him by securing a German professor to carry on the work which had been begun by the lamented Rauch. In 1843 the Synod unanimously elected to this position the Rev. Dr. F. W. Krummacher, of Elberfeld, Prussia. As Dr. Krummacher was the most celebrated pulpit orator of Germany, they would not have ventured to extend the call without assurances that it would be favorably considered. Rev. Drs. T. L. Hoffeditz and B. S. Schneck were appointed commissioners to present the call in person. They sailed for Europe in the following May, and were very cordially received in the Fatherland. Dr. Krummacher, however, finally felt constrained to decline, especially as the Prussian government expressed a decided disinclination to his removal. Unwilling to return to America without having accomplished their mission, the commissioners consulted with some of the leading divines of Germany, and were by them directed to Rev. Philip Schaff, Ph.D., who was at that time a professor extraordinary in the University of Berlin. On their return to America the delegates proposed his name to the Synod, and he was unanimously elected. He was installed Professor of Church History and Biblical Literature, in the city of Reading, on the 25th of October, 1844.

From this time forward, until the retirement of Dr. Nevin, in 1851, the history of the seminary runs parallel with that of the college. It was a period of great theological and literary activity. The professors edited reviews and published books which attracted general attention. There were earnest controversies, and Mercersburg Theology was a subject of discussion in theological circles in America and Europe. These discussions have now passed away, but it is pleasant to record that the professors were earnest, active, and laborious.

In 1853, Marshall College was removed to Lancaster, but the Theological Seminary remained in Mercersburg until 1871. Dr. Nevin had retired in 1851, but Dr. Schaff continued in connection with the institution until 1865. Rev. Bernard C. Wolff, D.D., held the chair of Systematic Theology from 1852 to 1864. He was succeeded by Rev. Henry Harbaugh, D.D., who occupied the position until his death, which occurred in 1867. Rev. E. E. Higbee, D.D., was Professor of Church History and Exegesis from 1865 to 1871. In 1868, Rev. E. V. Gerhart, D.D., was chosen to fill the place vacated by the death of Dr. Harbaugh. He was the only member of the faculty who accompanied the seminary to Lancaster.

In 1857 the Synod established a Theological Tutorship, partly by a fund invested in Germany, the gift of Baron von Bethman-Hollweg, which had been made available for this purpose, and partly by gifts from individuals and classes. The successive incumbents while the institution was in Mercersburg were William M. Reily, A.M., and Jacob B. Kerschner, A.M.

The largest contributions to the endowment of the institution received during this period were a bequest of ten thousand dollars from the estate of Mr. Daniel Kieffer, of Berks County, and a gift of five thousand dollars from Miss Ann E. Keller.

In 1871, Rev. Thomas G. Apple, D.D., was elected Professor of Church History and Exegesis, and Rev. F. A. Gast, D.D., was appointed tutor. In the following year the tutorship was changed to a full Professorship of Hebrew and Old Testament Theology, and Dr. Gast was elected professor. The faculty is now constituted as follows: Rev. E. V. Gerhart, D.D., Professor of Systematic and Practical Theology; Rev. T. G. Apple, D.D., Professor of Church History and Exegesis; and Rev. F. A. Gast, D.D., Professor of Hebrew and Old Testament Theology.

The seminary at present occupies rooms in the college building. It is probable that a building will finally be erected for its separate accommodation, but the present intimate relations of the two institutions have many advantages which are mutually appreciated.

When this Theological Seminary was organized there were about eighty ministers in connection with the Reformed Church in the United States; now there are nearly eight hundred. Other theological seminaries have been established, but a great part of this progress and success is naturally due to the oldest institution, which now numbers about four hundred ministers upon its roll of graduates. The demand for an educated ministry has never been more urgent than it is at present, and we therefore feel assured that the Theological Seminary will continue to enjoy the favor and patronage of the church.

The Juliana Library.<sup>1</sup>—Although the last of the thirteen colonies in point of colonization, it is the proud boast of Pennsylvania that she was the first among them to establish that great public educator, the subscription library. Long before any other colony had thought of making a step in this direction, Benjamin Franklin had laid the foundation of subscription libraries deep and well in giving birth and direction to the Philadelphia Library Company, whose origin dates back to 1732, and which Franklin with laudable pride called "the mother of all the North American subscription libraries." The Loganian Library building, erected in 1745, on a lot of ground on the west side of Sixth Street, between Chestnut and Walnut, in the city of Philadelphia, boasts the distinction of being the first building in the United States devoted to the uses of a public library.

In fact, despite the miscellaneous character of the people who came to Penn's colony during the first hundred years after it was founded, it seems to have been a sort of literary centre. Especially was this the case with Philadelphia. In a small volume of letters written by the Rev. Jacob Duché, the first chaplain of Congress, and of whom an excellent sketch appeared in No. 1, vol. ii. of the Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, the author says, "You would be astonished at the general taste for books which prevails among all orders and ranks of people of this city. The librarian (of the City Library) assured me that for one person of distinction and fortune there were twenty tradesmen that frequented this library."<sup>2</sup>

Elsewhere in the same volume we find the following: "There is less distinction among the citizens of Pennsylvania than among those of any other civilized city in the world. . . . Literary accomplishments here meet with deserved applause. But such is the prevailing taste for books of every kind that almost every man is a reader; and by pronouncing sentence right or wrong upon the various publications that come in his way, puts himself upon a level in point of knowledge with their several authors."

Evidently this same condition of things obtained in most of the towns throughout the colony. It must have been this same literary taste that in 1755 saw a second subscription library organized in the town of Hatboro', about sixteen miles north of Philadelphia, a third in the borough of Lancaster in 1759, and a fourth in Chester, the oldest town in the State, in 1769.

Of the Juliana Library so little was known that, in 1870, when the general government undertook to in-investigate the matter,<sup>1</sup> it had only a dozen lines to give to this institution, nearly every one of which contains an error, and which threw no light on the subject whatever. The casual discovery of the charter of incorporation in the recorder's office for Lancaster County by the writer some five years ago, led to an effort to collect materials for a sketch of the library, but the gleanings were so meagre that it became apparent nothing could be done with the few facts on hand. Recently, however, incited by several relics of the long-defunct library, the search was renewed, this time with more success. Not only was the constitution and by-laws brought to light, but the charter itself, as well as several pages of the original and only record-book, the accounts of the first librarian, and a number of other documents that were sufficient to form the foundation of an authentic, albeit very partial sketch of the third subscription library in the United States.

Although the charter of this library bears date of 1768, it had an existence of four years previous to that time, under another name however, that of "The Lancaster Library Company." The general scope and aim of the new organization may be learned from the constitution and by-laws, a portion of which is here given:

"Forasmuch as nothing can more usefully engage the Public Attention than the encouragement of Virtue, Taste, and Literature, which are the greatest ornaments of a Free People, and have in almost every Age and well regulated Community been patronized with laudable emulation by men of Sentiment and real Benevolence; and justly regarded as the firm Foundation upon which Liberty, Humanity, and Order were originally constructed and have from remotest Times been perpetuated and transmitted with ennobling Reputation; And as these Advantages may be successfully ascertained and propagated by having Recourse to the Writings of those several Authors who have treated the subjects whereon they respectively wrote with Accuracy, Penetration, and Judgment. The Persons who have hereunto subscribed their Names have resolved to erect a Public Library in the Borough of Lancaster in the Province of Pennsylvania, and for that valuable Purpose have collected several Sums of Money; and We do hereby covenant and agree, each Person for himself, his Heirs, Executors, and Administrators, to and with the Residue of the Subscribers, their Executors, Administrators, and Assigns in manner following, that is to say, &c."

Here follow numerous provisions of various kinds. One is that the numbers of subscribers shall never exceed one hundred. The annual dues were fixed at seven shillings and sixpence, fines arranged for, and other regulations made. The giving out of books was stringently guarded, every member being required to deposit a written ticket upon taking a book. Officers for the management of the library were provided for. A librarian, treasurer, secretary, and trustees, who were required to give security for the faithful performance of their respective duties.

Annual meetings for the election of officers were to be held on the 10th day of every November. The name assumed was that of the Lancaster Library Company, under which title it had an existence of four years. A seal was to be procured and kept in the library, with which all orders and public papers were to be sealed.

"In witness whereof the members of said company have hereunto set their hands — of November in the year of our Lord, 1769." Fifty-four names to begin with was not so bad. That they were in earnest is evidenced by the nine hundred and ninety-nine years through which they meant their association to endure. They even limited the membership to reasonable numbers. Not more than one hundred should belong to it at one time. Alas! what short-sighted mortals we are. It is more than probable that the roll of membership never reached that number. Perhaps it was never higher than when the charter of incorporation was applied for in 1768, when it contained seventy-seven names. All things considered, however, that was a good showing. Lancaster was a small town, comparatively speaking, with hardly more than five hundred houses, and not more than two thousand inhabitants; it does credit to her inhabitants that fifty-four names were signed to the constitution of the library company, whose owners were willing to pay seven shillings and sixpence yearly for the maintenance of the same. Franklin tells us that when he projected the subscription library with which his name is so indelibly connected, he "was not able, with great industry, to find more than fifty persons, mostly young tradesmen, willing to pay down for this purpose forty shillings each, and ten shillings per annum." When the relative wealth and number of inhabitants in the two places are considered, it must be conceded the Lancaster Library Company began its career under exceptionally favorable auspices.

How the new enterprise prospered during the few following years is not exactly known. Only two pages of the secretary's minutes have escaped the ravages of time. These are pages seven and eight;

the earlier pages, of which only five and six remain, are taken up with the constitution and by-laws, a synopsis of which has already been given. The organization was completed soon after the signing of the constitution. We learn from the record that one meeting was held in 1759, another in 1760, and three in 1761. The library was under full headway and apparently prosperous, and new members were taken in. The property of the association must have increased in extent and value, as we find William Dillwyn willing to pay three guineas and the last annual payment for membership. The original minutes of the recorded proceedings are appended, as much to place them permanently on record as to show the practical way these men had of carrying forward their laudable enterprise.

"Dec. 4, 1759. Agreeable to the aforesaid recited Articles, the following members were chosen directors, Treasurer, and Librarian, to execute their several services and continue in their several stations until the 15th day of September next ensuing, agreeable to the said articles, viz.: Emanuel Carpenter, Thomas Barton, Benjamin Price, Isaac Saunders, William Stoy, Joseph Rose, Edward Shippen, George Ross, Robert Thompson, Adam Simon Kuhn, Isaac Whitelock; Treasurer, Michael Cross; Librarian, Samuel Magaw.

"It likewise was ordered that the persons appointed at the last meeting to collect and receive the Subscriptions made and to be made for the use of the Library, do settle with and account for the same to the above-mentioned members and Chosen Directors, to be by them applied in purchasing of Books and other Services for the said Library, in such a manner as they shall think fit, agreeable to the Rules and Regulations aforesaid.

"At a meeting of the Members of the Lancaster Library Company the 15th of September, 1760, the following Gentlemen were chosen Directors, Treasurer, and Librarian, viz.: Edward Shippen, George Ross, Samuel Boude, Thomas Barton, Joseph Rose, Isaac Whitelock, William Stoy, William Bausman, Joseph Pugh, William Atlee, Benjamin Price; Treasurer, William Bausman; Librarian, Samuel Magaw.

"May 9, 1761. At a meeting of the Directors, the 9th of May, 1761, (present: Edward Shippen, Adam Simon Kuhn, George Ross, Joseph Rose, Samuel Boude, William Stoy, Isaac Whitelock, and Benjamin Price), agreed that the front left and home, in Benjamin Price's house, in Queen Street, be hired at the Rent of ten Pounds per annum, and for the term of three or five, as occasion may require; and the said Benjamin Price (one of the Directors), being present, agreed thereto.

"It was also ordered that the Librarian doth purchase boards and employ a workman to put up shelves in the above room, and the said Librarian is hereby empowered to apply to the Treasurer for the expenses thereof, who is hereby ordered to pay the same to the Librarian or his Order on sight.

"May 30, 1761. At a meeting of the Directors the 30th of May, 1761, Present Edward Shippen, Adam Simon Kuhn, Samuel Boude, Benjamin Price, Isaac Whitelock, Joseph Pugh, and William Atlee.

"Agreed that 'till the number of eighty subscribers be completed, no new Member shall be admitted without paying to the Treasurer the sum of three Guineas, together with the Annual Payments until the time of such admission and signing the Articles.

"That no Member shall take any Book out of the Library before he pays his Original Subscription, with the annual Contributors mentioned in the Articles, and that no Book shall be left to any Person who is not a Member.

"That William Dillwyn shall be received a Member of the Company, agreeable to his Request, upon delivering three Guineas and the last Annual Payment to the Treasurer and signing the Articles.

"That Books given out by the Librarian shall not be kept longer than a Week from the time of their being taken; this Rule holds 'till the next Meeting of the Directors, before which the Librarian is ordered to have Notes printed, in order to be signed and left as a Security for the safe return of Books by each Member that borrows any, and no person shall have more Books than one at a time.

"Aug. 3, 1761. At a meeting of the Directors the 3d of August, 1761, Present Thomas Barton, William Stoy, Edward Shippen, George Ross, Isaac Whitelock, Benjamin Price, and William Atlee.

"Agreed with respect to the time allowed for reading Books taken out of the Library; that Folios shall be returned in four weeks from the time they are taken out, Quarto's in three weeks, Octavos in two weeks, and Duodecimos in one week.

"Agreed that if upon the return of any Book it appears to be injured, the Librarian shall determine the damage and receive the fine accordingly. But when there is any Dissent from the Judgment of the Librarian in this Point, the matter must be referred to the Directors, and the Book must not be given out again 'till after their Determination.

"That the Books are all to be rated at one hundred and fifty per cent. upon the original cost, and that the Cash Notes given by the Borrowers for the security of the Library shall be filled according to this appraisement.

"Ordered that a proper Catalogue of the Books be fairly drawn out, and also a catalogue of the Members' names, the Accounts settled, etc.

"Agreed that John Craig be admitted a Member of this Company, having purchased a share of Wm. Smith, late of this county, with the consent of the Directors."

On a triangular corner of pages 9 and 10 it is seen a meeting was held on Sept. 15, 1761, and that one "Anderson will rent the . . . pounds a year."

The next authentic notice we have of this organization is the charter of incorporation, granted by Governor James Hamilton on the 22d day of October, 1763, and filed in the recorder's office on the 28th day of November of the same year. A most important change had taken place meanwhile. The old title had been dropped, and instead it took on the name of the Juliana Library. Unwearied and long-continued research has failed to reveal the smallest particle of evidence that might throw light on this interesting if not important point. Undoubtedly it was in the nature of a compliment to Lady Juliana Penn, daughter of the Earl of Pomfret, and wife of Thomas Penn, one of the Proprietaries. The commonly accepted opinion is, or rather was, that this noble lady was the patron, if not the founder, of the library. The facts already given show conclusively that it had been in existence four years before her name was in any way connected with it. All claims made for her as the founder consequently fall to the ground. That the change of name was brought about by the hope that Lady Penn might lend material assistance to the library seems more than probable. Perhaps its few years of existence were not attended with the prosperity that was hoped for, and the belief that the wife of one of the Proprietaries might, by donations of books or material assistance of some other kind, come to the rescue if her name was given to the association, was the inducing motive.

Let these things be as they may, there is no evidence that goes to show that these expectations, if really entertained, were realized to any considerable extent. Lady Penn did donate a few books to the library named after her, but they were very few. An examination of hundreds of volumes now in other local libraries, and that at one time undoubtedly belonged to the Juliana Library, gives no evidence, by inscription or otherwise, that any of them ever came from her whose name the library bore. The volumes in private hands, purchased at the sale when the remaining portion of the collection was finally disposed of, are equally silent on this point.

There is, however, one notable exception. Mr. William Heitshue, of Lancaster, is the owner of a copy of the Bible purchased by his father at this sale. It is a beautiful edition of the Scriptures, in three folio volumes, with an extended commentary on the Old and New Testaments.<sup>1</sup> On the lid of the first volume, in large gilt letters, is this inscription :

The Gift Of
THE RR. HONBLE.
LADY JULIANA PENN, To THE JULIANA LIBRARY,
At Lancaster.

The volumes measure eleven by seventeen and one-half inches, and are bound in full Russia leather. The binding is highly ornate. The most elaborate and beautiful hand-tooling adorns the back and outside and inner margins of the cover; such, indeed, as the best binders of our own day might be proud to own. These volumes, so far as known, are the only evidence of Lady Penn's bounty to the Juliana Library, and this gift, as the date of its publication indicates, was made at least seven years after the library had taken her name. From all the surroundings, and the little evidence there is to throw light on this matter, the conclusion is irresistible that the change of name was not in consequence of any special bounty on the part of Lady Penn, and that at no time did she lend material aid, either in books or money, to the organization. How the founders and members of the library regarded this action is, of course, a matter of conjecture. The reasonable inference, however, is, they did not consider their new departure in the light of a great success. The accounts of the treasurer from 1766 to 1769, all that are extant, show no donations in cash from Lady Penn. It is a reasonable conclusion, therefore, that whatever the governing motives may have been, they resulted in little or no benefit to the library. If any substantial evidence of Lady Penn's bounty was the inducing cause, we have a right to look for some acknowledgment of the same; if not in the charter itself, then in the other records of the association that have come down to us. But all are dark and silent on this point, and these worthies of a hundred years ago may be instanced as confirmative proof of the disappointment that is likely to await those who place too much reliance upon the patronage and generosity of the worldly great and high born.

During the four years that elapsed from the organization in 1759 to the incorporation in 1763, we find six of the original subscribers had dropped out.

Their places were more than filled by the twenty-nine new names which appear among the incorporators, swelling the total number to seventy-seven. These persons were not all residents of Lancaster City. Among the list of names we find many of the best-known citizens of the county; in fact, the list represents the most intelligent as well as the best element in the population. Many were men of more than local fame. Some had enjoyed the advantages of university training, more than half a dozen of them were lawyers, several were clergymen of eminence, a few of them were members of the Constitutional Convention, more than a score were members of the Legislature, and a number of them for more than twenty years.

It only remains to give such other particulars concerning the library as have been gleaned from contemporary records and the recollections of a few old citizens who were acquainted with it prior to its dispersion. Where the library was domiciled prior to 1761 is unknown. In that year, as appears from the minutes of the meeting held on May 9, 1761, a room was rented from Benjamin Price, on North Queen Street, for the term of three or five years, at the rate of ten pounds per annum. In 1766 the library was located in the house of Judge William Henry, on East King Street, now No. 8, who was also the librarian. His accounts with the library show that he drew rent from Nov. 1, 1766, to Nov. 1, 1768, at the rate of six pounds per annum, and the same sum for his services as librarian. How much longer it was kept there is unknown. It was moved from thence to what is now No. 1 East King Street, where it seems to have remained for a number of years. It was finally moved from that locality to what is now No. 21 North Queen Street. The cause of this last removal was the high rent it was compelled to pay, from which we may perhaps infer its financial affairs were not so flourishing as they might have been. In the last-named place the library remained for nearly or quite fifty years. It was placed there prior to the year 1800, and it remained there until sold in 1843, Mr. George Weitzel being the owner of the premises and acting as librarian. At the period of its last removal its days of greatest usefulness seem to have been over. Mr. George Weitzel, the son of the last librarian, and now more than eighty years old himself, and whose memory covers the period from 1810 to 1843, says few books were given out during that time. Occasionally persons would call and take out a few books, which seldom came back again. Dr. Meade, of Philadelphia, he remembers as one of these offenders.

The librarian and owner of the premises dying in 1843, the books were sold at public auction to satisfy the claims of the estate for rent. The appraisers were Dr. John Miller and William Gable, the auctioneer was Michael McGrann, and the clerk Thomas Zahm. There are two conflicting accounts as to the amount realized from the sale, the one placing the sum at three hundred dollars and the other at only eighty dollars. There are various reasons for believing the former amount the correct one. There is also a tradition that there was a previous sale of a portion of the library, in order to cover arrearages for rent, but this fact, while it is possible, has not been satisfactorily established.

The original scope of this institution was not that of a library merely. This is known not only by the few relics that have been preserved, but is further proven by four long-cap pages of accounts between the library and its librarian, Judge William Henry, in the latter's own handwriting, the only other original record concerning it that survives. There was a small telescope and other astronomical instruments; chemical and philosophical apparatus were also among its treasures. The jaws of a carnivorous animal also remain to prove the nucleus of a museum was laid. There is a charge of five shillings in the librarian's account "for the carriage of the orrery and catalogues from Philadelphia"; another of fifteen shillings for the carriage of the globes from the same place. A payment of fifteen shillings for an "electric machine" is also recorded. Charges are also made for sundry lots of vials and bottles, tin foil, and other articles, such as might be expected in a collection like this. In short, the library was to be a teacher in other ways than through books. There is also in existence a finely engraved copper-plate portrait of Thomas Penn, nine by eleven inches in size, saved from the wreck of the library when it was sold. This plate represents a handsome man, of imposing presence, with something of the build of his distinguished father. The inscription on the plate is as follows:

Davis, Pinx, 1761.

Martin, Sc.

THOMAS PENN, ESQ.,

The date affixed shows this portrait was not engraved especially for the library.<sup>1</sup>

What was the extent of the library and what was the general character of the books? These are important questions, and it is to be regretted no definite answer can be made to them. That the books were a collection of some extent hardly admits of a doubt. In the charter it is related that the incorporators "have at great expense purchased a large and valuable collection of useful books." At the winding up of the concern in 1848 the books have been described as having occupied a wall space about twelve feet long by eight feet high. Making allowance for the different sizes of books, this would give us perhaps eight hundred volumes, although the actual number of volumes sold was only three hundred. Earlier there were no doubt more, and perhaps at its most flourishing period it numbered a thousand volumes or more. When it is called to mind that the famous Philadelphia Library at the close of the Revolutionary war numbered only five thousand volumes, the Juliana Library must be regarded as a very respectable collection for a small provincial town. As to the character of the books hardly anything is known. Our fathers were not much given to what is at the present time called trash, and from the character of the men at the head of the library we may fairly infer there was plenty of solid reading in it. We find in the librarian's accounts £1 3s. charged for the "History of Greenland," and £1 9s. for Pennington's Works, 2 vols. A copy of Seneca's "Morals" was also among the contents. There was a printed catalogue as early as 1766, but not a copy has escaped the general wreck. With what interest the pages of that little volume would now be turned over! Messrs. Hall & Sellers seem to have been the Philadelphia firm from whom the purchases were chiefly made. The library seems to have had a considerable revenue from its subscribing members. From Sept. 21, 1766, to Sept. 15, 1769, the amount that came into the librarian's hands was £122 5s. 4d. What were its fortunes during the period of the Revolution and down to the beginning of the present century there is no record to show. Perhaps its most flourishing era was the one covered by the scant records here brought to light.

<sup>1</sup>This plate, as well as the constitution, by-laws, charter of incorporation, fragment of secretary's minutes of proceedings, and several pages of Librarian Henry's accounts, is now in the possession of Mr. John P. Schaum, of Lancaster City, who obtained them from Mr. George Weitzel, the octogenarian son of the last librarian. To the former of these gentlemen the writer's thanks are hereby extended for a free use of the papers just named, while from the active and vigorous recollections of the latter many facts were obtained that proved of great service in the preparation of this paper.

It is to be hoped that all the above documents may find a final and secure resting-place in the library of the State Historical Society, where they naturally seem to belong.

One other public notice of the library is found in the Lancaster Neutral Newspaper and Reporter under the date of Oct. 10, 1787. It is to the following effect:

"PUBLIC NOTICE

Is hereby given to all the members of the Juliana Library Company, at the Borough of Lancaster, that they are required to meet at the Court-House in the said Borough, by adjournment, on Saturday next at three o'clock (afternoon) in order to take into consideration the affairs of the said Library Company, and all persons having books of the said Company in their possession are desired to bring them in at that time."

It seems idle almost to speculate upon the import of the above notice. Had the trying times of the Revolution, in which so many of its original members took an active part, been the means of closing its doors, and was an attempt about to be made to revive its usefulness? The notice hints of a previous meeting where the preliminary steps looking to this end were no doubt taken. The request for the return of all the books out seems to intimate that an inventory of the property on hand was contemplated prior to a reorganization.

No charge has more frequently been brought against the German emigrants to Pennsylvania and their immediate descendants than that of ignorance and their indifference to educational matters generally, and none is more baseless. The church and the school went hand-in-hand everywhere throughout the colony, and in the founding of the Juliana Library we have irrefutable evidence of their progressive spirit. True, men of other nationalities were connected with the enterprise, but the majority were men of German ancestry. Their money, as well as their influence, was devoted to the cause of education and the advancement of learning. This reproach therefore must fall to the ground, and they be allowed to stand among the other friends of education who crossed the seas to found a new empire in the land of Penn.

The Lancaster Library Company.<sup>1</sup>—Co-existent with the Juliana Library was the Lancaster Library Company, an association that seems to have had its birth a few years before the birth of the present century. Of its character, aim, extent, and the period of its continuance hardly anything is known. No books, records, or minutes of proceedings seem to have come down to us. All that is known of it are a few business notices and editorial references in the newspapers of the day, but these are disappointingly few, meagre, and unsatisfactory.

The earliest notice of which I have any knowledge is in the Lancaster Journal of May 20, 1796, which reads as follows:

"LIBRARY, May 20, 1796.

"The Association for the erection of a Library Company in the Borough of Lancaster are hereby requested to assemble at the Court-House in Lancaster on Saturday the 28th of May (Inst.) at 3 o'clock, P.M., to carry into effect the intention of the Association."

As to what the "intention" of the association was, the above brief notice is provokingly silent. Evidently it was an entirely new organization. This is more than certain from a mention made in the above-named paper in its following issue. It is there stated that eighty-one (81) persons subscribed to certain articles of agreement, which number is competent to form a first general meeting, and a call is accordingly made upon the subscribers to meet on May 28th to effect a regular organization. Such an organization was accordingly formed, as we find a notice on Feb. 3, 1797, that the librarian is in attendance at the court-house on every Monday afternoon. In August, 1797, it is announced in the newspaper (Journal) that new regulations have been adopted by the Lancaster Library Company, which allow country members to keep books twice as long as had been allowed before.

The next notice of this association occurs in the issue of the Journal for March 26, 1804, in these words:

"LIBRARY COMPANY OF LANCASTER.

"The members are requested to meet on Monday next, the 26 instant at 4 o'clock in the afternoon, at the house of Matthias Slough."

Matthias Slough seems to have been among the foremost men of his day in Lancaster in promoting educational matters among his fellow-citizens. He was, as has already been seen, a charter member of the Juliana Library. Evidently the reading public of the county during the closing years of the eighteenth and the beginning of the nineteenth centuries owed him a debt of gratitude.

On Feb. 15, 1811, this notice appeared in the Journal:

"BOOKS WANTING.

"All persons having books belonging to the Subscriber or to the Lancaster Library Company are requested to return them without delay.

"JOHN ROSS,

With the last-mentioned date all trace of this Lancaster Library Company is lost. Doubtless it gave up the ghost, and its collections were sold and dispersed. But prior to this time other schemes looking to the establishment of circulating and other libraries had come to the surface. On Oct. 10, 1806, the following announcement appeared in the Journal:

"A CIRCULATING LIBRARY.

"Provided a sufficient number of subscribers can be procured, a Company pledges itself to establish a Circulating Library in the Borough of Lancaster. The Library will be opened with 2000 volumes, and will be continually supplied with the European Periodical Publications and with the best news and literary papers of the United States. The conditions are such as to encourage subscribers from Columbia, Middletown, Lititz, Strasburg, etc. No books will be lent but to subscribers. Terms of subscription, $5 per annum, $2 per quarter, or $1 per month, to be paid in advance. Subscriptions received at this office and at Thomas Pool's, agent for the Company."

Evidently the Lancaster Library Company was not fulfilling its mission very satisfactorily, else a second library had not been deemed necessary.

Joseph Clendenin evidently thought so, for in 1809 he also opened a circulating library in connection with his book-store. He, too, seems to have failed of success, as in April, 1811, he gave public notice that all books borrowed from him "must be returned before the first Wednesday of the court, as he means to sell them on that day."

The foregoing, it is believed, includes all the public libraries, subscription or otherwise, started in Lancaster County up to the year 1810. If there were any others they must have been on a very limited scale, and so insignificant as to have left no trace either in the public prints or elsewhere.

The Misses Jordan Library.<sup>2</sup>—This was a circulating library, which was the property of two maiden ladies of Lancaster, and was first opened to the public on the 23d of July, 1821, in East King Street. These ladies occupying as a private residence the same building in which the library was kept, it was therefore open daily from 8 o'clock A.M. to 8 o'clock P.M., and the subscription was three dollars per year, or one dollar per quarter to those who would not obligate themselves for a longer period than three months. This library was mainly an inheritance, and it continued in active operation during the lifetime of one or both of the proprietors, a period of about a quarter of a century. After the death of the proprietors it was disposed of at private and public sales. Volumes of it still exist in private collections, and others finally reached the libraries of the Mechanics' Society and the Athenæum.

The Lancaster Polemic Society.—This society was organized about the end of the eighteenth or the beginning of the nineteenth century. Among other things it held public discussions on questions relating to the current period. In a Lancaster publication, dated Nov. 22, 1805, the members of this society are requested to attend a meeting to be held at the house of Mr. Gurtorius Stoy on the following Saturday evening, at seven o'clock precisely, to discuss the question, "Are the natural talents of men superior to those of women?" By order of the society, and signed by Stacy Potts, Jr., Secretary. Little is known of this society at the present day, either as to the date of its organization or its final dissolution, nor yet of those who were active participants in its affairs. It is interesting, however, to know that such a society once existed in the town of Lancaster.

The Historical, Agricultural, and Mechanics' Society was organized on the 22d day of September, 1857. The object of its organization, primarily, was to secure the thousand dollars donation of books which Congress had a short time previously made to a society in each Congressional district devoted to history, agriculture, and mechanics, and, secondarily, to establish a library and reading-room, which should be kept open daily for the benefit of its members, and any responsible person could become a member by paying into the treasury one dollar annually. This society had its library and reading-room on the second floor of Russell's hardware-store in North Queen Street now owned and occupied by Mr. Kepler as a hardware-store, and for a short time it appeared to be prosperous. This society was subsequently consolidated with another and later library association called the Athenæum, and as after the union of the two was effected it still retained its original title with that of Athenæum as a prefix, it cannot be fairly classed with extinct institutions. Nevertheless, as a separate and distinct organization it was, perhaps permanently, suspended. This society also conceived the idea of fostering the natural sciences, and hence created a department of natural science and appointed a committee of ten members to take charge of that department; but, with the exception of a few antique relics and minerals, very little was done towards collecting materials for a museum. The finale of that committee will be found in the sketch of the Linnæan Society.

Lancaster Lyceum, or Conservatory of Arts and Sciences.—This institution also had its origin about the time Josiah Holbrook visited Lancaster City and County, in 1836 and 1837. It was still in a moderately flourishing condition in the winter of 1840, when the writer became a member of it, according to a card of membership before him bearing the date of that year and signed by "W. Kennedy, Sect." At that period it held its meetings in Franklin College, on West Lime Street, then popularly called "The Lyceum." It had its lectures and discussions on appropriate subjects, had a library of books, pamphlets, etc., a cabinet of minerals and other objects, and a very complete set of philosophical instruments and implements, especially in the department of chemistry. Before the advent of the fifties the Lyceum ceased to exist as an active organization, and all its remaining property was transferred to the custody of the Lancaster High School, corner of Prince and Chestnut Streets, from whence it never was removed.

The Athenæum was organized on the 11th of August, 1858, and the rooms in the third story of the City Hall, facing Penn Square and West King Street, were accorded it by a vote of the City Councils free of rent. To this society Hon. E. C. Reigart donated two thousand five hundred dollars on the 1st of January, 1859, and five hundred dollars annually thereafter for three years. The rooms were elegantly fitted up as a library and reading-room, and formally opened on the 17th of February, 1859, the Historical, Agricultural, and Mechanics' Society having ten days previously also removed all its books and other effects into said rooms. On the 20th of December, 1860, the Athenæum Association and the Historical, Agricultural, and Mechanics' Society were united and their libraries consolidated under the corporate title of the "Athenæum and Historical, Agricultural, and Mechanics' Society." Notwithstanding this auspicious beginning, supported by a large annual dollar membership, the prosperity of the society was comparatively of short duration. The Hon. J. J. Libhart, of Marietta, Pa., made a special deposit of a large number of mammals, birds, fishes, insects, minerals, and fossils, and other public-spirited citizens of the city and county made miscellaneous donations and deposits as contributions towards an ultimate museum. The committee on natural history and science was continued, but little opportunity was afforded for the development of that branch of the society's proposed work. At length came the sad tidings of the bombardment and fall of Fort Sumter, and the tocsin of war was sounded throughout the Union. From that period the Athenæum began to wane. The all-absorbing questions involved in the Rebellion, the death or removal of its most liberal benefactors, the withdrawal of the pecuniary support of the public, and the unavoidable closing of the daily reading-room and library produced a state of scientific and literary lethargy, as a result of the more active energies called into exercise through the local and temporary organizations made necessary in a time of active war. The return of peace could not revive it, and finally, after many vicissitudes, its functions were suspended, and on the 1st of April, 1878, it transferred its books and other property to the custody of the Young Men's Christian Association. This transfer, however, does not extinguish the Athenæum; it merely suspends it, and it is so provided in the articles of transfer. Under the provisions of its organic laws, it is governed by a board of directors, who are elected by the members and serve for one year, "and until their successors are elected and installed."

The last board of directors elected (January, 1870) were Hon. A. L. Hayes, president; Hon. George Sanderson, vice-president; James Black, Esq., treasurer; Professor John B. Kevinski, secretary; Hon. A. E. Roberts, Gen. George M. Steinman, Daniel G. Baker, Esq., Alexander Harris, Esq., Professor S. S. Rathvon, Mr. H. Baumgardner, and Mr. George K. Reed. After the death of the president the vice-president officiated, and after the death of the latter Professor S. S. Rathvon was elected president, and the vice-presidency was left temporarily vacant. By the present arrangement with the Young Men's Christian Association the Congressional documents are kept in a separate room in the second story of the building, and are always accessible to the public on the conditions provided by the rules of the joint associations, and the other volumes are so labeled and arranged as to facilitate a separation when the time arrives to make such a separation expedient. The library of the Athenæum consists of about six thousand volumes, and its future disposition is subject to the call of the board of directors. The main object in making the existing arrangement was to approximate the original aim of the founders of the Athenæum, and also the act of Congress in making it the depository of the public documents for the Congressional district composed of Lancaster County. During the latter years of the Athenæum, for want of pecuniary and moral support, it was unable, as a separate organization, to open its library to the public. The combined libraries of the Young Men's Christian Association and the Athenæum and Historical and Mechanics' Society now number over ten thousand volumes; and, aided by the fostering interest of the community in which it is located, they cannot fail to be an effective instrument for the diffusion of useful knowledge, besides constituting an historical and literary centre of eminent use to the scientist, the historian, and the scholar among the coming generations.

Lancaster Theatres.—During the town and borough existence of Lancaster, and for years even after it was incorporated as a city,—in 1818,—dramatic exhibitions and concerts were usually held in hotels or taverns, or in contemporary contiguous structures or inclosures. It was not until some time in the teens of the present century that a special permanent building was devoted to that purpose. The "Red Lion Hotel," now better known as the "Cooper House," the "Swan Hotel," or "Hubly House," now occupied by Hostetter & Son as a clothing-store, and also as a tea-store, "The Grape Hotel," better known as "Michael's Hotel," were conspicuous among those that entertained and accommodated dramatic and musical exhibitions. It was during the advent of a dramatic company at the Red Lion that one of the Jefferson family fell down-stairs and broke his neck.

It was some time prior to 1819 that Landis Beiter fitted up a building that stood on the southeast corner of Prince and Orange Streets for the accommodation of dramatic exhibitions. This building was also sometimes called the "Circus," and doubtless circus performances were also held therein. We conclude that this was previous to 1819, from the fact that it then was already a landmark, for in perusing the article on the Museum, it will be perceived that John Landis (one of the proprietors of the theatre) advertised in that year that he would open a museum in Orange Street, opposite the theatre. This building, according to tradition, was subsequently blown down by a storm. During the presidential campaign of 1840 the site was occupied by an immense log cabin, where "Bacchus" presided over the orgies of "Hard Cider" night and day for a season,—now occupied by the Union Bethel Church. The next theatre building in the order of time was fitted up about 1830, on West Chestnut Street, on the site of the present Harburger Foundry, formerly known as the "Keiffer Foundry;" the old buildings were destroyed by fire in 1858. Strolling companies from the Eastern cities performed here, and sometimes home talent took a part. "Stars" also, of greater or less magnitude, shone in this theatre.

Reitzel's Hall, on the north side of West Orange Street, was the next in order. This is the same building, in part, now occupied by the stabling of "Shober's Eagle Hotel," on the northwest corner of North Queen and Orange Streets.

Phillip Reitzel for several years had kept a lottery-office at No. 18 Centre Square. In the spring of 1837 he erected the theatre building, and late in March of that year it was leased by Mr. Potter, manager of a Philadelphia theatre, and opened by him soon after. A dramatic society, known as "The Conner Society," occupied this hall for some years, and here is where some of the highest local talent of Lancaster City was exhibited.

About 1847 or 1848 "Mechanics' Hall," in South Queen Street, was fitted up as a theatre, and continued so until the removal of the "Old Jail" from the corner of West King and Prince Streets to the new prison in the eastern suburb of the city. When part of the old prison structure was converted into "Fulton Hall," it was built for the express accommodation of theatrical exhibitions, and from that period down to the present time it has been almost exclusively devoted to the drama. The new prison was finished in 1851, and about that period Fulton Hall was in process of erection. This hall afforded by far the best dramatic accommodations that had ever before existed in Lancaster City; but after it came into the possession of Mr. Yecker, in 1870, through his individual enterprise it was metamorphosed into an opera-house which is superior in all its appointments to any other similar building in the State outside of Philadelphia, and perhaps Pittsburgh, and enjoys the entire monopoly of all the concerts, operas, and theatrical exhibitions held in Lancaster.

It will thus be seen that, so far as relates to the drama, and the facilities necessary to the accommodation and encouragement of the drama, Lancaster City has been slowly but surely progressive. She has been sometimes severely criticised for her encouragement of exhibitions intrinsically of an inferior order, while those of a superior character have been scarcely honored with a decent recognition, but these contingencies occur everywhere, sometimes inadvertent, sometimes uncontrollable, and other times purely accidental. Some people require a higher, a lower, or an intermediate order of gratification, according to taste and culture, and hence overcrowded houses or "empty boxes" are contingencies that are always likely to occur.

Many names might have been mentioned in connection with this subject, but for prudential reasons we have refrained from doing so. Those of the long past are forgotten, and those of the present are known to all.

The Mechanics' Society.—After several preliminary meetings,<sup>1</sup> a final meeting of citizens of Lancaster was held at the public-house of Widow Eichholtz,<sup>2</sup> East King Street, on the 8th of July, 1829, at which time and place the Mechanics' Society of Lancaster City was organized, and the following board of officers were elected: President, Hugh Maxwell; Vice-President, Ingham Wood; Librarian, Abner Thomas; Treasurer, Arthur Armstrong; Secretary, Abraham N. Breneman. The constitution was signed by ninety-nine members, of whom Dr. John L. Atlee, Sr., alone survives. A charter was obtained under date of May 26, 1831. This society therefore is one of the oldest, if not the very oldest literary association in the city of Lancaster. Soon after its incorporation it purchased a lot of ground in South Queen Street, and in the summer of 1839 Mechanics' Hall was built on the site now occupied by the lower furniture warehouse of George B. Schaum. The basement was occupied as an Apprentices' Library and reading-room, and the second floor was let out for concerts, balls, lectures, and other entertainments. The society introduced into Lancaster, during the winter seasons, popular lectures and night-schools. Among the lecturers were Redmond Conyngham, on history; Dr. Washington L. Atlee, on chemistry; John W. Forney, on miscellaneous subjects; David Paul Brown, on polite literature; Dr. Buckingham, on foreign travel and adventure; Dr. Gleason, on physiology; the elder Fowler, on phrenology; and various other lecturers on other topics. The society was originally organized for the benefit of mechanics, and especially apprentices, and none could become members but mechanics; but it appears they became "weary in well doing," and hence about 1845, or even earlier, the interest in what had been so auspiciously begun manifested signs of decay. Finally, for lack of zeal, and consequently of patronage, it was compelled to discontinue its meetings and close its library. Its books were transferred to the custody of the Lancaster City High School, and subsequently it disposed of its real estate, paid its debts, and put the balance of its funds out on interest. A few faithful friends, however, kept its organization intact, met annually, and elected officers. About the year 1855 it revived, removed its books to a room on the second floor of McConomy's building in West King Street, the room it still occupies, and opened a public subscription library. It increased its membership to about thirty, and its list of subscribers, alternately varying from fifty to one hundred, at one dollar a year. The number of volumes had dwindled down to about three thousand, but at the present time it numbers between six thousand five hundred and seven thousand volumes, adding from fifty to one hundred annually. After the revival in 1855 it assumed the title of Mechanics' Library Association. It meets on the third Monday of each month for the transaction of business, and opens the library every Thursday evening from six o'clock until nine o'clock, for the loan and exchange of books. The restriction confining its membership to mechanics has also been removed. The apprentice system, as it existed half a century ago or more, has become demoralized, apprentices generally not being regarded as members of the family of employers, and no control is assumed over them beyond the bounds of the shop, and the legal working hours. The exceptions to the present custom, in this respect, are very few among mechanics, and that few only patronize the Mechanics' Library.

<sup>1</sup> A meeting had been called as early as Dec. 30, 1828, and held Jan. 10, 1829, at the sign of the "Bull's Head" (Widow Eichholtz's), to consider the subject of a mechanics' society, at which Gen. Jeremiah Mosher was appointed chairman; James Cameron, Esq., and Col. Levi Rogers, vice-chairmen; Henry Breneman and Ingham Wood, secretaries. Resolutions were passed, addresses were delivered, and committees appointed, all in aid of the enterprise. Subsequent meetings were held Feb. 4 and June 18, 1829, at which the objects of the society were explained, and rules and regulations adopted.

<sup>2</sup> Widow Eichholtz kept a tavern on East King Street, known as the "Bull's Head," the site of which is now occupied by the jewelry-store of Mr. Augustus Rhoads and Russel & Shulmier's coal-office. The old structure was torn down, and the Exchange Hotel was erected in its stead. This was subsequently converted into a mercantile house, and for some years occupied by Watt, Shand & Co. It stood on the corner of what is now known as Christian and East King Streets.

This library contains many antique volumes, some of which belonged to other libraries once existing in the city of Lancaster, and others donated by private individuals. Among the former was the Juliana Library, founded before the American Revolution, of which Thomas Penn and wife were patrons. Some were obtained from the Misses Jordan's Library, and others from the Young Men's Private Library, which had been organized for mutual instruction during the first quarter of the present century; but the labels had all been removed by former librarians, so that it is nearly impossible now to distinguish them.

The present board of officers are as follows: President, H. R. McConomy, Esq.; Vice-President, J. W. Byrne; Secretary, S. H. Zahn; Treasurer, C. Gast; Librarian, S. S. Rathvon; Property Committee, G. M. Zahn, Phillip Doersom, Thomas Baker, J. W. Byrne; Library Committee, S. S. Rathvon, D. Haverstick, J. W. Byrne, W. F. Duncan, George Wiant. It must be very apparent how the Mechanics' Library has been enabled to prolong its existence and its usefulness for more than half a century: namely, by keeping intact its invested funds, and economically confining its expenditures within the limits of its income from accruing interest and subscriptions to the library. There has not been wanting a strong desire for some years to make it more effective in meeting the wants of a progressive public; but that desire has never been allowed to commit the society to any doubtful enterprise that would be likely to involve it in financial embarrassment, or destroy its usefulness altogether. Instead of making a temporary "splurge" for the sake of effect merely, it has chosen to continue on "in the even tenor of its way," and if it could not do much, to be content with little.

Lancaster Museum.—If ever there was an institution in Lancaster of which it could truly be said that it had become extinct, it was the old Lancaster Museum; for it was finally transferred to Cincinnati, where it was extinguished by fire, and probably not a shred of it remains at this day. This museum, perhaps better known as Landis' Museum, was established by John Landis, an innkeeper of Lancaster City. In an advertisement dated Oct. 23, 1819, Mr. Landis informed the public that he had collected a large number of natural and artificial curiosities for his museum, and that they would be ready for exhibition at an early day. Accordingly, on the 4th of December, 1819, he publicly announced that his museum was opened, and that the price of admission was fixed "at the low rate of 25 cents," and it would remain open every day (Sunday excepted) "from 9 o'clock in the morning until sunset." The building occupied by the museum was in "West Orange Street, opposite the theatre," and was probably the first museum established in Lancaster. Many years ago Landis L. Beitler established a theatre on the site now occupied by the Union Bethel Church, on the corner of North Prince and West Orange Streets, and if the museum was opposite, it very likely occupied the building on the southwest or northeast corner of the streets named.

From thence it was removed to the building that formerly stood on the site of the present Examiner printing-house, but we have not had access to the date of its removal. It was still the property of John Landis, and the next removal was to the south side of Penn Square, in the building now occupied by Mr. Michael Haverbush as a saddle and harness manufactory, where it was kept for many years.

When John S. Gable erected the large building (Rohrer House) on the corner of North Queen and West Chestnut Streets, he had express reference to the museum, hence the many large windows in it. Mr. Landis removed his museum to the Gable building in 1836 or 1837, and in 1838 he sold it to J. M. Westhaeffer. In 1839, Mr. Westhaeffer sold the one-half of it to Charles S. Getz, and it was conducted for three years under the firm of Westhaeffer & Getz. The senior partner sold his half to the junior in 1842.

About the end of 1842, Mr. Getz sold his entire interest in the Lancaster Museum to Mr. Noah Smith, an Eastern man, who conducted it until the winter of 1849, when he sold it to Wood & Peale, of Cincinnati, who removed it to that thriving city, and Lancaster was entirely deprived of an institution to which it had been accustomed for a period of thirty years. One year after its removal to Cincinnati the museum of Wood & Peale took fire, and the whole collection was consumed by the devouring flames.

Immediately above the upper story windows (now occupied by a row of brackets) on the east front of the Gable building, was a large sign-board occupying the entire front, on which was inscribed, in large black letters, "Gallery of Arts and Sciences," and this was all that remained of the old Lancaster Museum for a number of years after its removal.

The principal attraction of this museum was its wax statuary, and some of these would now be regarded as mere caricatures of the subjects they represented. Curious works of art and mechanical genius, historical relics, specimens of natural history, stuffed or alcoholized monstrosities, minerals, fossils, and shells, and numerous miscellaneous objects mainly constituted the collection. But such as it was, there were few in the rural districts who had not the desire of, at least once in their lifetime, seeing the Lancaster Museum; and after its removal it was by many regarded as a serious loss. It had, however, been of so little profit to any of its proprietors that no one subsequently attempted a duplication of it, and finally it was forgotten or only remembered as one of the things that were.

Linnæan Society.—This society was organized on the 15th of February, 1862, and under the title of the Linnæan Society of Lancaster City and County it was incorporated by the Court of Common Pleas of the county of Lancaster, Pa., on the 30th of August, 1865. Its objects were the cultivation, development, and advancement of the natural sciences, and for the investigation of the characters, habits, and qualities of the animals, plants, and minerals of Lancaster County and adjacent territory. It subsequently added the physical sciences, archaeology, historical collections, etc., and established a museum and library.

The original founders of the society were Professors T. C. Porter, J. P. Wickersham, and E. B. Weaver, and Messrs. J. Stauffer, S. S. Rathvon, J. R. Sypher, J. B. Kevinski, John F. Heinitsh, Samuel Auxer, and D. G. Swartz. These ten, together with the late Dr. S. S. Haldeman and Hon. J. J. Libhart,<sup>1</sup> constituted a committee on natural science in the Athenæum, which is now temporarily merged in another literary organization. In addition to the above named, except two deceased, the charter members were C. A. Heinitsh, J. M. Seitz, F. Smith, J. B. Eshelman, I. S. Geist, J. P. McCaskey, Edward Brooks, H. L. Zahn, H. G. Bruckart, S. W. Mifflin, J. A. Sheaf, G. M. Zahn, C. B. Grubb, J. M. Greider, J. Beck, W. L. Gill, S. G. Behmer, G. Steinman, A. P. Garber, J. S. Witmer, H. A. Rockafeld, A. O. Newpher, I. Bushong, P. E. Gibbons, L. M. Hobbs, and A. Sumny.

The first board of officers were: Professor T. C. Porter, president; J. P. Wickersham and H. G. Bruckart, vice-presidents; J. Stauffer, recording secretary; J. M. Seitz, assistant secretary; John P. McCaskey, corresponding secretary; S. S. Rathvon, treasurer; J. B. Kevinski, librarian; J. Stauffer, S. S. Rathvon, J. B. Kevinski, and H. G. Bruckart, curators.

The present board of officers are President, Hon. J. P. Wickersham; Vice-Presidents, Drs. J. H. Dubbs and T. R. Baker; Recording Secretary, Dr. M. L. Davis; Assistant Recording Secretary, S. M. Sener; Corresponding Secretary, Dr. H. L. Knight; Treasurer, Dr. S. S. Rathvon; Librarian, Mrs. L. D. Zell; Curators, Professor J. S. Stahr, S. S. Rathvon, C. A. Heinitsh, and S. M. Sener.

The scope of the "curriculum" of the society may be inferred from the following list of chairmen of the standing committees for 1888: Mammalogy, Dr. M. L. Davis; Ornithology, William L. Gill; Herpetology, Wilmer S. Bolton; Ichthyology, Charles A. Heinitsh; Entomology, S. S. Rathvon; Botany, Mrs. L. D. Zell; Geology, Professor J. S. Stahr; Paleontology, Dr. S. R. Baker; Microscopy, Dr. H. L. Knight; Conchology, Professor E. H. Buehrle; Archaeology, Professor J. H. Dubbs; Natural and Historical Miscellany, Mrs. P. E. Gibbons. Since the institution of the society in 1862 the succession of presidents has been T. C. Porter, J. P. Wickersham, H. G. Bruckart, J. S. Stahr, and the present incumbent.

The Linnæan Society meets at two o'clock P.M., on the last Saturday of each month, in the ante-room of its museum, in the building of the Young Men's Christian Association, South Queen Street, Lancaster. Its library consists of about five hundred volumes and about the same number of pamphlets, catalogues, etc. Its collections in natural history consist of about twenty-five thousand specimens, about five thousand of which are botanical, including nearly the entire flora of Lancaster County, and more than ten thousand of which are insects. In archaeology it contains a large number of the local mementos of the red men, who once existed in the county, but who have long since passed away. It also contains specimens of nearly the entire mineralogy and paleontology of the county. The historical section contains many relics, pamphlets, papers, manuscripts, maps, etc. For the past twenty-one years it has been almost exclusively supported by the contributions, fees, and ordinary dues of its members. From ten to twenty original papers are read before the society annually, a few of which are published entire in the local journals; but most of them are only recorded, or a synopsis of them published in the proceedings in the Lancaster Farmer or the daily papers.

The greatest obstructions to its progress at present are its crowded condition, the want of necessary funds, and men of leisure as co-operative workers. Thus far it has mainly been engaged in collecting material, which needs to be properly classified and arranged in order to give effect to its original objects, all of which require time and means.

The Tucquan Club.—In the month of February, 1862, there was organized in Lancaster City a scientific association known as the "Linnæan Society," of which Professor S. C. Porter was the president, Jacob Stauffer, secretary, and S. S. Rathvon, treasurer, with the usual additional officers. This society authorized "fixed meetings," for the purpose of scientific exploration and discovery. Accordingly, the three above-named officers, accompanied by from eight to ten other members of the society, among whom were Godfried Zahm, John B. Kevinski, John M. Seits, William L. Gill, John S. Witmer, J. R. Sypher, Professor E. Brooks, John P. McCaskey, Edward Zahm, and others, during the summer season made day excursions to various rural districts in Lancaster County, and this continued for several years, the number augmenting gradually by the addition of persons who were not members of the "Linnæan," until finally, in the month of July, 1869, on the banks of the Susquehanna, near the mouth of the romantic Tucquan Creek, the gathering culminated in the "Tucquan Scientific and Piscatorial Association," assuming a semi-organic form, electing a board of officers, and adopting a set of elementary rules and regulations and a "movable" or undefined roll of membership. It gradually acquired the necessary equipage and implements for a piscatorial and scientific encampment, and from 1869 to the present time (except 1876) it has annually made an excursion, and encamped for four days or a week somewhere in the county of Lancaster or beyond it, where piscatorial recreations were most available. It has been the means during these encampments of adding largely to the museum of the Linnæan Society, although it is an entirely separate and distinct organization.

The following board of officers was elected after the Tucquan organization, and, with some variation in the executive committee, continued down to 1879: S. S. Rathvon, president; Lewis Haldy, vice-president; John B. Kevinski, treasurer; Thomas B. Cochran, secretary; Michael Zahm, Hiram Stamm, William L. Gill, John H. Baumgardner, and Charles A. Boring, executive committee, with about twenty active members, and frequently an equal number of provisional or annual members.

In 1880 the Tucquan Club resolved itself into a closer corporation than had previously existed, revised its constitution and by-laws, and limited its active membership to thirty, a unanimous vote being necessary to a choice. It also provided for the election of annual members, who may continue such, or who may only attend on a single occasion. These have no vote, cannot hold office or a proprietorship in the property of the club. In 1882 the club adopted a seal and a certificate of membership. At the last election, in June, 1883, the following board of officers was elected for the ensuing year; President, S. S. Rathvon; Vice-President, L. Haldy; Secretary, A. C. Reinoehl; Treasurer, William L. Gill; Executive Committee, William L. Gill, G. M. Zahm, H. R. Breneman, G. R. Wilson, and A. H. Fritchey.

The leading object of the club is that of physical recreation and recuperation, and as the primitive condition of a sound mind also involves that of a sound body, its object incidentally includes mental recreation and recuperation. Although for its better government it has adopted a few simple rules and regulations unanimously acquiesced in by its membership, yet beyond the reasonable administration of those rules and regulations it exercises no governmental restraints. Every man is practically "a law unto himself," and it endeavors only to admit such members as can safely be made the custodians of such transcendent freedom. There are no expenses attached to it other than those incidental to its annual encampment, and these are only the free and equal contributions of its participating members. Its culinary department is presided over by a chief and an assistant cook, who are reasonably compensated for their services, and, on the whole, its members can enjoy a respite in midsummer from their weary and often enervating routine of labors at very little more than it would cost them to remain at home. It is surrounded and permeated by none of those formal and conventional restraints which obtain at seaside and society gatherings, where fashion is the only god that is worshipped, and which impose continual labor in lieu of recreation. There are no official insignia, no visible grades in rank, and for the time being the burden of its lay is

"A chosen band
In a rural land,
And a life in the woods for me."

The Evangelical Lutheran Church of the Holy Trinity.<sup>1</sup>—A number of Lutheran families having settled in and around Lancaster early in the eighteenth century, the Rev. John Christian Schultze became their first pastor. The register of baptisms begins with the year 1730, and the first entries were no doubt made by him. He soon afterward returned to Europe as the agent of the Lutherans in the eastern part of the State, and did not return to this country. The Rev. John Casper Stoever crossed the ocean about the year 1725, as the chaplain of a company of emigrants, and we find him in Lancaster in 1733, engaged in the work of preaching for a congregation which was organized and enjoyed regular services. On the eighteenth Sunday after Trinity of that year, the records show that he administered the Lord's Supper to as many as one hundred and forty-nine communicants, and other communions are mentioned. Until 1736 he seems to have officiated only in the capacity of a missionary. On Nov. 7, 1736, he received a call, signed by the church members of Lancaster, and then only became their regular pastor. The first Lutheran Church in Lancaster was erected during his ministry, which was solemnly consecrated by the pastor, Rev. Mr. Stoever, Oct. 28, 1738. The church stood on the spot now occupied by the chapel of the Church of the Holy Trinity. The altar was of stone, surrounded by a walnut railing, and was donated by several liberal members. The steeple of the church was furnished with bells. The organ was not completed until 1744. It was constructed by a skillful artist named George Kraft.

Rev. Mr. Stoever removed to Spottsylvania, Va., at the close of 1739 or beginning of 1740, and the congregation was for several years exposed to severe trials. They were visited and served for a time by a Mr. Valentine Kraft, whose influence was not the best. Rev. John Dylander occasionally served the congregation in 1743 and 1744, and was acceptable.

The Rev. Henry Melchior Muhlenberg, distinguished for his learning, piety, soundness of doctrine, purity of character, and active zeal for the welfare of the church, arrived in this country in 1742. He is often styled and is revered as the patriarch of the Lutheran Church in America. He visited Lancaster in December, 1743, and contributed much by his preaching and influence to give confidence and courage to the members of the congregation. The members at that time were so much interested in Dr. Muhlenberg's efforts to establish the Lutheran Church in Philadelphia, that they sent a sum of money to aid in building St. Michael's Church, in that city, equivalent to one hundred German dollars.

In 1745 and 1746 the congregation in Lancaster was thrown into the utmost disorder. The Rev. Mr. Nyberg, from Sweden, was their pastor. He became disaffected toward the Lutheran Church, renounced its doctrines, and exerted himself to carry the members of the congregation over to another denomination, and it was not until 1748 that the church became composed and settled down in peace. On the 3d of May, 1748, the Rev. John Frederick Handschuh entered upon the pastoral charge of the congregation. He was a man of excellent education, devout, conscientious, and self-denying. Under his ministry the church rose to a high degree of prosperity. Lancaster then contained about four hundred dwelling-houses. The parish school which he established was soon crowded, and the English and German pupils who applied for admission could not all be accommodated. His labors in the pulpit, in his pastoral visits, and among his catechumens were eminently blessed. The removal from Lancaster of those who had agitated the congregation tended to establish union and peace. He confirmed large classes of catechumens, the number of communicants rapidly increased, and the church was very prosperous.

The Ministerium of Pennsylvania was organized in Philadelphia in 1748. The second meeting was held in the church at Lancaster in 1749. At Easter in 1750 the number of communicants had risen to two hundred and forty-three. To the great regret of the congregation he deemed it his duty to accept a call to Germantown, and removed from Lancaster in May, 1751.

During 1751 and 1752 the congregation was temporarily supplied by Rev. Tobias Wagner, Rev. Mr. England, and Rev. Mr. Wortman, each of whom remained only a short time and then accepted calls elsewhere.

Anxious to enjoy the services of a trustworthy and settled pastor, the congregation addressed a memorial to the Consistory of Stuttgart, Württemberg, in which they expressed the desire that a competent pastor might be sent to them. In answer to this application the Rev. John Siegfried Gerock was selected for the position in May, 1752, and he reached Lancaster in March, 1753. He was a man of great excellence of character, and served the congregation with great fidelity and acceptance for a period of fourteen years. The divine blessing signally attended his efforts to restore union and harmony and to build up believers in their most holy faith. The increasing number of members and the encouraging evidences of continued and rapid accessions demanded a larger building than the church which the congregation had hitherto occupied. A meeting of the congregation was called, to take the subject into consideration, for Jan. 1, 1761, and it was resolved to proceed at once to its erection. It was decided that the lot on which the church now stands should be forthwith purchased. This action was ratified at another congregational meeting held a few days afterwards, and the building committee appointed, consisting of the pastor (Rev. Mr. Gerock), Adam Simon Kuhn, Bernhard Hubley, and Frederick Jayser.

The Synod was invited to hold its annual meeting in Lancaster on Trinity Sunday, May 17, 1761, in order that the whole body of ministers might be present at the laying of the corner-stone on the succeeding Monday. The invitation was accepted. On the morning of May 18, 1761, the members of the Synod repaired to the parsonage. At ten o'clock they went in procession to the old church, where the Rev. Dr. H. M. Muhlenberg delivered an appropriate discourse to an overcrowded house. After the services in the church all gathered around the corner where the stone was to be solemnly laid. Pastor Gerock read aloud the document which related the previous history of the congregation in detail, and declared that the building to be erected on this stone was to be called and known as the Evangelical Lutheran Church of the Holy Trinity, and to be consecrated to the cause of evangelical truth, as that truth is taught by the apostles and prophets and set forth in the pure, unaltered Augsburg Confession of Faith. He then transferred the document to a small box and deposited the whole in the cavity prepared for it in the corner-stone. The stone was then laid in proper place and firmly secured. The Rev. Dr. Wrangel, the excellent Swedish provost of Philadelphia, then stepped forward, and with a mallet struck the stone three times, uttering the words, "In the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen." Every clerical and lay member of the Synod and every church-officer approached the stone, raised the mallet, and struck the stone thrice.

The work of building the new church proceeded slowly, and it was not until May 4, 1766, that the building was consecrated. On this occasion again the entire ministerium was invited to be present. The principal consecration sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. H. M. Muhlenberg, and the act of consecration was participated in by Rev. Messrs. Muhlenberg, Gerock, Stoever, Kurtz, Sr., Schaum, Kurtz, Jr., Krug, and Buskerk, each repeating a verse of Holy Scripture appropriate to certain portions of the church and its service. The new edifice was eighty feet long and sixty feet wide. The principal door was in the centre of the west side, on Duke Street, and the pulpit was directly opposite, in the centre of the east side. The tower and steeple were built a number of years afterwards. Two stone tablets containing the name of the church and the date of its foundation, the one in Latin and the other in German, were inserted high up in the side wall on Duke Street, and they still occupy their old places. The German inscription reads, "Zur ehre der H. H. Dreieinigkeith ist diese Evangel. Kirche erbauet, A. C. 1761." The Latin inscription is as follows: "Hoc Templum ss. Trinitati Ecclesia Evangelica Sacrat. A. D. MDCCLXI."

With the exception of the tower, the pulpit recess, the southern extension inclosing the tower on the east and west, and the removal of the principal door from the centre of the side on Duke Street, to the addition on the southwest corner, the building is the same as that on which our fathers looked on the day of consecration, May 4, 1766.

EVANGELICAL LUTHERAN CHURCH OF THE HOLY TRINITY.

After fourteen years of most faithful and successful labor as pastor of Trinity Church, Rev. Mr. Gerock accepted a call from the Lutheran Church in the city of New York. He closed his ministry in Lancaster, March 29, 1767.

The name of Jacob Loeser deserves honorable mention here, in connection with the history of Trinity Church at this period. He was the parish school-teacher, and was universally respected and loved. He died in 1793, having fulfilled the duties of his office for a period of forty-four years. He lies buried just south of the present chapel.

From 1767, when Rev. Mr. Gerock removed to New York, until 1769, the church was without a regular pastor. During this interval the congregation was visited by Rev. Dr. Muhlenberg, Rev. Em. Schultze, and others, and by them temporarily supplied. It was in the early part of 1769 that Dr. Muhlenberg, in one of his visits to Lancaster, recommended to the congregation the adoption of the constitution and form of church government, which had been carefully prepared by Provost Dr. Wrangel, Rev. Mr. Handschuh, and himself, and which was adopted by the church in Philadelphia. It was unanimously adopted by Trinity Church, Lancaster, and remains to this day the form of church discipline by which it is governed.

The Rev. Dr. J. H. C. Helmuth was next called to the pastorate of Trinity Church, and removed to Lancaster at Whitsuntide, 1769. He was a man of fine talents and sincere piety, and the attendance upon his ministrations constantly increased. He was a strict disciplinarian, and made himself personally acquainted with the spiritual condition of each member of the church. People flocked to hear him from the surrounding country, and thirteen hundred names were subscribed to the constitution of the church. He was very popular with people of all classes, who respected him for his earnest devotion to his work. On the 25th of May, 1779, he was elected pastor of St. Michael and Zion Churches in Philadelphia, and, after mature deliberation, he thought it his duty to accept the call.

The Rev. Dr. G. H. E. Muhlenberg was elected his successor, and he removed to Lancaster, March 9, 1780. He was a man of great theological and scientific learning; he was also an able preacher and a faithful pastor; he was distinguished for his ability in catechising children and youth, and his catechumens bore him in grateful remembrance up to extreme old age. Up to within only a few years past persons were still living who spoke of him with strong feelings of respect and affection. His ministry was the longest of any pastor who preceded or succeeded him in Trinity Church.

REV. DR. G. H. E. MUHLENBERG.

In 1785 the erection of the present fine tower and steeple was begun, but it was not completed until the 8th of December, 1794. The steeple is one hundred and ninety-five feet high. The gilt ball is large enough to hold ninety-five gallons. The four wooden figures represent the four evangelists, beginning with St. Matthew, on the northeast corner; St. Mark, at the southeast; St. Luke, at the southwest; and St. John, at the northwest corner. The steeple is one of the handsomest structures of the kind, uniting in the peculiar features of that species of architecture the most elegant variety of forms, with the most chaste simplicity of combination.

Dr. Muhlenberg died suddenly on the 23d of May, 1815, having been pastor of this congregation for a period of thirty-five years. He had enjoyed the uninterrupted regard not only of his own congregation, but his virtues were enshrined in the hearts of the whole community. His death was universally lamented.

The Rev. Dr. C. L. F. Endress, of Easton, was called to Trinity Church, and removed to Lancaster Oct. 2, 1815. He was a man of fine literary culture, and was one of the ablest and most influential of our older divines. He was a finished classical scholar, and accomplished in almost every department of knowledge. He prepared for publication a "Commentary on St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans," and contributed largely to the pages of our church periodicals. He was an able preacher and a faithful pastor.

The principal event that agitated the congregation during his ministry was the introduction and use of the English language in the regular services of the church. The use of the English language at funerals had been allowed without any expression of dissatisfaction, and it appears that English preaching on Sunday evenings had been introduced before Dr. Endress became pastor. But as the young people of the congregation gradually lost their knowledge of the German language, and were unable to derive full benefit from attending the services that were held exclusively in that language, the desire grew that the Sunday morning services should be conducted alternately in the English and German languages. A formal petition asking for this change, signed by more than two hundred members, was presented to the vestry January 1, 1825. The question was discussed with much feeling in the meetings of the vestry, the majority of which body were at first opposed to the demands of the petitioners, and at meetings of the congregation protests were presented against action, and a committee of nine was appointed by the congregation, who met regularly, obtained legal counsel, canvassed the congregation in order to secure the election of members of the vestry favorable to the equal rights of the English language, and after a long and heated agitation the point was at length gained, and the first English service in the forenoon of Sunday was held about the 1st of May, 1825.

A number of members, dissatisfied with the action of the vestry and congregation, and believing that a Lutheran Church was needed in Lancaster in which the German language only was used, withdrew from Trinity Church and organized Zion's Church. The corner-stone of the new German Zion's Church was laid on April 17, 1827, and the edifice was dedicated May 11, 1828.

Dr. Endress died Sept. 30, 1827, after a brief but painful illness, after having been the pastor of the church for twelve years.

Mr. J. J. Strein, who succeeded Mr. Jacob Loeser as teacher of the parochial school, resigned his situation in the early part of 1828, having successfully performed the duties of his office for a period of about twenty-six years.

After the death of Dr. Endress, a unanimous call was at once extended to Rev. Dr. John C. Baker, of Germantown, to become his successor. His reply is dated Nov. 23, 1827, accepting the call, and he preached his first sermon Jan. 27, 1828.

Dr. Baker was a man of fine presence, genial in disposition, affable in manner, an earnest preacher, and an indefatigable worker. He was unwearied in his labors in the pulpit, in pastoral visits to the families of his congregation, in his attentions to children and youth, and in earnest concern for the spiritual welfare of the souls committed to his care. He was a devoted and influential member of the Ministerium of Pennsylvania, who frequently honored him by electing him to fill the position of one of its officers.

During Dr. Baker's ministry, and on his motion, the first Sunday-school was held in Trinity congregation. A Sunday-school society was organized, of which Dr. Baker was president, Feb. 10, 1828. The school was opened March 9, 1828; present, sixty-three teachers and four hundred and thirteen pupils. On March 16th there were present seventy-four teachers and four hundred and seventy scholars.

By a unanimous vote of the vestry, held April 5, 1836, the family pew system was introduced, and has been kept up ever since.

By the persevering exertions of the Sunday-school Society a Sunday-school building was erected on the lot adjoining the old stone school-house, situated on the site of the present parsonage. It was a two-story edifice, of brick, containing two large rooms, the one on the ground-floor being used as a lecture-room. The lot and the building on it were sold, when the present commodious chapel was erected.

On the 19th of July, 1847, Dr. Baker tendered his resignation to the vestry as pastor of Trinity Church. It was, however, not accepted, and a committee was appointed to wait on Dr. Baker, and prevail on him to withdraw it. They were successful, and Dr. Baker consented to withdraw it for the present.

The initiatory movement toward remodeling the church was made Nov. 3, 1851, by the appointment of a committee by the vestry "to make the necessary inquiry relative to the expediency of remodeling the church." The committee reported unfavorably.

On the 2d of March, 1852, the vestry, on application of the members of the Sunday-school Society of the church, granted permission to the society "to establish a Sunday-school in the northwestern part of the city," to be a mission school in connection with the church. The society obtained permission from the board of directors of common schools to occupy the male secondary school-house on Mulberry Street for its Sunday-school. The school was opened with twenty-two scholars. It prospered, and out of it subsequently grew St. John's Lutheran Church, located on West Orange Street, near the place where the Sunday-school was first opened.

On Nov. 1, 1852, Dr. Baker again presented his resignation of the pastorate of Trinity. The vestry with great reluctance accepted his resignation, but asked him to continue his services until the 1st of February, 1853. On the 30th of January, 1853, he preached his farewell sermon, and accepted a call to St. Luke's Evangelical Lutheran Church, Philadelphia. His removal from Lancaster was much regretted. He had a strong hold upon the affections of his congregation, and he enjoyed the confidence and esteem of the whole community. He was the faithful pastor of Trinity Church for nearly twenty-five years.

The Rev. G. F. Krotel, of Lebanon, was, on the 7th of March, 1853, unanimously elected pastor of Trinity Church, to succeed Dr. Baker. He preached his introductory sermon on Trinity Sunday, May 22, 1853. Dr. Krotel's ability as a preacher is excelled by few men, and the church enjoyed the highest degree of prosperity during his ministry.

In the spring of 1853 the present three-story parsonage was built, and the sexton's house was enlarged.

The subject of remodeling the church received a new impulse at this time. On the 5th of July a committee of five members was appointed by the vestry to take the whole subject into consideration, and report. This committee reported favorably on the 1st of August, and assigned as reasons that it was impossible "to accommodate the members, and others who wish to become members, with pews and seats on the present plan of the interior of our church." The recommendation of the committee was adopted, and on the 29th of August the following building committee was appointed to accomplish the improvement: George Musser, Sr., John F. Long, George D. Sprecher, F. W. Beates, and the pastor.

The plan adopted was proposed by Mr. John F. Sehner, and consisted in extending the church at the southern end, with galleries on the east, west, and south, and a recess for the pulpit at the northern end.

On Sunday evening, September 18th, the last service in the old church was held. On the following morning the workmen began to remove the woodwork of the interior, and many watched with tearful eyes the gradual disappearance of the old familiar pews, in which they had sat so many years, the altar around which they had knelt, and the pulpit from which Gerrock, Helmuth, Muhlenberg, Endress, Baker, and so many sainted fathers of the church had proclaimed the everlasting gospel.

The work was successfully completed, and on the 21st of May, 1854, amid great rejoicing and in the presence of an immense congregation, the remodeled church was consecrated by the pastor, assisted by the Rev. Dr. P. F. Mayer, of Philadelphia, and the Rev. Dr. C. W. Schaeffer, of Germantown.

At the regular monthly meeting of the vestry, held on the first Monday of December, 1853, it was resolved to contract with Mr. H. Knauff, organ-builder, of Philadelphia, for the construction of the organ that is still in use in the church. It was finished and used for the first time on Sunday, May 28, 1854.

The present chime of bells was put into the steeple, and were rung for the first time for divine service on May 28, 1854.

At a meeting of the teachers of the Sunday-school, held Feb. 11, 1855, a committee was appointed to open a mission Sunday-school in the northern section of the city. Two small rooms were rented on James Street, and the school was opened Feb. 25, 1855, with thirty-three scholars. Mr. J. W. Hubley was the first superintendent, afterwards Rev. Charles A. Baer, at that time a theological student, had charge of it, and subsequently, and for many years, Reuben A. Baer, Esq., was its superintendent. The vestry bought a lot of ground on East James Street, and erected a neat brick building upon it for the use of the school. The school took possession of it Oct. 18, 1857. Out of this mission Sunday-school arose the present flourishing Evangelical Lutheran Grace Church, at the corner of North Queen and James Street.

On the 4th of April, 1856, the young members, who had just been confirmed, at the suggestion of the pastor, organized the "Junior Missionary Society," which is still in existence, and has been eminently useful, both in aiding home and foreign missions, and in developing the social life of the young members of the congregation.

From the beginning of the ministry of Dr. Krotel the afternoon German service was discontinued and all the services were conducted in the English language exclusively. The order of service adopted by the Ministerium of Pennsylvania, and recommended for the use of our congregations, was adopted by the vestry, Nov. 13, 1860, and was used for conducting divine service until superseded by the Church Book recommended by the General Council in 1868.

Dr. Krotel, having been called to St. Mark's Church, Philadelphia, which he deemed it his duty to accept, presented his resignation on the 20th of November, 1861. It was reluctantly accepted, with many expressions of regret. Dr. Krotel, in the "Memorial Volume" written by him and published by the vestry, and from which we have culled nearly all the facts narrated in this article up to this period, closes with the following summary :

"During this century this venerable church has been served by Revs. Gerock, Helmuth, Muhlenberg, Endress, Baker; and the writer of this, —six pastors in a century. One of these served thirty-five years, another twenty-five, another fourteen, another twelve. The first seven years of the century were occupied by Mr. Gerock, and the last eight and a half by the writer. Mr. Gerock removed to take charge of a congregation in New York City, Revs. Helmuth and Baker and the writer were called to Philadelphia, and Drs. Muhlenberg and Endress rest in the graveyard of the church. Each of these pastorates witnessed some memorable event in the history of this church. During the ministry of Rev. Mr. Gerock, a native of Württemberg, Trinity Church was built and dedicated. Dr. Helmuth accomplished great things in the discipline and spiritual purification of the congregation; in Dr. Muhlenberg's time the great work of the steeple was accomplished; Dr. Endress passed through the ordeal of the introduction of the English language; Dr. Baker introduced the Sunday-school; and the last pastor of the century, a countryman of the one that opened it, witnessed the renovation and rededication of the venerable edifice.

"The writer and reader of these historical particulars cannot fail to perceive that the congregation has for one hundred and thirty years consistently pursued the same path and maintained the same principles. As the pastor who closes the century looks back upon the principles cherished by his predecessors, and the doctrines and usages of the church, he feels the gratifying assurance that he has attempted no novelties, but simply endeavored to maintain the old, historical Lutheran position of the congregation. He earnestly prays that the congregation, so old and influential, so faithful and affectionate to its pastors, will ever 'earnestly contend for the faith which was once delivered to the saints,' and 'continue in the things which they have learned, and have been assured of knowing of whom they have learned them.'"

The Rev. Dr. Krotel resigned the charge of Trinity Church Dec. 29, 1861, after a very successful ministry, and accepted the charge of St. Mark's Lutheran Church, on Spring Garden Street, Philadelphia. The Rev. Dr. F. W. Conrad was elected his successor, and he entered upon his ministry in Trinity Church March 16, 1862. Soon after the congregation mourned the death of two of its oldest and most active members, Adam Keller and William Frick, Esq. During his ministry the war of the Rebellion occurred. The pastor was ardently attached to the national Union, and his ministry was distinguished for the zeal with which he advocated the preservation of the integrity of the United States government. Its congregation took an active interest in the work of mercy made necessary by the war; a lady member was president of the Society of Patriot Daughters of Lancaster, whose object was furnishing supplies of all kinds for the wounded and sick soldiers in camp and hospital, and large amounts of money and materials were collected and sent forward by this church. The Rev. Dr. Conrad resigned this pastoral charge April 8, 1864, and removed to Chambersburg, Pa.

The Rev. Samuel Laird, of Philadelphia, was elected to succeed Dr. Conrad, and he entered upon his duties as pastor of this church Sept. 1, 1864. The balance of debt remaining unpaid from the remodeling of the church was liquidated during his ministry.

On the 10th of June, 1866, the centennial anniversary of the consecration of Trinity Church was held. Sermons appropriate to the occasion were preached by Rev. Dr. C. W. Schaeffer, president of the Ministerium of Pennsylvania, Rev. Dr. F. A. Muhlenberg, professor in Pennsylvania College, and Rev. Dr. Krotel, of Philadelphia. The church was appropriately decorated under the direction of Mr. Robert L. Eichholtz, and much interest was felt in the services.

Rev. Mr. Laird accepted a call to the English Lutheran Church at Pittsburgh, and resigned the pastoral charge of the Church of the Holy Trinity April 22, 1867. Rev. Dr. E. Greenwald, of Easton, the present pastor, was elected his successor, and took the pastoral charge May 1, 1867.

In July, 1867, a society of the young men of the church, called the St. Andrew's Society, was organized by permission of the vestry, and was very useful in aiding the improvement of its members in Biblical knowledge, in church activity, and in practical Christian life. In the fall of 1867 a mission Sunday-school was established at the intersection of Manor and West King Streets, with Mr. John W. Hubley as superintendent. A lot was subsequently purchased and a suitable building erected thereon. The school continued to flourish, and has since developed into Christ Lutheran Church, a branch of the Church of the Holy Trinity.

During the month of October, 1867, services were held in the church commemorative of the seventh jubilee of the Reformation by Dr. Martin Luther. A series of sermons was preached on the history of the Reformation, which were afterwards printed in a volume and obtained extensive circulation.

The General Council of the Evangelical Lutheran Church in America having issued, in 1868, the "Church Book for the use of Evangelical Lutheran Congregations," it was at once introduced into Trinity Church, and has been in use ever since as the directory of order of service.

In the month of September, 1869, the Committee of Ways and Means of the vestry in a formal report recommended the adoption of the plan of systematic beneficence, still in force, for the raising of a fund for the support of all the benevolent operations of the church by means of regular monthly contributions in envelopes dropped into the collection-baskets on the first Sunday of every month.

At the meeting of the vestry held June 6, 1870, the Rev. Charles S. Albert was unanimously elected assistant pastor, to labor especially in the two missions on James Street and on West King Street, under the care of the church.

At a special meeting of the vestry held Nov. 25, 1870, it was unanimously resolved to purchase the lot at the corner of North Queen and James Street, and proceed, as soon as possible, to erect a church thereon. The corner-stone was laid in due form Aug. 11, 1872, and the building was so far completed that the lecture-room was consecrated March 30, 1873. The entire building was finished and consecrated Nov. 9, 1873. The church was called Grace Evangelical Lutheran Church.

Rev. Charles S. Albert resigned his situation as assistant pastor and accepted a call to Carlisle, March 8, 1872, and the Rev. David H. Geissinger was elected his successor.

Grace Church Mission having taken the necessary steps for a separate organization as a distinct and self-sustaining church, and having called Rev. D. H. Geissinger as its first pastor, he presented his resignation as assistant pastor of Trinity Church Sept. 7, 1874.

On the 3d of March, 1873, Rev. John W. Rumble was elected assistant pastor, to labor in building up the West King Street Mission. He resigned his situation April 30, 1875, to accept a call to St. Luke's Lutheran Church, Philadelphia.

On the 6th of July, 1875, Rev. C. Elvin Houpt was elected assistant pastor, to labor particularly in the interest of the West King Street Mission. The Rev. Mr. Geissinger having removed to New York City, and Rev. Mr. Houpt having been called and removed to Grace Church, the Rev. E. L. Reed was, on March 4, 1880, elected assistant pastor of Trinity Church. The West King Street Mission had now progressed so far that it was deemed advisable to take steps to effect a permanent organization. Accordingly a meeting of the members worshipping there was held May 9, 1881, a constitution was adopted, and a regular organization, under the name of Christ Evangelical Lutheran Church, was effected, and Rev. E. L. Reed was elected its pastor.

The old Sunday-school building, south of the parsonage, having become inadequate to the increased wants of the church, the vestry, at its regular meeting held March 8, 1875, resolved to inaugurate the movement for the erection of the present commodious chapel. The corner-stone was laid Aug. 18, 1876, and it was completed and dedicated March 11, 1877. In making all these improvements the Church of the Holy Trinity expended between fifty and sixty thousand dollars.

In June, 1881, the Rev. Charles L. Fry was elected by the vestry assistant pastor, to labor directly in the Church of the Holy Trinity. He entered upon his duties Sept. 1, 1881, and by his active and efficient services in the pulpit, in the Sunday-school, and in the other departments of church work the senior pastor has been greatly aided in his duties, and the church has prospered largely. Notwithstanding two large colonies have been sent out within a few years Trinity Church is still full, and, large as the church is, nearly all the pews are taken. The number of names on the communion register is nearly one thousand.

REV. EMANUEL GREENWALD, D.D., eldest son of Christian Greenwald (1782-1865) and Mary Magdalena Smith (1780-1830), was born near Frederick, Md., Jan. 13, 1811. His father, a native of Berks County, Pa., was a carpenter, and supported his family by his trade. He was a man of decided religious views, a member of the church at Frederick, and his large German family Bible (Arndt's "Wahres Christenthum") and Jay's "Morning and Evening Exercises" constituted his favorite and almost his only religious reading. His mother was a devout and godly woman, and a regular communicant and attendant of the Lutheran Church. Their other children are Isaac and Ezra, steam-engine manufacturers at Cincinnati, Ohio; Mrs. Samuel Zimmerman and Mrs. Elias Zimmerman, of Frederick, Md.

Jacob Greenwald, grandfather of our subject, was a native of Montgomery County, and spent his life in Berks County, Pa., and his father was the progenitor of the family here, and settled in Montgomery County from Zurich, Switzerland, at about the age of eighteen years, in the beginning of the seventeenth century, fleeing his native country to avoid conscription into the Swiss army.

The parents of Dr. Greenwald, although only possessed of limited means to give their children an education, early taught them self-reliance, correct habits, and a Christian life both by precept and example. There being no Lutheran theological seminaries in the United States at that time, except the Hartwick Seminary, in the State of New York, Dr. Greenwald entered the private study of Rev. Dr. David F. Schaeffer, of Frederick, Md., under whose instruction not less than fifteen ministers had received both classical and theological education, and with him prosecuted his studies. To do this he made a journey of eight miles daily on foot for five years. Closing his studies at the age of twenty, he was ordained in 1831 at the meeting of the Synod at Cumberland, Md., his tutor being president of that body, whither he went on horseback, a distance of ninety-two miles. At that time there was a great want of ministers in both the South and West. Dr. Greenwald chose the latter as his field of labor, and provided with a home missionary license, granted by Dr. Schaeffer, he traveled the entire distance from Cumberland, Md., to New Philadelphia, Ohio, on horseback, one side of his saddle-bags being filled with books and the other with clothing, having in money less than fifty dollars. Upon arriving at New Philadelphia he found no church organization, no officers, no church edifice, no congregation, and only scattered and discouraged members, disappointed because of an effort that had been made and failed some years before. Here he began his missionary work, and faithfully labored for twenty years, preached at fourteen different places, organizing churches, and through his personal effort built some ten church edifices. He had been preceded by the venerable Rev. John Stough in that wilderness country, who may be properly regarded as the pioneer minister of the Lutheran Church beyond the Ohio River. Dr. Greenwald took for his text in his introductory sermon at New Philadelphia, Nov. 20, 1831, "I am determined to know nothing among you save Jesus Christ and Him crucified," which has been the key-note of his preaching since, a period of over fifty-one years. The Synod of Ohio established the Capitol University at Columbus, and Dr. Greenwald was called in 1851 as pastor of the English Church there, composed mostly of the professors and students of the school, and to edit the Lutheran Standard, a paper devoted to the interests of the church, where he labored until the fall of 1854. He was then called as pastor of Christ's Church at Easton, Pa., and for twelve and one-half years remained faithful to his charge. During his pastorate there the degree of D.D. was conferred on him by the Pennsylvania College of Gettysburg.

In 1867 he accepted the call of the Lutheran Church of the Holy Trinity, at Lancaster, Pa., where he has since acceptably ministered to the church and congregation. During this time this church has built two mission churches in the city,—Grace Church and Christ's Church.

Dr. Greenwald is the author of several published addresses, books, and pamphlets, that have attained large circulation in the Lutheran Church, among which are the following: Address before the Carrollton Academy, 1845; An Order of Family Prayer, 1867; The Lutheran Reformation, 1867; The Foreign Mission Work of Pastor Louis Harms, 1868; Dr. Parrot's Ascent of Mount Ararat, 1867; Address at the Funeral of Mrs. Sarah L. Sener, 1869; Meditations for Passion Week, 1873; Young Christian's Manual of Devotion, 1873; Questions on the Gospels for the Church Year, 1873; Questions on the Epistles for the Church Year, 1874; Baptism of Children, 1872; Christian Benevolence, a Sermon, 1870; Sprinkling the True Mode of Baptism; The True Church: Its way of Justification and its Holy Communion, 1876; Romanism and the Reformation, 1880; and numerous sermons and review articles. He was united in marriage, Dec. 17, 1834, to Lavinia, daughter of Judge Peter Williams, of New Philadelphia, Ohio. Their children are Mary, wife of Rev. Newton J. Conklin, a Presbyterian minister near Rochester, N. Y.; Emma was the wife of B. Frank Saylor, of Lancaster, and died in 1870; and Ada, wife of John K. Skiles, a merchant of Rice County, Kan.

Zion's Church.<sup>1</sup>—Zion's German Evangelical Lutheran Church was organized in the year 1827. The records of the minute-book do not run back further than Jan. 1, 1836, but the record of baptisms dates from September, 1827. We learn also from the memorial volume of the Evangelical Lutheran Church of the Holy Trinity the date when this church was organized and the causes which led to its organization. When the introduction of the English language in the Church of the Holy Trinity became necessary, about the year 1825, a number of members left this church to organize a new congregation, in which the German language should be used exclusively. This was done, and a piece of ground was purchased adjoining the graveyard of the Church of the Holy Trinity, and fronting on Vine Street. The corner-stone for the new church was laid in April, 1827. It was finished and consecrated in May, 1828, when, also, Rev. W. Schulze became its first pastor, who served the congregation until October of the same year. He was succeeded by Rev. Weiland, who continued to be its pastor until January, 1835, when Rev. Mr. Merz was called as his successor. In October, 1838, Rev. W. Baetis succeeded him, who served the congregation faithfully and gratuitously for many years, and to whom it is greatly indebted for his many services, especially in aiding to cancel its church debt.

The congregation increased in numbers and efficiency, and when Rev. B. W. Schmauk succeeded Rev. Baetis, in 1853, it soon became necessary to enlarge the church. During the same time a school-house was erected for Sunday-school purposes, and after a few years a parochial school was established, with Mr. Steinmiller as its first teacher. This school, in which the German and the English languages are taught, and where religious instruction is made prominent, has continued to exist and to prosper to the present day.

In 1864, Rev. B. W. Schmauk resigned, and was soon succeeded by Rev. W. Hoppe, under whose ministry the congregation continued to increase in numbers and to prosper, so that it became necessary to think and speak about a second enlargement of the church. It was, however, resolved to tear down the old church and to erect a new building. The last service in the old church was held in April, 1871, and on the following 31st of July the corner-stone of the new church was laid. This building was finished and consecrated in 1873. It was erected at a cost of about fifty thousand dollars, and is one of the finest church edifices in the city. A little over a year ago a new organ was added, at a cost of three thousand dollars, and it will no doubt not be many years hence when the building will be fully completed by having its steeple finished.

In 1874, Rev. W. Hoppe resigned its pastorate, since which time Rev. F. I. Mayser, the present incumbent, has been serving the congregation. There is still a heavy debt on the church, but its members are continually making earnest and commendable efforts to have it reduced. The congregation own also a parsonage opposite the church.

It is properly chartered, and has its constitution, which binds it and its pastor to the Evangelical Lutheran Ministerium of Pennsylvania and adjacent States, and it professes strictly the Lutheran faith according to the acknowledged confessions of the Evangelical Lutheran Church as laid down in the three Ecumenical Creeds, the unaltered Augsburg Confession, and the other symbolical books. Its present membership (1883) is about ten hundred and fifty confirmed members, and it is therefore one of the largest congregations of the city.

St. John's Lutheran Church.<sup>1</sup>—In the early spring of 1852 several of the younger members of Trinity Lutheran Church, after securing the permission of the church council, opened a Sunday-school in one of the school-houses on Mulberry Street, near Orange. The school, with twenty-two scholars, organized with Mr. J. S. Crumbaugh, principal of the high school, as superintendent. Immediately after the resignation of Rev. J. C. Baker, D.D., as the pastor of Trinity, in January, 1853, and before the coming of the new pastor, Rev. G. F. Krotel, the friends of the new organization resolved to unite in the formation of St. John's Lutheran congregation. The first recorded meeting of the congregation was held April 2, 1853, the committee on constitution and by-laws was appointed on the 18th of the following month, and the name of the church determined June 15th of the same year.

Rev. John S. Crumbaugh, being a graduate of Pennsylvania College, having completed his theological studies, and been licensed by the Pennsylvania Synod at its meeting in 1853, was elected the first pastor. At first the little band worshiped in Fulton Hall, and subsequently in the Moravian Church. The corner-stone of the present edifice was laid Oct. 9, 1853, and on the 5th of March following the congregation assembled to worship for the first time in the lecture-room. The entire building was completed at a cost of about twenty thousand dollars, and formally dedicated Dec. 24, 1854.

In 1855 the congregation applied to the Pennsylvania Synod, requesting honorable dismissal to the East Pennsylvania Synod. The following year this request was granted, and the congregation was received into its new ecclesiastical relation.

Because of the ill health of the pastor, Rev. Lewis Hippee was elected assistant pastor, which position he filled from October, 1856, until June, 1857. The first pastor, with failing health, resigned March 19, 1857.

In the fall of the same year, Rev. Daniel Steck, of Pottsville, Pa., was elected pastor, entering upon his duties in January, 1858, and serving the congregation until the last Sunday in June, 1862, when he accepted a call from the Lutheran Church in Dayton, Ohio.

On the 16th of January, 1863, Rev. Augustus C. Wedekind preached his introductory sermon as the third pastor of St. John's. For nearly ten years the congregation had been struggling with a heavy debt, which the new pastor found to be over six thousand dollars. To the removing of this incubus the pastor diligently applied himself, and in April, 1865, announced the fact that the last obligation had been met and the entire debt removed. On the 11th of September of the same year, having received a call from St. James' Lutheran Church, New York City, Rev. A. C. Wedekind resigned the pastorate of St. John's.

Rev. Washington V. Gotwald, of Emmittsburg, Md., the fourth pastor, was elected June 30, 1866, and installed on the 15th of the month following. His labor, which was attended with marked success, terminated with his death, June 10, 1869.

After a vacancy of several months, Rev. Benjamin C. Suesserot, the fifth pastor, took up the labor of his predecessor, Jan. 1, 1870. During the succeeding summer the church edifice was repaired, roof renewed, ceiling and walls repainted, floor recarpeted, and the pulpit and pews newly upholstered. After a pastorate of six years death cut short his work, Jan. 24, 1876.

Rev. R. W. Hufford was chosen the sixth pastor of St. John's. He entered upon the duties of the pastorate in May, 1876, returning to Springfield, Ohio, to graduate with his class from the Theological Seminary in the following month. On Sunday, August 13th, he was installed, Rev. J. Swartz, D.D., of Harrisburg, Pa., and Rev. J. H. W. Stuckenberg, D.D., of the Theological Seminary at Springfield, Ohio, delivering the charges. Having received a call to St. Paul's Lutheran Church at Easton, Pa., Rev. R. W. Hufford resigned in the fall of 1880, the same taking effect the last Sunday in November, 1880.

The present pastor, who is the seventh in the history of the church, was elected at a congregational meeting held Nov. 15, 1880. He accepted the call about ten days later, and preached his opening sermon on Jan. 19, 1881, and was installed March 6, 1881, the charges being delivered by Rev. S. A. Holman and Rev. John McCron, D.D., both of Philadelphia. On Sunday, July 10th, sixteen hundred dollars was raised, and during the summer the church was fully repaired.

Gotwald Mission Chapel.—In the month of January, 1869, the Rev. Washington V. Gotwald, pastor of the St. John's Evangelical Lutheran Church of Lancaster, suggested the organization of a Sunday-school in the northwestern part of the city, with a view ultimately of establishing another Lutheran congregation. The school was opened on the 14th of February in that year, and flourished until June, when Mr. Gotwald died. The congregation at once determined to build a chapel on James Street in memory of their late pastor. The work was commenced in July, and the corner-stone was laid August 29th. On the 30th of January, 1870, the chapel was dedicated with appropriate ceremonies. The school, which at its opening commenced with sixteen scholars, rapidly increased in numbers, and on the removal to the new house, Jan. 16, 1870, seventy-one scholars and eleven teachers assembled within the walls.

posed of those formerly connected with the parent church, and formed that body of believers which went out to establish the third new church descended from it. The house of worship is erected five squares north of the "Centre," at the intersection of North Queen and the north side of East James Streets, upon a piece of land originally purchased from Bridget Hook for the sum of four thousand dollars, and lying for one-half a square eastward to Christian Street along James Street. Upon this space there have been erected four houses, the church, the church school, a parsonage, and a sexton's house.

The church is an imposing and convenient structure of pressed brick, having a noble frontage and entrance on North Queen Street, flanked by two massive buttressed towers; the one on the corner is intended to be surmounted with the steeple, not yet erected. The windows are all of stained glass, Gothic in form, with stone sills. The size of this lofty, two-storied house is fifty-five by seventy feet. It is covered by a steep slate roof. Standing, as it does, upon high ground, this church is a conspicuous landmark as seen by those coming to the city from the east, north, or west.

The church proper faces eastward, and, vestibule excepted, occupies the entire second floor. It is a broad and beautiful sanctuary, with a seating capacity for eight hundred persons, a choir platform at the front beside the chancel, a chancel furnished with marble baptismal font, a lectern pulpit, and altar of rich native woods. A spacious gallery runs along the western side or rear of the room. The church school adjoins and communicates with the main building. It is a large, one-story house, with a frontage of twenty feet on James Street, and a depth of sixty feet. It is divided into two large rooms fitted with desks and seats of an improved order, well lighted and ventilated. It is supplied with a small vestibule adjoining. The parsonage and sexton's house are erected at the opposite end of the property, and are well equipped with every convenience. An open, grassy space intervenes between them and the school.

The idea of forming a branch Sunday-school in the northern limits of the city was proposed as early as February, 1855, when Rev. G. F. Krotel, the pastor of the Church of the Holy Trinity, suggested it at a Sunday-school meeting of that church. A committee consisting of John W. Hubley, Charles A. Heinitsh, and Reuben A. Baer was intrusted with the finding of a location. Consequently the first session of the school was held in two small rooms on West James Street, between North Queen and Prince Streets, on the afternoon of Feb. 25, 1855. Thirty-three scholars and a goodly corps of teachers were present. Mr. John W. Hubley was superintendent. A few months, and the rapidly-growing school was too large for its location. Hence the third story of a building at the northwest corner of North Queen and James Streets was briefly occupied. Afterwards the building at the southwest corner of Prince and West Lemon Streets was used. Charles Alfred Baer, a theological student, and subsequently the beloved pastor of Trinity Lutheran Church at Norristown, Pa., was the next superintendent. He was succeeded, Oct. 26, 1855, by his brother, Reuben A. Baer, who conducted the constantly-enlarging and flourishing school for upwards of nineteen years. His successors have been B. Frank Saylor and Alfred A. Hubley.

A suitable Sunday-school building was erected (forty-six by thirty feet) on James Street, between Duke and North Queen, and occupied for the first time Oct. 18, 1857. Church services were now begun on Thursday evenings, and for a time maintained, but were afterwards discontinued until the arrival of E. Greenwald, D.D., in 1867, when regular Thursday evening services were resumed, and increased by a Sunday afternoon service. To aid the pastor the vestry of the Church of the Holy Trinity chose an assistant pastor, Rev. C. S. Albert, who came (June, 1870) to build up this congregation in connection with another mission in the western part of the city (now Christ Church).

From the arrival of Rev. Albert a strong local attachment began to be formed. The first regular communion was held in the church April 2, 1871, so that when he resigned, April 1, 1872, the present site had been purchased, and ground broken for a new church edifice.

The pastor-elect was Rev. David H. Geissinger, who arrived July, 1872. His first public acts consisted in concentrating the congregation and laying the corner-stone of the new church Aug. 11, 1872 (an occasion of great interest to the many participants). Rev. Geissinger was a man of a remarkably comprehensive and liberal mind. His ministry was both faithful and successful.

The entire cost of the buildings as now erected, together with the parsonage and sexton's house, amounted to upwards of twenty-seven thousand dollars. Of this amount a large part had been previously paid by subscriptions from Trinity Church and friends of the enterprise. At the close of a pastorate of eight and a half years there was left standing a debt of nine thousand dollars.

Rev. C. Elvin Hout, who had come to Lancaster as Dr. Greenwald's fourth assistant, was now chosen to become Rev. Geissinger's successor. He was installed Feb. 1, 1880, and has continued his labors uninterruptedly to the present time (1888). During these years the congregation has liquidated the great bulk of the debt (two thousand seven hundred dollars) resting on the parsonage and sexton's house, and by the private liberality of Mr. Charles Schuberth the new church school-house has been placed in position. Here a flourishing parish school, taught by the pastor and two competent young lady assistants, has been established.

An especially noteworthy feature of 1883 has been the reclamation to holy usage of a time-honored bell. Cast A.D. 1745, in England, by order of "Onesimus" (Israel Eckerlin), prior, or business head of the order of Seventh-Day Baptists, of Ephrata, Lancaster Co., Pa., it was, on its arrival, repudiated by these plain people as savoring too much of pride, and sold to the Lutheran Church of the Holy Trinity, of the city of Lancaster. Here it was suspended in the belfry and rung during the colonial, Revolutionary, and national years until 1858. Then, being removed to make way for a chime of bells, it was purchased by Gottlieb Sener, a public-spirited citizen, and set by him, as a gift, in the tower of the Washington Fire Company. On the organization, in 1882, of the Lancaster Paid Fire Department, the old bell was re-sold by the disbanding volunteer company and erected in the tower of Grace Church by J. Frederick Sener, son of the above, as a memorial to his deceased child, Charles M. Sener.

In consequence of the burdensome debt under which Grace Church has labored her work has been internal rather than external, in the line of self-strengthening as distinct from that of lending aid to others. Notwithstanding, there has always been a response to every form of righteous appeal made to the church, and an endeavor to give to others as far as possible from the means in hand.

The congregation has steadily grown in numbers and efficiency until at present, April, 1883, it has an enrolled communicant membership of two hundred and sixty, a Sunday-school of three hundred and thirty, and a church-school of thirty-five. The church is thoroughly Lutheran, uses the Church Book of the General Council, adheres strictly to the unaltered Augsburg Confession of 1530, together with all the symbolical books of the church, and celebrates the festivals and Lord's days of the Christian year in a churchly and devout manner.

Christ Evangelical Lutheran Church.<sup>1</sup>—Owing to the rapid increase in the population and the spread of the city, the Rev. E. Greenwald, D.D., in the early part of his ministry in connection with the Church of the Holy Trinity, urged upon the vestry of that church the necessity of a policy for gathering the children of the more distant parts of the city into new Sunday-schools, which should be branches of the main school and church, and form the nucleus for new church organizations. Accordingly, such a branch school was opened on Sunday afternoon, Sept. 29, 1867, in a room at the house of Mr. Henry Bockius, No. 412 Manor Street. There were present on that day a goodly number of the members of Trinity Church and sixty-four scholars,—thirty-six girls and twenty-eight boys. The names of those who became officers and teachers are as follows: Superintendent, John W. Hubley; Secretary and Librarian, Alfred A. Hubley; Treasurer, John K. Skiles; Teachers, Miss Ada Greenwald, J. K. Skiles, Mary Trabert, Miss Bockius, Mrs. Kendig, Mrs. Martha Schaeffer, Miss Barbara Dean, Miss Kate Rudy, Miss Huber, Mrs. Sarah Acey, Miss Mary Myers, John G. Sieber, Miss Withers, Miss Weitzle, Miss Sallie Franciscus, Miss Amanda Miller, and Mrs. Biggs.

The unexpectedly rapid growth of this school soon made it necessary to provide two rooms. These also proved too small. At this time the vestry of Trinity Church concluded to make this venture a permanent affair by the erection of a building for the mission. A lot was purchased on West King Street near Manor, and the building erected, the corner-stone of which was laid with appropriate services on Sunday evening, June 21, 1868. The cost of this building was about three thousand five hundred dollars. The school now rapidly increased in its average attendance from one hundred and ten to one hundred and seventy-five members. In order to enable members of the church in the northern and western sections of the city to attend church more regularly, the pastor, Dr. Greenwald, undertook to establish regular divine service on each alternate Lord's day afternoon, in connection with James Street Mission. Catechetical instruction was held on alternate Thursday evenings in like manner. The amount of pastoral labor thus required was found to be too much for one pastor. Consequently the vestry of Trinity Church invited Rev. Charles S. Albert to assume, as assistant pastor, the charge of both the missions, viz., James Street and West King Street. He took charge July, 1870, and labored very successfully for nearly two years, when he resigned to take charge of another field. Rev. D. H. Geissinger became his successor July 7, 1872, who continued thus until the completion of Grace Church, when he resigned the mission at West King Street to take full charge as pastor of the James Street Mission, now organized as Grace Evangelical Lutheran Church. Rev. John W. Rumble was then chosen assistant pastor June 23, 1873, and he began full morning and evening services on each Lord's day at the West King Street Mission. During the pastorate of Mr. Rumble the chapel was enlarged and handsomely improved, at a cost of about three thousand five hundred dollars.

The building thus refitted was dedicated as Christ Church, June 21, 1875. Rev. Mr. Rumble resigned in June, 1875, and on Sept. 1, 1875, Rev. C. Elvin Houpt became assistant pastor in his stead. He labored successfully and with great acceptance for four years and three months, when he accepted a call to Grace Church, this city. On March 4, 1880, the vestry of Trinity Church extended a call to Rev. E. L. Reed, of Millersville, Pa., to become pastor of Christ Church and assistant pastor of the Church of the Holy Trinity. The call was accepted, and he entered upon his duties April 11, 1880. After continuing thus for more than a year, the vestry, impressed with the conviction that the time had come when Christ Church should take steps towards self-organization, at a regular meeting Monday evening, April 4, 1881, adopted the following:

"Resolved, That Trinity Church recommends that Christ Church organize as a separate congregation forthwith, and that Trinity Church will contribute towards their support for the first year six hundred dollars, decreasing the appropriation one hundred dollars each year, and that Trinity Church will deed them the property now occupied by them as soon as the vestry of Trinity Church is assured that Christ Church is self-supporting."

This proposition after mature consideration was accepted by Christ Church, the conditions to go into effect July 1, 1881. In accordance with this action the congregation met May 9, 1881, to adopt a constitution and elect their vestry, which was installed May 15th.

The congregation now made application for reception into the Synod of Pennsylvania, and was received at the meeting of that body in Pottstown, Pa., June 11, 1881. The assistant pastor, now relieved of all duties in connection with Trinity Church, continues to discharge his duties as regular pastor of Christ Church.

The congregation now numbers over two hundred communicant members, with a Sunday-school of over two hundred and sixty, and being virtually free of debt the prospects of Christ Church for permanent establishment are of the very best.

The following persons have served in the capacity of superintendent of the Sunday-school in connection with Christ Church at different periods of its history, viz.: John W. Hubley, John K. Skiles, E. J. Erisman, Washington H. Keffer, and the present superintendent, Professor R. K. Buerhle, elected Feb. 22, 1888.

The following pastors were connected with the mission during its history, viz.: Rev. E. Greenwald, D.D., originator; Rev. Charles S. Albert, Rev. D. H. Geissinger, Rev. John W. Rumble, Rev. C. Elvin Hout, Rev. E. L. Reed, present pastor, elected March 4, 1880.

St. Stephen's Evangelical Lutheran Church.<sup>1</sup>—The St. Stephen's Evangelical Lutheran Church is the youngest Lutheran Church in the city of Lancaster, and its house of worship, which is erected in Gothic style, is situated on the corner of South Duke, German, and Church Streets. The congregation, which is exclusively German, was organized in the summer of the year 1874, at which time the necessity of a second German Lutheran Church was felt. There were only seventeen families, who at the above-named time laid the foundation of this congregation in the name of the triune God, and in 1888 the number of the communicants reached three hundred and twenty-seven. The first minister of the St. Stephen's Lutheran Church, which is connected with the General Synod of the Lutheran Church of North America, was the Rev. W. Poor, who received the call in 1874, and was active in the congregation until 1880, at which time he was succeeded by the present pastor, the Rev. E. Meister. Until the latter period services were held in the lecture-room of the church, and on March 13, 14, 15, 16, 1881, the upper part of the church was dedicated, and on Trinity Sunday of the following year the church was completed and beautified with a large pipe-organ. There is a Sunday-school and Bible class connected with the church, the latter being organized in 1882, which are both very successful, the number of teachers and scholars numbering two hundred and thirty. In the Sunday-school the Old and New Testament, Luther's small catechism, with the Augsburg Confession and the history of the Bible, are used. Connected with the church is also a youth's and a ladies' society, which are under the supervision of the pastor, to further the good causes of the church.

First Reformed Church.<sup>2</sup>—The emigration of people of the Reformed faith from the Palatinate of Germany, Switzerland, and France to America began before the year 1700. Many of them settled in Pennsylvania. In 1709 there was a large emigration from the Lower Palatinate, also in 1712. Among these were some who settled within the bounds of what is now Lancaster County. Some of their names are found on the earliest pages of the baptismal record of this church. In 1727 there were about one thousand souls emigrated from the Palatinate, among whom were some who settled along the streams known as the Pequea and the Conestoga. In the colonial records there is a list of seventy-seven Germans who were naturalized in 1738, though many of them had been in the county for some years previous, among them are some names that appear on our church records. Thus we see that from 1709 to 1735 the emigration of French, Swiss, and Germans was large. Most of them, if not all, were of the Reformed or Huguenotic faith. They were chiefly exiles, or refugees, who were compelled by the then prevailing spirit of religious persecution and intolerance to forsake their homes in the Old World. At length, in the year 1736, these Reformed people felt themselves strong enough to organize a congregation and able to erect a church. They had no doubt occasional opportunity to enjoy ministerial services before this date, as evidences in the existing church-records clearly show. In September, 1731, the Rev. John Bartholomew Rieger, a native of the Palatinate of the Rhine, and a graduate of the University of Heidelberg, who was also a physician, arrived in this county. He settled in Lancaster, and preached occasionally to the scattered members of the Reformed Church. There is, however, some doubt of his having been an ordained minister at the time of his arrival. It may be that, being an educated man, he was pressed into the service by the peculiar wants of the times after he settled in Lancaster. He died here in 1769, and the spot where his dust reposes is marked by an humble monument in the rear of the present church edifice.

An account of the organization of the congregation and the erection of the first church edifice we find in the following extract taken from the earliest records extant. These records are entitled, "Church Protocol of the newly-built Reformed Church, here in the island of Pennsylvania, in Caunastoken, in the new town named Lancaster." In which protocol is to be found the commencement of this church building, and what took place in connection with it. It is also to be found in this protocol, "what and how many children have been incorporated into the Lord Jesus Christ through the Sacrament of Holy Baptism, together with the names of their Parents and Sponsors." Then comes the following historical statement: "Now as regards the building of this, our church, the beginning was made in the year 1736; and, by the help of God, it was so far completed, that on the 20th of June, 1736, or upon the festival of Holy Whitsuntide, we held Divine worship in it for the first time. The Teacher, Preacher, or Pastor called to this office of God, was the Reverend, and truly pious, John Jacob Hock. Inspired by the Spirit of God, he chose as his introduction the words in the prophecy of Isaiah, in the 35th chapter and 1st verse, 'The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose.' The text itself was the latter clause of the 4th verso in the 103d Psalm, 'Who crowneth thee with loving kindness and tender mercies'; and we joined with each other in singing the 84th Psalm."

"As regards the election of the first elders of the church, John Henry Basler, Felix Müller, John Gerner, and Peter Dorr were elected by the congregation, and declared duly qualified. It was resolved, at the same time, that two should withdraw annually, and that again other two should be elected in their place. Accordingly, at the expiration of the year, John Henry Basler and Peter Dorr retired, and Peter Balspach and Frederick Strubel were elected in their place; which order it is our mind to follow as long as the good God in His grace shall keep us together. We hope also that those who shall come after us will continue to do the same,<sup>1</sup> in order that the praise and honor and glory of God may be advanced day by day, the longer the more. Amen." The first deacons elected were John Charles Keller and John Stephen <sup>1</sup> That the wish of the Fathers has been respected, it may be here stated that the above law regulating the election of elders was subsequently embodied in the charter, and still continues in the congregation.

Ramersberger. The first baptism was that of Ann Barbara, daughter of Abraham Weidtmann, June 20, 1736. The membership at this time must have been quite large judging from the number of baptisms, which in 1736 was twenty-one; in 1737, fifteen; in 1738, twenty-seven; in 1740, thirty-eight.

Thus was the first Reformed Church in Lancaster solemnly consecrated to the worship of God. The historian, Harbaugh, says, "It was not only the first Reformed Church, but the first of any kind in Lancaster; the Lutheran Church being the next oldest, having been consecrated about two years later, Oct. 28, 1738, though this latter church was commenced in 1734."

This first church was a log building. Its precise location cannot be determined by any existing documents, but tradition says "it stood on the back part of the lot." This must have been somewhere in the neighborhood of what is now the corner of Grant and Christian Streets. The original lot was a grant to the congregation by James Hamilton, who executed a deed, in which, "favoring the application and request of the members of the congregation of the Reformed Church of the High Dutch (!) Protestants in the town of Lancaster," he "doth freely and absolutely give and grant" the said lot "for the promotion of religion." The lot is also further designated in the deed thus: "On which said lot, or piece of ground, a meeting-house erected by the said congregation now stands." This deed is dated Oct. 5, 1741. The meeting-house, of which mention is made, was erected five years previous, no doubt upon a lease which was now, upon "application and request," kindly changed by the proprietor into a permanent gift.

When the congregation built their second church edifice in 1753, the old log church or meeting-house was sold for £15 4s. 6d., and by the purchaser erected into a dwelling-house on the opposite side of East Orange Street (at present the northwest corner of East Orange and Christian Streets), where it stood until Jan. 14, 1836, when it was destroyed by fire.

Concerning the first pastor, the Rev. John Jacob Hock, nothing is known further than that he appears to have been a good man, being designated in the foregoing quotation from the "protocol" as the "truly pious," and that, after ministering to the congregation about sixteen months, from June 20, 1736, to Oct. 30, 1737, his ministry terminated with the latter date.

From the close of Rev. Hock's ministry the pastorate was vacant until April, 1739, at which time begins the pastorate of some minister whose name does not appear upon the records. He continued to serve the congregation until the close of the year 1742. During this time the congregation seems to have been in a flourishing condition. From February, 1743, to November, 1744, the pastorate was again vacant. At the last-named date the congregation succeeded in getting the services of the Rev. Caspar Lewis Schnorr, who served them till March, 1746. At the close of his pastorate a vacancy again occurred.

On the 23d of September, 1746, the Rev. Michael Slatter, on his tour of regulating charges and settling ministers, came to Lancaster. He found the Rev. Mr. Rieger, of whom mention has already been made, acting as pastor of the church. There is no evidence, however, that his service in the congregation was anything more than a temporary arrangement. He resided in the place, serving some churches in the country, and it seems that this was merely an effort during a vacancy to add this congregation also to his charge. But there were difficulties existing between him and the congregation which had ripened, on their part, into such a settled dislike that a separation took place towards the close of the year 1746. It is supposed that the cause of this dislike was his cold, languid, and heartless ministry.

THE OLD GERMAN REFORMED CHURCH.
Built 1753, taken down 1852.

On the 26th of September, 1746, Rev. Mr. Slatter preached in Lancaster, and explained the object of his mission. The people were unanimous in desiring a stated preacher; the Rev. Mr. Rieger himself judged this to be best, as they and he could not agree. The congregation promised to contribute "forty pounds in money, besides produce and other presents, for the support of a pastor." This was noticed in the call for a pastor which Mr. Slatter afterwards sent to Holland in behalf of the congregation.

In the mean time, while the congregation were awaiting the result of their call to Holland, Mr. Slatter seems to have taken a particular and deep interest in this church. He was then pastor at Philadelphia and Germantown. He visited Lancaster in November, 1746, in May and June, 1747, and in May, September, and November, 1748. He baptized at these several visits twenty-six children, the record of which is made in his own hand. He administered the Holy Communion here in June, 1747, to two hundred and twenty-five communicants. He says, "The multitude assembled on this occasion was so great that the church could scarcely contain half of them, so great was the desire to hear the word of God, and most of them returned with joy and thanksgiving."

In 1746 the congregation purchased the lot on East Orange Street, adjoining the one presented to them in 1741. For this lot they paid five shillings, subject to a ground-rent of seven shillings per year. The same year mention is made of work done at a steeple; it is likely that the steeple of the first church was then erected, as there is a notice that "a bell and a large clock were purchased for sixty pounds, Pennsylvania currency, the whole congregation contributing thereto." Harbaugh mentions a credible tradition that the bell of the Reformed Church, when it was first procured, hung for some time upon a hickory-tree in the neighborhood of Centre Square (no doubt the famed hickory-tree where the Indians held their council), and was rung there till the steeple was ready to receive it. This is no doubt the same bell mentioned in 1746. Tradition has also preserved the fact that on the emergency occasioned by a sudden incursion of hostile Indians into "Hickorytown," as Lancaster was first called, a heroic woman rushed into the church and gave the alarm to the neighborhood by ringing the bell. This bell, in 1774, burst on the occasion of a hasty ringing in very cold weather. In 1784 another bell also burst; they were both afterwards sold at eleven pence per pound, amounting to £15 11s. 9d. The church-going sounds of these bells have died, and so have the church-goers who heard them. The clock was sold when the old log church was taken down for thirty-two pounds, and the money was appropriated to the erection of the Second Church; its later history is not known.

In answer to the call from the congregation sent to Holland by the Rev. Mr. Satter, the Rev. John Jacob Hockrentiner arrived safely in this country on the 18th day of August, 1748. He was accompanied by the Rev. Dominicus Bartholomans, who was intended for the congregation at Tulpehocken. Mr. Hochrentiner preached in Lancaster and some other places directly after his arrival with acceptance, and was called by the congregation to become their regular and stated pastor. In October, when all the arrangements had been made for his removal, an elder was sent from Lancaster to fetch him from the house of Mr. Slatter, in Philadelphia. The elder, with a horse, was already at the door in readiness and waiting for him, but how mysterious are the ways of Providence! He had brought a gun with him from Holland, which he had loaded on shipboard, under the impression, it seems, that he was about to enter into a wild country, where he must be prepared for his defense in dangerous emergencies. Having found by a short residence in the country that his fears had been only imaginary, he attempted, before starting, to extract the load from his gun, when it exploded in his hands, and instantaneously laid him low in death! The written sermon which he had intended to preach as his introductory in Lancaster was found in his pocket after his sudden death, and on the earnest solicitations of many was printed. Mr. Slatter speaks in high terms of his worth.

Their hopes in this direction having now been disappointed, the congregation endeavored to procure a stated supply. The Rev. Dominicus Bartholomans and the Rev. John Philip Leydich, who arrived in this country from Holland Sept. 15, 1748, served them in this capacity during the year 1749. Toward the close of this year, having again consulted with Mr. Slatter, they succeeded in obtaining the services of the Rev. Ludwig Ferdinand Vock, an aged man, who arrived in Philadelphia in December, 1749. Mr. Vock began his pastorate in January, 1750. At a congregational meeting held Jan. 28, 1750, in reference to his settlement among them, the following action was taken, which we quote as it gives us a glance into the times:

"According to a resolution of the Reformed Congregation, the pastor for this year shall receive £40 cash, Pennsylvania currency. For Proclamation and Marriage he shall receive 7 shillings and 6 pence. For preaching a funeral sermon, from those who are able, 5 shillings. For baptizing children he shall receive nothing. In addition to this the Pastor shall be furnished with a free dwelling house; also six cords of wood. He shall also have four Sabbaths free to preach at other places, viz., the 1st Sabbath after Easter, the 1st after Whitsuntide, on St. Michael's day, and on the Sabbath after New Year. It is also allowed him on week days to preach in other congregations, provided it does not interfere with any of his pastoral duties in town."

This paper is signed by twenty persons.

Mr. Vock's pastorate continued for one year only. He failed to meet with favor from the congregation, as appears from the following remonstrance: "The names of those freeholders of the Reformed Church in Lancaster who, after the termination of the year 1750, will not continue with Pastor Vock, or who cannot with a good conscience hold to him." This paper is signed by thirty-four men, who were at that time the prominent members of the congregation. The language implies some defect in his moral character. The relation was dissolved at the end of the year. Of his subsequent history nothing is known.

The pastorate was now vacant from January, 1751, till after the middle of 1752. During this time the congregation was visited by way of supply several times by different ministers whose names are not given.

At this time the scarcity of ministers, and the destitution of the churches in consequence thereof, were so painfully felt that the Synod (Coetus, as it was then called), during its session at the close of the year 1750, took the matter into special consideration. The conclusion at which they arrived was to commission the Rev. Michael Slatter as their agent to proceed to Holland, Germany, and Switzerland, and represent in person the wants of the church in this country, and, if possible, induce some faithful laborers to come to its aid. This mission was accordingly undertaken by Mr. Slatter, and was, in a good degree, successful. In July, 1752, he returned to this country, bringing with him six young ministers who had been ordained by the Classis of Amsterdam, and appointed to labor in the destitute German Churches in America. Among these was the Rev. Philip William Otterbein, then in the twenty-sixth year of his age. He immediately received a call from the church at Lancaster, and entered upon his duties as pastor in August, 1752. An engagement was made between him and the congregation for five years. During this time he labored with regular success, though amid various discouragements. Owing probably to the frequent vacancies which had occurred in the pastorate during some years previous, loose ideas came to prevail, and various irregularities, especially in regard to order and discipline, had gradually crept into the church. This was a source of grief to the pastor. Accordingly, at the close of the stipulated term, in 1757, he was anxious to withdraw. The Synod interceded in behalf of the congregation, urging him to continue his ministry among this people, to which he finally consented, but was unwilling to engage for any specified term. "He complained of many grievances which had rendered his ministry unhappy, and demanded, as the condition of his continuance, the exercise of a just ecclesiastical discipline, the abolition of all appearances of disorder, and entire liberty of conscience in the performance of his pastoral duties." All this was readily promised by the congregation. He continued as pastor only one year longer. At the end of the year 1758 he resigned the charge to become the pastor of two congregations at Tulpehocken.

It is evident that it was his labor and influence in the congregation which gave it consolidation and character. Previous to his time its history was somewhat fitful, fragmentary, and weak. He brought its strength to a point and gave it permanency. His order and zeal look out upon us from the records in many ways, and enterprises, started in his time, extending their results in some of the permanent features of the congregation for years after his pastorate. This will be further seen from a glance at the outward history of the church during his ministry in it.

The second church edifice, with its massive walls and large proportions, considering the time when it was built, was erected during his pastorate. Mr. Otterbein had been pastor about six months only when the enterprise of a new church was started. The old subscription book is dated March 3, 1753. "Henry Walter, dyer in this place, treasurer." The building was begun that same summer, and, so far as we are able to learn, was finished in the latter part of the year 1756, or early in 1757. The precise time when this church was consecrated is not noted in the records. The final settlement was made June 28, 1758, with John Barr, second treasurer, when it appears that the entire cost of the church was £1018 16s. 1½d., and that there remained a debt on it of £215 7s. 6d. Some of the prominent members during the building of the Second Church were William Bausman, Lorenz Markedant, Paul Weitzel, Michael Fortue, Christian Graffart, Philip Leuber, Daniel May, Casper Schaffner, Jacob Kuntz, Peter Bier, John Hoffman, Henry Walter, Barnhart Becker, Peter Slicker, John Henneberger, Peter Wolff, John Scheiber, John Schneckenberger, Martin Bamberger, and Christian Buck.

The successor of Mr. Otterbein was the Rev. William Stoy. He came to this country with Mr. Otterbein in 1752, and began his ministry in Lancaster in October, 1758, which continued until January, 1763. In the Synodical proceedings of the Reformed Church in Holland for the year 1760, in the Dutch language, there is the following notice of Mr. Stoy and this congregation. "After Mr. Stoy came here, A.D. 1758, in the month of October, he found about one hundred families that belonged to the church. He has baptized since that time to the month of May, 1760, one hundred; instructed forty young persons in the confession of faith, and received them as communicants. At present sixty children attend the school."

During the pastorate of Mr. Stoy the congregation manifested considerable enterprise, especially in the improvement of its outward condition. In 1760 they bought a parsonage lot on North Duke Street for three hundred and twenty-eight pounds. The erection of the old parsonage and the school building, or lecture-room, adjoining (the houses at present numbered 41-49 North Duke Street), were begun in 1763, but they were not completed until some time during the year 1766. The cost of the lot, the cost of the buildings, together with the debt of some two hundred pounds remaining on the church, seem to have created a pecuniary burden which was severely felt by the congregation. This seems to have led, according to the fashion of the times, to the idea of resorting to a lottery for the purpose of raising the money for the building of the school-house. St. James' Episcopal Church, in this city, being then engaged in erecting their church, and the money realized by a lottery previously held by them not being sufficient to complete the work by them begun, they united "with their neighbors and fellow-citizens rather than set up a lottery by themselves for so small a sum." Thus these two interests gave rise to a scheme "for raising two thousand one hundred and thirty-five dollars for erecting a new school-house for the High Dutch Reformed Congregation at Lancaster, and for raising five hundred and sixty-five dollars to enable the wardens and vestry of St. James' Church, in the same borough, to complete the work begun by them." This lottery seems to have been begun in 1761, and was drawn in the beginning of 1765. They realized from it for the school-house £720 4d., and for St. James' Church £190 10s. 11d. The end for which it was held and the motives in holding it were, no doubt, good, but the thing itself cannot be justified on any ground of correct morals. Allowance must be made for the times.

From January, 1763, to December, 1764, the records are made in one uniform hand, which would indicate that some minister served as a supply, but his name is not recorded. There is a relic in the archives of the church, dated in this period, which, as a curiosity, is worthy of being put on record. It is in the shape of a letter from the frontier, and explains itself:

"CONNESCOCHIQUE 2d April 1764

"GENTLEMEN:

From January, 1765, until 1769 the pastor of the congregation was the Rev. Dr. William Hendel. Our data in regard to the life of this good man are scarce. He was one of the excellent of the earth. A contemporary clergyman speaks of his character in these terms: "This man is one of the best preachers that I became acquainted with in America. He was a Palatinate by birth, and had come to this country many years ago as a minister. He possessed much knowledge and science, and without any sectarian or party spirit, he was in heart consecrated to the cause of true godliness." During the year 1769, the last year of this pastorate, the congregation purchased the large organ which led the people in their songs of praise for one hundred years, but which is at this writing about to be removed in order to make room for a new one. It was built by David Jannenberg, in Lititz, at a cost of two hundred and fifty pounds. The congregation had, however, been in possession of an organ before that time, as mention is made of one in 1759. This was, no doubt, a small one, which, as the congregation increased, became inadequate to its wants.

At the close of Mr. Hendel's pastorate there occurred a vacancy again in the ministerial office of about one year, after which began the pastorate of Rev. Charles Lewis Boehme, which lasted from February, 1771, to July, 1775. Little is known of this man's history, and little has been preserved of the character of his pastorate in Lancaster. The most important event during this period of her history is the grant to the church of the earliest charter of incorporation of which we have any knowledge. It is an interesting document, written on parchment, in neat penmanship. It is given by "Thomas Penn and Richard Penn, Esquires, true and absolute Pro-prietaries and Governors-in-Chief of the Province of Pennsylvania, and Counties of Newcastle, Kent, and Sussex, on Delaware," unto the following-named consistory, "for the use and benefit of the Congregation," to wit: "Rev. Charles Lewis Boehme, the present minister of the same; Casper Shaffner, Eberhart Michael, and Michael Differderfer, Trustees; William Bausman, William Bush, Lorence Marquant, George Burkhart, George Reitzel, and Nicholas Yop, the present Elders; and Jacob Weber, Peter Ish, Bernard Wolf, Philip Bushong, John Hatz, and Jacob Frey, the present Deacons of the same." The paper is signed by "John Penn, Esquire, Lieutenant-Governor of the said province and Counties, who, by virtue of certain Powers and Authorities to him for this Purpose inter alia granted by the said Proprietaries, hath hereunto set his Hand, and caused the Great Seal of the said province to be hereunto affixed at Philadelphia this Sixteenth day of February, in the Year of Our Lord One Thousand Seven hundred and Seventy One, The Eleventh year of the Reign of King George the third over Great Britain, &c., And the Fifty-third Year of the said Proprietaries' Government." It was "entered in the office for recording of Deeds in and for the said County of Lancaster, the Twenty-ninth day of August, Anno Domini, One Thousand Seven Hundred and Seventy one." Signed by Edward Shippen, recorder.

In this connection it may be stated that this document was subsequently "confirmed and amended" by "An Act passed by the Representatives of the freemen of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania in General Assembly met, and by the authority of the same." This paper of "confirmation and amendment" is also written on parchment in an exceedingly fine style of penmanship. It was "enacted into a law at Philadelphia on Monday the 11th day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and eighty-six." "Signed, by order of the House," by Thomas Mifflin, Speaker; Samuel Bryan, clerk of the General Assembly. The following certificate is attached to the act:

"COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
"SECRETARY'S OFFICE,
"HARRISBURG, May 27, 1818.

"In testimony that the above is a true copy of the original law remaining on file and of record in the said office, I have hereunto set my hand and seal the day and year aforesaid.

"THOMAS SERGEANT, Secretary."

At the time the aforesaid amendment to the charter was obtained from the Legislature (Sept. 11, 1786), the following-named persons constituted the consistory of the church, to wit: Rev. William Hendel, minister; Peter Hoofnagle, Nicholas Job, and Christopher Grawford, trustees; Jacob Weaver, Peter Beier, Conrad Haas, John Hatz, Bernard Wolff, and Andrew Bausman, elders; and Andrew Backenstose, Casper Fordney, John Getz, Jacob Koeler, Andrew Teyer, and Michael Grubb, deacons.

In January, 1776, the Rev. John Conrad Albertus

Helfenstein became pastor, and continued his ministry here until July, 1779. This period includes part of those perilous times amid the throes of which this great and free nation was born. Although God may overrule the results of war for good, as He always makes the wrath of man to praise Him, yet war is always a great evil and calamity. Sad, then, for this church was the period of Mr. Helfenstein's ministry. The current expenses of the congregation, which, previous to 1776, were only from thirty pounds to fifty pounds per year, were in 1778 two hundred and seventy-four pounds. At the annual settlement there were but a few shillings of debt against the church, which the members of the consistory immediately paid out of their own pockets. The following remarkable minute is found in the proceedings of the consistory at that time:

"Since some of our posterity may perhaps wonder at the great difference in the expenses of the congregation between this and the previous years, this is to inform them that the famine (Theuring) was so great in 1777, and is still, that many items of expense were double, thrifble, and, in some cases, even tenfold what they had previously been, and it is a great blessing that the congregation was at all able to meet them as it has done. You, our posterity, remember that we, your fathers, saw and endured such times on account of our sins and many transgressions. Fear ye the Lord and serve him according to His Word, so will He in mercy preserve you from such times, as we hope He will, for Christ's sake, soon deliver us from them!"

During these times of civil troubles the congregation, in common with others, suffered great loss also by the depreciation of the currency.

It was a rare blessing which this church enjoyed in those trying times to have for their pastor one to whom the highest of all earthly titles belonged,—a good man! Mr. Helfenstein was born Feb. 16, 1748, in the Palatinate town Mossbach, in Germany. His classical education he received under the immediate care of his father, who was inspector in his native town. His theological education he received at the University of Heidelberg. After he had finished his studies he was sent to America by the Synod of Holland. He arrived at New York in 1772, where he was cordially received by the late eminent Dr. Livingston, at whose advice he proceeded to Philadelphia. Soon after he received a call to the congregation at Germantown, where he labored some three years, when, at the outbreak of the war, he was called to Lancaster.

He was an eloquent, warm-hearted, and pungent preacher. His zeal was more than ordinary. His ministry here was greatly blessed. Often, it is said, was the congregation overwhelmed by the mighty power of truth, as it flowed with holy warmth from his heart. He manifested especial zeal in his more private pastoral duties, in seeking out wounded and contrite hearts, and pointing them to Him who has power upon earth to forgive sins, and to bind up the broken-hearted. From Lancaster he was again called to Germantown, where he labored till death, in the form of a consumption, relieved him from his post, May 17, 1790, in the forty-second year of his age.

He had nine sons, four of whom entered the holy ministry.

The successor of Mr. Helfenstein in the pastorate of this church was the Rev. John Theobald Faber, who served the congregation from September, 1779, to September, 1782. In his time the consistorial minutes are not very carefully kept, indeed almost entirely neglected, so that not much is known, from this source, either of him or of the congregation during these three years. Nor does tradition speak anything of his ministry in Lancaster; but of his later ministry in Goshenhoffen, whither he went from Lancaster, it still speaks warmly of his worth. He was beloved of his people.

After Mr. Faber's pastorate closed in September, 1782, the Rev. Dr. William Hendel, of whom we have already spoken, became pastor of the church the second time. He returned with his former learning, eloquence, zeal, and piety, only all these had become still more venerable and lovely by age. The earthly house of his tabernacle now gave evident signs of gradual decay. The records, during his second term, are made with a trembling hand, resembling that of Mr. Hopkins in the Declaration of Independence. Still he continued his ministry here until February, 1794, and afterwards yet several years in Philadelphia, when the yellow fever carried him away, while he still held fast to his glorious commission with his dying hand. History records his faith and bravery during the period of that dreadful scourge. "When terror was written on every face, and death on every door, Hendel did not desert his post. He was with the sick; his place was the house of mourning." He was one of the last subjects of the retiring epidemic, and on the 29th of September, 1798, after he had served his own generation by the will of God, he fell asleep, and was laid unto his fathers.

The history of the congregation during this good man's second term is characterized with unusual zeal and prosperity. Its outward condition was much improved. In 1784 they purchased the half-lot of ground east of the graveyard, which at that time lay adjacent to the church. In the same year they imported from England the two bells, which from that date until 1852 hung in the tower of the Second Church edifice, and which in 1854 were transferred to the tower of the present church, where they still continue to call the people to worship. The larger bell weighs eight hundred and fifty-four pounds, the smaller seven hundred and twenty-four and one-half. The cost of them was one shilling twopence sterling per pound. Freight and all costs added, "the bells cost £232 18s. 4d., Pennsylvania currency, in gold and silver."

The following inscription is cast upon the bells: "Vor die Hoch Deutsche Reformirte Gemeine in Lancaster, in dem Staat Pennsylvania, 1784; Chapman & Mears, of London, Fecerunt, 1784." Besides, on each bell is cast a very appropriate and beautiful motto: On the large one, "Colite Jehovam cum Lætitia"; on the smaller one, "Venite in conspectum ejus cum cantu." The same year when the bells were placed in the steeple, that beautiful relic of the olden time, which some aged people still remember, the glass chandelier was suspended in the Second Church, where it remained until it was displaced by the introduction of gaslight in 1850. Its cost was "£24 8s., and was paid by subscription, and one French dollar left."

The internal and spiritual history of the congregation during this time shows the same signs of progress. A minute of the consistory in 1786 is worthy of note, as showing how the practice of baptizing children privately came to be introduced:

"Since through the disorders of the war the Christian order of the Church has fallen into neglect to such an extent that, for some time past, no children have been baptized in the church, therefore,

"Resolved, That from this time forward, in accordance with the rules of the Church, all children must be baptized in the church. If, however, a child is sick, or the weather is bad, it may be baptized in the house."

From March, 1795, to June, 1806, the pastor of the church was the Rev. Christian Lewis Becker, D.D. This eminent servant of Jesus Christ was born in Anhalt-Coeten, in Germany, Nov. 17, 1756. He enjoyed a thorough university education, extending over fourteen years, including four years in the theological department of the University of Halle, which he left with the honorary title of Doctor of Philosophy. From Halle he went to Bremen, where he spent fourteen years as Candidatus Theologie, during which time he pursued his studies with the utmost diligence, and was engaged also in the education of young men preparatory to entering the universities. While at Bremen he published also several works, one an exposition of the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah, and the other a "Treatise on the Best Mode of Converting the Jews," both of which are said to manifest great theological learning, and an extensive acquaintance with general literature. He published also three volumes of sermons, two while in Europe and one in this country.

In 1798 he embarked for America with the best testimonials of his learning and piety, and with the blessing and prayers of the ministerium. He landed at Baltimore, Md. After serving the united congregations of Easton, Mount Bethel, Plainfield, and Dry Land, in Northampton County, Pa., for eighteen months, where he was greatly beloved, he received a call from Lancaster, which he very reluctantly accepted. Here he labored with great acceptance and success, and the congregation prospered greatly. He seems to have had a special eye to the internal and spiritual interests of the church. The following resolution of the consistory, passed in 1799, speaks for itself:

"Resolved, That no one shall be elected elder who, besides leading a good life, is not of such an age as shall constitute him really venerable enough to be called elder. This shall be a settled ordinance forever."

In the year 1805 the consistory also established the custom of meeting four times a year as a strictly spiritual body, when no other business was to be transacted but such as pertained to "the establishing and maintaining of Christian order, to the promotion of love to all that is good, and to the advancement of God's honor and glory."

Previous to 1798 it had for some time been the custom to hold the afternoon services (this was doubtless a catechetical service) in the school-house. As the congregation was used to an organ in their worship, they felt the want of it in their afternoon devotions. This led to the purchase, in that year, of the small organ still used by the church in the Sunday-school and lecture-room services. It cost three hundred dollars, which sum was promptly subscribed and paid.

In 1801 the church in Baltimore, Md., gave Dr. Becker a call to become their pastor, which he declined. He seems to have been averse to removals. In July, 1806, the call from Baltimore was, however, renewed, which was successful finally in drawing him away from Lancaster. How deep a hold he had upon the affections of the people here may be inferred from the tradition that at his removal "a long train of carriages accompanied him as far as Columbia on his way, and the procession bore a strong resemblance to a funeral." They had lost a faithful, learned, and pious pastor, and this was cause sufficient for tears. He departed this life in Baltimore, July 12, 1818, in the sixty-second year of his age. The end of that man was peace.

The successor of Dr. Becker was the Rev. John Henry Hoffmeier. He entered upon his duties as pastor in October, 1806, and continued longer than any of his predecessors, his pastorate closing in 1832. This good man was born at Anhalt-Köthen, in Germany, March 17, 1760. He was educated at the University of Halle. Afterwards he spent some time as private teacher in Hamburg, and subsequently at Bremen, where he preached as candidate. In 1793 he came to America. In May, 1794, he was examined and approved by the Synod convened at Reading; he was immediately ordained and placed over a charge in Northampton County, where he labored with the divine blessing and with favor among his people until 1806. On the 10th of August of this year he received a call from the church in Lancaster, which he accepted, and entered upon his new field of labor in the following October. During the greater part of Mr. Hoffmeier's term of service the congregation kept the even tenor of its prosperous way. In 1812 considerable improvements were made in the church building in the way of painting and trimming, the cost of which amounted to two hundred and fifty-one dollars and thirty-nine cents. In 1820 two lots on the east side of Duke Street were bought for two hundred and twenty dollars, and in 1821 another lot near the church for eight hundred and five dollars. In 1822 the church building was improved, perhaps we should more properly say remodeled, at an expense of fourteen hundred and seventy-two dollars and forty-four cents. Previous to this time the aisles in the church were laid with brick; the gallery did not extend the whole way along the sides; the pulpit was of the ancient kind,—

"Goblet-formed, half up the wall,
The sounding-board above, with acorn crowned,"— only large enough for one man to stand in, with a narrow stairway winding up into it, and ending below in a small closet of lattice-work, intended as a privacy for the minister previous to ascending the pulpit, no doubt originally intended as a place for putting on the gown.<sup>1</sup> The altar place was a perfect circle, some ten or twelve feet in diameter, inclosed with banisters, so that the communicants could entirely surround it. There were, up to this time, no stoves, nor any other means of warming the church in winter. Perhaps there was more warmth in the hearts of the worshippers than there is now, which may explain the reason why an inconvenience could be endured the very thought of which to our effeminate age seems worse than to be without religion entirely. In the repairs which were made at this time many of these things were changed and more modern improvements introduced.

The latter part of Rev. Hoffmeier's term was emphatically the most trying period in the whole history of the congregation since its organization up to this time. Hitherto the public worship had been conducted entirely in the German language, and now began the transition from German to English. Whoever is in the least acquainted with the difficulties that have attended this crisis in other congregations will wonder that the matter here was piloted as well as it was. It is a time when the greatest wisdom, firmness, faith, love, and self-denial are required. Few would have acquitted themselves so well; hundreds, perhaps, in the circumstances would have done worse. Towards the close of Mr. Hoffmeier's time several efforts were made to procure the services of a co-pastor in English, so far as the nature of the circumstances seemed to require, but without success. At length the idea was abandoned, and after the withdrawal of Father Hoffmeier, in 1831, the congregation concluded to procure the services of a pastor who could officiate in both languages.

"LANCASTER, April 17, 1760.

"Received of Paul Wetzel, for boarding the tailor and paying him for his work while he was making the gown, six shillings.

"CASPER SCHAFFNER."

It is not many years since the last members of the church passed away, who remembered when at a later day the officiating minister wore a broad strip of black silk fastened in folds around the back part of the neck, from shoulder to shoulder, and extending down below the knee, growing broader as it approached the lower end. Dr. Becker, it is said, was the last who wore it.

On the 18th of March, 1838, the Rev. Mr. Hoffmeier fell asleep and was gathered unto his fathers. His learning, piety, faithfulness, and his services of love during a service of twenty-five years in this congregation have been appropriately honored by a monumental panel of marble to his memory, which now ornaments the walls of the present church, near by where his dust, together with that of his wife, reposes.

His successor was the Rev. Martin Bruner, whose call is dated May 4, 1832, and who soon after took charge of the congregation, and continued the pastor thereof until May, 1839.

The question of a Sabbath-school in the modern form was first agitated in 1821, but it was not until July, 1832, that the matter was finally decided in the affirmative. The school was then organized with from thirty to forty teachers and upwards of two hundred scholars, and was conducted in the church.

The next pastor was the Rev. George W. Glessner. His call is dated Jan. 28, 1840; he was installed July 24th of the same year. Under his ministrations the congregation, which for some years had been in a somewhat blighted condition, resumed its wonted order, strength, and beauty. He was a pungent, warm-hearted, and faithful herald of the everlasting gospel. There are still some persons left to whom the word proclaimed by him became the power of God unto salvation, and who yet cherish the most grateful recollection of his services. His pastorate closed by his resignation, which took effect April 1, 1847.

In April, 1847, the Rev. N. A. Keyes was elected as an exclusively English pastor. It was at the same time designed to secure the services of a German pastor, and to connect his labors in the city with ministrations to adjacent congregations in the country. After a number of unsuccessful efforts to effect this arrangement the project was finally abandoned, and the Rev. D. Y. Heisler, then the pastor at Columbia, was engaged to preach in the German language as a supply. This arrangement continued until the beginning of the year 1850, when, on the question of how much service should be continued in the German language, the congregation was at length divided into two separate and distinct churches. The branch in which the services were to be conducted exclusively in the English language withdrawing, and being organized by the Classis into the congregation since known as the "St. Paul's Reformed Church," with the Rev. Mr. Keyes as their pastor, erected the church building on the southwest corner of Orange and Duke Streets. The other branch remained in the old church, and immediately called the Rev. Henry Harbaugh, D.D., to become their pastor, who entered upon his duties March 24, 1850, and continued to conduct the public services in both languages. One of the earliest projects of the congregation during this pastorate was the erection of a new church edifice.

The old one had stood nearly a century, and was beginning to show signs of decay. The enterprise was suggested during the summer of 1851; it found favor in the consistory, and was by that body recommended to the congregation. It was unanimously agreed upon by the people, and the preparatory steps were immediately taken. The plan included a church, with parsonage adjacent. The State Legislature was overtured for permission to sell the parsonage and school building on North Duke Street, which was granted, and on the 14th of August, 1851, the consistory authorized the trustees to go forward with the sale of the said property, and apply the proceeds thereof to the erection of the new church and parsonage. The parsonage was sold April 1, 1852, to Mrs. Mary Carpenter for three thousand five hundred dollars, and the school building June 12, 1855, to Hon. Isaac E. Hiester for four thousand three hundred and fifty dollars. The church, exclusive of the furnishing thereof, together with the present parsonage, according to the report of the building committee, cost eighteen thousand eight hundred and sixty-eight dollars.

The last service in the old church was held March 21, 1852, which was naturally characterized, on account of its sacred and tender associations, as of great solemnity. The corner-stone of the third church edifice in the history of the congregation was laid with appropriate ceremonies at the Whitsuntide festival, May 30, 1852, and the church was finished and consecrated to the worship of the triune God amid great rejoicing Feb. 19, 1854.

Dr. Harbaugh's pastorate in the congregation was productive of much good. His memory as a man and as a preacher is still cherished by many who sat under his ministry. He was fearless in his denunciation of wickedness, and in maintaining that which he conceived to be right. His love of church order led him to the exercise of discipline which at the time excited considerable opposition, but which eventually brought about a more healthy spiritual life. At length, after a pastorate of ten years, he tendered his resignation, which was reluctantly accepted, and his ministry among this people closed Sept. 24, 1860. After a three years' pastorate at Lebanon, he was called to the professorship of Didactic Theology in the Theological Seminary of the Reformed Church, at Mercersburg, Pa., the duties of which he discharged with marked ability until his death, which occurred Dec. 28, 1867, at the age of fifty-two years.

His successor was the Rev. Amos H. Kremer, D.D., who entered upon the duties of the pastorate April 7, 1861, and continued in the same until Oct. 1, 1877. The congregation for some years after Dr. Kremer entered upon his pastorate was embarrassed by a heavy debt, which had been incurred in the building and furnishing of the church. This incumbrance, however, in March, 1871, was at length entirely removed by the cancellation of the debt.

In January, 1870, the German portion of the congregation was organized into an exclusively German Church, under the name and title of "The St. John's German Reformed Church," who proceeded at once to take steps looking forward toward the erection of a church building for their own use, which movement eventually resulted in the location of the said edifice on the northeast corner of Orange and Mulberry Streets. The German brethren receive some pecuniary aid toward the erection of their church from the English portion, and were allowed the use of this church in their religious services until their own was ready for occupancy. From that date the public worship in this church has been conducted exclusively in the English language.

On the 29th of February, 1872, an act was obtained from the State Legislature authorizing the congregation to have the dead removed from the graveyard in the rear of the church, to sell the ground thereof, and "to apply the proceeds of such sale to such purposes as the congregation shall direct." This grant was soon after carried into effect, the dead, with some few exceptions, were removed to the public cemeteries, and the property was sold for other purposes. These are some of the most important items in the history of the church during Dr. Kremer's pastorate. His ministry here, in the main, was prosperous, and characterized by unanimity and kind feeling until some differences arose, which eventually led to his resignation and departure at the date aforesaid. As to the issues involved in that controversy we are yet too near the time when it occurred to express an opinion.

His successor was the present incumbent, the Rev. J. A. Peters, whose call to the pastorate is dated July 8, 1878, and who was formally installed therein on the 10th of November following by a committee of Lancaster Classis, consisting of Rev. Drs. E. V. Gerhart, J. H. Dubbs, and J. S. Stahr. The congregation at the present writing may be regarded as in a prosperous condition, both in its internal spiritual interests as well as in its more external and material welfare. The membership are at peace and harmony, and Christ, the great Head of the church, seems to be blessing this portion of his heritage.

This church has now, in the providence and by the blessing of God, continued its existence for one hundred and forty-seven years. It has had the services of twenty-two pastors. Up to this date its records (although they were somewhat imperfectly kept during some of the early years) contain the following statistics, to wit: Baptisms, 8100; admissions to full communion, by confirmation, certificate, and renewal of profession, 8844; marriages, 6167; deaths, 2760.

As to its present numerical strength we give the following quotation from the last annual report made to the Classis: Membership, 880; unconfirmed membership, 150; baptisms during the past year, 19; admissions to full communion, 87; communed during the year, 365; Sunday-school scholars, 300; contributions to congregational and other benevolent purposes during the year, $3280.63.

Its present valuation of property, including the parsonage and the janitor's house, is estimated at $40,000. The following gentlemen, together with the pastor, now constitute the consistory of the church, to wit: Elders, Philip Bausman, Henry Gast, John Kepner, John B. Roth, Edward J. Zahn, and Joel S. Eaby; Deacons, Hiram Stamm, Eugene G. Smith, Esq., Addison H. Fritchey, Esq., Ernest Zahn, Meroz S. Miller, and John H. Hertzler; Trustees, Dr. Emanuel K. Young, Washington F. Hambright, and John H. Kauffman.

St. Paul's Reformed Church.<sup>1</sup>—The causes which led to the organization of St. Paul's Reformed Church were well grounded and legitimate. Those persons who were first identified with the movement, and sought the organization of a new interest of the Reformed Church in Lancaster, acted from good and sufficient reasons. The first Reformed Church of Lancaster, Pa., was organized in 1736. The preaching of the word was conducted exclusively in the German language until the year 1832, when the English language was introduced, and pastors were subsequently called who could officiate in both languages. The English tongue was rapidly taking the place of the German in the families, in the schools, and in the community, so that this change had a very material effect upon the church, and the youth of the church showed a desire to have and enjoy exclusively English services. There was such a falling off from the attendance upon the German service that at different times complaint was made of the difficulty of raising the pastor's salary.

In 1847 two pastors were employed, one to preach the German and the other in the English language. They were to alternate their services, so that both had an equal use of the house for morning preaching. But now a new difficulty arose. The revenues of the church were not sufficient to support two pastors, and having German preaching every other Sabbath morning militated against the true interests of the congregations. The consistory resolved to have English preaching every Sabbath morning and evening, and the Germans to occupy the church in the afternoon, or the lecture-room in the morning. This action led to an organized opposition against the consistory among the members, who petitioned to have only one pastor who could officiate in both languages. This petition was presented Sept. 14, 1849. While the petitioners stated that no fault was found with the English pastor, Rev. Nathaniel A. Keyes, he still regarded this movement as an effort at his removal. His first impulse was to resign, but after further reflection he decided to await future developments. To be consistent with his high character as a man, and that he might stand in a true light before the congregation, the community, and the Reformed Church generally, he said, "If in the judgment of the consistory, and of those who had a right to decide the case, the interests of the congregation and the cause of Christ would be promoted by this removal, I would be willing to retire and give the congregation no trouble." A number of unauthorized persons claiming to be members of the church held a meeting Oct. 11, 1849, and among other things resolved that the services of the English pastor would be dispensed with after Jan. 1, 1850. On Sunday, Nov. 4, 1849, Rev. Keyes preached a sermon on the state of the congregation, in which he urged the importance of building a new church, that there might be two congregations, one for the English and the other for the Germans. Action in regard to this step was not hastily taken. It was not until the 26th of December of the same year that a congregational meeting was held and a resolution was entertained in favor of building a new church. Efforts were made to have only those who were legally entitled to vote exercise this privilege, but in vain, and the resolution was tabled. Then an effort was made to appoint a committee from members of both parties to whom this subject should be referred with a view of bringing about an amicable adjustment of the difficulties, or looking to an equitable division of the church property and a legal separation. This measure was opposed by many who favored the Germans, but was finally carried, when the officers of the meeting, they who favored the German, withdrew without an adjournment. New officers were appointed in their places. Then the committee called for in the above-mentioned resolution was appointed, an equal number to represent each interest, but the Germans never met the others. The English at once opened a subscription towards the building of a house of worship. They were much encouraged in this undertaking, not only on the part of those of their brethren, but also in the community.

The election for church officers came on in January, 1850. It was a scene of confusion not to be here described. The German portion of the church elected their candidates by a majority of three votes. The English were really in the majority, but a number of their members in the confusion did not vote. The English pastor at once asked the consistory elect if they wished to receive his resignation before the next Sunday. A number of his friends, however, advised against hasty action, and the subject of the resignation was allowed to rest for the present. The installation of the church officers was deferred. In the mean time a memorial was prepared to be presented to the Lebanon Classis, about to convene in Myerstown, Pa., in which was set forth the state of the congregation, accompanied also by documentary evidences, asking the Classis to interfere and restore peace in the church, a division of the church property, and an amicable separation of the two parties. Besides the pastor and Elder Lenker, Brethren Christian Gast, George Spurrier, Joseph Welshaus, and Rev. Jacob Chapman attended the meeting of Classis to represent the case. The Germans were not prepared to have the case go forward, but requested that the English pastor, Rev. Keyes, be dismissed. In case the Classis did go forward, with a view to the adjustment of the difficulties, they declared themselves unwilling to stand by the decision of the Classis. The Classis appointed a committee of five ministers and two elders to come to Lancaster, to whom they delegated full power to settle all existing difficulties. Three ministers and the two elders came. After long and tiresome debates and deliberations, in which all the different phases of the case were presented, especially in regard to the property, the English portion, believing that they were justly entitled to half the property, yet, to avoid contention and secure peace, they agreed to receive as their portion "The Lancaster Cemetery," which was then valued at two thousand dollars, and availed the congregation that amount, reserving one hundred family burial-lots. They left to the Germans the church and lot, parsonage and lot, school-house and lot, in all valued at about fifteen thousand dollars. Both pastors, Revs. N. A. Keyes and D. Y. Heisler, resigned, and were authorized, on the part of the committee, to serve their respective congregations as supplies. The old congregation was directed to dismiss all who asked a dismission for the purpose of connecting themselves with the English Church, and Rev. Keyes was instructed to organize them into a congregation at the earliest period practicable. The members who withdrew from the old congregation were organized into an English Church on the 17th day of February, 1850, and the action was duly approved by the Classis. Twenty-eight male and seventy-two female members were recorded as uniting in the organization.

At the election for officers the following were chosen: Elders, Daniel Heitshu, Abraham Cole, J. L. Hoffmeier, and Christian Gast; Deacons, George Spurrier, Charles M. Erben, Henry Metzgar, George Gundaker, Jr., Joseph Welshaus, and David King; Trustees, Peter Long, Phillip K. Brenneman, and David Longnecker. These persons were duly installed to their respective offices on Sunday, Feb. 17, 1850, and the consistory met for the first time on Monday evening, Feb. 18, 1850. Rev. N. A. Keyes was at once elected as pastor of the congregation, and a committee appointed to confer with him as to his acceptance of their call, and to settle the preliminaries in regard to his support. Six hundred dollars was the amount that was afterward agreed upon as the pastor's salary. The new congregation went vigorously to work. The old Franklin College was secured as their temporary place of worship. A committee was appointed to secure a lot for the building of their house of worship. Subsequently this committee reported the lot on the southwest corner of Duke and Orange Streets as an eligible site, and that it could be purchased of the owner, Dr. Humes, for the sum of three thousand one hundred and fifty dollars, subject to the rents. On the 6th of March, 1850, the consistory instructed the trustees to purchase the lot, which was accordingly done. J. W. Jack was the contractor to erect the new house of worship, at a cost of eight thousand five hundred dollars. Services preparatory to the laying of the corner-stone were held on Sunday, Sept. 15, 1850, in the old Reformed Church, Rev. Dr. Zacharias, of Frederick, Md., officiating, assisted by Revs. Alfred Nevin and H. Harbaugh, and Pastor Keyes. The formal ceremony of laying the corner-stone was held on Monday, Sept. 16, 1850, in the presence of a large and deeply-interested audience. It required about a year to complete the church after the corner-stone was laid, and cost one thousand dollars more than the original contract price.

Heretofore the congregation had been indifferently called "The Second Reformed," and "The New Reformed Church." On the 5th of November, 1851, by resolution of consistory, the name "St. Paul's Reformed Church of Lancaster, Pa.," was adopted. The church was dedicated on the 9th of this same month of the year 1851. The entire week preceding the dedication was set apart by the pastor and congregation for religious worship and thanksgiving. The congregation now having a house of worship entirely paid for, entered upon its career of usefulness with encouraging prospects of success.

On the 1st day of September, 1855, Mr. Keyes tendered his resignation, to take effect October 1st of the same year, and it was reluctantly accepted.

Mr. Keyes, on his removal from Lancaster, went to Illinois, where he soon after was elected pastor of a Congregational Church, in which capacity he continued till the time of his death, which occurred in 1857.

From October, 1855, to February, 1856, the congregation was served by supplies. On Feb. 5, 1856, Rev. Isaac S. Demund, of Belleville, N. J., was unanimously elected pastor, and a call was forwarded to him, with a salary of eight hundred dollars per annum. Mr. Demund accepted the call, and entered upon his pastorate in the following April, and continued in this capacity for eight years. He served the congregation during the trying times of the civil war, which had such stifling effect upon all the interests of the country. When he offered his resignation the 24th of February, 1864, to take effect the last Sunday in March, it was accepted with reluctance.

Rev. Henry Mosser, of Perry County, Pa., was, on the 25th of July, 1864, elected pastor. A call was made out and forwarded stipulating a salary of seven hundred dollars. The call was accepted, and Mr. Mosser entered upon his duties the following September. In November of this same year he asked for an increase of salary, and an additional one hundred dollars was raised by subscription and presented to him. In September, 1865, Mr. Mosser informed the consistory that he had received a call from Paradise, Northumberland Co., Pa., and he was inclined to accept it unless the congregation would raise his salary to one thousand dollars. The amount asked for was raised, and Mr. Mosser continued to serve the congregation until March, 1867, when he resigned and removed to Northumberland County, Pa. During his pastorate the congregation purchased the property now used as a parsonage at No. 137 North Duke Street. The purchase was made Jan. 11, 1865, and the amount of purchase money paid was three thousand five hundred dollars.

For several months the congregation was now without a pastor. A number of calls were tendered, but declined. Rev. Edwin H. Nevin, a Presbyterian, was invited, and preached trial sermons on the 28th of July, 1867. He made a favorable impression, and arrangements were made that he should, for the present, supply the congregation with preaching. On the 30th of December following he was elected pastor, at a salary of fifteen hundred dollars, which was afterwards raised to seventeen hundred and fifty dollars, with the use of the parsonage. He continued to serve the congregation until Nov. 28, 1870, when he tendered his resignation, to take effect with the close of the year. It was accepted, and the congregation then invited Rev. G. W. Welker, of North Carolina, to preach trial sermons, and became a candidate for pastor, but he was not elected. Rev. O. L. Ashenfelter, of the Church of the Cross, Cincinnati, Ohio, was the next candidate, and was elected pastor on the 29th of May, 1871, at a salary of one thousand dollars. Mr. Ashenfelter entered upon his labors the 1st of June of the same year.

On Monday, Nov. 11, 1872, Mr. Ashenfelter tendered his resignation, which was accepted. The congregation for the time had to depend upon supplies, but steps were at once taken looking toward calling another pastor. At a meeting of the consistory, Dec. 9, 1872, a resolution was passed, inviting Rev. J. B. Shumaker, of Canton, Ohio, to preach trial sermons. On the 9th of February, 1873, Mr. Shumaker visited and preached for the congregation. At a congregational meeting held Feb. 17, 1873, he was elected pastor, and his call, promising a support of one thousand dollars and the free use of the parsonage from the congregation, states that this election was unanimous. Mr. Shumaker accepted the call and entered upon his labors April 1, 1873. He was installed by Rev. Dr. Gerhart, G. W. Glessner, and A. B. Sheukle, a committee of Lancaster Classis. The first communion celebrated under this pastorate was held April 18th, and numbered one hundred and fourteen.

In April, 1877, there was a movement started to erect a sexton's house on the rear end of the parsonage lot. Subscriptions were solicited and the work pushed forward, and on the 13th of August the trustees reported the building completed. The charter of the congregation provided for six elders, but up to the present only four had been elected, and on the 5th of February, 1878, it was resolved that the full board of six elders be elected. Since that time the congregation has the benefit of these six, who, with the pastor, constitute the spiritual court of the congregation. On the 9th of February, 1882, the congregation lost a very valued and esteemed friend and elder in the death of Daniel Heitshu, who had been identified with the interests of the congregation since its organization.

At this time, July 13, 1888, the congregation numbers two hundred and seventy members; of these about two hundred and forty are regular communicants. The following are the officers: Rev. Joseph B. Shumaker, D.D., pastor; Elders, Christian Gast, John H. Pearsol, Andrew J. Eyler, Jacob L. Hoffmeier, Charles Deneus, Christian S. Hoffman; Deacons, David C. Haverstick, John Brock, Phares P. Kauffman, George E. Zellers, John H. Hollolinger, Jacob Rauch; Trustees, John D. Skiles, Daniel H. Heitshu, John W. B. Bausman.

At the time the congregation began to worship in Franklin College the work of the Sunday-school was not forgotten. The organization of the school as it existed in the old church was transferred to the college building, and work was resumed there without break or hindrance. This change of plan left the old church practically without a Sunday-school, and they were compelled to begin anew. The first meeting of this organization outside of the old church was held Feb. 17, 1850, with one hundred and twenty-six pupils and twenty-eight teachers. From that time to this it has continued to prosper, and has proved a great source of help in caring for the spiritual interests of the children. In addition to its regular work, since Sept. 9, 1880, it has successfully carried forward a mission school, held every Sunday afternoon in a public school-house on Sherman Street. The superintendents have been Daniel Heitshu, Christian Gast, Jacob L. Hoffmeier, Charles A. Bronneman, John H. Pearsol, Rev. O. L. Ashonfelter, and Charles Deneus, Esq. At this time the school numbers fourteen officers, thirty-eight teachers, and two hundred and thirty pupils.

St. John's German Reformed Church.—For many years divine service was held, both in the German and English language, in the First Reformed Church in this city. In 1869 the Classis of Lancaster took active measures towards the organization of a German congregation. A committee, consisting of the Rev. Dr. Theodore Appel, the Rev. Dr. Nevin, and the Rev. W. T. Gerhard, were appointed to lay the action of Classis before the German members, which was done on Christmas-day in that year. The action was well received, and on the Thursday evening following there was a meeting of the German members in the lecture-room of the First Reformed Church, and an organization was effected with unanimity and cordial good-will on the part of the mother-church. Seventy-five members from the First Reformed Church became the constituent members in the new church. Elders and deacons were elected, and the Rev. W. T. Gerhard was chosen as their pastor. Services were held in the First Reformed Church until the completion of their new church, in 1876. A site for a church was selected on the corner of Orange and Mulberry Streets, and the building commenced in 1872 and completed in 1876, at a cost of twenty-three thousand dollars, and dedicated on the 17th of September in that year. The pastors who have served the church are as follows, with their terms of service: Rev. W. T. Gerhard, five years; Rev. — Stoehr (supply), six months; Rev. John Kulling, five and a half years; Rev. A. E. Dohlman, two years. Rev. G. L. Neff, the present pastor, commenced his labors in April, 1883. The church has a present membership of two hundred and seventy-five. It is proposed to erect a parsonage on the church lot on Mulberry Street in the summer of 1883.

St. Mary's Catholic Church.<sup>1</sup>—The history of this church is closely linked with that of Lancaster, the foundation of the former having been separated from that of the latter by only a few years. Well authenticated tradition asserts that even before the landing of Penn, Jesuit missionaries from the Maryland Colony of Lord Baltimore ministered to the wants of the dusky warriors in the Indian settlements on the north bank of the Susquehanna, and that these zealous men penetrated as far as the waters of the Pequea and the Conestoga. Certain it is that long before Lancaster was laid out as a town by Governor Hamilton, which took place in 1780, it was visited at intervals by missionaries from Baltimore, Philadelphia, and other places. The number of worshipers steadily increasing, a mission was established in 1741, which received regular visitations from the adjoining centres of Catholicity. In the record of the Hamilton grants it is found that on Aug. 10, 1742, two lots, numbered respectively 235 and 236, being the southeast corner of what is now Vine and Prince Streets, were granted to Henry Neill, as is probable, to hold for the use of the congregation. To these was added a third lot, No. 237, granted to Robert Harding, June 27, 1761, just prior to the building of the old stone church.

The first regular place of worship was a log chapel erected in 1745 on the site of the present convent and school building. It was destroyed by fire in 1760, and replaced two years later by the old stone church which was recently torn down. In the construction of the latter a very pretty tradition has been handed down to the effect that the women of the congregation mixed the mortar, while the men gathered from the fields near by the stones required. The different pastors that officiated at varying intervals from 1740 to 1802 were Fathers Molineaux, Farmer, Steenmyer, Schneider, Pellentz, Ailing, Brosius, Hellron, Rosseller, Stafford, Geisler, Homm, Mongrand, Fitzsimmons, Lewermond, Janin, Entzen, and Coleman. The latter was at one time imprisoned in New York for not revealing the secrets of the confessional, but was afterwards released, and his action sustained.

At the beginning of the present century John Carroll, bishop of Baltimore, and afterwards the first American archbishop, administered at different times in St. Mary's Church the sacrament of confirmation. Prince Gallitzin, the pioneer priest of the Alleghenies, also visited Lancaster on his way to and from Philadelphia. Both these dignitaries were frequently entertained by Anthony Hook, grandfather of D. A. Altick, of this city, at his residence, on the south side of East King Street, near Lime Street, adjoining on the west the present Eagle Hotel. In 1802, Revs. Michael Egan and Louis De Barth officiated at St. Mary's. The former was a brilliant orator, and his sermons always attracted large audiences. Many representatives in the State Legislature, which was at that time holding its sessions in Lancaster, were accustomed to attend the services to hear him preach. Dr. Egan was transferred to St. Mary's, Philadelphia, in 1806, and two years afterwards was appointed first Catholic bishop of that city, but was not consecrated until the autumn of 1810. Father De Barth remained in Lancaster until Bishop Egan's death, which occurred July 22, 1814, when he was appointed administrator of the diocese of Philadelphia. He performed the duties of that office for six years, and was succeeded by Rt. Rev. Henry Conwell.

Rev. I. Beschter, S.J., a French refugee, was the next pastor, and he was followed for brief periods by Fathers Stoecker and O'Connor. They in turn gave place to Rev. M. Byrne, a missionary belonging to the old Jesuit settlement at Conewago, on the York County side of the Susquehanna. His pastorate was brief, and he was succeeded by Revs. Schenfelder and J. J. Holland, the former for German, the latter for English, parishioners. Father Holland died universally lamented on the 29th of September, 1823. A once handsome but now time-worn marble tomb marks his resting-place in St. Mary's Cemetery. Rev. Schenfelder did not long survive his associate. He was buried at the Jesuit settlement at Conewago, in York County.

On the death of Father Holland, Rev. Bernard Keenan, who had come from Ireland with Bishop Conwell in 1820, and received his education for the priesthood at Mount Saint Mary's College, Emmittsburg, Md., assumed the pastoral charge, retaining it for a period of fifty-four years. During his prolonged pastorate he so intrenched himself in the hearts of the citizens of Lancaster by his unflinching devotion to principle and large public spirit that his death, on Feb. 19, 1877, was regarded by all classes, irrespective of creed, as a public calamity. Father Keenan's parish, which now comprises seven separate parishes, was very extensive, his ministrations reaching to Columbia and Elizabethtown, and at times to Lebanon, Colebrook, and Harrisburg, and on occasions even as far as Milton and Sunbury.

REV. BERNARD KEENAN.

The increase of membership and inadequacy of accommodations rendered necessary a larger edifice, and in 1852 the corner-stone of the new St. Mary's was laid with imposing ceremonies. Very Rev. John McCaffrey, D.D., president of Mount Saint Mary's College, Emmittsburg, Md., preached the dedicatory sermon. In March, 1854, the completed structure was consecrated for divine service by Bishop Newman, of Philadelphia, Rev. E. J. Surin delivering the consecration sermon in the presence of a vast assemblage of people. The diocese of Harrisburg, comprising the counties of Dauphin, Lebanon, Lancaster, York, Adams, Franklin, Fulton, Cumberland, Perry, Juniata, Centre, Mifflin, Clinton, Union, Snyder, Northumberland, Montour, and Columbia, was formed in 1868, with Right Rev. J. F. Shanahan as bishop; over this extensive diocese Father Keenan was appointed vicar-general, an office which he held until his death.

The reverend pastor bore the burden of his official duties without aid of any kind until 1852, when Rev. Sylvester Eagle, a native of Elizabethtown, this county, was appointed assistant. The latter afterwards became the pastor at York, and his place in Lancaster was supplied by Rev. Henry Balfe, a native of Philadelphia, who remained in Lancaster from 1858 until 1862, retiring in the latter year to Philadelphia, where he died soon after. His immediate successor was Father O'Brien, a native of Boston, educated at St. Sulpice, France, and an orator of considerable power. On the retirement of Father O'Brien, in 1864, Rev. Thomas J. Marren became assistant, and in less than a year was succeeded by Rev. Richard J. Barry. During the latter's term of stay, on Jan. 28, 1867, the new church took fire from a defective flue in the heater, and so extensive was the damage caused that a remodeling of the edifice was found necessary. The interior of the church was at the same time frescoed and repainted, the total repairs amounting to sixteen thousand dollars. On Sunday, May 8, 1868, the remodeled edifice was rededicated with impressive ceremonies by Bishop Wood, of Philadelphia, assisted by Bishops Shanahan, of Harrisburg, and Elder, of Natchez, a large number of priests being also in attendance.

Rev. Daniel J. McDermott succeeded Father Barry in October, 1868. He was a native of Ireland, and remained in Lancaster only six months. He afterwards went to Centralia, Columbia Co., Pa., and subsequently to West Chester, this State, where he still resides. His successor in office was Rev. Thomas J. Reilly, who remained in charge until 1871.

He was followed by Rev. Matthew O'Connell, who served until the spring of 1872, when ill health compelled him to abandon his charge and return to Ireland, where he died soon after. Rev. J. C. Hickey was appointed assistant in May, 1872, and remained in that capacity until Father Keenan's death, when he assumed entire charge of the church. He received assistance for a brief period from Rev. Daniel Reilly. In the spring of 1881, Father Hickey was transferred to Harrisburg, and subsequently to Carlisle, where he still resides.

On Feb. 19, 1877, Rev. Bernard Keenan, full of years and honors, passed away. He had lived far beyond the age of the patriarchs, having passed his ninety-seventh year, and to him was vouchsafed the pleasure of seeing all his fondest anticipations regarding the welfare of St. Mary's more than realized. His funeral was the occasion of a gathering of the ecclesiastical dignitaries of the Catholic Church such as was never before seen in Lancaster.

Attached to St. Mary's Church is an academy and parochial school under the charge of the Sisters of Charity. A considerable fund has accumulated in recent years for orphan asylum purposes. A portion of this fund was devoted in 1874 to the purchase of a property on South Queen Street, which was used as a school and orphan asylum until September, 1882. On Jan. 11, 1881, Rev. Peter J. McCullagh, the present pastor, was appointed to preside over the destinies of St. Mary's. On September 18th of the same year the corner-stone of St. Mary's Convent and Schools, a handsome edifice adjoining the present church on the east, and occupying the site of the old stone church, was laid with solemn ceremonial. Bishop Shanahan and a large number of priests were present, and Father McCallan, of Baltimore, preached an eloquent sermon. Prior to the dedication, on August 25th, the remains of those who were buried in the old graveyard were disinterred and removed to the southeast corner of the present cemetery. A portion of the new building has been in use for educational purposes since September, 1882, and it is thought that the completed structure will be ready for entire occupation Dec. 1, 1883. Its total cost will be about twenty-five thousand dollars, and it will comprise the Sisters' home, the academy, and the parochial schools.

Belonging to the church is also a handsome cemetery, on the New Holland turnpike, which was donated in 1853 by the late Michael Malone. The schools attached to the church are in a flourishing condition, the constant attention of a corps of seven efficient Sisters being required for their supervision. The Sunday-school numbers three hundred on its rolls, the parochial schools one hundred and ninety, and the number of communicants belonging to the church is about two thousand five hundred.

St. Anthony's German Catholic Church.—This church is beautifully situated on the corner of Ann and Orange Streets, fronting on Orange, north side.

The congregation was organized and formed into a parish in the month of April, 1870, by the Rev. Anthony F. Kaul, with the approbation of the Very Rev. Bernard Keenan, V.G., then pastor of St. Mary's Catholic Church, Lancaster, and at the same time administrator of the diocese of Harrisburg (to which Lancaster City and County belong), Right Rev. J. F. Shanahan, bishop of the diocese, being absent at Rome, attending the Ecumenical Council which had been convened by the late Pope Pius IX. in the fall of 1869. The district which was to comprise the new parish belonged to and constituted but one congregation, known as St. Joseph's, and contained about eighty families, or three hundred and fifty to four hundred souls.

The lot of ground, fronting on Orange Street three hundred and forty feet and along North Ann to Marion Street two hundred and forty-five feet, was purchased in April, 1870, through Patrick Kelly, from William Miller, for the sum of three thousand five hundred dollars; work was begun at once, and the corner-stone was laid, in presence of a great number of the clergy and a large concourse of people, on the 14th of August, 1870, by the Rev. Father McGinnis, of Danville, Pa., being deputed by the very reverend administrator.

There is a basement under the entire building, of which the rear was fitted up with altars, pews, organ, etc., as a chapel, and was blessed for divine services on Easter Monday, the 9th of April, 1871, by Right Rev. Bishop Shanahan.

The upper or main room was handsomely finished in hard wood, the sanctuary railing, pews, and wainscoting being polished walnut, and the arched ceiling and walls richly frescoed and adorned with beautiful fresco paintings, and the windows filled with fine stained glass, and was dedicated with solemn ceremonies by the same bishop on the 17th of May, 1875. The church is one of the handsomest in the interior of the State, built of brick, with sandstone dressing, according to the plan furnished by the well-known architect, E. F. Durang, of Philadelphia. The size of the church is sixty-five by one hundred and forty-two feet, and has a seating capacity of twelve hundred. The cost was about sixty thousand dollars, which included the five-thousand-dollar organ and the gold-embroidered imported vestments, valued at two thousand dollars.

The present number of members is about two hundred and twenty families, or one thousand and twenty-five souls. The Rev. Anthony F. Kaul continues as rector of the church.

The front part of the basement was fitted up in the spring of 1871, and a parochial school was opened in the fall of the same year with two lay teachers. In the fall of 1873 the present teachers, the Sisters of the Holy Cross, from Notre Dame, Ind., took charge, and also opened an academy and boarding-school for young ladies, known as the "Sacred Heart Academy."

In the spring of 1876, Rev. A. Kaul purchased the lot opposite the church, on the southeast corner of Ann and Orange Streets, from Patrick Kelly, for the sum of four thousand three hundred dollars, and began the erection of a building for the academy, which is of brick, three stories and clear story basement, and furnished with steam-heating and all modern improvements adapted to make it a first-class school. It is a very imposing building, and is indeed an ornament to the city. The same pastor also built a residence on the east end of the church lot, which is now used as the parochial residence, also purchased, in 1873, five acres of ground from Zyprian Hausner, which was consecrated and set apart as a cemetery; it is conveniently situated at the extreme end of East Orange Street, a few squares beyond the limits of the city, on Broad Street, in Lancaster township.

St. Joseph's Catholic Church.—In 1849 the German element of St. Mary's Catholic Church decided to petition the bishop to be set off as a separate church, that they might have services in their own language. Their petition was granted by Bishop Wood, of Philadelphia, and an organization was perfected in the autumn of 1850, consisting of about twenty-five families. The congregation was placed under the charge of the Rev. R. Tamchina, who remained until April, 1851. He was followed by Rev. M. A. M. Wirzfeld, who remained until September, 1851, and after that time the succession of priests was as follows: 1851-52, John Dudars; 1852-53, M. A. M.

Wirzfeld; 1853-56, Leopold Hoberferger; 1856-66, Anthony Schwarz; 1866-78, Francis Neufeld; and Louis Grottemeyer from 1878 to the present.

The church and parsonage were built at a cost of about eight thousand dollars soon after the organization. Although the church is quite roomy, the increasing congregation demands a larger one, and it is soon to be built. A school-house and Sisters' residence was commenced in the summer of 1880, and finished in the winter of 1881-82, at a cost of twenty thousand dollars. The German and English languages are both taught in this school. It has five teachers, and is attended by about three hundred and twenty pupils. The church has now about twelve hundred communicants, who belong to about three hundred families.

St. Joseph's Hospital, situated on College Avenue, was erected in 1878, at a cost of about six hundred and fifty dollars. It was put in operation upon completion and continued until June, 1882, when, by reason of financial difficulties, it was closed, and it now remains unused. It was built under Catholic auspices by the Rev. P. Ignatius Sagerer, but has no connection with the Catholic Churches of Lancaster.

St. James' (Episcopal) Church.<sup>1</sup>—It is evident that immediately upon its settlement, the county was visited by the zealous missionaries of the venerable Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts. By that society, indeed (the first missionary body organized in England since the Reformation), the church was established on a firm basis in many widely-scattered regions on this continent. We find from its records that as early as 1717-18 its clergy had already begun their ministrations in what is now the city of Lancaster. Thus the Rev. John Backhouse, rector at Chester, Pa., reports to the society in 1729 that he had just returned from a visit "to the church-people of Conestoga, about seventy miles back from Philadelphia." The Rev. James Lindsay held service here from time to time during the years 1735, '36, '37.

It was by means of these ministrations and others like them that many of the scattered emigrants were held faithful to the church of their fathers, and others brought back to its fold. So we find that on the 3d day of October, 1744, at a meeting held in Lancaster, St. James' Parish was organized. Thomas Cookson and James Postlethwaite were elected wardens, and Edward Smout, Daniel Syng, William Bristow, John Folke, Morgan Morgan, and John Connelly, vestrymen.

In the year 1745 the building of a stone church was begun, James Hamilton, Esq. (the head of a family who by grant from William Penn, dated 1729, owned a vast tract in Lancaster County), having given a lot of land for church and churchyard. It was finished in 1750. At various times additions and improvements were made—a tall spire, galleries, bells, and finally, special license having been granted by the provincial government for a lottery to raise the funds, the churchyard was surrounded in 1764 by a massive wall of molded bricks, part of which yet remains. The original church of rough limestone stood north and south, on a spot covered by the eastern end of the present building, and measured forty-four by thirty-four feet.

The first entry in the parish records is as follows: "October 3d, 1744. The Rev. Mr. Richard Locke accidentally coming into our borough of Lancaster a little before the date hereof, we agreed to give him what encouragement we could for his residence among us. And tho' destitute of any sett place of worship for Performing of Divine Service of y<sup>e</sup> Ch. of England, and its members here but very few, yet in order to keep up & maintain y<sup>e</sup> polity or Government of y<sup>e</sup> Church, we have met this day." The Rev. Mr. Locke removed about 1750, and was succeeded, in 1751, by another missionary of the society, the Rev. George Gray. During his charge it appears from the records that there was built "a platform on the east side for the Holy Table, and seats for servants on the other side."

The Rev. Thomas Barton (M.A., T.C.D.) assumed the rectorship in 1759. His ministry seems to have been a period of quiet growth and prosperity for the parish until the breaking out of the Revolutionary war. Then like most of the clergy of the Church of England here who felt themselves solemnly bound by their oaths of allegiance to the monarch and of conformity to the Book of Common Prayer, he found himself in great trouble. It is recorded of him, however, that he bravely performed his duty as he understood it, and prayed in church day after day for the King though threatened with violence and death. In a letter to the secretary of the society, dated Nov. 25, 1776, he speaks pathetically of his sufferings and those of the other loyalist clergy, and writes that though at last the church had been forcibly closed and its doors and windows boarded up, he still continued private ministrations to the scattered members of his flock. Worn out with arduous labors, which had extended for years both to the white people and Indians, and reached far beyond the bounds of the county, at last he asked permission to pass within the British lines. This seems to have been accorded, and he arrived in New York in November, 1778, intending to return to his birthplace in Ireland. His weakness, however, prevented him from undertaking the voyage, and he died in that city in the following May.

To him succeeded the Rev. Joseph Hutchins, who served from 1783 to 1790, and then the Rev. Elisha Rigg became rector, who was followed, in 1799, by the Rev. Joseph Clarkson, who held the rectorship until his death, in 1880. In the year 1818 the old stone building was felt to be far too small for the increasing congregation, and during the two following years a new and larger church of brick was erected upon its site. This was consecrated on Oct. 10, 1820, by the Right Rev. Dr. White, Bishop of Pennsylvania, assisted by many of the clergy. The next day thirty members of the parish were confirmed. In the same year it was agreed that the three parishes of St. James, St. John's, Pequea, and Christ Church, Leacock, should be placed under charge of Mr. Clarkson, assisted by another priest, and in October of that year the Rev. William A. Muhlenberg, whose name has become illustrious in the annals of the American Church, was elected co-rector of these parishes. Mr. Muhlenberg remained here until 1826, when he departed, and entered upon his great work in the diocese of New York.

ST. JAMES' EPISCOPAL CHURCH.

He was succeeded as co-rector by the Rev. Levi T. Ives, who labored here three years. He then departed to North Carolina, of which diocese he shortly after became bishop. Here he was succeeded by the Rev. Samuel Bowman, who became associate rector, with the right of succession, on the 27th day of September, 1827. On the death of Dr. Clarkson, Jan. 25, 1830, he took the rectorship, which he held through life. In May, 1858, this noble man was elected bishop assistant of Pennsylvania, and consecrated in August of the same year. Neither he nor the parish were willing, however, that the tie which had so long bound them together should be sundered, and he continued rector until his sudden death, while on a visitation at the western part of his diocese, Aug. 8, 1861. His mortal remains rest in peace, in the quiet old churchyard of St. James, and under the shadow of the walls which he loved so well.

To him succeeded as rector the Rev. J. I. Mombert,

D.D., who had been assistant priest in charge of the parish after Dr. Bowman's consecration. He resigned in July, 1869, and on the 19th of the following November the vacant rectorship was filled by the election of the Rev. Edward T. Watson. Mr. Watson, harassed with an increasing trouble in the eyes, which at the time threatened him with total blindness, gave up the charge of the parish Aug. 14, 1877, and on the following 20th of November the Rev. C. F. Knight, having been elected rector by the wardens and vestry, accepted the office, which he still holds.

During all these years since the parish was formed its growth has been quiet, and, with rare intervals, constant, and its power has never been torn by dissensions. It stands now one of the most important congregations in the diocese, having more than three hundred regular communicants, averaging more than sixty baptisms and about thirty confirmations in each year, with frequent celebrations of the Holy Communion, and constant week-day services, and a parish guild which does a great work of charity among the poor.

At various times through this century a parish orphanage, a chapel-of-ease (which is now St. John's Church, an independent parish), a church-home for the old, and two parish schools have been founded. Besides these, another chapel in a distant point in the parish, a rectory, sexton's house, and a Sunday-school-house have been built. The church, since its erection, in 1820, has been four times enlarged,—in 1844 under Dr. Bowman, in 1870 under Mr. Watson, in 1878 and again in 1880 under the present rector. These changes have been made thoughtfully, in excellent taste, and in a consistent architecture, and the building now stands, a simple but most effective and beautiful illustration of the early Lombardic style. The nave measures eighty-two feet by forty-eight. The chancel is twenty-three feet deep. The tower, on the northwest, rises to the height of a hundred and ten feet. The walls are massive, and pierced by memorial windows filled with costly and beautiful glass from England. A noble open roof of hard wood, oiled, covers the nave, and both within and without the church the eye falls everywhere upon tablets and other monuments to the dead. Altogether, there are few churches in the land which to the same degree call forth the interest of the architect, the antiquary, and the devout churchman.

SAMUEL BOWMAN was born May 21, 1800, and died Aug. 3, 1861. He was the fourth child of Capt. Samuel Bowman, an officer in the Revolutionary army, who participated in the initial struggle of the colonists at Lexington. At the close of the war he settled at Wilkesbarre, in the beautiful yet tragic valley of the Wyoming, where Samuel was born and reared to manhood. The enlightened and patriotic views of his father, the refined tastes and virtues of his mother, and the Christian influence of the Protestant Episcopal Church were the surroundings that blessed his early life. He received his education at the Wilkesbarre Academy, one of the foremost chartered institutions of that day. He seems to have been early inspired with that love of the true and the beautiful, which distinguished him as the brilliant orator and conscientious man through all his subsequent life. It was the desire of his family and friends that he should adopt the law as his profession, and with this object in view, he studied under Charles Chauncey, Esq., of Philadelphia. He gave indications of rapidly attaining distinction and success in that calling, but soon after commencing the practice of law an event occurred which gave a new direction to his life-career. He was brought under deep religious conviction by the sudden death of his father, caused by an accident, the circumstances of which were peculiarly impressive as illustrating the uncertainty of life. He felt an irresistible impulse to consecrate himself to the Christian ministry, and at once entered upon a course of preparatory theological study. The natural talent and studious application which had given promise of distinction at the bar characterized him in his new line of research. He applied for holy orders, and was admitted to the diaconate by Bishop White in Christ Church, Philadelphia, Aug. 25, 1823, and began his ministry at St. John's Church, Pequea, Lancaster Co., where he remained about two years, preaching also at Christ Church, Leacock.

In 1824 he was ordained a presbyter, and the year following accepted a call to the rectorship of Trinity Church, Easton, Pa., where he formed the acquaintance of Susan, daughter of Samuel Sitgreaves, Esq., whom he subsequently married. In 1826 he returned to his first charge at Pequea and Leacock, where he remained until Sept. 27, 1827, when he was elected co-rector of St. James' Church, Lancaster, of which the Rev. Joseph Clarkson had been rector since 1799, and whose activity in parish work was impaired by the infirmities of age. In 1836 the venerable Clarkson entered into rest, and Mr. Bowman became sole rector of one of the oldest and most prosperous Episcopal parishes in the diocese, which then embraced the entire territory of the State, a position which he filled until his death; for, on his elevation to the episcopate, thirty-one years later, his parishioners prevailed upon him to continue, so far as practicable, the relations he had so long and so happily sustained towards them. About this time the degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon him by Geneva College, New York, than which honor none was ever more worthily conferred.

Of the acceptable manner in which Dr. Bowman discharged the duties of minister and citizen during the thirty-four years he was rector of St. James', the testimony is not restricted to members of his own branch of Christ's Church, nor, indeed, to professing Christians of whatever denomination. Universally esteemed for his purity of life, suavity of manner, and amiability of disposition, blended with a natural dignity of bearing, which commanded respect in whatever circle he moved, his friends and influence extended far beyond the church circle in which the latter was potential. Unflinching as was his devotion to the creed and polity of the church whose faith he had pledged himself to uphold in his ordination vows, his catholic charity ever commanded the respect and esteem of Christians of all denominations, for his daily walk and conversation proclaimed that he believed in the sentiment of the poet, that and that this style is not circumscribed by denominational lines; but that, in the language of the Book of Common Prayer, "It is a most invaluable part of that blessed liberty wherewith CHRIST hath made us free, that in his worship different forms and usages may, without offense, be allowed, provided the substance of the Faith be kept entire." Hence, in his contribution to the Memorial Papers (June 19, 1854), he wrote, "On occasions—as funerals, meetings of societies, and the like—for which the Church makes no provision, let every man do the best he can. I have never considered myself bound by the prayer-book when I found myself in a position for which evidently the prayer-book had not provided. In all such emergencies I feel myself as free as a Methodist or a Presbyterian." Deeply interested in the promotion of popular education, he did not restrict his aid and influence to the parish schools he established, and which flourished under his fostering care. For many years he was an active member of the Public School Board, in whose deliberations his wise counsels and persuasive eloquence always had great weight. When any public meeting was called to consider measures for the general welfare, Dr. Bowman was a central figure, and when he rose to speak he always commanded the most profound attention, and generally carried his point in any controverted question. This was equally true of him in the councils of the Church. His "rare qualities of mind and heart gave him great influence in deliberative bodies, and though he spoke rarely in conventions, such was the weight of his reputation that his vote was worth more than most men's speeches."

At the Diocesan Convention of Pennsylvania, held in 1845, Dr. Bowman, against his own protest, was supported by the conservative clergy, who opposed the election of Rev. Dr. Tyng for bishop, and was elected by them on several ballots, the laity refusing to concur. After a long and exciting contest, Rev. Alonzo Potter, D.D., was elected as a compromise candidate, a result at which no one was more gratified than Dr. Bowman, for his attachment to his parish and the community in which he lived had grown so strong that he would have accepted the office with reluctance, and only under the most pressing sense of duty. This was again apparent in 1847, when he was elected bishop of the diocese of Indiana, which he declined, reiterating his desire to remain with the people between whom and himself the bonds of union had strengthened with the intervening years. Subsequently he was urged to consent to be a candidate for provisional bishop of New York, and again positively refused. But at the Diocesan Convention of Pennsylvania, held in 1858, the call to this humble man of God to go up higher came with such peculiar force that he no longer felt at liberty to decline, believing that his acceptance under the circumstances "would redound to the unity and advancement of the church." The convention having failed to make a choice between Dr. Vinton and himself, Dr. Bowman offered a resolution for a committee to report a candidate to the convention, which he advocated with great earnestness in one of the most eloquent speeches ever heard on the floor of the convention, concluding by solemnly and emphatically withdrawing his name from the nominations before the convention. He said God brought men together by ways unknown to them. His name had been placed before the convention without any desire on his part. His greatest and only ambition was to pass the remainder of his days in the humble yet honorable station of the ministry, to which he was so sincerely attached. He expressed the hope that the carrying out of the resolution he proposed would result in breaking down the partition which existed between some portions of the church, in which all should be of "one Lord, one faith, one baptism." Let the only strife be, he continued, as to who shall expend most labor in the cause of God. Let us no longer array ourselves under party leaders. Let our only motto be "Pro Deo, pro ecclesia, et hominum salute!"

The sincerity, humility, and fervent zeal which characterized this eloquent appeal for unity disarmed the opposition, and his election as assistant bishop followed as an irresistible conclusion. Upon being introduced to the convention, he closed a feeling address with expressing the "fervent hope that the work which the convention had that day accomplished would redound to the unity and advancement of the church through Jesus Christ our Lord." And that hope was happily realized during the three years that he labored as chief pastor in the diocese, and until God called him by the wayside as he "went about doing good" to again go up higher. He was consecrated in Christ Church, Aug. 25, 1858, in the same venerable church and on the thirty-fifth anniversary of his ordination by Bishop White.

During a brief pause in his episcopal visitations during the oppressive heat near the close of July, 1861, Bishop Bowman spent Sunday, the 28th, in his old parish, and preached for the last time to his people, who had insisted that the relation of pastor should not be severed except by death, for on his consecration as bishop the vestry had elected Rev. Dr. J. I. Mombert their co-rector. That evening he preached at St. John's Free Church, whose existence was "due to his energy and watchful care," and whose people he had served as rector as a labor of love for a period of four years. That proved to be his last sermon, and his text was an epitome of his life: "For I determined not to know anything among you save Jesus Christ and Him crucified." On Tuesday following he left home on an episcopal visit to the oil regions. At Pittsburgh, on Saturday morning, Aug. 3, 1861, he took the early morning train on the Allegheny Valley Railroad for Freeport, twenty miles distant, whence he proposed going by stage to Butler, where he had an official appointment for Sunday. Nineteen miles out the train was halted by a landslide and a bridge injured by a late freshet. Arrangements had been made to transfer the passengers in a hand-car to a train on the opposite side, but the bishop, with some other gentlemen, preferred walking. Unable to keep up with the others, he was missed when the train was on the point of starting, and when the workmen in charge of the hand-car returned they found him lying by the roadside, stretched at full length, and his face buried in his hat. The majority of the physicians consulted ascribed his death to apoplexy, but Dr. Atlee, his family physician, to disease of the heart. But the angel of the Lord had met him alone in the pathway of duty, and "he was not, for God took him." The remains were brought to Lancaster on Sunday, and the funeral obsequies took place in St. James' Church on Tuesday, August 6th, at 5 P.M. Two bishops, seventy presbyters, and all the resident ministers of other communions united with a vast concourse of citizens to do honor to his remains, which were laid in the evening shadows of the church which had so often resounded with his eloquent voice. Just as the solemn words, "Earth to earth, dust to dust, ashes to ashes" were pronounced, a rift in the clouds permitted the slanting sunbeams to fall upon the open grave, as if to remind the sorrowing friends of that land where their beloved had gone, where there is "no night, and they need no light of the sun, for the good God giveth them light, and they shall reign for ever and ever."

Bishop Bowman was twice married. His first wife, Susan Sitgreaves, bore him three children,—Samuel Sitgreaves, who died when about twenty years of age; Susan, who died young; and Ellen, the surviving member of the family, who is the wife of Bishop Vail, of Kansas. His second wife, Harriet R., daughter of the late Rev. Joseph Clarkson, died several years before him. The bishop's body lies in St. James' churchyard, by the side of these departed friends, and mural tablets to his memory are erected in the churches of St. James and St. John.

Bishop Bowman left many monuments more enduring than marble shafts, mural tablets, or memorial windows to attest the zeal and efficiency with which he labored in the Master's cause. He modestly referred to some of these in a discourse preached shortly before his death, on the occasion of his thirtieth anniversary as rector of St. James'. The number of communicants in the parish had been quadrupled. A parochial school had been established eight years before, in which from eighty to one hundred children had been continuously educated without drawing upon the public for aid. An orphan asylum had been established during the same period, affording a Christian home to many helpless and unprotected children, and later still a home for the aged and infirm (now called the "Bishop Bowman Church Home" in his memory), which accomplished great good. The Yeates Institute was endowed through his influence, and the confidence of the liberal founder reposed in his plans of charity and beneficence. But the grandest monument, alike to his memory, his liberality, and his energy, is St. John's Free Church, which he planned, furnished means, and moved others to furnish means to build, and fostered with fatherly care until it was able to care for itself. Soon after his entrance into the ministry he became deeply impressed with the idea that the seats in God's house should be as free as the gospel itself, and all distinctions of wealth or caste discouraged in temples consecrated to His service, and to demonstrate no feasibility of this, his favorite scheme, became a cherished object of his life.

In 1852 he selected the location, which was then practically out of town. The neighborhood was a moral wilderness, so much so that when the owner of the lot learned that Dr. Bowman desired to purchase it for a church he refused to sell at any price, until the late F. J. Kranph purchased it on his own account and subsequently transferred it. The building was erected in 1853, after plans suggested and procured by Dr. Bowman. Out of his limited means he pledged one-tenth of the entire cost, and paid still more to lift it out of debt. He gave his services as rector gratuitously for over four years, and until it became self-supporting. By his expressed desire while living, his daughter, Mrs. Bishop Vail, made a liberal contribution to the endowment fund after his death. It was at his suggestion and through his earnest persuasion that the rectory was built in 1858, after he was bishop, again pledging one-tenth the cost; and protesting against the small size proposed by the vestry, he declared it "poor economy to finish it badly or stunt it in size," adding, "I shall cheerfully bear the increased tax upon myself, as I am very sure others would sooner increase their subscriptions than see the building spoiled by its diminutive size." In the anniversary discourse already quoted he referred with great satisfaction to the successful establishment of this church on the principle of free seats, in which it was a pioneer, and that it had been paid for, and which he hoped had a long career of usefulness before it.

In his theological opinions Bishop Bowman was ranked as a moderate High Churchman; while in doctrine he never departed from his original position, on some points of practice he was disposed in his later years to be less rigid. This appeared in particular in a sermon preached before the Convention of Pennsylvania in 1855, and published by request, and in his contribution to the "Memorial Papers," already quoted. Were he living now the school of advanced churchmen of ritualistic tendencies would class him, with his plain, old-fashioned way of conducting the services, as a Low Churchman. In regard to the parties which unfortunately existed then as they do now in the Episcopal Church, Bishop Bowman was a conservative even to the extent of ignoring the terms "High" and "Low." He feared what this party spirit has since developed, and expressed himself freely and earnestly to those with whom he counseled in the selection of pastors for the free church. It was only on the Sunday previous to his death, while walking home with him from St. John's, where he preached his last sermon, that he remarked to the writer of this sketch that unrestrained party spirit had brought the then existing calamity upon our nation, and that if it were possible to destroy the church of Christ, party spirit would be the instrumentality through which it would be accomplished. He regarded party spirit as the besetting sin of Church and State.

The Moravian Church.<sup>1</sup>—There is only one congregation of this, the oldest Protestant Church in the world, in the city of Lancaster, and only two in the county, the other one being at Lititz. The official name of the church is the Unitas Fratrum, or Unity of Brethren, though it is more popularly known as the Moravian Church, from the country where it originated. The church was first organized in the barony of Lititz, in Bohemia, in the year 1467, by the more spiritually minded of the followers of John Huss, who first raised the banner of evangelical truth in Bohemia and Moravia, and sealed his faith at the martyr's pile in 1415. After the organization of the church numerous awakened Bohemians and Moravians flocked to it, and after a full and regular organization had been effected, and in 1467 the valid apostolic episcopacy had been introduced, the church grew rapidly in spite of much opposition and bloody persecution. In 1484 it published a translation of the Bible in the Bohemian language, and in 1505 its first hymn-book and catechism, both prepared by its bishop, Luke of Prague. At the time when Luther commenced the German Reformation, in 1517, the Unitas Fratrum had already more than four hundred churches in Bohemia and Moravia, with a membership of about two hundred thousand souls, among whom were some of the noblest families of the land.

After the accession to the throne of the bigoted Ferdinand II. in 1617, he inaugurated the Bohemian anti-reformation, a systematic endeavor to totally crush out the Brethren's Unity with fire and sword. He drove more than thirty thousand families out of the land, hunted down, imprisoned, and burnt multitudes more, and finally succeeded in establishing the Roman Catholic religion, and suppressing the outward organization of the Unitas almost entirely. It still, however, kept up its worship and ministry to some extent in secret, while in Poland, whither many of its members had fled, it maintained itself with all its distinctive forms and in all its purity.

In 1722 the Bohemian and Moravian branch, grown weary of its continual persecution, determined to seek an asylum, where it could worship according to its conscience, in some other land. Such an asylum it at last found in Saxony, where a colony of devout brethren established themselves on the estate of the pious Count Nicholas Lewis von Zinzendorf. This nobleman at once became deeply interested in them, gave them all encouragement and great material assistance. They built the village of Herrnhut, where they reorganized the ancient Unitas Fratrum, with its original constitution, ritual, and church government, in the year 1727. Reinforced by refugees from Bohemia and Moravia, and by many German converts as well, the church then grew and flourished. Their intention, however, was not to build up a strong denomination at home, but rather to devote themselves to the work of evangelization among the far-off heathen.

Hence in 1732, when the church numbered scarce six hundred members all told, they inaugurated their great and distinctive work of foreign missions, in which they have ever since been the foremost among Christians, having to-day nearly four times as many converts among the heathen in Greenland, Labrador, West Indies, South and Central America, Africa, Australia, in Asia, and among the American Indians as they have members in their home congregations.

With a view only to increase their work among the Indians, they tried to settle a colony in Georgia in 1735, but the war with the Spaniards drove them, in 1740, to settle on the banks of the Lehigh River, and found the town of Bethlehem, which from then on became the centre of their extensive missionary labors among the Delawares and Six Nations, or Iroquois Indians. They did not, however, confine their preaching to the red men, but sent out "pilgrims" to preach to the white settlers scattered throughout the interior of the New England and Middle colonies. These went from farm to farm, from village to village, and town to town in those early days, seeking not to gain members for their church, but simply to convert souls to Christ.

Thus it was that Count Zinzendorf, then become the head of the church, on his visit to the Brethren in America in 1742, when he made an extended tour through Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Maryland personally to inspect the country and its needs and the prospects of missionary work, came also to Lancaster County. He preached first at Lititz, and next day in Lancaster, in the old court-house, where he made such an impression that many people asked him to send them a regular preacher of his denomination. This he promised to do, and immediately after his return to Bethlehem sent the Rev. Jacob Lischy, who during 1743 preached frequently at Lititz and Lancaster. The next year a Lutheran minister of Lancaster was authorized to preach to the Moravians here, as also to those at Lititz. His name was Lawrence Thorstansen Nyberg, who thus faithfully served the Lutherans and Moravians together until 1746. He eventually left his denomination and joined the Moravian Church.

The "Pennsylvania Synod," an attempt of Zinzendorf's to unite all the German-speaking Protestants in the State into an evangelical alliance, but which was soon forsaken by all but the Moravians, held one of its sessions in the old court-house here in November, 1745, when Bishop Spangenberg presided, on which occasion a mob assailed the assembly with showers of stones. Instead of dispersing the rabble, a justice of the peace stood by and seemed to enjoy "the fun." Bishop Spangenberg, nothing daunted, simply arose and offered up so fervent and touching a prayer in behalf of the enemies that it is said the justice of the peace was then and there converted to Christ, and the mob of itself dispersed ashamed and abashed.

This same year the Moravians of Lancaster organized themselves into a congregation, and took measures for building their own house of worship. Instead of building upon the large tract of valuable land which they owned at the corner of Prince Street and Marion Alley, they purchased several lots of the original Hamilton estate, on the south side of Orange Street from Market Street westward. The tract on Prince Street they afterwards converted into their graveyard, which purpose it still serves, though no more interments are made there. In 1746, on the site of their present beautiful church edifice, corner of Orange and Market Streets, they erected a plain stone building for their church and parsonage, part of which also served as their parochial school, taught by the pastor. During the first few years of its existence the congregation seems to have been regularly supplied with ministers from Bethlehem and Lititz, but in 1748 the Rev. Leonard Schnell became its resident pastor. The same year the Rev. Richard Utley also served it.

Although the Moravian Church remained distinctively a missionary or evangelistic church, making no efforts to increase its membership, but devoting all its means and activity to work among the Indians and neglected white settlers, the congregation at Lancaster still grew in numbers and strength. Some of the oldest and most highly-respected citizens with their families joined it, and the social standing of its membership was as high as that of any church in the community. And this is true of it to this day, although in later years not a few of its members left it, chiefly on account of its persisting in continuing its worship and preaching altogether in the German language long after the English had become the dominant tongue in the town as in the church. It was not until the Rev. Charles F. Reichel's pastorate, from 1829 to 1834, that the worship was conducted exclusively in the English language.

MORAVIAN CHURCH.

The old stone church stood until 1820, when it became necessary to enlarge it. This was made the occasion for tearing down the old structure entirely and erecting on its site a new one, the handsome brick edifice that is standing there now. The original cornerstone, a curiously-wrought and quaintly-ornamented block of brown sandstone, was, however, carefully preserved, and is yet to be seen on the southeastern upper corner of the present building, where it was fixed into the wall. The old stone parsonage, however, remained standing, and continued to be used as the pastor's residence, lecture-room for week-day services, and parochial school until 1852, when the present two-story brick parsonage was built on Orange Street, immediately west of the church.

The old stone building is still standing, but the church building was in 1868-69 enlarged so as to join it, and then its lower story was fitted up as a lecture-room and Sunday-school room, while the rest of it continues to be the sexton's residence since 1853. At the same time, when this extension of the church proper was made, its interior was also entirely remodeled. Its large side galleries were removed, new pews put in, the old high box-pulpit replaced by a more modern one, its exterior front was changed, stained glass windows put in, a central ceiling gas-reflector furnished to light it, and a beautiful new organ built for it; this last, a donation from Mr. George K. Reed, is still in use. Still further improvements were made in 1879, when a new carpet was laid, the whole interior was handsomely frescoed, all the pews were upholstered, and the pulpit remodeled after the most approved plan, it having a walnut communion-table in the centre, on the right a handsome lectern, and on the left the pulpit. All this furniture is of solid black walnut, and all placed upon one pulpit platform, raised about two feet above the floor. It is one of the most commodious and beautiful pulpits in the city.

The membership of the congregation is about three hundred and twenty-five communicants. The Sunday-school numbers about two hundred members. In all its departments the church is in a flourishing and prospering condition. Its doctrine, as that of the entire Unitas Fratrum, is simply evangelical and broadly liberal. Its worship is liturgical, dignified, spiritually expressive and beautiful, a main feature of it being its excellent music, which combines congregational singing with the rendition of the classic productions of old and modern masters by an exceptionally good choir.

The following is a list of pastors who have served the church from its organization:

1746, Lawrence Thorstanssen Nyberg; 1748, Leonard Schnell and Richard Utley; 1749, Abraham Reinke; 1751, George Neisser; 1753, Christian Rauch; 1754, Otto Krogstrup; 1755, Christian Bader; 1756, Christian Rusmyer; 1757, Charles G. The Hebrew Congregation of "Shairy Shomain," and the Old-Time Society and Graveyard.

—The Hebrews have a history in Lancaster which is much older than is commonly supposed. That they had a society here prior to 1747 is conclusively shown by the following statement. On the 3d day of February, 1747, the borough of Lancaster conveyed to Isaac Nunus Ricus and Joseph Simons, also of the borough of Lancaster, a half-acre of land in the township of Lancaster "in trust for the Society of Jews settled in and about Lancaster, to have and use the same as a burying-ground." This society, thus shown to have existed in or prior to 1747, is believed by Hebrews in this country to be the third in point of antiquity in the United States, the first having been in Newport, R. I., and the second in New York City. The ground conveyed by Thomas Cookson is a square lot inclosed by white palings, which contains another inclosure fenced also with white palings. The inner inclosure is divided into two parts by a gravel walk. The eastern part is kept undisturbed, and no burials are now made there. It is cared for through the agency of the Philips, Cohn, Gratz, and other families of Philadelphia, Richmond, and New York, whose ancestors are believed to be buried there. It is in this portion of the little burial-place that the old graves are, five slabs marking the resting-places of as many persons who departed this life from four-score years to a century ago. Joseph Simon, one of the trustees to whom this burying-ground was conveyed, and an Indian-trader, who was noted in this region, and now occupies quite a prominent place in its history,<sup>1</sup> lies buried here. There are inscriptions upon his tombstone in English and Hebrew. Of the former the following is a verbatim copy:

"And Joseph gave up the Ghost, and died in a good old age.
An old man, and full of years and was gathered to his people.

"JOSEPH SIMON
Departed this life

the 12th day of the month Shebot, in the year 5565, corresponding with the 24th day of January, 1804, aged 92 years, in a good old age.
"And he walked with God, and he was not; for God took him."

By his side rests

"The Body of Mrs. Rou. Simon, wife to
Mr. Joseph Simon, who departed this life
the 3d day of May, 1796.
in the 69th year of her age."

Near the graves of the old Indian trader and his wife is a low, upright slab inscribed,— <sup>1</sup> An account of Joseph Simon appears elsewhere in this volume.

"Here lieth the remains of Rachel Ettine, wife of Solomon Ettine,
who departed this life
on January 14, 1790."

There is a small slab near by with a Hebrew inscription, and a large one which appears much older than any of the others, and bears an inscription apparently in Hebrew, but indecipherable.

This old burying-ground came into the possession of the present society soon after its organization, was fenced by them, and has since been kept in good condition by their efforts. The society now uses it as a burial-place, having made their first interment there in 1855.

In the year 1853 the Hirsh Brothers came to the city, and soon after measures were taken to gather the Hebrews of Lancaster and vicinity into a congregation. On Feb. 25, 1855, a charter was obtained, incorporating twenty-one persons under the name of "Shairy Shomain." In 1866 a lot was purchased on the corner of Orange and Christian Streets, whereon the present synagogue was erected in that and the following year. It was formally and appropriately consecrated on Sept. 13, 1867. The congregation was served by readers for many years, the following persons officiating in that capacity, viz.: Joseph Eckstein, L. Rosenstein, W. Frankenstein, and at various periods, Jacob Stein, — Weil, William Shuster, A. B. Bloch, and Henry Weile. Mr. Samuel Larki is at present the rabbi of the congregation, the membership of which is twenty-six, the heads of families only being counted.

The Friends or Quakers.—This sect made an early religious beginning in Lancaster, built a house of worship, and for some time maintained a flourishing organization. The existence of the society, however, came to a close many years ago, and its full history is now impossible to obtain. As early as 1725 the Quakers were quite numerous in the county. In 1729 the number of their families was more than one thousand. It is probable that they had religious services of some kind in Lancaster as early as 1735 or 1736. The earliest authentic information relative thereto, however, is in the records of "Sadsbury Quarterly Meeting," under various dates in 1754-55. The first of these references to Lancaster Quakers in the minutes of the meeting held "5, 13, 1754," is as follows:

"Sadsbury monthly meeting acquaints this meeting that the Friends living in and near Lancaster have for some time past, by their allowance, kept meetings for worship on First days in Lancaster, and they do now, on behalf of those Friends, request that this meeting would appoint some Friends to give them a visit and to consider how far they may be capable to hold and keep meeting for worship with reputation. In regard thereto this meeting to appoint Joseph Hoskins, Thomas Goodwin, Caleb Pelce, Abraham Musgrove, Thomas Carlton, Zachariah Paris, James Miller, and Henry Reynolds to visit them, as also to visit those Friends on this side of the Susquehanna, and advise them to come under the immediate care of some monthly meeting, and make report of service therein at our next meeting."

At the next meeting, held "8, 12, 1754," we find that

"The Friends appointed at our last meeting on the affairs of Lancaster and Hempfield are desired to give them their further advice and assistance, and make report thereof in writing at our next meeting."

At the meeting held Nov. 11, 1754, the committee was authorized to continue its endeavors in caring for the Friends in Lancaster, and at their meeting Aug. 11, 1755, the committee reported that "from information and from a conference they had had with those Friends, and having considered their capacity, (we) do unanimously think that if it was allowed them and liberty given to build a meeting-house, it might be kept with reputation," and the Sadsbury Friends, on hearing this report, entered on their minutes the following:

"This meeting, on mature consideration, do allow those Friends in and near Lancaster liberty of building a Meeting-House on the ground proposed and agreed to by the Friends in the Borough of Lancaster, as also liberty of holding and keeping meetings for worship, and that their week-day meeting be kept on the fifth day; which is allowed till further notice."

It would seem that the Lancaster Quakers took some action toward the building of a house before they were authorized to do so by the Sadsbury meeting, as noted in the foregoing minutes. On May 1, 1754, James Hamilton deeded to Peter Worrall, Isaac Whitelock, and Thomas Poultney, "trustees of the Quaker Society in Lancaster borough," two lots of ground on the east side of South Queen Street (where the Odd-Fellows' Hall now is), sixty-four feet front and two hundred and fifty-two feet deep.

Services were held in the meeting-house from the time it was completed until about 1810. From that time until it was sold it was used occasionally as a school-house, and from 1816 to 1822 Rev. John Elliott preached in it. By the 5th of March, 1844, the Society of Friends in Lancaster must have become so weak as to no longer be able to keep up their meetings, for upon that date the Sadsbury meeting appointed a committee to make a sale of the house and report. They effected a sale to Ellis Lewis (reserving the burying-ground) for twelve hundred and fifty dollars. The deed was made out March 24, 1845, and signed by Gainer Moore, Samuel Whitson, Truman Cooper, and Robert Moore, of the committee, and William Brinton and Abraham Gibbons, trustees. One year later Mr. Lewis sold the property to the Odd-Fellows.

The Presbyterian Church of Lancaster.<sup>1</sup>—The Presbyterians in and about Lancaster were members of the Pequea Church, and for the purpose of encouraging them to form an organization, James Hamilton granted to the "Presbyterian Congregation" Lot No. 19, on Orange Street, where the church at present stands. Under the stimulus of this offer, the people organized the church in 1763. Services were held in the old court-house until the completion of the meeting-house. Efforts were soon made to erect a house of worship, and to accomplish this result a lottery was drawn in the year 1766, and on the 21st of February, 1767, we find that an act of Assembly was passed "to enable commissioners to settle accounts of managers and sue for such sums of money as are now due and unpaid on account of the lottery set up and drawn for erecting a house of worship in the borough of Lancaster for the use of the Presbyterian Congregation in and about the said borough."

A house was erected soon after this time, and on the 7th of July, 1770, James Hamilton deeded to the trustees of the church (who were Edward Shippen, Robert Boyd, Esq., William White, Henry Helm, and William Montgomery) Lot No. 19 on Orange

Street and Lot No. 491 on Lime Street. These lots "were for use of the minister of the Presbyterian Church in communion with the Church of Scotland, for a site for a church, school, or almshouse, and for burying-ground for the members aforesaid, and to and for no other use, intent, or purpose whatsoever." In the year 1809 the trustees of the church purchased a half-lot adjoining the church of the executors of Ann Davis.

On the 22d of December, 1810, an act of Legislature was passed, authorizing the trustees of the church to sell a tract of land in Tioga County, Pa.; also a lot of ground in the borough of Lancaster. In accordance with this authority, the trustees of the church, on the 21st of September, 1811, conveyed Lot 491, on Lime Street, to Michael Gundaker, for two hundred and twenty-nine dollars.

In the year 1769 the Rev. John Woodhull was called as their first pastor. By the terms of this call Mr. Woodhull was to preach in Lancaster one-third of his time, the other two-thirds he gave to the Leacock Church. Being without a church building, they held their services in the old court-house in Centre Square, which was destroyed by fire in 1784. Prior to 1769 efforts had been made to erect a building, but for want of funds the work had ceased after the walls were up and the roof on. Mr. Woodhull and one Henry Helm went to Philadelphia and other parts of the country to solicit benefactions, and were so successful that the building was finished in 1770. By leave of Synod the church was placed under the care of the New Castle Presbytery. The names which appear prominently on the record at that time are Judge Yeates, Edward Shippen, Dr. Robert Boyd, Charles Hall, Samuel Boyd, William Montgomery, William Davis, James Davis, John Jacks, William White, and Henry Helm, the two last named acted as elders. Mr. Woodhull continued pastor for ten years, resigning in 1779, and removing to Monmouth, N. J.

During the pastorate of Mr. Woodhull the war of the Revolution occurred, and when a company of militia raised by Capt. Ross was in readiness for the field, they were invited to attend the Presbyterian Church and listen to a sermon to be preached by the Rev. John Carmichael, A.M. On Sunday, the 4th of June, 1775, the company assembled in uniform and listened to a sermon from the text, Luke iii. 14: "And the soldiers likewise demanded of him, saying, And what shall we do? And he said unto them, Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely; and be content with your wages."

The Rev. Nathaniel W. Sample in 1780 received a joint call from the three Presbyterian Churches of Leacock, Lancaster, and Middle Octorara, which he accepted, and was ordained and installed the following year. He continued as pastor for the unusually long period of forty years, dividing his ministrations about equally between the three congregations.

In the latter part of the pastorate of the Rev. Mr.

Sample the church was enlarged and improved. The following notice was inserted in the papers of the time, and gives the facts. It bears date April 20, 1820: "Divine service may be expected in the English Presbyterian meeting-house in this city (the enlargement and alteration of which is now nearly completed) on the first Sabbath in May next at the usual hours." The Revs. Kerr and White assisted the Rev. Mr. Sample in the services. The Presbyterian Synod met with the people of this church on the last Wednesday in October of that year.

The Rev. William Ashmead succeeded Mr. Sample in 1821. In hopes of being benefited by a more genial climate, he resigned his charge here in April, 1829, and was called to the Second Presbyterian Church in Charleston, S. C. He died in Philadelphia in the same year, in the thirty-second year of his age.

The Rev. Richard W. Dickson was called to succeed Mr. Ashmead Aug. 20, 1829. After a diligent ministry of nearly four years, he resigned his charge Oct. 1, 1833. He removed to New York from Lancaster, and died about 1875.

The Rev. J. T. Marshall Davie was the next pastor. Mr. Davie was installed in April, 1834, and continued as pastor for about six years. He left his charge in Lancaster in the spring of 1840, and removed to Middle New York, afterwards located in Brooklyn, where he died in 1859.

Rev. John McNair was called to succeed Mr. Davie, and was installed June 1, 1841. He resigned his charge in the fall of 1851 or the spring of 1852.

The Rev. John Baldwin was called to succeed Mr. McNair. He resigned the charge April 8, 1856.

Rev. Walter Powell succeeded Mr. Baldwin.

The Second Presbyterian Church, being first after its organization ministered to by the Rev. William S. P. Noble, then quite young in the ministry, and afterwards by the Rev. Alfred Nevin, D.D., maintained its separate existence from 1852 till the fall of 1858, commencing with thirty-one members. It increased its membership to about sixty-nine, besides having a large number of outside hearers. The congregation had bought the old Mechanics' Hall, in South Queen Street, and converted it into a church, at an outlay of between six and eight thousand dollars. They were thus laboring harmoniously when their pastor, Mr. Nevin, resigned, and removed to another field. Both churches were comparatively weak and embarrassed for means, which led them to desire a reunion. This, under the judicious administration of Mr. Powell, was easily effected, his people giving a unanimous invitation to the Second Church to return. There was a complete reunion established in the fall of 1858. Mr. Powell continued as pastor of this church until the time of his death, which occurred Jan. 23, 1868.

The Rev. George Robinson was called to succeed Mr. Powell. The ordination and installation of Mr. Robinson took place Aug. 8, 1868. This was his first charge. During his pastorate the Old and New Presbyterian Churches united, and the first united General Assembly, at its session in Philadelphia, May, 1870, determined to raise a memorial fund of $5,000,000 in token of their thankfulness. The united church heartily indorsed this action of the Assembly, and by May, 1871, more than $8,000,000 had been raised, $5,000,000 of which went into the common treasury of the church. The other $3,000,000 was appropriated by individual churches.

The session of Lancaster, by formal action Oct. 7, 1870, determined upon building a memorial chapel. Mr. Robinson entered heartily into the work, and his unremitting labor was rewarded at last in seeing completed the fine and comfortable chapel on South Queen Street. His pastorate continued until the spring of 1874, when he resigned and accepted a call to the Presbyterian Church at Duncannon, Pa. Here he remained until about April, 1877, when he accepted the appointment of post chaplain in the United States army.

The Rev. Henry C. Westwood, D.D., was called to succeed Mr. Robinson June 26, 1874.

He accepted the call soon afterward, and was duly installed by a committee of Westminster Presbytery. This was his first charge in the Presbyterian Church. His ministry prior to this time had been in the Methodist Episcopal Church. His pastorate continued until March, 1876, when he accepted a call to Chambers Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia.

The Rev. James Y. Mitchell, the present pastor, was called to succeed Dr. Westwood May 26, 1876. The call was accepted, and he was installed as pastor October 1st of that year. The church edifice was remodeled and improved in 1877.

The United Brethren in Christ.—A church of this denomination was organized in Lancaster about the middle of the eighteenth century by the founders of the sect, Philip William Otterbein, formerly of the German Reformed denomination, and Martin Boehm, a Mennonite. The origin of the denominational title is said to have been as follows: At a large unsectarian religious meeting, held in Lancaster some time between 1750 and 1760, Otterbein, at the close of a warm discourse, suddenly folded Boehm, who was quite a small man, in his arms, exclaiming, as he did so, "Wir sind Brueder" (we are brethren), and from this time onward the church was called by the name this emotional utterance suggested. Otterbein came to Lancaster and began preaching as a missionary in 1752, and remained two years, after which he was successively in Tulpehocken, Pa., Frederick, Ind., York, Pa., and Baltimore. This noted man was born in Germany, June 4, 1726, and died in Baltimore, Nov. 17, 1813. Of the history of the church in this place but little is known beside the facts that it was organized early enough to be among the first few churches, that it flourished for many years, and that it then passed out of existence. Its organization was retained at least until 1843, for in that year the society bought from John B. Newman a lot on North Prince Street. The society built a church probably subsequent to the above date, and upon another lot on the west side of Mulberry Street, north of West King. This was sold to the Evangelical Association, and by that society to the Dunkers.

Duke Street Methodist Episcopal Church.—Methodism was introduced into Lancaster County rather more than one hundred years ago. In 1781, Strawbridge and Abbot, in pursuance of a purpose long cherished, visited Pennsylvania, and eventually found their way to Soudersburg, in this county, where at the house of Martin Boehm they met a hearty welcome, and arranged for regular preaching services. Out of this movement grew the erection, in 1791, of Boehm's Chapel, the first Methodist house of worship in Lancaster County. Here preached the bishops of the church, and the men whose names are now historic,—Strawbridge, Abbot, Whatcoat, and others. Entrance was with difficulty effected into Lancaster City (then a thriving borough), owing to the strong prejudices against Methodism. The first sermon was preached in 1803 by Henry Boehm (son of the aforesaid Martin), standing on a butcher's block in the old market-house near Penn Square. In the Intelligencer and Advertiser of Lancaster dated July 26, 1803, the following notice appears:

"FRIENDLY MEETING.

"It is hereby agreed upon by the travelling and local preachers of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Lancaster County, that a Friendly Meeting will be held on Aug. 7, 1803, at or near Columbia, where not only the people belonging to said church, but of all denominations, are invited. Said meeting to begin at 10 o'clock A.M."

The results of above meeting cannot have been very encouraging, since for three years no Methodist preacher again visited Lancaster. In 1804, however, the Philadelphia Annual Conference met in its regular session at Soudersburg, on May 28th.

Not until 1807 was a permanent foothold secured in Lancaster. In that year Father Henry Boehm was directed to the house of Philip Benedict, on North Duke, between Orange and Chestnut, north of the residence of S. H. Reynolds, Esq. Here in an upper room, small and dimly lighted, the little band who formed the nucleus of the present churches was organized into a class, and services were held regularly.

The lot for the first meeting-house was purchased on Feb. 12, 1809, and the house was erected the same year. The following extract from the Lancaster Journal, dated Dec. 11, 1809, calls attention to the opening ceremonies:

"The lovers of religious worship are hereby respectfully informed that on Sunday, the 17th inst., the new church built for the Methodist Society in this borough will be opened for divine service. The Rev. Ezekiel Cooper, Rev. Thomas F. Sargent, and Rev. Michael Coote, all from the city of Philadelphia, together with the preachers of the circuit, are expected to be present. Worship to begin at half-past 10 o'clock."

By Rev. J. T. Satchell.

The building stood on a lot extending a little south of the present church, and westward to the alley between Duke and Queen Streets, the front being on Walnut Street. Revs. James Smith and Thomas Burch were the circuit ministers.

In the columns of the Journal for July 28, 1810, notice is given for a camp-meeting, which may have been the first ever held in the county, as follows:

"A CAMP-MEETING will be held on Thursday, the 9th of August next, on Martin Boehm's place, and will continue several days. Strange preachers will attend this solemnity. The Rev. Mr. Asbury, Bishop of the Methodist Society, will preach on Sunday, the 5th of August, in the new meeting-house in Lancaster."

The name of the venerable Asbury suggests another announcement. In the Journal, Aug. 16, 1811:

"On Sunday next, the 18th, the Rev. Francis Asbury, one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, will preach (through Divine permission) in the Methodist Church at Lancaster, at 10 o'clock A.M., and at night."

It may be interesting to note that it was in Lancaster that Bishop Asbury and Henry ("Father") Boehm, then presiding elder, took their final farewell of each other. Towards the close of 1816, at the corner of West King and Charlotte, this sad parting occurred, and Boehm says he looked after the departing loved one with tears in his eyes till his venerable form disappeared in the distance.

In the year 1823, on August 3d, the first Sunday-school attached to the church in Lancaster was organized through the efforts of Father Boehm. From that time the Sunday-school has, without any interruption, continued to exist.

Thus far Lancaster had been the head of a circuit, over which the preachers traveled regularly; but as the congregation grew gradually in numbers, a feeling obtained that the needs of the work demanded that it should be created a station, so on Jan. 13, 1828, we find a meeting is held and a memorial drawn up to the above effect, which should be presented to the bishop. The prayer of the petitioners was granted, and the Rev. Joseph McCool was sent to Lancaster as the first stationed preacher at that place. The wisdom of this step was shown in the fact that within ten years the society began seriously to consider the erection of a new church building. A charter of incorporation was passed by the Legislature and approved by the Governor on March 18, 1840, and after much difficulty as to the selection of a site, the present location on North Duke Street was selected and the work of building begun. The work progressed slowly, so that the church was not completed until September, 1842, at which time the dedicatory services were held, participated in by Rev. Dr. J. P. Durbin and a number of other ministers. The Rev. Solomon Higgins was then pastor. In the year 1849, under the pastorate of Rev. James McCarter, a Sunday-school building was erected on a lot of ground in German Street, and was dedicated on August 25th by Dr. (since Bishop) Peck, then president of Dickinson College. Here the nucleus was formed which eventually grew into St. Paul's Church, on South Queen Street.

The parsonage of the church was erected during the year 1853, and at the present time is still occupied by the preacher in charge.

The year following, 1854, the church was repaired, and the East Mission Sunday-school was opened in East Orange Street public school-house, and after continuing for many years, mainly under the care of James Black, Esq., was transferred in 1871 to a neat mission chapel on East King Street, built for its accommodation. The corner-stone was laid by Father Boehm, who then expressed his great satisfaction at the progress of Methodism in Lancaster since its foundation by himself in 1807.

In the spring of the year 1855 the Philadelphia Conference held its annual session in the Duke Street church, Bishop Janes presiding, and at this conference Rev. D. W. Bartine was appointed preacher by special request of the church.

In 1856 the present building of the St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church was completed, and though long heavily encumbered, has recently been relieved from debt. The year 1864 is memorable as having witnessed the total extinction of the debt which for so many years had been embarrassing the society of the mother-church, and in 1867 the West Mission Chapel on Charlotte Street was purchased, mainly through the instrumentality of the "Young Men's Christian Brotherhood," a society formed by Rev. C. I. Thompson, as the fruits of a gracious revival of religion which occurred under his ministry. To this chapel an addition was erected in the fall of 1879, making it now an attractive and convenient house of worship.

During the years 1873-74 a project for building a new church on the corner of North Duke and Walnut Streets was set on foot, but the preliminary arrangements fell through, and the society contented themselves by repairing and improving the old church building. Subsequent repairs were made during the winter of 1882-83, in anticipation of the meeting of the Annual Conference in Lancaster in the spring of 1883, after an interval of twenty-eight years. The presence of the Conference, presided over by Bishop Thomas Bowman, has done much for our local church, a most favorable impression having been made on the entire community. The session is regarded as one of the most interesting and successful in the history of the Conference.

The following is a list of the ministers who have served the church at Lancaster since its erection into a station in 1828: 1828-29, Joseph McCool; 1830, Thomas Miller; 1831, John Nicholson; 1832-33, John Lednum; 1834-35, Thomas Sovereign; 1836-37, James L. Houston; 1838-39, James Neill; 1840-41, Dallas D. Lore; 1842, Samuel Higgins; 1848-44, Robert Gerry; 1845-46, William Wiggins; 1847-48, William Urie; 1849-50, James McCarter; 1851-52, Pennell Coombe; 1853-54, William Bishop; 1855-56, D. W. Bartine; 1857-58, Francis Hodgson; 1859-60, William Elliott; 1861-62, James Meredith; 1863-64, Goldsmith D. Carrow; 1865-67, Charles I. Thompson; 1868, H. F. Hurn and E. J. Gray; 1869-70, Curtis F. Turner; 1871-73, Joseph E. Smith; 1874-76, Joseph B. Dobbins; 1877-78, J. Richards Boyle; 1879-80, S. H. C. Smith; 1881-82, W. C. Robinson; 1883, J. T. Satchell.

St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church.<sup>1</sup>—In 1849 the Duke Street Methodist Episcopal Church purchased a lot on German Street, and erected a building thereon for Sabbath-school purposes. On August 25th of the same year the building was dedicated by Dr. Peck, then president of Dickinson College, Carlisle, Pa. Regular services were held here under the auspices of the First Church until 1851, when the congregation became a separate organization, with Rev. Jacob Dickerson, who is now their presiding elder, as pastor. At the close of his pastoral term in the spring of 1853 the membership numbered sixty-seven, and fourteen remained on probation. Rev. J. H. Alday was his immediate successor, and remained in charge one year. He closed his pastoral term with eighty full members and sixty-one probationers. In 1854, Rev. George Brindle became pastor. At the expiration of one year, on account of failing health, he took work in the West. But a few years ago he was still preaching in the State of Iowa. At a meeting of the board of trustees, May 16, 1854, Rev. George Brindle was requested to meet the board of trustees of the First Church at its next session and secure the deed to the property on any reasonable terms. At the same meeting a vote of thanks was passed to the trustees and members of the First Church for their sympathy and uniform generosity to the infant society.

Jan. 15, 1855, the trustees authorized and requested the pastor to secure a lot of ground for the further purposes of the church, and placed one hundred dollars at his disposal for that purpose. February 28th, the pastor reported that the lot in view could not be purchased for less than fifteen hundred dollars. At the same meeting it was reported that overtures were being made to purchase the present church edifice by the Mennonites. A committee was appointed to negotiate the sale, provided they would not sell for less than twelve hundred and fifty dollars. This same committee was authorized to purchase the lot at the price specified.

In the spring of 1855, Rev. Henry Killgore, an unordained minister, was sent to supply the charge. He left about the 1st of December of the same year.

June 4th, the trustees met and the committee reported that the church had been sold to the Mennonites for twelve hundred and fifty dollars. Though not specifically stated in the minutes of that meeting, it is evident that the lot on South Queen Street, where the church now stands, had in the mean time been purchased for fifteen hundred dollars. At this meeting of the trustees the committee appointed by the Quarterly Conference to estimate the cost of building the new church reported that they had met and agreed upon a plan, the estimated cost of which was five thousand dollars; that the basement could be finished for four thousand eight hundred dollars. The report was adopted and the new church named Scott Methodist Episcopal Church. Notwithstanding this action of the board the church has never been called by that name. At all subsequent meetings of the trustees the name St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church appears upon the minutes. This is the name by which the church is chartered and known among the people, yet no record is found of an authoritative change of the name then adopted. At this same meeting a committee of three was appointed to secure a suitable place in which the congregation could worship after August 1st, at which time the church would pass into the possession of the purchasers.

August 8th, at a special meeting of the board, the committee reported that although the use of the Lutheran school-room had been kindly tendered, they thought the best plan would be to build a board church, such as would serve their purpose until the church proper was under roof. It was resolved to erect the building as soon as possible, and work was commenced at once and pushed vigorously forward. By about the 1st of September the building was completed, almost all the work being done by the members gratuitously. The plank church, as it was called, was a rude affair, set up on six rather shaky-looking piers, constructed of the commonest kind of lumber, and roofed in with common boards. At a meeting of the board of trustees in October, bills amounting to two hundred and thirty-one dollars and eighty cents for this plank church were introduced. This was probably nearly the entire cost of the building.

The building answered tolerably well during the warm and dry weather. Upon the approach of winter the trustees covered the leaky roof with oil-cloth, and the sisters stuffed rags in the many openings in the floor and walls.

Rev. Henry Bodine succeeded Rev. Killgore as pastor of the plank church in December, 1855, and remained until the following spring. Feb. 26, 1856, at a meeting of the board of trustees, John L. Sampson offered a resolution to the effect that in view of certain untoward circumstances it be deemed inexpedient to build a church as costly as the one contemplated; that all resolutions as to material, form, and size be reconsidered; that the draught of a frame church, Gothic style, forty by seventy, which was drawn by Joshua Jack, be declared to be the contemplated church edifice. These resolutions were adopted, and on March 12th the contract was awarded to McGlin & Hershey for three thousand two hundred dollars. The following April Rev. Christian Walters became pastor. In June the contract for the erection of the frame church was annulled, and the plan for a brick church, drawn by William Hensel, adopted. The contract to build the church for five thousand two hundred dollars was awarded to McGlin & Hershey. Work was at once commenced and pushed vigorously forward. Solicitations for subscriptions were liberally responded to. Among other liberal subscriptions were two of fifty dollars each by the late President Buchanan.

About the 1st of August, 1856, the corner-stone was laid by Rev. Dr. Bartine. The sermon was preached by Rev. J. W. McCaskey, in a large tent erected on the site of the church. By November the building was under roof, and the basement so far completed that the trustees held their meetings in it. Shortly after the contractors threw up their contract, finding it impossible to go on without heavy loss. An equitable settlement was made by the trustees and further work indefinitely postponed, the congregation continuing to worship in the basement. Rev. Walters, after serving the charge for two years, removed in the spring of 1858. His health being impaired he went to Minnesota, where he continued in the work of the ministry. Returning East, he died in Harrisburg about the year 1870. In 1858, Rev. Joseph Smith, an Englishman by birth and a fine scholar, was appointed pastor. A debt of about six thousand dollars was then burdening the society, and strenuous efforts were made to reduce it. During his pastorate about six hundred dollars were raised for this purpose. The Annual Conference in 1859 appointed Rev. Levi B. Hughes as pastor. From the spring of 1860 to that of 1861, Rev. J. L. Heisinger was pastor, during which period the audience-room was finished by William Hensel. About thirteen hundred dollars were raised by subscription to meet the expenses thus incurred. During the winter the church was formally dedicated, Bishop Janes preaching the dedication sermon.

From the spring of 1861 to 1862, Rev. George Heacock was pastor, and from 1862 to 1863, Rev. Thomas Kirkpatrick served the church.

In 1864, Rev. J. F. Crouch was appointed pastor, and remained three years. During his pastorate there were large accessions to the church, while not less than two thousand five hundred dollars of the embarrassing debt was liquidated. Rev. George Hurlock, who succeeded him in the spring of 1867, remained two years. During this period the last of the church debt was canceled.

In 1870, Rev. Edward T. Kenney became pastor, but did not remain the full term of two years. Rev. J. R. Boyle, who was not at that time an ordained minister, supplied the pulpit from his departure until the session of the Conference in the spring of 1871, when Rev. John C. Gregg became pastor, who remained three years. His pastorate was marked by prosperity in things temporal and spiritual. The parsonage on Conestoga Street was purchased for two thousand six hundred dollars. Many were added to the church.

In 1874, Rev. J. R. Calloway followed as pastor, and served the church for two years, during which period one hundred and thirty-two were added to the list of probationers. In 1876 he was succeeded by Rev. John Stringer, who served the church until the spring of 1878, when Rev. T. M. Jackson became pastor, whom the church regretted to lose at the expiration of one year.

In 1879, Rev. J. R. Lindemuth was appointed pastor. Within the period of the two years he served the charge the whole interior of the building was renovated at a cost of two thousand three hundred dollars. In 1881, Rev. Lindemuth was returned to the charge for the third year. About six weeks later he was sent to Asbury Church, Philadelphia, and Rev. A. I. Collom appointed as pastor. He is now serving the church as pastor for the third year, having been returned each time at the request of the congregation. During his pastoral term thus far forty-five have united with the church on probation, and a number by certificate. The church building is valued at from twelve to fifteen thousand dollars, and there are no claims against the property. The parsonage is valued at two thousand dollars, and is mortgaged for sixteen hundred dollars. The membership numbers two hundred and twenty-five.

African Methodist Episcopal Church.—On June 10, 1817, about fifty persons of color assembled at the house of James Clendening, and expressed a desire that the Rev. Daniel Coker and the other circuit preachers of the Methodist denomination should visit the town and preach to them once every two weeks. These people also desired to have a place of worship, and decided to take steps to secure one. With this end in view they chose some of the leading men of the town—Walter Franklin, Robert Coleman, William Kirkpatrick, Charles Smith, William Jenkins, Adam Reigart, and George L. Mayer—to act for them. This committee met on the 23d of June, at Col. Slough's, approved of their plans, and cordially agreed to unite with them in accomplishing their object. They sought the aid of their fellow-citizens, and so effectively enlisted it that by the beginning of the year 1821 the African Bethel meeting-house was completed. It was consecrated February 11th, the Rev. Christian Endress preaching the sermon. This church, on the corner of Strawberry and North Streets, was rebuilt in 1879, at a cost of two thousand three hundred dollars, the frame structure having been destroyed by fire. The congregation, which is under the charge of Rev. William Norris, includes about sixty members in good standing.

Union Church.—About the year 1816, one John Elliot, an Englishman, came to this country as a reform Methodist and settled in Lancaster. He preached in the old Friends' meeting-house for several years. His preaching was satisfactory to Christians of all denominations, and it was decided to erect a church called the Union Church. A lot was purchased on Chestnut Street, between Duke and Queen Streets, and a church erected. The following notice was published in the Lancaster Intelligencer of May 7, 1822:

"The building recently erected in the city by Christians of all denominations will, with Divine permission, be dedicated to the public worship of Almighty God on the second Sabbath of this month (the 12th).

"Services in the English and German language."

In the Intelligencer of March 23, 1824, the following notice was made:

"The subscribers to the Union School-house and Church of all Christian Denominations (more generally known by the name of Mr. Elliot's church) are requested to attend a meeting to be held at the church on Wednesday next, at three o'clock in the afternoon, on business of importance."

About the year 1828, Elder John Winebrenner came to Lancaster County, and preached in the Union Church. Soon after this time the Rev. Mr. Elliot and most of the congregation embraced the views of Elder Winebrenner, and adhered to his faith. Mr. Elliot remained with the church until about 1832. The house later was used by different denominations, and last by the Baptists, who had possession from 1843 to 1847, when that denomination dying out, the property reverted to Thaddeus Stevens and Mr. Leonard, of Philadelphia.

The New Jerusalem Church.<sup>1</sup>—Baron Henry Von Buelow, a German nobleman and a native of Prussia, who in his early years had adopted the military profession, visited America in 1785, and spent some time in the town of Lancaster. He had previously embraced the views and doctrines of Emanuel Swedenborg, and, with a view to the dissemination of those doctrines, had brought with him from Europe a number of works containing them both for sale and for gratuitous distribution.

About the same period William Reichenbach, a native of Saxony and a man of classical attainments, left his native country and also located in Lancaster. Almost immediately after his arrival he was appointed Professor of Mathematics and German Literature in Franklin College. Buelow and Reichenbach became intimate friends, and through the teachings of the former the latter became a receiver of the doctrines of Swedenborg, and avowed them openly. Von Buelow afterwards returned to Europe, but through his efforts before he left Lancaster a small band of "re-cleivers" arose, about the year 1783 or 1790, and from that period down to the present time, with alternately increased and diminished numbers, that band has continued. Both Von Buelow and Reichenbach were fluent and prolific writers, and when the former returned to Europe he left a number of manuscripts in the hands of the latter, one of which, entitled "Agathon," was translated into the English language by Reichenbach, and was subsequently published in book form by Joseph Ehrenfried, in both the German and the English languages, and was well received. (This work has now become very rare, and very few copies are to be found, even in Lancaster.)

Among the first who became receivers of the doctrines of Swedenborg, after Von Buelow and Reichenbach, were Francis Bailey and family, Jacob Carpenter, the intimate friend of Buelow, Frederick Damish, a Saxon music-teacher, and a Mr. Eckstein, all before the close of the eighteenth century, and all residing within the town or county of Lancaster.

After the beginning of the nineteenth century others became receivers, among whom were Joseph Ehrenfried, John Funk, Henry Keffer, the intimate friends of Damish; William Girling, formerly a Methodist minister; John Henry Young, Henry Baer, Henry A. Carpenter and wife, Louis C. Jungerich, Charles Frederic Nauman and wife, Frederic J. Kramph, John Robertson, the intimate friend of Girling, Henry Pinkerton, Sr., Henry Pinkerton, Jr., Christian Fritz and wife, William H. Benade, previously a Moravian minister; Alexander Officer, Lawrence J. Demuth, S. S. Rathvon, Oscar Hoheim, Lawrence Falk, and John H. Metzler, all residents at the time of Lancaster City or County. Of those who became receivers elsewhere and afterwards settled here either permanently or temporarily, were Joseph C. Boardman and Joshua Colebern, teachers in the public schools; David Pancoast and family, Mrs. Ann Kramph, Mrs. Mary Kramph, and William Toelle. In addition to the foregoing, from time to time, were the adult children of some of the above-named members.

The Lancaster New Jerusalem Society was organized on the 14th day of February, 1836, and regularly instituted by Rev. Manning B. Roche, then of Philadelphia, on the 17th of the following April, and, although always small in numbers, and unaided by any one outside of its own organization, it purchased a piece of ground in East Vine Street, Lancaster, and erected a small frame temple in 1837, since which time regular weekly services were held therein down to the time of its partial destruction by fire in November, 1874. Since the latter period church services and Sunday-school have been regularly conducted in an upper room of Long's building, No. 16 North Queen Street, and notwithstanding the society has been depleted through deaths and removals, there is still the usual number present at worship.

Although the society has never been in a financial condition to justify the employment of a resident pastor, it still has had the ordinances of the church administered by an ordained New Church minister from once to four times a year ever since its organization. The society was incorporated by the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and became a body politic in law on the 8th of June, 1841. It had the regular ministrations of Rev. Isaac Worrell from October, 1839, to April, 1840, and of Rev. N. C. Burnham from July, 1866, to October, 1868, who were residents of Lancaster City, in the pursuit of other professional callings, but temporarily supplied the place of regular pastors. Rev. William H. Benade, of Philadelphia, visited the society four times a year, and preached and administered the sacraments from about 1853 to 1859. These services have also been performed at intervals by other ministers of the church, among whom were Richard De Charms, David Powell, Arthur O. Brickman, James P. Stewart, James Reed, Thomas Wilks, Samuel M. Warren, Louis Carrier, J. O. Colburn, Adolphe Bartels, and John R. Bowers. In the absence of a pastor, the services are conducted by the "leader" in worship. During the forty-seven years of the society's existence it has had but three leaders, namely, William Girling for the first two years, Henry Pinkerton, Sr., from 1840 to 1856-57, and S. S. Rathvon from that period down to the present time.

The present officers are Rev. N. C. Burnham, president; J. H. Metzler, secretary; S. S. Rathvon, treasurer and leader.

Baptist Churches.<sup>1</sup>—The first Calvinistic Baptist to visit this county was the Rev. Leonard Fletcher, in 1835. He was stationed in Chester County, and from there visited different parts of the country, preaching occasionally at Churchtown, where for a short time were a few Baptists.

In 1839, Gilbert Hills, a Connecticut Baptist, located in Lancaster, and soon afterwards invited Baptist ministers to visit this city and preach. The first to respond to this invitation was the Rev. Mr. Kingsford, who preached on several occasions in the old Franklin College building, on Lime Street above Orange. During 1839-40, a number of ministers from Chester County, Philadelphia, and elsewhere preached to the little unorganized congregation, first in the Friendship hose-house, on Duke above Chestnut Street, and afterwards in the Mechanics' Hall, in South Queen Street, opposite the Fountain Inn.

Among those who preached were Revs. Messrs. Gillette, Kennard, Babcock, Dodge, Keys, Woolsey, Dean, and Higgins.

In February, 1841, an organization was effected by the Rev. Mr. Higgins with the following constituent members: Gilbert Hill, Harriet, Adolina and Selena Hensel, John and Amelia Eberly, and Catharine Rife.

The little congregation was supplied occasionally by the Messrs. Shadrac, Miller, Burbank, Hendrickson, and others.

In 1848 the Baptists purchased the little frame meeting-house on Chestnut Street, near Duke, which had been successively occupied by the Lancaster Armenian Church, the Second Adventists (or Millerites), and the Winebrennerians (or Church of God). The latter denomination having built a new church at the corner of Orange and Prince Streets, sold the little frame to the Baptists for thirteen hundred dollars. The purchase-money was subscribed by the late Hon. Thaddeus Stevens and Mr. Leonard, of Philadelphia, on condition that the building should be used as a Baptist Church, and the money refunded if the church ceased to exist.

The first stationed pastor of the church was Rev. Mr. Dickinson, a learned and pious man, and a good preacher. He was followed by Rev. Mr. Brettell.

Rev. Leonard Fletcher, a very pious, eloquent, and faithful minister, succeeded him. During his pastorate the church numbered forty members, the greatest number it ever had in Lancaster.

He was followed by the Rev. Henry Essick, an excellent preacher and a good man, who was in turn succeeded by Rev. Jesse Saxton. The church had, however, dwindled in numbers by the removal from Lancaster about this time of several of its members. Mr. Saxton left in 1847, and took charge of the church in Colerain, and he removed thence to Montour County, where he died some ten or twelve years ago.

The Lancaster congregation being too poor to support a pastor, disbanded, selling their church to the United Brethren, and refunding the amount towards the purchase of the church.

Twenty years elapsed after the dissolution of the old church before the organization of the new, and it was not until the summer or fall of 1869 that the few Baptists residing in Lancaster determined to make efforts to establish a new church. They invited Rev. Thomas S. Malcolm, under the auspices of the Pennsylvania State Baptist Association, to preach for them. He preached his first sermon on Sunday, Oct. 17, 1869, in Temperance Hall, to about forty persons. On the following Sunday, Rev. Lemuel Moss, of Philadelphia, preached, and so much interest was manifested on that occasion that it was resolved to hold a meeting on the following Sunday to consider the propriety of at once organizing a church. The meeting was held on October 31st, Rev. Dr. Whitehead and Mr. W. M. Webster, of Philadelphia, being present. It was unanimously agreed that a church ought to be organized. On the 6th of November the Articles of Faith of the Baptist Church were read and adopted; and the brothers and sisters present, thirteen in number, joined hands, and solemnly covenanted together as the First Baptist Church of Lancaster. Having leased Temperance Hall for five years, arrangements were made to supply the congregation with regular preaching. A number of Philadelphia clergymen officiated until the close of 1869, at which time Rev. Isaac Bevan took charge of the church as a temporary supply.

On the afternoon of the 17th of February a council of Baptist ministers and laymen met in Temperance Hall to consider the question of formally recognizing the congregation as a regular Baptist Church. After some interesting devotional exercises a resolution of recognition was unanimously adopted by the council, and at a meeting held the same evening the hand of fellowship was extended to the church by Rev. George Pierce, of Harrisburg, moderator of the council.

One of the most efficient and zealous friends in the furtherance of the organization of the new church was Mr. Wallace M. Webster, of Philadelphia. He visited Lancaster several times in its interest, and presented it with a beautiful silver communion service, a set of church books, and rendered other valuable assistance, which was acknowledged by the church in a complimentary resolution entered on their records.

The Rev. Isaac Bevan served the church for nearly a year, and received a call from Pittston, Luzerne Co., Pa., which he accepted. The church was temporarily supplied by the State Baptist Association till the erection and completion of the new church in 1873, when the Rev. Mr. White was called to be their pastor. He was succeeded by the Revs. Carleton, J. O. Critchlow, Ross Matthews, William Morrison, and — Owen, the last of whom resigned in the spring of 1883, leaving the church at present without a pastor. The church has a membership of eighty. The present church edifice was erected on East Chestnut Street in 1873.

Mount Olivet Baptist Church.—On the 18th of May, 1879, this church was organized with thirty members in Temperance Hall. The Rev. Ross Matthews was called to the pastorate. He continued in charge sixteen months and resigned. He was succeeded by the Rev. Michael Frayne, who is the present incumbent. Services are now held in the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association. The membership is thirty-eight.

The Church of God.<sup>1</sup>—From the early records we learn that about the year A.D. 1816, a church was established in Lancaster City, Pa., by Rev. John Elliott, under whose pastoral care it continued to remain until 1833. It does not appear that the congregation was connected with any particular denomination of Christians for some time; as its pastor seemed also to stand free of any until about the year 1828, perhaps, when he became connected with the labors of Elder John Winebrenner. He met with the first six ministers in Harrisburg, Pa., who assembled to organize the East Pennsylvania Eldership of the Church of God in October, 1830. The next yearly meeting of the Eldership was held in Lancaster in 1831. Mr. Elliott met also with the next annual convocation in Singletown in 1832, where a difference of views on his part gave dissatisfaction and resulted in his separation from the Eldership. It is presumable that during the five years prior to 1832, the ministers of the Eldership visited the Lancaster Church organization occasionally, and that a union existed in an informal manner; but it appears that after Mr. Elliott's disseveration from the Eldership no further intercourse was had between the church and the Eldership for some years.

After Mr. Elliott's resignation from the church and departure from Lancaster, the church, which had up to 1832 worshiped in the old white meeting-house on Chestnut Street, opposite the Pennsylvania Railroad passenger depot, and up to 1841 was supplied with preachers from other denominations as follows: Revs. William Brown and Ezekiel Boring, of the United Brethren in Christ; Rev. Crawl, of the Reformed Methodists; and Revs. Smith, Fletcher, and others, of the Baptist Church.

On the 22d of January, 1841, Elders John Winebrenner, Jacob Flake, and Joseph Ross commenced a series of meetings which were continued every evening, and sometimes in the day, for upward of four months. During this time about one hundred and twenty persons, besides a number of young boys, were converted, and the former members were much revived and encouraged. The church held a camp-meeting that summer near Lancaster, where a number more persons were converted and added to the membership.

The congregation having by this time become much increased and strengthened, it was deemed necessary now to reorganize it, and in doing so it assumed the name Church of God, and agreed to be one of the congregations of the denomination known as the "Church of God in North America;" and it was also determined to build a new and larger house of worship. The lot of ground, corner of Prince and Orange Streets, where the Union Bethel now stands, was purchased for fifteen hundred dollars, and the members and citizens subscribing liberally, the corner-stone of the new house was laid by Elders J. Flake and J. Winebrenner, on the 12th of August, 1841. The building is sixty feet in length and forty-five feet in width, with a vestibule and Sunday-school and lecture-room in the lower story, and an audience-room with gallery on two sides and the front end, and a baptistery under the pulpit in the second story, with a capacity of seating eight hundred persons. The house and ground cost seven thousand dollars. The building committee consisted of Emanuel Shaeffer, John S. Gable, David Cockley, Michael Erisman, John Black, and Jacob N. Miller.

On Sunday, March 20, 1842, the new structure, being finished, was dedicated. In the morning at nine o'clock a prayer-meeting was held in the old meeting-house, at the close of which the congregation formed in order and walked in procession to the new house, the preachers leading the way. Elder J.

Winebrenner preached the dedicatory sermon from the text (1 Kings, 8th chapter, and part of the 63d verse): "So the King and the children of Israel dedicated the house of the Lord." In the afternoon Elder J. Flake preached from Heb. xii. 22-24. In the evening Elder J. Ross preached from Luke xiv. 22.

When the reorganization was effected, Elders J. Winebrenner and J. Flake were chosen as joint pastors for one year, the latter having been pastor from the time of the protracted meeting. None of the records at the writer's command state who were the ruling elders and the deacons prior to the reorganization, nor those who were chosen at the reorganization, but from what we can judge, Brethren J. S. Gable and Em. Shaeffer were chosen to the office of elder, which they retained till their death by re-election every year.

Among the preachers who assisted at the revivals enjoyed by the church in the earlier days of its organization are found the names of Elders John Winebrenner, Jacob Flake, Joseph Ross, E. H. Thomas, Jacob Keller, William McFadden, David Maxwell, James Mackey, William Miller, and Israel Brady.

The ministers who served the church as pastors from the time of reorganization, as far as they can be gathered, were Elders John Winebrenner, Jacob Flake, William Mooney, Josiah Hurley, Abraham Swartz, Henry L. Soule, John T. Owens, Edward H. Thomas, C. H. Forney, Colton Price, John Hunter, Jesse Haisleigh, George W. Seilhamer, and D. A. L. Lavery, some serving one, some two, and others three years, while several served four and five years, being sent back for a second term, among whom is Elder J. W. Seilhamer, who is the pastor for the fifth year at the present time.

The salary received by the preachers in charge of this church for a number of years past has been six hundred dollars, a free parsonage, and other income, which amounts to about one thousand dollars a year. The number of members in 1883 is two hundred and forty-five. The value of the church property is twenty-two thousand dollars. The church has a prosperous Sunday-school, under the superintendence of Mr. S. I. Owens. Among its membership at this time are four local preachers, Elders J. F. Weishampel, John Swenk, John B. Tucker, and William H. H. Criswell. The church council (consisting of the pastor, ruling elders, and the deacons) consists at this time of Elder J. W. Seilhamer, Edwin H. Shaeffer, Henry B. Springer, Abraham Long, and John H. Abraham, ruling elders, and George M. Long, Henry Shindel, Alfred Seiber, John Lollar, William Brady, Jacob Hoover, John Millysook, and N. Sell, deacons.

in the city of Lancaster from the year 1846. The first minister was Rev. W. L. Reber, who in that year was sent by the East Pennsylvania Conference as a missionary to that field. He opened his labors in the building opposite the Odd-Fellows' Hall in South Queen Street, at one time occupied by the Home for Friendless Children, and at the present time by St. Mary's Academy. He succeeded the first year in gathering a membership of about twenty-five in number. The services were conducted exclusively in the German language. He was succeeded next year (1847) by Rev. John Eckert, who held services on the first floor of the Odd-Fellows' Hall. This locality was also used next year (1848) by his successor, Rev. Frederick Danner. By this time it became apparent that in order to succeed in establishing a permanent church organization a building especially dedicated to public worship was necessary. Steps were accordingly taken to secure this object, and the ground on the west side of North Water Street, between Orange and Chestnut Streets, was secured and the present Salem's Church of the Evangelical Association was built during the year 1849. Rev. Daniel Berger was the pastor in charge that year. He was succeeded by Rev. W. L. Reber, the founder of the church organization, who labored for two years (1850 to 1851), when Rev. R. Deischer was sent here as pastor, who also remained two years (from 1852 to 1854). It was during his ministry that a great portion of the church debt was paid off. By this time the membership had gradually increased, the exact number varying from year to year from sixty to seventy-five. The next minister was Rev. D. Berger, who served two years (1854 to 1856). After him came Rev. Michael Sindlinger, who remained only one year (1856 to 1857). In the spring of 1857, Rev. James O. Lehr was sent to this station as preacher, which position he occupied for two years (1857 to 1859). We now approach the time when a considerable increase of membership took place. This occurred under the ministry of Rev. George Marquart, who labored here from 1859 to 1861. The number was fully doubled, but, as is usual, many of them did not prove steadfast in their profession. In February, 1859, the East Pennsylvania Conference held its session in this church; Bishop Long presided. Since that time the church has been served by the following ministers: F. P. Lehr, 1861-63; W. L. Reber, 1863-64; Ephraim Ely, 1864-66; Daniel Yingst, 1866-68; John Kohl, 1868-70; Jacob Adams, 1870-73; Abraham Schultz, 1873-76; R. H. Yost, 1876-78; Jacob Adams, 1878-80; Jacob Zaun, 1880-83; E. Butz, 1883.

On account of an English mission of the Evangelical Association having been established in Mulberry Street, Lancaster, in the year 18—, which divided the membership to some extent, and from other causes, there has been no increase of membership of late years in the German church.

The society owns not only a substantial brick church in Water Street, but also a comfortable parsonage in West Orange Street, both of which are free from debt.

St. John's Protestant Episcopal Church.<sup>1</sup>—The church edifice, parsonage, and grounds, on the north-west corner of Chestnut and Mulberry Streets, Lancaster, constitute one of the most valuable church properties in the city. The style of architecture is Gothic, the original edifice, consisting of lecture-room and vestry on ground-floor, and nave and chancel on main floor, having been built in 1853, after plans by the late John E. Carver, of Philadelphia, and the extension built this year (1883), from plans by Edwin F. Durang, of the same city. This extension includes two additional rooms on ground-floor for Bible classes, and a vestry and robing-room and organ-loft on second floor, the old vestry-room being now used for the infant school, which was formerly held in the nave. The lecture-room, also used by the Sunday-school, is one of the most pleasant and convenient for that purpose, as well as for the week-day evening services, which are also held there.

The existence of St. John's Church is mainly due to the energy and watchful care of the late Bishop Bowman, its first rector. To establish a church in which the seats should be free to all who desired to avail themselves of the privileges of God's house had been with him a cherished object for many years. Two incidents falling within his personal observation deepened his convictions in favor of free churches. Remaining over Sunday while on a visit to the city of New York, he was ordered by the "owner" to leave a pew in an Episcopal Church in which, as a stranger, he had taken a seat. A similar circumstance subsequently took place in his own church, St. James', Lancaster. These, together with the conviction that there should be no distinctions of wealth or caste in the house of God, led Dr. Bowman, early in 1852, to give practical shape to plans for building the pioneer free church of the diocese. He fixed his mind on the lot on the corner of Chestnut and Mulberry Streets as a desirable location for the proposed new church. There being neither church nor Sunday-school then in that section of the city, the chosen field was purely missionary ground. A Sunday-school was organized in one of the public school buildings on Chestnut Street, in which the late Mrs. Martha Ehler (then Miss Calder) was the first teacher, and who continued an efficient laborer in the parish work for several years. But among the many devout and earnest women who co-operated with their pastor, the late Miss Mary Bowman, his sister (who will ever be gratefully remembered in this community as the founder of the Children's Home), was the most zealous and efficient. She went from house to house to urge parents to send their children to the Sunday-school; and though often discouraged and sometimes rudely repulsed, she persevered, and a promising Sunday-school was organized long before the new building was ready for its accommodation.

The next important step in the new enterprise was thus recorded by Dr. Bowman in the parish register, where he entered a brief sketch of the inception and progress of the work from the purchase of the ground until the consecration of the church edifice:

"In the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and fifty-two, in the month of November, arrangements were entered into by the rector of St. James' Church, Lancaster, for the purchase (at the price of $900) of the lot of ground at the northwest corner of Mulberry and Chestnut Streets, in said city. The design of this purchase was to erect thereon a church whose seats should be, and (if possible) continue forever, FREE. An application was then made by the rector of St. James' to his parishioners and others for means to carry the scheme into effect."

On the 5th of December, Dr. Bowman preached a discourse to the congregation of St. James' in behalf of the new enterprise. A subscription-book was then opened, when he headed the list with a contribution of one thousand dollars, which he subsequently increased when the final effort was successfully made to free the church from debt. Work was commenced on the foundations in the month of March, and on the 17th of April, 1853, the corner-stone was laid by Bishop Alonzo Potter.

The first formal meeting of which we have any record of those interested in founding the new church was held on the 5th of May, 1853, at which the form of charter still governing the corporation was agreed upon. The persons present at this meeting were those whose names are attached to the charter. Henry Wright, Isaac Diller, Robert Clarkson, Henry P. Carson, William Diller, William Wilson, Sr., and Henry E. Slaymaker were chosen vestrymen. The vestry organized by electing Rev. Samuel Bowman, D.D., rector (who appointed Henry Wright senior or rector's warden), Isaac Diller junior or vestry's warden, Henry E. Slaymaker secretary, and Robert Clarkson treasurer. On the 24th of May, 1853, the contract for the erection of the building was awarded to the late O. C. M. Caines. The building committee who had charge of the work were Isaac Diller, Edward Morton, and Henry E. Slaymaker. The entire cost of the church when completed, including the ground, was fifteen thousand dollars.

On the 12th of April, 1854, Rev. Henry A. Coit, deacon, was elected assistant minister, and "the church was so far completed that on the afternoon of Easter-day, April 16, 1854 (one year from the laying of the corner-stone), the first service was held in the lecture-room by the rector, and, with the assistance of Mr. Coit, continued to be held until the completion of the building."

As to the character and some of the details of the interesting work in which St. John's had engaged at this early stage in its history, and the aims and views of its founder, we quote the cotemporary record made by Dr. Bowman himself. In his admirable communication in favor of popularizing the services of our church, printed in the "Memorial Papers," edited by the late Bishop Potter, he wrote, under date of June 19, 1854, as follows:

"In all our large towns and cities we should have free churches; not for the poor, but where rich and poor shall meet together on a footing of substantial equality, at least so far as the worship of God is concerned. . . . I will briefly mention what we are doing at the new church, and then release you. There is the Sunday-school, with above one hundred children, twenty or thirty of them German, speaking no English,—Romanists and Protestants. But we have teachers who speak German. Then, through the week, Mr. Coit has his school, of about forty boys, in the basement of the church. On Wednesday evening we have an excellent teacher of sacred music, whose instructions all are free to attend. On every other evening of the week, except Sunday, in the same place, a class of adults come to be taught to read and write. This week, on Saturday, the girls of the neighborhood are to be assembled to be taught the use of the needle; of course, we shall take the opportunity to teach them something else. I am about to attempt what may be called Cottage Lectures,—i.e., to go of an evening to the houses of those poor people where three, four, or six of the neighbors may be called in, and have some little, but edifying, service among those who have but seldom been seen in the house of God. Out of these small beginnings something valuable may come. It is truly a day of small things with us yet. If we succeed in our work, it will be, under God, more owing to the zealous efforts of devout women than to almost any other single cause."

The church was consecrated on the 24th of September, 1854, the Right Rev. Alonzo Potter, D.D., officiating, assisted by Rev. Dr. Bowman and Rev. Messrs. Passmore and Coit. There remained a debt of two thousand dollars on the property, but this was personally assumed by the rector and vestry before the consecration.

Mr. Coit resigned Nov. 17, 1854, and Rev. J. C. Eccleston, M.D., was elected assistant minister Dec. 14, 1854. Owing to failing health, he requested and was granted leave of absence for nine months (March 30, 1855), and shortly after sailed for Europe.

On the 20th of July, Rev. Horatio N. Powers was elected as a supply until the return of Dr. Eccleston; but the latter having sent in his resignation on his return from Europe, Mr. Powers was elected assistant minister Dec. 19, 1855.

During this time Dr. Bowman had been giving his services as rector to the new parish as a labor of love, the salary (then about six hundred dollars) being all paid to his assistant minister. On the 25th of February, 1857, he tendered his resignation, to take effect the following Easter, for the reason that the cornerstone had been laid and the first service held on that day.

On the 17th of March, 1857, Mr. Powers also tendered his resignation, to take effect on the day indicated by Dr. Bowman for severing his own connection with the parish, in consequence of which the latter, at the urgent solicitation of the vestry, suspended his resignation for the time being. He also made the parochial report to the Convention of that year, in which he said, "Since Mr. Powers' resignation the duties of the parish have devolved upon me. I hope, by God's blessing, very soon to see the vacancy happily filled. Every year's experience seems to strengthen my confidence in the free principle on which this church is established. The parish is out of debt and the salary promptly paid."

Rev. Edward W. Appleton was elected assistant minister June 2, 1857, and entered upon his parish duties on the 1st of July. Rev. Theodore A. Hopkins was elected rector June 25th, when the resignation of Dr. Bowman, which had been laid over, was finally accepted, to take effect on the 1st of September following, at which time Mr. Hopkins entered upon his duties as rector, and also as principal of the Yeates Institute, then recently endowed by Miss Yeates.

Mr. Appleton having been ordained a presbyter, Mr. Hopkins resigned on the 24th of April, 1859, and Mr. Appleton was elected rector. In the mean time, Dr. Bowman, although no longer officially connected with the parish, and having been elected to the more responsible duties of the episcopate, still actively interested himself in the prosperity of the Free Church. At a meeting of the vestry, held July 6, 1858, a communication was read from him urging upon them the importance of building a parsonage; and with that liberality for which he was ever distinguished, he proposed that, if the vestry would at once undertake the work, he would pay one-tenth of the entire cost. This proposition was accepted, and the present parsonage was built at a cost of three thousand five hundred dollars, Henry P. Carson, George J. Diller, and Henry E. Slaymaker being the building committee.

Owing to failing health, Mr. Appleton tendered his resignation on the 24th of May, 1861, to take effect on the ensuing 1st of July; and on the 31st of July, 1861, the vestry, upon the recommendation of Bishop Bowman, extended a call to Rev. Francis D. Hoskins, which was accepted, and he took charge of the parish on the 22d of August following. During the vacancy Rev. Dr. Mombert, rector of St. James', at the request of the vestry, supplied the pulpit at evening service. On Sunday evening, July 28th, Bishop Bowman preached in St. John's, what proved to be a memorable discourse, being the last he ever delivered.

During Mr. Hoskins' pastorate the debt remaining upon the parsonage was paid, and various improvements made, including new seats in the lecture-room, an iron fence around the yard, and new iron sash in the side windows of the church.

Mr. Hoskins resigned on the 7th of March, 1864, to take effect on the last Sunday in April, and on the 23d of the same month the vestry extended a call to the Rev. Thomas B. Barker, then assistant minister at Grace Church, Philadelphia, which he accepted, and took charge of the parish June 12, 1864. In 1871 the church property was thoroughly renovated and various improvements made under the direction of a committee consisting of J. M. W. Geist, Isaac Diller, and William O. Marshall, at a cost of over four thousand dollars, all of which was paid for when completed with contributions and collections made by the committee.

After going in and out among the people of St. John's with great acceptability for seventeen years, a period covering considerably more than half the history of the parish, Mr. Barker resigned on the 5th of April, 1881, to take effect on the following Easter Monday, and on the 21st of June the vestry extended a call to Rev. Charles N. Spalding, of Wheeling, W. Va., who is the present incumbent.

In his report to the Diocesan Convention in 1864, Mr. Hoskins thus referred to a serious want in the church:

"The Bible-class for young men, organized the year before to fill a great want in the church, had been reluctantly discontinued for want of a suitable room for its accommodation. This is still the only serious defect in the church property. The Young Ladies' Bible-class has for years proved an unfailing source of supply of teachers to the Sunday-school and of members to the church; but for want of a similar instrumentality the young men wander off when too large for the Sunday-school class, and are thus often lost to the parish, which has otherwise the strongest claims upon them."

This led the secretary of the vestry, Mr. Geist, a few years later, to prepare a plan to supply this want. It contemplated the erection of a wing on the north side of the chancel, corresponding with it in size and architectural harmony, and extending westward fifteen feet on the north side of the church, which would serve the purposes of vestry- and class-rooms, library-room, and organ-gallery. Owing to the financial crisis of 1873, the project was temporarily abandoned for want of means; but the late Jasper Yeates Cunningham having in the mean time left a legacy to the church, which added to a sum he had given in trust during his lifetime, and supplemented with subscriptions by members and friends of the church, justified the vestry in undertaking the work, and on the 28th of October, 1882, a building committee, consisting of J. M. W. Geist, John I. Hartman, and James A. Miller was appointed. Plans submitted by Mr. Edwin F. Durang were adopted, which located the annex on the south instead of the north side, as originally proposed. The work was delayed after the foundations were laid by a dispute with the city authorities about the street line, which was decided in favor of the committee; but now the improvements are all completed, including painting of the interior and exterior, and thorough repairs to the old edifice.

Of the eight pastors who have officiated at St. John's, four of them—namely, Messrs. Coit, Powers, Appleton, and Hoskins—married Lancaster ladies.—Mr. Coit to Miss Wheeler, a teacher in St. James' Parish-School; Mr. Powers, to Miss —, a niece of Mr. McElrath, of the New York Tribune, and a protégé of Dr. Bowman: Mr. Appleton to Miss Sarah, daughter of the late George Louis Mayer; and Mr. Hoskins to Miss Mary, daughter of Hon. Thomas E. Franklin.

The present organization of the parish consists of Rev. Charles N. Spalding, rector and chairman ex officio of the vestry; Thomas E. Franklin and J. M. W. Geist, wardens; William O. Marshall, treasurer and leader of the choir; John I. Hartman, Isaac Diller, and William F. Himble, finance committee; William O. Marshall and James A. Miller, committee on music; and John Ferrier, sexton.

The first vestry consisted of Henry Wright, Isaac Diller, Robert Clarkson,*<sup>1</sup> Henry P. Carson, William Diller,* William Wilson,* and Henry E. Slaymaker. During the intervening thirty years the following persons also served as vestrymen for longer or shorter periods: A. H. Chase,* Theophilus Fenn,* Henry L. Zahm, Peter Wager, Jr., Peter E. Lightner,* George J. Diller,* John F. Heinitsh,* James L. Youngman,* James Marshall, A. T. Fahnstock,* and James G. Thackara. H. E. Slaymaker, the first secretary, served until April, 1856, when he was succeeded by Mr. Geist. Robert Clarkson, treasurer, was succeeded by George J. Diller in 1860, serving until April 6, 1880, when he resigned and W. O. Marshall was elected. Henry P. Carson, one of the charter members, served as vestryman and warden until 1882, when he declined on account of the infirmities of age.

The Second Church of the Evangelical Association dates its origin from the year 1867. Before that time there was no church of that denomination in this city in which divine service was held in the English language. The authorities of the denomination recognized the existing want, and in said year sent Rev. J. N. Metzger as a missionary into this field of labor.

For want of a better place he held divine services in his dwelling-house on West King Street. This continued for about six months, when the one-story frame church, situated on the west side of Mulberry Street, a little north of West King, was purchased. This church was used by him and his successor from that time until the year 1875, when it was sold to the German Baptist Brethren or Dunkers, by whom it is still used for divine worship.

A new brick church, situated also on the west side of Mulberry Street between Orange and Chestnut, was erected in the summer and fall of 1872, during the pastorate of Rev. F. P. Lehr, who was Mr. Metzger's successor, and was well known in the city of Lancaster, having previously served the parent church in Water Street as its pastor. He was succeeded by Rev. B. D. Albright during the years 1874 and 1875. The following year (1876), Dr. Frederick Kreeker was sent by the Conference as pastor of this charge. Dr. Kreeker was the son of a minister of the gospel, and was an educated physician. He was still a young man, and had but recently joined the Conference. He had been only about six months on this field of labor when he was called as a missionary to Japan. He and his wife and young family left Oct. 1, 1876, and arrived at Yokohama November 13th of the same year, and proceeded to establish a Christian mission at Tokic, Japan, where he patiently and successfully labored in his calling until April 26, 1883, when he died, while engaged in his philanthropic labors.

Since that period the following ministers have served this charge, to wit: 1876, A. Markley; 1877-79, O. L. Saylor; 1880, J. A. Fegar; 1881-82, J. C. Krause; 1883, L. N. Warman.

The numerical strength of the church approaches one hundred. A prosperous Sunday-school is maintained.

Salem Church of God.—This church was organized in Roberts' Hall on the 8th of June, 1875, with forty-nine members. Services were held there for about a month, and then in the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association, which were rented for the purpose and occupied for about a year. Temperance Hall was then the place of worship for two years. In 1877 the present church, on the corner of Orange and Concord Streets, was built, and dedicated November 17th. The Rev. J. B. Soule, who was with the society at its organization, was chosen pastor, and remained five years. He was succeeded by Rev. J. Ridley, who served only six months. There was then a period of supply preaching, but in September, 1882, the church again received a pastor in the person of Rev. Henry Zeigenfuss, who still maintains that relation. The church at present has a membership of about one hundred.

St. Luke's Reformed Church.—St. Luke's is the Fifth Reformed Church of Lancaster. It was organized as a mission Sunday-school Nov. 15, 1874, and as a church Jan. 12, 1879. Its history as a mission Sunday-school begins in the "Society of Inquiry" of the "Eastern Theological Seminary," located in this city. This society is composed entirely of students. Shortly after the removal of the theological seminary from Mercersburg, Pa., to this city, the students, being imbued with the missionary spirit, considered the expediency of making an effort to establish a mission Sunday-school in Lancaster, voting unanimously in the affirmative, and then referred the matter, through a committee, to the faculty for their judgment. The faculty gave the movement and object their hearty indorsement. The society accordingly, through its committee, endeavored to secure the organization of such a school, with the co-operation of the First Church.

Reports of progress were made from time to time, but at the end of two years all efforts seemed to have failed, and a majority of the committee reported that they were unable to do anything looking towards the organization of a mission, and recommended that the object be abandoned. A few of the members were unwilling to adopt the recommendation, and appealed to the society to ask authority from the consistory of St. Stephen's (College) Church to organize a mission school. This appeal was heeded, and the action proposed taken. Two or three weeks later the committee of the society was constituted as follows: William F. Lichliter, John C. Bowman, and Z. A. Yearick, all being members of the Middle Class. They presented the matter to the consistory of St. Stephen's Church, and were authorized to go forward with the work, under such plan as the society might adopt, with the advice and co-operation of the consistory.

In the fall of 1874 the committee went actively to work, selecting the southwestern section of the city as the best locality, securing the use of the middle public-school-house, on South Mulberry Street, and reported these facts to the society, and requested the appointment of an auxiliary committee to aid them in canvassing the district. The district was canvassed, and on Nov. 14, 1874, the committee reported to the society that on the following day, Sunday, at 2 P.M., they would open and organize a mission Sunday-school. At the hour stated the school was opened with an attendance of forty-two scholars. By invitation of the committee, Misses S. H., Annie C., and Georgie Bundell, Alice Nevin, Lottie Appel, and Grace Gerhart became teachers, and much of the prosperity of the school was due to the faithful and efficient labors of these ladies. On the following Sunday a constitution was adopted and the following officers elected: Superintendent, William F. Lichliter; Assistant Superintendent, G. D. Gurley; Secretary and Librarian, Z. A. Yearick; Treasurer, George W. Roth. By May 1st the mission had increased from forty-two to seventy-five scholars.

In January, 1878, it was felt that to secure the fruits of their labors there ought to be an organized church with regular services. The committee originally having the establishment of a mission in charge, in their first report, called the attention of the consistory of St. Stephen's Church to the need of an organized church and a chapel to secure the best results. Now this need had become more fully apparent. The teachers overtured the consistory in relation to it, and the consistory recommended that Rev. Jacob F. Wiant, who had just finished an agency for the board of publication, and who was residing in the city unemployed, be elected superintendent of the school, and that a canvass be made to ascertain the number willing to enter an organization. Rev. Wiant took charge of the work in March, and soon after began to hold regular services in the old Humane hose-house, on Manor Street. But this place was soon found unsuitable, and the services were then held in the public school building where the Sunday-school met. In June a meeting of representatives of the several churches was held, at which they expressed "their approval of the mission," and "commended it to the sympathy and support of the members" of the Reformed Church, and at the annual meeting of Lancaster Classis held the week following, St. Stephen's Church asked permission to organize a new church in the western part of Lancaster. The request was granted. At a meeting of representatives of the English Reformed Churches, held in November, 1878, the judgment was expressed that "the mission ought to be carried forward, and asking the board of missions for an appropriation towards the pastor's support." The board voted three hundred dollars on condition that the city churches raise a like amount.

On Jan. 12, 1879, an organization was duly effected. The elders elected were Jacob Bomberger and J. Rudolph Suter, and the deacons, J. Frederick Suter and Benjamin F. Bausman. Besides these there were three other persons who entered into the organization, and the pastor's wife. In April steps were taken to erect a chapel. A meeting of representatives of the several churches was held to provide for this object. Rev. E. V. Gerhart, D.D., Rev. Jacob F. Wiant, John H. Pearsol, Hiram Stamm, and B. F. Bausman were appointed to determine the preliminary steps and appoint an executive committee. They appointed Christian Gast, Rev. I. F. Wiant, Edward I. Zahm, Rev. I. H. Dubbs, D.D., and B. F. Bausman this committee. Dr. Dubbs was chosen chairman, and B. F. Bausman, secretary. This was also the building committee. Rev. Wiant and Mr. Bausman were energetic and persevering in collecting the necessary funds, and much of the success of the undertaking was due to them. They were aided by members of the church and others, the members of the church giving not only of their means as they were able, but also of their labor to help in the erection of the chapel. The lot, forty by eighty feet, was a gift from Mr. John C. Hager, and is located on Marietta Avenue, near West Orange Street. On Oct. 26, 1879, the corner-stone was laid, the sermon being preached in St. Paul's Church, and on Feb. 6, 1880, the chapel was consecrated. In March, Rev. Wiant having received a call to the pastorate of the Beaver charge, Clarion Classis, constrained by a sense of duty, tendered his resignation, and on the 1st of April his labors closed. At this time there was an enrolled membership of thirty-five, and a Sunday-school of one hundred and twenty-five scholars. These were all strongly attached to their pastor; and it was with sincere regret that they received his resignation. The church being without a pastor, turned to Rev. William F. Lichliter, the first superintendent of the Sunday-school, and gave him a unanimous call, and he entered upon the discharge of the duties of the pastorate May 30, 1880. Since its organization the church has had seventy-eight members enrolled, and after deducting deaths, removals and dismissions, and erasure of name, fifty-nine are still regular communicants. The Sunday-school numbers two hundred and twenty-five scholars. The value of the church property is three thousand dollars, and is entirely free from debt. The mission is vigorous and prosperous.

The Mennonites and Dunkers.—Both of these sects have meeting-houses in the city, but for several reasons, chief among which is the fact that the units of their organization are larger and broader than those of other denominations, exceeding the limits of city and township, they are treated of in the general chapters of this work rather than this, which is intended to include only the strictly local religious history.

Home for Friendless Children.—In the year 1859 the idea was conceived by Miss Mary Bowman of founding an institution in which poor and uncared-for children of the city should have a home. The plan was carried into effect in a small way, and during a period of six months something was accomplished in the way of bettering the condition of neglected children, but it was not as much as the originator of the project and others who came to her aid desired. A number of ladies who became interested in the work determined, in 1860, to extend their charities to the children of the county, and in order to make it a lasting institution, applied to the Legislature for a charter, which was granted March 29, 1860. The incorporators were Dr. F. A. Muhlenberg, Dr. P. Cassidy, James Black, Horace Rathvon, G. Taylor Lane, C. Widmyer, John Deaner, James H. Barnes, Henry Wentz, John Bomberger, Rudolph F. Rauch, Dr. John L. Atlee, Charles M. Howell, James Evans, H. E. Slaymaker, Jacob Griel, Samuel W. Taylor, Thomas E. Franklin, W. B. Fordney, Hiram B. Swarr, Benjamin F. Shenk, Daniel Heitshu, John Ditlow, Christiani Shenk, I. E. Hiester, G. M. Kline, A. Herr Smith, George Calder, Jr., John A. Hiestand, Reuben Baer, S. S. Rathvon, W. Carpenter, John Wise, Albert Sanderson, William Diller, John D. Skiles, John Lippencott, W. L. Peiper, John R. Russel, Lewis Hurford, John Erben, Nathaniel Ellmaker, Bartram A. Shaeffer, J. F. Steinman, Michael Carpenter, Godfried Zahm, Dr. Eli Parry, Peter McConomy, John W. Jackson, S. A. Wyllie, John R. Bitner, Jacob M. Long, Dr. John Miller, John Trissler, Henry Scherff, George Spurrier, John Rankin, Dr. Henry E. Muhlenberg, Dr. John Longenecker, Anthony E. Roberts, Watson H. Miller, John Michael, David Reese, Michael McGrann, William Miller, Frederick Cooper, David Jeffries, Henry Blickensderfer, Henry Frank, Emanuel Gast, G. M. Steinman, Christopher Hager, Peter G. Eberman, John P. Myer, Joseph Ehrenfried, Carpenter McCleery, John A. Sheaff, George K. Reed, Dr. Henry Carpenter, J. J. Cochran, William P. Brinton, O. J. Dickey, Isaac Diller, H. F. Pinkerton, Henry C. Locher, Jacob Bowers, Phillip Fitzpatrick, John H. Pearsel.

An organization was effected by the election of the following officers and trustees: Dr. John L. Atlee, Sr., president; Bartram A. Shaeffer, C. H. Lefevre, vice-presidents; George Calder, Jr., secretary; Horace Rathvon, treasurer; B. F. Baer, solicitor; Horace Rathvon, H. E. Slaymaker, P. McConomy, B. Champneys, C. M. Howell, B. A. Shaeffer, S. S. Rathvon, George Calder, Jr., C. McCleery, Christian Widmyer, R. F. Rauch, Samuel Bausman, Jacob Frantz, Dr. John L. Atlee, Sr., J. R. Smeltz, C. H. Lefevre, trustees.

The board of managers was constituted as follows: Miss Mary Bowman, first directress; Mrs. Serena Franklin, second directress; Mrs. Sarah M. Kramph, secretary; Miss Maria Miller, treasurer; Mrs. Susan Miller, matron; Mrs. Elizabeth McComsey, teacher; Miss Henrietta Hoffmeier, Miss Susan Smith, Miss Elizabeth Eichholtz, Mrs. Rosina Hubley, Mrs. Louisa Long, Mrs. Elizabeth Sterrit, Mrs. Ann Muhlenberg, Mrs. John R. Russel, Miss Margaret Heitshu, Mrs. G. B. Kerfoot, Miss Margaret Humes, Mrs. Jacob Griel, Mrs. Bartram A. Shaeffer, Miss Margaret Dale, Mrs. Isaac Dunn, Mrs. Henrietta Bomberger, Miss Louisa Voorhis, Mrs. Sarah Cox, Mrs. George M. Steinman, Mrs. Mary Patterson.

By the act of incorporation the managers were authorized to take under their guardianship all vagrants whose parents cannot, or whose vices render them unfit to, take care of them; also to bind them out as apprentices to some useful trade or employment.

The Home and school was opened under the above organization in a nineteen-room house on South Queen Street, which was purchased in October, 1861, for three thousand dollars, of which amount one thousand dollars was raised by the citizens, and the remaining two thousand dollars by a State appropriation made in 1863, and they received later a second appropriation from the State of two thousand five hundred dollars. The contributions from citizens, which aggregated only two hundred and sixty dollars in 1860, increased steadily year after year, and the Home became consequently better prepared to meet the demands upon its charity. In 1864 the home was opened to soldiers' orphans.

In 1867 it became evident that the usefulness of the institution was limited by the inadequate quarters which were occupied by the children, and it was decided to secure, if possible, a larger building—to erect one which would answer every need. Appeals were accordingly made to the public and preparations commenced for building the present beautiful structure on the east side of South Ann Street. This building was completed, at a cost of twenty-eight thousand dollars, in 1869, and dedicated December 1st, with appropriate and interesting ceremonies. Dr. E. Greenwald, Rev. E. T. Kenny, and Dr. J. L. Atlee made remarks upon the occasion, and fine music was rendered by volunteer vocalists and instrumentalists. The building is of brick, four stories high, and ninety by fifty-five feet in lateral dimensions. Of the sum paid for its construction, two thousand five hundred dollars were received from the State, five thousand dollars from Lancaster County, and the remainder from individuals. A considerable sum of money was raised from a lecture course in 1873.

Miss Mary Bowman, the founder and for many years the president of the board of managers, died in December, 1874, and her place was filled by Mrs. S. M. Kramph. A Kindergarten teacher has been employed during the past three years, and the system of instruction has given excellent satisfaction.

The institution is supported by an appropriation of ten thousand dollars per year from the county, made by order of the court under the authority of an act of Assembly passed April 12, 1876. Donations are also made and legacies left which augment the income. The number of the children in the school is one hundred and forty-six. The president of the board of managers is Mrs. S. M. Kramph, and the secretary, Mrs. Charles A. Heinitch. The only one of the original board remaining with Mrs. Kramph is Mrs. Sarah Cox. Mrs. Kate Hamaker is matron, and Misses Oril R. Cole and Juliet S. S. Herr are teachers,—the first-named of the Kindergarten.

Young Men's Christian Association.—The first meeting held for the object of bringing into existence a branch of this widely-spread organization was at Temperance Hall, Dec. 9, 1869. It was then and there decided to form an association, and a committee was appointed to draw up a plan and prepare a constitution. Organization was effected Jan. 31, 1870, and the constitution reported by the committee unanimously adopted. D. S. Burrh was elected president; W. L. Bear, secretary; and A. A. Hubley, treasurer, and a board of managers was also chosen. Temperance Hall was rented for a short time, but upon Sept. 12, 1870, arrangements were perfected with the officers of the Athenæum for the use of their rooms and library, then in the City Hall over the post-office, where the association remained for two years. On Nov. 18, 1872, the new room which had been fitted up in Locher's building, on the corner of West King Street and Centre Square, was ready for occupation, and was taken possession of. Soon after the organization was made the nucleus of a library was formed, to which additions were made from time to time; and when, several years later, the Young Men's Christian Association moved into the new building on South Queen Street, which we shall presently speak of, the Athenæum Library was merged with its own. A fair was held in December, 1872, which netted about two thousand three hundred dollars, and that amount was expended in books and furniture, three rooms being carpeted and neatly furnished. In March, 1878, the building on South Queen Street, now owned by the association, was purchased of Sanfuel Miller, and rooms fitted up in it, which were occupied for the first time on Sunday, April 21st, being opened with appropriate exercises. D. S. Bursk was president from the organization until January, 1878, when he was succeeded by Judge John B. Livingston, who served that year, during which a considerable sum of money was raised to pay off old indebtedness, and to repair the building. In 1879, D. C. Hayerstick became president, and he still holds the office. In 1882 the society, finding itself somewhat embarrassed owing to annual payments, interest, and general expenses which had to be met, decided to call upon the citizens for subscriptions to pay their indebtedness and secure the building in which they had their hall. The people responded liberally, about seven thousand dollars being raised, with which the building was purchased. It was then placed in the possession of Henry Baumgardner, George R. Read, and Robert A. Evans, in trust for the use of the association as long as it works under its charter. The Young Men's Christian Association has now about one hundred and fifty members, and its library contains over seven thousand volumes.

Lodge No. 43, F. and A. M., of Lancaster,<sup>1</sup> is the oldest lodge of the order in the county, and ranks eighth in age in the State. There are traditions of the working of the brethren of the craft of Masonry in the then borough of Lancaster as early as 1778. When Maj. André was held here as a prisoner of war in 1775, he was known as a Mason, and recognized as such by the members of the order then residing here. Robert Moderwell, deceased, communicated to members now living the fact that meetings had been held in Lancaster prior to the time of the granting of the first warrant to Lodge No. 43, which fact he had learned from William Kirkpatrick. There is no doubt that these meetings were of an informal and convivial nature, as no minutes can be found of any meeting prior to 1785. On the 21st day of April, in that year, a charter was granted to Stephen Chambers, John Doyle, and Henry Huber, authorizing and empowering them to form a new lodge, to be known as No. 43, to be held in the borough of Lancaster, "or anywhere within five miles of the same, and make Free Masons, according to the ancient custom of the Royal craft in all ages and nations throughout the known world, and not contrarywise." This charter was granted at Philadelphia by the Grand Lodge for the province of Pennsylvania, by virtue of a provincial grand warrant from the Grand Lodge of London, Great Britain, of which lodge the Right Worshipful and Right Honorable Thomas Erskine, Earl of Kelly, Viscount Trenton, Lord Baron of Pitteen Weem, etc., was Grand Master. The lodge continued working under the original warrant received from the Grand Lodge of Great Britain, only concluding to sever their allegiance to their mother-lodge in the year 1787, in which year they received their present warrant from the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, and bearing date of July 14, 1787, thereby revoking all jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of Great Britain over them, but preserving by stipulation the original title of Lodge No. 43. The early history of Lodge No. 43 appears to be closely identified with the history of Lancaster. Among its members it counted such names as Frederick Hubley, Thomas Edwards (who was a member of the Legislature from 1729 to 1739), George Ross, Matthias Slough, who at the time kept the tavern at the southeast corner of Centre Square, and who was coroner at the time of the murder of the Conestoga Indians by the Paxton boys; Leonard Eichholtz, who kept the tavern with the sign of the "Bull's Head," and many others whose names are closely interwoven with the history of the city. The first meeting under the original warrant of the lodge was held in the public-house of Frederick Hubley, which stood at the old fish-market. In this tavern, on the night of the 14th of September, 1785, the first officers of the lodge were installed. They continued holding their meetings in that house for about three years, moving to the house of Mr. Thomas Edwards some time in the year 1788. This place evidently did not suit them, as they only held a few meetings there, when they met at the house of Mr. George Ross.

In January, 1789, the place of meeting was again changed, this time to the tavern kept by Matthias Slough, on the southeast corner of Centre Square, where the New Era printing-office now stands. The brethren continued to meet in this tavern up to the year 1792, when the lodge-room was again removed, this time to the house of Mr. John Julian Sonnet. For about one year their meetings were held in Mr. Sonnet's rooms, but they finally deemed it convenient to make another change, and their meetings were held in the house owned by Mr. Leonard Eichholtz. This change was made in June, 1793, and they appear to have remained there until the early part of the year 1800, when they are recorded as meeting in the house of Mrs. Edwards, which stood on the corner of South Queen and German Streets, where Mr. Gideon Arnold's house now stands. The meetings during this period, 1785 to 1800, were frequently held under numerous difficulties. The minutes frequently record the fact of women being found hidden in the lodge-room, and their summary ejection.

In the year 1796 or 1797 the project of securing a permanent hall appears to have been considerably discussed. On March 2, 1798, as the records of the borough show, the corporation considered the advisability of building a new market-house, and a committee from the lodge met with them to consult upon the privilege of erecting a superstructure upon the house for use as a hall. A plan was agreed upon whereby the borough was to build the first and the lodge the second story, the committee of the latter assenting to the arrangement consisting of Messrs. Charles Smith, Henry Deering, John Miller, Jr., and Lewis Lanman. This building was upon the ground now occupied by the post-office, masonic hall, and city offices. A more formal agreement than that of March 2d was entered into between the borough authorities and the authorized committee of the lodge on April 14, 1798, and the work begun soon after, Mr. Jacob Albright receiving the contract for doing the brick work, and Mr. Gottlieb Sener furnishing the lumber, shingles, etc. The brick for the new building was furnished by Mr. George Peters, at a cost of thirty shillings per thousand. The work was rapidly pushed forward, the building being completed during the summer of 1800, and the first meeting of the lodge in their new hall was held on the night of September 10th. From that date until the present time they have continued holding their meetings in the same place, with the exception of the decade between 1835 and 1845. During this period the Anti-Masonic excitement was at its height, and their doors were closed, and meetings held at various places, the members secretly stealing into their lodge-rooms. The hall was refitted in 1868, and much improved in beauty and convenience. The old hall has in its time been the scene of many interesting events, and contains many relics of "auld lang syne."

A year or two prior to the building of the hall, Lodge No. 43 was visited by the immortal Washington, one of the most illustrious craftsmen of the order. During the period of Lafayette's visit to this country the lodge was also visited by him, and in the traditions of No. 43, and on the minutes, may still be heard and read the records of these visits. On the occasion of Washington's presence in the lodge an artist, whose name is unknown, was so impressed with his commanding figure and noble bearing that he at once set to work and carved from wood a life-size and life-like statue of the hero of the Revolution, which he presented to the lodge and which is still in their possession. On a stand in the centre of the room may be seen the first Bible in the possession of the lodge, having been presented to the order in 1785. The stand on which the Bible rests, and also several of the desks, are the same that were in use on the day of the opening of the hall, in the year 1800. Hanging in the banquet room is a full set of Masonic implements inclosed in a glass case, the frame of which was made from cedar wood growing over the grave of Washington at Mount Vernon. These tools were presented to the lodge by Mr. Samuel Strachen, and, of course, are highly cherished by the members. The lodge has numerous other relics which are venerated for their ancient associations.

Lodge No. 48 is the parent of not less than eight lodges in Lancaster County, of which we give a list with the respective dates of their warrants:

Washington Lodge, No. 156, held at Drumore Centre; warrant dated July 2, 1818. (This lodge lost its charter during the Anti-Masonic excitement.)

Columbia Lodge, No. 236, held at Columbia; warrant dated June 13, 1854.

Ashava Lodge, No. 398, held at Marietta; warrant dated November, 1867.

Colerain Lodge, No. 417, held at Kirkwood; warrant dated June, 1868.

Lamberton Lodge, No. 476, held at Lancaster; warrant dated 1870.

CHARLES MILLER HOWELL, marble manufacturer, of Lancaster, Pa., was born in Philadelphia, April 24, 1814, and obtained his early education in the schools of his native city and at Plainfield Academy, Connecticut. From the age of fourteen to the time of reaching his majority he was an apprentice with Gen. Peter Fritz, a marble-mason of Philadelphia, and for three years following worked at his trade as a journeyman. In the spring of 1838 he set up business for himself, and carried on the marble trade until September, 1843, when he came to Lancaster and established his business on East King Street. Here he continued successfully until April 1, 1850, when he purchased the old Gompf property, on the west side of North Queen Street, where he has since carried on a large marble trade. In 1863-64 he erected his present residence and brick block upon this site. Mr. Howell has been one of Lancaster's most active business men, and closely identified with the material interests and worthy local enterprises of the city, and as a member of both branches of the City Council, as a member of the city school board, and as city treasurer in 1865 he did efficient service for the public. In 1856 he was elected county treasurer on the Democratic ticket, and discharged the duties of that office with entire satisfaction. He is a member of the First Presbyterian Church of Lancaster, a member of its board of trustees, of which he has served as treasurer for nine years, and for thirty-nine consecutive years he has served as a faithful and efficient secretary and treasurer of the Presbyterian Sunday-school. Mr. Howell is a member of Mount Moriah Lodge of Masons, Philadelphia. He has been Deputy Grand Master of District No. 1 of Pennsylvania for twenty years, and was Grand Commander of the Grand Commandery of Knights Templar of Pennsylvania in 1872-73. His close identification with Masonic interests in the county and State has made his name familiar, and the following lodges have been named "Howell" in honor of his public service. "Howell Lodge," at Waynesburg, Pa.; "Charles M. Howell Lodge," at Safe Harbor, Pa.; "Howell Chapter," at West Chester, Pa.; and the "Howell Chapter," at York, Pa. He married, Dec. 28, 1841, Elizabeth, daughter of John (1798-1867) and Elizabeth Deitrich Michael, who was born in Lancaster, June 22, 1822, and died Oct. 22, 1877. Her parents are familiarly known to the public as the hospitable proprietors of the Michael Hotel of Lancaster, which has been owned by them for sixty years, and which they carried on for a large part of that time. Mrs. Michael was born Oct. 21, 1798, and survives in 1883.

Their children are Sally Provost, wife of Rev. William D. Le Fever, a German Reformed minister; Elizabeth Michael (deceased); Charles May (deceased); Henry N., chief engineer of the Lancaster

Fire Department; and Frank Roderick Howell. Mr. Howell's paternal great-grandfather was a native of Wales, the progenitor of the family in New Jersey, and settled at Lambertville, where he married Julia Ann Holcombe, daughter of John Holcombe, about 1740.

Amos Howell, grandfather of our subject, born at Lambertville, died Dec. 14, 1811. His wife was Martha Jones, who died Dec. 19, 1821, aged sixty-eight years. Their children were Elizabeth (Mrs. Prentice), of Trenton, N. J.; Rebecca, wife of Samuel Wolley, of Trenton; Felix, of Philadelphia; Amos, father of our subject; and Maria, wife of James Caldwell, of Philadelphia. Amos Howell owned the ferry on the Jersey side, and for his services to Gen. Washington in crossing with his army Dec. 25, 1776, he was presented with a fine horse by the great military leader.

Amos, son of Amos Howell, was born at Lambertville, July 31, 1792, went to Philadelphia while a boy, there learned coach-making, and carried it on extensively at the southeast corner of Eighth and Arch Streets until his death, April 11, 1832. He served in the war of 1812. His wife, Sarah Provost, born in Philadelphia, Jan. 21, 1799, died at the residence of her daughter, at Buckingham Court-House, Va., Aug. 30, 1863. Their children are Charles Miller, subject of this sketch; Henry Provost, born Aug. 27, 1816, engaged in the East India Ship Company's service, and no tidings have been heard of him since 1860; Elizabeth Prentice, born Sept. 1, 1818, wife of Reuben Cobb, Buckingham Court-House, Va.; Martha Jones, died young; Emeline Margaretta, born July 2, 1822, wife of Norvell Cobb, Buckingham Court-House, Va.; George Hocker (1824-59), past assistant surgeon United States navy, died in Philadelphia; John Martin (1827-49); and Paul Alexander, died young.

An old relic, a cane with ivory top and brass ferrule, owned by Prince Howell the Good, of Wales, in the ninth century, is owned by his descendant in 1883; and this relic of "High-born Hod" was exhibited at the Centennial at Philadelphia in 1876.

Goodwin Council, No. 19, Royal Super-Excellent and Select Masters, opened and assembled under a dispensation dated Feb. 26, 1864, which was subsequently confirmed by a charter from the Grand Council of Pennsylvania, June 14, 1864. The present officers are John Hull, T. I. G. M.; Joshua L. Lyte, D. I. G. M.; Dr. John R. Morris, P. C. of M.; Charles A. Heinitsch, Treas.; Hugh S. Gara, Rec. The principal past officers, with dates of election, were Charles M. Howell, 1864; Andrew J. Kauffman, 1865; Elam D. Hurst, 1866; William J. Fordnoy, 1873; William Z. Sener, 1875; William A. Morton, 1877; Dr. George R. Wolchous, 1879; Henry E. Carson, 1880; James B. Strine, 1881; David H. Wylle, 1882. The number of members is one hundred and fifty-eight.

Lamberton Lodge, No. 476, A. Y. M.—In 1870 the effort which had been made for several years to establish a new lodge of A. Y. Masons culminated in the formation of this organization. At a stated meeting of Lancaster Lodge, No. 48, May 11, 1870, Henry Baumgardner and William A. Morton, Past Masters, and Samuel F. Rathvon, Edward Welchus, J. Frederick Sener, William Z. Sener, Henry R. Fahnestock, and John A. Shultz resigned their membership in that lodge for the purpose of uniting to form the new one. Immediately after their resignation the secretary read a petition from them, praying the R. W. Grand to grant a warrant to constitute a new lodge in Lancaster, and the warrant was duly made. At a meeting of the Grand Lodge, held June 1, 1870, a warrant was granted to the new lodge as Lamberton Lodge, No. 476, and on the 23d the R. W. Grand Master, Robert A. Lamberton, with those who were to constitute the lodge, convened at the hall of Lodge No. 48, and with impressive ceremonies installed as officers the following persons, viz.: William A. Morton, W. M.; Samuel W. Rathvon, S. W.; Edward Welchus, J. W.; Henry Baumgardner, Treas.; and Henry Fahnestock, Sec. At the close of the ceremonies the new lodge was addressed by the R. W. G. Master in terms of great commendation, and with the expression of a hope that the lodge would prove to be a credit to the city and State. The meetings of this lodge have been held in the hall of Lodge No. 48. The present membership is eighty-five. The officers now serving are W. M., J. Willis Westlake, and Secretary, Henry R. Fahnestock.

Lancaster Lodge, No. 67, I. O. O. F.—The application for the dispensation for organizing this lodge was signed by James Boone, Michael Hanvey, Henry Markee, James Hindman, David Hantsch, and John Wood. The charter was granted May 29, 1841. The six men already named and four more,—David E. Sechler, Edward Jeffries, Jonathan I. Monaghan, and John Lippencott,—were the charter members. The first officers were James Boone, N. G.; John Lippencott, V. G.; David Hantsch, Sec.; Michael Hanvey, Treas. The lodge was instituted with appropriate ceremonies at a meeting held in a room on the southwest corner of Walnut and Queen Streets, then occupied by David E. Sechler (now by Stoner, Shreiner & Co., as a hardware-store). The regular meetings of the lodge were held for some time at this place, and then a room was rented in the old Museum building, corner of Chestnut and North Queen Streets. In 1846 the lodge purchased two lots of ex-Judge Ellis Lewis, one of which was occupied by the old Quaker Church, and the other used as a burying-ground by the same society. For this property they gave fifteen hundred dollars, a small portion being reserved from sale, but finally bought by the lodge about 1872 for eight hundred dollars. At the time of the purchase the building was only one story high; but the Odd-Fellows raised it another story at a considerable cost, and thus provided themselves with an excellent hall. When it had been completed and handsomely fitted up, it was formally dedicated on the 2d of September, 1852, by the officers of the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania. On that memorable day in the local annals of Odd-Fellowship there were estimated to be at least twenty-five hundred members of the fraternity in the city, and there were from twelve to fifteen hundred in the procession, according to careful estimates. Twenty-two lodges and six encampments were represented. Hon. D. B. Vander-smith was grand marshal. The oration was delivered by P. G. M. Witte, of Philadelphia, who was introduced to the audience by Past Grand Sire Thomas Wildey, founder of the order in the United States. This gala day closed with a large ball at Fulton Hall in the evening. The lodge has ever been in a flourishing condition. It is the lodge from which the others in the county have sprung. There have been received into the lodge altogether eleven hundred and twenty-six persons, and it now has the remarkably large membership of three hundred and forty-three. Past Grand James Boone, one of the charter members, is still living and active in the organization. The present officers are: N. G., George M. Graham; V. G., F. D. Miley; Sec., H. L. Fraley; Treas., — Gundecker. The valuation of the property owned by the lodge is about fifteen thousand dollars.

Monterey Lodge, No. 242, I. O. O. F.<sup>1</sup>—In the year 1847 ten men,—viz., George M. Kline, H. B. Vondersmith, Charles M. Howell, Charles Boughter, John Leonard, M.D., Walter G. Evans, Stephen G. Chapman, Alexander Carpenter, M.D., G. M. Zahm, and Francis Shroder,—members of Lancaster Lodge, No. 67, I. O. O. F., thought the time had arrived when it would be beneficial for the prosperity of the order to organize a new lodge; hence they made application to the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania for a charter, which was granted. These brethren met from time to time to discuss matters relative to the organization. Among them was the name by which the lodge should be known. Various names were suggested, but none seemed to give entire satisfaction. At one of the meetings—the United States being at war with Mexico—word was received that the city of Monterey had surrendered to Gen. Taylor, that the Stars and Stripes were floating over the battlements of the city, whereupon Past Grand Charles M. Howell suggested that the name be Monterey, which was, amid applause, unanimously adopted. The charter was granted on the 19th of April, 1847. District Deputy John L. Thompson, acting as Grand Master, together with Brothers Rothamel as G. W., Ihling as G. S., McClure as G. Treas., M. Zahm as G. G. M., presented the charter, instituted the lodge, administered the obligation, and installed the following officers: George M. Klesner, N. G.; D. B. Vondersmith, V. G.; Charles

M. Howell, Sec.; John Leonard, Asst. Sec.; Walter G. Evans, Treas.

In December, 1847, Judge Ellis Lewis, president judge of the courts of Lancaster County, presented the lodge with a beautiful engraving representing "Charity," which was thankfully received.

A singular coincidence is that the name of the lodge was given in honor of the surrendering of a Mexican city to the United States troops, that the lodge was instituted on the 19th of April, 1847, and that on the 19th of April, 1861, when the first gun was fired in the great civil war, the lodge, at its meeting on that night, resolved that all members of the lodge who enlisted in the military service of the United States should be kept in good standing during such service; also that the families of all members in the military service of the United States to be treated the same as the by-laws of the lodge require the families of deceased members to be treated; also that the secretary shall furnish a complete list of all who have entered the United States service, have them suitably enrolled, framed, and suspended in the lodge-room, thus carrying out the fundamental principles of the order, "Grateful to our Creator, faithful to our country, and fraternal to our fellow-men."

The following is the tabular statement as reported up to April 1, 1888: Number of members, 315; amount of relief granted to brothers, $29,490.50; families of deceased brothers, $13,008.91; donations for charitable purposes, $1005.50; total amount of relief, $43,504.91. The initiation fee varies, according to age, from five dollars upwards. The weekly dues are fourteen cents; weekly benefits, five dollars; funeral benefits, three hundred and twenty-eight dollars.

The lodge has been fortunate in having good officers, and it knows how to appreciate them by retaining them in office. The trustees are Hon. James Black, Dr. G. Baker, Esq., and James Potts, the former of whom has been trustee for nearly twenty-five years. The investments of the lodge amount to $15,000; banner, $450; regalia, etc., $600; total, $16,050, with no liabilities. The late secretary, James M. Channell, who was compelled to resign in February, 1883, on account of ill health, held that position for twenty-five consecutive years. The present elective officers are Charles Shaub, N. G.; Charles I. Landis, V. G.; Linneus Rathvon, Sec.; Thomas Burr, Asst. Sec.; Adam Oblender, Treas.; Hon. James Black, Chaplain; E. J. Erman, Representative to Grand Lodge.

1869 being the fiftieth anniversary of the institution of Odd-Fellowship in the United States, a grand parade in honor of the occasion was held in the city of Philadelphia, Pa. Monterey Lodge participated in the parade, and the Daughters of Rebecca (wives of the members of the order) presented the lodge with a handsome banner, costing four hundred dollars. The lodge also took part in the parade on Odd-Fellows' Day at the Centennial, in 1876, at Philadelphia.

Washington Encampment, No. 11, I. O. O. F.—The charter of this organization was granted April 9, 1844. The first officers were William B. Fahnestock, Chief Patriarch; Abram N. Brenneman, High Priest; Charles Boughton, Senior Warden; Henry Rotharmel, Junior Warden; John W. Forney, Scribe; John Matthiot, Treas.; James Boone, Scribe. The encampment met in the rooms of Lancaster Lodge until the Odd-Fellows' Hall was fitted up. There are now two hundred and twenty-five members enrolled upon the books of the lodge. Edward Bookmyer is Chief Patriarch, and W. F. Hambright, Scribe.

Habel Lodge, No. 599, I. O. O. F.—This lodge was composed of the German element of Lodges Nos. 67 and 242, of this city, and was organized May 8, 1867, with eleven members from the former and five from the latter. The first Past Master was Adam Schub, and the present is Charles Roth.

Lancaster Lodge, No. 68, K. of P.—Early in the spring of 1868 this order had its inception in Lancaster City. A charter was applied for and granted by the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania on March 15th, and on the 28th of the same month this lodge was instituted by the grand officers, in Russell's Hall, on North Queen Street. Soon afterwards new quarters were secured in the American Mechanics' room, in the Inquirer building. In the summer of 1869 the fourth story of the Fulton building was fitted as a lodge-room jointly by this lodge and Inland City Lodge, at a cost of about fifteen hundred dollars, and in October was occupied by them, as it continues to be at the present time. Lancaster Lodge has a membership of two hundred and ninety-five, an invested fund of six thousand and seventy-nine dollars, and a total fund of six thousand four hundred dollars. This lodge conferred the third, or Knight's Rank upon its members, and is the only one in the county, and among the very few in the State, which has done so. From the membership of this lodge exclusively was started the first Uniform Rank in the county, Lancaster Division, instituted Sept. 30, 1879. An Endowment Rank was started in August, 1877. It is known as Section No. 112, and had an original membership of fifteen, which has at the present time increased to twenty-four.

Inland City Lodge, No. 88, Knights of Pythias.—The charter for this lodge was granted June 6, 1868, and the lodge was organized on the 20th, with Henry L. Frailley, George S. The organization took place in Odd-Fellows' Hall, where meetings were held until October, 1869, when the lodge moved to the Knights of Pythias' Hall, in the Fulton building.

Since its organization the lodge has received $23,524.10, paid out for relief $9700.20, and now has funds and a cash investment of $5071.57, besides lodge property to the value of five hundred dollars. Meetings were first held in a building which stood on South Queen Street, where Shaum's furniture warerooms now are. They were afterwards held in various places until the year 1869, when the three tribes—Metamora, Ee-shah-ko-nee, and Red Jacket—united in fitting up a wigwam in the Fulton building, at a cost of two thousand one hundred dollars. About 1878 the society merged with the Washington Union, No. 1, and is now working under that name, with a membership roll of one hundred and ten. The Most Worthy Governess is Mrs. Esther Hoover, and the Secretary, Miss Susan S. Hambricht.

The Philozatheans.—An organization bearing this name, composed entirely of ladies, and purely beneficial in its aims, designing to defray the expenses involved by sickness of its members and to meet the outlay for funerals, is in active existence, with a membership of one hundred and thirty persons. It was organized May 13, 1852, with seventy-five charter members, and first met in Odd-Fellows' Hall. It has since held its meetings in various places. The presiding sisters are Mrs. Christiana Heckert and Miss Susan S. Hambricht.

Lancaster Lodge, Good Templars.—This temperance society was organized Oct. 1, 1856, as No. 147, and changed in 1861 to No. 9. Meetings were held in Commercial Mechanics' Hall, on King Street. The lodge increased until it had two hundred members, but declined, and was disbanded in 1876. It was reorganized in September, 1880, and flourished for about a year.

Union Lodge, Good Templars.—On the 22d of September, 1861, this lodge was organized as No. 35. It was an offshoot of Lancaster Lodge, and similar to that organization in history. It gained a membership of about two hundred, and then rapidly declined, becoming defunct in July, 1878.

Independent Order of Seven Wise Men.—Washington Conclave, No. 9, of this order, was organized in 1862, with nine charter members. Meetings were held in the Odd-Fellows' Hall until rooms were fitted up in the Excelsior Hall building in 1877, since which time they have been held there. The lodge has now about one hundred and sixty men. Nicholas Welker is the present Noble Grand.

Independent Order "B'nai B'rith," Lodge No. 228.—This lodge, which has at present forty members, was chartered with just half that number in 1874. Meetings have been held from soon after the organization in the Grand Army Hall. The present officers are: Monitor, Selig Cohn; President, Adolph Jewel; Vice-President, Lewis Sylvester; Secretary, Albert Rosenstein; Financial Secretary, George Bomberger; Treasurer, Abram Hirsh.

Washington Legion, No. 3, Knights of the Revolution.—This society meets in the Grand Army of the Republic Hall, on Centre Square, on the first Monday and third Wednesday of every month. The number of members is forty. The lodge was organized Oct. 23, 1880. The Patriarch of the lodge is Emanuel Rutter, the Secretary W. M. Bair.

Patriotic Order Sons of America.—Washington Camp, No. 27, of this order was organized Jan. 24, 1882, with twenty-two members, and now has eighty-five. The organization was effected in the old Inquirer building, which was destroyed by fire the next day. Meetings were then held in Odd-Fellows' Hall until the completion of the present Inquirer building, when the lodge removed to the hall which it now occupies. There were two lodges prior to this one, Nos. 13 and 74, the former disbanding in 1880, and the latter in 1879. The present lodge is in a healthful condition, and has a capital of about seven hundred dollars.

An Early and Useful German Society.—"The German Association" was the name of an organization which had its origin in October, 1818. Its meetings were held at that time in the German Reformed school-house. In fragments (which have been preserved) of an address delivered on the 1st of January, 1820, by the president of the society an idea is given of the objects of the organization, which seem to have been, according to the second article of the constitution, which is quoted, "To afford needful counsel and advice to German emigrants who may arrive in Lancaster, and to give needful assistance to strangers who may arrive amongst us from Germany, and in some particular cases also to Germans or the descendants of Germans arriving from other parts of our country who may be deserving thereof. To see also that proper justice be done to German Redemptioners, that, having fled from governmental oppression, they may be treated by their masters as Human Beings and according to the Covenants of their Indentures." The society numbered seventy-four members in 1820, and the officers, besides the president, Rev. Dr. Endreas, were: First Vice-President, Rev. Samuel Reinko; Second Vice-President, Adam Reigart; Treasurer, George Louis Mayer; Collector, Jacob Schneider; Secretary, Joseph Ehrenfried. The society was in existence in 1833, and probably a number of years later.

Grand Army of the Republic, George H. Thomas Post.—This post was chartered with twenty members Sept. 28, 1867. Upon the same day an order was issued for its organization from the headquarters department of the Pennsylvania Grand Army of the Republic, under which Maj. A. C. Reinoehl, special A. D. C., organized the post upon Oct. 1, 1867. There have been mustered from first to last five hundred and sixty-three members, and there are now two hundred and twenty-two in good standing. The first meeting was held at Mechanics' Hall, East King Street, but in April, 1868, the post moved to the hall of the Independent Order of Red Men on North Queen Street. In 1870 they moved to the Grand Army Hall in Coyles building, East King Street, and in 1871 to the hall of the order in Bair & Shank's banking building, Centre Square. The names of the past Post Commanders are William Weidler, W. W. Hopkins, J. K. Rutter, Jacob K. Barr, A. R. Brenneman, E. H. Thomas, John P. Rea, Edward Egerly, William D. Stauffer, A. F. Herr, Hugh R. Fulton, B. F. Eberle, John McGinnis, C. H. Fasnacht, J. H. Metzler, John Black, Jr., Hiram McElroy, James Sweger. The present Commander is Martin Stark. Past Post Commander J. K. Barr was elected Senior Vice Department Commander of Pennsylvania at the Department Encampment held at Lebanon in January, 1878. Marriott Brosius was elected as delegate by the Department of Pennsylvania to the National Encampment in 1876, and again to the National Encampment in 1883. Past Post Commander J. P. Rea is now Department Commander of the State of Minnesota.

Sons of Veterans.—The George H. Thomas Camp, No. 19, of this order, was organized under dispensation March 11, 1882, with nineteen charter members, and mustered in by Adj. John L. Stewart, of Philadelphia. The camp now has a membership of seventy-four, and is commanded by Capt. W. W. Franklin. Meetings are held in the Grand Army Hall on Penn Square.

The Order of United American Mechanics.—The first seven councils of this order were instituted and located in the city of Philadelphia, and the first council to be chartered and located outside the city of Philadelphia was Conestoga, No. 8, at Lancaster. The charter of this council was issued on the 12th day of March, 1846, to the following then well-known citizens of Lancaster, to wit: George W. Reichenbach, Samuel Chapman, Henry F. Benedict, George Miller, Joshua W. Jack, William J. Kryder, Edward H. Rauch, and Michael Trisler (all of whom are deceased at this date except Edward H. Rauch and Henry F. Benedict, both of whom are still members of the order).

This council was instituted on the 20th day of March, 1846, by William Sharpless, the then president of the State Council of Pennsylvania. The first elected officers of the council were: President, Joshua W. Jack; Vice-President, A. N. Brenneman; Secretary, G. T. Zahm; Treasurer, George W. Reichenbach; Financial Secretary, Edward H. Rauch.

The first meetings of this council were held in Odd-Fellows' Hall, on South Queen Street, and from there to the Mechanics' Institute, on the same street, now the site of the extensive furniture warerooms of George B. Schaum; from there the council removed to the third floor of what was known as the Witmer building, on East King Street, one door west of the Farmers' Bank, now the site of the Demuth buildings; from there the council removed to the third floor of the Gyger banking-house, on East King Street, now known as the First National Bank.

The council remained there until the month of March, 1869, when it removed to the second floor of the Lancaster Inquirer building, on North Queen Street, which had just been completed by the late Stuart A. Wylie, who at that time was a very active member of the council. In this building the council fitted up a council-room for its purpose, which was considered the best arrayed council-room in the State. Here the council remained until the 26th day of January, 1882, when they were completely burned out of their home, by the total destruction of the Inquirer building by fire, the council losing nearly all their furniture, regalia, flags, etc., and a greater part of their private papers and records. Fortunately the council property was insured to the amount of two thousand five hundred dollars, being about one-half or less of its worth. They received from the insurance company in cash two thousand one hundred dollars, and property saved to the amount of four hundred dollars. After the fire the council met temporarily in the Grand Army Hall, Knights of Pythias Hall, and Temperance Hall until the 4th day of December, 1882, when they re-entered the reconstructed Inquirer building, having fitted up the third story (which they have leased for ten years) of this building for their uses and purposes. On the 10th day of August, 1849, the council participated in the procession and reception given in honor of the visit of the President of the United States, Gen. Z. Taylor, to the city of Lancaster, Mr. M. J. Weaver acting as marshal of the occasion.

On Friday, the 11th day of September, 1868, a grand parade of the order, under the auspices of the State Council O. U. A. M. of Pennsylvania, was held in this city, in which sixty councils of the O. U. A. M. and twenty-five councils of the Junior O. U. A. M. took part, with more than seventy bands of music in line; Col. David Miles, of Conestoga Council, No. 8, was chief marshal. There was over eight thousand men in line wearing the red, white, and blue regalia of the order. The demonstration was the largest that had ever taken place in this city, and has never been equaled since that day to the present time.

The council has been honored by having two of its members fill the office of State Councilor, Edward H. Rauch and Edwin E. Snyder. The council was not only instrumental in organizing councils of the O. U. A. M. in this county and others, but also was the means of starting the Junior O. U. A. M. which has grown to large proportions. The receipts of the council since organization have been over $75,000, and there has been expended for benevolent purposes, etc., $64,988.90, leaving the council worth, to date, in actual cash, about $11,816.10, besides their furnished meeting-room and other property to the amount of $25,000 or more. Meetings are held every Monday night at eight o'clock. The officers of the council at present are as follows: Councilor, John B. Milleysack; Vice-Councilor, Jacob D. Houser; Recording Secretary, Isaac F. Long; Assistant Recording Secretary, William Wetzel; Financial Secretary, William H. Powell; Treasurer, Edwin E. Snyder; Inductor, William Harry; Examiner, Jacob Weitzel; Inside Protector, David Keeparts; Outside Protector, J. E. Snyder; Trustees, John W. Rudy, Edwin S. Smeltz, and E. S. Kurtz; Representative to State Council, David Hartman, Jr. The present number of members is about two hundred.

Junior Order of United American Mechanics,—Conestoga Council, No. 22.—During the spring and summer of 1867 some of the members of Conestoga Council, No. 8, O. U. A. M., were agitating the propriety of establishing a council of the Junior Order of United American Mechanics, in order to gather in the young men of the city, and teach them the objects and principles of that order, and to prepare them to become members when arriving at the proper age. Accordingly, John K. Skiles, Edw. E. Snyder, J. K. Snyder, and others set about in securing suitable young men to form the junior council, and were not long in procuring the names of quite a number of young men, who expressed their willingness to become members, when an application was forwarded to the State Council of Pennsylvania of the Junior Order United American Mechanics to organize Conestoga Council, No. 22, with the following as charter members: Jonas E. Brubaker, John C. Swope, William L. Holden, William Leonard, Michael K. Gochenauer, Charles G. Bates, Isaac G. Seltzer, Augustus D. Killian, William Anderson, J. E. Rote, Anthony Lechler, Jr., George P. Roy, Samuel S. Sprecher, Henry Anne, John A. Murphy, John Like, William K. Mathews, Samuel Fox, Fred. Burr, Andrew Lebkicher, John W. Hubley, A. W. Snyder, Josiah Davish, Daniel Markley, Frank Fisher, John C. Haus, George E. Wisner, William G. Gilgore, Clemens H. Smeltz, and H. W. Rudy.

In due time a charter was granted, and the council was instituted Oct. 3, 1867. John C. Swope was elected as Councilor and Isaac J. Seltzer Recording Secretary. Between eight and nine hundred members have been received into the council altogether, and it has now a large membership. The council is worth about seven thousand five hundred dollars. It now holds its meetings in a fine hall in the Inquirer building. The present officers are:

Councilor, H. M. Erisman; Vice-Councilor, Joseph Like; Recording Secretary, John C. Swope; Assistant Recording Secretary, Elmer Humphreville; Financial Secretary, Edwin S. Smeltz; Treasurer, John O. Spaeth; Conductor, H. J. Baurer; Warden, Jacob Houser; Inside Sentinel, Samuel Unger; Outside

Sentinel, Harry Carter; Trustees, William H. McComsey, Jacob D. Houser, William C. Wetzel; Representatives to State Council, E. S. Kurtz and Edwin S. Smeltz, Jr.; Past Councilor, G. A. Graham.

Lancaster Mænnerchor.—This German society was organized in 1858 with twelve members, its object being the cultivation of vocal music. The first place of meeting was a small back room in L. Knapp's saloon, and the first musical director was F. Leuthy. The society soon became popular, and increased so fast in membership that the old quarters were found to be too contracted, and, in 1865, William L. Knapp built for the society the hall on Grant Street. In 1862, Professor L. Steinmuller, a very able teacher of music, was elected director, and he retained that position until 1870, when he resigned on account of ill health, Professor C. Matz being elected to fill the vacancy. He holds the position at the present time. The society having increased very largely in numbers, found, in the spring of 1883, that it had outgrown its second headquarters, and purchased the property on North Prince Street known as the Hotel Franke, where they built, at a cost of forty-five thousand dollars, the two-story brick edifice, sixty by one hundred and twelve feet, in which they now have their hall. The Mænnerchor now has five hundred and fifty members. The President is Mr. H. Gerhart; Secretary, George Pfeifer; and Treasurer, William Balc.

The Newspaper Press.—Newspapers, more appropriately than the players of whom Shakespeare wrote, may be called the "abstract and brief chronicles of the time." If they do not so well "hold up the mirror to nature's face," they at least perform that office creditably, and they often carry down the centuries the definite and minute history of a day, written while its hours are still lingering.

But the "art preservative of all arts" does not always perform the function which the trite quotation implies, and in such cases, whether just or not, its own fame suffers, and there are blanks in its history. There are some such intervals of oblivion in the annals of the Lancaster press, as a journalist,<sup>1</sup> who, several years ago, imposed upon himself the task of writing its history, discovered.

"The history of the newspapers in Lancaster," says Mr. Geist, "can be traced back as far as 1751. In January of that year a newspaper, in the English and German languages, was published in this city by Miller & Holland. What the title of it was we cannot now learn, neither the date of its suspension. Before the Revolutionary war, and for a short time after its commencement, William Albright, associated with Lahn and Stiemer, published a German paper, and soon after the beginning of the war Francis Bailey published a paper in English." Copies of this paper of different dates in June and July, 1775, have been preserved. One of them contains a sermon, delivered June 4th, by Rev. John Carmichael, and another (in July) contains the statement that, "By an express arrived at Philadelphia on Saturday last, we have the following account of the battle of Charlestown, on Saturday, the 18th of June last." Bailey subsequently removed to Philadelphia, where he published the Freeman's Journal.

<sup>1</sup> J. M. W. Geist, Esq., of the Lancaster Express, wrote a sketch of the newspaper press of the county for Mombert's History, published in 1869. From that sketch the present article on the press of the city is in part derived, but it contains much additional matter gathered from many sources.

That there was an interval between the establishment of the first paper in Lancaster and the appearance of those of the Revolutionary period is evident, from the fact that on the 3d of October, 1772, the burgesses ordered an account "of their proceedings to be published in the Pennsylvania Gazette and Journal, and that proper copies be made out and forwarded to the printers of those papers." It is altogether improbable that this would have been done had there been a home paper in existence.

The first paper established after the Revolution, concerning which any authentic information has descended to the present time, was a German journal, of which the name (translated) was the New Neutral Lancaster Newspaper and Reporter. This was first issued Aug. 1, 1787, by Steiner, Albrecht & Lahn, from "the new book printing establishment." Anton Steiner died April 16, 1788, in his twenty-fourth year, and the publication was continued by Albrecht & Lahn to 1794. This paper, as its files from 1787 to 1790 show, was printed almost entirely in German, but contained a few English advertisements. In 1787 the report of the first commencement of Franklin College was published. The office was originally on Queen Street, but was removed in October, 1789, "to Prince Street near the prison," which stood on the northwest corner of Prince and West King Streets.

Der Wahre Amerikaner was established at a later period than the paper of which we have just spoken, and probably after its suspension. It was in existence as early at least as 1799, and was published from that time on for many years. From the year mentioned until 1812, when Lancaster was the seat of the State government, the proprietors, Benjamin and Henry Grimler, were employed by the Legislature to do the State printing. Der Wahre Amerikaner was for many years the leading Democratic paper of the county, its editors being recognized as men of character and ability. Benjamin Grimler was elected to the Lower House of the Assembly in 1824, and died in 1832. His brother Henry, who was a talented and brilliant young man, died at the early age of thirty-six years in 1814.

We now come to the history of two papers, the Journal, established in 1794, and the Intelligencer in 1799, which, merged under the name of the latter, still exist.

The Lancaster Journal was issued in June, 1794, by Willcocks<sup>1</sup> & Hamilton, whose office was at "Euclid's Head," in King Street, nearly opposite Mr. Stoff's. It was a small sheet with three columns to the page, and the motto was, "Not too rash, yet not too fearful; open to all parties, but not influenced by any." In July, 1796, Mr. Willcocks retired, and William Hamilton continued the publication alone until January, 1819, when he made an assignment to Emanuel and E. C. Reigart, who, in 1820, sold it to Huss & Breiner. They published it exactly six months, and on July 7, 1820, were succeeded by John Reynolds (father of the late Gen. John F. Reynolds, Commodore William Reynolds, and Hon. James L. Reynolds). On May 9, 1834, Mr. Reynolds announced his retirement from the paper, and that it would be conducted henceforth by Hugh Maxwell. He removed the office from West King Street to the southwest angle of Court-House (now Centre) Square. Maxwell had at this time advertised proposals for a new paper to be called The Pennsylvania Gazette and Union Advertiser, and was favored with a good subscription list; but as the new paper projected was to have been of the same political principles as the Journal, the enterprise was merged in the old publication. In September, 1839, young John W. Forney, —who had learned the printer's trade with Maxwell, —a bright and ambitious lad, who had previously obtained control of the Intelligencer, bought the journal and consolidated the papers.

During these changes of ownership the Journal was at various times changed from weekly to semi-weekly, to tri-weekly, and back to weekly. As announced in his prospectus, the "printer" at the outset deemed himself a public servant, and his columns "open to all parties." In the Presidential campaign of 1796 the members of the State and Federal Legislature on either side fixed up a ticket of fifteen electors for Jefferson and as many for Adams. John Whitehill, of Lancaster City, was on the Jefferson ticket, and Robert Coleman on the Adams ticket, but both were elected. The contest was very close in the State, and though the Jefferson ticket generally prevailed, Coleman ran ahead of one of the electors on it. Flushed with his success, or annoyed at attacks on his candidate which had been made by correspondents of the Journal,—there being no editorial department,—Coleman and Charles Smith, Esq., an attorney-at-law, began what the Journal called "an attack on the liberty of the press" by taking advantage of court week to circulate a paper binding the signers to stop their subscriptions to the Journal. Hamilton, the publisher, submits the outrageous facts to the American public, and triumphantly announces that the bold attempt to "ruin a young man just entering upon the theatre of the world, and to trample under feet the sacred liberties of the press," had lost him only twenty-seven subscribers, though over two hundred were applied to, and mean time he gained thirty-five new patrons.

But gradually Hamilton drifted the paper into support of the Federal party, and continued to adhere to the varying fortunes of that political organization while it had vitality. During the Monroe administration and the resulting "era of good feeling" in American politics, the partisan lines on national questions became fainter, but in all State and local nominations the Journal continued to support the Federal (or Federal-Republican) nominees. In the memorable Presidential campaign of 1824, under Reynolds' control, it "hoped" for the election of Jackson, but acquiesced in the choice by Congress of Adams, though in 1828, when Jackson's election was sought by his friends in vindication of his defeat, the Journal ardently supported him, and continued to be a Democratic paper until its merger in the Intelligencer. It bore from time to time at the head of its columns patriotic sentiments from the public declarations of Washington and Jefferson.

The old newspapers differed very widely from the corresponding publications of to-day in that they allotted little space to local or editorial writing, it being taken for granted apparently that people knew what was going on about them and formed their own opinions; their political tone was largely expressed in contributions; to foreign events, State and Federal politics, and to advertisements the greater part of their limited space was given up. It is in the examination of the advertising columns that most of the facts bearing on the social and local events of the earlier days can be found.

Robert and William Dickson issued the first number of the Intelligencer from their office on North Queen Street on July 31, 1799, and Robert dying in September, 1802, his brother continued the publication until his own death in 1828. From the beginning it was consistently an anti-Federalist and Democratic journal, and took high rank among the organs of that party in the State. Its importance was enhanced by the incidents of its editor's prosecution and imprisonment for libel under the administration of Governor McKean. In its issue of February 11th it published some correspondence giving in detail rumors of corrupt overtures having been made to Henry Wertz, a State senator from Bedford County, by the Governor's secretaries. Within two days the grand jury, then in session, and consisting, as it was afterwards developed, of fourteen Federalists to five Anti-Federalists, indicted Dickson for libel. As the Legislature was then in session in Lancaster, and the witnesses on the spot, the editor promptly joined issue, and the trial began on Saturday morning, continuing all day Sunday, in the chamber of the House of Representatives. The Intelligencer records that "the examination of witnesses, arguments of counsel, and the charge of the court, excessively pointed, or rather point-blank against the defendant, occupied the sacred day till about sunset, when the jury retired." Dickson's paper further understands that "when they first withdrew to consider their verdict, notwithstanding the charge of the court, they were equally divided. Two Quakers who were on the jury, and another person not remarkable for Revolutionary services, were inflexible. The jury continued out till next day, when from their sufferings from cold and hunger they surrendered the defendant to the justice and mercy of the court by a verdict of 'guilty.'" Judges Henry and Coleman promptly sentenced Dickson to three months' imprisonment in the county jail, five hundred dollars fine, and the costs of prosecution. The petit jury contained ten Federalists to two Republicans.

During the period of his imprisonment in the county jail, Dickson edited his paper from there, where he dates an appeal to his subscribers in arrears, stating that his type is worn out, and addressing to them the additional "powerful argument" of the heavy fine imposed upon him. The press and his party generally of the State made much of what was held to be the persecution of Dickson. His fine and costs were paid by his friends; he was daily visited by members of the Legislature and politicians of high degree; was given a banquet in the jail, and out of respect to him the county meeting of his party was fixed upon the date of his release from confinement, and the event was made the occasion of a public reception. His wife behaved with much spirit and fortitude during his imprisonment, aided his editorial labors, and loftily scorned to ask the favor of any Executive pardon or commutation. After his death she conducted the newspaper, assisted by her son-in-law, Gunning Bedford, until his death, April 31, 1826. On July 4th of that same year, it was announced that Thomas Feran had been selected by Mrs. Dickson to publish and edit the paper for her. He continued in that capacity for a number of years, and was succeeded by James Flood, until in March, 1837, the office was sold to one of its apprentices, James H. Bryson, who took into partnership with him John W. Forney, then an apprentice to Maxwell in the Journal office. Forney secured the entire ownership and control of the paper during the year, and in September, 1839, he bought the Journal, consolidated the papers, and enlarged the new Intelligencer and Journal.

The enthusiasm and enterprise of the new editor gave his journal a commanding place in the politics and journalism of the State, which was maintained until he went to Philadelphia in 1845 as deputy surveyor of the port and established the Pennsylvanian. He left Marcus D. Holbrook as manager and part proprietor of the Intelligencer, and later Mr. Holbrook became sole owner, but soon transferred it to Franklin G. May, who on Jan. 1, 1848, sold it to Rev. E. W. Hutter, who, in turn, transferred it in July, 1849, to George Sanderson. Mr. Sanderson subsequently associated with him his son Alfred, and they continued it until July 18, 1864. Under their control it was an able and influential organ of the Democracy in the State, devoted to the political fortunes of Mr. Buchanan, and regarded as his "home organ." Their interest in the paper was purchased by a firm composed of John M. Cooper, H. G. Smith, W. A. Morton, and Alfred Sanderson, who established the daily in August, 1864, and who sold out to H. G. Smith and A. G. Steinman in November, 1866. Under their business and editorial management the paper acquired an unprecedented material prosperity and a professional standing and influence which has been continued under the present firm of Steinman & Hensel, Mr. Smith's half interest in the establishment having been purchased by W. U. Hensel in May, 1874. The Monthly was an illustrated publication, devoted to literature, art, and local history, and was published during the year 1875. In September, 1874, the Daily was materially enlarged, and important typographical improvements were made. These have continued since, and later the Weekly was greatly enlarged and changed to an eight-page paper, one of the largest in the State. The Intelligencer continues to be Democratic in politics, but its fearless and dispassionate criticisms of public men and measures without regard to party affiliation has made it an authority known and respected throughout the country. In the presentation of certain leading issues it has been conspicuously progressive and independent, having years ago taken and consistently maintained a position in favor of the limitation of corporate powers and privileges, against free passes, for municipal reform, and against all forms of political corruption. As a local newspaper its characteristics are the fullness, fairness, and accuracy of its reports of current events, in its general news columns it displays enterprise and judgment, and as an advertising medium it ranks high in the estimation of its patrons.

Both of its present editors are members of the Lancaster bar, and as such were the subjects of a proceeding that, like the persecution of their predecessor, William Dickson, before narrated, made them and their newspaper famous throughout the country, and gave them the opportunity to test a question of equal interest to the editorial and legal professions. In their daily issue of Jan. 20, 1880, it was alleged, substantially, that a certain imposition had been practiced upon the Court of Quarter Sessions of Lancaster County by some of the members of the bar and officers of the court; that there had been "a prostitution of the machinery of justice to serve the exigencies of the Republican party. But as all the parties implicated, as well as the judges, belong to that party, the court is unanimous—for once—that it need take no cognizance of the imposition practiced upon it and the disgrace attaching to it." For this they were summoned before the court by Judge Patterson, presiding, and upon their declaration that they declined to answer to the court as attorneys for their action as editors a rule was taken upon them to show cause why they should not be disbarred; subsequently, after argument of this rule, they were disbarred. Upon an appeal to the Supreme Court, argued for the editors by Hon. A. K. McClure and Rufus E. Shapley, and for the court by Hons. H. W. Palmer, attorney-general, Samuel H. Reynolds, and J. B. McPherson, the lower court was reversed and Messrs. Steinman and Hensel fully reinstated as members of the bar.

Reverting from this long history, extending down to the present, we find the early years of this century a period prolific of newspaper projects.

For a year or two prior to 1803 efforts had been made to start "a periodical literary work to be called The Hive." Charles McDonnell proposed publishing the first number on Wednesday, June 22, 1803. The office was at the sign of "The Bee Hive," a few doors east of the Leopard Hotel. The paper passed into the hands of William Hamilton in 1810.

Stacey Potts, Jr., editor, and William Green, printer, advertised July 19, 1808, that they proposed to publish a periodical work called the Gleaner, or Monthly Magazine, at three dollars per year.

The Constitutional Democrat was started early in 1810 by John R. Matthews, who met with such poor patronage that he offered his whole stock of material for sale in September of that year.

One of the papers started in this early period eventually became a success.

In July, 1808, the editor of the Lancaster Journal (William Hamilton), who had advertised for several months for a German editor, procured one, and on the 22d he announced that in about two weeks he would issue the first number of Der Volksfreund, a Federalist paper, the subscription price to be $1.50 per annum. The editor of whom he wrote was Joseph Ehrenfried. In February, 1809, Mr. Hamilton announced that he had formed "a connection with Mr. Peter Albright, late one of the publishers of the Amerikanische Staatsboth," and that "the Volksfreund will henceforward be published under the firm of Hamilton, Albright & Ehrenfried." Subsequently Mr. Hamilton became involved in pecuniary difficulties, and the establishment passed into Mr. Ehrenfried's possession at sheriff's sale. He did not make a success of the paper, and it was again sold by the sheriff in 1817, and purchased by John Bear and Samuel Kling. The latter retired the same year, and Mr. Bear became sole proprietor. The greater portion of the history of the Volksfreund being found in a sketch of this gentleman's life, we herewith insert it:

JOHN BEAR was born Jan. 31, 1797, in Leacock township, Lancaster Co., Pa., of parentage that is traced back to ancestors who came to this section of Pennsylvania among the Mennonites of Swiss origin about the year 1780. His father, Andrew Bear, was a farmer, who died in 1807, leaving a widow with several children. The family came to Lancaster in 1812, the widow having married again. The descendants of this family are found in Lancaster County, Western Pennsylvania, and the Western States, and among them have been citizens of prominence.

John Bear applied himself to the art of printing in the office of William Greer, in Columbia, Lancaster Co., and afterwards in the office of John Wyeth, in Harrisburg. In the twenty-first year of his age he formed a partnership with Samuel Kling for the publication of the Volksfreund. In a few months he became sole proprietor of the paper by the purchase of the interest of Samuel Kling. In 1834 he purchased the Lancaster Beobachter from Samuel Wagner, and combined the two papers under the title of Der Volksfreund und Beobachter (in English, The People's Friend and Observer). He was now firmly established in the confidence of the public, and entered on a prosperous career, which continued until his death. He developed remarkable enterprise in the publication of many books of miscellaneous, moral, and religious character, besides the regular issue of the German newspaper, English and German almanacs, and printing-work in general.

In 1819 he published a large German folio Bible, the first German Bible in folio printed in this country, the prospectus of which appeared in the first number of the paper published by himself. It was an enterprise of considerable risk, and attended with many difficulties, owing to the primitive character of the printing machinery and apparatus then in use. It was printed on an ancient Ramage hand-press, inked by hand-balls, and yet the work was a success and compares favorably with work of more modern facilities.

His ancestry secured for him the favor of the Mennonites of his native country, and by industry and integrity he gained their patronage and support, and became the publisher of many of the religious books used by that denomination. With the people of Lancaster County, especially those of German origin, he exerted an influence through the columns of the Volksfreund which he conscientiously used for the best interests of the community. By appointment he was for a number of years treasurer of Lancaster County.

In 1828 he continued the publication of the "Agricultural Almanac," formerly published by William Albright, and in 1833 commenced the publication of the "German Pennsylvania Almanac," which were published until his death, and have been continued by his sons. These almanacs have become household friends in Pennsylvania and the Western States.

In the year 1820 he married Frances Rine, of Lancaster City, a daughter of a Lutheran family of German origin, by whom he had five sons, who grew to the age of manhood. Of his sons, Reuben A. Baer and Christian R. Baer have succeeded him in the business of the house under the firm of John Baer's Sons; another son, Rev. Charles A. Baer, was pastor of the English Lutheran Church at Norristown, Pa., where he died in September, 1863; another, Benjamin F. Baer, was a lawyer of promise, who became a captain in the One Hundred and Twenty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers in the war of the Rebellion, from which position he was obliged to retire by broken health, which led to his death in 1875; another, John A. Baer, is engaged in business in New York City.

As a citizen the subject of this notice was a man of honor and integrity, and was animated by sincere desire to advance the interests of the community. He was a member of the board of common schools of Lancaster City in the early stage of their existence, and evinced a great interest in their success, knowing the value of a good education. Liberal and unassuming, though firm in his convictions, he won the esteem and respect of his fellow-citizens. He was a faithful husband and a kind father, leading his children, by education and example, in the path of truth and uprightness. Endowed with a vigorous form and a strong constitution, he drew unsparingly on his energies in the prosecution of his business, which led to failing health and a shortened life. He died Nov. 6, 1858, in the sixty-second year of his age.

Notice appeared Nov. 19, 1816, of the Lancaster Patriot, to be soon published by Messrs. W. Harrington and M. B. Roberts, but if the paper ever was issued it did not long continue to be.

Hugh Maxwell established an influential and successful newspaper in 1817, under the name of the Lancaster Gazette. He continued the publication for a number of years, and subsequently became owner of the Journal. Maxwell was a native of Ireland, but came when quite a youth to Philadelphia, where he was engaged in editing magazines of high repute. He made his advent in Lancaster the same year that he established the Gazette. He had some mechanical as well as literary ability, and was the inventor, in 1817, of the "printer's roller" used in conjunction with the old-fashioned hand-press.

Samuel C. Stambaugh, a noted Democratic politician of the time, issued proposals in February, 1819, for the publication of the Free Press, the first number of which was brought out as soon as he had received a sufficient number of subscriptions to warrant the enterprise. The paper was merged with the Political Sentinel, to which name Literary Gazette was subsequently added. Stambaugh advertised, Oct. 2, 1827, that he was going to Harrisburg to establish the Democratic Herald and Pennsylvania Reporter, and the publication of the Sentinel was continued by Nathan Siegfried and Lewis H. Wiggins.

Die Stimme des Volks was published some time prior to 1822, by Jacob Shrier. On the 7th of September of that year the paper had probably been discontinued, as the subscribers were notified that their accounts had been left at the Intelligencer book-store, where they were "earnestly invited to call and make payment."

The prospectus of the Lancaster Eagle, a German Democratic paper, was issued by Baab & Ville, Oct. 26, 1826, and about the same time Herman W. Ville published an English paper called the Standard of Liberty.

Cyrus S. Jacobs brought out, Oct. 3, 1827, the first number of the Lancaster Reporter, which earnestly supported the administration of Adams.

In 1828, Benjamin Grimler again began publishing a German paper, Der Lancaster Wahre Amerikaner, which was the name also of his earlier publication heretofore mentioned. Francis Frank was editor of this paper in 1833, and in 1840, after Grimler's death, it was bought by Jacob Myers, who changed the name to Wahre Demokrat.

Among the large number of newspapers and miscellaneous prints launched on the sea of public favor (or disfavor) at this period were William Piatt's Bouquet, or Ladies' Literary Portfolio, announced in 1829; C. W. Fenton's Keepsake, a Christmas and Now Year's gift; Cyrus Jacob's Anti-Masonic Opponent, commenced in 1829 or 1830.

Theophilus Fenn and Dr. Thomas W. Vesey (son of the Governor of Maryland) had located in New Holland in 1828, and established, under the patronage of the Anti-Masonic leaders, the Anti-Masonic Herald, the first number having been issued June 27th. In April, 1828, they removed this paper to Lancaster. In 1831, Mr. Fenn removed to Harrisburg, where he started the well-known Telegraph, which he conducted with great vigor until 1854, when he returned to Lancaster to conduct the Independent Whig and Inland Daily. The Anti-Masonic Herald was carried on after Fenn's departure until 1834, when it was absorbed by the Examiner.

The Lancaster Examiner was established by Samuel Wagner, who came to Lancaster from York, and the first number was issued on Thursday, April 15, 1830. In April, 1834, Mr. Wagner sold the Examiner to George W. Hammersly and Luther Richards, who united with it the Anti-Masonic Herald (owned by Mr. Hammersly), and on Thursday, April 10, 1834, the paper appeared as The Lancaster Examiner and Herald. Hammersly & Richards continued the publication of it until April 15, 1838, when they sold it to Robert W. Middleton. On Dec. 2, 1841, Edward C. Darlington purchased an interest in the paper, and it was published by Middleton & Darlington until the 22d of the same month, when Edward C. Darlington became the sole owner. He continued the publication of it until Oct. 20, 1858, when it passed into the hands of John A. Hiestand, John F. Huber, and Francis Heckert, who published the paper under the firm-name of Hiestand, Huber & Heckert. On Nov. 4, 1862, John F. Huber died, and on Feb.

9, 1863, Edmund M. Kline, who had been connected with the editorial department, purchased the interest of Mr. Huber, and the name of the firm was changed to John A. Hiestand & Co.

On Jan. 1, 1864, this firm purchased from Thomas E. and John J. Cochran The Lancaster Union. It was published on Saturday, and the Examiner on Wednesday, and, for the convenience of subscribers, part of the edition of the Examiner, after the consolidation, was printed on Saturday and part on Wednesday. This was continued until January, 1879, and since that date the Examiner has been issued on Wednesday. Mr. Heckert sold out his interest in the paper on May 1, 1864, John I. Hartman becoming the purchaser, the firm-name then being Hiestand, Kline & Hartman. On May 1, 1868, Mr. Hartman withdrew from the firm, and Hiestand & Kline continued in its publication until 1874, when, owing to failing health, Mr. Kline withdrew, since which time John A. Hiestand has been the sole proprietor. On July 1, 1872, Mr. Hiestand began the publication of a daily paper, and since that time the Daily and Weekly Examiner has been regularly issued. In 1876 the printing-office of the Daily and Weekly Express was purchased at public sale by Mr. Hiestand and merged in the Examiner.

The Lancaster Examiner and the Anti-Masonic Herald, both before and after the consolidation, were exponents of the principles of the Anti-Masonic party. After the failure of the Anti-Masonic party the cause of the Whigs, under the leadership of Henry Clay, was advocated, and in 1856 the Examiner espoused the cause of the Republican party, advocating the election of John C. Fremont for the Presidency against James Buchanan, a citizen of Lancaster, and it has supported every Republican candidate for President and Governor of this State ever since.

The Daily Examiner is printed on a sheet twenty-six and one-half by forty and one-half inches, contains four pages of eight columns each. The Weekly Examiner is double the size of the daily, being printed on two sheets each twenty-six and one-half by forty and one-half inches, making eight pages of eight columns each, or sixty-four columns in all.

In January, 1831, Cyrus S. Jacobs was publishing the Lancaster Republican, and then advertised it for sale, as he intended moving West. A year later he published proposals for issuing a paper at Harrisburg.

The initial number of the Inciter, an educational paper, was published by Kirk & Gilbert, June 21, 1838. The Lancaster County Temperance Society began to agitate the subject of printing a paper this year, and bought out the Temperance Register early in January, 1834. In 1834 or 1835 the Lancaster Miscellany was published by Redmond Conyngham.

The Lancaster Union was started May 24, 1834, by John L. Boswell, then of the Columbia Spy. On the 28th of November of the same year he formed a partnership with Carpenter McCleery. It was published by these gentlemen until 1835, when the latter became sole proprietor. On the 9th of April, 1839, A. H. Hood purchased the office, and he conducted the paper from that time until Oct. 18, 1842, when he sold to Henry Montgomery. The Union was merged with The Independent Whig in 1831.

The Old Guard, a Whig paper, was published by the friends of Hon. John Strohm in 1839-40. This paper was sold to Lloyd Jones & Co., and eventually swelled the strength of the Examiner.

The Buckeye was another campaign paper of 1840, owned by R. W. Middleton. The Mill-Boy, edited by E. C. Darlington, was a notable paper of the canvass of 1844, and the Rough and Ready, by John J. Jones, and the Grape-Shot, by R. W. Middleton, were popular in 1848. The National Whig appeared in 1851, and The Scott Bugle, from the office of The Independent Whig, in 1852.

James H. Bryson, J. H. Pearsoll, and James Wimer issued the initial number of the Semi-Weekly Gazette, Aug. 19, 1839, and four months later transformed it into a temperance weekly, under the name of The Age. It was a well-conducted paper, but not successful financially, and was discontinued in 1842.

Some time subsequent to 1840, Jacob Meyers started a paper devoted to the interests of the workingmen, called The Workingmen's Press. In 1846 it was united with the American Republican, which in 1850 lost its identity in the Inquirer.

A Whig publication, called The Tribune and Advertiser, was started by R. W. Middleton in 1846, and continued in existence about two years, at the expiration of that time being merged with the Union, under the name of the Union and Tribune.

The Lancaster Weekly Express (from which was ultimately developed the daily) "was started by John H. Pearsoll, Feb. 10, 1848, as a six-column paper. In August, 1849, Mr. Meeser purchased an interest in the office, which he resold, however, to the original proprietor in the following year. Mr. Pearsoll then enlarged the paper, and, assisted by various editorial writers, conducted it until August, 1856, as sole proprietor. Up to this time the Express was the recognized organ of the temperance element, and politically neutral. On the 1st of August, J. M. W. Geist, who had been the managing editor since 1852, purchased a half interest in the paper, when the weekly was again enlarged, and arrangements made for issuing the Daily Express, which made its appearance Nov. 3, 1856. In the mean time the Kansas troubles having assumed the magnitude of a great national question, the Express abandoned its neutrality and advocated the formation of the Republican party, calling the first meeting which convened for that purpose May 31, 1856." The Express continued to be published until 1876, when it was purchased by the proprietors of the Examiner and merged with that paper.

In May, 1844, the Lancaster Democrat was started, with Henry Hays publisher, and Col. John Forsythe Carter editor. Mr. Hays was succeeded as publisher by William B. Wiley, who subsequently sold out to the editor, Col. Carter. In 1845, Patrick Donnelly became publisher, and in his hands the paper remained until its suspension.

In the same year that the Democrat was started the American Republican had its origin. It was established by David S. Kieffer as an organ of the "Native American" party, and was published by him until 1846, when he sold out to Jacob Myers, who united the paper with the Press.

The Moral Reformer was another paper of 1844, started by the Rev. Henry Miller. It was a small temperance weekly, and not a pecuniary success. J. M. W. Geist became the proprietor on July 4, 1844, six months after the paper was first issued, and he subsequently enlarged it and changed its title to the American Reformer. It was suspended in 1845, but revived for a short time at Harrisburg.

Eli Bowen commenced in 1845 the publication of a large agricultural paper called The Lancaster County Farmer, but the paper was soon suspended because of inadequate capital. Jacob B. Garber becoming associated with Mr. Bowen, the paper was revived, and through the expenditure of a large amount of money and exercise of good judgment it was put upon a paying basis. The name was changed to The Farmer and Literary Gazette. The establishment was bought by Aaron, Eshleman & Gochnauer in 1849, and they were succeeded by W. H. & A. M. Spangler, who finally merged the paper with the Examiner.

The Lancasterian made its appearance on Jan. 1, 1848, as an advocate of Cass Democracy. Its proprietor, Marcus D. Holbrook, sold out Oct. 23, 1852, to Henry S. Myers and William B. Wiley. One year later the junior member of the firm became sole proprietor. The Lancasterian was hostile to the election of Mr. Buchanan to the Presidency, and on the 12th of October, 1855, the subscription-list was purchased by his friends, and united with that of the Intelligencer.

A monthly magazine called The Guardian, devoted to social, religious, and literary matters, and designed especially for the young, was started at Lewisburg, Pa., in 1849, by the Rev. Henry Harbaugh, and removed to Lancaster in 1850. It was bought soon afterwards by Pearsoll & Geist, who in 1863 transferred the property to S. R. Fisher & Co., of Philadelphia. In 1864, Rev. Benjamin Bausman succeeded Dr. Harbaugh as editor.

The Independent Whig was established in November, 1851, by a joint stock company, at the head of which was Hon. Thaddeus Stevens. It was started as an organ of the anti-slavery Whigs, in opposition to the Examiner, which was then conservative on that question. The old Union was bought, and its subscription-list was made the basis of the new paper. The Independent Whig was at first edited by Edward McPherson, since clerk of the House of Representatives at Washington, assisted by E. H. Rauch. The latter retired in the fall of 1853, and Mr. McPherson soon after resigned the management. He was succeeded by Theophilus Fenn as publisher and Harvey L. Goodall as editor of the daily, which was afterwards enlarged and called the Inland Daily Times. Mr. Schroyer took charge in 1834 and remained two years. In the summer of 1855 the Inland Weekly was started as an organ of the "American" movement, and about the same time the Whig was published as a semi-weekly. The various enterprises proving a pecuniary loss to the company, Mr. Fenn became the owner of the concern. He finally sold out to Thomas E. and J. J. Cochran, Sept. 21, 1858, who discontinued the Daily Times and changed the name of the weekly to the Lancaster Union. On Jan. 1, 1863, the Messrs. Cochran sold to J. A. Hiestand & Co., who consolidated the paper with the Examiner.

In January, 1852, Thomas H. Burrowes issued the first number of the Pennsylvania School Journal, which was established as the organ of the "Lancaster County Educational Association," and six months later made a State organ of the common school cause. Professor J. P. McCaskey became associated with Mr. Burrowes in May, 1866.

In December, 1853, H. A. Rockafeld started the Public Register as an independent paper. In June, 1854, under John F. Huber, who succeeded to the ownership, changed the name of the paper to the Public Register and American Citizen, and made it an organ of the "American," or "Know-Nothing" party. M. M. Rohrer became a partner a few months afterwards. The firm of Huber & Rohrer was succeeded by Walter G. Evans, and he in turn gave place to Jacob Myers, who consolidated it with the Press.

In 1852, E. H. Rauch published the Mechanics' Counsellor, devoted to the interests of the Order of American Mechanics.

The Conestoga Chief, a small paper devoted to the interests of the Independent Order of Red Men, was started by Harvey L. Goodall in 1855.

The Temperance Advocate, a weekly, was started by E. S. Speaker in October, 1858, and continued about three years.

The Morning Herald, a daily, was published for about two months subsequent to June 25, 1859, by E. S. Speaker.

The Lancaster Inquirer (weekly) was started on the 1st of January, 1859, by Stuart A. Wylie, Jacob D. Gompf, and J. W. Gaintner, under the firm-name of Stuart A. Wylie & Co. It was a six-column paper, but was enlarged to seven columns on the following 1st of September, when the firm bought out the American Press and Republican from Jacob Myers & Son, and united it with the Inquirer. In 1860, Mr. Wylie bought out the interests of Messrs. Gompf and Gaintner, and became the sole proprietor. In July, 1862, he began the publication of the daily Inquirer, which was continued until Feb. 13, 1864. In the spring of 1868 a half interest in the paper was purchased by Elwood Griest, by whom the paper was subsequently edited. In July, 1871, the Inquirer was enlarged to a nine-column paper, and printed on a sheet thirty-one by forty-six inches, its present size.

After the death of Mr. Wylie, which occurred in June, 1872, the Inquirer, with the printing establishment, passed into the hands of the Inquirer Printing and Publishing Company, Mr. Griest being retained as editor. In February, 1876, it was sold by the company to Elwood Griest, who has been from that time its sole proprietor. It was printed by the Inquirer Company until the destruction of their office by fire in January, 1882, when it was printed for a short time at the Examiner office. On the 1st of July following it was removed to 26 South Queen Street, where it is now printed and published. During the political campaign of 1860 the Inquirer supported Mr. Douglas for the Presidency. Since that time it has been Republican.

STUART ALEXANDER WYLIE, founder of the "Inquirer Printing House," Lancaster, was born in the city of Lancaster, Jan. 25, 1840, and died here on June 12, 1872. He was graduated from the high school in 1856, and for a year or more was a teacher. Here, as always, "what his hand found to do, he did with his might," and his school, from being the worst in the district, soon had the reputation of being the best. He established free night-schools for those unable to attend in the daytime, debates, and himself prepared stated lectures upon such topics as he thought would interest the people of the neighborhood, historical characters being his favorite subjects. Unfortunately for school interests, he turned away from the school-room and its work to what he imagined a broader field, one in which more brilliant success was to be won. He learned the printing business in the old Whig newspaper office, a weekly, published by Theophilus Fenn. He at the same time studied phonography with Harvey Goodall, editor of the Inland Daily, and took a position as local reporter upon that paper. About 1859 he purchased the Pathfinder, an advertising sheet, from John F. Huber, changing its name to the Weekly Inquirer. He soon after purchased from Jacob Myers the Press and Republican, and united it with the Inquirer, which at once took a prominent place among Lancaster newspapers. During the war he issued a Daily Inquirer, which suspended after two years' publication. He formed a copartnership with Elwood Griest, and in 1868 they erected the large and elegant building in which the Inquirer was printed. It was one of the finest establishments in the State, and gave employment to between one and two hundred workmen.

The writer of this sketch can do no better than use the following quotations from the pens of those who knew him and his work:

"He was a man of extraordinary capacities and aptitudes for business, and through his indomitable energy and activity he built up one of the most extensive and completely-furnished printing establishments in the State. Young, active, genial, hopeful, and of tireless energy, he had a rare combination of generous and manly qualities which inspired the sympathy, the confidence, and the strong attachment of his many friends."—Lutheran Observer.

"Mr. Wylie's intellect was of a peculiar cast; profound, bright, clear, active, and incisive. He was a ready writer and speaker, and in some departments of literature would have excelled; but his great forte was business. He had a wonderful faculty of gathering up and mastering the details of any particular branch of trade or manufacture, and would in a short time be as familiar with it as many who had made it the study of their lives. To this he was largely indebted for the rapid building up of the establishment with which his name will ever be connected."—Lancaster Inquirer.

"We loved him, not for his wonderful business tact, not for his marvelous acuteness of thought, not for his almost superhuman energy and perseverance, not for his inexorable ambition, not for the almost limitless range of his capacities which stamped him as an extraordinary man, but for his second sober thought, his deep and serious insight, his inner life, so separate from his business life, and so prized by those who knew him best. Here he was a companion indeed, a reinforcer of hope and courage, a dispenser of comfort, an inciter to nobler thoughts and deeper feelings, a friend that could not be spared. To know him only in his business life was to know him not at all; to know him in the life he lived for his friends—that higher life which embraces the deeper realities of being and reverently acknowledges a Divine presence—was to love him.

"He was an extraordinary man, and yet but thirty-three years old. In ten years, by his marvelous energy, intellect, and industry, he had created out of nothing one of the largest printing-houses in the country. In ten years he did the labor of a life-time. He died from overwork of body and mind—a victim to his ambition and his will; to that white heat of business competition and business creation which is devastating the country."—Pennsylvanian.

At the time of his decease he was a member and officer in several secret organizations of the county and State, and his name loomed up above all others as the next Vice-Grand Chancellor of the Knights of Pythias of Pennsylvania.

His wife, Mary Amanda, was the only daughter of George Brubaker, a lawyer of Lancaster, who, after the death of her husband, became the wife of Eugene H. Munday, of Philadelphia.

William Wylie, a weaver, and his wife, Agnes, both natives of Ireland, settled at Lancaster from Ireland in 1805. They were of Scotch-Irish extraction. David, son of William, born in Lancaster in 1806, died in 1862, and was a cooper here for thirty years. His wife, Elizabeth (1800-1870), a native of Ireland and of Scotch-Irish extraction, came to Soudersburg, Lancaster Co., from Ireland. After the death of her father, James Hamilton, with her mother and two brothers, William and James; the brothers settling in Pittsburgh, Pa. Their children, who grew to manhood, are Agnes, Mary J., David H., Stuart Alexander (subject of this sketch), and William T. Wylie.

In 1859 the Church Advocate, which had been established in 1835, at Harrisburg, as the Gospel Publisher, under the auspices of "the Church of God," and subsequently edited under the title first given by Mr. Weinbrenner, was removed to Lancaster. Its first editor here was the Rev. E. H. Thomas.

In 1860, Samuel B. Markley published, as a campaign paper in the interest of the Bell and Everett party, The Constitution. Mr. Markley began publishing the same year a monthly Educational Record, of which F. L. Saunders was editor.

During the campaign of 1864 the Father Abraham was started at Reading as a campaign paper by E. H. Rauch & Son, revived in 1866, and in 1868 transplanted to Lancaster, where it was continued for some time after the campaign as a weekly.

The Keystone Good Templar was started in 1866 as the Monthly Circular by the Grand Lodge of Good Templars. The paper was changed to a weekly in 1869.

The Sunday-School Gem was issued from the office of the Church Advocate in January, 1867. It was edited by Rev. E. H. Thomas.

The Lancaster Farmer had its origin in 1869. In the spring of 1868 some of the members of the Lancaster County Agricultural and Horticultural Society conceived the idea of publishing a "Year Book," to contain the essays read before the society as well as the important reports on grain and fruit culture, and the standing resolutions that relate to the permanent interests of the same, and made suggestions to that effect at the April meeting of that year; whereupon a committee of five was appointed, consisting of S. S. Rathvon, chairman; Alexander Harris, J. M. Frantz, Dr. W. S. Diffenderfer, and H. M. Engle. This committee reported that the journal ought to be published quarterly. After further consideration, it was decided to publish monthly.

Efforts were made during the summer to obtain subscriptions sufficient to warrant the publication. This was successful, and arrangements were made with Wylie & Griest to publish the journal.

At a stated meeting held Dec. 7, 1868, the society adopted the name of Lancaster Farmer, and took definite steps to inaugurate the publication. It named J. B. Garber, H. M. Engel, L. S. Reist, Drs. W. S. Diffenderfer, J. H. Musser, S. S. Rathvon as editors, and Dr. P. W. Hiestand, H. K. Stoner, J. M. Frantz, Alexander Harris, Esq., Casper Hiller, and L. W. Groff as publishing committee, and early in the month of January, 1869, the first number of the journal was issued in royal octavo form, and "under the auspices of the Lancaster County Agricultural and Horticultural Society."

At the end of the first year the editorial and publishing committees were dispensed with, and S. S. Rathvon and Alexander Harris were appointed editors by the society, and they also, in connection with Mr. Wylie, became the responsible publishers. At the end of the second volume S. S. Rathvon discontinued his relation as one of the publishers, but continued as senior editor, and his place in the publishing firm was supplied by John B. Devlin. Subsequently Mr. Wylie also withdrew from the publishing firm, and for a few months the publication was conducted by Harris & Devlin, Mr. Harris also acting as associate editor.

At the commencement of the fourth volume a part-norship was entered into between Messrs. Harris and Devlin, in which only the name of Devlin appeared as publisher, and Rathvon and Harris as editors, and this relation continued until January, 1873, at the commencement of the fifth volume, when Mr. Devlin became the sole publisher, and Mr. Rathvon the sole editor, Mr. Harris having retired. During the publication of the sixth volume Mr. Devlin acted as associate editor, in addition to his function as publisher; and on the completion of that volume he transferred all his "right, title, and interest" in the Lancaster Farmer to the firm of Pearsol & Geist, editors and publishers of the Daily and Weekly Express, by whom it was continued until the end of the eighth volume in December, 1876, Mr. Rathvon having been retained as editor. Under the publication of Messrs. Pearsol and Geist, the journal was changed from an octavo to a quarto, and illustrations with various other improvements added thereto, but the increase in its patronage was not in a ratio with the cost of these improvements.

At the commencement of the ninth volume the printing and publishing establishment of Pearsol & Geist had passed, by public sale, into the hands of John A. Hiestand, Esq., and was consolidated with the Lancaster Examiner, but Mr. Hiestand declined to continue the Farmer. Through the special efforts of the Agricultural and Horticultural Society the subscription-list was increased, and Linnæus Rathvon was induced to become publisher, S. S. Rathvon having the editorial control, and this relation was continued until the end of the tenth volume, when the Lancaster Farmer, by purchase, became the sole property of John A. Hiestand, Esq., publisher of the Daily and Weekly Examiner, and has been continued by him down to the present period, retaining S. S. Rathvon as sole editor.

The first distinctly agricultural journal published in Lancaster County was commenced by A. M. Spangler, in January, 1851. It was an octavo in form, but at the end of the second year it was removed to West Chester, Chester Co., and subsequently from thence to Philadelphia, where it was afterwards merged in the Progressive Farmer. It was entitled the Pennsylvania Farm Journal, and under that title completed seven volumes. Subsequently a folio, entitled the Lancaster County Farmer, hitherto mentioned, was published in Lancaster City by Jacob B. Garber and others, but it did not continue its existence even as long as the Farm Journal. The publication of the Lancaster Farmer is, therefore, the third attempt to sustain an agricultural journal within the county.

The Mechanics' Advocate, organ of the order of United American Mechanics, was first issued in April, 1869, with W. T. Wylie as editor.

The Voice of Truth, a temperance paper, published monthly, was started also in 1869.

Among the comparatively new newspapers of Lancaster City and County is Die Laterne, a German weekly, established in January, 1871, by the Messrs. Joseph and Gottlieb Schmied, the editor at the time of establishing being Herr von Bülow. In 1872, Professor F. W. Haas entered upon his duties as editor, and in 1873 the latter purchased the interest of Joseph Schmied, thereby entering into a copartnership with Gottlieb Schmied. In January of the same year the last-named firm began the publication of a daily edition, the Daily Laterne, which, however, suspended after an unsuccessful career of five months. The weekly edition of Die Laterne was continued by the firm until 1874, at which time Professor Haas retired, having disposed of his interest to Gottlieb Schmied, the senior partner. From this time until in the fall of 1879, Die Laterne was more or less unfortunate. Financial embarrassment compelled Mr. Schmied to sell his newspaper, and in September, 1879, the same was purchased by the Messrs. Seibert & Schneider. From this date on the management of the newspaper, together with the political stand-point taken by the new publishers, assured to the Laterne certain success, and with hard struggling increased the circulation doubly in a very short time. Politically (since 1879) Die Laterne has advocated independent Democratic principles, never encouraging the ring system or the spoils of office. In December, 1880, Mr. Seibert retired from the firm, and sold his interest to the present publisher, J. H. Schneider, and through his increasing efforts to publish a paper for the people, it was worked with success, and to-day stands in the front ranks of German journalism.

Encouraged by the immense success in the last two years of Die Laterne, Mr. Schneider, together with Professor Carl Matz, decided to publish a daily, and on the 23d day of October, 1882, the first edition of the daily Lancaster Freie Presse was issued. From the very start it was evident that the German population of Lancaster City and adjoining towns appreciated the efforts of the publishers in giving the German population a daily newspaper, and its success was assured. The daily is a seven-column sheet, twenty-four by thirty-six, and contains all telegraphic as well as local news of the day. It is the only home-printed German daily in Pennsylvania between Philadelphia and Pittsburgh. In January, 1883, Professor Matz retired from the firm, and it is now published by the remaining partner, J. H. Schneider.

Der Christliche Kundschafter was removed to Lancaster in 1872 from Auburn, Schuylkill Co., where it was founded in 1869. The editor, J. F. Weishampel, continued the publication under the original name until April, 1882, when it was printed in both English and German under the titles Weishampel's Torch of Truth and Fackel der Wahrheit. The paper is published in the interests of religion, but is independent as regards denominationalism.

The first number of the daily edition of The New Era journal was published on the 28th of April, 1877, and of the weekly edition on Saturday, the 5th of May, following. Mr. J. M. W. Geist, who had been the editor of the Express since 1852, and one of the proprietors and publishers since 1856, when he projected the daily edition of that journal, accepted the position of co-editor of the Examiner and Express, after the purchase of the latter by Mr. John A. Hiestand, and its consolidation with the Examiner, in December, 1876. This relation continued only until March 14, 1877, when, owing to difference of opinion between the editor and proprietor, growing out of the election of Hon. J. D. Cameron to the United States Senate, Mr. Geist resigned. As he had represented and given expression to the independent Republican sentiment of the county since the organization of the party, in which he took an active part, a strong desire was manifested to have him establish a journal which should reflect the independent sentiment created and fostered by him through the Express. Various propositions were made to raise capital through a stock company, but none of these proving satisfactory, ex-Senator John B. Warfel proposed to advance the necessary means for the purchase of an entirely new plant, and to supply the necessary capital to put the new journal on a paying basis. His offer was promptly accepted.

Although the enterprise was started in a period of great business depression, its success exceeded the most sanguine expectation of its friends. At the end of the first year the circulation of the weekly edition exceeded that of any of its local cotemporaries, and the daily was steadily gaining in public favor and patronage. At the end of the fifth year the official record kept by the Lancaster postmaster showed that The New Era circulated as many copies through that channel as all the other local newspapers and periodicals combined. At the end of its sixth year it had paid back all its capital and doubled its plant, its job-printing department being one of the most complete of its class in the State, besides leaving for its editor, who had no capital to put in it, a full half-interest, when the firm was changed to Warfel & Geist. In founding The New Era some innovations were made on the old Lancaster style of make-up, which were severely criticised by its local cotemporaries, such as placing the latest news, general and local, on the outside form, and refusing to print cuts or bold type in its advertisements; but experience has proven the wisdom of adopting and adhering to what the name of the paper signified,—a new era in local journalism. During the first eight months the daily edition of The New Era was a six-column folio (twenty-two by thirty-two), and the weekly a six-column quarto. It was then enlarged to a seven-column folio for the daily, and a double folio of the same size (twenty-five by thirty-six) for the weekly, the sheets of the latter being folded one within the other. This also was a new departure in rural journalism, but it is now being generally followed. During the pressure from advertisements of real estate the weekly edition is enlarged by adding from two to four extra pages, the usual quantity and variety of reading matter being thus maintained. The original staff of The New Era was composed of John B. Warfel, publisher; J. M. W. Geist, editor; Frank R. Diffenderfer, associate editor; John J. Cochran, managing news editor, assisted by James D. Landis, with Walter Kieffer and George W. Mason on the local news department, and B. S. Shindle in charge of the business office. All of these except Mr. Diffenderfer had been associated with Mr. Geist on the Express. The only changes since occurring have been made by death, Mr. Landis having been promoted to the position made vacant by the death of Mr. Cochran, and Thomas McElligott taking the place of Mr. Mason, deceased.

JOHN B. WARFEL, son of John (1798-1846) and Maria (Eshleman) Warfel, grandson of Jacob and Mary Warfel, great-grandson of Henry (died in 1810) and Margaret Warfel, and great-great-grandson of George Warfel, one of the earliest settlers in Martie township, and from whom it is believed all of the name in Lancaster County have descended, was born in Paradise township, Lancaster Co., Sept. 19, 1830. His father was appointed recorder of deeds for Lancaster County in 1836 by Governor Joseph Ritner. One brother, Jacob E. (1826-1855), attracted favorable attention by eminent artists for his talent in drawing and painting. John B. Warfel received his early education in the public schools, at the Strasburg Academy, and at Lewisburg University, and for several years was a teacher in the village schools of Paradise and Strasburg. In 1854 he commenced farming, and in connection therewith surveying and conveyancing. In 1855 he was elected a justice of the peace for Paradise township, and re-elected in 1860, serving also as school director in that township for several terms, and for some time as the district superintendent. In 1863 he was appointed an examiner in the Pension Department of the government at Washington, and removed thence with his family. In 1864 he registered at Columbia College as a law student, pursued his studies in connection with his official duties, and was graduated in the class of 1867. He was at once admitted to practice in the courts of Washington City, and the same year in the courts of Lancaster County. In 1867, Mr. Warfel was appointed assessor of internal revenue for the Ninth Pennsylvania District (Lancaster County), resigned his position in the Pension Department, and discharged the duties of assessor until 1869. He was elected State senator from Lancaster County in the latter year, re-elected in 1872, and again in 1875, and during his incumbency of that office served as chairman of the standing Committees on Federal Relations, Education, Private Claims and Damages, Railroads, Pensions and Gratuities, and also on the Finance, Judiciary Local, Library, and Constitutional Reform Committees.

In 1876 he was chosen one of the Republican electors for Pennsylvania that cast the vote of the State for President Hayes. Mr. Warfel has served for a number of years as a member and president of the Lancaster City School Board, president of the Lancaster County Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals since its organization in 1872, and the public drinking fountains in the city were erected mainly through his influence. He was president of the Howard Association for a number of years, and organized courses of lectures and public entertainments, the proceeds of which mostly sustained the association. He has been a member of the Board of Trustees of the State Normal School at Millersville since March, 1872, is a member of the Board of Trustees of Lancaster Cemetery, of Lodge 48, A. Y. M., and of Lancaster Commandery, No. 13, and he is a trustee in charge of several large private estates. In the spring of 1877, in connection with J. M. W. Geist, Mr. Warfel commenced the publication of The New Era at Lancaster, a daily and weekly newspaper, in which business he is still engaged. His wife, Mary, is the eldest daughter of Col. Isaac and Susan Carvin, of Strasburg township. Their children are Ila, wife of William F. Boyer, of Lancaster; Jessie F. and John G. Warfel, and Robert, who died young.

J. M. W. GEIST, the oldest journalist connected with the Lancaster press, is a native of Bart township, Lancaster Co., Pa., and was born Dec. 14, 1824. He is of German-Scotch parentage. His parents were unable to afford him opportunities for an education beyond those of the common schools of the neighborhood. These he improved to the utmost, and at the early age of sixteen years began teaching school, and at the same time, through the persuasion of friends, rather than of his own inclination, prosecuted the study of medicine. When eighteen he removed to Philadelphia with the intention of attending medical lectures, but finding the medical profession not in accord with his tastes and aspirations, he turned his attention to printing and journalism. After learning the business of stereotyping and printing, in the mean time contributing to The Dollar Newspaper and one or two Lancaster journals, he removed to Lancaster City about the 1st of July, 1844, and entered upon his career in journalism as a profession as editor and publisher of the American Reformer. Lack of means compelled the relinquishment of the enterprise, but he subsequently renewed it at Harrisburg in connection with the late U. J. Jones, but the enterprise again failed for want of support. In 1846 he edited an independent Democratic campaign paper called the Yeoman, which was largely instrumental in defeating William B. Forster, the Democratic candidate for canal commissioner. In 1847 he was for a short period news editor of the Pennsylvanian, then published by Hamilton & Forney, and subsequently the assistant editor of the Quaker City, a literary journal, published by Florence & Severns, and edited by George Lippard, and news editor of the Evening Argus, published under the same auspices. Upon its suspension he became editor of the Sunday Globe, succeeding the late Dr. Thomas Dunn English, and afterwards editor and one of the publishers of the Sunday Mercury. The Globe, during the editorial management of Mr. Geist, increased its circulation from one thousand to nearly twenty thousand copies per week, a marked tribute to the ability and enterprise of its faithful editor. During a period embracing the years 1852 to 1856, Mr. Geist was the able editor of the Weekly Express, at Lancaster, then owned by John H. Pearsol. In 1856 the Daily Express was established in connection with the Weekly Express, and Mr. Geist entered into partnership with Mr. Pearsol in their publication, a business relation which continued until the fall of 1876, when the Express was sold and consolidated with the Lancaster Examiner.

Mr. Geist was retained as editor of the consolidated journal until March, 1877, when he resigned, owing to a difference of views between himself and the publisher as to the political policy of the paper. In April, 1877, in connection with Hon. John B. Warfel, he established The New Era, which, as announced in the prospectus, was placed "under his sole and unconditional editorial control." In 1881 he became a joint partner in the firm of Warfel & Geist, and still retains the editorial management of The New Era. In addition to the editorial and other office duties devolving upon Mr. Geist, he is interested and takes an active part in all matters of general and local importance. He was for several years a vice-president of the Young Men's Christian Association. As chairman of its library committee he fostered and developed the growth of the library and free reading-room. He is still chairman of that committee, his resignation, prompted by a press of other duties, having been declined. Mr. Geist is a zealous member of St. John's (Free) Episcopal Church, and has been a vestryman and secretary of the vestry for over twenty-seven years, and a warden for several years. His interest in the Sunday-school work of the parish has been marked and of great benefit to its success. He has devoted much time and considerable means to the church improvements at various times, notably at the renovation of the property in 1871, and again at the enlargement the present year (1883), of which he was the projector and chairman of the building committee.

Next to the line of his profession, to which he has been enthusiastically devoted with little intermission for forty years, Mr. Geist's ruling passion is for mechanics and machinery, in the judgment and handling of which he is credited with being unusually expert for an amateur. He has always selected and supervised the erection of the machinery used in his business, even to the minutest details, and in 1865 he selected the machinery for a newspaper-mill near Lancaster, in the erection and subsequent improvement of which he took a deep interest as chairman of the building committee. His favorite recreation from the cares of journalism, in which he is a rapid and incessant worker, is superintending or working out the details of some mechanical or architectural improvement. He would rather take down and set up a church organ or a printing-machine than spend a "vacation" in lounging at a summer resort, and always gains in appetite and strength when so doing.

In 1849, Mr. Geist was married to Elizabeth M. Markley, of Lancaster, a daughter of the late Dr. George B. Markley, a gentleman widely known and honored. He is the father of eight children, four of whom (three sons and a daughter) died young. Four daughters survive. The eldest, Mary, is the wife of John M. Newbold, of the firm of Cranston & Newbold, Newport, Del., and Florence, the second, is married to Dr. J. Paul Lukens, of Wilmington, Del. His family circle consists of his wife and two single daughters.

JOHN JEFFERSON COCHRAN.—The Cochranes are described in ancient records as a family of great antiquity, and as having derived their name from the Barony of Cochrane, in Renfrewshire, Scotland. Warden de Cochrane, in the reign of Alexander III., was witness to grants made by Dunegal, or Dongal, the son of Swaine, to Walter Cumming, Earl of Monteth, of sundry lands in the county of Argyle, and his successor swore fealty to King Edward I. of England. The William Cochrane who lived in the reign of Queen Mary obtained from her Majesty charters of the lands and Barony of Cochrane, etc., and erected from its foundations the ancient seat of that family, at the same time that he adorned it with extensive plantations. His only daughter, Elizabeth, married her cousin, Alexander Blair, a younger son of John Blair, "of that ilk," who thereupon, as usual in such cases, assumed the name and arms of Cochrane.

Sir John Cochrane lived in the reign of Charles I., and was a devoted loyalist. His brother, Sir William Cochrane, of Cowden, a man of "great parts and learning," was equally loyal, and in recognition of his services was raised to the peerage, in 1647, as Baron Cochrane, of Dundonald, and in 1667 to the dignity of Earl of Dundonald, being at the same time created Lord Cochrane of Paisley and Ochiltree. He left two sons, William Lord Cochrane and Sir John Cochrane, of Ochiltree, the latter's daughter being the familiarly known Lady Kilsyth, of Scotland. The Cochranes were ranked among those who were friendly to Presbyterianism, and shared the fate of thousands of other families who were driven from their native country and sought homes in the north of Ireland during the persecution of that religious denomination in Scotland.

In 1570, John Cochrane, of the family of the Earl of Dundonald, from whom John Jefferson Cochran, the subject of this sketch, traces his lineage, crossed from Paisley, Scotland, to the north of Ireland. His son James was succeeded by John, who was the father of another James. Then came Robert. His sons were James, Stephen, and David, who emigrated to Pennsylvania in the beginning of the eighteenth century, and first settled in Chester County at what is now known as Cochranville. John, the son of the last-named James, moved from Chester County, Pa., to the State of Delaware, near Middletown, where his son, Dr. Richard E. Cochran, was born Sept. 1, 1785. His wife was Mary Ellis, whom he married about 1775. Dr. Richard E. Cochran inherited the Scotch-Irish qualities characteristic of his race. He was graduated at Pennsylvania University in 1810, took part in the war of 1812, was elected a member of the Delaware Assembly for the session of 1822-23, and came near being elected Governor of the State. He practiced medicine in Middletown and Wilmington, Del., and removed to Columbia, Lancaster Co., Pa., in May, 1824, where he actively engaged in the practice of his profession. In 1832 he was a Henry Clay elector for Lancaster County, and active in Whig politics. He was a member of the Reform Convention which met to amend the Constitution in 1836. In September, 1854, he fell a victim to the cholera, which raged at Columbia, and died in his seventieth year. His wife, Eliza F. (1794-1862), daughter of Nathaniel Evans, whom he married May 5, 1812, was a native of Delaware, near Middletown. Their children were Hon. Thomas E. Cochran, a prominent lawyer, represented Lancaster and York Counties in the State Senate of Pennsylvania in 1840-48, elected in 1859 auditor-general of Pennsylvania, and was a member of the State Constitutional Convention of 1872-73, died at York, Pa., in 1882; John J. Cochran (Dec. 20, 1816-May 12, 1879), subject of this sketch; Lieut. Richard E. Cochran, served in the regular army in Florida and among the Indian tribes in Arkansas and Kansas, and under Gen. Taylor in the Mexican war, falling at the battle of Resaca de la Palma, just after he had entered the intrenchments captured from the Mexicans. Theodore D. Cochran, graduated from the Columbia Spy office, and succeeded Preston B. Elder in the editorial management of that paper. In 1840 he came to Lancaster and took charge of The Old Guard, then the organ of "Honest John Strohm." Returning to Columbia in a few years, he wrote for the Spy, York Republican, and other papers, and was elected to represent Lancaster County in the Legislature in the session of 1844-46. He served in the Mexican war as a lieutenant of volunteers, and died in York in 1868. Mary Frances was the wife of E. Reed Myer, of Bradford County, Pa.

John Jefferson Cochran (formerly spelled with a final e) was born in Wilmington, Del., Dec. 20, 1816, and was eight years of age when the family moved to Columbia. In 1831 he entered the office of the Columbia Spy, then edited by his brother, Thomas E., and in due time became a good, accurate, and practical printer, receiving the benefit that a printing-office gives an apprentice, not only in the mechanical branches, but in mental training. One of his duties was the distribution of papers every week, making a tour covering a circuit of forty miles. It was on one of these excursions on horseback that he first saw an improved hand-press making a complete impression at one "pull," and using rollers instead of balls. In the spring of 1835 he removed to York, and, in partnership with his brother, Hon. Thomas E. Cochran, continued the publication of the York Republican in the active support of the Whig party until 1852, when they sold the paper. In the mean time he had been appointed postmaster of York by President Fillmore, and filled that office until 1853, when he removed to Lancaster and engaged in the coal-mining business at Shamokin, Pa., the firm being Cochran, Peale & Co. Unsuccessful in this, on Sept. 21, 1858, in connection with his brother, Thomas E., he purchased the printing establishment of the Independent Whig and Inland Daily Times from Theophilus Fenn, discontinued the daily edition, and changed the name of the weekly to the Lancaster Union. That journal was the organ of the anti-slavery Whigs led by Thaddeus Stevens, and was intended to counteract the influence of the Examiner and Herald, organ of the silver-gray, or pro-slavery Whigs, led by the late Isaac E. Hiester. On Jan. 1, 1868, the Messrs. Cochran sold the Union to John A. Hiestand & Co., who consolidated it with the Examiner and Herald. In the mean time he had been appointed postmaster by President Lincoln, and officiated in that position at Lancaster until 1868. A determined effort was made to dispossess him under the Johnson administration, in favor of Jay Cadwell, who had received his commission, but the influence and diplomacy of the "old commoner," the fast friend of Mr. Cochran, prevented the change. He was appointed newspaper clerk in the House of Representatives at Washington, and served during the terms of Hon. O. J. Dickey, member from Lancaster, after which the office was abolished. Following this he was one of the office editors of the Republican campaign paper Father Abraham for some time, became a stockholder in the Inquirer Printing and Publishing Company, and took the position of proof-reader, where he remained until he resumed his favorite pursuit at the editorial table.

In April, 1874, Mr. Cochran became news editor of the Lancaster Express, and discharged the duties of that position until December, 1876, and in the following April accepted the position of news editor on the staff of the New Era. Here he efficiently labored until the 11th of November, 1878, when, on account of illness, he severed his connection with all editorial work, and died, surrounded by the members of his family, at his home in Lancaster, Pa., May 12, 1879, in his sixty-third year. Throughout his life Mr. Cochran was highly respected by all who knew him, and he gained the strongest friendship of all those with whom he came in contact. He was an earnest Christian gentleman, and at the time of his death was a prominent member of St. John's Lutheran Church. An indefatigable worker, he was invaluable in a newspaper office, manifested a deep interest in the welfare of the public schools, and served on the school board of Lancaster from 1859 to 1868. He married, in October, 1839, Catherine, sister of Thomas Henry Baumgardner, of Lancaster, and a descendant of Leonard Baumgardner, the progenitor of the family in Pennsylvania from Germany, who died at York in 1821.

He left to survive him a wife and seven children, viz.: Thomas B., who published the paper Father Abraham in 1868-71, co-editor of the Lancaster Bar for a number of years, read law with J. B. Livingston, Esq., now president judge, was admitted to practice at the Lancaster bar in 1873, and in 1883 is serving his fifth term as chief clerk of the Pennsylvania State Senate; Richard E., a brass manufacturer in Chicago; Harry B., druggist in Lancaster, and treasurer of the Lancaster County Pharmaceutical Association; Alice E.; John J., manufacturer in Lancaster; Flora May and Elizabeth G. Cochran.

The Express was continued by its founders, Pearsol & Geist, until the fall of 1876, when, owing to financial embarrassments, caused by investing its earnings in outside enterprises and lending its credit to parties who failed to meet their obligations, its personalty was sold at sheriff's sale for twenty-seven thousand dollars, Mr. John A. Hiestand, of the Examiner, being the purchaser, who consolidated the two journals under the title of the Examiner and Express. The real estate, embracing three adjoining South Queen Street properties, in two of which the office and plant were located, a one-third interest in the "Printer's Paper-Mill," and two dwelling-houses, were sold at a great sacrifice from their original cost by the assignees of the estate.

Banks and Banking Interests.—An act of Assembly, passed March 30, 1793, authorized the establishment of the Bank of Pennsylvania, with privilege of locating branch offices at Lancaster, York, Reading, or such other places as might be deemed expedient. Branch offices were located at Lancaster and Pittsburgh, which were the only ones established until a supplement to the charter, March 8, 1809, at which time the State was divided into eight banking districts, each district to be allowed a bank. On the 21st of March, 1814, a general banking act passed the Assembly authorizing the division of the State into twenty-seven banking districts with forty-two banks. Five of these were designated as in Lancaster County. Since that time numerous banks and banking-houses have been organized, some of which have gone out of business, while others are still in operation.

Branch Bank of Pennsylvania.—The desire and agitation on the part of the people for a bank as early as the year 1803 led to the following action by the Borough Council on the 10th day of February in that year:

"WHEREAS, The establishment of a bank in the borough of Lancaster is considered not to be contrary to the interests of the inhabitants, but rather expected to be promotive of the inland trade of this place and its vicinity, it is therefore

"Resolved, That the president, directors, and company of the Bank of Pennsylvania be, and they are hereby permitted and invited to establish a branch of the said bank in this borough, in conformity to the act of Assembly incorporating the subscribers to the same, in case the said president and directors should think proper so to do.

"Ordered, That a copy of the above resolve be transmitted to the president and directors of the Bank of Pennsylvania, with the seal of the borough affixed thereto attested.

"GEORGE WEITZEL, Clerk."

This request on the part of the Council was favorably entertained by the president and directors of the bank, and action was taken towards the establishment of a branch in Lancaster. In May of that year the following-named gentlemen were chosen directors: Adam Reigart, Jr., Robert Coleman, John Hubley, William Webb, Michael Gundaker, James Hopkins, George Musser, William Montgomery, William Kirkpatrick, Thomas Boude, Samuel Bethel, and James Whitehill. The directors elected Adam Reigart, Jr., as president and James Houston cashier. An office was fitted up in the building that still stands on the northeast corner of King and Prince Streets, now occupied by Weaver's grocery-store, and business opened May 18, 1803. The office was kept in this place for many years. On the 29th of March, 1824, the Bank of Pennsylvania offered a reward of three thousand dollars for the discovery and prosecution of the perpetrators of forgery committed upon the said bank at its office in Lancaster, by means of two counterfeit checks, one presented Aug. 18, 1823, for $6800, the other on the 2d of October the same year for $1800; also $2500 reward was offered for the recovery of the lost money. No mention is made in the papers of the time whether the perpetrators were discovered or the money restored.

The bank continued in operation till about 1840, when its affairs were wound up and removed to Philadelphia.

Farmers' National Bank of Lancaster County.—The Farmers' Bank was chartered with a capital of $800,000 on the 17th day of January, 1810. The directors named in the act were John F. Steinman, Benjamin Schaum, Conrad Schwartz, Albert Dufresno, Samuel White, Christian Hoover, Robert Patton, John Breneman, Esq., Jacob Charles, Charles Montellus, John Neff, Peter Diller, and Jacob Rohrer. These directors were to remain until Nov. 1, 1810, when an election was to take place. Conrad Schwartz was chosen president, and Samuel Clendennin cashier. The bank opened for discount and receiving deposits on Monday, Feb. 19, 1810. It is not known where the office was opened, but on the 10th of March, 1811, it was announced "that the bank is removed to the house of Mr. M. Gundaker, next door to his store in East King Street." In 1818 the bank purchased the brick house and lot on the corner of Duke and King Streets, the present site, for seventeen thousand dollars. The office was kept here until November, 1874, when it was removed to Diefenderfer's building, on North Queen Street. The old building was demolished, and the present commodious banking-house was erected. Possession was taken of the new rooms the last of May, 1876.

George Graeff was elected president Nov. 21, 1814, and was succeeded by William Jenkins, F. A. Muhlberg, George L. Mayer, George H. Krug, Christopher C. Hager, and Jacob Bausman, who is still acting. John Eberman succeeded Samuel Clendennin as cashier, and was followed by Gerardus Clarkson, Henry R. Reed, Edward H. Brown (Oct. 1, 1868), who is the present cashier.

In the year 1814 the authorized capital was allowed to be increased to $600,000, which was subsequently reduced. In December, 1864, the bank was reorganized under the National Act, under the name of the Farmers' National Bank of Lancaster County, with a paid-up capital of $450,000, with the privilege of increasing the capital to $600,000.

JACOB BAUSMAN, banker, was born at "Bausman's Farm," near Lancaster City, Pa., Oct. 20, 1812. His father, John Bausman, a native of the Palatinate, on the west side of the Rhine, Germany, came to America in 1802 upon the invitation of his uncle, Andreas Bausman, who settled in Lancaster from Germany in 1755, where he owned large real estate and had amassed a fortune. John Bausman inherited a part of the estate of his uncle, and a part of the landed property has remained in possession of the family since, the "Bausman Farm" being a part, and in 1882 owned by Henry, brother of Jacob Bausman.

John Bausman married, in 1805, Elizabeth, sister of Hon. Abraham Peters, a wealthy landholder of Lancaster County, who bore him eight sons, viz.: Andrew (died), Abraham, John (died), Jacob, Samuel, Henry, Phillip, Rev. Dr. Benjamin Bausman, a Reformed Church clergyman at Reading. Most of these sons were farmers on the original Bausman estate, which was divided among them. Jacob Bausman obtained his early education in the school of his native place, and at the academy at Lititz, where he remained until 1829. Peculiarly characteristic of him while a young man was his inclination and aptitude for business pursuits, to which he turned his attention, and has been eminently successful during a long business career of over half a century. In 1831 he engaged in milling business, and in 1835 added large operations in grain. In 1838 he suspended business and trade, and made a tour through the Western States, and during his three years' travel he became fully conversant with the commercial interests of the country and its prospective development. Returning home he resumed business, and between the years 1841 and 1854 was reputed one of the largest flour, grain, and lumber dealers in Eastern Pennsylvania. About 1854, with others, he built the Lancaster Cotton-Mills, and has remained one of its stockholders since. Mr. Bausman was a director of the Farmers' National Bank of Lancaster for many years, and since 1868 has been its president. His time is largely devoted to the interests of this institution, which, under the management of its board of directors, with Mr. Bausman as its presiding officer, ranks among the most stable and prosperous financial institutions in the State.

He has been for a long time largely interested in coal operations in the Shamokin region, was one of the originators of the Lancaster Gas Company, of which he is a manager, and he is a director of the Lancaster

Fire Insurance Company. Mr. Bausman's influence has always been extended in aid of the worthy local enterprises of Lancaster, and he has contributed liberally of his means in the support of educational interests and religious work. He is a member of the American Reformed Church, treasurer and trustee of Franklin and Marshall College, and a trustee of the State Normal School at Millersville.

In January, 1854, he married Mrs. Mary Baer, who died in February, 1862, aged forty-five years. He has an only son, John W. B. Bausman, who was graduated from Lafayette College in the class of 1874, read law with Samuel H. Reynolds, of Lancaster, was admitted to the bar in December, 1877, and has practiced his profession in Lancaster since. He married, in April, 1880, Annette, daughter of Hon. Thomas E. Franklin, of Lancaster, who died June 18, 1882, leaving an only child, Thomas Franklin Bausman.

Lancaster Bank.—The Lancaster Trading Company was organized under the general act of March 21, 1814. The commissioners appointed to take charge were Caspar Shoffner, Jr., Henry Reigart, Jacob Long, William Hamilton, Joel Lightner, Jr., Abram Witmer, Dr. Abraham Carpenter, Jacob Duchman, Isaac Heney, Jacob Kaufman, Henry Slaymaker, Andrew Boggs, and Matthias Tschudy. Caspar Shoffner was chosen president of the board of directors, and William White cashier. On the 2d of September, 1814, at a meeting of the directors of the banks of Lancaster County, it was resolved to suspend specie payment until a change of circumstances. This action was brought about by similar action on the part of Philadelphia banks, and was thought the best method for security. The following banks were represented: Farmers' Bank, George Graeff, president; Lancaster Trading Company, Caspar Shoffner, president; Marietta and Susquehanna Trading Company, Henry Carroll, president; Columbia and Susquehanna Bridge Company, William Wright, president.

On the 24th of March, 1818, an act was passed changing the name of the "Lancaster Trading Company" to the "Lancaster Bank," and on the 28th of the month, in the same year, the Trading Company advertised that all persons having notes of the bank are required to renew them, payable at the "Lancaster Bank," the name of the institution having been so altered by act of Legislature, signed by William White, cashier.

On the 19th of November, 1827, the directors elected F. A. Muhlenberg president, and James Evans cashier. Mr. Muhlenberg was succeeded by James Evans about 1840. David Longenecker became president about 1847. He was succeeded by John G. Fetter, and later by Benjamin C. Bachman, who was its last president. The cashiers since Mr. Evans were Christian Bachman, Benjamin C. Bachman, and Horace Rathvon. The office of the Trading Company (the "Lancaster Bank") was on the property of Mrs. Robert Evans, now owned by William Gumpf, and on the first of April, 1837, the bank was removed "to Dr. Samuel Hume's house, on the southwest corner of Court-House Square," where it remained until business was closed in 1857, an assignment was made Feb. 2, 1857, to Horace Rathvon, who was also appointed cashier.

Union Bank of Lancaster.—A bank of the above name was authorized to be established at Lancaster under the general act of March 21, 1814. Commissioners were appointed to solicit subscriptions to stock. On the 21st of May in that year sufficient stock had been taken to procure a charter, but for some reason the bank did not go into operation, and on the 6th of December following a dividend upon the assets was paid to stockholders, and soon after the business was closed.

Lancaster Saving Institution.—An act of Assembly was passed April 14, 1835, incorporating the above-named institution with thirty-eight incorporators. It was limited to fifteen years. On March 20, 1849, it was still further extended ten years. The office was held first in the building in the southwest corner of the Centre Square, now occupied by Mrs. J. Strine, and was later removed to the northwest corner of the square now occupied by American Rapid Telegraph Company. A year or two after the withdrawal of the Branch Bank of Pennsylvania, the institution purchased the property owned by them on the northeast corner of King and Prince Streets, where they removed and remained till 1857. In May, 1855, irregularities were discovered, and an assignment made to Luther Richards and Amos Henderson; later they reassigned to the institution, and continued for a time, Anthony E. Roberts acting as treasurer. April 25, 1857, another assignment was made to Thomas L. Roberts, by whom it was finally closed about 1858. Its presidents were Samuel Dale and Emanuel Shofer. The treasurers were Samuel Gundaker and Charles Boughter.

Lancaster County National Bank.—In the year 1839 the Lancaster Loan Company was formed by Philip Reitzel and others as a private banking company, having for its president Henry Bushong, and for cashier Robert D. Carson. It was reorganized in 1841, and chartered August 14th, in that year, as the "Lancaster County Bank." The incorporators were Henry Bushong, Dr. John Witmer, Philip Reitzel, John Landis (farmer), Jacob Kreider, Francis Kendlg, Jr., George Withers, Jacob Shenk, Benjamin B. Herr, Isaac Brenler, J. Landis, J. Witmer, George Blattenberger, and James Smith. Directors were elected, and by them John Landis was chosen president, and Robert D. Carson cashier. Mr. Landis continued as president till his death, in February, 1867. Christian B. Herr was elected president on the 14th of the same month, and is acting in that capacity. Robert Carson served as cashier till his death, late in March, 1855, and on the 5th of April, in the same year, William L. Peiper was elected to fill the vacancy, and continued as cashier till his death, Dec. 14, 1881. On the 20th of December, T. F. H. Breneman was elected as cashier, and is the present incumbent. The bank was reorganized under the national banking law Jan. 5, 1865, with a paid up capital of three hundred thousand dollars, and has at present (1883) a surplus fund of one hundred and forty thousand dollars. The office of the bank in its early days was in the old stage-office, where Bursk's grocery-store now is. The present property was purchased Dec. 13, 1855, and a banking-office fitted up and occupied until September, 1881, when the bank was moved into temporary quarters in Gable's building on East King Street, while the present elegant and commodious banking-house was being erected.

Banking-House of Reed, McGrann & Co.—In January, 1850, George K. Reed, at present one of the firm of Reed, McGrann & Co., in connection with John F. Shroder, commenced to do a general brokerage and banking business, it being the first institution of the kind in the city of Lancaster. In November, 1856, John F. Shroder retired, and George K. Reed continued the business on his own account up to June, 1857, when he associated himself with Richard McGrann, Patrick Kelly, and Ambrose McConomy, under the firm-name of Reed, McGrann, Kelly & Co. In August, 1861, it was changed to Reed, McGrann & Co., on account of the death of Patrick Kelly. In October, 1867, Richard McGrann died, when his son, Bernard I. McGrann, took his interest. In 1873, Roland H. Brubaker and Peter McConomy were admitted as members of the firm, the title of the firm, Reed, McGrann & Co., remaining unchanged up to the present time. The first location was at the corner of East King and Duke, where the court-house now stands. After a few years the firm erected the building on North Queen Street, now occupied by the Examiner and Express. In 1857 they bought the Lancaster Bank building, corner of South Queen and Penn Square, which they still occupy.

Banking-House of A. S. Henderson.—In March, 1855, John K. Reed, A. S. Henderson, David Shultz, and Isaac Heister became associated under the firm-name of John K. Reed & Co., for the purpose of conducting a banking business. Their office was opened at the corner of Duke and East King Street. A change was made in March, 1860, by the retirement of David Shultz, and business was continued under the name of Reed, Henderson & Co. until Feb. 14, 1871, when, Mr. Heister having died, the name was changed to Reed & Henderson. Upon the death of Mr. Reed, May 1, 1882, A. S. Henderson assumed control, and still continues the business. The present property on Duke Street was purchased Dec. 5, 1865, and an office was fitted up and possession taken in March, 1866.

First National Bank.—A banking-house was opened in the latter part of 1857 by John Gyger, David Bair, and Benjamin Eshelman, under the name of John Gyger & Co. The office was on the present site. Business was conducted by the firm until January, 1864, when the First National Bank of Lancaster was organized, with a paid up capital of $140,000. Directors were elected, and John Gyger was chosen president and Horace Rathvon cashier. Mr. Gyger remained president until his death, in April, 1870. He was succeeded by the present president, Clement B. Grubb. Upon the death of Horace Rathvon, cashier, in the fall of 1875, Henry C. Harmer, November 22d, was elected to fill the vacancy, and is the present cashier. The present banking-house was fitted up by John Gyger & Co. before the organization of the national bank.

came from Germany at the age of fifteen, in the year 1762, without money and near friends. He settled near Lancaster City, where by economy and industry he in time became a quite large real-estate owner just outside the city, owning and carrying on a hotel, tannery, and farm. He removed to Maryland, where he continued the tanning business for several years, and owned large real estate, but finally returned to Lancaster, where he died in 1839, at the advanced age of ninety-two years. His wife, Elizabeth Hoffman, bore him four sons,—Henry, John, Jacob H., and George,—and five daughters, and died, aged eighty-four, in 1841. Of these, Jacob H. Locher (1789–1859) was father of our subject, born in Lancaster, was a tanner and currier by occupation. He removed

The Banking-House of Evans, McEvoy & Co. was established in February, 1867, with a capital of $50,000, by Robert A. Evans, Patrick McEvoy, Henry Carpenter, and Samuel H. Reynolds. An office was opened where High & Martin's china-store now is. The business continued under this firm until the death of Mr. McEvoy, about 1869. It was continued for a short time by R. Evans & Co., and in 1870 was changed to D. P. Locher & Son. In 1872 the office was removed to the present banking-office on the corner of West King and Centre Square.

DAVID P. LOCHER, banker and leather merchant, of Lancaster City, was born in Washington County, Md., July 27, 1827. His grandfather, Henry Locher, from Maryland in 1837 to Mount Joy, Lancaster Co., was in business there for four years, afterwards in Lancaster City until 1850, when he removed to Harrisburg, where he was a leather merchant until his death. His wife, Mary (—1873), daughter of Philip Grove, of Sharpsburg, Md., bore him the following children: Catharine, wife of Jacob Beuhler, of Harrisburg; Joseph, a leather merchant at Harrisburg; David P.; Anna M., wife of John B. Roth, of Lancaster; George W., a leather merchant in Lancaster; and Mary Elizabeth, widow of the late William A. Cathcart, of Harrisburg.

David P., son of Jacob H. Locher, obtained his early education in the public school, and early in life learned that industry and a right use of means obtained are necessary lessons for a successful business career. He learned the trade of a tanner and currier of his father, and upon reaching his majority started out in life for himself, without pecuniary aid, but with proper resolution and a will to do. For some time he dealt in leather at Pottsville, Pa., but in 1850 returned to Lancaster, where he has been in active business since as a tanner and currier and a manufacturer and dealer in leather. He has built four tanneries in the city in different locations, and has been largely and actively engaged in leather interests during his whole business career. In 1870 the firm of D. P. Locher & Son succeeded Evans, McEvoy & Co., bankers, and continue a private banking-house on Penn Square, in Lancaster, in 1883. Mr. Locher has kept aloof from political place, given his time to active business interests, and has been considerably identified with real estate operations and farming. He is a thoroughgoing, enterprising business man, and interested in every local object that tends to the prosperity of the city and the welfare of its citizens.

He married in 1848, Clementina M., daughter of Robert Evans, a merchant of Lancaster, by whom he has four surviving sons,—Charles H., for many years a clerk in the banking-house of Evans, McEvoy & Co., now the partner with his father as their successors; Robert E., a partner with his father in the leather business; Grove and Clement Locher.

The Locher family have been identified religiously with the Reformed Church, and with the Presbyterian. Politically they were originally members of the old Whig party, but became Republicans upon the organization of that party.

ROBERT A. EVANS was born in Lancaster, Nov. 26, 1824, and was educated in the private schools of the city and at Franklin and Marshall College. Choosing a business life, at the age of nineteen he went to Baltimore, Md., and for one year was clerk in a commission house, where he became conversant with general business. Returning, he carried on a general mercantile business in Lancaster until 1855, when he established a private bank, and continued in business alone for twelve years. In 1867 the banking-house of Evans, McEvoy & Co. succeeded his private bank, and continued business until the death of Mr. McEvoy, two years later, and was afterwards carried on under the banking firm name of R. A. Evans & Co. until 1871, and at that date succeeded by D. P. Locher & Son, who have remained in business since. Mr. Evans has been closely identified with various local interests in and about Lancaster. For twenty years he has carried on farming; was a director of the Farmers' Bank of Lancaster for several years prior to 1867; one of the managers and president of Woodward Hill Cemetery, and a member of the board of trustees of the Presbyterian Church. In 1869 he was elected a member of the Select Council of Lancaster, and has served as a member, president of the Council, and upon its important committees since, by re-election, a period of twenty-four years. In 1863 he was elected a school director, and by re-election has served since as a member and chairman of the finance committee, a period of twenty years. He married, Nov. 3, 1858, Catharine C., daughter of Samuel Dale, associate judge of Lancaster County, and alderman of the city for many years. They have no surviving children. John Evans, the progenitor of the family in Lancaster County, a native of Wales, with his brothers, David and James, came here while young men. James settled in Cecil County, Md., David in Drumore township, and John, grandfather of our subject, resided on five hundred acres of land in Little Britain township, Lancaster Co., where he died in July, 1797. He also owned some two hundred acres of land in the same locality, the warrant of which was issued to him by Richard and Thomas Penn, April 23, 1747. His wife, Jane Grubb, whom he married after arriving in this country, and who died Dec. 29, 1826, bore him children as follows: Thomas, born April 1, 1789, a merchant in Lancaster and afterward in Middletown, N. Y., where he died; Robert and James (twins), merchants in Lancaster, the former died Nov. 3, 1831, aged forty, the latter was also cashier and president of the Lancaster Bank for many years, and died Oct. 12, 1864, aged seventy-three years; William, born July 22, 1795, was a farmer in Orange County, N. Y., and died there; Dr. John, born Oct. 8, 1793, a physician of Strasburg, and afterward of Chambersburg, Pa., died at the latter place; Sarah D., born Sept. 15, 1787, wife of Rev. Dr. William Sample, a Presbyterian minister; and Isabella P., born Aug. 5, 1797, wife of Patrick Ewing, of Cecil County, Md. Of these children, Robert was father of our subject and carried on general mercantile business in Lancaster, on the corner of Duke and King Streets, during his active life. He married in 1816, Ann Margaret, daughter of Michael Gundaker, one of the early merchants of Lancaster, who died in 1815, aged sixty-one, and whose parents came from Germany and settled in Lancaster when it contained only a few houses, and there reared their family. One son, Michael Gundaker, was a soldier in the Revolutionary war. Ann Margaret Evans survives in 1883, aged eighty-nine years, and dictated many of the facts for this sketch. Her mother, Barbara Walter, a native of York County, died in 1829, aged fifty-eight years. Robert and Ann Margaret Evans' children are John J., a farmer near Lancaster City; Jane G., wife of William E. Bryan, a lawyer of Peoria, Ill.; Walter G., a merchant of Lancaster, died Jan. 22, 1879, aged fifty-six years (he was alderman of the city for twenty years, notary public, and served as recorder of the city); Robert A., the subject of this sketch; William W., a farmer on a part of the Evans homestead in Little Britain township; and Clementina, wife of David P. Locher, leather merchant and banker of Lancaster.

Banking-House of Bair & Shenk.—In March, 1866, this house was started by David Bair and Joseph Clarkson. An office was opened in the building of William G. Baker, druggist, Centre Square. Joseph Clarkson retired in the spring of 1869, and on the 20th of March, David Bair and R. W. Shenk formed a partnership. In 1870 commenced the erection of what is known as the Bair & Shenk Banking Building, which was first occupied in March, 1871. Upon the death of David Bair, Oct. 10, 1876, his widow retained the interest of her husband and became a partner. R. W. Shenk died Sept. 26, 1880, and the business has been and is continued under the above name by Mrs. Mary Bair, the surviving partner.

Banking-House of Diffenderffer Brothers.—The banking-house of Diffenderffer Brothers was organized in January, 1872, the members composing the firm being D. R. Diffenderffer, W. L. Diffenderffer, and T. R. Diffenderffer. The paid up capital was $50,000. The house began doing business at Nos. 26 and 28 North Queen Street, and remained there about a year and a half. Meanwhile the premises now known as 67 and 69 North Queen Street were purchased, and on this site a commodious banking-house was erected. The firm took up its quarters in this building in 1873. A change was effected in June, 1879, by the death of W. L. Diffenderffer, the second member, but no change was made in the firm-name. In 1875 the business of the firm was gradually wound up, and it went out of existence.

Fulton National Bank.—Early in February, 1882, an organization was perfected having for its object the establishment of this bank. Subscriptions were obtained, and on the 6th of February the stockholders elected directors, who, on the 8th, elected as president John R. Bitner, and as cashier C. A. Fondersmith. An office was opened temporarily on the corner of East King and Centre Square, and business was opened on the 13th of March, 1882. The site of the present banking-office was purchased, and the demolition of the old buildings upon the lot was commenced in August, 1882, and the new structure was erected upon their site. It was first opened for business March 30, 1883. The present directors are John R. Bitner, president; H. M. Mayer, Samuel Groff, L. S. Hartman, John D. Skiles, Eli J. Kindig, Abraham B. Huber, David Brown, John L. Miller, John R. Bricker, James Shaum, John M. Stehman, and Jacob Wolf.

JOHN R. BITNER, president of the Fulton National Bank of Lancaster City, was born in the same city, Aug. 7, 1826. His father, Abraham Bitner (1791-1874), whose ancestors were of German origin, and among the early settlers of Pennsylvania, was a native of York County, by trade a carpenter, was a chairmaker and flour merchant in Lancaster most of his active business life, and a member of and officially identified with the German Reformed Church of the city. His mother was Elizabeth Porter (1799

-1856), also a member of the same church. Their children who reached manhood and womanhood are Anna R., wife of George Dietrich; Jacob died at the age of twenty-six; Sarah W. (deceased); John R., Charles Augustus, Abraham, Benjamin, David P., and Mary Ann Bitner. He obtained his early education in the schools of Lancaster, and at the age of thirteen began learning cabinet-making, at which business he continued until 1846. For one year following he was in the employ of the State Railroad. In 1847, in company with his brother, C. A. Bitner, the firm of John R. Bitner & Brother purchased a few cars, and established the Fast Freight Line between Lancaster and Philadelphia, running their cars on the State Railroad, and subsequently on the Pennsylvania Railroad tracks. Gradually, as their business increased, they placed additional cars on the road, and thus continued until they were the owners of some thirty cars, which they ran in transporting and forwarding merchandise over the railroads of this and other States. From 1857 until the dissolution of the partnership in 1874 they were the leading firm in this business in this part of the State. In 1848 they also became engaged, in connection with their freighting business, in grain operations and shipping grain to different points in the East, which afterwards developed into a prosperous trade. In 1854, with others, they were interested in building the Eden Paper-Mills, and large owners therein. In 1855 they built a steam flouring-mill in Lancaster, which had a capacity of one hundred and fifty barrels per day, and which they continued to operate until 1868, when, owing to the pressure attendant upon furnishing supplies to the Union army, they took down the mill to make room for an extensive warehouse, which they built on its site.

John R. Bitner & Brother were large contractors for the government during the war for furnishing supplies for the army, and their work was so satisfactorily done that at the close of the conflict the government applied to them for supplies for the old army stock until it could be disposed of. In 1865 they were members of the company that built the Fulton Cotton-Mill, but sold their interest in it four years later, and they were also members of the company that built, the same year, the Printer's Paper-Mills at Binkley's Bridge, that were burned in November, 1882, in which John R. Bitner has retained a large interest. The firm of John R. Bitner & Brother continued their freighting and forwarding business until 1874, when Mr. Bitner purchased his brother's interest, continued it alone until 1882, and sold out the business to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. Mr. Bitner was one of the original founders of the noted summer resort, "Ocean Beach," on the New Jersey coast, in which association he retains an interest, a director in the New Egypt, Farmingdale and Long Branch Railroad of New Jersey for some time, and in 1865, in company with others, founded a forwarding and commission house at 811 Market Street, Philadelphia, where he remained a partner until 1870. He has been a member of both branches of the City Council for several terms, served for three years as prison inspector for Lancaster County, director of Lancaster County National Bank for some seven years, a director of the Quarryville Railroad, and he was one of the organizers of the Fulton National Bank of Lancaster, in February, 1882, of which he was chosen president. He married, April 26, 1852, Fianna, daughter of David Wiedler, a farmer of Lancaster County, by whom he has children: Jacob S.; Lillie W., wife of J. C. Martin, died June 30, 1881; William H., D. Edwin, Anna M., Abraham, Alfred F., and Nellie O. Bitner.

Insurance Companies.—The first movement tending towards the organization of an insurance company in Lancaster was made in 1807. At a meeting held February 2d of that year, at the house of Henry Reigart (the Fountain Inn), of which William Kirkpatrick was chairman, and Adam Reigart, Jr., secretary, it was resolved "that application be made to the Legislature for an act to incorporate an insurance company in this borough, the capital stock of which shall consist of $100,000, to be divided into 4000 shares of $25 each." The petition was presented, the act passed, and the company incorporated April 10, 1807, under the name of the Lancaster and Susquehanna Insurance Company. Adam Reigart, Jr., the president, advertised that the company would open an office on the 16th of April "in the house occupied by the bank in the borough of Lancaster, where applications would be received for insurance against fire and other risks." The company had easy office-hours, from 9 o'clock A.M. to 3 o'clock P.M. There is but little more to be said concerning this organization, as records of its subsequent proceedings are not to be found. It maintained an existence for several years. A dividend of seventy-five cents per share was advertised in 1808, and one of five per cent. in 1811, but what profits, if any, were divided between those years is not known. The expediency of increasing the capital was considered in 1808. At that time Jacob Krug was president.

The Widow and Orphan Assurance Society of the City and County of Lancaster came into existence in February, 1822, with the following officers, viz.: President, Rev. Christian Endress; Vice-President, Rev. Joseph Clarkson; Secretary, William White; Treasurer, George L. Mayer; Directors, Ebenezer Wright, Nathaniel Lightner, Robert Evans, Benjamin Ober, George Musser, Dr. Samuel Fahnestock, Dr. F. A. Muhlenberg. The design of the society was to pay a fixed sum per week to the widows or children of those members who died. The society remained active for a number of years, but was finally disbanded.

Lancaster City and County Insurance Company was the name of an organization which had its origin in 1838, being incorporated by act passed April 16th of that year. Forty-eight commissioners were appointed soon after that date to take subscriptions for the stock, the company having an authorized capital of $200,000. Emanuel C. Reigart was chosen president, and John Zimmerman secretary. Mr. Reigart resigned the presidency in 1839, and James Evans was elected to fill the vacancy. Business was opened by the company soon after its organization, and continued with indifferent success until 1852, when the company retired, though still maintaining its charter and privileges.

On Oct. 7, 1867, a meeting of stockholders of the old Lancaster City and County Fire Insurance Company, to consider the propriety of reorganizing the company, was held in the city of Lancaster, Christopher Hager, Esq., in the chair. The opinion of the meeting was that there existed a necessity for an active home company; that it had been demonstrated by actual experience that Lancaster County was one of the most favorable points in the United States for the business of fire insurance, Lancaster City alone paying annually large sums to companies located in Philadelphia, New York, and Hartford; that a home company with a good paid up capital, under the direction of responsible men well known by all in the community, would undoubtedly command a preference from the start, and would be able to retain at home a large portion of the sums hitherto sent abroad by our citizens for insurance; that an effort ought to be made to place this old institution on a sound and permanent basis; and that the present time was favorable for the effort. A meeting to elect directors was therefore called on Monday, November 4th, at which Messrs. Thomas E. Franklin, C. Hager, John L. Atlee, H. Carpenter, Jacob Bausman, A. E. Roberts, George K. Reed, B. F. Shenk, F. Shroder, and B. B. Martin were elected as directors for the ensuing year. The organization of the company was perfected by the election of Hon. Thomas E. Franklin, as president; Edward Brown, secretary; and George K. Reed, treasurer; the finance committee consisting of George K. Reed, B. F. Shenk, and A. E. Roberts.

The State Legislature, Feb. 14, 1868, passed an act supplementary to the charter, legalizing the election of directors, and authorizing them to act in accordance with the privileges of the charter. The company issued its first policy under the new organization March 9, 1868.

Success was met with in procuring business, but by extension to other fields than this county and State the company met with losses, becoming particularly involved through the Chicago fire of 1871. This necessitated the surrender of stock by the holders to the extent of forty per cent. New stock was issued and sold, and business was continued until October, 1878, when the company retired honorably, paying all debts and losses, and stock in full. The company still holds its organization. Thomas E. Franklin was president from first to last of the reorganized company. Edward Brown, secretary, was succeeded in 1871 by George R. Hendrickson, who, in November, 1872, gave place to B. F. Shenk.

The Inland Insurance and Deposit Company was organized in July, 1854, and opened an office not long thereafter where Kepler's new building now is (the old Black Horse tavern stand), which, however, was soon removed to the Swan Hotel. Dr. H. E. Muhlenberg was president, and Rudolph F. Rauch secretary and treasurer. Isaac E. Heister succeeded Dr. Muhlenberg as president, who, however, again became president, and filled that office until the close of the company's existence. John W. Jackson followed Rauch as secretary and treasurer in 1863, and gave place to J. E. Muhlenberg in 1869. The company closed its affairs and its career in 1874.

The Lancaster Home Mutual Fire Insurance Company was incorporated May 1, 1861, and, as its name implies, was and is strictly a home company, being limited by its charter to the city and county of Lancaster. The incorporators were John Sheaffer, Christian Gast, John D. Skiles, J. B. Swartzwelder, Charles A. Heinitch, David G. Swartz, Anthony Lechler, Christian H. Lefevre, Jacob N. Lancaster City Gas Companies.—A gas company was projected for the city of Lancaster late in the fall of 1841, and on the 17th of December, in that year, the City Council authorized a company to lay pipes through the city for the introduction of gas, under the direction of the Street Committee. The company was organized and a charter granted under the name of the "Lancaster City Gas Company," on the 31st of March, 1842. By the terms of the charter the work was to be commenced within three years, or the charter was null and void. Nothing was done, and again, April 7, 1849, a charter was obtained for the "Lancaster City Gas Company," with John Steinman and others as commissioners. By this company land was purchased near Hoffman's Run, in the southwestern part of the city, works were erected, pipes laid, at a cost of $28,555.80. Gas was first introduced into the city on the 21st of February, 1850. As the demand increased pipes were laid and improvements made. At first the gas was manufactured from rosin, and in 1852 the works were improved and changed to manufacture gas from coal. The works were so successful that in 1876 another company was organized, by the name of the "Lancaster Gaslight and Fuel Company." This company purchased land near the old works, and commenced manufacture. About the year 1879, the companies finding the demand not equal to the supply, made arrangements with each other, which resulted in the new company purchasing all the rights and franchises of the old company. The office of the company is now on Duke Street, at H. Baumgardner's coal-office.

Cotton-Mills.—About the year 1845, David Longnecker, of this city, conceived the idea of establishing a cotton-mill. The project was received with favor, a number of citizens formed a company, with John F. Steinman as president, and Mr. Longnecker as treasurer and agent, raised a capital of $125,000, purchased ground, and during 1845-46 built what is now known as the F. Schroder Company's Mill, No. 1. About six thousand spindles and two hundred and sixteen looms, with other necessary machinery, were placed in the building, and work commenced in March, 1847.

Gen. Charles T. James, of Rhode Island, who was then prominent in cotton manufacture, came to the city about the time the first mill was put in operation, and in 1848 built what is now known as Conestoga Mill, No. 2, in which work was commenced in August, 1849, with eight thousand spindles and two hundred and eighty-eight looms. After Gen. James had operated the mill about a year he sold it to the Conestoga Mill Company, for which he also built on contract in 1850 Mill No. 3, with ten thousand spindles and two hundred and sixty-four looms. This mill was put in operation in 1851.

These mills were carried on by the company until the spring of 1855, when it was decided to divide the shares. In this division Mill No. 1 was kept by the Conestoga Company, Francis Schroder, president; David Longnecker took Mill No. 2, and a number of members of the old company formed a new one, with A. W. Russell president, and took Mill No. 3. The financial panic of 1857 affected the welfare of the mills, as it did of all other business establishments and mills. Nos. 1 and 3 were sold by the sheriff, the former being bought by Francis Schroder & Co., who still operate it, and the latter by Shenk, Bausman & Co., who carried it on until 1867, when they sold to John Farnum, of Philadelphia, whose heirs are still in possession. David Longnecker sold Mill No. 2 to John Farnum and Gen. Robert Patterson (the latter also of Philadelphia), who were its joint owners until 1862. Mr. Farnum then became sole owner, and upon his death the mill, going into the hands of his heirs, was operated by them in conjunction with Mill No. 2; as it still continues to be. Mill No. 1 has at this writing (1888) thirteen thousand spindles and two hundred and eighty looms, and manufactures brown shirtings, drills, and flannels. Mill No. 2 has fourteen thousand spindles and four hundred looms, and with No. 3 manufactures almost exclusively bed-tickings, awning stripes, and  $\frac{1}{2}$  sheetings. Mill No. 3 has thirteen thousand spindles and two hundred and sixty looms.

In 1864 the old machine-shop on Beaver Street was purchased by Shenk, Bausman, Carpenter & Co., and fitted up as a cotton-mill, with three thousand spindles and eighty-two looms. It was known as No. 5. Work was begun in the spring of 1865, confined to sheetings, and carried on until 1878, since which time the machinery has been idle.

The Fulton Cotton-Mill, No. 5, on the corner of Duke and Lemon Streets, was built in 1865 by the firm of William Wiley & Co. Equipped with two thousand spindles and sixty looms, it was put in operation as soon as completed, and turned out sheetings. In 1870 the original firm expired by limitation, and Wiley & Calder continued the business. After the death of Mr. Wiley, in February, 1879, the business was controlled by George Calder, Jr., by whom the mill is still carried on in connection with the Allendale Mill, No. 6. It now has two thousand spindles and ninety-one looms in motion, and produces awning stripes and fancy-colored ducks.

The Allendale was established by the firm of Wiley & Calder, who in 1872 purchased the old file-factory at the corner of Chestnut and Plum Streets, and put into the building three thousand spindles and one hundred and four looms. It is now devoted to the production of ducks. In connection with the Fulton and Allendale Mills a large dry house was erected in 1874.

The Lancaster Locomotive Works.—The company which established these works (now controlled by the Penn Iron Company (Limited), was organized under the general manufacturing law, May 31, 1858, with a capital of $100,000. The first president was Daniel Cockley, who was, however, superseded by James Black on May 21, 1855, and the directors were John Black, Christopher Hager, Abraham W. Russell, Benjamin Eshleman, Michael Malone, John U. Lane, Henry Musselman, James B. Lane, George F. Lañe, and James Black. The treasurer and secretary was M. O. Kline, and the superintendent, John M. Brandt, Sr. The only survivors of this number are John Black, James Black, A. W. Russell, and M. O. Kline.

Five acres of land was purchased of John H. Duchman, lying east of Ann Street and fronting on the Columbia and Philadelphia Railroad. Ground was broken and the work of erecting a building commenced early in July, 1853. The first locomotive was built and placed on the track of the Columbia and Philadelphia Railroad in December, 1855. The entire number built while the works were in operation was thirty.

The company became embarrassed during the great financial panic of 1857, caused by the inability of three or four railroads to meet their engagements, and allowing their paper to go to protest, thereby throwing upon the Lancaster Locomotive Works a heavy burden of indebtedness which they could not successfully tide over, in consequence of the then existing state of affairs. It then became a necessity to make an assignment for the benefit of its creditors, and on the 5th day of October, 1857, a deed of assignment was executed to M. O. Kline, the treasurer of the company. Some time in 1861 the works were leased to James A. Norris, and on his death, some few months after, were sold to Edward Norris, and were successfully operated by him during the war of the Rebellion.

On the 1st of September, 1870, the works passed into the possession of the present organization, the Penn Iron Company (Limited), by whom they are extensively operated in the production of merchant bar-iron, railway supplies, car-forgings, bolts, nuts, etc.

The Lancaster Watch Company.—This extensive manufacturing company was the outgrowth of the Adams & Perry Watch Company, of Lancaster, which was organized at the Board of Trade rooms, June 10, 1874, with a capital of $75,000, which had nearly all been subscribed at that time. The company was incorporated under the laws of the State, on Sept. 26, 1874. Soon after this men were sent here who began, in a shop near the Best Boiler-Works, the manufacture of machinery to be used in the watch-manufactory. At the meeting of the board of directors, Dec. 2, 1874, it was reported that Mr. C. A. Bitner had made the company a deed of gift of three and a half acres in the western part of the city as a site for the proposed works. Upon this the present building, which is exceedingly well adapted to the purpose for which it is used, was erected under the personal supervision of Mr. Bitner and G. M. Zahm. It was first occupied in the summer of 1875. The company carried on the manufacture with varying success until September, 1877, when a reorganization was deemed expedient, and the Lancaster Pennsylvania Watch Company was formed. On April 1, 1879, a change in the organization was effected, and this was followed, April 1, 1883, by reorganization as a stock company, with a capital of $250,000. The stockholders in the present company are Messrs. John I. Hartman, C. A. Bitner, A. Bitner, John D. Skiles, J. P. McCaskey, B. F. Breneman, Lewis S. Hartman. The officers of the board are Messrs. John I. Hartman, president; John D. Skiles, treasurer; and J. P. McCaskey, secretary. About four hundred and fifty thousand dollars has been expended in the enterprise thus far, of which three hundred thousand dollars were used for wages alone. Now fourteen grades of watches are manufactured. The factory has a capacity for turning out one hundred and fifty watches daily, and is running at about two-thirds that production. A capital of $250,000 is invested, and two hundred and fifty men employed.

ABRAHAM BITNER, manager of the Lancaster Watch Company, and son of Abraham and Elizabeth (Porter) Bitner, was born in Lancaster City, Jan. 22, 1836. He started out in life for himself at the early age of thirteen years, without pecuniary assistance, but with a determined self-reliance and resolution to carve out a fortune for himself that has characterized his whole very active business career. For several years he was employed by Bitner & Brother in their freighting business in Lancaster, and in running their individual line of cars from Lancaster to Philadelphia. Subsequently he was a clerk in a flouring-mill, and operated a stationary engine. In 1857 he went to Philadelphia and took charge of the freight interests of Bitner & Brother, in that city, and also engaged in the produce commission business until 1861, when he formed the partnership of Acheson & Bitner in the flour and grain business, which continued for about one and a half years. Returning to Lancaster County he purchased a farm in Warwick township, upon which he resided in 1864. In 1865 he opened a coal-yard in Lancaster City, and in 1867 built the first coal-chute erected in the city, on the Reading and Columbia Railroad. He disposed of this business in 1872, and purchased one hundred and thirty-six acres of land on the New Jersey coast, worth then some ten thousand dollars, organized the Ocean Beach Association, comprised of men from that State and neighboring cities. As superintendent of the association from 1873 to 1876, he laid out and founded what is now the famous and favorite summer resort, Ocean Beach. The first year, 1873, he built the Ocean Beach Methodist Episcopal Church, almost wholly at his own expense, the first building completed on the beach, and made other important improvements. The value of an acre of ground at Ocean Beach in a desirable location, in 1883, is fifteen thousand dollars. In 1874 he was elected a director of the New Egypt and Farmingdale Railroad Company, reorganized the board of directors by requesting the resignation of four of its members and causing the election of four others. Subsequently he obtained full control of the road by purchase, built the road, and when completed sold it to the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey. From 1877 to 1879, Mr. Bitner was a clothing merchant in Lancaster City.

In 1875 he was induced to take an interest in the "Lancaster Watch Company." By close application and personal interest in this, to him, a comparatively new field of operations, he mastered the minutest details of the business, reorganized the company Sept. 1, 1877, and put it upon a systematic working foundation. He is the general manager of this company, and is the joint inventor of an improved safety pin-ion, which constitutes one of the most important and valuable features of the Lancaster watch, which experts pronounce superior to any other device for a similar purpose. This device is necessary to protect the delicate movement of a watch from injury in case of the breaking and sudden expansion of the mainspring. It was patented Aug. 12, 1879.

Mr. Bitner is also the inventor of other very valuable patents in the construction of a watch. He is the patentee of a watch-dial, April 5, 1881; a hand-setting and stem-winding device, July 25, 1882; a patent compound regulator, Oct. 10, 1882; a dust-proof watch-plate, Nov. 25, 1882; and an improvement on the latter in 1883.

Mr. Bitner has recently engaged also in the purchase of real estate near the watch-factory building, and has erected a fine and substantial home residence, besides several tenant-houses, the whole comprising "Cottage Place." He has given little attention to matters outside of his business interests, never sought office, nor held any, but stands firmly intrenched in the principles of reform laid down by the Republican party.

His first wife, Sarah Ann, daughter of John Retallick, died in 1874. Their children are Elizabeth (deceased), George W. (deceased), John Wesley, Mary Margaret (deceased), and William Yard Bitner. By his present wife, Anna C., a daughter of David B. Hostetter, of Lancaster County, he has children: Grace, Herbert, and Walter Bitner.

Miscellaneous Manufacturing Interests.—There are a number of other manufactories concerning which we present brief historical and descriptive notes. Among them is the Conestoga Furnace, conducted by Peacock & Thomas, which is situated in the southern portion of the city, on South Prince Street, the ground occupied covering an area of about eight acres, upon which are erected numerous buildings equipped with all the machinery and appliances requisite for securing the best results, and a steam-engine of one hundred horse-power and eight boilers. The capacity of the furnace is one hundred and forty tons, and the average annual production about six thousand tons of pig-iron of the best description for foundry purposes, which meets with a ready sale, both in the East and West, on account of its acknowledged superiority in quality and uniformity. The ore, which is known as the hematite, is of a neutral nature, and is procured about ten miles south of the furnaces from mines owned by the firm, on the line of the Quarryville Branch Railroad tracks, running direct between the mines and the furnaces. At the mines a force of about seventy-five men is employed, and at the furnaces an average number of about twenty-five. Mr. Peacock commenced operations at the Conestoga Furnace in 1868, since which time numerous additions and improvements have been made, the present firm coming into existence in July, 1879.

The steam-engine and boiler-works of John Best, on East Fulton Street, are the outgrowth of a small shop opened in 1856 by the present proprietor, who then had a capital of only twenty dollars.

Among the industries in iron is an establishment owned and managed by Ezra F. Landis, on North Cherry Street, in which are manufactured Eclipse Fan Blowers, the Eclipse Fan Exhauster for ventilating mines, Scandinavian or jail padlocks, and other articles, which have a wide sale, being shipped to all parts of the United States, Mexico, England, and even Australia.

The only establishment in the State, outside of Philadelphia, devoted to the manufacture of horn combs is located here, and the industry has been carried on for more than half a century. It was originally founded in 1824 by Peter P. Voorhis, and upon his death, in 1839, passed into the hands of Shoffner & Hambright. In 1850, Mr. Hambright having retired, Dana Graham became associated with Mr. Shoffner, and after the latter's death became sole proprietor. The premises occupied by him are on James Street, and the buildings are quite extensive. A ten horse-power engine and fifteen horse-power boiler furnish the motive power for the machinery, and a force of forty men, women, and boys is at present employed, at a weekly expense of about two hundred and fifty dollars. The material employed at these works is of the better grades of horn, which are obtained from South America, Texas, and a few from this State. Only the best portions of the horn are used for combs, the tips being shipped to Philadelphia, where they are used for making buttons, mouth-pieces for pipes, and other small articles.

Cork manufacturing is one of the interesting and important industries of Lancaster. In 1875 the Lancaster Cork Company (limited) established the works which now belong to G. W. Dodge & Son, and which they obtained possession of in August, 1876. The manufactory was originally located in a building on Fulton Street, but this being destroyed by fire, the proprietors recommenced business in the building formerly occupied by the Eureka Bark-Mill Company, where they are at present. The works turn out about twelve or fifteen thousand gross of finished corks per day, and employ about thirty men.

The marble, brownstone, and granite yard carried on by Lewis Haldy was established in 1849. Mr. Haldy produces all kinds of plain and ornamental stone-work for building purposes and a great variety of monuments.

F. O. Sturgis engaged in the planing-mill and manufacturing business in 1870.

J. P. Stormfeltz, who now has a large manufactory of sash, doors, etc., on North Water Street, began business in 1872.

The Lancaster Planing-Mill was established in 1870 by the Lancaster Door and Sash Company in a small frame building on Beaver Street. In 1873 it passed into the hands of Urban & Burger, who erected the present large building on South Prince Street. At this mill was executed much of the ornamental work of the buildings used for the Centennial Exhibition.

D. B. & D. H. Bartholomew are extensively identified with the manufacture of lumber. The senior member of the present firm has for many years been identified with this branch of trade, and in 1870 the firm as it now exists was formed, and the business considerably increased. The premises occupied on South Prince Street cover an area of about one acre, upon which is erected one frame building, twenty-four by sixty feet in dimensions, for manufacturing purposes, and a number of smaller buildings, sheds, etc., for storage of seasoned lumber. The main building is thoroughly equipped with all the requisite appliances for the manufacture of cedar or poplar cigar-box boards, walnut and poplar table tops, ash boards, planks or scantling of any dimension, picture-frame backs, walnut, cedar, white holly, mahogany, mulberry, cherry, apple, or other woods for brackets, and every description of hard wood for carpenters, stair-builders, wheelwrights, wagon-makers, undertakers, or other uses.

Widmyer & Ricksecker, upholsterers and manufacturers of furniture, are the successors of a house established about thirty-five years since by the father of the senior member of the present firm. The firm employs about fifteen men.

Levi K. Landis started in his present business, that of a general machinist, in 1870. He makes a specialty of the manufacture of Hoover's patent Diamond millstone dressing-machine, which is sold throughout the Union.

An extensive cigar manufactory is conducted by H. L. Stehman on North Queen Street. He employs about thirty skilled workmen, and manufactures between thirty and forty thousand high grade cigars per week, which find market in all parts of the United States. This factory was established in 1870, but its proprietor had a long experience in tobacco handling prior to that time.

Jewelry is manufactured by Edward J. Zahn and

H. M. Shreiner. The former began in partnership with H. L. Zahn in 1854, and has carried on business alone since 1870. Mr. Shreiner has carried on business under his own name since 1878, and was engaged as early as 1845 in the house which he succeeded.

The Empire Steam Breweries are carried on by Lawrence Knapp. The annual product of the brewery on Locust Street alone varies from four to seven thousand barrels.

Conrad Gast & Sons' pottery on Prince and James Streets was established by the senior member of the present firm in 1842, and his son, Amos C. Gast, was admitted as a partner in 1877. They turn out some very attractive specimens of ceramic art, and do a large business.

Another pottery is carried on by Henry Ganse. It was started by his father in 1848.

D. A. Altick & Sons carry on the largest carriage manufactory in the city. The business was started in 1848 by Mr. D. A. Altick, who then occupied a small building on the corner of Duke and Orange Streets. In 1850 he removed to the corner of Orange and Prince, and in 1854 erected the large four-story brick building which the company now occupies.

Steigermalt & Boersom began the manufacture of carriages in 1865. Mr. Boersom became the sole proprietor in 1871, and is now carrying on the business on East King Street, and making about one hundred carriages per year.

S. E. Bailey & Co. are another firm of well-known carriage-makers. They have a large manufactory on North Queen Street and Market Street, which was erected in 1879. The number of men employed by this firm ranges from sixty to seventy-five.

The Co-operative Carriage-Factory, conducted by Messrs. G. W. Killian and Andrew McGinnis, gives employment to a large force of men, and produces a fine line of carriages and buggies in all styles. The works of the company are in a two-story building on East Grant Street.

John J. Hoover started in the same line as the above in 1855, and still carries it on, his shop being on West Grant Street.

The Eagle Spoke-Works were established in 1856, on small capital and in a limited way, by Phillip Lebzelter, who has increased their size and capacity from time to time, until at the present they form one of the most extensive establishments in the city. The main building on Christian Street is three stories high and one hundred by sixty feet in dimensions.

The Lancaster Coach-Works is an establishment of considerable extent, which has grown out of a small business founded about 1849 by S. B. Cox & Co. It subsequently passed into the hands of McKeon, Miley & Co., and in 1877 the firm-name became as at present, Norbeck & Miley. The location of the factory is the corner of Duke and Vine Streets.

Another firm engaged in carriage-building is that of Edgerly & Co., whose works are on Market Street, occupying a three-story brick building. The company consists of Edward Edgerly and John Schaum. There are many other manufactories in the city, but those which are of sufficient importance to be appropriately mentioned are not yet old enough to demand a place in history.

The immense tobacco warehouses in Lancaster are chiefly owned by New York firms, and are spoken of in the general history contained in this volume.

HENRY E. LEMAN, rifle manufacturer of Lancaster, Pa., was born in this city, March 8, 1812. He obtained a practical business education in the private schools of his native place. At the age of sixteen he began learning gun-making with Melchoir Fordney, who was a gun manufacturer in Lancaster during his active business life, and served for three years. From 1831 to 1834 he was a journeyman with George W. Tryon, rifle manufacturer in Philadelphia, and in the latter year established his present business in Lancaster City, in a part of his father's brewery, afterwards carried on at corner of Walnut Street and Cherry Alley, and which he subsequently removed to its present location on James Street. During the first year he received an order from John N. Le ne for fifty rifles, which were shipped to St. Louis for the Indian trade, and his entire manufacture was that year about two hundred and fifty. This business he rapidly increased, caused by the demand for his products, until it has reached thousands annually. His first contract for the government was for one thousand rifles in 1837, during Van Buren's administration, at the time of a treaty with the Indians, and thereafter annually the United States government made a contract with Mr. Lemman for his rifles until 1860. In 1861 he was offered a contract by Gen. Cameron, Secretary of War, for two hundred and fifty thousand rifles, which he declined on account of the uncertainty of the continuance of the war, and the extra necessary machinery required for producing them on short time. But he repaired large numbers, changing them from flint to percussion. His trade has extended largely to the Southern States, and his rifle was the first to supply the Pacific coast and the far West. As far back as 1840 he had a contract to repair muskets for the State at Philadelphia, Harrisburg, and Meadville arsenals. There are few sporting rifles that have a more extended or better reputation than those manufactured at the Lemman Rifle-Works at Lancaster, Pa., every one being made of the best wrought iron and steel, with varnished maple stocks, silver sights, double trigger, bullet-moulds, rifle-wipers, charger, and extra nipples, every rifle being warranted before it leaves Mr. Lemman's works. He is a man widely known and respected, and one whose goods are of too high a standard to need any recommendation.

Mr. Lemman has been a member of both branches of the Common Council of the city, and with George M. Steinman was one of the originators of the sinking fund of the city. Since 1840 he has been identified with Masonic Lodge No. 43, F. and A. M., and was one of the charter members of Lamberton Lodge, No. 476, and is in 1888 a member of the Lancaster Lodge of Perfection, and also a member of the board of trustees of Lancaster Cemetery.

He married, in 1851, Anna (1828-1873), daughter of Louis (1774-1831) and Anna (Hull) (1787-1865) Dubois, of Newburgh, N. Y. Louis Dubois was the son of Louis Dubois (1728-1802) and Rachel Jansen (1735-1807), who were married in 1770. This last Louis Dubois was a descendant of Louis Dubois, a French Huguenot, who fled the persecution in his native country and settled in Ulster County, N. Y., with eleven other families in 1660. The Lemans came in the same ship. The children of Henry E. Leman and Anna Dubois are Henry E., Jr., Samuel W., Adelia, and James Cameron Leman. The sons, Henry E., Jr., and James Cameron, are in business with their father.

The Leumans (now spelled Leman) were French Huguenots, and came to America about 1660 with the Duboises, Deyos, Ferrees, and Lefevres. The Lemans settled in Lancaster County, as also did members of the Ferree and Lefevre families. Another spelling of the name "La Mont" for the family of Leman was used in their early history. The ancestor of the Lemans settled in Paradise township, and became the founder of the family here. Daniel, grandfather of Henry E. Leman, married a Miss Ferree, and resided on the homestead property in Paradise township. Jacob Leman (1756-1835), father of our subject, was a farmer near the city and a brewer. He served in the company of Pequea Rangers during the Revolutionary war, and his high sense of honor forbade him to accept a pension for his services, because he considered this sum intended for the soldiers and their families who were in pecuniary need, and not for those who were in comfortable circumstances. He succeeded to his father's homestead in Paradise township by will, which was occupied afterwards by his younger brother, and he also dropped the letter "a" from the original name "Leaman." His wife Catherine (1773-1856), whom he married in 1792, was a daughter of Leonard Eichholtz, whose family were among the early settlers of Lancaster. Their children were Catherine (1796-1857); Maria (1798-1872), wife of Thomas I. Barry, of Baltimore, who died in Mexico during the war; George (1800-1830); Rebecca, born in 1802, first the wife of the late Dr. Galbraith, of Bainbridge, and now the widow of Col. James Cameron, killed at first battle of Bull Run, resides in Lancaster City; Joseph (1805-1832); Susan (1807-1836); Ann Caroline (1809-1851); Henry E.; Elizabeth Cecilia (1814-1834); and Margaret Adelia (1817-1842).

Jacob Leman's father is supposed to be the progenitor of the family here, and his initials, "D. L.," are upon his tombstone in East Lampeter township, near Soudersburg.

Cemeteries.—In the year 1746 Lots 212 and 213, situated on the east side of Prince Street, near Chestnut Street, were donated by James Hamilton, Esq., to the Moravian Church for burial purposes. The grounds were used for many years, and until the Lancaster City and Woodland Hill Cemeteries were laid out for public use, since which time but few funerals have been made there.

In the year 1836, Martin Shreiner (whose remains now repose in it) laid out a private cemetery at the corner of Chestnut and Mulberry Streets, which is known as Concord Cemetery. It is tastefully laid out, and well ornamented with shrubbery. A large number of burials have been made in the little inclosure, and there is room for few more. The fame of this burial-place rests chiefly upon the fact that its earth incloses the dust of the "Great Commoner," Thaddeus Stevens. His grave is marked by a massive but simple marble and granite monument, which bears upon the north side the inscription:

"THADDEUS STEVENS.
Born at Danville, Caledonia County, Vermont,
April 4, 1792.
Died at Washington, D.C., August 11, 1868."

and upon the south side these characteristic words:

"I repose in this quiet and secluded spot, not from any preference for solitude, but finding other cemeteries limited, as to race, by charter rules, I have chosen this that I might illustrate in my death the principles which I advocated through a long life,—EQUALITY OF MAN BEFORE HIS CREATOR."

Mr. Stevens owned lots in two or more other cemeteries.

For more than a century the people of the German Reformed congregation had used as a place of sepulture a plot of ground set aside for that purpose adjoining the church. In the year 1846, the members of that church having a difficulty in finding places for burial in the old ground, agitated the question of establishing a cemetery for the city of Lancaster. The enterprise found favor with the people, and on the 14th of December, 1846, the consistory of the German Reformed Church passed the following resolution: "Resolved that the Lot of Ten Acres of Land on the New Holland Turnpike now the property of D. Longnecker be purchased for a Grave Yard provided it will suit the purpose." A committee appointed reported, December 21st, that it could be obtained. A committee was then appointed to purchase the lot and to obtain a charter. The lot was purchased, and a charter was obtained bearing date March 8, 1847. The plot was designated as the "Lancaster Cemetery." The movement met with general approbation, and people from other denominations purchased lots. The grounds were laid out under the direction of the Rev. N. Keyes, who at that time was pastor of the German Reformed Church. The first interments were of two children, June 6, 1848. The next year it was suggested that other denominations have a voice in the management of the grounds. This suggestion met with favor from the German Reformed Church. Arrangements were made for the change, the new company refunding the money expended for the purchase of the property. The old charter was surrendered, and a new one granted April 26, 1850. Under the new management ten acres of ground additional were purchased and laid out into lots.

In the year 1873 a chapel was erected at the main entrance of the cemetery, at a cost of ten thousand dollars, and dedicated in October of that year with appropriate ceremonies; a historical discourse, from which these facts are obtained, was delivered by the Rev. J. I. Mombert. The presidents, secretaries, and treasurers since the organization are here given: Presidents, David Longnecker, Emanuel Schaeffer, Peter Long, Daniel Heitsch, John I. Hartman; Secretaries, A. G. Helfenstein, Charles M. Erben, Christian Gast, P. K. Breneman, John Zimmerman, Joseph Samson; Treasurer, Benjamin C. Bachman, Adam Wolf, Christian Gast.

On the 3d of October, 1849, a movement was inaugurated in the vestry of the Lutheran Trinity Church for the purchase of a piece of ground for a new cemetery, which resulted in the laying out of the beautiful "Woodward Hill Cemetery." On the 10th of November, 1849, the committee was appointed to select a site for the proposed cemetery, and at a subsequent meeting of the vestry the committee reported that they had purchased of Em. C. Reigart, Esq., a lot of ground for that purpose, containing twelve acres, one quarter, and thirty perches. The committee asked permission to employ a landscape surveyor to lay off the grounds into lots, walks, etc. After the purchase of the property the vestry, on Nov. 4, 1850, elected the following nine persons as trustees of the cemetery: Messrs. Adam Keller, Dr. F. A. Muhlenberg, John Ehler, John Hamilton, John F. Long, Frederick Sehner, Judge Lewis, C. Kieffer, and Henry Reed. A very general desire having been expressed by the citizens of Lancaster that the cemetery should be made a public cemetery, under the management of stockholders, the vestry, after due consideration of the subject, acceded to the desire. At the meeting of the vestry, therefore, held Jan. 25, 1851, C. Hager, Esq., made the following statement, viz., "That the cemetery committee have appointed Judge Lewis their chairman, and also moved that a committee be appointed to transfer the cemetery to the stockholders, through their trustees, upon certain conditions, to be hereafter approved by this vestry." Whereupon a committee of three members of the vestry was appointed, viz., C. Hager, George Musser, and F. W. Beates, to confer with the cemetery committee for the purpose of carrying the above into effect. It was resolved, on motion of Dr. F. A. Muhlenberg, that the committee have discretionary power either to take a mortgage on the lawn for the amount to be paid for the cemetery, and receive the interest for the first two or three years in lots, or, if willing to purchase and pay the cash, to receive it. On the 2d of February, 1852, the cemetery committee reported that they had executed a deed of conveyance to the proper persons and secured payment for the same by a bond and mortgage. The committee was directed to purchase fifty cemetery lots for the use of the congregation, and also to settle and close up the whole business to the best of their judgment and ability. In this way the cemetery, which was originally undertaken and established by the Lutheran Church of the Holy Trinity, passed into the hands of an independent company.

Says the Rev. Dr. Krotel, to whose memorial volume we are indebted for most of the facts related in this article, "Woodward Hill Cemetery has already received many a silent inhabitant, and among them many of those who were active in its establishment. Its location near the city, and yet in a direction in which it is not likely to be crowded by the growth of the city, with the Conestoga winding along its base, the beautiful and peaceful rural prospect which is presented from almost every part of it, and the number of flourishing trees and evergreens render it one of the most beautiful of cemeteries."

Upon the organization of the Woodward Hill Cemetery Company, Christian Kieffer was chosen president, and John F. Long secretary. In addition to the grounds laid out by the Lutheran Church twelve acres adjoining were purchased, and subsequently, in 1881, seven acres more on the south side was added, making about thirty-two acres. The grounds were laid out uniformly in 1851, and the chapel erected that year. The main entrance to the grounds is through a broad avenue from South Queen Street.

In this cemetery is the tomb of James Buchanan. His monument is a plain but huge block of white marble, with the simple inscription:

"Here Rest the Remains of
JAMES BUCHANAN,

Fifteenth President of the United States.

Born in Franklin County, Pa., April 23, 1791; died at Wheatland, June 1, 1868."

The trustees of Woodward Hill Cemetery, in addition to the ground purchased of the Lutheran Church, purchased twelve and a half acres additional, making twenty-five acres. This was laid out into lots, walks, and drives. A charter was obtained on the 29th of March, 1851.

About the year 1854 Zion's Lutheran Church, through the vestry, purchased a few acres of ground on South Queen Street, adjoining the Woodward Hill Cemetery, and laid it out into lots for the use of members of the church and congregation.

Early burials of the members of St. Mary's (Catholic) Church were made in grounds adjoining the church. About the year 1857, Mr. Michael Malone donated to St. Mary's Church six acres of ground lying on the New Holland Turnpike, adjoining Lancaster Cemetery. Improvements were commenced in March, 1858, and the grounds were beautifully laid out and ornamented with evergreens and other trees. Since that time many of those who were buried in the old churchyard have been removed to the new grounds.

Lancaster and Millersville Street Railroad.—

This convenient means of local transit was established in 1874, the road being constructed under the charter of the Lancaster and Reading Narrow-Gauge Railroad, at an expense of about $38,000. Rolling stock was placed on the track in the fall of 1874, and began running soon after. In 1877 an extension was made from the Millersville terminus, westerly, to the present stables, a distance of about one-quarter of a mile. After its completion the road was leased to J. C. Cowel, who operated it until the year 1876, when it passed into the control of John G. Brenner, lessee, who carried it on for a period of about ten and a half months. The company, after conducting it a few months, leased it to Dr. P. W. Hiestand for a period of five years. Since April 2, 1882, when his lease expired, the company, of which John C. Hager is president and Charles Dennis secretary, has operated the line very successfully.

Building and Loan Associations.—Several building and loan associations have arisen, flourished, and fallen in the past fifteen years, and there are now in existence the American, Union, and People's.

The American was organized in December, 1868, under the provisions of a general act of Assembly passed April 12, 1859, and met with success from the start. The receipts for the year ending Dec. 31, 1882, were $29,500.71, and the assets were stated as $57,078.81. There were then one thousand and fifty-seven shares, the total value of which was $57,068.49. The officers for 1883 are the following: President, R. Blickenderfer; Vice-Presidents, Daniel G. Baker, E. E. Snyder; Secretary, E. J. Erisman; Treasurer, John D. Skiles; Financial Committee, William T. Jeffries, William F. Humble, B. F. Benedict; Auditors, Daniel G. Baker, John H. Baumgardner, Oliver Poland. The stock is divided into fifteen series, five of which have matured.

The Union Building and Loan Association was organized April 30, 1875, and chartered June 23d of the same year. The report for six months, ending May 28, 1883, shows a cash account of $36,280; profit and loss, $8218.96; assets, $75,177.97. The stock is divided into thirteen hundred and forty-eight shares, which are embraced in sixteen series. Their total value is $73,642.74.

The officers for 1883 are: President, H. S. Gara; Vice President, Charles A. Heinitsh; Secretary, A. H. Ball; Treasurer, Dana Graham; Directors, John A. Arnold, Daniel G. Baker, Joel S. Eby, John Hull, G. Edward Hegener, J. B. Kaufman, John B. Rehm, C. Widmyer, George E. Zellers; Auditors, J. K. Barr, Jacob Gable, D. E. Long.

The People's Building and Loan Association was organized in June, 1875, and a charter obtained on the 22d of that month. It has a capital stock of $500,000, which was divided into 1250 shares of a par value of $400 each. The sixteenth semi-annual report for the half-year ending June 30, 1883, shows that the stock is divided into sixteen series, containing 509½ shares each series, reaching a value of $37,271.56. The cash accounts were $10,886.01; and the assets $37,433.71.

The officers for 1883 are: President, H. R. Breneman; Vice-President, Martin Kreider; Secretary, A. S. Miller; Treasurer, Dr. A. J. Herr; Directors, James H. Marshall, Phares W. Fry, John Dickel, R. A. Smith, H. B. Cochran, Charles F. Miller, D. P. Rosenmiller, R. M. Agnew, P. C. Snyder; Auditors, William E. Kreider, A. A. Herr, J. E. Zecher; Solicitor, A. C. Reincohl.

These building associations have been very useful and valuable institutions to the community, as they have been the means of securing to hundreds of families, who otherwise could not have procured them, comfortable and permanent homes.

Lighting the City by Electricity.—The propriety of lighting the city by means of some one of the systems of electric lights recently invented was favorably considered in 1881. Several propositions were received from different companies during that year and the early part of 1882, and duly laid by the Lamp Committee before the Councils. The plans and the terms proposed by the Maxim Electric Light and Power Company being considered the best, the committee was authorized to enter into contract with that company, and did so on June 9, 1882.

By the terms of this contract the company agreed to furnish to the city one hundred and twenty electric lamps, to be erected according to the rules laid down by the New York and Philadelphia Fire Underwriters; to place the same in such locations as the Lamp Committee should direct; to light them with electric light every night in the year such length of time as the committee should designate; to keep said lights clean, repaired, and in good working order; and to have each light equal to two thousand candle-lights, French measurement. For the plant and for light furnished for a period of one year the city agreed to pay sixteen thousand eight hundred dollars, and the Maxim Company entered into bond in the sum of ten thousand dollars well and faithfully to comply with the terms of its contract.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

SAMUEL F. DALE.

Samuel F. Dale was born in Chester County, Pa., July 15, 1778, and died in Lancaster City, Sept. 1, 1842. He removed from Northumberland County to Venango in 1800, and there engaged as deputy surveyor under Gen. Cochran. He represented the district composed of Venango and Mercer Counties in the State Legislature from 1807 to 1813, and was lieutenant-colonel of a regiment in defending the Northern frontier in the war of 1812-14.

In the latter year he removed to Lancaster City, where he resided until his death, having his residence in the central part of the city, fronting on Centre Square. He was an alderman of Lancaster for many years, very much interested in school and church matters, and in 1819 was appointed associate judge of Lancaster County by Governor Snyder, which position he filled with dignity and credit until his death. Judge Dale was well read, conservative in his opinions, a man of sound judgment, and characterized by a high sense of honor in all the relations of life. He was a member of the Presbyterian Church at Lancaster.

He married his first wife, Eliza Gundecker, in 1812, who bore him children: Ann Mary, Michael Gundecker, Samuel Futhy, William Walter, John James, Elizabeth Gundecker (wife of William Black, of St. Louis), Catherine Clementine Matilda (wife of Robert A. Evans, banker, of Lancaster), and Charles Henry Walter Dale.

His second wife, Leah, whom he married April 29, 1834, was a daughter of John Adam Lightner (1743-1798) and Leah Ferree (1757-1841), of Lampeter township, was born in Leacock township May 18, 1789, and survives in 1883. She is a woman of superior intelligence, furnished most of the facts for this sketch, and a member of the Episcopal Church, to which her mother also belonged. Adam and Maud Lightner came from Holland with two of their sons, Nathaniel and Adam, in 1717, and settled in Leacock township, Lancaster Co., Pa. One son, William A. Lightner, remained in Holland, and subsequently resided in India. Adam settled in York County, Pa. Nathaniel (1709-1782), grandfather of Mrs. Dale, married, in 1731, Margaret La Rue (1713-1794), a native of France, and resided on the old homestead in Leacock township. John Adam Lightner, son of Nathaniel, and father of Mrs. Dale, was born on the homestead in Leacock, where he resided most of his life. He removed to the Philadelphia turnpike, on the Pequea Creek, about eight miles from Lancaster, where, just prior to his death, he erected a brick residence in 1795, the homestead of Mrs. Dale since the death of her husband, and of her nephew, Col. Joel Le Fevre Lightner. The children of John Adam and Leah (Ferree) Lightner are Rachel, born 1777, wife of William Henderson; Joel, born 1779, father of Col. Joel Le Fevre Lightner; Jane, born 1781, wife of David Witmer; Margaret, born 1783, wife of Dr. J. Ankrin; Mary, born 1785, wife of John B. Henderson; Nathaniel F., born 1787; Leah and Isaac Lightner, born 1794. John Adam Lightner served a little time in the Revolutionary war, was a member of the Lutheran Church at New Holland, and was a man much respected. Both himself and father were farmers.

Col. Joel Le Fevre Lightner, mentioned above, is a man of sound judgment, judicious management, and held in high esteem for integrity by his townsmen, and he is trustee, administrator, or executor of a large number of estates.

THE STEINMAN FAMILY.

Christian Frederick Steinman (1711-1760), a native of Dresden, Saxony, married Anna Regina Rosin (1717-1788). Their eldest son, George Michael, born at Erfurt, in 1738, sailed with Moravian colonists from Zist for St. Petersburg in 1767, and the next year was one of the zealous band who founded Serepta, in Astrakhan, and there settled and married in 1793. The parents embarked for Pennsylvania as a fruitful field for missionary labor, and settled at Bethlehem, where another son, John Frederick (1752-1823), was born. The Moravian Church records at Lititz, Lancaster Co., Pa., report that Christian Frederick Steinman arrived with his family at that new ecclesiastical establishment in November, 1756, and that he had been appointed to oversee and take care of the workmen who were to build the saw- and grist-mill near the town, on the stream issuing from the great Lititz Spring. After a large part of this work was done the church authorities changed the site of the mill to a spot quite a mile below the village, whither "Brother and Sister Steinman removed in April, 1757, taking up their abode in a house bought by the brethren." They returned to Bethlehem in 1758, but in October of the next year returned to Lititz as permanent residents, where he died, being the first married man who had died in the new settlement, and the fifth person buried in the Moravian cemetery, his grave being numbered "5," and the seventh from the main entrance walk, in the second row from the south end of the graveyard, in its southwestern corner. His widow removed with her son, John Frederick, to Lancaster, there married John Christopher Heyne, and died without issue of her second marriage.

John Christopher Heyne established a tin- and copper-ware business in Lancaster in 1764, on the present site of the George M. Steinman & Co.'s hardware-store, which John Frederick Steinman continued to carry on after the death of John Christopher Heyne, in 1781,—a business which in his hands and in those of his descendants, has expanded into one of the largest and most opulent hardware houses in the country. John Frederick Steinman was Burgess of Lancaster in 1800, and elected chief Burgess in 1801. He married, in 1777, Sybilla Margaretha Mayer (1753-1831), eldest daughter of George Ludwig and Maria Barbara (Diemer) Mayer, of Lancaster. George Ludwig Mayer (1727-1793), a native of Ulm, came to America in 1752; his wife, a native of the same place, died in Lancaster in 1777, and was buried in Trinity churchyard, her husband being buried there, and noted on the church records as an old member thereof. The children of this union are George Michael Stefnman (1779-1799), went to Cape François, San Domingo, with his uncles, Jacob and John Mayer, the former United States consul there, and with the latter largely associated in commercial enterprises and there died of yellow fever; Anna Maria (1780-1844), wife of George Bryan, clerk of the State Senate and auditor-general; Rebecca Regina (1782-1845), wife of Daniel Dinkle, died at Carlisle, Pa.; Susanna Juliana (1785-1817), wife of Joseph Cottrell, hardware merchant of Columbia and Lancaster; Sybilla Amelia (1786-1839), wife of John Christian Ernst, a farmer and merchant of Easton, Pa.; John Frederick, born at Lancaster, Dec. 19, 1789; and Eva Henrietta Steinman (1791-1842), wife of Richard Treat Leech, farmer and merchant of Pittsburgh, Pa.

Of these, the only son, John Frederick Steinman, succeeded, on attaining his majority, to his father's mercantile business in Lancaster City, which he developed into large proportions, and conducted with great success until his retirement from the business, in 1849, when he transferred it to his eldest son, George M. Steinman, who had been his partner since 1836. He was a non-commissioned officer of a volunteer company in the war of 1812, and marched to Elktown. He was first president of the Conestoga Steam Cotton-Mill Company, organized by citizens of Lancaster; active in the City Councils for many years, and a member of the first Select Council of the city, chief organizer of the school system of the city, and a director of the school board for a number of years, over which he was first to preside; took an active part in building the first reservoir, and, while he took a deep interest in the prosperity of his own, the Moravian, church, he was liberal in his opinions of other religious denominations. His public spirit led him to assist in all worthy local enterprises. He survives in 1888, in his ninety-fourth year, the oldest native resident of the city, and represents a generation long since passed away, the founders of many of our institutions and places of business, which have contributed largely to the growth and prosperity of the city of Lancaster. His first wife, Maria Gill, of Lancaster, whom he married Sept. 5, 1811, died Nov. 25, 1818, having borne him one son and three daughters,—Henrietta Dickert, born March 1, 1813, became the wife of George H. Bomberger, of Lancaster; George Michael, born July 11, 1815; Margaretta Rosina (1817-1817); and Mary Gill Steinman, born Oct. 14, 1818, wife of Elam D. Hurst, of Lancaster. By his second marriage, in 1824, to Mary Smith (1794-1851), daughter of Charles Fahnestock, of Chester County, Pa., he had children: Susan Smith, Margaretta Sybilla, Charles Fahnestock, Rebecca, John Frederick, Amelia, and Andrew Jackson Steinman, born Oct. 10, 1836, by profession a lawyer, one of the proprietors and the senior editor of the Lancaster Daily Intelligencer, and chairman of the Penn Iron Company.

George Michael Steinman, eldest son of John Frederick and Maria Steinman, obtained an academic education in the private school of the eminent teacher, John Gummare, of Burlington, N. J. At the age of eighteen he went into business with his father in Lancaster, to which he succeeded upon his father's retirement in 1849, as before stated, greatly enlarging the business and extending the patronage of the trade in jobbing and retail. He conducted the business until 1869, when he associated with himself as partners his son, George Steinman, and Capt. George M. Franklin, under the firm-name of George M. Steinman & Co., which firm continues trade at the old stand at 26 and 28 West King Street in 1888. Mr. Steinman is a public-spirited citizen, and has filled many places of trust and honor. He was a member of the Common Council of the city of Lancaster for some eleven years, president of the Council for eight years, and a director of the school board for eleven years, of which he was president from 1846 until 1854. He took an active part in building the second reservoir for the city and the Central Market-House, and was one of the originators of the sinking-fund of the city. A Union Democrat during the late civil war, he was one of the first to raise his voice in defense of the Union, and to assist in raising troops to put down the Rebellion. He was a candidate for Congress from this district, and received a flattering vote, although defeated at the polls by Hon. Thaddeus Stevens by a small majority in one of the most bitter partisan campaigns in Lancaster County.

George Michael Steinman married, April 5, 1838, Elizabeth Frederika, daughter of John Myer, of Lancaster, who was born Dec. 3, 1816. They have one son and two daughters,—Sarah Myer, wife of Capt. George M. Franklin, a member of the firm of George M. Steinman & Co.; Mary Elizabeth; and George Steinman, member of the same mercantile firm before mentioned.

RICHARD McGRANN.

Richard McGrann (1794-1867), a native of Ireland, came to America in 1819, then without means, but a young man of indomitable perseverance and a well-balanced mind. He was a man of warm impulses, unimpeachable integrity, and great public spirit, and at the time of his decease the Philadelphia Press said of him, "Richard McGrann was well known in Pennsylvania as one of the most enterprising and courageous contractors in the State. The elegant bridge which spans the Schuylkill at the end of Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, is a lasting and most creditable monument of his labor; the Pennsylvania and Northern Central Railroad, as well as many other lines, testify to his success."

Among the public works constructed by Mr. McGrann were: The State Railroad between Lancaster and Philadelphia, Lehigh Canal, Raritan and Union Canals, the Welland Canal, portions of the Erie Railroad, a large part of the heavy work of the main line of the Pennsylvania Railroad; and, in connection with other gentlemen, nearly the whole of the North Pennsylvania Railroad. The Lehigh and Susquehanna Railroad, including the bridge across the Delaware and Lehigh at Easton, Pa., was his last public work, and he died while constructing the railroad bridge at the latter place.

Mr. McGrann settled in the township of Manheim, Lancaster Co., in 1835, where he built a house in 1838, and there kept his residence until his death, the property being owned since by his son, Bernard J. McGrann, an engraving of which appears in this work. He was never solicitous of public place or the emoluments of office, although he was a man of large influence in the county.

His wife, whom he married before leaving Ireland, was Alice, daughter of Bartley Sheridan, who bore him eight children, and died in 1848. The eldest died young; Bridget became the wife of Hugh Fitzpatrick; Richard; Elizabeth became the wife of John McGovern; John; Alice R. is the wife of Hon. John T. MacGonigle, mayor of the city of Lancaster; Patrick F. Bernard; and Bernard J. McGrann, only two of whom, Mrs. MacGonigle and the youngest son, survive in 1882.

Bernard J. McGrann, youngest son of Richard McGrann, was born on the homestead in Manheim township, Lancaster Co., June 24, 1837, and has resided there since. He obtained his education at the public schools of Lancaster and at Mount St. Mary's College, Emmittsburg, Md. From 1854, after completing his studies until 1870, he devoted nearly his whole time to agricultural pursuits on the home farm, and upon the death of his father succeeded him in the firm of Reed, McGrann & Co., bankers in Lancaster, whose banking-house was established in 1857. Mr. McGrann has added largely to the homestead real estate in Lancaster County, and is among the extensive growers of leaf tobacco. Seeming to inherit the spirit of enterprise from his father, since 1870 he has been largely engaged in the construction of public works in Pennsylvania.

In company with others he built the Catawissa Extension Railroad to Williamsport, in 1870, ready for the rolling-stock, and subsequently graded a portion of the Bound Brook Railroad, extending from Jenkintown to the New Jersey line, including the bridge across the Delaware. Without partners he located and constructed the Pittsburgh and Lake Erie Railroad from Pittsburgh to Youngstown, Ohio, a distance of seventy miles, including a bridge across the Ohio, ninety-five feet above the water, with a channel span one hundred and forty-six feet in length. This, his last public work, he began in 1878. He married in 1872, January 3d, Mrs. Mary, widow of the late William F. Kelly, and daughter of Philip Dougherty, of Harrisburg, Pa., by whom he has two children, Richard Philip and Francis McGrann.

THOMAS BAUMGARDNER.

The progenitor of the Baumgardner family in York, Pa., was Leonard, a native of Germany, who first settled at York on coming to America, where he died in 1821. By his wife, Barbara, he had children,—Thomas (1783-1872), a hatter and farmer, whose wife was Elizabeth (1782-1850), a daughter of Jacob Gartman, of York, married in 1805; Daniel, Mrs. Benjamin Weiser, and Mrs. Jenkins Crothers, of the same place. Of these, Thomas, father of our subject, had children,—Abraham (1806-1841), hatter, of York; Isaac (1808-1837), also a hatter; Ann Mary (1809-1811); Jacob (1811-1857), merchant in York and Lancaster, dying at the latter place; Eliza (1812-1833), wife of Jacob Upp; Joseph (1815-1862), currier at York; Thomas, subject of this sketch; Catharine, born in 1819, widow of the late John J. Cochran, journalist, of York and Lancaster, who died in 1879, aged sixty-three; and Henry Baumgardner, born in 1821.

The latter finished his education in the Pennsylvania College, at Gettysburg, and came to Lancaster in 1839, where he has been closely identified with its business interests since, a period of forty-four years. He was in the mercantile business until 1861, and has been since largely interested with his brother Thomas in the coal business. In 1872 he established the Beverly cordage-works, in New Jersey; was one of the originators of the cotton-mill industry of Lancaster; built five large tobacco houses in Lancaster, in 1870 and 1871, on Lemon Street; was one of the founders of the Gas-Light and Fuel Company; a member of the school board and Common Council for a number of years, and has done efficient service on the Finance Committee. His first wife, Anna Louisa, daughter of Christopher Kurtz, whom he married in 1844, bore him children,—Clara Louisa, wife of Rev. R. W. Hufford, a Lutheran minister; Henry Kurtz, manager of the cordage-works at Beverly; Anna Mary, wife of J. F. Cross, of Philadelphia; and William T. Baumgardner. His present wife is Mary Salina, daughter of James Prosser, and widow of the late J. Cadwell.

Thomas Baumgardner, of Lancaster, was born in York, York Co., Pa., Dec. 20, 1816. He obtained a practical education in boyhood in the school of his native place, but at the early age of thirteen began his business life, which has been constant, active, and worthy of notice in the history of Lancaster City, extending through a period of fifty-four years. For five years he was a clerk in Thomas C. Lano's store, at Carlisle, Pa., and in March, 1835, came to Lancaster, where he was a clerk in the store of Henry P. Carson for eighteen months, and afterwards, until 1840, his partner in business. In the latter year he purchased a property on the northwest corner of North Queen Street and Centre Square, and opened mercantile business on his own account, which he continued until 1852. In 1842 he began to deal in coal with an annual sale of one thousand tons, which was brought down the Susquehanna to Columbia from Wilkesbarre in arks, and afterwards in canal-boats, and subsequently associated with himself in this business his brother, Henry, and later, his son, John H. Their sales annually in Lancaster reach some twenty-two thousand tons, while the whole amount supplied the city is some eighty thousand tons. The Baumgardners were only preceded in the coal business in Lancaster by one Robert Johnson, who dealt in it in a small way for five years previous. They are also extensive miners and shippers of coal from the Shamokin Valley, and interested in the Enterprise and Franklin Mines, having offices, for the better control of their trade, at No. 811 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, and in the Trinity Building, New York City. Thomas Baumgardner was the first shipper of anthracite coal to Boston from the Shamokin Valley, shipping it by canal and river to Delaware City, and from thence by vessel. He is largely interested with Capt. George M. Franklin in the Sand Mining Industry of Lewistown, Mifflin Co., which furnishes the finest glass sand in the United States, shipping it to other States, and is a large holder of various iron founding interests of Pulaski County, Va.

In 1844, Mr. Baumgardner was one of the originators of the cotton-mill industry of Lancaster, contributing largely in the construction of the several mills, and he is a member of the firm of Shenk, Bausman, Carpenter & Co., owners of Cotton-Mill No. 4, Lancaster. He was formerly a valued director in the Philadelphia and Sunbury Railroad, in the Lancaster County Bank, in the Lancaster Bank, in the Lancaster Savings Institution, and in the Northumberland County National Bank, from which he has now retired, and he is a director in the Lancaster Fire Insurance Company, and of the Reading and Columbia Railroad Company. He obtained a charter from the State Legislature, and built the Enterprise Railroad in 1868, which he sold soon after to the Reading Railroad Company. In 1869 he built the Junction and Breakwater Railroad, in Delaware, of which he was the principal owner, and subsequently sold it to the Old Dominion Steamship Company, retaining an influential share in its management. He is president of the Enterprise Coal Company, a director and stockholder in the Green Serpentine Marble Company of Harford County, Md., the only mine of the kind known in the world, with office in Wilmington, Del., and in connection with his brother and son herein mentioned, and five other citizens of Lancaster, in 1876, built the Lancaster City Gas-Works, holding a large interest therein as stockholder and director of the Lancaster Gas-Light and Fuel Company. Outside these interests, Mr. Baumgardner carries on farming near the city and a flour-mill on Pequea Creek in Pequea township, and is a director of the Lutheran Observer Company of Philadelphia.

Although unassisted financially in starting out in life, by industry, far-seeing and judicious management, practical ideas, and correct business habits, he ranks among the foremost business men of the county and State, and while he has avoided politics and never sought either political place or the emoluments of office, he has aided with time and means all worthy public and local enterprises.

He married March 5, 1840, Susan Ann, daughter of John and Ann Mary (Boyer) Hoff, of Lancaster. Their children are Mary Elizabeth, wife of Edwin Eberman, a lumber merchant of Lancaster; John H., a graduate of Philadelphia Polytechnic College, in the class of 1863, and in business with his father; Ellen Louisa, widow of the late James Patterson, a lawyer of Lancaster; Margaretta Ann, wife of Wilson H. Jenkins, a lawyer of Camden, N. J.; Susan Ann, wife of F. R. Howell, in the marble business in Lancaster; David L., deceased; Eliza Atlee, wife of Paul Gerhart, a commission merchant of Lancaster.

The progenitor of the Hoff family here was John George Hoff (1733-1816), a native of Westerburg, Germany, married Justina Margareta Schnertzel (1743-1806) in 1761. He, with his wife and three children, came to America, landing at Philadelphia in August, 1765, and soon after settled in Lancaster, where he followed the business of watch- and clock-maker the remainder of his life, and reared his family of fourteen children.

One son, John (1776-1818), was a watch- and clock-maker in Lancaster, cashier of the Farmers' Bank, and treasurer of the old Lutheran Church. His wife, Ann Mary Boyer (1779-1853), bore him children,—Anna C., born in 1801, wife of Henry R. Reed, banker in Lancaster; Anna Maria (1803-1825), wife of Henry P. Carson, merchant in Lancaster; Margaret Justina, born in 1805; Justina Rebecca, born in 1808; Ann Eliza (1809-1871), was the wife of Dr. Washington L. Atlee, of Philadelphia; George Frederick, born in 1810, watch-maker in Lancaster; John George, born in 1812, merchant in Waterloo, Iowa; Henry A. Hope, born in 1814, engineer, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Ann Louisa, born in 1817, died young; and Susan Ann, born in 1819, wife of Thomas Baumgardner, of Lancaster, subject of this sketch.

PATRICK McEVROY.

Patrick McEvoy (1805-1870), a native of Mount Mallick, Queen's County, Ireland, came to America in 1823, and, like many others who have left kindred and friends to better their condition in a foreign land, so he also, with little but a robust constitution and willing hands, while yet in his minority, met the obstacles incident to a stranger striving for place. Returning to Ireland, he married, in July, 1835, Julia Maher (1813-62), a native of the same place as himself, and a daughter of Timothy and Mary (Gorman) Maher. With his wife he again crossed the ocean, and soon became the business partner of Mr. Malone. His self-reliance and enterprising spirit led him to engage largely in business, and in a few years he became one of the most extensive railroad contractors in this country. He had large contracts in the construction of the Pennsylvania Central Railroad, the New York and Erie, on the Susquehanna Tide-Water Canal, and in the neighboring State of New Jersey. He built the section of the Pennsylvania Central Railroad at Kittanning Point, which is regarded by railroad men as one of the finest pieces of work in the United States. At the time of his death he was engaged in completing a very large contract for the Philadelphia and Erie Railroad Company, in constructing Bennett's Branch Railway, eighteen miles in length, at Driftwood. Mr. McEvoy became a member of the banking-house of Evans, McEvoy & Co., Lancaster City, in 1867; was the owner of large real estate, a stockholder of the Pennsylvania Central Railroad, a director of the Lancaster, Mount Joy and Middletown, and of the Conestoga and Big Spring Valley Turnpike Companies, and also a director of the old Lancaster Bank. He visited Ireland five years prior to his decease, and spent considerable time among the scenes of his youth. In the fall of 1864 he was chosen a Presidential elector on the Democratic ticket, and he was a consistent member of St. Mary's Catholic Church, of Lancaster, and a liberal contributor to all worthy objects brought to his notice. Mr. McEvoy purchased a valuable homestead on the Harrisburg turnpike, in Manheim township, just outside the city, about 1840, upon which he resided afterwards until his death. Mr. McEvoy was one of the founders of the Buchanan, McEvoy, and Reynolds Relief Fund, and he bequeathed various amounts of money to the Boys' Orphan Asylum, Philadelphia, to the Catholic College at Overbrook, to erect a mortuary chapel in the Catholic Cemetery at Lancaster, and was liberal in his contributions to various charitable objects, not forgetting munificent donations for the needy of his native country.

Timothy Maher, before alluded to, landed in New York from Ireland in 1847, where his wife soon afterward died. He died not long afterward in Lancaster. Three of their children died before coming to America, and four sons, all mechanics, and three daughters accompanied their parents here. The sons all became contractors, and were engaged for many years in the construction of public works in this country. Patrick resides in West Philadelphia; John (deceased); Daniel (deceased) was a partner with Patrick McEvoy and James Purcell in building the Indiana Branch of the Pennsylvania Railroad in 1854-55; Timothy, resides in West Philadelphia; Julia, wife of Patrick McEvoy, before mentioned; Mary, born Sept. 2, 1815, was married in 1836 to James Dunn (1813-1847), who was born near Mount Mallick, Queen's County, Ireland, and died soon after arriving in this country; and Honora Maher. After the death of her husband, Mrs. Dunn settled in Lancaster, where she has since resided. One son, whose portrait appears in this work, James Timothy Dunn, born Aug. 17, 1837, in Mount Mallick, died in Lancaster April 21, 1872. He obtained his early instruction in the public schools in his native country and at Lancaster City, and completed his education at St. Francis' College, at Loretto. He was engaged in constructing a railroad in New Jersey with his uncle, Patrick Maher; was agent of the Waynesburg Branch of the Pennsylvania Railroad, and subsequently transferred to an important position at Williamsport, Pa. Returning to Lancaster, he was first a clerk in the office of the collector of internal revenue at Lancaster, under Mr. Strickler, and afterward appointed deputy collector, having charge of the office and business. In 1867 he took charge of his uncle's (Mr. McEvoy's) interest in the banking-house of Evans, McEvoy & Co., Lancaster, where he remained for a time, and then was made superintendent by Mr. McEvoy of the construction of the Bennett's Branch of the Pennsylvania Railroad at Driftwood. He was a young man of quick perception, ready business ability, and had the confidence and esteem of all who knew him. The other children are Mrs. William E. Lant, of Lancaster; Mrs. John A. Mullen, died Aug. 26, 1878, aged thirty-four years; and Anna H. Dunn, who died July 19, 1872, aged twenty-five years.

JACOB GRIEL.

Jacob Griel, son of John Frederick and Elizabeth (Goll) Griel, was born in Württemberg, Germany, June 2, 1804. His parents were wine-growers; both died in their native country and left three children,—Rosina, Sophia, and Jacob.

In 1819, Jacob, then a lad of only fifteen years, set out for America, leaving friends and home. He landed in Philadelphia on September 13th, having in money only one dollar, but owing sixty. Thus he found himself in a new country and among strangers. Before leaving home he had worked as an apprentice for one year at shoemaking. He at once after landing set out on foot for Lancaster, his future home, where for four years he applied himself as a journeyman shoemaker, and saved enough of his earnings to start in a small way the shoe business for himself. This he continued successfully on North Queen Street, near the Square, until 1843, when he opened a dry-goods store on the same street. He continued mercantile business until 1853, and retired from trade, having, by his honest dealing and judicious management, not only acquired a fair competency, but had during these years retained the confidence of the community. In 1836, Mr. Griel had purchased sixty-four acres of land adjoining the city, which, in 1888, includes the extension of Orange, Chestnut, Walnut, James, and Lemon Streets, and College Avenue, west of Charlotte Street.

The elevated site for the college grounds he sold for that purpose, and what was then common farm lands is now a desirable part of the city of Lancaster for private residences.

Since his retirement from trade his time has been largely taken up in the improvement of this real estate, and through his son, John Frederick, he has erected on this property one hundred and sixty-nine brick houses, sixty-one of which he owns. Besides, he has laid out the extensions of the several streets above named, and Pine, Lancaster Avenue, and Nevin Streets crossing them on this property. Thus, from a penniless boy, Mr. Griel has become the largest real-estate owner in Lancaster, and has contributed more buildings to the city than any other man. He has led a quiet and unostentatious life, free from a desire for political honor or official place. He is a member of the Lutheran Church of the Holy Trinity, of Lancaster, and has always been a liberal contributor to all worthy enterprises and charitable objects in the vicinity.

He married, April 23, 1831, Margaret, daughter of John Fravel, of Philadelphia, who was born in 1813, and died March 25, 1844. His second wife, Sarah Angelina, a daughter of Dr. Aylesberry, of Philadelphia, died Sept. 15, 1880, aged sixty years, leaving no children. His children by his first marriage are John Frederick, born March 11, 1832, learned mercantile business in Philadelphia, and then carried on the hosiery and glove trade from 1851 to 1871, when he returned to Lancaster, and has since had largely the charge of his father's business; Jacob, born Dec. 22, 1833, carried on mercantile business in Philadelphia, returned in 1873, and with his brother is a manufacturer of brick on the property before mentioned; Mary, born Sept. 4, 1840, is the wife of Henry L. Sultzbach, of Marietta; Margaret Louisa, born Jan. 28, 1848, died March 28, 1883, was the wife of H. H. Betts, of Philadelphia.

BARTON B. MARTIN.

Barton B. Martin was born in the township of East Earl, near the eastern confines of Lancaster County, and is a descendant of the old and hardy Swiss Mennonite stock who peopled that section early in the last century. His father, John Martin, was one of the most progressive men of his day, prompt to identify himself with every movement which promised to open up to his locality increased facilities for education or to secure local improvements.

Barton was the eldest of a family of nine children, all of whom to-day are well and widely known and respected as men and women of integrity and worth in the communities in which they live.

He was equipped for the battle of life only by such ordinary common school education as the outlying country districts of his day afforded, but he carried into the struggle what no amount of academic training could supply the want of,—indomitable pluck, tireless energy, and a determination to succeed. These qualities he evinced early in life, and the circumscribed conditions of his farm-home being unsuited to their development, he, at the age of fourteen, started into life on his own responsibility as a clerk in the store of a relative at Rohrerstown, in Lancaster County. His keen business insight led him to look for greater opportunity in a wider field, and before he became of age he had embarked in his career as a country merchant at Millersville, in the same county. Here he did for many years a lucrative and extensive business, and became known far and wide for his principles of fair dealing and strict integrity. It was here that he married his estimable wife, Catharine Rohrer, and after his marriage became a devoted and earnest laborer in the Lutheran Church.

A numerous family springing up around him, and noting anxiously the meagre array of educational privileges the locality afforded, he, together with Rev. L. M. Hobbs, D. S. Bare, and several others of the more liberal and energetic citizens of that vicinity, in the summer of 1854 embarked in an enterprise for erecting at Millersville an institution for academic training. It was regarded as a bold and hazardous enterprise, public sentiment was unfriendly, and at the inception of the enterprise in not a few instances hostile; but with Mr. Martin to conclude was to carry out, and then and there were laid the foundations of what afterwards developed into the celebrated Millersville State Normal School, which from that day to the present (1883) has in one way and another, during its distinguished career, sent forth from its walls over twenty thousand students to bless the disinterested sacrifices of its founders. In laying the foundations deep and wide for the noble edifice which afterwards was to crown their labors, no one contributed more liberally both of time and means than the subject of our sketch; and on one occasion, when the infant institution was threatened with destruction by creditors who were no longer willing to await the tardy subscriptions upon which its credit had depended, Mr. Martin promptly came forward, and with his personal indorsement of the obligations which had been contracted in its erection, secured it a new lease of life. He long remained a trustee and faithful friend of the institution, and after seeing its success firmly established by being taken under the patronage of the Commonwealth, he withdrew from its direction, which has been so ably and successfully continued by others to the present time.

In 1859, Mr. Martin closed out his business at Millersville, and erected an extensive dry-goods store at the corner of West King and Prince Streets, in Lancaster City. After a few years, his health becoming impaired by the too great confinement incident to mercantile life, he entered upon the lumber and coal trade, in which he has been continuously engaged for the past thirty years. During that period he has been interested in the manufacture of lumber in the counties of Clinton, Centre, and Cambria, where he owns extensive tracts of white-pine lands. He also had wholesale yards at Lock Haven and Columbia, and a retail yard at Lancaster. His career as a lumberman has been a busy one; handling many millions of feet of lumber annually, he has become well and widely known as one of the ablest men in his line in Eastern Pennsylvania.

He is at present the principal member of the extensive coal-mining firm of Martin & Co., whose properties cover several thousands of acres of the best bituminous coal-field of Cambria County, and who have offices at Philadelphia and Lancaster, and shipping wharves at Greenwich Point, South Amboy, and Baltimore. He is likewise interested in some thousands of acres of timber- and coal-lands on the line of the new Vanderbilt railroad, which penetrates the Clearfield region.

During the war he was an earnest supporter of the government, taking an open and active part in every movement to further the cause of the Union, and contributing liberally of his efforts and means to that end. His beautiful home, "West Lawn," at Lancaster, is notably one of the handsomest pieces of architecture in the county, and one of the best specimens of a villa residence in the State.

Mr. Martin is the father of nine children, two sons and seven daughters. The eldest son, E. K. Martin, Esq., an attorney at the Lancaster bar, with an extensive practice, is a graduate of Amherst College, in the class of 1871. He entered the army at the outbreak of the war, when only sixteen years of age, as a member of the Seventy-ninth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, served through the entire war, participated in the great engagements and campaigns in the Southwest under Sherman, Thomas, Buell, and Rosecrans. After the war he completed his college course, subsequently attended Columbia College Law-School, in New York City, and in 1876, as a student of Hon. Thomas E. Franklin, was admitted to practice at the Lancaster bar.

John C. Martin, the second son, is a member of the firm of Martin & Co.; has for years been associated with his father in the manufacture of lumber and the mining of coal. He, too, entered the army at a very early age, as a lieutenant of Company D, One Hundred and Fifty-seventh Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and was for a long time a member of the staff of Gen. Tyler, of the Army of the Potomac. He was an efficient officer and is a successful business man.

HON. ANTHONY E. ROBERTS.

Hon. Anthony E. Roberts, one of the oldest residents of Lancaster, was born in Chester County Oct. 29, 1803, and removed with his parents to Lancaster County in 1804. He received in early life only the limited opportunities for obtaining an education afforded by the common school. He commenced his business life as a clerk in a country store at New Holland, where he remained until 1839, when he was elected sheriff of Lancaster County and served acceptably for one term of three years, returning to New Holland. In 1849 he was appointed marshal of the Eastern District of Pennsylvania by President Taylor, and served in that capacity with ability until the close of President Fillmore's administration. In the fall of 1854, Mr. Roberts was elected on the American ticket to the United States Congress from the Ninth Congressional District, composed of Lancaster County. In 1855 and 1856 he was found among the leaders in organizing the Republican party, strongly advocated its principles, and in the fall of the latter year was re-elected and returned to Congress, where he served upon important committees. He took up his residence in Lancaster City in 1855, where he has since been engaged somewhat in real-estate operations and the improvement of his property on North Prince Street. Mr. Roberts comes from German and Welsh ancestors, and is characterized by firmly-established principles of justice and right to his fellow-men, independent thought and action, and a well-balanced, reading, and reasoning mind. Throughout life he has sought to fulfill the full duties of the citizen, and both in public and private life enjoyed the confidence of those who knew him.

Hon. Thaddeus Stevens named Mr. Roberts, with Edward McPherson and Hon. Oliver J. Dickey, as executors of his will.

In 1840 he married Emma, daughter of Andrew Bushong, by whom he has twelve children. Dr. Isaac E. Roberts, his eldest son, is a graduate of Union College and of Pennsylvania University, and a practicing physician in Philadelphia.

CAPT. EDWARD EDGERLY.

Capt. Edward Edgerly was born in Lancaster City, Sept. 18, 1837, and obtained his early education in the public schools of the city. At the age of eighteen he began learning carriage-making with Cox & Suydam in Lancaster, and after two and a half years here, one year in Philadelphia, and two years more as a journeyman at his trade in Lancaster, he, in 1859, established business for himself, Edgerly & Parvin, manufacturing carriage wood-work in Lancaster. On Sept. 16, 1861, patriotic to his country's call, he enlisted as orderly sergeant, Company K, Seventy-ninth Pennsylvania Volunteers, Col. H. A. Hambright commanding, and served for three years and ten months. This regiment was mostly engaged in the Western campaigns, and a part of the Army of the Cumberland, being successively commanded by Gens. Buell, Rosecrans, Thomas, and Sherman. He was promoted to second lieutenant October, 1862, after the battle of Perryville, and to the rank of captain in 1864, being mustered out of service at Alexandria, July 12, 1865. Capt. Edgerly was engaged in the battles of Perryville, Ky., Stone River, Hoover's Gap, Dalton, Resaca, Kenesaw Mountain, Peach-Tree Creek, around Atlanta, Jonesboro', Sherman's march to the sea, around Savannah, Ivoryboro', and the severe battle of Bentonville. Ill health, resulting from exposure in the army, deterred him from resuming his business upon his return to Lancaster, and for one year he was in the service of the post-office in the city. In 1868 he re-established himself in the carriage manufacturing business on Market Street, Lancaster, Edgerly & Co., where he has carried on a successful business since, mostly for home trade. Capt. Edgerly has served for five years in the Common Council of the city, and in the fall of 1878 was elected on the Republican ticket register of wills for Lancaster County, and served for one term of three years.

He married, in 1858, Rosanna, daughter of John Stehman, who carried on a foundry in Lancaster. The children of this union are Edward Everett, Bertha, Sherman, Anna S., Mary, Harry Emery, Mabel, and Catherine Edgerly.

Thomas Edgerly, the emigrant ancestor, a native of England, came to America, was received an inhabitant at Oyster River, township of Dover, N. H., 19th 1st mo., 1665, and admitted a freeman "At a County Court held at Portsmouth 25th June, 1672," he being at the same time one of the grand jury thereof, and having taken the oath of "fidelity at a training ye 21st June, 1669." In 1684 he was a magistrate, and he was one of the justices before whom the Rev. Joshua Moody was tried at Portsmouth for non-conformity, through the instigation of Edward Canfield, Governor of the province. At the memorable attack on Oyster River settlement, July 18, 1694, his garrison-house was evacuated, and with five others set on fire. As soon as the Indians were gone Thomas Edgerly succeeded in putting out the fire and saved a part of his house. The old Edgerly garrison-house is still standing in Durham (formerly Dover) township. Zachariah, his son, was mortally wounded while trying to escape, with others, in a boat. Thomas Edgerly was living in 1700. His wife, Rebecca, daughter of John and Remembrance Ault, of Oyster River, whom he married Sept. 28, 1665, bore him children,—Zachariah, killed by the Indians; one daughter, made captive by the Indians; Thomas, Samuel, John, and Joseph. Of these, John resided at Oyster River, and owned large real estate, as deeds dated from 1700 to 1728 testify. He was dead in 1740, as the "Junior" was omitted from his nephew's name at that date. His wife, Elizabeth, bore him six children whose names are known,—Elizabeth, John, Zachariah, Joseph, Alice, and Mrs. Joseph Bickford. Of these, Joseph married and resided in Durham. His son, Capt. Edward Edgerly, was killed at the battle of Eutaw Springs, Sept. 8, 1781, and left a son, Capt. Edward Edgerly, who was probably a native of Maryland, and who married, in 1790, Elizabeth, daughter of John Kirk, of Little Britain township, Lancaster Co., Pa. Their son, Gideon Emery Edgerly (1795-1849), was father of Capt. Edward Edgerly, married Elizabeth Keller (1800-1881). He was a hatter in Lancaster City. His children are Jacob, Ann (wife of William Rahl), Harriet (wife of William P. Leonard) Levi, Mary (wife of Luke Suydam), Sarah (wife of John Barnhart), Charlotte (wife of Samuel Gross), and Capt. Edward Edgerly.

A. H. PEACOCK.

A. H. Peacock, manufacturer of iron at Lancaster, Pa., and one of the proprietors of the Conestoga Furnace, was born at Reading, Pa., June 26, 1821. His early education was limited to a few years in the private schools of his native place. The death of his father in 1828, leaving a widow and eleven children, necessitated self-reliance on the part of the children who could earn their own living, and the subject of this sketch dates the beginning of his business career to the time when he was only eight years of age. For thirteen years he was engaged on the Schuylkill Canal. In 1847 he had lain aside enough of his earnings to engage in business on his own account, and from that date until 1863 carried on general mercantile business in Reading. For two and a half years following he was a member of the firm of Hunter & Peacock, iron manufacturers at Mosalem, Berks Co., Pa., and for a year carried on a forge in Oley township, in the same county, formerly owned by Jacob K. Spang. In 1867, Mr. Peacock purchased the blast-furnace at Lancaster, and the firm of Thomas & Peacock conducted the business until 1878, when, on account of the death of his partner, B. B. Thomas, the firm-name was changed in 1879 to Peacock & Thomas, the father's interest being represented by his son, Robert C. Thomas. Under Mr. Peacock's management the business of the furnace has doubled, and in 1883 yields one hundred and fifty tons of pig-iron per week, giving employment to one hundred and fifty men. The hematite ores used in the Conestoga Furnace are mined in Lancaster County, on the line of the Quarryville Railroad, and the mines are owned by the company.

Mr. Peacock, while a resident of Reading, served for several years as a member of the board of control. He is a director of the Penn Iron Company, is interested in other furnaces in different parts of the State, and for seven years (1872 to 1879) was one of the owners of the Howard Iron-Works in Centre County, Pa. He was one of the incorporators of the Lancaster and Reading Narrow-Gauge Railroad, built in 1872, of which he has been president since the death of Maj. M. R. Shenk in 1880.

He married, in 1849, Charlotte K., daughter of Jacob Spang, an iron manufacturer in Berks County, by whom he has seven sons and four daughters. His father, Thomas Peacock (1776-1828), resided in Reading, and was a manufacturer of cut-nails as early as 1804. This business he continued until machinery was introduced about 1815, and supplied the northern part of the State with nails. His wife, Margaret Orth (1791-1874), of Harrisburg, bore him eleven children, of whom the subject of this sketch was next to the youngest.

CHARLES A. HEINITZSCH.

John F. Heinitzsch (now spelled Heinitsh) was receiver of duties for the king of Poland. One of his sons was mayor of Lutzen, consul regens, and a renowned attorney; another son, Carl Heinrich Heinitsh (1738-1803), a native of Lutzen, Saxony, served six years' apprenticeship at Weissenfels, in a mercantile house, beginning in 1753, landed at Philadelphia May 14, 1772, and the same year settled in Lancaster, Pa. For some time he was a clerk for Paul Zantzing, a merchant, but in 1782 founded the drug business in Lancaster, which has been carried on by him and his descendants over a century. He continued the business until his death in 1803, was succeeded by his son, Charles August, until 1816, then by Charles August and his brother, John Frederick, until 1818, by the latter until 1841, when he associated his son, Charles A., with him until his retirement from business in 1849, since which time it has been conducted by the son, subject of this sketch. Carl Heinrich Heinitsh's wife, Sophia Hartoffel (1762-1802), whom he married in 1782, bore him children, —Charles, Henry E., Charlotte (1783-1852), wife of Leonard Eichholtz; Charles August (1786-1823), John Frederick (1792-1858), and Henrietta Maria (1798-1856), wife of James Smith, druggist, of Lancaster. Of these John Frederick served his apprenticeship of five years with his elder brother, apothecary and druggist, and for one year following 1815 was a partner in the drug business with Dr. Samuel Humes, before joining his brother. He removed the business in 1818 from West King Street, where it had been established in the house of Paul Zantzing, to East King Street, and it has been continued in the first and second squares of that street since, and at the present stand, No. 16, since 1841.

John Frederick Heinitsh served in a company of Pennsylvania riflemen at Baltimore in 1814, and was honorably discharged. He was a great lover of the sciences, botany, mineralogy, chemistry, etc.; warden, elder, and secretary of the Lutheran Church of the Holy Trinity for a number of years, and a respected and highly-esteemed citizen of Lancaster. He married, in 1818, Susan (1795-1853), daughter of Christopher Hager, of Lancaster, who bore him children, —Henry Hager, Charles A., Sigmund W., William Edward, merchant, and John Frederick, a druggist in Lancaster, all deceased but the second son, who was born in Lancaster, July 31, 1822. He was educated in the private schools of Lancaster, at Lititz Academy, and at the Pennsylvania College at Gettysburg. At the age of sixteen he began as a clerk in his father's store, and since 1841, a period of forty-two years, he has been identified as an apothecary and druggist in Lancaster, the successor of his father and grandfather.

He was at the first meeting of the American Pharmaceutical Association held at Philadelphia in 1851, became a member of the association in 1856, was once its third vice-president, and was elected its presiding officer at Niagara, N. Y., at its annual meeting in September, 1882. Mr. Heinitsh was one of the founders of the Pennsylvania Pharmaceutical Association, organized at Harrisburg, Feb. 26, 1878, was chosen its president, presided at the annual meeting at Reading in June of the same year, and by re-election was also its presiding officer at the annual meeting at Pittsburgh in June, 1879. Upon the organization of the Lancaster County Pharmaceutical Association in April, 1882, he was chosen its president; William Maulick, vice-president; A. A. Hubley, secretary; and Henry B. Cochran, treasurer. He is identified with the Lutheran Church of Lancaster, and active in promoting all worthy objects brought to his notice. He married, in 1851, Maria, daughter of Henry R. Reed, of Lancaster, and has no surviving children.

Charles August Heinitsh, before mentioned, had a son, Charles Hambright, who was a druggist in Philadelphia and Portsmouth, Va., dying at the latter place in 1853.

Henry E. Heinitsh also had two sons, Edward H. and Henry E., the former a druggist at Columbia, S. C., and the latter a druggist at Spartanburg, S. C.

PATRICK KELLY.

Patrick Kelly, the largest and most successful cattle dealer that ever lived in Lancaster County, died at his residence on Orange Street, in Lancaster City, Aug. 9, 1861, in his sixty-fourth year. He was a native of Ballinascreen, County Derry, Ireland, and came to this country while a young man in 1824, and settled in Lancaster. On July 4, 1841, he married Mrs. Catherine Murray, a daughter of James and Catherine (Sheridan) Duffy, of Marietta, and sister of James Duffy, of that borough, whose sketch is in this work. She was born Jan. 15, 1805, and survives in 1888, having an only surviving child, Miss Agnes Kelly. Before the transportation of stock by rail, Mr. Kelly was largely engaged in purchasing cattle in the Western States, principally in Illinois, and for that purpose employed several men. After the herd was collected, it was driven through the country to Lancaster, often taking from seventy-five to one hundred and twenty days, varying according to the size of the herd and the distance to be driven. These cattle, upon reaching here, were disposed of to farmers and others, mostly in Lancaster and Chester Counties and in Eastern markets, for which purpose Mr. Kelly kept several salesmen. In his business relations he became widely known for his integrity and honest dealing in his extensive purchases and sales, and this reputation was not only established here, but wherever he was known. This was his life business, and he was closely devoted to it for a period of about thirty-seven years. In 1857, Messrs. Patrick Kelly and Richard McGrann were the principals in founding the Reed, McGrann, Kelly & Co.'s banking-house, in Lancaster, with which he was identified until his death. Mr. Kelly received a liberal English education in his native country, was well informed upon the current topics of his time, and was social and frank in his manners. He was a judicious business man, and although unassisted pecuniarily in starting out in life, he accumulated a competency. He was kind-hearted, and frequently assisted others to complete their undertakings, giving them plenty of time to reimburse him for his expenditure. He was identified with St. Mary's Catholic Church of Lancaster, a liberal contributor to its support, with other necessary charities of the city.

One brother, older, Michael, preceded him here, who died in Lancaster, leaving children. His parents were Michael and Catherine (Heron) Kelly, of County Derry, Ireland, and his grandparents were James and Mary Kelly, of the same place.

ISAAC DILLER.

Caspar Diller (1675-1775), of French Huguenot descent, as is shown by documents in possession of the family dating back to Michael Dillar, court-preacher of the Electorate in 1548, a native of Alsace, France (now Germany), was the progenitor of the Diller family in Lancaster County, Pa. He and his wife, Barbara, whom he married in England, and two children settled in the locality of Loch Platz, about one mile south of New Holland, on Mill Creek, in Earl township, about 1729. Here they engaged in agricultural pursuits, and their numerous offspring, numbering some two hundred and fifty in 1880, were mostly located between the Conestoga, near Hinkletown, on the north, and Mill Creek on the south.

Members of this large family have been prominently identified with the medical and legal professions and as ministers of the gospel, as well as with agricultural and other business pursuits, and some have served with distinction in the Revolutionary war and in subsequent struggles for the rights of American citizens in the United States. Among these are Rev. John Baker Clemens, D.D., of Claymont, Del.; the late Rev. Jacob W. Diller, D.D., for the last forty years of his life rector of St. Luke's Church, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Rev. Alonzo P. Diller, S.T.B., of Brooklyn, N. Y.; Rev. Walter North, of Buffalo, N. Y.; Rev. Simon Diller, of Churchtown, Pa. In the medical profession: Dr. David Diller, York Sulphur Springs; Dr. Joseph Moritz Diller, of Ohio; Dr. Samuel Ringwalt, late of New Holland; Dr. H. M. Diller, of Pequea; Dr. John Diller, Maryland; Dr. Charles H. Diller, also of Maryland; Dr. Washington H. Baker, of Philadelphia; Dr. John R. Diller, of Lehigh County, Pa.; Dr. Winfield Scott Yundt, of New Holland; Dr. Willoughby Walling, of Louisville, Ky.; and Dr. Esaias Kinzer, State senator from Lancaster County. Also of soldiers in the Revolutionary war: Maj. Enos Diller, a distinguished officer at the battle of Brandywine; Capt. Roland A. Luther, of the Mexican war; Col. Cyrus Diller, Seventy-sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers; Maj. William S. Diller; Capt. Luther Yundt Diller, wounded at the battle of Cold Harbor; and Lieut. Simon J. Diller, of the late civil war. Isaac R. Diller was prominent in the politics of Pennsylvania before settling in Chicago, was chairman of the Illinois Democratic State Central Committee in 1856, and consul to Bremen during the Buchanan administration; and Dr. Diller Luther is now agent of the Pennsylvania State Board of Charities. Other members of the family have been able lawyers and judges, among whom are Judge George Washington Baker, of San Francisco; Stewart Leidich, member of the Carlisle bar; Horace Roland, Berks County bar; and Horace and Harry Yundt, of the Lancaster County bar.

Caspar Diller had three sons,—Philip Adam, Han Martin, Caspar, Jr.—and seven daughters. Of these, Phillip Adam (1723-77), a native of Pflatz, near Heidelberg, came here with his parents, married Elizabeth (1727-1807), daughter of Leonard Ellmaker, who came from Germany and settled in Earl township in 1726. Their children were Adam, born in 1746; Anna Maria, 1748; Christina, 1750; Magdalena, 1752; Margareta, 1755; Leonard (1759-98); Peter (1761-1816); and Isaac (1763-1835). Of the above, Leonard married Mary Magdaline Hinkle, of Hinkletown, who bore him children: George (1785-1858); Jeremiah, went to Kentucky in 1807, was prosperous in business, and owned and commanded several steamboats on the Mississippi; General Adam, captain of a troop of cavalry in the war of 1812, sheriff of Lancaster County in 1827, and adjutant-general of Pennsylvania for six years following 1830; Elizabeth and Mary Diller. Of these, George A., a native of the county, resided most of his business life in Lancaster City, married Lydia Souder (1785-1845), who bore him children: William; Rev. Jacob W. Diller, D.D., before mentioned; Catharine, wife of John Reilly; George J.; Mary, wife of W. W. Fisher, Chambersburg, Pa.; Samuel; Isaac; and Sarah, first wife of W. W. Fisher, before named. The youngest son, Isaac, is the subject of this sketch, was born in Lancaster City, Feb. 5, 1823. Owing to reverses of his father he had no pecuniary assistance in starting out in life, and after the age of thirteen cared for himself. One year as clerk in a grocery store, from 1836 to 1843 as clerk in the dry-goods store of George Fahnestock, and five years more in the store of John N. Lane, of Lancaster, gave him a reputation for integrity and a knowledge of business enterprises. In 1848 he entered the hardware store of Steinman & Son, Lancaster, as book-keeper, afterwards became a valuable salesman, and from 1860 to 1872 was a partner in the business (George M. Steinman & Co.). Although retiring, he continued business relations with Mr. Steinman in his store until 1877. The same year he succeeded by purchase to the large hardware business on East King Street, established by Christian Mayer in 1790, afterward carried on by George L. Mayer until 1837, and by his son, Henry Mayer, until 1840, but for a time previous to his purchase by Diller & Gross. This business Mr. Diller successfully continues in 1883, assisted by his sons. Mr. Diller has never sought office and never held any political place. He has assisted with his means all worthy enterprises and objects of the city tending to promote the welfare of its citizens. In early life he identified himself with the church as a member, was vestryman of St. James' Episcopal Church for many years, and was one of the founders of St. John's Episcopal Church in 1854, of which he was for many years a chief supporter as well as vestryman and warden. He married, in 1849, Anna, daughter of Jacob Frey and granddaughter of Jacob Frey, one of the early merchants of Lancaster. Their children are Rev. Alonzo P., before mentioned, William F., Charles F., Samuel B., and daughters, Lydia and Anna M. Diller.

COL. JAMES CAMERON.

Col. James Cameron, son of Charles Cameron and brother of Gen. Simon Cameron, was born in Maytown, Lancaster Co., Pa., March 1, 1801. He started out in life without pecuniary assistance, and worked his way by successive steps to distinction. As a young man he was fond of reading and study, and for a time was a partner in the Lycoming Gazette, and in the year 1829 obtained control of the Lancaster Sentinel. He read law with James Buchanan, afterward President of the United States, and Judge Molton C. Rogers, of Lancaster; was admitted to the bar in 1829, served one term as district attorney, and practiced his profession in Lancaster City until 1846. In 1848 he was appointed deputy attorney-general of the Mayor's Court, in place of S. Humes Porter, resigned, having been appointed in 1839 superintendent of motive-power on the Columbia Railroad in place of Andrew Mehaffey. For one year following 1846 he was sutler at New Orleans, during the Mexican war, and in the fall of the next year went to Gosport, Va., where he remained until 1851 engaged in building the steamship "Powhatan," and repairing other vessels for the government. In the latter year he retired to his farm near Milton, Northumberland Co., Pa., where he lived in comparative quiet until the Southern States began to withdraw from the Union. He was then employed a secret agent by the government to intercept dispatches of the seceding States, and otherwise watch their secret movements throughout the South. Upon the breaking out of hostilities, in 1861, he was urged to accept the rank of colonel as commander of the Seventy-ninth New York Highland Regiment by the then Secretary of War, his brother, Gen. Simon Cameron. Although sixty years of age, he responded to the appeal that summoned the loyal sons of the United States to the defense of her insulted flag and her imperiled institutions. Reluctantly at first, but with his whole heart and soul in the work, he accepted this responsible position, and soon had the confidence and esteem of his regiment, which embraced many of the most intelligent and wealthy citizens of the metropolis, thus accepting the conviction that the path of duty and honor was thus providentially opened up before him. His appearance in full uniform at the head of his men when on parade is said to have been very imposing. The regiment was among the first to feel the shock of battle at Bull Run on the fatal 21st of July, and nobly did they do their duty as soldiers and patriots. In the thickest of the fight Col. Cameron fell at the head of his men, nobly waving them on to conflict. His last command, if not his last words were, "Scots, follow me!" He fell, pierced through the heart with a minie-ball, and his body was left in the confusion of the retreat on the field of battle. His name stands beside those early martyrs in the cause of truth and right,—Ellsworth, Baker, and Lyon. Months afterward his body was identified by his devoted wife's miniature being found on it, and brought north for interment. A correspondent speaking of the repulse of the Union army at Bull Run, says,—

"Col. Cameron, who had repeatedly rallied his men, seemed paralyzed at this new reverse; he dropped his sword from his hand and looked a moment at the retreating mass. Some of his men still fired, and when one of his lieutenants came forward for orders about the wounded soldiers, he turned suddenly towards him, faced the battery, and at the same instant a minie-bullet pierced his breast. He fell without a groan. After his fall the rout became complete, and night saw the disheartened army in full retreat toward Fort Corcoran. His widow survives in 1883, and resides in Lancaster City, Pa. She is a daughter of Jacob Leman, and was at the time of her marriage, in 1829, to Col. Cameron the widow of the late Dr. Bertram Galbraith, who practiced medicine at Bainbridge, Lancaster Co.

LEVI SENSENIG.

Levi Sensenig, stock-dealer of Lancaster City, was born in East Earl township, Lancaster Co., Pa., Aug. 27, 1834. His boyhood was spent at home, where he worked in the mill of his father. At the age of twenty he started out in life for himself, unassisted pecuniarily, but possessed of a will to succeed, and an untiring ambition to carve out a competency for himself. Upon the death of his father, in May, 1863, he had accumulated sufficient means in the butcher business and dealing in stock in a general way to enable him to purchase the residence and mill property (Bairs' mill) on the Conestoga formerly occupied by his father, the latter of which he conducted in connection with his other business. He began buying cattle in Ohio, and driving them to Lancaster in droves for sale, prior to the war, and in 1863, as his drove was approaching Gettysburg, a large part of them were slaughtered to supply the Union troops just prior to the memorable battle at that place, for which, however, he received fair compensation. In 1867, Mr. Sensenig was chosen keeper of the Lancaster County prison, took up his residence in the city, and held this position for a term of four years.

At the close of his official term he resumed his business, and made preparations to deal in cattle on a larger scale. At this time the cattle trade was carried on in Lancaster County by some forty dealers, who made their purchases largely in Pittsburgh, the then great cattle mart of Pennsylvania. In 1870, James Steward built a cattle-yard at Lancaster for the reception and shipment of stock, in connection with the Pennsylvania Railroad. The accommodations of this being insufficient for Mr. Sensenig's increasing trade, he built a yard of his own, at the northeastern end of the city, sufficient for the reception of a large herd of cattle or other stock, and by his extensive purchases in Chicago, St. Louis, and Buffalo, as well as Pittsburgh, he in a short time made Lancaster the great central market for the Eastern trade instead of Pittsburgh, and since about 1875 the cattle trade at Lancaster has made rapid advances. The well-fattened cattle received from the West are sent on to New York and Philadelphia, and supply the local trade for one hundred and fifty miles around, while the lean cattle are sold to farmers, who feed and prepare them for market.

The location of Lancaster County, with its richness in grass and grain, and its nearness to Eastern markets, places it far in the advance of almost any other territory of many times its size for the propagation and preparation of stock for market, and it is said that during the winter season as many cattle are fed and made fit for market in Lancaster County as in any two Western States, on account of the superior accommodations for stabling and preparing their food, and at a less cost.

The estimated number fattened during the winter season in Lancaster County is thirty thousand head. By well-directed efforts and judicious management Mr. Sensenig has increased his purchases and sales since 1871 from two thousand to forty thousand head of cattle annually, and at the present time is counted by far the largest dealer in the East. His stock is brought by railroad from different points in the West, and after being properly selected at Lancaster, forwarded to the several markets of the East.

He married, in 1855, Catherine, daughter of Samuel Snyder, of Earl township, who died in 1856. He married his present wife, Emma, daughter of Daniel Hull, in 1863. His children are Daniel H., Edwin (died at the age of six years), Christian H., Harry, and Lillie Grace Sensenig. His father, a miller by trade, carried on this business for fifty-one years. He was a native of Earl township, where he spent his life, and died at the age of seventy years. His mother, Susannah, now seventy-five years of age, is a daughter of Christian Root, a wealthy farmer and miller in East Earl township, who died at the age of sixty years. Their children are John (deceased), Isaac, Daniel (deceased), Maria (deceased, was the wife of John K. Snyder), Elizabeth (deceased, was the wife of Samuel S. Martin), Mattie (wife of Martin Sensenig, of East Earl township), and George R. Sensenig.

His paternal grandfather, John Sensenig, was a wealthy farmer in Earl township, and gave each of his sons a farm. Both his father and grandfather Sensenig were in religious faith Menmonites.

GEORGE W. SCHROYER.

George W. Schroyer was born Sept. 9, 1818, near Lewisburg, Union Co., Pa. Although not born in Lancaster County, he came from Lancaster County stock. His grandfather left his farm near the Coleman estate, in the northeastern part of the county, in the year 1795, and moved to the central part of the State while it was yet a wilderness. His father, Col. Schroyer, kept the hotel across from Lewisburg, and took a prominent part in politics. Mr. Schroyer remained home until 1836, when he went to Harrisburg and served four years' apprenticeship at the printing business under Packer, Barret & Park, who published The Keystone. In 1845 he was married to Miss Anna E. Thompson, daughter of J. B. Thompson, of Harrisburg, and in the fall of that year he purchased the Columbia Spy, which he sold in the latter part of 1847 and returned to Harrisburg, where he remained until 1854, when he came to Lancaster to take charge of the Inland Daily, and in 1856 he left the Inland Daily to become foreman of the Evening Express. His health failing him, he purchased his present home from Dr.

H. E. Muhlenberg in 1863, and after twenty-seven years' labor at the printing business he went to the cultivation of flowers and vegetables. He was the first person in Lancaster County to go into the cultivation of flowers extensively; in fact, he was the pioneer of floriculture in this county. When he purchased his home in 1863 there was only one small green-house; now (1883) he has eight large green-houses, besides a large lot of cold-frames, having over thirty thousand feet of glass. He employs from six to ten men.

His son, Harry A. Schroyer, who was born in Harrisburg, Jan. 29, 1850, and married, Oct. 27, 1875, to Miss Anna V. Myers, daughter of Samuel Myers, of Chambersburg, Pa., assists him in his business, and has charge of the cut-flower department. He has always taken an active part in politics, being a Republican. In 1879 he was elected a member of Common Council from the Ninth Ward by a majority of six, and was the youngest member in Council that year. The following year he was defeated by seven votes. In 1882 he was a delegate to the Republican State Convention, and was the first person to name Marriott Brosius as the candidate for congressman-at-large.

Mr. George W. Schroyer makes the cultivation of roses a specialty, and was the first person to grow tomatoes, cabbage, egg- and pepper-plants in pots. He has done more than any one to develop the taste for floriculture in Lancaster, and deserves a great deal of credit, more so from the fact that when he began in 1863 he knew nothing about the business except what he had read.

CHAPTER XXX.

BOROUGH OF COLUMBIA.<sup>1</sup>

THE thriving borough of Columbia occupies the site of "Shawanah Indian Town," which consisted of two or three dozen wigwams and huts constructed with logs. They were scattered along Shawanese Run principally, but there were others along the run passing through the northern section of the town. A number of these Indians remained at this place for some years after the white settlers came. They never at any time had a valid claim to the land, and were only squatters, subject to the will of William Penn and the "Susquehannocks," who were in turn subjects of the Five Nations of Indians who had conquered them.

This place, which was the scene of many a conflict between the Susquehannocks and the Indians who lived in New York to obtain the mastery over each other, whose bones were left to enrich the soil, has been succeeded by one of the most flourishing towns in the State.

Original Owners of the Town Site and Descent of Title.—The accompanying draft was made by John Taylor for Jeremiah Langhorne soon after he located this land by virtue of an English warrant.

On the "17th and 18th of 11th mo., 1701," William Penn gave a patent to George Beale, of Surrey, in Great Britain, for three thousand acres of land clear of Indian encumbrances. Beale, on the 17th and 18th of October, 1718, sold the same to Jeremiah Langhorne. Richard Hill, Isaac Norris, and James Logan, the loan commissioners, on the 25th day of July, 1717, issued a warrant directed to Isaac Taylor, surveyor of Chester County, to survey to Langhorne five hundred acres along the Susquehanna, a part of the aforesaid three thousand acres. This survey "began at a marked hickory at mouth of a run at River, up river three hundred and twenty-six perches to a post; thence east by James Logan's land five hundred and eighty-nine perches to a post; around by vacant land to an ash at Run seventy-one perches, down run, containing five hundred acres."

Robert Barber purchased this tract Aug. 20, 1726, and was in actual possession of the same for a year or more before Langhorne conveyed the title to him in 1727, for which he paid two hundred pounds. Samuel Blunston and John Wright were witnesses to the execution of the deed. The acknowledgment of Langhorne was taken before John Wright, Sept. 8, 1731, four years after the conveyance was made. The draft hereto annexed explains who and how this tract was divided.

Barber gave a mortgage to the loan commissioners for two hundred pounds for his two hundred and fifty acres. He died before the payments were all made, and by mutual consent between the land commissioners and Barber's children, the former sold the land and conveyed the title to Hannah Barber, the widow of Robert Barber, June 12, 1750. The land was described as bounded by a line extending up the run seventy-one perches, two hundred and forty-five perches to a post, ninety-one perches, by land of John Wright four hundred and thirty-nine perches to a run; thence down run to river, containing two hundred and fifty acres.

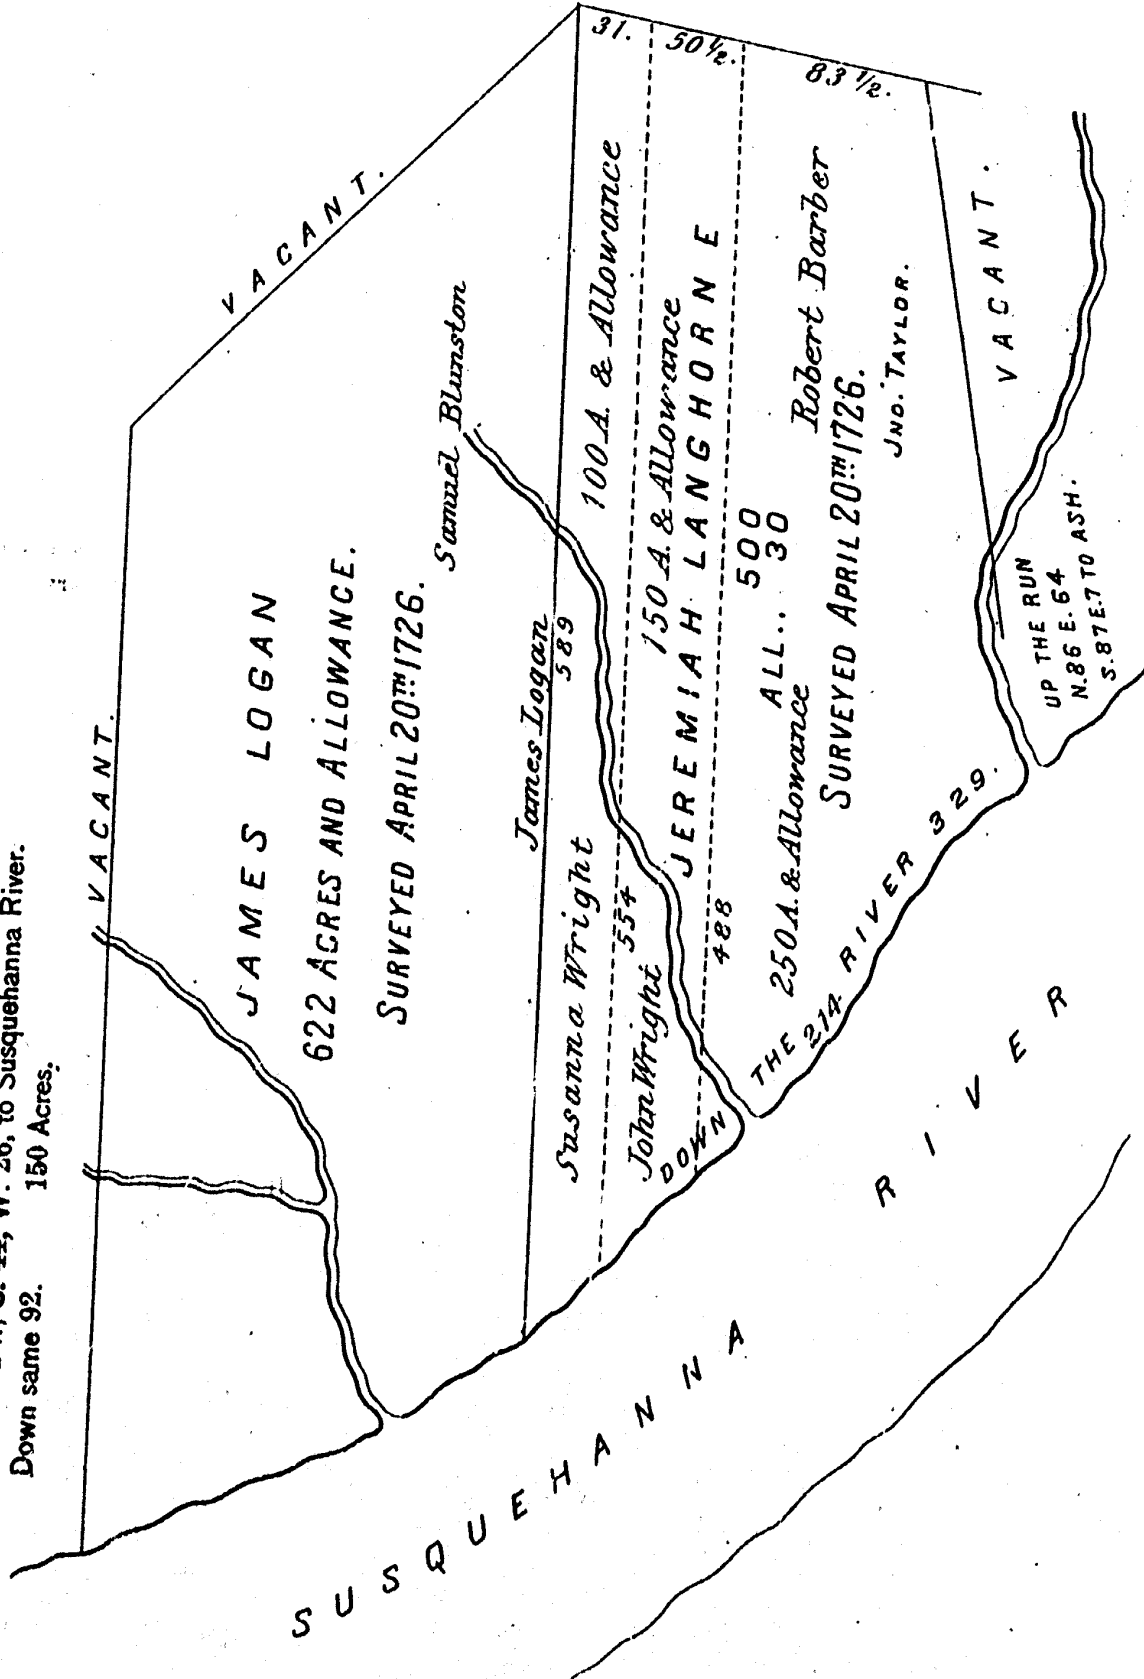

Robert Barber directed how this land should be divided. His widow followed these directions, and conveyed on the 14th day of October, 1761, sixty-two acres to her son Robert. (The Third Ward of the borough embraces this tract.) On April 19, 1770, she conveyed to her son James forty acres, which is now owned by the heirs of Jacob Strickler, E. K. Smith, Samuel Truscott, Michael S. Shuman, and J. W. Stacy, and Fred. S. Bletz, and Henry S. Wolfe.

It appears from the draft that the Langhorne tract was divided on the 26th day of April, 1726, Barber getting two hundred and fifty acres of the lower part, John Wright getting one hundred and fifty acres adjoining on the north, and his daughter, Susannah Wright, one hundred acres adjoining her father on the north. Robert Barber and his wife, Hannah, on the 31st day of August, 1726, made a conveyance for one hundred acres of land to Susannah Wright. Upon the tract belonging to Miss Wright "Old Columbia" was laid out; and upon her father's tract John Wright's addition was built.

Arrival of the First Settlers.—On the 23d day of August, 1726, Samuel Blunston, then of Darby, Chester Co., Pa., purchased from James Logan three hundred acres of land, adjoining Susannah Wright's land on the north; and on the 10th day of January, 1733, he purchased from Logan three hundred acres, which belonged to Logan, as marked on the draft.

On the 2d day of June, 1741, he received a patent from John, Thomas, and Richard Penn for two hundred and twenty-five acres more. It is probable that John Wright was the first one of these pioneer settlers who visited the place where they settled. By an examination of the minutes of Chester Monthly Meeting it appears that he preached to the Indians at Conestoga before this land was purchased by them. Mr. Barber was also one of the assessors for Chester County in 1724-25, and Conestoga was assigned to his district. It was the custom then for the township constables to make a return to the assessors of all the taxables. When the day of appeal came the assessors were assigned to various districts, and they sat generally at some tavern in their district, where the inhabitants went to attend the appeal, when they so desired. Mr. Barber in this way may have also visited the spot. He was the first, however, to move to the place in the spring of 1726, and was followed in the fall of that year by the others.

At that time it was the custom with the loan commissioners to make an agreement with a settler permitting him to take up land upon the condition that he settled and remained upon it for one year, free of charge, and at the end of which time, if he so desired, a patent was granted to him upon the payment of the sum agreed upon. This seems to have been the case with Barber.

When these pioneers came they found a Shawanese village scattered along and near the run which bears their name. The lower part, selected by Mr. Barber, was covered with a heavy growth of large trees, consisting of hickory, oak, and walnut, a fine stream of water running along its southern border, upon which he erected a saw-mill in 1727, a short distance above the Kauffman stone-quarries. Along its northern border Shawanese Run bounded it, and in the centre of the tract a small stream flowed from a spring to the river. He erected his dwelling close to a spring and a few yards from the present dwelling of Jacob O. Stoner.

John Wright built upon his own land, about one hundred yards from the river, upon ground now occupied by dwellings belonging to Abram Bruner. The Wright mansion was torn down in 1874.

Blunston did not build upon the land included in his first survey. He found a more eligible site for a residence upon Susannah Wright's land, and he purchased from her several acres, which was cut out of the northern border of her land, which sloped gently to the river, and upon the northern and southern side of this purchase. This is now occupied by Samuel B. Heise. Part of the dwelling erected by Mr. Blunston is still standing, and may be seen on the north side of Mr. Heise's dwelling. Of the three tracts Mr. Barber's seemed to be the most desirable one, on account of the abundance of timber, water, and superior quality of the land. He was given the first choice of the land.

When John Wright came to the Susquehanna he was a member of the General Assembly, Samuel Blunston a land surveyor.

Both were trusted and held in the highest esteem by John, Thomas, and Richard Penn, and from the day they landed upon the shores of the Susquehanna they led an honorable and busy life.

The northern and southern line, as the same appears upon the draft, forms the boundary of the town. The line on the northeast side does not extend as far in that direction as it appears upon the draft. When the county came to be organized John Wright was appointed one of the justices, and was the presiding justice until he resigned. Samuel Blunston was appointed prothonotary, register, and recorder, and Robert Barber, sheriff.

Wright's Ferry.—In the year 1730, John Wright procured a patent for a ferry. He built a ferry-house, which stood on the north side of Locust Street, near Front. In the rear of this house, which faced the south, was a garden which embraced all of the ground between Bank Alley and to a point about sixty feet from Front Street, and extended as far north as the stone dwelling below Walnut Street. In front of the ferry-house the road leading from Lancaster to the ferry ran, and beyond the road the barn belonging to the ferry-house stood, which was struck by lightning and burned down before the town was laid out. There were several acres of land belonging to the ferry, which extended from Locust Street south to the alley which divided the land of the late John Lowden Wright and James Cresson, and between an old public road (now Second Street) and the river. The garden and this last-described tract were not embraced within the limits of Old Columbia, and it was not divided into building lots until after the erection of the brick ferry-house, which stood where the Pennsylvania round-house now is. The travel over this ferry by emigrants moving south and west was very great. They did not have long trains of wagons to transport their goods, but used pack-horses.

During the dry season stock of all kinds were compelled to ford the river, which was very shallow. The ferry-boats were large "dug-outs" that would carry one or more tons. Persons and their household stuff were placed in them and ferried over. When the water was too high to ford the river with a wagon, two "dug-outs" were lashed together and the wheels placed in each. When horses and cattle in large numbers were to be taken over a canoe was sent in advance, with a person in the stern who led one of the stock with a rope, when all the rest followed. If this was not done, the leader sometimes became confused and swam in a circle or returned to the shore from whence they started. If the leader was not caught and its head turned in the proper direction, they became exhausted and were drowned. After the erection of the new ferry-house and large flat-bottomed boats were introduced, the travel became so great that two days elapsed before some parties could get their "turn." It was no unusual thing to see from one hundred and fifty to two hundred vehicles of various kinds waiting at the ferry-house for their turn, and to serve those who came in regular order the ferryman numbered their vehicles with chalk. The water was often so low at this ferry, by reason of the greater width of the river, that ordinary dug-outs could not be floated across. Hence many travelers sought Anderson's Ferry, three miles farther up the river. Thomas Cresap received a patent for a ferry at "Blue Rock," four miles below Wright's, from Lord Baltimore in 1780, but it was never able to rival the ferry here.

By reason of Mr. Wright's great prominence in public affairs, his ferry became not only a point of local note but well known in Europe, and was spoken of frequently in official papers of the Crown of England. John Wright, Jr., a son of the old pioneer settler, took charge of the western end of the ferry, and built a tavern and ferry-house. He remained upon that side of the river until his death. Although John Wright had been a public speaker at Friends' Meeting, and Barber and Blunston were at one time prominent members of the same society, their intercourse with men of prominence and familiarity with public affairs seem to have swerved them from the routine of habits and discipline adopted by that society, and were not averse to adopting the means most available for the preservation of their homes and the peace of their families and the welfare of the community at large. As the settlement increased around the ferry, the people were put to the inconvenience of traveling to Chikis Creek or Conestoga Creek with their grists. To accommodate the settlers, Samuel Blunston and James Wright (son of John) erected a corn- and grist-mill near the mouth of Shawanese Run, which stood where the road-bed of the Pennsylvania Railroad now is. In the year 1745, Samuel Blunston devised his half of this mill to James Wright. When Gen. Braddock was seeking in vain for supplies from Virginia for his army, he was compelled to appeal to the province of Pennsylvania for help. Among those who responded favorably was our Quaker friend, James Wright, who filled kegs with flour, and sent large quantities upon pack-horses to Raystown (now Bedford) to supply the army. He did not wait until he was paid before he delivered the flour, but acted promptly as a patriot should do, and the emergency required. This little corn-mill was again taxed to supply the Indians to keep them from starving at a time when they were afraid to go out among the farmers to beg or steal from the frontier settlers.

The defeat and disaster which overtook Braddock's army in June, 1755, near Fort Duquesne, was immediately followed by a panic among the frontier settlers, which extended along Cumberland Valley and many miles above Harris' Ferry. The settlers fled for safety to Lancaster County. Many took refuge in Drumore and Little Britain townships, and others sought safety at Wright's Ferry. Rumors of the approach of the savages, who were murdering the frontier settlers, caused great alarm at this place.

The women and children were sent to Philadelphia, and the able-bodied men went to James Wright's mansion, and fortified it. The venerable stone building is standing yet, along Second Street, and is owned and occupied by the descendants of James Wright. The side fronting on Second Street is the rear side of the building. That one facing the river is the proper front. It was a formidable place of defense, and with the appliances and means of warfare then adopted by the Indians they could have made but little impression upon its stone walls and double doors of oak. There were no wooden buildings near it which the savages could set on fire and burn them out. The windows were very narrow, and could easily be used for port-holes. The men who were inside had fire-arms, and it is presumed that James Wright and his Quaker friends were fully cognizant that these weapons of warfare were there and ready to be used. Neither Blunston, Wright, or Barber cared to sell any of their land, or encourage the settlement of the place. A few persons were allowed to squat upon the land and build small cabins. They were tradesmen or laborers, who worked upon their farms. Neither John Wright, or his son, James, who inherited the land at this place, seemed to think that there ought to be a town, or that there was a necessity for one. And it remained for the latter's enterprising and sagacious son, Samuel, to move in that direction.

Columbia Laid Out and Named.—Susanna Wright, daughter of John Wright, Sr., died in 1785, and left her farm of one hundred acres—which is marked upon the "plan" heretofore inserted—to her nephew, Samuel Wright, son of James. In the spring of 1788 he had that part, extending from Front Street back about half of a mile, surveyed and laid out into building lots. On the 25th day of July, 1788, these lots, to the number of one hundred and sixty, were chanced off by lottery. Each "adventurer" paid "fifteen shillings," Pennsylvania currency, for a ticket, which entitled the holder to one lot. The lots upon the plan of the town were numbered, and the holders of the tickets took lots corresponding to such numbers, without regard to their eligibility. These tickets were purchased and held by persons, many of whom lived in different sections of the county and the eastern part of the State, who never became residents of the place, but sold their lots to others at a large advance. Upon the margin of the town "plan" Samuel Wright made the following memorandum before the lottery drawing was made, and thus every one who desired to purchase a ticket could see the plan and understand his intentions. It read as follows:

"The lots from No. 1 to No. 16, inclusive, are 52 feet in front and from 100 to 200 deep." (These lots extend from the stone dwelling on Front Street below Walnut, which stands on lot No. 16, up Front to the Round-House.) "The range from 17 to 30, inclusive, are from 60 to 160 feet front and from 115 to 250 deep." (These lots extend along the north side of Walnut Street from the rear end of the Pennsylvania Railroad passenger depot lot to a point on the west side of Fourth Street.) "The lots in the regular part of the plan are 60 feet front and 101 feet deep, and in general, where the front is narrower the depth is greater, and where the depth is less the front is increased in proportion, so that the lots generally contain above a quarter and not quite a third of an acre each, exclusive of streets and alleys.

"The ground between the Front Lots down to the Road is to be for the use of the Inhabitants of the place for to put any kind of Lumber on. But no buildings to be erected."

Samuel Wright wisely named the town Columbia. It sprang into importance at once, and attracted the attention of the whole country. On the 8d day of September, 1789, Thomas Scott, a member of Congress from the southwestern part of the State, in pursuance of a "notice given," moved "that a permanent residence for the seat of government be fixed." The House immediately resolved itself into Committee of the Whole to take into consideration the motion of Mr. Scott. Benjamin Goodhue, a member from the State of Massachusetts, was the first one to discuss the subject, and in his speech he made the following statement: "The Eastern members, with the members from New York have agreed to fix a place upon national principles without regard to their own convenience, and have turned their minds to the banks of the Susquehanna." This they considered the centre of the population, and in accordance with this view he offered a resolution, "That the permanent Seat of the General Government ought to be in some convenient place on the east bank of the River Susquehanna, in the State of Pennsylvania." Other places were named by members during the discussion. Col. Thomas Hartley, of York, was the first person to mention by name "Wright's Ferry." After the matter had been discussed for some time, he again arose and presented the superior inducements of this place in most eloquent language. He described Wright's Ferry as being on the east bank of the Susquehanna River, etc.

On the following day a motion was made to strike out the east bank of the Susquehanna, but the motion was defeated by a vote of 28 to 28. Michael Jenifer

Stone, a member from Maryland, moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words "east bank" and inserting "banks." This motion was carried by a vote of 26 to 25. An amendment was offered authorizing the president to appoint three commissioners to examine and report an eligible situation on the east bank of the Susquehanna, and an appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars was named in the resolution for the purchase of land for the seat of government. This amendment was carried by a vote of 28 to 21. The bill as amended was passed by the House by a vote of 31 to 17. It was engrossed and sent to the Senate on the 22d day of September, 1789. On the 26th day of September, 1789, the Senate sent a message to the House informing that body that they had passed the bill for establishing the seat of government of the United States, with an amendment, naming a district of ten miles square, on the west side of the river Delaware, which was to include "Germantown." The bill was dropped for the session. At the session of 1790 the subject again came up on July 6th, and was discussed with great warmth and bitterness between the members. There was another measure before Congress, called the "Assumption Bill," in which the members from New England had a great interest. The measure did not have a majority, and in order to carry it its friends formed a combination with the Southern members who were opposed to it, and they resorted to what is known in modern legislative tactics as "log rolling." This measure, which assumed the war debts of the States by the general government, left in its wake great sectional bitterness, which was not allayed until many years had passed.

I have extended the history of the location of the seat of the general government at some length to make clear the fact that "Wright's Ferry" was situated upon the east bank of the river, and not upon the west side. Thoughtless persons have fallen into this error by supposing that "Wrightsville," which was named after the family who gave theirs to the ferry, was then in existence, or that it succeeded "Wright's Ferry." John Wright, Jr., owned the land upon that side of the ferry, but the old mansion farm was upon the east side, and the ferry was very properly described as being upon the east side. This is not written to offend our neighbors over the river, nor to rob them of what is their due, but to establish the truth of history.

The tradition among the descendants of the founder of the place is that the scope of country a mile east from the river was the spot designed for the Federal capital.

Geographical Features of the Locality.—The town was located and built along a gentle slope which faced the river, which at this point was a mile and one-eighth wide. Immediately along its bank there was a narrow strip of low, flat, sandy loam, which was overflowed by water during spring freshets. In width this was from ten to thirty yards. From thence the ground ascended gradually for a distance of two hundred yards; from thence for a thousand yards the ascent was much less. From this slope, which faced the west, one of the grandest and most picturesque landscape scenes in this region was presented to the view. The broad and rapid stream in front was interspersed with islands and rocks, and the waters were often covered with numerous flocks of wild ducks. The western shore presented a succession of abrupt hills of various shapes, and a valley of unsurpassed fertility. Artists have attempted to place upon canvas this picture as it presents itself to the eye, and poets have written in vain to describe it.

The most desirable part of the town in its early days, and that which attracted the attention of settlers, was along Front Street, where they had an unobstructed view of the river and the matchless sunsets. The rapid growth of the town, and the immense business along the river-bank in handling produce and lumber, created a necessity for the erection of warehouses and room to pile lumber. The commerce carried on between the middle and northern section of the State and this place, which became a point of transshipment, was very great. Merchants and adventurers from the eastern part of the State flocked here in great numbers. Those who settled along Front Street did not have an unobstructed view of the river and hills very long, for great quantities of lumber were drawn from rafts and arks and piled upon the shore to dry, and great warehouses were built. Settlers began to build along Locust Street and upon higher ground.

Upon the land of Samuel Blunson two small streams of water ran to the river, both of which had their sources upon or close to the edge of his lands. These streams followed ravines to the river. The elevation along their banks did not assume the dignity of hills, but ran rather abruptly down to the water's edge. Between Walnut and Locust Streets there was also a ravine, which has been filled up since that part of the town has been built. Locust Street, from Bank Alley to Third Street, was laid out along the slope of rolling land, which required several feet digging on the north side and none on the south. There was a ridge between Alley "I" and Perry Street, and the water-flow from the eastern part of what is now known as the Second Ward, found its way along this ridge until it came to a ravine along Perry Street.

Shawanes Run, the largest of these water-courses, has its source three miles northeast of the town. It was fed by a small stream flowing into it from the north, at the borough limits, and by another flowing into it from the east. There was water enough in this stream to run a corn- and grist-mill. A mile farther south was another small stream, which had its source on Robert Barber's land. Along the southern border of this tract there was another and larger stream than either of the others. The topography of the land was such that every part of it was easily drained, and there is no town in the State with better-kept and cleaner streets than Columbia, because of its fine drainage. All of this land was covered with a very heavy growth of the best timber to be found in America. Along the bottom-land at the river-shore there was an abundance of walnut- and buttonwood-trees. Thirty years after this settlement was made there was but eighteen per cent. of the land cleared.

Additions to the Town.—After Samuel Wright laid out the town there remained nine acres and fifty-six perches in connection with the old Ferry House. This extended from the stone dwelling-house on Front Street, near Walnut, to Locust, and from the river to Bank Alley; and on the south side of Locust Street, from Second to Front Street, extending south about three hundred feet. This tract belonged to James Wright's sons, Samuel, John, James, and William Wright, who held it as tenants in common. In October, 1795, the last three conveyed their interest to their brother Samuel, in this tract, in which was also included the Ferry House, kept by Joseph Jeffries. In the year 1794, Samuel Wright laid this tract out into nineteen building lots, and named it "Columbia Continued." The purchaser of lots on the east side of Front Street was also entitled to a lot extending from the river to a line sixty feet west from the east side of Front Street. They did not, however, in all cases avail themselves of this privilege. Between the river-lot it was provided that the owners thereof were to keep in repair canals which extended at right angles from the river to a point within a few yards of Front Street, between every pair of lots, which were used to allow "keel-boats" to enter and unship their produce. When the river was in a flood state the stream was very swift, and the safety of these little river crafts was endangered if left along the shore; hence the necessity for these little inlets for their protection.

Samuel Wright, the eldest son of James, in the year 1788 conveyed to his brother John one hundred and twenty acres, part of his father's estate. This land ran to the river, and was bounded on the north by Samuel Wright's land and on the south by "Shawanes Run."

In the year 1790 he laid out part of this land into about one hundred building lots, "No. 1" commencing at the corner of Second and Union Streets, at St. Joseph's Church, and extending up to Fifth Street on the north side, and from Furnace Alley on the south side to Fourth, down that street on both sides to Mill Street, down Union to a point near Third Street. This plan was named "John Wright's Addition." Subsequently the land along Front, above Union Street, was laid out into thirty-one lots.

In the year 1794 or 1795, Samuel Miller, a prominent and influential Quaker, who came from Downingtown and purchased the Ferry House and two and one-half acres of ground which extended from the Ferry House north to the line of Samuel Bethel's land, and between Front Street and the river, from Frederick Stump. He laid it out into lots, and called it "Miller's Plan."

In the year 1812, Daniel Musser, a lumber merchant, and Amos Buckalew, a school-teacher, purchased several acres of land extending from Union to Perry Streets, and from Second Street to an alley east of Third Street. They held this as tenants in common. They laid it out into building lots, and called it "Musser and Buckalew's Plan." The lots were much smaller than those laid out by Samuel and John Wright. Buckalew was the uncle of the distinguished Democratic ex-Senator, Charles Buckalew.

That part of the town extending from Perry Street south, embracing the old mill-dam, was laid out by Rudy Herr (who came from the manor) and Jacob Rohrer, and was called "Rudy Herr's Addition."

In the year 1813, Robert Magill laid out twenty lots upon Filbert Street, which came to be known as "Sawneytown," after Mr. and Mrs. Sawney, colored people, who were once slaves. Mrs. Sawney was the "queen" of that locality, and ruled her "subjects" most effectually. She did not hesitate to use violent means to enforce submission from those who lived near her. Magill also laid out a number of lots at corner of Third and Union Streets. John Barber and Killian Epley laid out a number of lots along Front Street, below Union Street. This was called "Barber's and Epley's Plan."

The town grew with great rapidity, and many large and substantial brick dwelling-houses along Front and Locust Streets were built.

Samuel Wright reserved a square and a half of ground east of Second Street and in front of his dwelling, expecting that the permanent seat of the State government would eventually be located at Columbia. For more than ten years this question was agitated, and the popular sentiment of the people throughout the eastern section of the State, so far as it could be ascertained, was in favor of this place. But, unfortunately, there was no person from the neighborhood who was a representative in the Legislature who could watch and urge the superior claims of the place. Samuel Wright was a Quaker, and he did not resort to the various means usually adopted to induce the members of the Legislature to enact the law fixing the place where the permanent capital was to be. Mr. Harris was unceasing in his importunities with members while the Legislature was in session at Lancaster, and after several years of hard work succeeded in carrying off the prize.

The limits of the town were not extended beyond the various divisions named until the public improvements which had their terminus here created a necessity for more room and more dwellings. The Pennsylvania Canal terminated in a basin or pool at the southern limits of Bethel's land. Along the Columbia, Marietta, Bainbridge, and Portsmouth turnpike or road, which ran along the eastern side of the canal basin, the State built an office and dwelling, where the collector of tolls and his clerks had their offices. A short distance above it a tavern was built, which was soon succeeded by another one, and in a few years a number of dwellings and store-houses were built. This was upon the land of the Misses Bethel.

The town gradually improved. After the close of the great war of the Rebellion the rapid growth of the place again created a necessity for more room. Amos S. Green and Philip Gossler, who were then in their prime of life, saw their opportunity, and they purchased in 1866 fifty acres of land, which was part of the sixty-two-acre tract which Hannah Barber conveyed to her son Robert. They divided it off into building lots, which they sold rapidly. Large numbers of mechanics and laboring men purchased lots, and commenced the erection of dwellings, beginning by building a back building or kitchen first, to which they afterwards, as they accumulated more means, built an addition in front. This place was named Gossler Green, but it was nicknamed "Kitchen Town," by which term it is more generally known. A new charter was obtained in 1866, and the limits of the borough were extended north and south.

Samuel B. Heise and J. Houston Mifflin, who owned a large portion of the Blunston land, in the northern section of the borough, wisely offered to sell their land for building lots. Streets were extended and lots were bought, upon which their owners commenced the erection of elegant brick mansions. The growth of the place is now almost wholly in that direction.

Public Ground.—When Samuel Wright laid out his land into town lots, he left the plan at the Ferry House, then kept by Joseph Jeffries, where all the adventurers who purchased, or desired to purchase, tickets in the lottery could see where the respective lots were located.

Upon the drawing was the following note or memorandum written by Mr. Wright:

"The grounds between the front lots down to the road, is to be for the use of the inhabitants of the place, for to put any kind of lumber on, but no buildings to be erected."

The road mentioned ran parallel with the river-shore, and twenty or thirty yards distant therefrom. It was used and intended to give free access to and from the ferry and the shad fishery, and also for the convenience of those who purchased produce or lumber from the up-river men. Up to the death of Mr. Wright, in July, 1811, the public ground was doubtless used by all the citizens who purchased lumber, and stored it there to dry free of charge. From this time there accrued a revenue derived from the rents paid by those who used the ground to store lumber upon.

By the fourteenth section of the act of Assembly incorporating the borough, passed Feb. 25, 1814, the corporation was expressly excepted from taking or holding the profits, rents, and emoluments arising from said ground.

Five trustees, who were to be chosen annually by the inhabitants of Old Columbia (by which is meant that part of the town laid out by Samuel Wright), who were to manage and lease or let the public ground.

The sums arising from ground rent were allowed to accumulate until the year 1820, when the same amounted to about two thousand dollars.

The gross sum collected was much larger, but some of it was swallowed up under the head of expenses. The citizens of Old Columbia who had not participated in the enjoyment of these rents became restless and anxious about the matter, and on Tuesday the 14th day of November, 1820, they held a public meeting for the purpose of determining what disposition should be made with this accumulated fund. After a full and free discussion, it was finally decided that it should be applied to the purpose of devising means to carry spring water into said Old Columbia for the use of the inhabitants thereof.

A petition to the Legislature duly setting forth these facts was presented, and on the 31st day of March, 1821, an act was passed which made it lawful for the inhabitants of Old Columbia to elect seven managers annually, who were to be freeholders, and were termed "Managers of the Old Columbia Water Company."

If the revenue arising therefrom exceeded the expenses, a dividend was to be declared, and the money divided among the lot-holders. This was the germ of the Water Company.

This was one of the earliest efforts in the State to supply the inhabitants of an incorporated town with spring water conveyed in pipes under ground.

At an election held in the town hall (then at the southern end of the market-house), April 21, 1821, in pursuance of said act the following-named persons were chosen managers: William P. Beatty, Jacob Forry, Henry Martin, Dr. Thomas Griffith, Jacob Mathiot, Thomas Lloyd, Eli H. Thomas.

At a meeting of the managers held on the 21st day of May following, William P. Beatty was chosen chairman, Thomas Lloyd secretary, and Christian Brennehan treasurer.

On the 5th day of June following, these managers met and directed their treasurer to inform the trustees of the Old Public Ground Company that they were ready to receive, and desired them to pay over all moneys in their hands, in accordance with the act of Assembly.

For the year 1822 the following-named persons rented lots on the public ground. They dealt in lumber, one or two of them also dealt in stone-coal. The public ground took up about one-fifth of the river front of the borough, as then limited. Some idea of the amount of business carried on along the river shore in lumber alone can be had by reference to the following renters:

Thomas Boude, No. 1.....	$35
Stephen Smith, No. 2.....	36
William B. Hunt, No. 3.....	37
Barber & Vaugheu, Nos. 4 and 5.....	77

John Guntner, No. 7.....	40
Abijah Smith, No. 8.....	61
John McKissick, No. 9.....	43
	$359

Thus the annual rentals amounted to three hundred and fifty-nine dollars.

John L. Wright, the only son of Samuel Wright, attained his majority in the year 1822. He claimed to own the strip of land between the road above named and low-water mark. This was a serious matter to the Public Ground Company, and if they did not purchase it free access to the river would be cut off.

On the 14th day of February, 1823, a public meeting of the citizens of Old Columbia was held in the town hall to take into consideration the claim of Mr. Wright to the strip of land along the shore. Legal counsel was employed who advised its purchase, as his title to the same was perfect. The trustees made a settlement with and paid him two thousand dollars, he giving deeds for the property.

In the years 1821-23 the trustees of the Old Columbia Public Ground Company made liberal loans to the water company, which was then a separate corporation.

An act of Assembly was passed April 10, 1826, incorporating the Old Columbia Public Ground Company, which was accepted by the company May 15, 1826. By this act the old trustees were required to transfer the deeds, stock, and moneys to the new corporation.

The first managers elected under this act, on the 3d day of June, 1826, were as follows: James Sweeny, Michael Way, Robert M. Houston, Henry Martin, Eli H. Thomas, Richard Derrick, Jacob Forry, treasurer.

On the 2d day of October, 1826, the board gave John L. Wright four shares of water stock for the ground now occupied by the old reservoir at the corner of Locust and Fifth Streets, which cost one hundred dollars. An expensive litigation has grown out of the ownership of this piece of ground formerly occupied by the reservoir. The matter was tried in the lower court, and is now before the Supreme Court of the State on appeal.

Ten years ago a new and larger reservoir was erected along Sixth Street, two squares farther east when the old reservoir was abandoned. The Public Ground Company then claimed the land, as did also the water company, who sold it to the Methodist Episcopal Church, who erected a chapel upon it.

In 1826 the Public Ground Company owned forty shares of water stock, which cost one thousand dollars. They also made loans to that company amounting to two or more thousand dollars.

When the Columbia and Philadelphia Railroad was completed, in 1832-34, the tracks passed through this property to the canal basin, which terminated near the northern boundary of this property. This improvement greatly enhanced the rentals. The lots were rented by public "outcry" in 1831,—

In the year 1832 the company commenced to wharf the shore. The late John Lowrey was the contractor. At this time the managers were George Zeigler, John Swartz, John M. Heller, James Sweeney, Michael Strein, John Lockard. In the same year the board subscribed for one hundred and twenty shares of water stock, amounting to two thousand five hundred dollars. The expense of wharfing cost two thousand five hundred dollars. From this period the company was frequently involved in litigation, which cost them a good deal of their revenues.

In 1835, Ashbel Green, Esq., was appointed their attorney at a salary of fifteen dollars per annum. (He came from New Jersey. His office was in the dwelling now occupied by Dr. G. W. Berntheisel, on Locust Street, between Third and Fourth Streets.)

Notwithstanding the litigation and mismanagement of the property, a considerable fund was accumulated, and it became an important question with the citizens of Old Columbia as to its disposition.

In 1837 a committee was appointed to ascertain the number of children between the ages of four and twenty-one years of age in Old Columbia. On the 4th day of March this committee reported the number at three hundred and five.

The board then made an appropriation of twelve hundred dollars to establish and maintain schools for these children. They also appointed directors to supervise the schools.

In the year 1838 some of the lots rented for two hundred and fifty dollars each.

In 1841 the company owned two hundred and fifty-five shares of water stock, valued at six thousand four hundred and fifty dollars.

In the same year additional wharfing was made, which cost two thousand six hundred and twenty-three dollars and fourteen cents. Some litigation grew out of this matter, which cost the company several hundred dollars more.

In 1853 the managers were J. Houston Mifflin, Samuel Truscott, William F. Caruthers, Francis Bradley, John Finger, and J. G. Hess.

In the same year the Baltimore and Susquehanna Railroad Company leased a portion of the ground for a passenger and freight depot for twenty-five years for fifteen hundred dollars.

In the year 1854 the company purchased from John L. Wright several acres of land along Lancaster Avenue and east of Locust Street, which surrounded the old reservoir ground.

In the year 1856 they contracted with Michael Clepper for the erection of an academy building, which was to cost eight thousand six hundred and forty dollars. After its erection several acres of land were purchased from J. Houston Mifflin in 1868 for eighteen hundred dollars (which was part of the Bethel estate), and added to the tract purchased from Mr. Wright. The ground now occupies an entire square, extending from Fifth to Sixth Street, and from Locust to Cherry Street, with the exception of a triangular piece fronting on Fifth Street, and known as the Flat-Iron Square. Under the head of Schools a more extended notice will be found of the "institute."

In the year 1849 the Columbia Water Company leased some of the public ground along the river for their use for a long term of years.

The erection of Washington Institute and the purchase of the land adjoining cost over ten thousand dollars, which sum the company borrowed from Joseph Detweiler.

It was supposed that the institute would be a success, but it proved to be a failure financially, and in consequence the company became greatly embarrassed.

In February, 1876, the board leased "Washington Institute" and that part of the grounds purchased from John L. Wright to the board of directors of the public schools of Columbia for a period of twenty years, at an annual rent of four hundred dollars.

On the 14th day of February, 1873, the Public Ground Company rented their ground along the river (excepting the ground below Walnut Street) to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company for a period of nine hundred and ninety-nine years, at an annual rent of six hundred dollars.

The company are in debt a few thousand dollars, which will be paid in three or four years, when they will receive a handsome annual income, which, if wisely expended, will result in doing great good to the citizens of "Old Columbia." Recent efforts have been made to convert the grounds purchased from Mr. Mifflin into a public park, and a number of trees have been planted in the grounds with that view. It seems to be a doubtful policy, however, that would convert a piece of land totally inadequate in its area for that purpose, which, if divided into building lots and sold, would bring a sum large enough to purchase a tract of land many times the size of this one, in the neighborhood of the borough limits, that would be better adapted for a place of recreation.

Public Buildings.—About the year 1814 a market-house was erected upon the lot at the corner of Third and Locust Streets, and running parallel with Third Street. The southern end of this market-house was divided by a partition from the other part, and it was plastered on the inside and used for a town hall and school-room. This was found to be too small for the wants of the town, which grew rapidly until the close of the war of 1812-15. It was built by Calvin Cooper at a cost of six hundred and fifty dollars.

The present market-house was built under authority of an ordinance offered by Robert Crane April 17th, and adopted by Council June 19, 1868. At the same meeting plans were presented, and the floor plan of Mr. Sloan and the front plan of Mr. Hobbs were approved and accepted. The market committee, consisting of Messrs. S. S. Detwiler, David Mullen, and Robert Crane, together with W. W. Upp, constituted the building committee for 1868. In 1869, Alexander Craig succeeded David Mullen, whose term had expired. The contract for building the market-house was awarded to Michael Liphart, Aug. 1, 1868, for $17,000, and work was commenced at once. Samuel Wright was the borough regulator. There were some changes in the original plans, and these, with the allowances for extra work, increased the total cost to $19,656.77. The building was reported as completed, accepted by Council, the final voucher drawn, and the building committee discharged Sept. 17, 1869. The market-house is one hundred and eighteen feet long and eighty feet wide. It is furnished with one hundred and eighty stalls in the inside and thirty-seven under the projecting roof on the outside.

In the month of May, 1828, ground was broken for the erection of a new town hall at the end of the market-house fronting on Locust Street. It was completed in the month of November, 1829. It measured thirty feet in front on Locust Street, and forty feet deep on Third Street. It was built of brick, two stories high, and surmounted by a cupola or steeple, in which was hung a bell weighing three hundred and fifteen pounds. After the erection of the building the citizens raised a considerable sum of money, with which a town clock was purchased and put in the cupola. It was manufactured by Frederick Heiseley & Son, of Harrisburg, at a cost of seven hundred dollars. The entire cost of the town hall was two thousand seven hundred and thirty-one dollars. Evan Green advanced the money for its erection. The borough authorities afterwards issued bonds to cover this debt. Mr. Green sold them to William Kirkpatrick, a merchant in Lancaster. By bad management this debt was allowed to increase, and it was not entirely liquidated until the year 1850. If space permitted, an interesting history might be written of this old town hall, where so much eloquence was expended and amusement afforded, and the many interesting scenes witnessed in the school-room.

A "lock-up," constructed of oak plank set upright, was built upon the market-house lot, on the east side, which was used to confine temporarily the violators of law. It was torn down in 1836, and the basement under the northeast corner of the town hall was fitted up for a "lock-up."

The rapid growth of the town created a necessity for a larger and more imposing structure to accommodate the people. A few spirited citizens started a movement for the erection of a large public hall. The citizens generally were opposed to the creation of a new borough debt, and it became a serious question among the friends of the measure to devise ways and means to raise the necessary funds. An act of Assembly was passed giving the borough officers authority to borrow money. Bonds were issued, and a sufficient sum was realized from their sale to warrant the commencement of the work. The contract was given to Michael Liphart. The old hall was torn down, and the new one, measuring seventy-five feet front by one hundred feet in depth, was erected in its place. One of the finest opera-houses in the State was made on the second story, that will seat comfortably more than a thousand persons. Upon the Locust Street side several elegant store-rooms were constructed, and in the rear space was made for a market. Upon Third Street store-rooms and the chief burgess' office was made, and in the front basement a large room was built.

In the second story front the council-room and borough regulator's office is situated. A tower and belfry, with clock and bell, surmount the building in front.

After the construction of the town hall in 1872, measures were taken to erect a new market-house on the east side of the town hall. It was finished in 1874, and measures eighty by one hundred feet. A basement was constructed under the front end, which is used for a lock-up to detain temporary prisoners. These buildings cost one hundred thousand dollars. The annual rentals of both buildings amount to several thousand dollars more than enough to pay the interest on the bonded debt of the borough.

The pound-house was built in December, 1814. It was intended to confine swine caught running at large in the streets. For many years it was the source of much annoyance to the neighboring farmers, and litigation was followed often by bad blood between citizens and neighbors. Thoughtless or bad boys would sometimes open a gate or take down the bars, and permit the farmers' hogs to wander into the town, where they were taken up by the constable, and put in the pound-house, and their owners were compelled to pay a fine, with costs imposed.

Jacob Strickler, William Wright, and others, sometimes came and forced open the pound-house, and took their swine away. Prisoners were also confined temporarily in the pound-house, and it came to be named the hog-house. It was torn down in 1832, and a lock-up was made in a corner of the cellar of the town hall.

Old Taverns.—When John Wright procured a charter for his ferry, he erected a tavern, which stood on the north side of Locust Street, opposite the depot of the Reading and Columbia Railroad, in the year 1730. It was built of logs, two stories high, with a large room at either end, with a passage-way between. John Wright, Jr., was the first person who kept this tavern. He remained there until he married, in 1734, when he removed to the western side of the ferry, where he built a hotel.

Col. John Lowden, of Revolutionary fame, kept the Ferry House prior to the war. He was the son of Richard Lowden, who married John Wright's daughter. He removed to Buffalo Valley, upon the West Branch of the Susquehanna, from which place he raised a company of volunteers and marched to Boston in 1776.

Joseph Jeffries came from Quaker stock in Chester County. He removed from there, about the year 1774, to Hellam township, York Co., where he kept the Ferry House. He was wagon-master for York County during the Revolutionary war, and at its close, in 1783, he removed to the east side of the ferry and took charge of the Ferry House. He remained there until the year 1794-95, when the heirs of James Wright erected a new brick hotel near the northern line of their property, the site of which is now occupied by the round-house of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, when he took charge of the new hotel. He removed to Lancaster, where he also kept hotel.

Frederick Stump first settled at Vinegar's Ferry above Marietta, after he came to this country from Germany. On account of malarial fever, which was then prevailing among the settlers along the river, he removed to Maytown, where he commenced to keep tavern about the close of the Revolutionary war. From thence he removed to Columbia in 1796, and rented the Ferry House and ferry. On the 14th day of February, 1798, he purchased two acres and Lots Nos. 1, 2, and 3, which adjoined the first-named tract on the south, and all the boats belonging to the ferry, from Samuel Wright for the sum of two thousand eight hundred pounds. The hotel, which was new, stood on Lot No. 1. The two acres mentioned Mr. Stump sold to Samuel Miller, who laid the same out into lots. The ferry was the most profitable one on the river. He purchased the extensive brewery on West King Street west of the Stevens House in Lancaster City, which he afterwards sold to C. Barnitz, of York, Pa. He also purchased a large number of lots in Columbia. He died in Columbia in 1804. His widow and Samuel Evans, administrators of his estate, sold the hotel and other property to Samuel Miller, who rented the hotel and ferry to Joshua Ring. He also ran a line of stages from Lancaster to York.

Mr. Miller sold the hotel and ferry-boats to Thomas Brooks Feb. 14, 1814. The latter died before he obtained possession of the property. His administrators, William and Amos Green, offered the property at public sale on the 24th day of December, 1814. While the vendue was in progress, John Reynolds (father of Gen. Reynolds, who was killed at Gettysburg in 1863) and Jasper Slaymaker, a young lawyer of Lancaster, while on their way to Marietta, and when passing called out to the crier, "Six thousand seven hundred dollars!" They thought nothing more of the matter, but received notice that they were the highest bidders. And thus they became the owners of the "Ferry House." They held this property for twenty years. The erection of the bridge over the river destroyed its profits. They sold the property to John Guy, the famous hotel-keeper of Baltimore. He was born on the Eastern Shore of Maryland. He removed to this county in 1815 and leased the Washington Hotel at Big Chikis, where the Lancaster and Mount Joy turnpike crosses the same. He also established a line of stages, which ran between Lancaster and Harrisburg. From thence he removed to Marietta and kept hotel in the large brick building adjoining Abraham N. Cassell. He purchased a farm a mile farther east, along the Lancaster and Marietta turnpike, from whence he removed to Columbia. His daughter, Ann, married the late Maj. Frederick Haines, of Donegal. The hotel was afterwards purchased by Joseph Black, and was thenceforth called Black's Hotel. After his decease it was purchased by his son, Joseph H. Black, who, by his integrity and good management, built up a very profitable business. He sold the property to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. Their "round-house" occupies the spot where this famous hostelry stood.

The "Sorrel-Horse Hotel" was built by Joseph Jeffries, who had been keeping the hotel upon the western side of the river. It stood at the corner of Walnut and Front Streets, the site of which is now occupied by the passenger depot of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company. It remained in possession of the Jeffries until 1835, when Frank Boggs, who married Maria Jeffries, purchased the property and enlarged it at the northern side. After the death of Mr. Boggs the property was leased by Chip. Parsons, Mrs. Ann Haines, and that prince of landlords, John Barr.

On the opposite corner, adjoining the store of Houston, Barber & Gossler, the Washington Hotel was built by Jacob Gossler, who removed the old frame building, and erected a three-story brick addition fifty-one years ago. He was followed by Daniel Herr and Joseph H. Black, and it is now owned by the latter. The reputation of the house has always been "No. 1."

For a period of forty years after the town was laid out, the principal street through which wagons passed to the ferry was Walnut Street. Hence there were several hotels along that thoroughfare which did a large business. There has been no hotel on that street for many years. The large brick building now owned by Col. McClure was owned by Charles Odell.

Joshua Ring also kept the tavern. Occasionally a wandering theatrical troupe gave performances at this hotel.

Reuben Mullison kept the hotel on the east side of Commerce Street. He was also largely interested, with the late Thomas Collins and others, in several stage lines and was a railroad contractor. When he first came to Columbia he ran the river in the spring of the year as a pilot. He was a very active citizen. His daughter married Thomas A. Scott, the great railroad magnate.

Charles Odell came from the State of New York and settled in Marietta, where he remained one or two years. He married Miss Lockard, of Hempfield, and removed to Columbia, and took charge of the hotel west of Mullison's.

The "Black Horse Tavern," at the corner of Fourth and Walnut Streets, was kept by one Getz originally. He was followed by Henry Knight.

Jacob Comfort kept the brick hotel on Locust Street, on the east side of the Reading and Columbia Railroad depot.

James Sweeney kept tavern in a frame house which stood back from Locust Street fifteen or twenty yards, upon ground which is now occupied by the "Franklin House."

"The Lamb Tavern" was torn down a few years ago to make room for the Columbia National Bank, on Locust Street, between Second and Third Streets. It was a noted tavern in its time. There was a large yard attached to this property into which wagons could be driven, which made it a desirable place for teamsters to stop over night. The Kendricks, Binkley, and Michael Strein (and his son, Jacob, many years after him) kept this tavern.

Ezekiel Cook came from Little Britain township about the year 1812, and first kept tavern in the frame house, of which the Franklin Hotel is the successor, on Locust Street, near Bank Alley. He removed to Marietta, where he kept tavern a few years, when he returned to Columbia again, where he died fifty or more years ago. He was a candidate for sheriff in 1827, but was defeated.

The "Washington Hotel" was built by Jacob Gossler. He was the son of Philip Gossler, who removed from York to Columbia about the year 1798 and established a coal- and lumber-yard. His son, Jacob, married Miss Stump, daughter of Frederick Stump, who owned the ferry and Ferry-House. He dealt largely in real estate. There were fewer changes in the ownership or management of this hotel than in any of the others.

The "Pine Creek Hotel" was kept by Mr. Withers fifty-five years ago, who was succeeded by the late Cornelius Tyson. It is located on Front Street below Union.

Brown's tavern was kept by Jeremiah Brown, who came from Little Britain, seventy years ago.

The "Swan Hotel" was built by Samuel Eberlein eighty years ago. It stood on the north side of Locust Street, near the Columbia National Bank.

Moses Montgomery built a frame tavern on the north side of Locust Street above Third Street eighty years ago. He had been in the Irish Rebellion, and came to America about the year 1799, and settled in Columbia. He raised a company of volunteers in 1812, and was preparing to go into the field when he got into a scuffle with Paul Wolf, who shot through a window at a candle in his house out of pure mischief. He was thrown upon a pile of rails in front of the tavern, and had his collar-bone broken.

In the early history of the place "cherry fairs" and "harvest homes" were quite common. They frequently lasted several days. These were profitable seasons for the landlords.

Old Grist-Mills.—The little corn or grist-mill which stood on the north side of Shawanese Run, a few hundred yards above its mouth, was built of stone, two stories high, and about twenty-five feet square, in the year 1735. It was erected upon land of John Wright, and built by his son, James, and Samuel Blunston, the old pioneer settler. The stream was not large, but there was ample fall to turn an "overshot" wheel of more than twenty feet in diameter, which gave all the power required to drive the machinery long enough to grind the grists of the pioneer settlers.

Samuel Blunston made his will in 1745, and devised to James Wright one-half of the "corn- and grist-mill." This little mill ran day and night in the spring of 1755, grinding flour for Braddock's army, and in 1758 for Gen. Forbes' army. The flour was packed in kegs and carried on pack-horses over the mountains to Fort Bedford. And upon several other occasions the colonial authorities called upon James Wright to supply flour for the use of the associated companies of rangers along the frontiers, and to supply the vagrant Indians at Turkey Hill.

This mill and land belonging to it descended to Samuel Wright, the oldest son of James, and the founder of Columbia, who conveyed it to his brother, John, who laid out that part of Columbia called "John Wright's addition" in the year 1788. On April 1, 1807, James Wright, Jr., son of John, sold the mill, shad-fishery, and fifteen acres of land to John Halde-man, who sold the same, April 14, 1812, to Rudy Herr, of Manor township, for six thousand seven hundred and fifty pounds. Jacob Strickler and his brother-in-law, George Weaver, purchased this mill about the year 1818 from Rudy Herr. They tore down the old stone mill and built one of brick at the corner of Mill and Front Streets. It afterwards came into possession of William Atkins, Jonathan Pusey, George Bogle, and is now owned by McBride and Maulfair, who have introduced new machinery, and manufacture "new process" flour. The mill is almost wholly run by steam power.

The Fairview Grist-Mill is located on the north bank of Barber's Run near its mouth, at the southern boundary line of the borough. This mill was built by James Barber, son of Robert Barber, the pioneer settler, about 1780. On the 7th day of May, 1791, William Barber, Esq., of York, and oldest son of James, sold the mill and fifty-seven acres of land to Judge William A. Atlee, of Lancaster, who resided in the mansion which stood where E. K. Smith, Esq., resides. This property was sold by order of the Orphans' Court. On the 28th day of August, 1795, Alexander Scott, Esq., and Mary, his wife, sold the one-half to Alexander Anderson, who was sold out by Sheriff Michael Rine May 15, 1801, and purchased by James and William Miller. On the 11th day of August, 1801, James Miller, merchant, of Philadelphia, and William Miller, of Washington County, Pa., and Alexander Anderson, of Lancaster, conveyed the property to John Haldeman, of Donegal, and Jacob Strickler, of Hempfield. Mr. Haldeman sold his interest to Mr. Strickler, from whom it went to his son, Jacob, and the latter's son-in-law, Ephraim Hershey, who sold to Samuel Truscott, Michael Shuman, and J. W. Stacy, who now own it.

The first saw-mill erected at Columbia or neighborhood was built by Robert Barber, the pioneer settler in 1727, in the meadow below his dwelling, which stood near Kauffman's stone-quarries. There is nothing now left of it.

Shad Fisheries.—There were but three shad fisheries along the shore prior to the erection of the dam across the river. The first one established was at or near the ferry, in front of the public ground, and belonged to James Wright and his heirs. After his death, when the property came to be divided, in 1788, his son, John Wright, established a fishery near the mouth of Shawanese Run, which was sold with the Shawanese mill property.

Robert Barber also had a fishery opposite his land below John Wright's. The entire shore in front of the town was well adapted for fishing with a drag seine. The shore sloped gradually, and there was a gravel bottom.

Mifflin's Island, across which the old bridge ran, had a profitable fishery on the west side. It was owned by James Mifflin, Esq.

The erection of a dam across the river in 1838 to form a pool to float boats to the mouth of the Susquehanna and Tide-Water Canal effectually destroyed all of the fisheries above that point.

Post-Office and Postmasters.—Joseph Smith came to Columbia about 1795, and opened a store, in connection with James Wright, in the lower room of the old Ferry House, which stood on the north side of Locust Street, near Front. A post-office was established at Columbia in 1797, and Mr. Smith was appointed the first postmaster. The receipts of the office for the year 1799 were $10.44. He was the eighth child of Col. Robert Smith, of Chester County, and was born Sept. 24, 1770. He removed to Philadelphia in 1802, where he embarked in the iron and shipping business. He died on his farm at "Steambot Hotel," in Chester County, Dec. 18, 1845. He left several children surviving him, to wit: Persifer Frazer Smith, Esq., late reporter of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, and a distinguished member of the Chester County bar; Elizabeth; Rhoda; Vaughan, a daughter, married Rev. Riley, of Montrose; Joseph Smith married Mary, daughter of Col. Persifer Frazer and Mary Worrall Taylor, who was the granddaughter of Isaac Taylor, the surveyor of Chester County. Mr. Smith and Frazer were the progenitors of a number of distinguished military and civil officers.

William P. Beatty was appointed postmaster by President John Adams in 1802. He was the son of Rev. Charles Beatty (of Log College memory) and Ann Reading, daughter of Governor Reading, of New Jersey. He was born in Neshaminy, in Bucks County, March 31, 1766, and died in Philadelphia, July 28, 1848. When Jefferson was elected President another postmaster was appointed. In 1825 he was appointed postmaster under President John Quincy Adams, which office he held for twelve years.

John Mathiot was appointed postmaster in 1807, and retained the position until he was elected sheriff of the county, in 1818. His father, John, was a Huguenot, and came from France to Lancaster about the beginning of the Revolution. He removed to Columbia in 1798, and opened a dry-goods and grocery-store in connection with Michael Gundecker, of Lancaster, in the brick building he erected on Walnut Street, adjoining Bank Alley. While hunting upon Mifflin Island, above the bridge, he was accidentally shot by a friend and killed about the year 1804. His son John, as stated, was elected sheriff in 1818, although a Democrat, whose party was then in a minority in the county. The Wrights, who were Federalists, all united in his support. He was elected mayor of Lancaster in 1831, and re-elected eleven times. He died Jan. 22, 1848, aged fifty-eight years. In the year 1807 the quarterly receipts of the office were fifteen dollars, and for the year 1815 they were from one hundred and twenty-five to one hundred and fifty dollars. Although he was not subject to military duty, he procured a horse and marched with Capt. Jacob Strickler's company to Kennet Square, in 1812, expecting to be mustered into the service of the United States. Owing to some informality they were not mustered, and the company returned to Columbia.

Philip Eberman, a brother-in-law of John Mathiot, was appointed postmaster in the fall of 1818, and retained the position until he was succeeded by William P. Beatty, in 1825.

In 1837, Dr. F. A. Thomas was appointed postmaster under the administration of Martin Van Buren.

Guilford G. Claiborne was appointed postmaster under Gen. Harrison's administration in the spring of 1841. But for an accident he probably would not have received the appointment.

After it was known in Columbia that Gen. William H. Harrison was elected President, in November, 1840, the Anti-Masons and Whigs of that place concluded that they would celebrate the event by firing a salute with a cannon in honor of the event, in the orchard of John L. Wright, between Second and Third Streets and Alleys "J" and "K." During the night before this was to take place some person spiked the cannon with a rat-tail file. When the time came to fire the salute there was great disappointment among the friends of Gen. Harrison. C. I. Amos S. Green, Mr. Claiborne, and others, after working for more than an hour, succeeded in getting out the file, and proceeded to announce the fact by firing the cannon in rapid succession. After firing it three times, and Mr. Claiborne and William Dickey were forcing a wadding of sod down upon the powder, a boy attempted to jump or run across in front of the cannon, when he fell. Abraham Myers, who had his thumb upon the touch-hole, raised it, when the charge went off prematurely when Claiborne and Dickey had hold of the ramrod. The former had his arm shattered, which had to be amputated above the elbow. Dickey was knocked insensible, but recovered. There was a great deal of sympathy for Mr. Claiborne. He was appointed postmaster, a position he retained for twelve years. He was succeeded by A. P. Modernell in 1853, who died while in commission, and his widow succeeded him, and held the position until 1861, when Henry H. Fry was appointed under President Lincoln's administration. He also died while in commission, and his widow was appointed to succeed him, and retained the position for twelve years, when Henry Mullen was appointed, and is now the postmaster. He enlisted in the "Cookman Rangers" in April, 1861, and marched to Camp Curtin, mustered into the United States service in Co. K, Fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Reserves, on the 21st of June, 1861; was appointed quartermaster-sergeant of that regiment in November, 1861; served three years, and was in all of the battles with the Army of the Potomac. After the expiration of his term of service, on the 6th of June, 1864, he re-enlisted as a veteran, and was appointed first lieutenant of Co. A, One Hundred and Ninety-first Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers. He was taken prisoner at Weldon Railroad, below Petersburg, Va., on the 19th day of August, 1864, and was imprisoned at Libby, Va., Salisbury, N. C., and Danville, Va., where he remained till March 22, 1865. He was mustered out with the company June 28, 1865. The business of the office for the year ending in July, 1883, amounted to $7822.88.

Meeting-Houses—The Friends, or Quakers.—The pioneer settlers were members of the Society of Friends, and held their meetings for some time after they came in private houses. Their number increasing, they built a log meeting-house upon the south side of Union Street, near Lancaster Avenue.

Their first and only speaker was John Wright, Esq. This settlement, composed entirely of Quakers, was the only one that ventured to locate upon the extreme frontier of the province. The heads of these families all entered public life, and mingled a great deal with all classes of people, and hence we find that they were not very strict in discipline, but conducted their meetings in their own way, and for thirty years they persistently refused to ask to come under the jurisdiction of Sadsbury or Lampeter Quarterly or Monthly Meetings. The records of these meetings occasionally make mention of a Wright or a Barber being "read out" for "marrying out," or for being married by a "priest," a term by which they designated a minister regularly ordained, without regard to any particular denomination to which he may have belonged. To their credit be it said that no greater offense was ever charged to them. It often required a great deal of patience and persistence on the part of Friends to induce them to send to these meetings a testimony against themselves for these departures from the discipline of the society. If we follow closely the history of a number of the descendants of these pioneer Quakers, we will find that they wandered much farther away from the time-honored customs of the society. Some of them entered the military service of their country, and others strayed off into the civil service, and some were not averse to the chase and field sports. There are very few, if any, of the many hundred descendants of John Wright and Robert Barber who are now members of the Society of Friends.

Sadsbury and Lampeter Quarterly Meetings frequently selected two or more of their leading men to go to the Susquehanna and talk to the Hempfield Friends, and occasionally a public speaker stopped there and preached. But little impression was made upon them until Jan. 1, 1790, when Job Scott, a celebrated Quaker, who came from England, and after an extended tour through the Southern States, along the sea-coast, where he aroused the followers of George Fox to renewed action. On his return he preached at Pipe Creek, Manallen, Huntingdon, Warrington, Newberry, and York, thence to Wright's Ferry, where he remained at the Widow Wright's for several days. He preached a number of times at her house, and awakened a strong feeling among the descendants of the pioneer settlers.

In 1799 the Quakers at Columbia made application to Lampeter Monthly Meeting to hold an "indulged meeting" on first and week days.

Samuel Wright, the founder of Columbia, gave the society a lot on Cherry Street, near Third Street, in trust, to build a meeting-house on.

It was not, however, until the year 1810 that the meeting at Columbia was established by "Calm Quarter," and in 1812 they were allowed a "preparative meeting."

The present brick meeting-house was erected about the year 1800. (Under the head of schools further notice is made of it.)

There are now living in Columbia but two persons who claim to belong to the Society of Friends. Occasionally Friends from a distance come and hold meetings, but when they are gone the building is closed up, sometimes for a year or more.

The Methodist Church.—On the 13th day of July, 1803, Samuel Wright gave Lot No. 160, as laid down on the plan of "Old Columbia," which was the last number on the "plan," and was situated at the south corner of Alley "K" and Fifth Street, measuring forty-seven feet on Fifth Street, and extending along said alley two hundred and thirty feet. This lot was conveyed to the following-named persons: Samuel Goff, Benjamin Wright, John Wright, Christian Herr, Christian Herr, Jr., Abraham Herr, David Musselman, William Tadd, Robert Magill, Thomas Lloyd, Abraham Goff, Owen Bruner, William Torbert, John Boehm, James W. Newcomb, and Isaac Swartzwalter, trustees. This lot of ground on the west side of Cherry Street, between Fourth and Fifth Streets, measuring sixty feet front and one hundred feet deep, upon which they desired to erect a Methodist Church, was purchased when every species of property was inflated. A part of the purchase money was paid, and a mortgage was given for the payment of the balance. No building was erected upon this lot, and the congregation continued to worship in the little frame church in the alley.

The trustees of the Ebenezer meeting-house, for the Methodist Episcopal Church, erected a frame meeting-house upon the rear end of this lot, measuring about twenty-five feet front and forty feet long. The pulpit stood at the north end. For thirty years this congregation had no regular pastor. The pulpit was filled occasionally by an itinerant minister, who traveled around the circuit. The trustees named above resided principally in Manor township. They belonged to the circuit. When a four weeks' and six weeks' circuit was established, there were ministers enough to assign a pastor once a week to each congregation. Sometimes several weeks would intervene before the same pastor came to the same congregation a second time. (This little frame church building in the alley was purchased by Stephen Smith, who razed it to the ground, and erected another one for the colored Baptists. It was burned down, and a brick one erected in its place, which has been converted into dwellings.)

The membership of this church increased very fast. Their meetings were largely attended, and this little church building in the alley was found entirely inadequate to accommodate them. They were generally poor people or in moderate circumstances, and they were not able to buy a lot in a more desirable part of the town, and erect a larger house, and they found it up-hill work to collect from the public at large.

In the year 1829 Columbia is first mentioned in the minutes of the Methodist Church records. John Goforth and J. Ledmem were appointed to go to the place.

In 1830 it was a large circuit, and reported two hundred and eighty-two members. Afterwards it was called Strasburg and Columbia Circuit until the year 1835, when it was organized as a station, and Francis Hodson was its first stationed preacher. On the 10th day of August, 1832, Michael Elder and his wife, Charlotte, conveyed to William Todd, James Little, Joseph Cottrell, Abram Bruner, Jacob Mathiot, James Giren, Thomas Lloyd, Abraham Sherrick, and Henry Martin, trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church, forty-eight feet of ground fronting on Cherry Street, and extending north along the east side of Third Street one hundred feet to a twelve-feet wide alley. They erected upon this lot a brick building forty feet fronting on Cherry Street, and extending along Third Street sixty feet, with a basement-room under the entire building. A gallery ran around three sides. The pulpit was at the northern end. The building was remodeled and enlarged in 1846 by adding fifteen feet to the northern end. The ceiling of the basement-room was also raised about one foot. In 1851 this church was partially destroyed by fire, and the congregation worshiped for a time in Odd-Fellows' Hall. The congregation purchased a lot on the corner of Second and Cherry Streets, upon which they erected a church building in 1852, measuring fifty feet front on Second Street and seventy-five feet along Cherry Street. Upon the rear end of the lot they built a two-story brick dwelling-house for the sexton.

The following-named members remain of those who belonged to the church when it was first organized as a station in 1833: Abigail Dean, widow of Benjamin Dean; Samuel Grove, who has been a very active member of this church for fifty years, and has built up a fine circulating library of choice books (he married (second time) Maria, daughter of the late Ephraim Eby ("miller") who is also a member of the church. His first wife was a Miss Stacy, of Strasburg, in this county); Catharine Lighthouse; Prudence Suydam, widow of the late Henry Suydam (who was a director of the Columbia National Bank), and daughter of the late James Given, lumber merchant.

The present trustees of the church are Abram Bruner, Robert Beecham, Daniel Stape, Jr., J. R. Witmer, John Paine, Henry F. Bruner, Samuel S. Klair, Ephraim Hershey, S. H. Hoffman.

WOMAN'S FOREIGN MISSIONARY SOCIETY.—President, Mrs. Richard W. Humphreys; Vice-Presidents, Mrs. M. Bletz, Mrs. S. S. Nowlen; Recording Secretary, Mrs. Ella Meiser; Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. Julia Kauffman; Treasurer, Miss Emma Patton.

LADIES' CHURCH AID SOCIETY.—President, Mrs. Richard W. Humphreys; Secretary, Miss Mary Paine; Treasurer, Mrs. S. J. Bruner. The present membership is something over four hundred and fifty.

SUNDAY-SCHOOLS.—Superintendent, — — —; Assistant Superintendent, A. G. Guiles; Secretary, S. W. Guiles; Assistant Secretary, F. G. Paine; Treasurer, A. C. Bruner; Chorister, A. Bruner; Librarians, J. S. Maxton, James Schraeder, I. Annerter.

Cookman Chapel Sunday-School.—This chapel was erected by the Methodist Episcopal Church a few years ago, at the corner of Fifth and Locust Streets, and is sustained and owned by the mother-church, at the corner of Second and Cherry Streets. The officers are as follows: Superintendent, Simon Cameron May; First Assistant, J. W. F. Nowlen; Second Assistant, G. W. Paules; Secretary, H. B. Dean; Assistant Secretary and Treasurer, William K. Nowlen; Librarians, Thomas J. Wright, J. S. Snyder, C. W. Stevenson, I. E. Graybill, Harry Bonson; Chorister, C. W. Stevenson; Organist, Mrs. Thomas J. Wright.

The Methodist Church is in a prosperous condition, and the church buildings are free from debt. There have been periods of dissension in the congregation, caused generally by trouble between the pastor and the congregation. The term of service of the former, when this took place, was shortened, and a change of pastors brought harmony again. But for this arrangement in the policy of the Methodist Episcopal Church it would have been split in two, and two or more churches would have been erected in the place, and both doubtless would have gone into decay for want of support.

Since 1835 the church has had the following pastors: Francis Hodson, 1835; William Roberts, 1836-37; Elijah Miller, 1838-39; James Cunningham, 1840; James H. McFarland, 1841; Joshua Humphries, 1842-43; David Gardner, 1844; William H. Elliot, 1845; Stephen Townsend, 1846; William Barnes, 1847-48; William Urie, 1849-50; William Bishop, 1851-52; Joseph Mason, 1853; William Cooper, 1854; J. W. McCaskey, 1855-56; William Barnes, 1857-58; J. Y. Ashton, 1859; J. Aspril, 1860; J. B. Maddox, 1861-62; H. R. Calloway, 1863-64; William Major, 1865-67; S. H. C. Smith, 1868-70; Robert J. Carson, 1871-73; J. Dickerson, 1874-75; Theodore Stevens, 1876-78; Henry Wheeler, 1879-81; Richard W. Humphries, son of former pastor, 1882-84.

Presbyterian Church.—In the summer of 1803, Revs. Collin McFarquahr and Robert Cathcart preached in Columbia occasionally in the Methodist meeting-house. In September of that year an unsuccessful effort was made to organize a society and erect a house of worship.

In February, 1806, Rev. Nathaniel Snowden, who had settled in Lancaster, began to preach here statedly every third Sabbath, sometimes in the Methodist Church and sometimes in a storehouse or in private houses.

On the 29th of August, 1807, he ordained William P. Beatty, Esq., Moses Montgomery, and James Graham ruling elders, and on the following day administered the sacrament of the Lord's Supper to about twenty-two communicants. Mr. Snowden received from eighty to one hundred dollars per annum for his services, which continued till 1808.

In the spring of 1809 Rev. William Kerr engaged for one-fourth of his time, and received about one hundred dollars per year for his services. At his suggestion the following application was, on the 26th of March, 1810, made to the Presbytery of New Castle:

"We, the subscribers, beg leave to state that a few families of this place, say twelve or fourteen, associated together about four years ago for public worship. This society was organized in due form by Rev. Mr. Snowden. Elders were ordained, and the ordinances have since been occasionally administered.

"We wish to be connected with the Presbyterian Church, and desire, as a congregation, to be taken under your care. That you may grant our request and that our infant society may prosper under your direction is our earnest prayer.

"WM. P. BEATTY,
"MOSES MONTGOMERY,
"Elders."

Samuel Wright donated to the congregation for a building-site a lot adjoining the German Church, but this not being deemed suitable, was in October, 1810, sold for three hundred and fifty dollars, and another on the corner of Locust and Fourth Streets purchased for six hundred dollars, and conveyed to the trustees Feb. 9, 1811. The foundation of the church was laid on the 15th of July, 1811, and on the 19th of July, 1812, the house was opened for public worship.

Mr. Kerr became stated supply, and on the 13th of September, 1812, ordained John Hudders, Dr. Hugh McCorkle, and John McRessick ruling elders. He ceased to supply the church in January, 1814.

In May, 1814, Rev. Stephen Royer became supply, and continued to minister to the congregation till 1830, although there does not appear any record of his installation as pastor. It is believed that he preached here on alternate Sabbaths. During a large portion of his term of service he resided at York during the latter part of his term, where he was engaged in teaching in addition to his other duties.

The church building when first erected stood back from Locust Street about twenty feet. The pulpit, which was at the Locust Street end, was several feet higher than the present one, and a gallery crossed the rear end. Thirty-six years ago the building was remodeled and extended to Locust Street; John Fred. Houston was the architect and Michael Clepper the builder. A few years later a Sunday-school and session-house were erected in the rear of the church, and both that and the church building were enlarged and remodeled a few years since.

The names of the following members appear on the record in the sessions-book from 1808 to 1822, inclusive: William P. Beatty and wife, Mrs. Michael Elder, Mrs. Hugh Menough, Daniel McLane and wife, John Menough and wife, William Green, Mrs. Simpson, John Hudders, John McKissick, Mrs. Sarah Strickler, Mrs. Letitia Ralston, Miss Sallie Roseburg, William Wilson, James Wilson and wife, Archibald Hudders and wife, Dr. Hugh McCorkle, Benjamin Worrall and wife, Mary McKissick, Mrs. Bogle, James Bogle, O'Rey Henderson, Samuel C. The ministers of the Presbyterian Church since its organization have been as follows: Nathaniel R. Snowden, stated supply, 1804; Colin McFarquahr, stated supply, 1805; William Kerr, stated supply, 1808-14; Stephen Bowyer, 1814-33; John H. Symmes, 1833-39; Robert W. Dunlap, 1841-44; Roger Owen, 1844-50; Ebenezer Erskine, 1851-57; Joseph S. Grimes, 1858-61; Robert A. Brown, 1864; J. Witherow, John McCoy, George Wells Ely.

In connection with the Presbyterian Church a Sunday-school was established soon after Rev. Stephen Boyer became permanently located in this charge, and John McKissick was chosen its superintendent. In the year 1825 there were five male teachers and seven female teachers; sixty-four male scholars and fifty female scholars.

For the year 1825 the teachers were Samuel B. Heise (living), Henry Connelly, Guilford Claiborne, Thomas Cochran, Mary Stump, C. McKissick, Mary McKissick, Catharine Stump, Eleanor Houston, William Mathiot, John Houston, Elizabeth Sterret, Elizabeth A. McKissick, Henrietta Claiborne, Samuel Greenleaf, Christiana Houston, Benjamin Worrall, Daniel McLane, Daniel J. Snow, John McKissick, Jr., John R. Beatty, John Stewart, Preston B. Elder, Mary Cochran, Ann Elizabeth Beatty (living), Sarah S. McCorkle, C. G. T. Waggoner, Adam Campbell.

The German Evangelical Lutheran (Salem) Church was organized in the year 1806, and was made up of Germans who resided in Columbia and vicinity. Not being strong enough to build a church alone, they informally agreed to unite with the German Reformed Congregation, which was organized about the same time, and by their united efforts raised funds for the erection of a church in which both congregations were to worship on alternate Sabbaths. In 1807 a brick church was erected on Walnut Street between Third and Fourth Streets. This was the second church erected in Columbia (the first one being the Friends' meeting-house). The pulpit was supplied by the pastor of the Lutheran congregation in Lancaster, Maytown, and Manheim. Thus the two congregations worshiped in the same church harmoniously. In 1819 they made a mutual agreement in writing to hold the property jointly and worship on alternate Sundays. The Rev. J. Strein had been their regular pastor four years prior to this date, and he continued to preach there for more than forty years, until he was compelled from age to relinquish the charge.

The congregation grew so large that it became necessary to erect a larger church building. In 1860, under the pastorate of Rev. — Darmstaetter, a new church building was erected upon the site of the old one, which was torn down. The congregation was divided some years ago, and another church was built. For a few years after the division the old church was weak and few in numbers. The congregation has gradually increased until it now numbers one hundred and twenty-five persons.

Since Mr. Darmstaetter's pastoral duties ceased the succession of pastors has been as follows: Revs. Heischmann, Reidenbach, Schwartz, Czar Nedden, Baner, Charles Ernst, Burghardt, A. Eisenhauer, H. Rella, the present pastor.

The trustees are William Harm, John Ehrnan, Fran. Thumm; and the elders, F. Abendschein, Jacob Nickalaus, Stephen Kneal, J. Wigand, Christian Kunly, Lewis Messer, John Weber, John Kranz, Ludwig Schiler, Nicholas Wolf, Aug. Witt, John Hans. There is a flourishing Sunday-school connected with the church.

St. Paul's German Evangelical Lutheran Church of the Unaltered Augsburg Confession.—The congregation and pastor belonging to this church withdrew from Salem Church, on Walnut Street, in the year 1862, on account of certain proceedings therein and against which this portion of the congregation in vain protested.

In the following year they were recognized by the Evangelical Lutheran Ministerium of Pennsylvania as the regular congregation which worshiped in, and known as, the Salem Church. Not being strong enough to elect the proper number of officers as provided for in their charter, they only elected provisory officers. For a short time the services were held in the parsonage on Fourth Street. Subsequently, for a period of about two years, services were held in the German Reformed Church, at the corner of Cherry and Third Streets, and for the following four years services were held in Washington Institute. On Sept. 18, 1868, the congregation reorganized under the title given at the head of this article. Up to this period and to the present time the Rev. J. A. Darmstaetter has presided over this congregation with great acceptability. The officers elected were Peter Rodenhauser, Sr., elder; Christian Kraft, George Gundel, deacons; Nicholas Beinhauer, Adam Brommer, John Neuer, trustees.

In the same year they commenced the erection of a new church building, on the north side of Locust Street, about midway between Fifth and Sixth Streets. It was finished and dedicated June 21, 1869. The building is a one-story brick, thirty-two by sixty feet, which has a seating capacity of four hundred.

At the time of the withdrawal of this congregation from Salem Church they numbered fifty communicants. They now number two hundred. The church is free from debt and has a surplus fund.

There is a Sunday-school connected with the congregation which is in a flourishing condition. There are sixteen teachers and eighty scholars in regular attendance.

Trinity Reformed Church.—A number of German families organized a congregation about the year 1805, but had no stated place to hold their religious meetings.

Samuel Wright, the founder of Old Columbia, gave them and the Lutherans a lot of ground on the south side of Walnut Street, between Third and Fourth Streets, on the 13th day of March, 1806, and these two denominations by their joint efforts collected enough funds to erect a brick church building about the year 1807-8. This was the second church building erected in the place, the Friends' being the first.

For some years neither congregation had a regular pastor, nor did they have preaching at stated intervals.

On the 2d day of December, 1821, the German Reformed congregation and the Evangelical Lutheran congregation of Columbia entered into an amicable agreement, wherein it was stated that they built a church jointly under the name of Salem Church. Each was to worship on alternate weeks, the Lutherans to commence the first Sunday in January. If one congregation did not worship on the Sunday assigned to it, then the other one was not prohibited from doing so.

The Rev. Henry Shaffner, who resided at Marietta, but preached at Maytown, Marietta, and Columbia, was the pastor of the German Reformed Church. The names of the trustees were Isaac Hougendobler, Phillip Mumma, Peter Livergood, and Adam Otstot; Joseph Hougendobler, George Peters, Peter Mumma, Jr., John Hougendobler, wardens.

This church was incorporated in 1820. Mr. Shaffner remained pastor of the charge to which Columbia then belonged, consisting also of Marietta, Elizabethtown, Maytown, and Manheim, until the year 1840. He was succeeded by the Rev. Herman Bokum, whose ministry lasted only a few years. From 1845 to 1850 the congregation was served by Rev. D. Y. Heisler, who resigned in April, and was succeeded by the Rev. Alfred Helfenstein, who continued to preach during the remainder of the year 1850. In 1851, Rev. W. Goo.rieb took charge of the congregation, and resigned Dec. 12, 1852. He was succeeded by Rev. Joel T. Reber, in April, 1853, who resigned in the summer of 1854. About this time the Reformed and Lutheran congregations dissolved their agreement, the latter purchasing from the former their interest in Salem Church. Services were then held by the Reformed congregation in the old town hall.

In the same year they erected a new Reformed Church at the corner of Cherry and Third Streets, of brick, two stories high, which is the building still occupied by the Trinity congregation. The licentiate, Christian C. Russell, commenced preaching in this church on the 19th of October, 1856. He was ordained and installed on the 7th of December, 1856, and resigned in the spring of 1858. About this time the church was sold by the sheriff and purchased by Nicholas Hougendobler. On the 1st of December, 1858, Rev. John Hoffmeier took charge of the congregation, which was at this time very small, and the few members who adhered to the congregation were very much discouraged. Mr. Hoffmeier's pastorate soon terminated, after which the congregation was supplied by different ministers of Lancaster Classis until Oct. 29, 1864, when the Rev. James A. Shultz became pastor, but after a few months' labor was obliged to retire on account of sickness. After his withdrawal Dr. Theodore Appel and Rev. John G. Wolf were appointed a committee of supply. Under their efficient management the congregation was increased, and funds amounting to three thousand two hundred dollars were collected to liquidate the church debt and redeem the church property.

In 1868 the Rev. F. Pilgram's pastorate commenced, which lasted until the fall of 1872. The audience-chamber was handsomely frescoed, and the entire building, both in the interior and exterior, painted. An organ was purchased for the congregation, and also a reed-organ for the Sunday-school, and a two-story brick parsonage was erected upon their property adjoining the church on Cherry Street.

In the summer of 1873, Rev. C. Clever became pastor, and under his energetic and efficient ministry the membership was largely increased. He resigned in February, 1879, and the present able pastor, Rev. C. S. Gerhard, entered upon his duties on July 1, 1879. The entire debt against the church and parsonage has been removed. This church up to January 1, 1883, received missionary aid, but now is self-supporting. The present membership is one hundred and eighty-four, and the Sunday-school scholars number two hundred.

The German Lutheran Church was organized contemporaneously with the German Reformed Church, and through their combined efforts a church building was erected upon a lot given them by Samuel Wright, which is located on the south side of Walnut Street, midway between Third and Fourth Streets. The congregation was supplied occasionally by the ministers located at Maytown and Lancaster for several years, these two congregations holding service on alternate Sundays.

St. Paul's Church.—Services of the Protestant Episcopal Church were held occasionally in this place by the Rev. Joseph Clarkson, of Lancaster, as early as 1820, in the Presbyterian Church at the corner of Fourth and Locust Streets. Services ceased altogether about the year 1835. About the year 1840 an effort was made to organize a church and erect a building, and six hundred dollars was subscribed for that purpose. Nothing was done, however, until a regular organization was perfected, in 1848, when its first rector, Rev. Dwight E. Lyman, was called to preside over them on the 13th day of August, 1848. To the efforts of Mr. Lyman the parish owes the erection of its very pretty church building. The corner-stone was laid Oct. 10, 1849, and completed in 1850, the consecration taking place on the 28th day of May of that year. Mr. Lyman remained in charge until July, 1853. He was a beautiful reader and an elegant performer on the organ or piano-forte, and was one of the finest singers of sacred music within the range of the Episcopal Church. He connected himself with the Roman Catholic Church in 1854, and is now a regular ordained priest. The history of the church has been quiet, and its growth moderate.

The following is a list of the rectors succeeding Mr. Lyman: the Rev. Henry W. Woods, from December, 1853, to Oct. 1, 1854; Rev. Alexander McLeod, D.D., from May, 1855, to January, 1856; the Rev. Samuel E. Appleton, from July, 1857, to the early part of 1860; Rev. Theodore A. Hopkins, of Lancaster, provided services temporarily in the spring and summer of 1860; Rev. John Cromlish, from January, 1861, to September, 1867. He is now a minister in the Methodist Episcopal Church. (In the summer of 1865 the members who had been accustomed to attend this church from Marietta concluded to build a church in that place, which they did, and this parish was deprived of their presence and offerings.) Rev. Benjamin I. Douglass, from January, 1868, to July, 1870. The Rev. George H. Kirkland, from Sept. 11, 1870, to Dec. 28, 1873. The Rev. Percival Becket, from Feb. 1, 1874, to July 11, 1875. He also conducted a parochial classical school. The Rev. George H. Kirkland (second time), from Sept. 5, 1875, to Aug. 5, 1879. The Rev. Richard C. Searing, Dec. 5, 1879, and is the present pastor.

There is a Sunday-school attached to the church.

United Brethren in Christ.—In the year 1846 the first families belonging to this denomination moved to Columbia. Their names were Christian Hershey and Solomon Von Neida. The first preaching was held at their dwellings by itinerant preachers who happened to be passing through the place. From this small beginning their numbers gradually increased, when preaching was held in the brick school-house on Third Street, near Perry Street, in the year 1858-59. A great many persons connected themselves with the church at that time. In the year 1860 they erected a church building of brick at the corner of Third and Perry Streets. The trustees at that time were Christian Hershey, Jonas Garber, and David Wayne.

A Sabbath-school was also organized, which now numbers two hundred and seventy-five scholars;

Jacob Sneath, superintendent. There are now two hundred members of the congregation in good standing. The ministers in regular succession were Rev. Joseph Young, — Gilbert, J. Scott, J. Young, T. Peters, G. W. M. Riger, J. Doughter, W. S. H. Keys, A. Kauffman, G. Wagner, H. V. Mahn, J. C. Mumma, J. W. Geiger, J. D. Mouer, C. S. Meily, S. G. Merrick, J. C. Smith, and J. B. Funk.

The present trustees are John C. Klingbill, A. Dyer, Thomas S. White, D. Welsh, and Uriah Sourbeer.

The congregation and Sunday-school are in a flourishing condition, and in the near future they contemplate the erection of a larger church building in a more central part of the town.

Evangelical English Lutheran Church.—During the year 1849, Rev. J. H. Menjes, of Mount Joy, preached at stated times in the English language in the German Lutheran Church on Walnut Street. About this time he took up his residence in Columbia, and devoted his time to the work of preparing the way for the organization of an exclusively English Lutheran Church. J. C. Pfahler, H. Pfahler, Andrew Gohn, John Hiffer, and others were active in this work, and to their efforts is owing the fact that the church is in existence to-day.

The formal organization of the church did not take place at once, but the work of building a place of worship was first completed. The land for the site of the church was purchased April 2, 1850, and the building finished during the next two years, at an expense of $6390.50, more than half of which remained as a debt against the new congregation.

The congregation was incorporated by special act of the Legislature, March 8, 1853, under the title of the English Lutheran Congregation of Columbia. During the subsequent years the congregation gradually increased, and after discharging all debts and liabilities, and paying for numerous improvements, in 1875, under the ministry of Rev. J. C. Burke, the church was enlarged, remodeled, and furnished with all the modern church conveniences, at an expense of ten thousand dollars.

In the spring of 1881 certain tendencies culminated in the withdrawal of a number of members, who organized a new congregation which located farther up-town.

The church was without a pastor at the time, but soon afterwards obtained one in the person of Rev. William P. Evans, who assumed charge July 1, 1881. Since that time there has been steady growth and a systematic and regular reduction of the church debt. The church has now nearly two hundred communicant members. A flourishing Sunday-school, with a well-selected library of twelve hundred volumes, and a most convenient, well-appointed, and valuable church property, situated on Second Street, between Locust and Walnut.

The present board of officers consist of: Elders, John Steetin, L. C. Oberlin, J. H. Oberlin, and Samuel Filbert; Deacons, F. A. Bennett, J. G. Beemer, H. F. Yergey, L. W. May, J. G. Peirce, Ed. Newcomer, S. P. Graver, and Dr. O. F. Markel; Sunday-school Superintendent, L. W. May.

The list of pastors from the beginning comprises the following: Rev. J. H. Menges, 1849-60; Rev. P. E. Dorsey, M.D., 1860-63; Rev. C. Reemensnyder, 1863-65; Rev. W. H. Steck, 1866-70; Rev. G. M. Rhodes, 1870-74; Rev. J. C. Burke, 1875-77; Rev. F. W. Staley, 1877-81; Rev. William P. Evans, 1881 to the present time.

St. Peter's Catholic Church and its Auxiliary Institutions.—By way of introduction to the history of this church the following preamble is taken from the subscription-book issued by the Rev. Bernard Keenan, in which he authorizes the gentlemen named therein to collect money for the erection of a church in the borough of Columbia:

"The Roman Catholics of the borough of Columbia (by the grace of God), having unanimously resolved to build a Roman Catholic Church in said place, and in order to enable them to proceed in so necessary and laudable an undertaking, are induced to solicit subscriptions from a generous and charitable public.

"As Roman Catholic pastor of Lancaster County, I sanction and highly approve of the resolution adopted by the congregation of the borough of Columbia, under my care, and likewise state that Messrs. George Ziegler, John Arms, John McMullen, and Dominick Eagle, who compose the committee for collecting subscriptions, are persons worthy of the highest confidence and trust, and capable of performing the duties reposed in them.

"REV. BERNARD KEENAN.

"LANCASTER CITY, 2d March, 1828."

In pursuance of the resolution to erect a church, approved by the Rev. Father Keenan, measures were taken to secure a site. Two lots on Lancaster Avenue, lately used as a cemetery, were bought. It was afterwards, however, thought best to select a spot in a more central part of the town, and the ground upon which the church now stands was purchased. The funds necessary for commencing the building were not without a hard struggle raised, and in 1828 a contract for the erection of the church was given to Israel Cooper. The corner-stone was laid in 1828, and in 1830 the church was dedicated by the Right Rev. F. Patrick Kenrick. Before the erection of the church the few Catholics living in Columbia were obliged, in order to hear mass, to go either to Lancaster, York, or Elizabethtown. Sometimes, however, during this period mass was said in private houses, that a better opportunity might be afforded the people of Columbia and vicinity of fulfilling their religious duties. Prior to the building of the church missionary priests from Conewago and other places occasionally visited the town. From 1828, the date of the laying of the corner-stone, until 1842, Father Keenan came once a month from Lancaster to say mass and attend to the spiritual wants of the congregation. In February, 1842, came Rev. Daniel Kelly to reside in Columbia as the pastor of St. Peter's congregation. His successors in order of their appointment were Revs. John Mackin, B. A. Shorb, M. F. Martin, Dr. Balfé, Dr. Leitner, Rev. P. Toner, and Rev. A. McGinnis.

The church was enlarged by Dr. Balfé, and the parochial house built by the Rev. Father Shorb, and the ground in front of the church was terraced and otherwise beautified by the Rev. Dr. Leitner, who also had a neat iron railing erected about the church premises.

This short history of the Roman Catholic Church in Columbia would not be complete without recording the fact "that the Right Rev. Francis Patrick Kenrick, Bishop of Philadelphia, trustee for the Catholic congregation of the borough of Columbia," procured an act of the Legislature, per McSherry, authorizing him to convey by deed unto Robert B. Wright, Esq., his heirs, etc., a part of the lot on which the church was built in exchange for all that part of his lot adjoining the Catholic Church lot aforesaid, lying and being southeast of a line drawn from the west corner of the Catholic parsonage at right angles to Second Street." For this kind and generous act on the part of Mr. Wright in exchanging lots without any money consideration the members of St. Peter's congregation felt very grateful to him, and justly, for it enabled them to have an entrance to their church from Second Street instead of from Union Street, as formerly, and it also prevented the erection of objectionable buildings right in front of the church door, and his memory is still held in grateful respect by the members of St. Peter's Church.

On the 30th of September, 1866, Rev. J. J. Russell was appointed pastor by the Right Rev. James F. Wood, Bishop of Philadelphia. The congregation at that time was not large, numbering about one hundred families. It possessed what is now called the old church property, corner of Second and Union Streets, which extended on Second Street one hundred feet and on Union one hundred and forty-five feet, and on which were erected the church and parochial house. In the same year the church and house underwent a complete renovation. In 1872 two brick houses on Union above Second were purchased for the congregation, one of which was used as a dwelling-house by the Sisters who had charge of the parochial schools, and the other as a school-house.

The parochial schools which the reverend pastor opened have been marked by exceptional success, especially since the advent of the Sisters of Charity. A notable feature of these schools is the annual public examinations, which many of the educated citizens of the town are accustomed to attend. The searching questioning to which the pupils are subjected at these examinations shows most clearly the proficiency which children, with close application to study, may be able to attain under the careful training of efficient teachers.

For the better convenience of that part of the flock living in Wrightsville, a piece of land was purchased in that borough in the year 1874 by Rev. J. J. Russell for a cemetery, which was consecrated by Right Rev. J. F. Shanahan, Bishop of Harrisburg, June 7th of this year. Prior to the buying of the ground for the cemetery, a house for school purposes in that town was secured, in which school has continued to be held. In March of the same year the St. Patrick's Temperance and Beneficial Society was established in the parish, as well as another society called St. Peter's Church Society. The following extract from the latter society's minute-book will explain the object of its organization :

"At a meeting of the parishioners of St. Peter's Church, Aug. 2, 1874, called by Rev. J. J. Russell, pastor of the above church, for the purpose of adopting some means by which to raise money to pay for the new church property lately purchased by him for the congregation,

"Resolved, That the parishioners form themselves into an association under the title of St. Peter's Church Society, for the liquidation of the debt incurred by the above-mentioned purchase, and that each member pay monthly a certain sum of money into the treasury of said society."

This property adjoins the old church property on the northwest side, and extends on Second Street one hundred and sixteen feet, giving the entire church property a frontage of two hundred and sixteen feet. The building erected by the former owners of the property is now the pastoral residence.

A noteworthy occurrence in this church's history was the ordination to the priesthood of Rev. A. J. O'Brien, nephew of Rev. Father Russell, by the Right Rev. J. F. Shanahan, on the morning of the 21st of November, 1874. So solemn a ceremony as the conferring of the sacrament of Holy Orders naturally drew to the church almost the entire Catholic population of Columbia, Marietta, and Wrightsville. On May 30, 1878, the corner-stone of the convent building was laid by the Right Rev. Bishop of Harrisburg, assisted by a large number of clergy of the diocese, in the presence of an immense concourse of people. The work upon the building was pushed vigorously, and in a very short time a substantial, magnificent, and commodious structure stood complete in every detail.

As an educational institution for young ladies it is meeting with merited popularity and success. The same Right Rev. prelate consecrated the convent and the convent chapel on the 8th day of the following December. The convent was built according to the plans and specifications of E. F. Durang, the renowned Philadelphia architect, and under the immediate supervision of the Rev. J. J. Russell. The building, including the Mansard roof, is four stories high, surmounted by a cupola, from which a commanding view is had of the picturesque scenery along the Susquehanna River, and of the undulating country on either side, and it has eight bow-windows of semicircular form in front.

On the same day after the consecration of the convent the Right Rev. Bishop blessed St. Peter's new cemetery, which is situated in West Hempfield township, on the farm purchased by the Rev. Pastor for the people of the parish with the express purpose, principally, of securing for them a suitable spot wherein the sacred remains of their departed friends might decently lie until the day of final resurrection. In the convent are a high school and an academy, under the control of the Sisters of Charity of Mount St. Vincent's, on the Hudson, N. Y. The former is designed for the more advanced children of the parish, the latter as a boarding-school solely for young ladies who are not of the congregation or who live without its boundaries. Besides the societies already mentioned there are in connection with the church three sodalities, whose end is solely a religious one. Writing on the subject of societies it will not be out of place here to speak of the "St. Peter's Building and Loan Association," instituted in June, 1876, which holds its meetings in a school-room in the convent. The present officers are: President, C. F. Young; Vice-President, J. C. Atwood; Treasurer, Rev. J. J. Russell; Secretary, John B. Wisler; Directors, James Mack, Daniel McCarty, William Foley, Martin Ford, Cormick McCall, Bryan Cavanaugh, Bart Foley, P. Moriarity, John McCall, F. McCarty, L. Hendrick, James Gegan.

This association has thus far prospered, as the value of the shares (one hundred and forty-seven dollars) at the end of its seventh year shows. The Columbia Workingmen's Saving Fund and Building Association, when in existence, held its meetings in the basement of the church, and was, in a sense, a parochial society, since so many parishioners have obtained homes through it. At the end of nine years it terminated a successful career, the value of two hundred dollars per share having been attained.

St. Peter's Sunday-school of Columbia has an average attendance of one hundred and thirty children. The superintendent of this Sunday-school was for a number of years Mr. Francis Ziegler. Since October, 1872, the Sisters of Charity have the conduct of it. The number of pupils who attend Sunday-school in Wrightsville is about twenty, and at present Mr. Charles Dougherty superintends it, and of late years the day school has been under the charge of lay teachers.

Holy Trinity (German Roman Catholic) Church.—This church edifice is of brick, located on Cherry, between Fourth and Fifth Streets, and was built in 1860, under the supervision of Rev. Father Schaffrot, then pastor in charge of this parish. For the first two years services were held in the basement of the building, as the edifice was not completed and dedicated until 1862.

In 1863, Mr. Schaffrot was succeeded in the pastorate by Rev. Father William Pieper, the present pastor. During Mr. Pieper's pastorate the church edifice was enlarged (1873) to nearly double its original seating capacity, marble altars placed in the chancel, memorial windows inserted in place of the old ones, statuary and paintings placed in proper position, adding grandeur to the beautifully-frescoed walls and ceiling, making it one of the pleasantest and most attractive audience-rooms in Columbia.

In 1865 the present parsonage was built, and in 1869 the Sisters' house, in rear of and adjoining the church, was erected. They have charge of the school, which was established in the basement of the church in 1867, and at present numbers two and forty pupils.

The present membership of Holy Trinity Church is about two hundred and fifty.

Church of God.—The followers of Rev. John Winebrenner held religious meetings for a few years at private dwellings. In the latter part of the year 1878 and beginning of 1879, through the personal exertions of Rev. J. W. Deshong, money enough was raised by subscription to erect a brick meeting-house at the corner of Seventh and Walnut Streets. Mr. Deshong was followed by the Revs. C. W. Wimbiger, J. H. Esterline, and S. C. D. Jackson, the present pastor. The present membership numbers thirty. The church was not regularly organized until March 30, 1879. There is also a Sunday-school attached to the church, numbering ten teachers and ninety-five scholars.

St. John's Lutheran Church.—On Sunday, March 27, 1881, a number of the members of the Lutheran Church on Second Street severed their connection with that organization. On the 8th day of April, 1881, these members met at St. Paul's Lutheran Church, on Locust Street above Fifth, for the purpose of organizing a new church, which was done, under the title which heads this sketch; but no immediate measures were taken to erect a church building or securing the services of a pastor. Their first object was to take care of the children and build up a Sabbath-school. Schuler's Hall, opposite the opera-house, on Locust Street, was secured for that purpose. They were supplied from April to September by the Revs. Samuel Yingling, Hering, Anstadt, Barnitz, Frazier, Fritz, Miller, Stine, Brown, and Fensler, Lutheran ministers, who came to Schuler's and Armory Halls and preached for them. They were much pleased with Samuel Yingling, and in September, 1881, they gave him a regular call, when he became their pastor. From this period new life was given to this weak congregation, and they took measures to procure a lot of ground whereon they desired to erect their church. A lot was purchased on the southeast side of Locust Street above Sixth. The ladies of the congregation worked unceasingly, and continued to provide means to meet the daily expenses while the new church building was being erected. They were assisted very much by their pastor and the male members of the congregation. The building, which is in its internal arrangement the most complete of all the Protestant churches in the place, cost ten thousand dollars, one-half of which sum was raised by the "workers" in the congregation before its completion. The building was completed on the 1st day of October, 1882. This congregation up to June, 1882, held no synodical relations with either branch of the Lutheran Church government. In that month they were received into the Synod of Pennsylvania at its meeting in Philadelphia.

The Sabbath-school received the first anxious care of those who separated from the Lutheran Church on Second Street. The school was first held at the private residence of Charles P. Schreiner, on Locust Street, where there was an attendance of seventy children. On the following Sabbath, which was on April 11, 1881, the school convened in Schuler's Hall, where one hundred and forty-seven children were in attendance. From that place they removed to Armory Hall, on Walnut Street, above Second Street, where the number increased to one hundred and seventy-four. The officers of the school were Henry Leaman, assistant superintendent; C. C. Hogentogler, secretary; W. H. Herr, treasurer; Mrs. C. P. Shreiner and Miss Hallie Clepper, assistants in the infant school; and Mrs. Benjamin Herr, treasurer; George Tille, librarian; Isaac T. Gitt, assistant; and Messrs. Harry Bennett, John Williams, Jacob Lutz, and Tyson Simpson, directors.

Colored Churches.—In the year 1822, John Staman gave a lot of ground at the corner of Concord and Fifth Streets to the Rev. Joseph Henderson, who conveyed the same to Joseph Henderson, Walter Green, John Winston, and Nicholas Pleasants, trustees of the Colored Baptist Church. These trustees and a large majority of the congregation were manumitted slaves from Virginia, who came to the place in 1817-19.

In 1823 a little frame church was built, and in the same year with the assistance of John McKissick and William P. Beatty a Sunday-school was started. This church was largely attended for many years, and on special occasions many white persons attended also. As the pioneer members began to die, the church gradually declined until there were not enough left to hold service. The last of these manumitted slaves, Benjamin Randolph, died two years ago, when the old church building was torn down and another small church building across the street, which belonged to Zion's colored congregation, was removed to it.

Contemporaneous with the erection of this church, and by manumitted slaves also, was built a small frame church in the alley between Union and Perry Streets and Third and Second Streets, called the Mount Zion African Methodist Episcopal Church.

The congregation worshiped there until the Rev. Stephen Smith purchased the frame church from the Methodist Episcopal Church, in the alley between Cherry and Union and Fourth and Fifth Streets, about the year 1832. The building was destroyed by fire, and another one of brick was built. Twenty years ago they sold the church, and built another one on Fifth Street, below Union Street, which they sold to the public school board for a colored school. A few years ago they erected a new, much larger, and more substantial brick church on the same street, a little west of the old one.

Another church, called the Union Church, was erected on the south side of Union Street, between Fourth and Fifth Streets, about the same time the first two were built. Preaching is only occasionally held in the building.

The religious feeling among the present generation of colored people in Columbia may be said to be on the decline.

Educational.—Prior to the Revolutionary period there were no school-houses or regular schools kept at Wright's Ferry.

Occasionally an Irish peripatetic school-teacher came to the neighborhood, and taught school during the winter months, and boarded around with the parents of the children. The Wrights, Barbers, and Bethels were intermarried with each other, and were the only English-speaking families who resided permanently at the ferry.

Those of them who desired a better and more thorough education for their children than could be obtained at home, sent them to Lancaster or Philadelphia, and to the select schools conducted by Friends in Chester County and Cecil County, Md. The pioneer settlers were well educated before they came to the river, and it is probable that many of the children were taught the rudiments of an education at home. That remarkable woman, Susanna Wright, took care of the children of her brother James and Samuel Bethel. She not only taught them to read and write and the rudiments of arithmetic, but how to paint and use the needle also. She was implicitly obeyed in everything. She was abundantly able to teach them the higher branches, and to her brother James was indebted for much he knew, and his success in life.

The first attempt to establish a school where the higher branches were taught was in the summer of 1800, when Robert Patton opened a boarding-school for boys only. The school was held in the little brick meeting-house belonging to Friends, situated on the south side of Cherry Street, a short distance above Third Street. In addition to the common branches, that of surveying was also added. The price of boarding was twenty, and tuition five dollars per quarter. The scholars were boarded at private houses. The school was not self-sustaining, and Mr. Patton gave up teaching, and entered into mercantile pursuits, for which he was well fitted.

Edward Postlethwait Page, an Englishman, who had been an officer under Nelson at the battle of Trafalgar, in 1805, followed Patton. He was a very eccentric person, but occasionally displayed great talent. He had the gift of oratory, and when he attended a town-meeting or the lyceum he often astonished his audience by bursts of eloquence surpassed by no trained speaker in the country. He had an English soldier with him, who was dressed up in military uniform and acted as usher.

Page also taught the first Sunday-school in Columbia, in the Quaker meeting-house. The late Samuel Nelson Houston was the last of his scholars. He removed to Marietta, Ohio, where he died many years ago. He was followed by Welden Brinton, who taught in the same place. He was succeeded by Dr. Edwin A. Atlee, who also taught in the same place. He had a Revolutionary soldier, who wore a "cocked hat," for usher. He was a great musician, and rose to distinction in the medical profession. He owned and lived in the brick building occupied by Dr. Rodgers, on Locust Street. Samuel N. Houston, who was also one of his pupils, lived and died in the adjoining house.

A number of prominent citizens, whose names are appended to the following, made the first organized effort to establish a better school in Columbia:

"Whereas, a Number of the Inhabitants of this Place (Columbia) are solicitous for the education of their Children and those under their care, which, under the present Regulation of Schools, they cannot have done satisfactorily to themselves, they therefore propose to erect a School-house and establish a School therein for the purpose above mentioned under their own immediate direction, and submit the following Plan for that Purpose, viz.:

"1. That William Wright, Saml. Bethel, and Amos Harner be Commissioners, who shall open a Subscription for Fifty Shares of Stock and enter therein as follows: We, whose names are hereunto subscribed, do promise to pay to the President and Trustees of the Columbia School the sum of Ten Dollars for every share of Stock in said School set opposite to our names respectively, in such manner and proportions, and at such times as may be determined on by said President and Trustees.

"2. No Person shall subscribe for more than two Shares, provided a sufficient Number offer at that rate.

"3. Each Subscriber shall be entitled to send one Scholar for every Share subscribed, and Subscribers shall have the preference to Non-subscribers in filling up Vacancies.

"4. Each Subscriber shall pay Five Dollars to the Commissioners on each Share at the time of subscribing, and the said Commissioners shall pay the same into the hands of the Treasurer as soon as he shall be appointed.

"5. When two-thirds of the shares are subscribed for, the subscribers shall meet and choose by Ballot thirteen of their Number who shall be styled Trustees, which Trustees shall again elect out of their number a President, Treasurer, and Secretary, to act as such for one year.

"6. The Treasurer shall give bond with security, if required, for the performance of the duties intrusted to him.

"7. When all the shares are paid in full, the Trustees by their President shall issue a Certificate to each Stockholder for the number of Shares by him held, bearing an Interest of six per cent. per Annum, transferrable in the Presence of the Treasurer.

"8. At all Elections each Stockholder, for one share shall have one Vote; for two or more shares, two Votes.

"9. Every vacancy in the Board of Trustees by Death, Resignation, or otherwise, shall be forthwith supplied by an election held for that purpose.

"10. The Trustees shall have power to purchase or receive, by Donation or otherwise, a suitable Lot on which to erect a School-house and to receive a Deed for the same in Trust for the Stockholders generally, and to contract with Workmen, purchase Materials, &c., and to have the sole management of the same, and whenever they shall see cause, lay a statement of the Expenditures before a Meeting of the Stockholders to be convened for that purpose. And provided the Expense of erecting and preparing the said School-house shall exceed the amount of the Original Subscription, then, and in that case, the said Trustees shall open a new Subscription for as many more shares as shall be necessary to make up the deficiency, which new shares shall be at the Rate of the original Subscription, with Interest from that date.

"11. The President and Trustees shall have the sole direction, order, and management of the School.

"12. The Trustees shall annually, on the first Monday in January, lay before the Stockholders a general Statement of the Funds and situation of the School.

"We, whose names are hereunto subscribed, do promise to pay to the President and Trustees of the Columbia School the sum of Ten Dollars for every share of stock in said school set opposite to our names, respectively, in such manner and proportions and at such times as may be determined on by said President and Trustees.

Columbia School.—On the 25th day of March, 1807, Samuel Wright conveyed to Samuel Bethel, Esq., Maj. Thomas Boude, Dr. Edwin A. Atlee, Robert Patton, James Wright, William F. Beatty, Esq., Jonathan Mifflin, John Evans, William Wright, Nathaniel Barber, Christian Breneman, and James Graham, for one silver dollar, Lot No. 104, and measuring fifty feet on Third Street, and extending sixty feet along a public alley between Locust and Cherry Streets, for the purpose of erecting a school-house upon it.

The stockholders increased, and the number of shares from fifty to sixty, and the value from ten to fourteen dollars per share. In the year 1807 they erected a one-story brick building, measuring twenty-eight feet in front, and extending along a public alley thirty-five feet.

The original stockholders are named above. They organized by the election of a president, secretary, treasurer, and twelve trustees.

The first teacher was E. P. Page. He was followed by Dr. Edwin A. Atlee, William Kirkwood, Thomas Trump, Elisha Halloway, Jesse Haines; in 1819 by Moses P. Cheney, who taught again in 1826. He had been a teacher in the Westtown school in Chester County. He was followed by Thomas Sharpe in the fall of 1823. During his term a belfry was erected on the top of the school-house and a bell placed in it. He resigned in 1826, and, as before stated, Mr. Cheney took charge of the school April 1, 1826; he was assisted by Benjamin Gilbert. He resigned in 1828. On the 29th day of March, 1828, Frederick Hinkson took charge of the school, and resigned during the following summer. He was succeeded by William Van Wyke on July 27, 1828, who resigned in September, and was succeeded by G. Gillett.

Charles Farnam came in 1832. An incident occurred to him which he had good reason to remember while he remained in Columbia. He was very hasty and passionate. Cyrus Strickler was one of his pupils, whom he chastised very severely for an offense he did not commit, and he left the school and declined to return again. He returned to the schoolroom, accompanied by his father, Jacob Strickler, to procure his books. Farnam at once commenced to lecture and upbraid Mr. Strickler for his want of discipline and watchfulness over his son's welfare. Mr. Strickler, who was also of hasty temperament, commenced to belabor the teacher with a raw-hide. There was no school for some days afterwards. Farnam removed to the basement of the Methodist Episcopal Church in 1833, where he also taught a night-school. This school at various periods seemed to prosper, and bid fair to establish a plant for one of much higher grade. The trustees or managers were not fortunate in procuring the right kind of a teacher. The changes were too frequent, and the managers did not offer a sufficient inducement to command the best educational talent.

The stockholders on the 28th day of August, 1830, made an effort to reorganize the school and enlarge the building. On the 4th day of September, 1830, a committee reported in favor of the erection of a building large enough to accommodate two hundred and fifty scholars, on Cherry Street, a period when the school was struggling for an existence. It seems to have breathed its last breath in 1831.

The Lancasterian system was then under successful headway in the town hall. In a few years the free school law came into force, which also operated against the success of this school. The effort to erect a large school building on Cherry Street was a failure.

There seems to be a hiatus in the records of this school from January, 1831, to May 11, 1838, when the stockholders met to reorganize the school. They increased the number of shares to one hundred at fourteen dollars per share, for the purpose of raising money to put another story upon the building and extending it several feet in the rear. The following-named persons subscribed for the additional shares: Samuel W. Mifflin, Henry Breneman, Dr. J. S. Clarkson, Joseph Black, Davis Gohenn, Abraham Bruner, Samuel Grove, Joseph Cottrell, Thomas H. Pearce, Dr. George Moore, William Mathiot, Owen B. Goodman, Moses Whitson, James Barber, Jacob F. Markley, Albert G. Bradford, James Caldwell, James Cresson, Israel Cooper, Robert K. Colvin, Alexander Rowan, William Wright, John L. Wright, Jonathan Pusey, Robert B. Wright, Joseph W. Cottrell, Christian Haldeman, Peter Haldeman, Reuben Mullison, Jonas Rumble, John Cooper, Joseph Jenkins, Henry Montgomery, Samuel S. Haldeman, William S. Shultz, Michael Strein.

A contract was made with Israel Cooper, who put another story upon and extended the building several feet in the rear, where a staircase was built, from which access was had to the hall on the second floor, which was rented to the Lyceum Association for five years.

On the 9th day of March, 1839, Noble Heath, an Englishman, who had been teaching a select school at West Chester, was engaged to teach at a salary of eight hundred dollars per annum. Owing to some serious indiscretion on his part he was requested to resign, and the board engaged R. S. Roberts to take charge of the school in the fall of 1839. In the same year the title was changed to Columbia Academy.

On March 20, 1841, Cyrus Frost, of Philadelphia, took charge of the school, but in the fall of the same year the trustees employed Mr. Johnson to take his place. In the winter of 1842 he resigned, and Thomas H. Pearce was engaged to teach three months. He was followed by Mr. Howland, who taught one term. In July, 1842, B. F. Wright, a graduate of Dickinson College, was engaged. In the spring of 1843 he was succeeded by Thomas W. Sommers, who was followed by L. J. Roads in 1845, who remained in charge of the school until 1851, when the property was sold to the borough, with the view of making room to extend the market-house. Some of these teachers were addicted to the use of ardent spirits, and at certain periods drank to excess. The frequent changes made in teachers indicate that the school was not entirely successful. There were a number of private schools in the borough, which interfered with its prosperity.

Private Schools.—John Quest taught in Walnut Street in the years 1807-9; Amos Harmer in 1809, and Sarah Currie (mother of Martin Currie), on Walnut Street, in 1812. Rev. Stephen Boyer, the pastor of the Presbyterian Church, opened a select school and prepared young men to enter upon a collegiate course in 1812-20.

Joseph Mifflin, born in Philadelphia, removed from there to Little Britain township, in this county. On the 8th day of May, 1806, he married Martha Houston, daughter of Dr. John and Susanna Houston, of Columbia, and removed to Columbia, where he taught school in 1813-14 in a frame building which stood in the rear of the market-house. He afterwards entered the Columbia Bank and Bridge Company as teller, and was thus engaged several years, ending about the year 1820.

A Mr. Barber taught on Walnut Street in 1800.

Lydia Hutton, a Quaker, taught a school for poor children at the corner of Cherry Street and Lancaster Avenue. She was paid by a few of the wealthy citizens, 1825.

Mrs. Claiborne, daughter of Gen. Ross, and the widow of Gen. Richard Claiborne, who had been Governor of Louisiana, came from New Orleans to Columbia in 1818, where she opened a school in the house lately owned by the Miss Houstons, on Locust Street; she afterwards taught on Walnut and Front Streets. She taught children between the age of eight and twelve years, and was thus engaged about twenty-five years.

Richard H. Murphy, John Resch, John P. Wade, William Kenneday, — Bond, — Dunlap also taught between the years 1820 and 1832.

David J. Snow taught singing-school in 1826 and 1827.

Henry Connelly taught a classical school on Front Street.

Thomas Lloyd taught school for eighteen years. He was a justice of the peace for many years, and was also a surveyor and scrivener, secretary for many years of the "Water Company," and held that position for a number of other societies and corporations. He ceased to teach school in 1831, and was succeeded by Ezra Ffirth on July 11, 1831, who came from Philadelphia, where he had been teaching for twenty years. In December, 1831, he added a night- to his day-school. His wife also taught young children, and gave young ladies lessons in fine needle- and lace-work. They taught on Third Street, near the old Columbia brick school-house, and also in the latter place. Mrs. Ffirth is now living in Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Columbia Select School for Young Ladies was established in 1833 by Miss E. Ely. She had a number of scholars from a distance, who boarded with private families, and paid from one dollar and a half to two dollars per week for boarding.

This school was on Second between Walnut and Locust Streets. The school was well patronized and in a prosperous condition for two or three years, when it declined rapidly, and ceased to exist in the following year. The terms of tuition for the English branches were five dollars per quarter; the French language, ten dollars per quarter.

In June, 1832, Rev. William F. Houston opened an infant school. It lived but a few years, notwithstanding the efforts of this public-spirited gentleman to supply what he believed to be a want greatly needed in the borough.

Deborah Foreman conducted a private school for young children for thirty years. She died in 1882.

Francis X. Zeigler commenced to teach a private school about forty years ago, and at intervals since has taught both private and public schools. For more than twenty years he has devoted his entire time to the telegraph and Adams Express, in connection with fire insurance business.

Commencing in 1825, Amos Gilbert taught school a few years on Second Street near Walnut. He was a Quaker, and was a descendant of the Gilbert family who were taken prisoners by the Indians a hundred years ago. His son Howard is a professional teacher, and is well known in this county and the eastern section of the State as one of the best and most successful teachers and accomplished scholars in the State. He has traveled a great deal upon the continent of Europe, and has acquired the language of many nations.

In 1829, Michael Strine began teaching, and continued a few years on Walnut Street and on Locust Street. He was born in Lancaster, and came from a family which furnished a number of teachers and ministers in the Lutheran Church. His son, Jacob S. Strein, was the late sheriff.

John Christy taught in the blue-front house on Locust Street above the old town hall in 1828-31. James Stevenson taught school on Walnut Street, 1828-30. Miss Laird, Miss Hamilton, and Miss Houston were also teachers at a later period, and John D. Wright taught about twenty-five years ago.

Lancasterian School.—Joseph Lancaster, a member of the Society of Friends in England, was the founder of the monitorial system, by which the most intelligent pupils in a school were required to teach their fellows what they had learned in advance of them. Mr. Lancaster died in 1839. This system came into general use in England and this country. In 1822 the Legislature of Pennsylvania enacted a law encouraging these schools. Lancaster City and the boroughs of this county were designated as the "Second School District of the State." Twelve directors or controllers, to be elected by the people, were to manage the schools in each of the boroughs.

J. I. Rowand commenced to teach school in his native place, in the winter season, in New Jersey in 1820. He went from there to the city of Camden, N. J., and took charge of the academy in that place and remained there until 1827, when failing health compelled him to relinquish for a time the business of teaching. During the summer of 1827 he went to Philadelphia and took instructions in the model school on the "Lancasterian" mode of education. In the autumn of 1828 he came to Columbia and opened a school on the Lancasterian plan in the then new town hall, which had just been completed. Among the trustees were William Wright, president, Evan Green, James Given, and William Dick, secretary.

The school was opened in the second story, with one hundred and five scholars on the first day. This number increased, and the room was found to be entirely too small to accommodate that number. The charge for each scholar was two dollars per quarter, which covered all expenses.

This school was conducted on that plan for about two years, when the trustees changed its character to a select and limited in number school, which was always full. In the spring of 1832, Mr. Rowand was compelled to give up his school on account of failing health. In June, 1832, he sold his school to George W. Layng, a native of New England. In addition to the ordinary English branches he taught the Greek and Latin languages. His terms of tuition were:

Spelling, reading, and writing, three dollars for twelve weeks; arithmetic and geography, four dollars for twelve weeks; English grammar, history, use of the globes, natural philosophy, etc., five dollars for twelve weeks.

Extra charges were made for pens, ink, and pencils, and for fuel. His sister, Miss Maria Layng, gave instructions in plain and ornamental needle-work to young ladies. Mr. Layng was a classical scholar, as well as an accomplished gentleman. His school was well patronized. Mr. Layng removed to Pittsburgh, where he studied law, and became a successful attorney. He died some years ago. He was followed by Henry Montgomery in 1836, a native of New York State, who taught school near the "Gap," in this county, from which place he came to Columbia.

Like his predecessors, he used the rod freely, which on several occasions stirred up the ire of the "bad boys'" parents, who came to the school-room to return the compliment on the teacher, which was not always a success. Mr. Montgomery found that the profession of teaching was not the one best adapted to the development of his abilities. He was in political faith an Anti-Mason, and entered into the personal warfare carried on in the newspapers between the parties with a good deal of vim. He established the Pennsylvania Courant in Columbia in 1837, and while he was connected with this paper, which was about two years, he was in "hot water" all the time, and was never satisfied unless he could find some political opponent to pound. As a political writer in a heated campaign he had few equals. He remained in the newspaper business for many years in Harrisburg, Lancaster, and Detroit, Mich. He married Ann, daughter of Robert Spear, Esq., late of this place.

He was followed by Michael R. Keegan in 1837, who taught school in the town hall and at the corner of Front and Union Streets for ten years. He removed to the State of Ohio.

Washington Institute was created and brought into existence by the trustees of the Public Ground Company, whose funds were a trust designed by the founder of Columbia for the sole benefit of the citizens of the town he laid out, which is known as "Old Columbia."

Before the free-school system was adopted in the State, the citizens of Old Columbia frequently met and endeavored to convert the income of this trust to establish free schools in the town. There was no one who could devise a plan calculated to make the scheme a success, and hence every attempt in that direction was a failure.

There was jealousy and envy among the citizens of Old and New Columbia over the disposition of this trust fund, and different projects were proposed, which led to a confusion of counsel, and the consequence was that nothing was done.

In the spring of 1854 the board of trustees of the public ground concluded to purchase a tract of land on the north side of Lancaster Avenue, between Locust and Cherry Streets, from John L. Wright, upon which they designed to erect a school building. In the year 1856 a contract was made with Michael Clepper for its erection for $8040, and it was finished the same year.

June 30, 1857, a school board composed of five members were elected, to wit: Samuel Truscott, Philip Shreiner, Jonas Ruple, Joshua Vaughen, and Henry Minnich, of the board of trustees of the public ground, and Joseph W. Fisher, Hugh M. North, Samuel Shoch, and Dr. Benjamin Rohrer by the citizens of Old Columbia, who were to serve for one year.

In November, 1857, Professor Joseph D. Nichols was chosen principal, and in the following winter Morris D. Wickersham and Grace Clarkson were chosen assistants. In 1859 he was assisted by Mr. Gamwell and Miss Herntz. The school was not self-sustaining, and on the 1st day of March, 1859, the company gave the buildings to Mr. Nichols free of rent. During the summer and fall of that year the school was reported to be in a flourishing condition, but it soon declined again.

On the 1st day of July, 1860, the Institute was rented to Rev. A. Essick for a period of one year. He was assisted by Mr. Patton for a few months. The following two or three years were periods of depression, and the board of trustees made an effort to sell or rent the buildings to the school board of the borough.

In February, 1863, Professor Howard Gilbert and Professor Vicroy and Miss Johnson taught in separate rooms. In April, 1863, a free school was taught for three months by Professors Peck, Richards, Johnson, and Haldeman.

In the month of September, 1863, the Institute building was taken by the United States government for a hospital, and so occupied for two months.

In October, 1863, it was rented to Professor H. S. Alexander, and a portion of the building was converted into a dwelling. In January, 1864, Mr. Alexander leased the buildings for a period of eight years.

In April, 1866, Mr. Alexander sold his lease to President Sacket, who found the school in a prosperous condition, but let it run down, when Mr. Alexander took charge of the school again in 1868. In March, 1868, the trustees purchased from J. H. Mifflin, for eighteen hundred dollars, a tract of land adjoining the Institute grounds which extends to Locust and Sixth Streets. In the same year the buildings were enlarged. Under the management of Professor Alexander the school was in a flourishing condition and profitable. His health and that of Mrs. Alexander was such that they had to abandon the profession they had adorned with so much grace and ability, and in March, 1871, they retired from the Institute and were succeeded by the Rev. Ewing. In January, 1873, Mr. Alexander again took charge of the school, but he was not able to make it self-supporting.

In February, 1876, the school board of the borough leased the Washington Institute buildings and the grounds purchased from John L. Wright for a period of twenty years, at an annual rental of four hundred dollars. It is now called the Columbia High School, and under the superb management of Professor B. G. Ames, superintendent of the public schools of Columbia, and Misses Lillian and Mary Welsh and Mr. Hoffman, his able assistants, who have charge of the schools, it is second to none in the State in school government and the thoroughness with which they instruct in the several branches of study in accordance with the curriculum.

A day- and boarding-school for boys, English and classical, was established in the second story of the town hall, on April 18, 1853, by Professor Alfred Armstrong, principal. The school was removed to the building in the rear of the Presbyterian Church on Fourth Street. A number of scholars received a classical course of studies, and were prepared to enter upon a collegiate course of studies. The school was scarcely self-sustaining, and Mr. Armstrong removed to Harrisburg, where he again established an academy.

Up to the year 1834 there was no uniform system of education in the State for the common people. Every township and town had its private schools, conducted frequently by incompetent teachers in their own way. They were peripatetic in their movements, and seldom remained longer in one place than three winter months. In the country they boarded around among the farmers, and sometimes behaved very dishonorably.

Long and persistent efforts in behalf of the common school system in New England by Horace Mann crowned his efforts with success about the year 1830. Friends of the educational cause in Pennsylvania took up the subject, and began to agitate and mould a public sentiment in favor of the common school system. The subject was brought before the Legislature and discussed there. Governor Wolf rendered valuable aid. Among the ablest and most persistent champions in the Legislature of these measures was Thaddeus Stevens, then of Adams County. His eloquence and matchless argument brought a majority of the Assembly to his side, and the common school law was passed in 1834. There was a provision in the law requiring the districts to accept the same before it was brought into practical operation.

When the Legislature adjourned and the full scope of the law became known to the people, there was great opposition to its enforcement.

On Tuesday, Sept. 11, 1834, a meeting of the citizens was held in the town hall to ascertain the sentiments of the people on the subject of adopting the school law. Dr. Joseph Clarkson was chairman and J. Houston Mifflin secretary. Thomas E. Cochran addressed the meeting in favor of the school law. Dr. R. E. Cochran, John Barber, Esq., and J. Houston Mifflin were selected or nominated by the meeting for school directors, and Samuel Boyd, Christian Horshey, and John Musselman were selected for school directors from West Hempfield township.

When the Legislature met in 1835, a majority of its members were in favor of repealing the law of 1834. Thomas H. Burroughs, who was then Secretary of State under Joseph Ritner's administration, was a warm friend of the law, and worked very hard to save it. Opposition grew rapidly, and everything seemed to be lost. Upon making a private canvass among the members, it was found that a large majority were in favor of repealing the law. When the question came up upon second reading, Mr. Stevens arose, and under the inspiration of the moment made one of the grandest and most successful efforts ever undertaken in a deliberative body of people to change a large majority to the minority side. He had barely taken his seat when there was a call from every member to vote upon the question. The law was sustained, and it has never been disturbed since, except to improve it. A copy of this speech should be printed and hung upon the walls of every school-room in the State.

There was considerable opposition to the seventh section of the school law, which required a tax to be levied in the borough of Columbia and East and West Hempfield townships.

On the 16th day of May, 1835, a public meeting of the citizens of Columbia and the township named was held at the public-house of Joshua Kehlers, one mile and a half east from Columbia, along the Columbia and Lancaster turnpike, of which Samuel Boyd was president; J. Houston Mifflin, secretary.

West Hempfield, which included Columbia, was among the first townships in the county to accept the law.

The Public Schools.—After the system of common schools came into general use, the improvement made was gradual. The schools were better attended, more care was taken by the directors in the selection of competent teachers; but little real progress was made, however, until the Normal School at Millersville was fairly under way and a class of teachers trained and equipped to enter a profession they adorned.

Another step in advance was taken when graded schools were introduced. In 1857 a committee was appointed by the school board, with J. G. Hess as its chairman, to grade the public schools of Columbia. This was something new, and but little progress was made, promotions were gradual and few. There were six separate school buildings in the place, some of which were substantial brick structures. The citizens wisely selected some of their best educated and most prominent citizens for school directors. Their education and training enabled them to select competent teachers from merit alone, and to them much credit is due for the advances made in the cause of education in Columbia. Of the number may be mentioned Samuel Shoch, Hugh M. North, J. W. Fisher, Amos S. Green, J. Houston Mifflin, and also Joseph M. Watts, Samuel Grove, Phillip Shreiner, David W. Griffith, J. G. Hess, Samuel Young, Abraham Bruner, George Young, Jr., Daniel Waun. The most successful teachers were Calvin Stewart (now pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Colerain township), William Murphy, Morris Wickersham, Frederick S. Pyfer, Mary Shoch, Grace Clarkson, Georgian Houston, and Mary Miller.

The board of directors in 1862 decided to erect one school building large enough to accommodate all white children of lawful age in the place. Accordingly a building was erected on Cherry Street between Fourth and Fifth Streets, three stories high, and containing eighteen commodious school-rooms, ten of which were furnished and prepared for the reception of scholars in 1863. The building was constructed of brick, and was modeled after the High School building on Broad Street, Philadelphia, and when completed was one of the largest and finest school buildings in the State. At the time of its erection it was thought that it was sufficiently large to accommodate all of the white children in the place for many years to come. When filled it would seat two thousand scholars. Although it was a great stride in educational progress, experience has since demonstrated that it was not altogether a wise movement to collect the scholars in an entire district as large as Columbia and place them under one roof. The system has its advantages, but there are many disadvantages which more than balance the good ones. The original cost of the building was sixteen thousand dollars.

The borough superintendency of public schools was adopted for Columbia April 1, 1875. In May they agreed to advertise for a superintendent, and agreed to pay him an annual salary of fourteen hundred dollars. Out of fifty-seven applicants Benjamin G. Ames, of Bridgeton, N. J., was chosen to fill the new position. He was an accomplished scholar, and had rare qualifications to fill a position of this kind; more than thirty years of his life has been devoted to the cause of education.

His system of promotions was different from the old one, and he gradually made a number of other changes, which experience has proven to have been wise and salutary. The most accomplished and thorough teachers in the schools are graduates of the High School.

Miss Lillian Welsh, a daughter of the late Gen. Thomas Welsh, is now vice-principal of the High School, and is one of the most successful and talented teachers in the State. Her sister Marie is her assistant, and is well fitted for the position.

Mr. Hoffman has also risen from the lower to the front rank as a teacher. The entire body of teachers are excelled by few anywhere, and Columbia may well feel proud of the position her schools hold in relation to others in the State.

Lyceum.—The system of social lyceums became very popular with the people in the United States about the year 1830, and it did not decline for ten or twelve years. Josiah Holbrook, who was actuary of the Universal Lyceum, was the principal organizer of lyceums in the United States. The Columbia Lyceum was organized Dec. 2, 1835. The exercises generally opened with a lecture delivered by one of the members, or a subject selected which was debated by members chosen by the chairman. This feature of the lyceum was always entertaining. Among the members who delivered lectures were Henry Montgomery, S. S. Haldeman, Dr. J. S. Clarkson, Samuel A. Black, Dr. William S. McCorkle, James J. Given, Thomas H. Pearce, E. C. Lewis, Dr. R. E. Cochran, Owen B. Goodman, H. Bingham, Philip Gossler. Many of these lectures were illustrated with scientific apparatus. When the lyceum ran out of home material for lecturers, they were supplied by young and promising lawyers from Lancaster. Among the number we recollect Amos Slaymaker, Esq., Nathaniel Ellmaker, Esq., George M. Kline, Esq. The meetings of the lyceum were held in the old brick school-house on Third Street, near the town hall. After its decline many of its members formed an organization called the Senate. Members were divided and assigned to each of the States. This organization was copied after the United States Senate. Its most pleasing and interesting feature was the political discussions between the members, who were supposed to represent the same political parties which elected the United States senators in their respective States, and they generally adhered to the line of argument used by the members of the United States Senate, whom they were supposed to represent. These discussions were animated and often acrimonious. Among the most active members were J. H. Mifflin, John S. Given, Joseph W. Fisher, Napoleon B. Wolfe, Samuel Evans, Alexander Caldwell,<sup>1</sup> James B. Cowden, John Frederick Houston, Stewart D. Elliot, Hugh M. North, Philip Gossler, Amos S. Green, J. G. L. Brown. This organization lasted several years.

Public Libraries.—On the 14th day of January, 1829, a number of prominent citizens subscribed various sums to be expended in the purchase of books for the mutual benefit of all those concerned in a library company to be formed. The company was organized in the spring of 1829 by the election of Evan Green, president, and William Dick, secretary; Miss Haines, librarian. A large and judicious selection of books and pamphlets were purchased. Much interest was at first taken in the enterprise, but debts were accumulated gradually, and in four years from its organization the books and property of the "Columbia, Pennsylvania, Library Company" were sold at auction to pay its debts. Enough was realized also to pay each shareholder two dollars on each share of stock, the par value of which was five dollars. The building opposite the Franklin House was occupied by the library. Herewith we publish the names of each shareholder, so far as we are able to ascertain :

The Franklin Library was organized in the spring of 1834, John L. Boswell, secretary. The stockholders purchased the books of the Columbia Library, and added to them a large number of new books. This was, like its predecessor, a circulating library. It flourished for a few years, and then went down rapidly. There was no public library in the place from 1836 to 1862.

In the year 1862, Samuel Shoch, president of the Columbia National Bank, donated to the public schools of Columbia five hundred dollars for the purpose of procuring books and establishing a library. The school board accepted this fund and established a library, and named it after its donor. This was the plant of a large and select library. Mr. Shoch has given liberally of his abundant means since, and the school board have at various times made large appropriations and purchased several thousand volumes of choice books. They have, and it is their duty to make, an annual appropriation for the purchase of books and meet incidental expenses. The library is now established on a permanent basis, and will become in time one of the grandest institutions in the county.

At present a large room on the first story of the public school building on Cherry Street has been set apart for the library. Only one danger confronts the friends of this enterprise, and that is the possibility of fire wiping out of existence in a few hours the accumulated work of many years. It is hoped that there may be found in the community enough of generous-minded citizens who will provide sufficient means to erect a fire-proof building upon the public ground at the corner of Fifth and Locust Streets, or in that vicinity, that will protect this library from a calamity so disastrous.

Samuel Grove, a prominent citizen of the place, twenty or more years ago commenced to purchase books with a view of establishing a circulating library. He made additional purchases from time to time until he has several hundred volumes in his library-room on Third Street, between Locust and Cherry Streets. His books are generally of a religious cast.

Old Residents' Society.—On the 27th day of November, 1874, a number of citizens of Columbia organized a society of old residents of Columbia, the object being to cherish the social interests and friendly relations by holding frequent meetings, under the name of the "Ancient Citizens of Columbia." Following is a list of the members:

To become a member of this society a residence of fifty years is required. Several have attained an age of more than fourscore years. As will be seen from the foregoing list, their numbers are rapidly growing less.

Banking.—The Philadelphia Branch Bank was opened on the 22d day of May, 1809. John McKissick was the first cashier, and was followed by Dr. Beaton Smith. This bank did business in the brick house at the corner of Locust and Front Streets, now owned by Jacob Snyder. The Philadelphia Bank had its branch in Columbia for about fifteen years.

The great increase in the population of the State, and the travel incident thereto between sections divided by our great river, the Susquehanna, rendered it necessary to adopt other means than a ferry to accommodate the traveling public who desired to go to either side of this stream; we find, therefore, that in the onward progress of the internal improvements of the State that the construction of bridges, although a novel and untried enterprise, found its advocates, and was undertaken with hopeful confidence of good results; therefore, "An act authorizing the Governor of Pennsylvania to incorporate a company for the purpose of making and erecting a bridge over the river Susquehanna, in the county of Lancaster, at or near the town of Columbia," was passed by the Legislature and approved the 28th of March, 1809, the State being pledged therein to take $90,000 of the stock.

A charter was accordingly granted by Governor Snyder on the 19th of October, 1811, and on the 23d of December following the stockholders organized by electing as managers, viz.: William Wright, president; Thomas Boude, Samuel Bethel, James Wright, Samuel Miller, John Evans, Christian Breneman, John Forrey, Jr., Abraham Witmer, Henry Slaymaker, William Barber, Jacob Eichelberger, John Tomlinson, and William P. Beatty as treasurer, and John Barber secretary.

On the 8th of July, 1812, articles of agreement were entered into with Henry Slaymaker and Samuel Slaymaker, of Lancaster County, and Jonathan Walcott, of Connecticut, for the erection of a bridge for the sum of $150,000, but which before its completion cost $233,000. The piers were fifty feet long, and ten feet wide at top. The spans each one hundred feet in length.

Stock to the amount of $400,000 was subscribed for, and after paying for the cost of the bridge the remaining balance was appropriated to banking purposes, and an office of discount and deposit was opened on 5th July, 1813, and notes were printed and issued as bank notes. This proceeding being declared illegal, a charter was afterwards obtained on the 27th March, 1824, for the establishment of a bank under the title of "The Columbia Bridge Company," Christian Breneman being elected president, and John McKissick, cashier. Since then this title has been changed to "The Columbia Bank and Bridge Company," "The Columbia Bank," and lastly, the "Columbia National Bank," which it still retains, with a capital of $500,000, having been increased from time to time from its original charter amount of $150,000, to $250,000, $322,500, and in 1864 to its present amount.

Since 1824, Christian Breneman, Christian Haldeman, John Forrey, Jr., John N. Lane, David Rinehart, John Cooper, Col. James Meyers, Dr. Barton Evans, John Cooper, George Bogle, and lastly, the present incumbent, Col. Samuel Shoch, have severally acted as presidents, and during their several periods of service John McKissick acted as cashier until 1832, Preston B. Elder, his successor, until 1839, and Col. Samuel Shoch until 1878, a period of thirty-nine years, when he was elected president, in which capacity he still officiates, although in the eighty-seventh year of his age.

PHIL. ZEISS DEL.

Samuel Hoeb

In 1832 the bridge was carried away by an ice freshet, and rebuilt at an expenditure of $157,300 and the debris of the old bridge. In June, 1863, the bridge, as rebuilt, was burned as a military necessity under an order from Gen. Couch, commandant of the Susquehanna division of the Federal army, to prevent the rebels from crossing, as the best protection for Eastern Pennsylvania. The bank, owning the bridge, sold the piers and the abutments, with the franchises as a bridge company, to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company for $57,000, and has therefore sustained a loss of $100,000, for which a claim has been preferred against the United States government with hopes of its being allowed.

The First National Bank was organized in May, 1863, with a capital of $100,000. President, Ephraim Hershey; Cashier, S. S. Detweiler. This bank increased its capital to $200,000, and its surplus amounts to $40,000. The present officers are Hugh M. North, Esq., president; S. S. Detweiler, cashier. The bank building is located at the southeast corner of Locust and Second Streets. The amount of deposits is very large, and the bank is in a prosperous condition.

E. K. Smith & Co.'s banking house is located at the northwest corner of Locust and Second Streets. Its capital unlimited. The members of the firm are E. K. Smith and Christian E. Graybill.

The Columbia Deposit Bank was organized in March, 1870, with E. K. Smith, president, and C. E. Graybill, cashier. This bank closed in 1880.

The Dime Savings Bank was organized in 1869. The treasurers were Samuel Allison and Ephraim Hershey. The bank suspended business in 1880.

COL. SAMUEL SHOCH.—Michael Shoch, the grandfather of Col. Samuel, was a native of Germany, and on his emigration to America settled near Philadelphia. He had several children, among whom was John, whose birth occurred at the paternal home near Philadelphia. He in 1792 removed to Harrisburg, Dauphin Co., and there remained until his death in 1842. He married Miss Salome Gilbert, of Philadelphia, and had children,—Mary, Sarah, Rebecca, Eliza, Cassandra, Samuel, John, Jacob, and one who died in childhood. Samuel, whose life is here briefly sketched, was born in Harrisburg, May 28, 1797. His career covers some of the most eventful periods in our national history, and has been so closely identified with local events that it forms an inseparable part of them. His early education was commenced at preparatory schools before the establishment of the present school system, and continued at the Nottingham Academy, Cecil Co., Md. His further education and preparation for professional life were the result of personal application directed only by himself.

As early as 1812 he was recorder of patents under John Cochran, secretary of the land-office, and recorder of surveys in the office of Andrew Porter, then surveyor-general. In September, 1814, he joined the Harrisburg Artillerists, a company formed within twenty-four hours after the British had burned the capitol at Washington, and was the youngest man in the four companies that volunteered from Harrisburg on that occasion. The company marched to York and thence to Baltimore, and remained on duty there until the British withdrew and abandoned their contemplated attack on that city.

In May, 1817, he began the study of law under Hon. Amos Ellmaker, attorney-general, and was admitted to the Dauphin County bar in 1820. He was always aggressive, and as a young lawyer displayed great energy and fearlessness in prosecuting what he believed to be wrong. He took an active part in an unsuccessful attempt to impeach Judge Franks, of the Lebanon and Dauphin district, for alleged offenses.

In 1835 he was elected clerk of the House of Representatives by a union of the Whig and Anti-Masonic members, defeating Francis R. Shunk, the Democratic candidate. In 1837 he was secretary to the convention which gave us the Constitution under which Pennsylvania lived from 1838 to 1873, and at the adjournment of that body was unanimously thanked. The colonel finds special pleasure in recounting his services with that body.

In 1839 he cast his fortunes with Columbia, and went there to live, having been elected cashier of the Columbia Bank and Bridge Company. The company had a nominal capital of $150,000, but actually not more than $80,000 to $100,000, as a bridge costing more than $175,000 had been swept away by an ice freshet in 1832, and the loss had not been wholly made up. The capital was afterwards increased, first to $250,000, and in 1837 to $322,500, with a change of title to Columbia Bank. In 1865 the bank accepted the national bank law and became the Columbia National Bank, with a capital of $500,000, at which it still remains, with a surplus fund of $150,000. He has thus maintained official relations with the corporation as its cashier and president for forty-four years, during a period the events of which are matters of local history.

Col. Shoch was, in 1842, married to Mrs. Hannah Evans, daughter of Amos Slaymaker, of Lancaster County, who was the leading manager of the line of stages between Philadelphia and Pittsburgh. Her death having occurred in March, 1860, he contracted a second alliance in August, 1865, with Miss Anna E., daughter of Robert Barber, of Columbia, Pa.

In 1848, Col. Shoch was appointed aid to Governor William Johnson, which by courtesy conferred upon him the title of colonel, a title by which he is better known than by his Christian name.

In 1860 the colonel was a member of the State committee of the Republican party, and a delegate to the National Convention at Chicago which nominated Abraham Lincoln, the martyr President.

During the war he was foremost in deeds of charity and patriotism, and presented to the first company formed in Columbia a beautiful and costly silk flag.

He always took a warm interest in our public schools, and through his active exertions and liberal donations the "Shoch Library," in honor of its patron, was established.

Col. Shoch also took an active interest in local enterprises, and was at one and the same time president of the Columbia Gas and Water Companies, the Old Public Ground Company, and the Marietta, Chestnut Hill and Washington Turnpike-Road Companies. He was also treasurer of the Reading and Columbia Railroad Company, but resigned in 1862, before going abroad on a continental tour. He was for ten years president of the school board of the borough of Columbia, during which period a spacious edifice, devoted to the use of the public schools, was erected. He served a term as director of the poor of Lancaster County, two terms as county auditor, was a trustee of the Millersville Normal School, and director of the Wrightsville, York and Gettysburg Railroad. If responsible official positions are a measure of public confidence, then Col. Shoch was favored above all his fellow-citizens.

The colonel was always an active worker in the Sunday-school cause. In the early part of his professional career he was both a teacher and superintendent of the Sunday-school of the Lutheran Church in Harrisburg. Within the last ten years his youthful enthusiasm for the cause has been specially reawakened, and his active services as teacher of a Bible class in the Columbia Fifth Street Presbyterian Sunday-school, together with the erection, furnishing, and endowment of their beautiful chapel (named "Salome" in honor of his mother), attests the sincerity of his motives. In 1854, and for several years thereafter, he maintained at his own expense a public night-school, employed teachers, and furnished books, etc., for the benefit of apprentices and other young persons who could not attend school during the day, and was happily rewarded by finding the school well attended. Many of the pupils since grown up have become prominent and well-to-do citizens, who gratefully acknowledge the advantages they derived from the enterprise.

In politics he has been uniformly and radically anti-Democratic, a great admirer of Thaddeus Stevens, and is in full accord with Republican administration.

The colonel's has been an eventful and busy life, and even now, when he has just crossed the threshold of his eighty-sixth year, not a single duty is neglected, not a responsibility evaded, and not an energy relaxed.

Having faithfully performed the duties of cashier of the Columbia National Bank for a period of thirty-nine years, he was, in December, 1878, elected its president, and notwithstanding his age, continues his routine of duties, beginning at eight o'clock in the morning and remaining to witness the settlement of all accounts after the bank closes. His principal diversion is his violin, an instrument of unusual excellence, which affords him many happy hours.

With a mind fresh and vigorous, and with a remarkable activity of body and buoyancy of step, he has reasonable expectations of passing many more years of usefulness.

Newspapers.—The Susquehanna Waterman was started in the year 1811 by Thomas A. Wilson, a practical printer, who learned his trade in the borough of York. He established a printing-office in a one-story frame building which stood on the north side of Locust Street below Second Street. In the following year he purchased a half lot of ground on the south side of Locust Street, nearly opposite his frame shop. Upon this lot he erected a three-story brick house, to which he moved his printing-press, etc. He probably used the third story of this building for an office, for he did not plaster the walls. The reaction in business and values of all kind after the war of 1812-15 left him stranded, and his property was sold to James Cyde, Esq., in the year 1818. Mr. Wilson returned to York, thence to one of the Southern States, where he remained for many years. Some of his descendants reside in Wrightsville, York Co.

William Greear published a small newspaper in Lancaster called the Hive in 1804. He removed his job-printing press, etc., to Columbia in the year 1812. In the winter of 1814-15 he was elected printer of the "Rolls" by the Legislature, and he removed his printing-press to Harrisburg. He returned to Columbia and commenced the publication of a newspaper called The Columbian on the 24th day of July, 1819, in a two-story brick building he purchased from Dr. Eberle. After publishing eighteen numbers it was suspended for want of support. After six or eight months it was revived. It was not self-sustaining, and its publication ceased altogether in a few months. He removed his printing-press to Washington, D. C. He was a Quaker and a person of strict integrity. The Columbian was published in 1840 by Thomas Taylor, and edited by N. B. Wolfe. The editor wrote a romance called the "Bandit," which ran through several numbers of the paper, which seems to have knocked the life out of the paper. Before the story was completed the paper ceased to exist.

The Monitor was established by Dr. William F. Houston on the 24th day of April, 1823. It was printed in Dr. Houston's dwelling, now owned by Theodore Urban, on Locust Street below Second. Like the Columbian, it was neutral in politics. It was strongly religious in tone. It was published several years.

The Columbian Courant was established by Scheaff & Heinitch, who purchased the press and type belonging to the Pioneer in Marietta and brought it to Columbia. They sold out to John L. Boswell, a young printer who came from the State of Connecticut, who, on the 3d day of June, 1830, commenced the publication of the Columbia Spy and Literary Register, which was neutral until June 23, 1831, when its title was changed to Columbia Spy and Lancaster and York County Record, and the "Henry Clay" banner was nailed to its head, with the "American System" inscribed upon it. For that period in the history of journalism it was ably conducted, and was devoted to the interests of Henry Clay, whom the editor desired to be President of the United States. On the 6th day of July, 1833, the paper was enlarged to twenty by thirty inches. In 1834, Mr. Boswell and Carpenter McCleery, of Lancaster, established the Lancaster Union, published in that city. The editor of the Spy gave a portion of his time to that paper. On the 24th day of May, 1834, Thomas E. Cochran took formal charge of the editorial department of the Spy. In the spring of 1836, Mr. Boswell sold the Spy to Preston B. Elder, cashier of the Columbia Bank and Bridge Company, and purchased the Hartford Courant, and removed to Hartford, Conn. Ercurius Beatty published the Spy for the proprietor from that time to September, 1837, when it was published by E. Beatty & Co. Under the editorial management of Mr. Elder the paper obtained a high rank among the literary papers in the country. He was an accomplished writer and poet.

After Mr. Elder's death in 1839, Theodore D. Cochran, who was then an apprentice in the office, took editorial management of the paper. He developed great talent as a political writer, and had few equals among his editorial brethren. While yet in his minority he took charge of the Old Guard in 1840, an Anti-Masonic paper, established in Lancaster in 1839. Evan Green, the administrator of Mr. Elder (who died in 1839), sold the paper to James Patton, collector of tolls at the canal basin, who changed its name to the Columbia Spy and Lancaster and York County Democrat. It advocated the election of Martin Van Buren for President. In 1842, Mr. E. Maxson was taken into partnership, and in the spring of 1843, Eli Bowen and Jacob L. Gossler purchased the paper. They were both minors, but young men of ability. In the fall of 1844, Mr. Bowen started the Protector, a tariff paper, and sold his interest in the Spy to Charles J. Barnitz, of York, who also purchased Mr. Gossler's interest in 1845. In June, 1847, Charrick Westbrook purchased the Spy, and Dec. 11, 1847, William H. Spangler purchased an interest in the paper. In the summer of 1848 they sold to George W. Schroyer, who sold to Eshleman, Kammerer & Gochenauer in 1849, who sold to J. G. L. Brown in 1850. In 1853 it was published by Brown & Greene, who sold to Coleman J. Bull in 1855. In 1856 it was purchased by Stephen Greene (Mr. Brown taking a position in Forney's Press office), who sold to Samuel Wright in 1857, was appointed to a position on Gen. Thomas Welsh's staff, and went into the army. He sold to Andrew

M. Rambo in 1863, who on Sept. 4, 1869, sold to Maj. James W. Yocum, the present proprietor. It is a conservative Republican paper and conducted with ability.

The Columbia Daily Spy was started by A. M. Rambo & Son in 1868, and was published for a period of eighteen months. It was Republican in politics.

The Pennsylvania Courant was started in 1837 by Henry Montgomery. Ercurius Beatty subsequently became the publisher and proprietor. It lived until 1843. During the gubernatorial canvass of 1838 this paper was particularly strong in its political department.

The Protector was started by Eli Bowen and Jacob L. Gossler in March, 1843. As its name implies, it was a devoted advocate of the cause of protection and the election of Henry Clay to the Presidency. After a few numbers were published Mr. Gossler retired, and sold his interest to Mr. Bowen, who became editor, publisher, and carrier. He had but little money, and often not the means to procure a meal. He would go barefooted, and often sleep in an outhouse when out of money. He walked to Lancaster, and purchased an old Ramage press from Hugh Maxwell, and two hundred pounds of type, on trust. He struck off an edition of one thousand copies, and carried his papers to Lancaster and neighboring towns, and sold the entire number, which put him upon "his feet." He bid fair to be one of the best newspaper men in the country, but he was erratic, and did not tread the paths of journalism for a period longer than four or five years. The Protector lived but six months.

The Water-Spout was started during the height of the Washingtonian temperance movement, and was devoted to that cause. James Klinedriest was publisher and Theodore D. Cochran editor. It lived but six months.

The Columbian was started by Charrick Westbrook in 1846, and published by him until he purchased the Spy in 1847, when it was merged in the latter.

The Columbia Herald was established in December, 1867. Several leading men in the Democratic party subscribed a sum sufficient to start a paper, and George Young, Jr., who was then an officer in the Columbia Fire Insurance Company, was chosen as editor. He became sole owner. Mr. Young, Jr., sold an interest in the paper to W. Hayes Grier in 1873, and subsequently to that time it was published by Grier & Moderwell. Several years ago Mr. Grier purchased Moderwell's interest, and is now sole proprietor and editor. Mr. Grier has been recently appointed superintendent of the State printing-office at Harrisburg. He was a private in the late war (see military chapter). He is also justice of the peace for the Second Ward, Columbia.

The Daily Telegram was started by Frank S. Taft in 1869. It lived about two months.

The Democrat was started in the summer of 1872 by W. Hayes Grier. It advocated the election of Horace Greeley for President, and was discontinued in November, 1872.

The Weekly Courant was started by Andrew M. Rambo & Son in 1870, and is now published by the former. It is an ably-conducted paper, and is radical Republican in politics.

Foundries and Machine-Shops.—The expansion of the iron interest in this place and vicinity since the first machine-shop was erected, forty-seven years ago, is truly wonderful. In the year 1836, Jeffrey Smedley and Thomas Hood, of Chester County, started a small machine-shop at the canal basin. The first steam-engine built in the county was the one they built to drive their machinery. The firm was dissolved in September, 1837, and the business was then carried on by Mr. Smedley. He manufactured stationary engines and machine work generally, and in this was greatly aided by the establishment of a foundry near his shop. He carried on business at that place until 1850, when he purchased the old Shultz Brewery, a large four-story stone building, situated on Second Street below Union, and converted it into a machine-shop. A short time after this purchase he took his son-in-law, Henry Brandt, into partnership. In September, 1854, Mr. Smedley died of cholera, then raging in Columbia. Mr. Brandt continued the business until October, 1857, when a stock company, entitled the Columbia Manufacturing Company, took possession of the property, and added a foundry thereto. The members of this company were Henry Brandt, Thomas R. and Zimmerman Supplee, brothers, who came from Bridgeport, Montgomery Co., Pa., where they had been carrying on the business for several years. They removed all of their machinery from there to the works in Columbia, which greatly increased the facilities of this establishment. The company arrangement was not successful, having carried on the works at a period of great depression in business. The Supplee Brothers leased the works and built up a large trade. Finding their buildings and ground limited in extent, they sold this property and purchased a large tract near the Columbia and Reading Railroad, at Fourth Street, where they erected larger and more extensive works in 1870. A few years ago a stock company was formed, called the Supplee Iron Company, under which name it is now conducted.

In the year 1837 Frederick Baugher and George Wolf, residents of York, Pa., formed a copartnership, and erected a foundry at the canal basin. When railroads were first built, in order to get around the curves without slipping it was necessary to have one loose wheel upon every axle. James Wright, Jr., of Columbia, conceived the idea of making a wheel with a beveled tread. He erected a circular railroad upon John L. Wright's lot, upon which he experimented. When Baugher and Wolf started their foundry they were the first in the country to manufacture car-wheels under Mr. Wright's patent. This firm also invented a wheel with solid hubs and concave and convex plates in 1837. Previous to that time all car-wheels were made with split hubs with spokes. Mr. Baugher, being an Anti-Mason, obtained a good deal of State work under Governor Ritner's administration, and when David R. Porter was elected Governor, in 1838, George Wolf, who was a Democrat, obtained a share of the State work. Mr. Baugher retired from the firm in 1839.

Samuel Truscott, who was their principal pattern-maker, and to whom this firm was indebted for some of their inventions and the excellent work they turned out, came from Baltimore, Md., to work for them in 1837, and was taken into partnership by Mr. Wolf on the 1st day of May, 1846. Mr. Wolf died in 1859, when the firm was dissolved and Mr. Truscott retired, and in a few years embarked in the coal-oil refining business where the Columbia Stove-Works now stand. After the removal of Mr. Smedley's machine-shop to Second Street, Wolf and Truscott erected a large machine-shop adjoining their foundry. These works were carried on by the heirs of George Wolf until Feb. 1, 1871, when they were sold to the Messrs. Perrottet and Hoyt. In the year 1872 they sold their property to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to make room for their new round-house. The firm purchased property in the rear of the round-house fronting on Bridge Street, where they erected larger and more extensive works.

James Perrottet was a bound apprentice to the late firm of Merrick & Son, of Philadelphia. He afterwards went to the State of Louisiana and thence to the West Indies, where he erected and took charge of machinery in sugar-mills built by him. Their specialty has been the manufacture of sugar machinery for Cuba and other sugar-making countries.

William J. Hoyt also learned his trade in Philadelphia, and worked for Merrick & Son. He was promoted by that firm to various positions, and remained with them until they sold their works in 1870.

There is a machine-shop connected with the Keeley Stove-Works which manufactures small stationary engines, and is conducted by Zimmerman Supplee, which is a separate establishment from the stove-works. Their business is increasing, and the works in the near future are to be enlarged.

Saw-Mills.—Jacob Strickler erected a saw-mill on the bank of the river, a short distance above Fairview Grist-Mill, about the year 1818. A wing wall was built some distance up the river from the mill, which caught the current. There was only two or three feet fall of water. When the dam was constructed across the river, in 1838, for the Susquehanna and Tide-Water Canal, this mill was taken away, and another and much larger one built a short distance farther down the river. A sluice was left in the breast of the dam, which gave a greatly-increased power. This mill has been rebuilt and enlarged by its present owner, Frederick S. Bletz.

In 1830, John McKissick, Jr., John Forry, Jr., and Samuel B. Hise erected a saw-mill along the river shore, a short distance above the present outlet-locks at the canal, in the northwestern section of the borough. The falls were called Little Conewago. A wing wall was built which gave about three feet fall of water. It was partially destroyed repeatedly by floods in the river. It was torn down in 1847, and a new mill built by Dr. J. J. and J. S. Grier & Co., which was wholly run by steam-power. After the public works were sold by the State, the mill was torn down, they having to depend entirely upon the patronage awarded them by their party friends.

In 1844, Jonathan Pusey built a saw-mill at the mouth of Shawanese Run, which was run by steam-power. It was afterwards owned by his son Isaac, after whose death, fifteen years ago, it was sold to Abraham Bruner, and about ten years ago it was torn down and a much larger mill was built by Abraham and Cyrus Bruner along the river shore, close by the old mill-site.

Planing-Mills.—The first planing-mill was built on the south side of Union Street, between Second and Third Streets, by Jacob F. Markley & Co. This mill was built in 1837. The Daniels patent planer was used. The grooves and tongues of the flooring were made entirely with a series of circular saws. The Woodworth patent rotary planer entirely superseded this mode of making flooring. The mill building was converted into a lamp-black manufactory by J. H. Mifflin. The place is now occupied by dwelling-houses.

In 1850, Joseph Pownall, Joseph Dickinson, Hiram Draucher, and John B. Bachman leased ground from John L. Wright at the rear end of his mansion, and erected a planing-mill, where not only flooring-boards were manufactured but all kinds of house-carpenter work. The mill was removed farther away from the railroad to make room for more tracks, and finally taken down and rebuilt along the river shore. It is and has been for years owned wholly by John B. Bachman, Esq. It is now one of the best-equipped planing-mills in the State. The business is conducted by John B. Bachman and John Forry.

In 1881, Edward Smith erected a planing-mill on the river shore above Union Street. Additions have been made since its erection, and new and modern machinery is constantly being added to it, and in a few years it will rank among the best in the State.

Frederick S. Bletz erected a planing-mill below the mouth of Shawanese Run, along Front Street, in the year 1848. All kinds of building material are also manufactured at this establishment. It has been in operation ever since, and is still owned by Mr. Bletz.

Michael Liphart erected a planing-mill at the corner of Lawrence and Second Streets in 1870, which was destroyed by fire some years ago, and has not been rebuilt.

The Keeley Stove-Works, located on the corner of Second and Maple Streets, were erected in the summer and fall of 1882. They are operated by a stock company, whose charter was dated May 5, 1882, with a capital stock of $100,000, and subsequently increased to $150,000. The works have a capacity of twenty thousand stoves per annum, and employ in their manufacture nearly two hundred men. The following-named persons are the present officers of the company: President, George W. Haldeman; Treasurer, S. S. Detwiler; Secretary, J. W. Ziller; Manager, W. H. Pfahler.

Tanneries.—Samuel A. Atlee, son of Col. Samuel John Atlee, erected a tannery on Shawanese Run near the Lancaster turnpike in 1798, which he sold to William Todd a few years later. He sold to — Houston and Joseph Mifflin. On the 13th day of March, 1835, it was entirely destroyed by fire. It was rebuilt by them, and in a few years they sold out to Andrew John, who sold the property to the Chestnut Hill Iron Ore Company.

John Hollinger erected a tannery on the same run on the north side of the Lancaster turnpike about the year 1868. The establishment is a very large one. Mr. Hollinger also erected an additional currying-shop farther down the stream, at Fourth Street.

The Columbia Water Company was organized under an act of Assembly approved the 29th of May, 1823. William Wright was made president. The company met with but indifferent success, and failed to answer the expectations of the people. In 1858, after being in operation for thirty-four years without making a dividend or furnishing a proper supply of water for domestic use, the company was compelled to make an assignment for the payment of debts, and some time during that year the charter, with franchises and all the property, was sold at public auction to Samuel Shoch for fifteen thousand three hundred and fifty dollars, when a new organization was made.

The new company by an expenditure of more than $100,000 has erected a dam, two large reservoirs, with important improvements, and laid through the streets of Columbia large iron pipes in place of the smaller ones laid by the old company, by which the several steam-engines for the extinguishment of fires and other machinery requiring water can be abundantly supplied as well as the demands for domestic use. A full quantity of excellent water is drawn from natural springs north of the town and also from the Susquehanna River.

The capital has been enlarged to the sum of $100,000, and the affairs of the company are managed by Samuel Shoch, president; Joseph H. Black, Col. Wm. W. McClure, Samuel Truscott, K. A. Fondersmith, James A. Meyers, and W. Latimer Small, directors; Simon C. May, secretary and treasurer; W. B. Foeseq, superintendent.

Columbia Gas Company.—By act of Assembly of 10th April, 1851, the Columbia Gas Company was chartered, and, after erecting suitable buildings, went into operation for the purpose of making and supplying gas. Samuel W. Mifflin was elected president, and Amos Slaymaker Green treasurer and secretary. The capital was at first $37,500, but afterwards increased to $60,000, at which it remains. I. G. Hess was at one time president. In 1865, Samuel Shoch was elected president, and still continues in that office. In 1874 the Lowe process of making gas out of oil was introduced, by the use of new apparatus and machinery, and thus far has proved an entire success. The gas produced is of the best quality. The company is at present under the management of Samuel Shoch, president; H. M. North, Samuel Truscott, H. F. Bruner, William W. McClure, Charles H. Henkle, C. E. Graybill; Charles H. Henkle, secretary and treasurer; Robert Beecher, superintendent.

Riots.—From the day the manumitted slaves of Isard Bacon and others, of Virginia, located in Columbia (in 1818-19) their numbers were largely increased from that source, and fugitives from human bondage in their flight to a land of freedom—who were not a few—brought with them, and thus increased the number of colored people to more than a thousand. They did all the labor for the lumber merchants along the river during the most profitable and busy seasons of the year. This excited the envy and hatred of not a few white people.

Stephen Smith, who was born a slave in Paxton, and was purchased for a limited time (until he arrived at the age of twenty-eight years) by Gen. Thomas Boude in 1802, was a bright and intelligent boy, and he soon developed a business talent not easily checked in an ambitious youth. Before he was nineteen years of age Gen. Boude gave him the entire management of his lumber-yard, and in the same year he was clandestinely married to a beautiful mulatto girl, who resided in the family of Jonathan Mifflin. He proposed to Gen. Boude to buy the remainder of his servitude, and that gentleman agreed to take one hundred dollars. He went to his friend John Barber and told him of his designs, when that large-hearted gentleman handed him one hundred dollars. He purchased his freedom, and then, with fifty dollars he had saved by doing extra work, he commenced to buy a little lumber and speculate in every venture in which he could turn a penny to profit. His profits increased rapidly until he owned one of the largest lumber-yards along the shore. He also invested money in real estate, and whenever a property was offered for sale he was one of the foremost and liveliest bidders. In the height of his prosperity, in 1834, he was served with the following notice:

"You have again assembled yourself among the white people to bid up property, as you have been in the habit of doing for a number of years back. You must know that your presence is not agreeable, and the less you appear in the assembly of the whites the better it will be for your black hide, as there are a great many in this place that would think your absence from it a benefit, as you are considered an injury to the real value of property in Columbia. You had better take the hint and leave.

MANY."

To this he gave but little attention. James Wright, William Wright, and John L. Wright promptly offered a reward for the detection of the author of this notice. In the spring of 1834 there had been a number of riots in several cities in the Northern States against the colored people. Excitement ran high everywhere.

On the 11th day of August, 1834, some person or persons broke into Smith's office, which stood on Front Street, a short distance below the round-house, and destroyed his books and papers. This was a great loss to him, but one that he could bear. He stood up manfully for his rights, and did not quail before the men whom he was well assured were encouraging a clamor against him and invoking mob law. This lawless feeling against a worthy colored man, who was not to be "browbeaten" or driven away by threats of personal violence, was turned against his less courageous colored friends who resided in the northeastern section of the town. On the 16th, 17th, and 18th of August, 1834, a mob drove the colored people from their homes and destroyed much of their property. They fled to the hills surrounding the town and to Bethel's Woods for safety, and some of them remained there several days without shelter or food. David Miller, high sheriff of the county, swore in a large number of "deputies," who went from Lancaster to Columbia and arrested a number of persons supposed to be the leaders in the riots. They were tried, but none of them were convicted and sent to prison as they deserved to be.

Mr. Smith removed to Philadelphia in 1842, where he engaged in business. He also retained his lumber-yard in Columbia, and gave William Whipple, a colored man, who resided in Columbia, an interest.

First Steamboat on the Susquehanna.—On Saturday evening of June 11, 1825, the first steamboat that attempted to navigate the Susquehanna River from its mouth to its source arrived unexpectedly at this place. The following day was spent in taking pleasure-parties to "Big Island," "Goose Island," etc. The citizens turned out in a body to witness the novel sight. The churches were all closed, and the Sabbath-schools presented an array of empty benches. It required several days to bring the boat from the mouth of the river to this point. Between these points the distance is forty-five miles, and the river at Columbia is two hundred and sixty feet higher than the head of tide-water, which is five miles above the mouth of the river. The channel is tortuous and rocky, and at that time it was exceedingly dangerous for any craft to attempt to navigate the stream against the current. Men ran out to the rocks on shore in advance of the boat in canoes, with anchors, to which ropes were attached, and on the bow of the boat the other end of the rope was fastened to a capstan, and the boat was "warped" over the most dangerous places. The boat left Columbia on Tuesday, the 14th of June, 1825, and it required three days to get it through Little Conewago Falls, above the outlet lock, and at Chikis Rock. The citizens of Marietta welcomed its arrival with booming of cannon and fire-works. The boat was taken up the river as far as Wilkesbarre, where the boiler exploded and destroyed it.

Asiatic Cholera.—Columbia was suddenly visited by this dreadful disease in September, 1854, and it raged with great fury for ten days, and threatened at the height of the epidemic to destroy the entire population. It was confined entirely to the town, and was altogether one of the most remarkable epidemics in this country of which history gives any account. The month of August and first week in September of that year was unusually dry and hot. On Thursday, September 7th, a warm wind came across the river from the south, wafting noisome odors, which was supposed to come from the decaying vegetable matter in the river. This was a subject of remark, and many citizens thought it foreboded no good for the health of the people. They anticipated malaria only, and never dreamed of the impending danger, which visited the town almost as suddenly and unexpectedly as a bolt of lightning.

When the railroad cars came from Philadelphia in the evening of Sept. 7, 1854, they left a family of emigrants. Two of them were sick, father and son, and they were taken to an unoccupied dwelling on Front Street. Physicians were called to attend them, and they pronounced the disease Asiatic cholera. Two or three citizens waited upon them during the night. The father died in the morning, and the son some time during the day.

No uneasiness was felt on the part of the citizens, and the death of these two emigrants caused but little remark. On Friday, the 8th of September, Francis Bradley, a notary public and worthy citizen, was taken sick suddenly with the disease, and in an hour or two he was a corpse. When Saturday morning, the 9th, dawned it found its citizens in a panic. During Friday night many persons were seized with the disease, and when daylight came long processions of men, with despair or anxiety depicted upon every countenance, were hurrying to the drug-stores or to the physicians. The disease spared neither age or sex, rich or poor, high or low in society, but swept all before it.

The large list of deaths on Saturday and Sunday attest the severity of the disease. On Sunday the hegira of the citizens commenced, and half of the population fled from the place. Fortunately for them and the country the disease did not spread any farther, although there were many cases in Pittsburgh, brought there by some emigrants who came to this country with those that were left with the disease in Columbia. A number of physicians came from other places to assist those here. Several citizens distinguished themselves by their benevolence and untiring efforts in behalf of the sick. There was one who deserves special mention. I refer to Daniel R. Craven, who volunteered as nurse, and was a most faithful one.<sup>1</sup>

A number of persons apparently in good health were taken sick suddenly on the street, and in an hour afterwards they were dead. A large number of those whose names we give were taken sick, died, and were buried on the same day. Following is a list of the victims of this epidemic:

Railroad Strike.—In the early part of the summer of 1877 there was a great deal of agitation among railroad employes all over the country. Secret organizations were formed in every town and city bordering along the trunk lines of the great railways, which embraced very nearly all employes of the several railroads, day laborers only excepted. The several classes of employes had distinct and separate organizations, and worked under various titles, but all had one common object, to wit, the securing of more remunerative wages, and helping each other in case of sickness, etc. The aggregate number belonging to these several societies embraced many thousands. In July, 1877, the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company declined to accede to a demand made by some of their employes, and the latter suddenly quit work. The news was flashed over every telegraph wire in the country, and gradually others quit work for this company. The members of the different secret societies sympathized with their friends along the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and were carried away by the excitement of the hour, and were drawn into the "strike." There was no outward indication that the storm started in Virginia was about to burst upon the Pennsylvania and Reading Railroad Companies.

On Saturday, July 21, 1877, the employes commenced to "strike" at Harrisburg, and on Sunday, July 22, Columbia received the shock, and the engineers and others refused to permit the moving of any freight trains.

A mass-meeting, composed of railroad employes, numbering several hundred, met on the same evening at the public ground below the bridge. Committees were appointed whose duty it was to obstruct entirely the movement of the rolling-stock of the railroad. A mob of disorderly and disreputable persons took possession of the town. Some of them marched around among the farmers and enforced contributions from them for the support of alleged "strikers."

Saloons and taverns were ordered to be closed by the "strikers," and in one or two instances the mob forced some of the grocerymen to give them flour, groceries, and provisions.

The company was at the mercy of the strikers, and they were very much afraid that their property in the borough, which amounted to a million dollars or more, would be destroyed by fire. The danger-point was not passed until the leader and chief conspirator, Truxell, was arrested and taken to jail, which occurred on Thursday, July 26th.

Fire Companies.—Just when, where, or by whom the pioneer fire apparatus of the old Columbia Company was purchased we cannot ascertain, as the earliest records are lost or destroyed. However, we find that the company was organized and owned a fire-engine as early as February 27, 1806, and an account of one hundred and fifty dollars having been paid towards its purchase, and the same year eleven dollars was charged by the treasurer as having been paid for repairs to the carriage. This is supposed to mean the hose-carriage, though not definitely stated. In 1814, at a reorganization of the company, the following persons were enrolled as members: Samuel Miller, William F. Houston, William B. Hunt, John Wilson, John Haldeman, Michael Elder, William F. Beaty, Joseph Jeffries, John McKissick, Joseph Mifflin, Jacob Williams, Thomas Wright, Thomas M. Mifflin, John Forrey, John Brumfield, Robert W. Houston, C. Breneman, Dominick Haughey, E. Green, Amos H. Slaymaker, Benjamin Brubaker, John L. Wright, John Gontner, Jr., James Willson, Jr., John Mathiot, A. B. Breneman, John Greenleaf, Peter Yarnall, John Evans, James Clyde, James Sweeney, Thomas Lloyd, Joshua King, William Wright, James E. Mifflin, Charles N. Wright, Hugh McCorkill, William Liston, John W. Patton, Israel Cooke, James Collins, Nathan Roberts, Jr., Benjamin Worrell, Henry Martin, Robert Barber, Jacob Mathiot, Casper Peters, John Hippey, Th. A. Willson, Robert Magill, Thomas Trump, John Dicks, William Kirkwood, George W. Gibbons, George Mason, James Todd, George Peters, Christian Haldeman. The engine- and hose-house of this company is located on Locust Street, between Second and Third, and is conveniently and elegantly fitted up for the comfort of the members of the company and their visitors. The officers for 1883 were: President, John Tyson; Vice-President, William Findley; Secretary, H. M. Sample; Treasurer, J. W. Yocum; Chief Engineer, D. A. Wayne; Chief Director, Eugene Conley.

The Good Intent Fire Company was organized in April, 1835, and a fire-engine was purchased in the summer of the same year. This company was composed of the wealthiest and best citizens in the place.

The Vigilant Steam Fire-Engine and Hose Company, No. 2, whose engine-house is located at No. 24 North Second Street, was originally organized as the "Good Intent Fire Company," and subsequently (about 1844) the name was changed to "Vigilant Fire Company," and at the outbreak of the Rebellion nearly all the members "shouldered arms and marched to the front." In the latter part of 1865 the company was reorganized and consolidated with the old "Susquehanna Fire Company," under the name of "Vigilant Steam Fire-Engine and Hose Company, No. 2." The property at No. 24 North Second Street is owned by the company. They have in charge a fourth-class Clapp & Jones steamer, built in 1882, and have upon their rolls the names of about two hundred men. The officers of the company for 1883 were as follows: President, George R. Bennett; Vice-President, James Kiskaddon; Treasurer, N. Gilman; Secretary, George W. Schroeder.

The Shawnee Steam Fire-Engine and Hose Company, whose engine-house is located on North Fifth Street, in the Fourth Ward of the borough, was organized June 4, 1874, with the following officers and members, the first election taking place June 12th of the same year. The following were the first officers elected: President, James E. Wolf; Vice-President, Frank Conroy; Secretary, George L. Lyle; Treasurer, Daniel F. Gohn; Trustees, William G. Lutz, John Elliott, Philip Schlack; Foreman, George W. Wike; Assistant Foreman, C. Swartz, O. Shillot, D. Coleman; Hose Guards, John Wolf, James Hickey, David Barr, Andrew Lane, Samuel Blackson, George Shoemaker, Ed. Gause, Frederick Hardnele. The steamer in charge of this company is a third-class Clapp & Jones machine, built and purchased in 1876. The company had, July 30, 1885, two hundred and seventy-four members on their rolls. The officers for 1883 were as follows: President, Andrew Hardnele; Vice-President, George Hardnele; Secretary, George F. Lutz; Treasurer, Daniel F. Gohn; Chief Engineer, Joseph Bowers; Assistant Engineer, Harry Dinkle; Trustees, A. H. Gilbert, Peter Book, Joseph Sweitzer; Janitor, John Honadle; Chief Hose Director, Ed. Tracy; First Assistant, George Dinkle.

The borough purchased a small fire-engine called the "Bravo" about the year 1825. The box was supplied with water carried in buckets from the river or some adjoining pump. There was a crank-handle on each side, where two men could stand and turn the handle, which forced the water over an ordinary house.

It was of great service in case of fires, and could be taken into any of the back yards and other places where a larger engine could not go. But little care was taken with it, and the wood-work shrank and let out the water at first about as fast as it was put in.

The cylinder lay horizontal, and the shaft between the handles ran through the centre. Two men could work this little engine very easily.

It went to pieces more than twenty years ago. In 1832 it was given in charge of Columbia Fire Company.

Eastern Star Lodge, No. 169, F. and A. M., was constituted about 1812. The records of the lodge are lost, but it is known that it continued work till about 1830, when its communications ceased. The last surviving Mason who was a member at that time, Thomas B. Dunbar, died in June, 1883.

A number of the prominent members of this lodge formed an association, and erected a large four-story building at the northeast corner of Second and Locust Streets, measuring forty feet on Locust, and extending along Second Street eighty feet, in the year 1850. The lodge-room is in the fourth story. The third story is used by the order of Red Men and the Masonic fraternity. The second story is used for a public hall, and the first story for law-offices and drug-store. The association is a stock company.

Gen. Welsh Post, No. 118, G. A. R., at Columbia, was organized and mustered March 21, 1868. It is named in honor of Brig.-Gen. Thomas Welsh, a distinguished soldier, who served through the Mexican war and in the war of the Rebellion. His military history is given elsewhere. He was severely wounded at Buena Vista, and his leg was saved from amputation by Dr. Blanton, after whom his only son, Blanton, was subsequently named. The latter is a graduate of West Point Military Academy, and a lieutenant of the Fifteenth United States Infantry. Gen. Welsh organized the Forty-fifth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, and was subsequently promoted to brigadier-general. His lieutenant-colonel was James A. Beaver, afterwards also a distinguished brigadier-general.

Gen. Welsh Post is one of the strongest, numerically and financially, and one of the best organized and successfully conducted posts in the interior of the State. Its muster-roll contains nearly three hundred names, comprising many of the leading citizens of Columbia, including merchants, members of the different professions, skilled mechanics, numerous employés and officers of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, and farmers from the suburban districts. It is an organization which very fairly represents the character, patriotism, and intelligence of our citizen soldiery, commanding the respect and enjoying the confidence and sympathy of the community.

The post controls a beautiful plot of ground in Mount Bethel Cemetery, where soldiers, dying without friends, are buried. It annually observes Memorial Day with solemn and appropriate services. The post owns a valuable siopticon and dissolving views, used in the illustration of its ritual; has a large and well-organized drum corps, and is now negotiating for a more convenient and suitable post-room.

The Opera-House.—The erection of a new public hall was first discussed in Council, March 18, 1870, on a proposition from the Masonic Hall Association to purchase or lease for that purpose the borough lot at the corner of Third and Locust Streets. Three days after a special meeting of Council was held to consider the proposition, when it was agreed to obtain legislation to authorize the borough to borrow forty thousand dollars to build a hall, if approved by a vote of the people. The election for that purpose was held April 9, 1870, when four hundred and ninety-three votes were polled for, and fifty-five against, a new town hall. Plans for the hall were submitted May 28th, a building committee appointed; proposals invited. They were found to be so high that they were referred back to the committee and architect for revision, and were never considered again. In 1871, the hall project was revived.

In 1873, at an adjourned meeting held May 30th, it was resolved, "that the Borough Council proceed to erect an additional market-house and town hall combined." At the same meeting a building committee was appointed, consisting of Messrs. Bachman, Kauffman, Detwiler, Craig, and Steacy. On August 18th, of the plans submitted, that of E. F. Durang was adopted. September 10th ground was broken by Chief Burgess Shenberger. September 18th the work of tearing down the old town hall was commenced. The foundation walls for the new structure were completed during the autumn, and carefully protected against the exposures of winter.

Feb. 24, 1874, the contract for the building, exclusive of clock, bell, stage, and auditorium furniture, upholstering, heating apparatus, gas fixtures, etc., was awarded to Michael Liphart, being the lowest bidder, at fifty-four thousand three hundred dollars. The building committee of 1873 was continued, Mr. Haldeman having succeeded Mr. Detwiler, whose term had expired. In 1875, the terms of Messrs. Craig and Steacy having expired, Messrs. McClure and Wolfe were appointed to succeed them. E. W. Goerke, C. E., was employed as superintendent. Mr. Liphart died Jan. 30, 1875, and his contract was completed by his sureties, Messrs. A. Bruner and E. Hershey. The bell in the tower was used for the first time after it was hung in tolling his sad funeral notes.

The Opera-House cost $85,824.15. It was formally opened by the Mendelssohn Quintette Club of Boston, on Tuesday evening, Aug. 24, 1875, in the presence of over seven hundred people. Before the concert a short dedicatory address was delivered by H. M. North, Esq.

Prominent Families and Individuals.—Robert Barber was born in England. He was bound to his uncle, Robert Barber, to learn the "art and mystery of cordwaining." They came to Chester in the latter part of the seventeenth century. In the summer or fall of 1708, Robert Barber died, leaving no issue. His estate was large for that time. He devised to his nephew, the subject of this sketch, who was then living with him and had not attained his majority, its largest portion. When he became of age he decided to follow a seafaring life. He was taken by the French and thrown into prison in France, and when he was released he returned to Chester. He and his uncle were Quakers, and it is probable that the experience he had while in a French prison, and a prospect of being recaptured by French privateers if he continued to follow a maritime life, diverted his mind from what seemed to be a vocation of much peril to a more peaceful one, and he concluded to settle in Chester. He had an active mind, which was well developed, a body healthy and vigorous, capable of enduring hardships.

He married Hannah Tidmarsh, of Philadelphia, a member of the Society of Friends, and a person endowed with great energy and a mind of more than ordinary character. In the year 1719 he was a candidate for sheriff of Chester County, but was beaten by Nicholas Fairlamb. In the fall of 1721 he ran for coroner in the same county, and was elected. In the year 1724 he was elected a member of the Board of County Assessors.

When this county was organized he was appointed sheriff, and at the general election in October, 1729, he was chosen to the same office by the people.

He was ambitious to secure the location of the county-seat upon his farm, and at his own expense he erected a temporary log jail in front of his dwelling, which stood where is now the garden of Jacob S. Stoner, the present owner of the premises. This jail is known in history as the place where Sir James Annesly was confined. Until the county-seat was permanently located where it now is, Mr. Barber did not give up all hope of getting it upon his land. It caused him some anxiety, and when he became assured that he could not succeed he was greatly disappointed.

In the fall of 1730 he declined to be a candidate for sheriff, and he returned to his farm and private life. He built a saw-mill in the meadow south of his dwelling, to which he gave attention. There were but a few acres under cultivation, which was barely sufficient to provide grain enough to support his family and feed his stock. He had a very large family, and it required his best energies to provide for them. He was elected county commissioner for the years 1740-41. He took an active part in behalf of the Penns during "Cresap's war."

Robert Barber died in the year 1749, aged about fifty-seven years. He left a widow, Hannah, and ten children, namely: John, was "read out" of the Society of Friends in 1755 for "marrying out." He was killed by the Indians at the Ohio while trading. Robert, who married, Sept. 26, 1746, Sarah, daughter of Samuel Taylor; Thomas, who died in his minority; Nathaniel, who settled where his father built his mansion, and retained a portion of the land. He died in the spring of 1804, leaving five children. Elizabeth, who died in her minority; James, married; Samuel; Eleanor, who married John Wright, Jr.; Mary, and Sarah.

The second generation of Barbers gradually left the Society of Friends, and we find that there were several members of the third generation who entered the Revolutionary army and served their country faithfully.

Samuel Blunston was the son of John Blunston and Sarah, who came from Hallam, in the county of Derby, England, in 1682. He was a minister of the Society of Friends, a warm personal friend of William Penn, and a member of his Council. He was also a member of Assembly. He died in 1723, and his wife, Sarah, died Oct. 4, 1692. Their children were John (1685-1716), Samuel, Joseph (1691-92), and Hannah, who married Thomas Pearson, of Kingsessing.

Samuel Blunston was born Sept. 2, 1689, at Darby, Chester Co., Pa. He married, June 4, 1718, Sarah Bilton, the widow of — Bilton, who kept a ferry over the Schuylkill. He studied land-surveying. He had considerable means of his own when he married, which was largely increased by his wife's fortune. She had no children by her first husband, nor did she bring any to her second one. They came to the Susquehanna in the fall of 1726. She lived but a few years after coming here. He was appointed by Peter Evans, the register-general of wills, deputy register of the county, on the 2d day of August, 1729. When the county was organized he was appointed one of the justices, although he was in commission as a justice from Chester County previous to that time. He was not recognized as a strict member of the Society of Friends after he came to the Susquehanna, and his name does not appear upon the minutes of the Quarterly or Monthly Meeting records. He was a generous liver, and entertained a great deal of company. Thomas Penn was at his house in 1736, and Logan and other prominent officials were there frequently. He was elected a member of the General Assembly in 1732, 1741, 1742, and 1744. He and his life-long friend, John Wright, stood up manfully when in the Legislature and opposed Governor Thomas in his arbitrary measures.

When the court-house and jail were built, he was frequently consulted about their erection, and he seems to have had a general supervision of the work. In 1732, when troubles commenced between the Marylanders and Pennsylvanians, in Conagohela Valley, four miles below Wrightsville, to the day the former struck their flag and left the soil of Pennsylvania forever, he was untiring in his efforts to bring the freebooters to justice. He employed Benjamin Chambers (the founder of Chambersburg) to go to the enemy's camp in Maryland and discover their designs. Although captured, he escaped and reported to Mr. Blunston the true state of affairs. He was sent to Donegal, where the Scotch-Irish had a house-raising. They stopped their work and gathered up what firearms they had, and hastened to the west side of Wright's Ferry, and just arrived in time to give the Marylanders a warm reception. For the time being a conflict was prevented.

"ROSE LAWN."
RESIDENCE OF JOHN FENDRICH, COLUMBIA, LANCASTER CO., PA.

After all of the German settlers in the valley had either joined the enemy or fled to the east side of the river, a large force was collected and placed in the Ferry-House on the west side of the river for defense. Mr. Blunston at his own expense kept a large number of men there. Governor Ogle, of Maryland, offered a reward of one hundred pounds for his head, and they actually arranged a plan to capture him when returning from the funeral of the wife of the Rev. James Anderson, at Donegal, in 1736. He became aware of their plans, and avoided the trap they had laid for him. About this time he became very much discouraged in consequence of the dilatory actions of the Governor and his Council. He saw the danger to the interests of the proprietors by delay, and knew the necessity for prompt action. He sent frequent messengers to the Governor, with letters couched in caustic and bitter terms, that must have had a salutary effect upon the mind of the Governor and his friends. On the 3d day of April, 1736, he was appointed deputy surveyor for the townships of "Derry, Hempfield, Dunnegal, and Lebanon." At the same time he, in behalf of the inhabitants of these townships, presented a scheme for appeasing the "tumults and animosities among them," which was adopted, and it put an end to the troubles about the titles to their land. He had a large field to cover, and the duties which called him there were very exacting. But for the assistance of that remarkable person, Susannah Wright, who copied and assisted him in his writing, he could not have accomplished successfully the work he did. His health became greatly impaired, and in the summer of 1746 he was compelled to give up all out-door work. He died in September, 1746. He left no issue, and he gave his valued friend, Susannah Wright, a life estate in all his large property, which consisted of nearly nine hundred acres of land. He made several bequests, among which was one to the poor of the county. He owned a number of slaves, and gave them their freedom after a term of a few years.

John Wright was born in Lancashire, England, about the year 1667. He came to Chester in the year 1714. He was a public speaker among the Quakers, and he came recommended from that society in England. He was not long in Chester before he was elected to the General Assembly, and was also appointed a justice of the peace. Before he came to the Susquehanna he had been at Conestoga, where he preached to the Indians. He may have gone up as far as Shawanese Run, where that tribe had a village, and thus became acquainted with the locality where he subsequently settled. Robert Barber went in advance, and the first survey was made in his name, and he conveyed to John Wright in August, 1726, one hundred and fifty acres.

He built his dwelling upon a level spot of ground fronting the river. This dwelling was torn down in 1874 to give place to a more stately brick mansion of modern times. The logs used in its construction were hickory, white and Spanish oak, and a number of black walnut. The dwelling, as first constructed, seems to have contained but one room upon the first story and one upon the second.

In the year 1729, John Wright was elected to a seat in the General Assembly, and re-elected in the years 1730 and 1731 without opposition. He was again a candidate in 1732. Accidentally or otherwise John Wright's name was omitted from some of the ballots and another name inserted in its stead, which caused his defeat by half a dozen votes. He carried the contest to the General Assembly, but was again beaten. George Stewart, who resided in Donegal, was elected to the General Assembly in the same year, but he died before taking his seat, and John Wright was elected without opposition to fill the vacancy. He was re-elected for seventeen successive terms thereafter, and on Oct. 15, 1745, he was elected Speaker of the General Assembly.

George Thomas was appointed Governor in 1738. Almost from the commencement of his administration he undertook to carry measures through the General Assembly of an arbitrary character which were in direct opposition to the policy of that body. Among the number of those who led the opposition was John Wright, whose integrity stood the test of all the cajolery or threats the Governor and his friends could bring to bear. The replies of the Assembly through their Speaker, who presented addresses to the Governor in answer to his messages to that body, displayed great ability. Governor Thomas became so enraged at Wright and others for their opposition that he determined to punish them for their temerity. He announced that he would issue new commissions of the peace in place of those held by Wright and other recusant members of the Assembly. This was intended as a threat to coerce them into his measures.

In the year 1733-34 he was appointed a loan commissioner, one of the most important positions of trust in the province. During the period of Cresap's war, which lasted three years, the farm which he had bought upon the western side of the river was frequently run over by bands of hostile Marylanders. His tenants and laboring men were often driven away. In the month of July, 1735, when he was having a field of wheat reaped, Thomas Cresap, with about twenty persons, armed with guns, swords, pistols, and blunderbusses, marched into the field with drum beating. This military display was not very imposing, but it was calculated to terrify and drive away from his land a farmer who was opposed to the use of personal force to resist it. Wright walked to the valiant warrior, Cresap, and demanded to know what he meant by appearing in so hostile a manner to the terror of His Majesty's peaceable subjects employed about the lawful and necessary business of husbandry. Cresap replied that he came to fight several persons who came over the river, if they would accept his challenge. He drew his sword and cocked his pistol, and presented them at the person of Mr. Wright, who very coolly commanded Cresap and his company to keep His Majesty's peace, and that he would proceed on his lawful business. Cresap brought a number of wagons with him to carry off Wright's grain. He changed his mind when he discovered that he could not intimidate him, and he and his men retreated, leaving the wagons in the field in charge of the owners, who could not resist the persuasive powers of Mr. Wright. They assisted to put the grain upon their own wagons, and hauled it to the ferry, where it was placed in boats and taken to the eastern side of the river.

Governor Ogle, of Maryland, afterwards offered one hundred pounds reward for Mr. Wright's head. He held many conferences with different Indian tribes, and sometimes made long journeys on horseback to meet them. He was afflicted with rheumatism, which often confined him to his bed. He married Susannah Crewason. They had five children,—Susannah, Patience, John, Elizabeth, and James.

Susannah was born in England. When her parents removed to America she was at school, where she remained and finished her education, and followed her parents a few years after they left England. Although she was a member of the Society of Friends, prominent persons of birth, education, and culture sought her society. She was brilliant in conversation and endowed with an extraordinary mind. She could not have been a strict follower of George Fox in all things, or she would have devoted herself to the ministry. After the death of her mother, which took place shortly after her arrival at Chester, she became the ruling spirit in her father's family.

Many of the leading men of the province sought her company, whom she entertained and edified with her conversation. Of this number there was but one young Quaker who made an impression upon her heart, and that person was Samuel Blunston, who married another. After the decease of the latter their old friendship and love for each other was renewed and they became inseparable friends. They did not marry, probably for the reason that she had entire charge of her father's affairs and her younger brother, to whom she was much attached. There were but a few families settled here, but all seemed to belong to one family, and all of them looked up to her as the ruling spirit in the neighborhood.

In business affairs she was consulted by every one. She could draw up any legal paper, and her judgment upon ordinary legal matters was sound, and it was safe to follow her advice. She gave her attention also to the study of medicine, and probably read the few medical books she could find, with the view of being better equipped to fight against sickness. She had some taste for painting, and in her leisure moments from other pursuits she painted a number of landscape scenes. She corresponded with Logan, Benjamin Franklin, and other leading men in the province and in England upon matters best calculated to elevate the race.

She was one of the first persons in America to demonstrate the fact that the climate was adapted to the culture of silk. She procured silk-worm eggs, from which she raised a large number of the worms. She sent the raw silk to Europe and had it woven into manilla. One piece alone measured sixty yards, a portion of which she gave to the queen, who presented her with a silver tankard, which is still retained among the descendants of her brother James. Benjamin Franklin, who was then in France, became greatly interested in this experiment of silk culture in his adopted province of Pennsylvania, and he wrote to Miss Wright upon the subject, and called the attention of a number of leading men in England to the matter. There are a few specimens of this silk now in the rooms of the Historical Society.

Samuel Blunston gave her a life estate in his property, and after his death she and her father and brother, James, removed to the Blunston mansion.

Patience Wright was also born in England. She married Richard Loudon on the 5th of June, 1728, at the dwelling of Samuel Blunston. He purchased a farm in Strasburg township in 1727, adjoining the lands of Samuel Taylor. When the county was organized and the permanent county-seat located where it now is he was appointed keeper of the prison. Mr. Loudon purchased a farm in Manheim township and a small tract near Graff's landing.

Col. John Loudon, son of Richard and Patience (Wright), became a distinguished officer in the Revolutionary war, and was in a number of battles. At the close of the war he located in Buffalo Valley, on the West Branch of the Susquehanna River.

John Wright married Eleanor Barber, daughter of Robert Barber, the first sheriff of the county. He settled upon his father's land on the west side of the river, and built the ferry-house there. He was a member of the General Assembly from York County for a number of years, and held other positions of trust in that county.

Elizabeth Wright married Samuel Taylor on the 8th day of May, 1728, at the house of Samuel Blunston, Esq. Samuel Taylor was the son of Christopher Taylor. He came from "Tinicum" to this county in the year 1728, and purchased land in Strasburg township near the Bart township line, where he erected a grist- and saw-mill upon a branch of Beaver Creek.

James Wright was born in Chester in the year 1714 or 1715, and was the only one of John Wright's children born in America. About the year 1738, he, in connection with Samuel Blunston, erected a corn- and grist-mill near the mouth of Shawanese Run. He married out of the Society of Friends. About the same time he erected the stone mansion now along Second Street, between Locust and Cherry Streets, known thereafter as "Wright's Ferry Mansion," and was on land attached to the ferry-house. He at once took a front rank among the leading men of the county. He was elected a member of the General Assembly in 1745, and continued to serve in that body until the year 1771. He and his father and brother, John, were members of that body at one and the same time. It was an unusual circumstance for three members of the same family to serve so many years together in a legislative body. Through all the turmoil, excitement, and bitterness which grew out of the French and Indian war of 1755-60, and Pontiac's war of 1763, which was followed by the destruction of the Conestoga Indians, but few Quakers could face the storm which followed them into the General Assembly and drove a number of them out. James Wright rode safely through it all, and this fact alone speaks in favor of his prudence, judgment, and integrity. He served on many important committees, and was intrusted with matters which required sound judgment and tact to prevent Indian outbreaks.

During the campaign of Gen. Forbes against the French and Indians, in 1758, several battalions of troops raised in the eastern part of this province and elsewhere, numbering twelve hundred, marched as far as Lancaster, but refused to go any farther unless they received more rations. James Wright came forward and agreed to provide for the troops until they arrived at Harris' Ferry, about two days' march farther west. They then moved promptly. In this connection it is well to mention that these pioneer Quakers who settled at the Susquehanna were a law unto themselves, and for many years refused to have anything to do with the Yearly or Quarterly Meetings of Friends elsewhere. James Wright was married (2d), July 2, 1753, to Rhoda Patterson. Their children were Samuel, Elizabeth (who married Col. Thomas Boude), John, Thomas, Susannah, James, William, and Patience (who married Dr. Vincent King).

Maj. Thomas Boude was the son of Dr. Samuel Boude, of Lancaster, who married Mary, the daughter of Samuel Bethel, mentioned elsewhere. He and his family were Episcopalians. Before he attained his majority he showed a fondness for military matters, and when the conflict between Great Britain and the colonies came, he and his brothers were among the first to enter the Continental service and march to the front. He entered the army as a lieutenant under command of Gen. Anthony Wayne. He was in the brilliant action at the taking of Stony Point, on the Hudson, and was in command of one of the volunteer squads of twenty called the "forlorn hope," and would have been the first person to enter the sally port-holes but for the fact that a much larger and more powerful person at his side pulled him back and forced himself in front. After the capture of the fort, Lieut. Boude found in an officer's room a watch, which is now in possession of his descendants. For gallant conduct upon this occasion he was promoted to a captaincy, and afterwards to major. He commanded a body of Light Troops at Gen. Washington's headquarters, and was also a member of his staff. He was in a number of battles, and acquitted himself with honor. He was one of the original members of the Society of the Cincinnati, and was appointed general of militia by Governor Thomas Mifflin. He married Elizabeth Wright, daughter of James Wright. They had one child, Elizabeth, who never married. He was married the second time to Emily, daughter of Col. Samuel John Atlee, a distinguished officer of the Revolutionary war, by whom he had four children,—Mary, Sarah, Samuel, and Washington.

Col. Thomas Boude, at the close of the Revolution, removed to Hempfield township, and lived upon the farm belonging to his first wife, and now owned by B. Musser. When his brother-in-law, Samuel Wright, laid out the town of Columbia, he purchased a number of lots, among which were several fronting the river above Walnut Street. He erected the brick mansion now owned by Michael S. Shuman. He embarked in the lumber business, and was one of the first persons who bought lumber and piled it along the shore to resell. He was a Federalist, and took a prominent part in building up that party. He was elected a member of the State Legislature for the years 1794, 1795, and 1796. He also represented the county in Congress from 1801 to 1803. He was again a candidate for Congress on the Federal ticket, but was defeated by John Whitehill. The Federal party was losing ground rapidly, and when the parties were nearly equal in numbers the political campaigns were carried on with great bitterness. William Hamilton published the Federal newspaper, and William and Robert Dixon published the Jefferson paper which opposed the Federalists. After the defeat of Major Boude, in 1804, Hamilton charged the opposition with cheating at the election-poll held in Elizabethtown, where a number of Irish laborers, who were working on the new turnpike at that place, were induced to vote more than once, when they had no legal right to vote at all. In reply to this charge the Dixons charged Maj. Boude with voting twice in Lancaster borough, to which place the voters in Columbia and Hempfield had to go to vote.

Maj. Boude had the Dixons arrested for libel. They gave bail, and before the case was tried the proceedings were removed from the County Court by certiorari to the Circuit Court. This was probably the last of the case.

Maj. Boude became totally blind some years before his decease, which took place Oct. 24, 1822, in the seventieth year of his age.

Samuel, son of S. Bethel, son of Samuel and Susan (Taylor) Bethel, married Sarah Hand, a daughter of Gen. Edward Hand, of Lancaster. He was educated in the city of Philadelphia, with the expectation that he would enter the medical profession. But he preferred that of the law. He studied law in Philadelphia, and was admitted to practice at the bar in that place. In the year 1795 he was admitted to the bar in Lancaster on certificate. He did not remain there, but came to Columbia and settled upon his estate, which was very large, and required his whole attention. (This estate was inherited by his grandmother, Sarah Bethel, and Hannah Pearson, from their brother, Samuel Blunston. Mrs. Pearson sold her interest to the Bethels, who became the sole owners of nearly nine hundred acres.) He was elected to a seat in the State Legislature for the years 1808 and 1809. He was fond of literature, and had a large and select library. He was considered one of the best mathematicians in the State. He was one of the foremost and most liberal patrons of the schools and libraries in Columbia, of which mention is made elsewhere. He built an addition to the Blunston mansion, now owned by his nephew, Samuel Bethel Heise, at the northern terminus of Second Street. Here he resided and here he died in the year 1819.

William P. Beatty was born at Neshaminy, Bucks Co., March 31, 1766. His parents were Rev. Charles Beatty (of Log College memory) and Ann Reading, daughter of Governor Reading, of New Jersey. Both of his parents died before he was six years of age. He was apprenticed to the tailoring business. While thus engaged he devoted his leisure moments to the study of books, and when he attained his majority he wrote an elegant hand and displayed an aptitude for figures.

These qualifications prompted him to go to Philadelphia, and obtain a clerkship, with the expectation of making himself familiar with mercantile pursuits, which these attainments seemed to indicate that he was best qualified for.

In 1798 we find him engaged in the office of Mr. Nicholson, the Comptroller of the State.

In 1798 he removed to Columbia, and opened a store on Front, between Locust and Walnut Streets, in connection with Richard S. Leech. He married in 1799. In 1802 he was appointed postmaster under John Adams' administration, and retained this position until 1807. In 1808 he was appointed a justice of the peace by Governor Thomas McKean. In 1810 he was appointed secretary and treasurer of the "Susquehanna Lottery Improvement Company," and in the following year treasurer of the "Susquehanna and York Turnpike Road Company," and two or three years subsequent to this time he was appointed treasurer of the "Columbia Bridge Company." In the year 1813 this company was given power by an act of Assembly to do a banking business, and he was chosen their cashier, a position he retained until the year 1821. He held the position of chief burgess and also treasurer of the water company for several years. In the year 1825 he was reappointed postmaster by John Quincy Adams, President of the United States, a position he retained until the year 1837. He was a ruling elder of the Presbyterian Church for many years. There were many minor offices of trust which he held, not mentioned in the above list. In personal appearance he was tall, stately, and dignified in his carriage, and always wore a queue.

He removed to Harrisburg in the year 1843, and died at Philadelphia at his son's (Dr. George) home, July 28, 1848, in his eighty-third year. He left surviving him,—

Dr. George, who is now living in Philadelphia.

William P., who died at Harrisburg in 1866.

John R., who died at Harrisburg in 1866.

Ann Eliza, who married Thomas H. Pearce, who was an officer in the Mexican war of 1846. He resided for some years in Columbia, and held a clerkship in the collector's office at the canal basin. He died at Steubenville, Ohio, where his widow is living.

Ercurius, who learned the printing business in the Spy office while John L. Boswell published the paper. On the 21st day of April, 1861, he enlisted in Capt. Robert M. Henderson's company, which was connected with the Seventh Pennsylvania Reserves, and was made lieutenant. He was on Gen. McCall's staff at Tennytown and Camp Pierpont, Virginia; was wounded at Charles City Cross-Roads June 30, 1862, and was promoted to first lieutenant and captain Sept. 17, 1862, and to brevet major and brevet lieutenant-colonel.

Michael Whisler was born near the Trappe, in Montgomery County, Pa., in the year 1756. In the month of May, 1776, he enlisted for twenty months in Capt. Henry Christ's rifle company, in Col. Samuel Miles' rifle regiment. He was in the battles of Flatbush, on Long Island, where but one-fifth of Col. Miles' command escaped; at White Plains, at Trenton, Princeton, Brandywine, and Germantown, and discharged at Valley Forge on the 1st day of January, 1778. He was twice wounded in these battles.

He enlisted and marched to the western part of the State with the army raised to quell the Whiskey Insurrection. When the troops lay at Wright's Ferry waiting to be taken over the river, he was impressed with the beautiful scenery all around and the location of the town, and he concluded as soon as he returned from the army to bring his family to the place and locate.

One of the most pressing wants in the place was a person who understood the manufacture of bricks. He brought his family to Columbia in the same year and purchased a lot from Samuel Wright, upon which he erected a dwelling. By trade he was a shoemaker, but he also knew how to manufacture bricks. He leased a meadow along the northern boundary of Columbia from the Barbers, where he established a brick-yard, and for more than eighty years brick have been burned at this place which are esteemed the most durable of any manufactured in the State. His son, Lewis Whisler, purchased the brick-yard and farm, and they are now owned by his son Henry.

He died Sept. 14, 1824, leaving a wife, Sophia (Herbel), and children,—Lewis, John, Kitty, who married William Christy; Magdalena, Peggy, who married Samuel May; Sally, who married Ezra Breece; Phillip, Nancy, who married Jacob Mathiot, and Michael.

Joseph Pool was a captain in the Revolutionary army, and participated in a number of battles. He was at the battle of Brandywine, and when on duty a British soldier thrust a bayonet through his tent which wounded his wife, the marks of which she carried to her grave. They removed to Columbia eighty years ago. He rented the old "Ferry House," where he kept a store for a few years. They removed to the corner of Walnut and Third Streets. Their son, Joseph, accidentally shot Miss Susanna Cookmar and killed her.

Francis Ottomar Zeigler, a native of France, in the year 1777 joined an expedition under Baron De Steuben, and came to this country as aide-de-camp to that officer, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. The detachment of troops landed from the frigate "Le Flamand," at Portsmouth, N. H., and from thence marched to York, Pa., where they were duly mustered into the army, and the officers commissioned by order of Congress. Col. Zeigler participated in a number of battles. After the war was ended he settled in Lancaster, where he followed the business of whitesmithing.

While in that place he married Mary Frances Hook (or Huck, as the name was spelled at that time), and shortly thereafter removed to Baltimore, Md., where their children were born. In 1798 they returned to Lancaster, and from thence to Columbia in 1800, where he purchased a lot on Front Street, about midway between Walnut Street and the Pennsylvania Railroad round-house. Before getting possession of this property he occupied a log house on the same street, a short distance from Walnut, where he took malarial fever and died in the autumn of that year. He left five children, namely, Ann Mary, who afterwards married Tempest Wilson (who kept a tavern in Martie township, from which place he removed to Wright's Ferry, and rented the tavern and ferry upon the western side of the river); John, who died in 1836; George, who died in 1838; Barbara, who married John Arms; and Andrew, who died in 1818. The widow of Col. Zeigler carried on a bakery for many years. She died Dec. 26, 1825.

There were several other Revolutionary soldiers in Columbia, concerning whom full biographical data cannot be obtained.<sup>1</sup>

Evan Green was born near Quakertown, Bucks Co., Pa., in 1778, and learned the hatting business with his father, who lived on a small clearing of one or two acres. During the winter months he was sent to the common schools of the neighborhood. He was fond of books, and read them with great avidity. The family being Friends, he had access only to books written and published by the early Quakers. He committed to memory the few poetical works written by them. He came to Columbia in the year 1804 and commenced the manufacture of hats in a little shop on Front Street, and from there he removed it to Walnut Street. He was one of the foremost in every enterprise calculated to benefit his fellow-men and extend and foster the best interests of his adopted town, hence we find him organizing schools, libraries, erecting public buildings, and urging internal improvements.

He established a lumber-yard and leased ground from Samuel Bethel at the canal basin, where he conducted that business for fifteen years. In the year 1810 he erected three two-story brick houses on Front Street, above Locust, in one of which he lived. He married Isabella Slaymaker, daughter of the Hon. Amos Slaymaker, a member of Congress in 1811.

He was a member of the Federal party while it existed, and afterwards joined the Whig party. He was opposed to Southern slavery, although rather conservative in his views. He did not belong to or encourage what came to be known as the "Underground Railroad," but he rendered valuable aid to the colored people and assisted a number of fugitive slaves in their efforts to obtain their freedom. Charlotte and her husband, Charles Green, were both fugitive slaves; the one was a domestic in his family, and the other his coachman.

About the year 1832 the former was suddenly seized

<sup>1</sup> Robert Barber, a grandson of the old pioneer settler, was a captain in the Revolutionary war, and was in the battle of Long Island and other engagements.

Joseph Boyd was a private, and served through the Revolutionary war. He was a blacksmith, and carried on his business at the corner of Fourth and Walnut Streets. He died about 1849.

James Upjohn enlisted in May, 1777, in Capt. Kern's company, in Col. Patton's regiment of the Pennsylvania Line. He was in a number of battles, and was wounded at Monmouth, N. J. He removed to Columbia after the war, and died here.

William Poor enlisted in June, 1779, in Capt. Thomas Wylie's company, in Col. Benjamin Flowers' regiment of artillery. He served four years and two months. He was a "fuller."

by her master while sweeping in front of the house, and carried to Lancaster before the judges, who remanded her back to slavery. Mr. Green did all in his power to save her. In that he failed, but he prevented two of her children from being carried and sold into slavery. Charles Green collected six hundred dollars, and went to Baltimore to buy his wife. When he arrived there he was seized and sold into slavery, and nothing more was ever heard from him.

His wife was sold several times, and finally got to New Orleans, where she was hired out by her master as a yellow fever nurse. She finally purchased her own freedom, and married a Creole and became very rich.

Mr. Green was for many years a director in the Columbia Bank and Bridge Company, and held a number of minor trusts. He always declined to hold a political office of any kind.

His children were Amos S., who was born in 1816, became a prominent and influential citizen, and was elected to the Legislature in 1858 and 1859; Cornelia, who married Dr. Spence and removed to Virginia; Benjamin; Henry, followed a seafaring life for some years; and Jasper.

Dr. Beaton Smith was the son of the late Jonathan Smith, president of the United States Bank. He was born in Chester County, Pa. He went to Paris and attended medical lectures, where he graduated with high honors, when he returned to Philadelphia. He married Miss Hiddleston, and was appointed teller in a branch of the Pennsylvania Bank, and removed to Columbia soon after the war of 1812. He remained in charge of the bank for several years, and until it was removed from Columbia. He remained in the place and practiced medicine, and was also appointed agent for the Pennsylvania Fire Insurance Company in Columbia. He was a person of ability, and took a very active part in the temperance movement, and was one of their principal speakers. He removed to Germantown in 1831, and died in Philadelphia a few years ago at a great age.

William Kirkwood was an Irish Quaker. He came to Sadsbury township, in this county, about the year 1806 or 1807, where he taught school, and married Rebecca Cooper about the year 1809. He removed to Columbia, where he taught school in the brick school-house on Third Street and on Locust Street for ten years. He abandoned teaching and became a tenant farmer. He first rented a farm at Wrightsville, where he also burned large quantities of lime. He returned to Columbia and opened a lumber-yard, and also farmed for the Wrights near Columbia. He was a public speaker at Friends' meetings, and became an ardent temperance advocate. He was also a fine writer. He died in Columbia about the year 1833.

John McKissick was born in Chester County, and came to Lancaster about the year 1800, and held a position under the State government until the capital of the State was removed to Harrisburg. He came to Columbia in 1809, and was appointed an officer in the Branch Bank of Pennsylvania, and afterwards cashier of the Columbia Bank and Bridge Company, a position he held for many years. He was a prominent member of the Presbyterian Church. He died in this place about the year 1838, and left two children surviving him,—Eliza and Mrs. Laird.

John McKissic, Jr., married Capt. Clyde's sister Sarah, and came from Chester County to Columbia, and took a position in the Branch Bank of Philadelphia as clerk. He had one son, James, who graduated at Lafayette College with high honors, was admitted to practice law, and opened an office in Columbia. He died suddenly in 1853. John McKissic and Sarah had also daughters,—Sarah and Mary. The latter married John B. Edwards.

Dr. Hugh McCorkle was born in Chester County. He came to Columbia about the year 1805, and commenced the practice of medicine. In 1812 he married Miss Strickler, daughter of Jacob Strickler, who resided near Columbia. His son, William S., married Elizabeth Heise, daughter of Samuel B. Heise. Another daughter married John L. Boswell, the editor of the Columbia Spy.

Hugh McCorkle was clerk in the Columbia Bank and Bridge Company for several years prior to 1819.

Capt. James Clyde was born in Northampton County, Pa., in 1783, and came to Columbia in 1810 and engaged in the lumber business. He was appointed a justice of the peace in 1812.

In 1814 he took command of a volunteer company of soldiers (which was recruited by Moses Montgomery, who was disabled the evening before he was to march) and marched to Baltimore. He was married the first time to Miss Horner, and moved to Washington County, in Ohio, in 1823.

He was married the second time to Miss Sally Downing, of Downingtown, now living in Columbia. Capt. Clyde returned to Northampton County in 1842, and died upon his farm in that county in 1866.

Capt. William Vicary was a sea-captain. He married a daughter of Philip Gossler, who kept the Ferry House and rented Wright's Ferry. He owned and lived in the first frame house below the brick Ferry House hotel, on Front Street, now occupied by Bridge Street. It is said that he was the first person in the United States who introduced the tomato in the country. He brought some seed with him from the Sandwich Islands. He did not intend to raise them for table use, but rather as something ornamental. He was one of the earliest burgesses of the town.

Thomas Welsh was born in Columbia about the year 1825, and for a number of years resided with John Cooper, late president of the Columbia National Bank. He enlisted as a private, and marched with several other Columbians to Mexico. He was wounded at the battle of Monterey in his leg, and was brought home, where by kind attention and the best medical attention he was able to be out again in a few months. Having shown a talent for the military profession, many of his friends persuaded him to accept a lieutenant's commission in the regular army. He was duly appointed and marched to Vera Cruz, and participated in several battles under Gen. Scott. After the war he resigned his position in the army and returned to Columbia. For some years he kept a store at the basin, and owned several canal-boats. In 1856 he was elected a justice of the peace. In the spring of 1861 he raised one of the first volunteer companies in the State and entered the three months' service.<sup>1</sup>

Capt. James Caldwell came to Columbia from the central part of the State when the public works were being built, he being one of the contractors. When the war with Mexico commenced he raised a company of volunteers and marched to Mexico. He participated in all the battles between Vera Cruz and the city of Mexico. While advancing at the head of his company, after the capture of Chapultepec, to the gates of the city of Mexico, and passing along the causeway, he received a wound in the foot from the fragment of a shell, from the effects of which lockjaw set in, and he died in two weeks.

His son, the Hon. Alexander Caldwell, of Kansas, who was about fourteen years of age, was by his father's side when he received his wound. Gen. Pierce appointed him commissary clerk when he landed at Vera Cruz. For gallant and meritorious conduct he received a lieutenant's commission about the close of the war.

He did not enter the regular army, but returned to Columbia, where he entered the produce-store of Joseph M. Cottrell as clerk, and thence to the Columbia Bank as teller. In 1858 he removed to Kansas, where he was afterwards elected to the United States Senate.

His success as a business man has been phenomenal.

Richard E. Cochran, Jr., was the son of Dr. Richard E. Cochran, and was born Nov. 16, 1817, in the State of Delaware. In 1838 he was appointed second lieutenant in the regular army, and at once went into active duty in Florida and along the western border of Arkansas.

When the war with Mexico commenced in 1846 he joined his regiment, and was in the battle of Palo Alto, May 8, 1846, and on the next day in the battle of Resaca de la Palma, and when entering the captured intrenchments, sword in hand, he was killed. Some months later his body was brought to Columbia, and interred with the honors of war. The citizens of the place erected a marble monument over his grave. He received a collegiate education, and was rather above the standard of ability in this remarkable family. His military genius gave promise of a future brilliant career.

Capt. Theodore D. Cochran was the fourth son of Dr. Richard E. Cochran. He was born in Delaware in 1821. He was sent to the common schools in Columbia. About the year 1836 he entered the Columbia Spy printing-office, where from the beginning of his apprenticeship he developed talent as a political writer. After the death of Preston B. Elder, the proprietor of the Spy, in 1839, he took charge of the Old Guard, an Anti-Masonic and Whig paper, published in Lancaster, which was established in the interest of the Hon. John Strohm. He was elected to the Legislature in 1844 and 1845. He understood but little of the arts of the orator, but when a member of the Legislature he made one of the most brilliant speeches of the session in favor of the "right of way" for the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad through the western part of the State.

He received a commission as lieutenant in the regular line, and marched to Mexico. He was conspicuously brave at the battle of Molino del Rey and Chapultepec. He returned to Columbia after the war with greatly impaired health, and again entered the editorial field, for which he was so well equipped.

He resided at York when the Rebellion of 1861 broke out, when he immediately raised a company of volunteers and entered the three months' service, and after its close accepted a commission in the regular service, but was compelled from ill health to resign. He died in York at his brother's, Hon. Thomas E. Cochran, in July, 1863.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

THE HOUSTON FAMILY.

The Houstons of Lancaster County are of Scotch-Irish descent. The origin of the family is ancient, the name coming from Sir Hugh De Padvinan, A.D. 1160, he being possessed of the lands of Kilpeter, in Strathgrief, Scotland. In 1250 the name of Houston was adopted, and the titles follow in direct line through the oldest sons to the present time, George Ludovic Houston being in possession of the baronetcy and estates at Johnstone, Renfrew County, Scotland. From existing evidence it appears that the younger sons of the original family left Scotland for the north of Ireland early in the seventeenth century. We now find them scattered through the counties of Donegal, Londonderry, Antrim, and Tyrone, from whence came the first of the Houstons of Lancaster County, Pa., between 1725 and 1730. From these families came the Houstons of Virginia and Tennessee. Sam. Houston, of Texas, left Lancaster County with his father's family when a child for Virginia, and after the death of his father went, with other children of the family and his mother, to East Tennessee. The family remaining in Lancaster County are the descendants of John Houston, who had six sons and two daughters, all born at the farm in Pequea Valley, immediately facing Gap Station, on the Pennsylvania Railroad. The sons were Daniel, Dr. John, William, James, Thomas, and Samuel. One daughter married the Rev. Dr. Proudfit, the other Mr. John Johnson, of Mercersburg, Franklin Co., Pa. Both daughters had large families. The Proudfits now live in New York and vicinity, and the Johnsons in Franklin County and farther west in Pennsylvania. The five elder boys (Samuel was too young) were soldiers in the Revolutionary army, and with the exception of James, who was killed at Paoli, fought through the war. After the war Daniel moved to Franklin, and afterwards to Washington County, Pa., William to Trumbull County, Ohio, and Thomas to Rockbridge County, Va.

The youngest son, Samuel, remained in Pequea Valley, Lancaster Co., during his life.

Dr. John Houston, the second son, was born at Pequea in 1748. He finished his studies at the University of Edinburgh, Scotland, graduating in 1766; studied medicine with Dr. Shippen, of Philadelphia; commenced the practice of medicine at York, Pa., then a frontier town; married Susannah Wright, of Columbia, June 17, 1778. He entered the army as a surgeon. Gen. James Ewing married Patience Wright, Mrs. Dr. Houston's sister. They were the only children of John Wright, the holder of large properties on both sides of the Susquehanna River, at Columbia and Wrightsville. After the war, Dr. Houston spent the remainder of his life at his winter home in Columbia or on his farm, on the west side of the Susquehanna, in York County, now a part of Wrightsville. His wife, Susanna Houston, survived him many years, and died in 1829. Their children were James, John, Martha, Eleanor Wright, Anna S., William Frederick, Robert Wright, and Samuel Nelson.

James married Nancy Wright. He erected the flouring-mill and first saw-mills near the mouth of Kreitz Creek, at Wrightsville. Their children were Susan E. and John W. Susan married James E. Mifflin. James E. Mifflin, now of Columbia, is their son. John W. married Mary B. Martin, of Lycoming County, Pa. They had sons and daughters,—George, now living in Missouri, and William, at Cincinnati, Ohio. His daughter Annie married Col. Lewis Merrill, of the United States army; Emily married Col. Alexander, of the United States army; and Eliza married Capt. Warner, United States army.

Martha married Joseph Mifflin, a prominent scholar, and for a part of his life a bank-officer in Philadelphia. Their children were Deby Ann, John Houston, James H., and Joseph. Deby Ann died in Columbia in 1829. James H. died at Eatonton, Ga., in 1838. J. Houston married Elizabeth B. Heise, of Columbia. He is still with us, a hale, hearty artist-poet-farmer. Though past the allotted space of threescore and ten, long may he live to enjoy the comfort and companionship of his four bright sons! Joseph married Julia Duncan Stewart, and is living on his farm in Cumberland County, enjoying the comfort of a well-spent life.

John and William F. both studied medicine. John died just after graduating.

William, having abandoned the practice of medicine for the pulpit, lived for many years a devoted minister of the Presbyterian Church. He married in early life Amy McCorkle, of Philadelphia. They had two children,—Christiana M. and John Frederick. Christiana married Rev. James L. Scott, of the Presbyterian Church, in 1837, and immediately sailed for India. After remaining ten years there, Mrs. Scott's health became impaired and she was ordered home. She died on shipboard just after passing the Cape of Good Hope. They had three children,—two (Amy and Edward H.) died after reaching man and womanhood. Anna E., the surviving daughter, is now and has been for many years in the mission-field in India.

John Frederick married Catharine J. Fisher, of Pine Ford, Dauphin Co., Pa. He was one of the lightest young men of our country. He was born in Columbia, and lived there all his life. He graduated at an early age at Amherst College with high honor; adopted the profession of a civil engineer; was engaged on the construction of the Baltimore and Susquehanna Railroad, Gettysburg Railroad, the State works of Pennsylvania, in progress between 1834 and 1839. He abandoned the engineer service and studied law with his brother-in-law, Judge Robert J. Fisher, of York, Pa. He commenced the practice of law in the counties of York and Lancaster, continuing his home in Columbia, and was fast gaining prominence, when at the early age of thirty-five he was stricken with paralysis, after which he lived nearly thirty years, respected by all who knew him. He has three surviving children,—Georgianna F., at Harrisburg; William F., at San Francisco, Cal.; and Harry, at Denver, Col.<sup>1</sup>

Robert W. lived in Columbia all his life. He was an enterprising and highly respected citizen. For many years a merchant, and afterwards a contractor in the Columbia and Philadelphia Railroad and Pennsylvania Canal. He married Sarah Ann Jones, of Great Valley, Chester Co. She died in Columbia in 1834. They had two daughters,—Mary and Susan W. Mary died young. Susan married the Rev. Robert Gamble, of the Presbyterian Church; they are now living in Chanceford, York Co., Pa.

<sup>1</sup> The daughters, Eleanor W. and Anna S., who lived respectively eighty-two and eighty-four years, remained unmarried, during all those years living together and keeping house that was always a home for their nephews and nieces and their children. All their means and all their personal attention devoted to hospitality to their relatives and to their friends,—long lives of unselfishness and affectionate care. Of Anna S., but for the constraint of this duty of her heart, her fondness for reading and her talents as a poetess would have distinguished her in literature. Both were zealous members of the Presbyterian Church. Even in her age, until physical infirmity forbade it, Eleanor especially visited the poor and the needy in their humble homes, prescribing food and medicine and Christian comfort, "going about doing good."

Henry A. Houston

Samuel Nelson was born in 1791; finished his education at Burlington College, New Jersey; studied medicine and pharmacy in Philadelphia in 1811 and 1812; returned to Columbia on account of ill health; spent his time in the field and saddle for two or three years (we cannot refer to the exercise which restored the health of Mr. Samuel N. Houston without remarking that he was of uncommonly handsome personal appearance; that in those days before fox-hunting was one of the lost arts, while he was distinguished for all manly and athletic exercises, he was especially noted as a magnificent rider); was an active member of Capt. Shippen's troop of horse of Lancaster County, in the war of 1812; entirely regained his health, and in 1816 married Susan Strickler, daughter of Col. Jacob Strickler; they had five children,—John James, Henry Howard, Emily Strickler, Eleanor Wright, Martha Mifflin. He died November, 1878, aged eighty-seven years. John James married Ann Blakiston, of Philadelphia. He was for many years engaged in transportation in Pennsylvania and Western States; lived the most of his life in Columbia, a few years in Pittsburgh, and died in Philadelphia in 1869. His wife survives him. They had no children. He was a wonderful man, and though with a slight frame and delicate constitution, he by determination and pure grit accomplished great results, and of him we can say he died as he always lived,—ready.

Henry H., the second son of Samuel N. Houston, was early at work in a mercantile house, and soon left it for that of transportation.

Emily Strickler died in Columbia, aged seven years.

Eleanor W. died at fifty-five years of age, in 1881.

Martha Mifflin, the youngest daughter, married Stephen Greene, in Columbia, in 1855. They went to Philadelphia in 1860, where they now reside with a family of six children.

The only other branch of the original John Houston, first referred to, that remained and grew up in Lancaster County, was Esquire Samuel Houston, of Pequea Valley, of which family we regret we cannot give a full account. He married Miss Hopkins, of Lancaster, and had children—John, James H., Franklin, William, Samuel, Horatio, Sarah Jane, Martha, and Louise.

John married Gertrude Truxton, daughter of Commodore Truxton, and had sons and daughters. Several of the boys were in the navy, and daughters married officers in the United States army. One of the sons, James Buchanan Houston, is president of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company.

James H. married Miss Henderson, and had sons and daughters. One of the sons, J. Hopkins Houston, was rapidly becoming prominent as a railroad officer, but died young at Prairie du Chien, Wis., while occupying an important position.

Franklin lived and died in Lancaster County, was married, and most of his children are settled in this county.

Gen. William married Miss Jacobs, of Lancaster County. He was engaged for many years in the manufacture of iron in Centre County. He had several sons. Part of the family went to California, and part to Missouri. He died in California.

Dr. Samuel married Agnes Humes, of Lancaster. They had sons and daughters. The doctor died in Washington, where his family now resides. One of his sons, a prominent army officer, died young of yellow fever in Havana.

Horatio was an officer in the navy, and died young.

Sarah Jane married Dr. Harris, of Bellefonte, Pa., and after his death married Mr. Yardly, a prominent merchant of Cincinnati. He lived but a few years. She lived several years a widow, and died in 1881, and is buried in the family burying-ground, Pequea Valley, Lancaster Co.

Martha married Col. William Baker, of this county. They have several children. She died in 1881.

Louise is living with her sister-in-law, Mrs. Dr. Samuel Houston, in Washington, D. C.

HENRY HOWARD HOUSTON.

Henry Howard Houston, the youngest son of Samuel Nelson Houston, and now the oldest living grandson of Dr. John Houston, of Columbia (bearing his name), was born at the Houston farm, Wrightsville, on the 3d day of October, 1820. He left school at fourteen to enter the mercantile house of Mr. John S. Futhey, in Wrightsville. This was probably the best house in its day in this section of the country for qualifying boys for a thorough business life. Mr. Futhey was a man of large means, great industry, strict integrity, high moral character, always on duty himself, and kept his boys at their post. Proverbially he dealt in "everything that grew, was manufactured, or consumed." This gave those with him a knowledge of the value of products and material rarely obtained in one establishment. During the five years young Houston was with him, say from 1834 to 1839, the Baltimore and Susquehanna Railroad (Wrightsville to York), the Tide-Water Canal (Wrightsville to Haver de Grace), the dam across the Susquehanna River, and towing-path bridge were being constructed, and supplies for most of the contractors and laborers on these works were furnished by Mr. Futhey, which, with the bulk of the trade of the rich region within five miles of Wrightsville, gave him an extensive business. Houston's associates in this house were Samuel M. Smith, afterwards a successful merchant; Samuel D. Young, who went early into the transportation business at the Columbia Canal basin, and at the time of his death was superintendent of the Pennsylvania Railroad at Harrisburg; Jasper W. Boyd, son of the first superintendent of the Tide-Water Canal; and J. Smith Futhey, now Judge Futhey, of West Chester, Pa.

At twenty Houston went with Mr. Samuel M. Reynolds, of Lancaster, to Lucinda Furnace, in Clarion County, Pa. After remaining there three years he joined Mr. Edmund Evans in rebuilding and operating Horse Creek furnace, on the Allegheny River, in Venango County, Pa.; remained there two years, and returned to Columbia in January, 1845; remained at home one year, then made a tour of the Southern and Western States, reaching home in December, 1846. In February, 1847, entered the Philadelphia office of Leech & Co., canal and railway transporters. Continued with this company in Philadelphia and New York until December, 1850. The Pennsylvania Railroad was then completed to Hollidaysburg and with the State Portage Railroad over the mountains and the canal (Johnstown to Pittsburgh) furnished a through line from Philadelphia to the Ohio River. Col. William C. Patterson, then president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, selected him to organize the freight department of the new road. The rail line was completed to Pittsburgh in 1853, and from this time until 1860 the efforts required to secure and maintain trade against rivalry in the North and South was incessant and laborious. He continued in charge of this department for fifteen years.

Since then he has, with associates, been largely interested in the construction of local railroads and roads across the continent. He is now engaged in lake and ocean transportation, being part owner of a line of nine steamships on the ocean and a fleet of twenty steamers on the northwestern lakes; was an early and successful producer and operator in petroleum, a miner of coal in Pennsylvania and Western Virginia, and interested in gold and silver mines in Montana and Colorado. He is now in the board of directors of the Pennsylvania Railroad, the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati and St. Louis Railroad, the Pennsylvania Company, the International Steamship Company, the Erie and Western Transportation Company, besides others of less importance.

He married Miss Sallie S. Bonnell, of Philadelphia, in 1856. They have had six children. The first, a daughter, died in infancy. Henry Howard, Jr., the eldest son, who traveled during school and college vacations the entire chain of the lakes between the head of Lake Superior and Quebec, through the Southern and Western States and part of Mexico, across the Rocky Mountains and north to British Columbia. He graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in the class of 1878. Then made a tour of Europe, the region of the Nile and Palestine, returned to Italy via Turkey in Europe, and died in Rome in June, 1879, just as he reached his twenty-first year.

Eleanor Anna, the third daughter, died at twelve years of age, in January, 1875. The remaining children are Sallie B., Samuel Frederick, and Gertrude. The family reside in Germantown, a suburb of Philadelphia, where they have lived for twenty-five years. Mr. Houston is a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church, has been rector's warden and superintendent of Sunday-school of St. Peter's Church, Germantown, since the organization of that parish.

JOHN HOUSTON MIFFLIN.

John Houston Mifflin, of whom the following brief sketch is given, is a Pennsylvanian of the seventh generation. The first John Mifflin came from England with William Penn in 1676, and took up four hundred acres of land, now included in Fairmount Park, Philadelphia. A son of John, born in 1660, married in 1683, and from his son John descended John (4th), whose son, Joseph Mifflin, was the grandfather of John Houston Mifflin, and a successful merchant in Philadelphia, as were also his brothers. The second Joseph Mifflin, the father of the subject of this sketch, came to Columbia and married Martha Houston, a daughter of John Houston, whose father, John Houston, emigrated from Scotland about 1680 and settled in Pequea township, one of the finest farming regions of Lancaster County, Pa. His son, John Houston, J. H. Mifflin's grandfather, was sent to Edinburgh to complete his education as a physician, and there received his medical diploma. He served as a surgeon for seven years during the Revolutionary war. He married Susanna Wright (more particulars of their several children, as well as of the ancestors of the family, being given in the biographical sketch of Henry H. Houston, Esq.). John Houston, after the close of the Revolutionary war, continued the practice of medicine in Columbia, and was commissioned a justice of the peace by Governor Mifflin. Mr. Mifflin's father, Joseph Mifflin, removed to the neighborhood of Columbia and married Martha Houston, daughter of John Houston and Susanna Wright Houston. He was occupied in teaching for some years in Columbia, and afterwards as a book-keeper in the first bank in that place. John Houston Mifflin was the first of several children of Joseph and Martha Mifflin, and was born on the 7th day of February, 1807. When about six years of age his parents removed to Philadelphia, his father assisting his own brother, Lloyd Mifflin, in the banking-house of the Camden Bank of New Jersey, at their office in Church Street, Philadelphia. There he attended an excellent private school until the death of his mother, which occurring at an early age, he was sent to the celebrated boarding-school of the Society of Friends, or Quakers (that being the religious faith of his family), called Westtown, near to West Chester, and about twenty miles from Philadelphia. Mr. and Mrs. Mifflin both died in Philadelphia, where their remains are interred. The subject of this biographical sketch having early shown fondness and facility for drawing, after abundant drawing-lessons under I. R. Smith, then celebrated in Philadelphia, and opportunities of painting at the Academy of Fine Arts in that city, had the privilege of instruction from Thomas Sully and John Neagle, two of the most distinguished portrait-painters of that day. He pursued his art as a portrait-painter in the city where his boyhood was passed, and where his many friends kept him moderately busy, until his old and particular friend and fellow-student at drawing-school, James DeVeaux, enticed him to the South to spend the winters. Here he found such hospitality and high appreciation of his art as to influence his return in the winter to its hospitable cities, and to protract his visits till the early summers of the sunny South attracted him to view the wonderful and romantic scenery of the northern part of Georgia,—in particular, those localities where mountains and water-falls compressed all Switzerland within a radius of thirty miles, and which he traversed, occasionally sketching during this period. In his business as a professional portrait-painter Mr. Mifflin was amply rewarded by his friends and liberal patrons in the South, and in company with his artist-friend, DeVeaux, made the tour of Europe, visiting in 1835-36 the galleries and museums in parts of England, in London, Brussels, and Paris, and nearly all the collections in every city in Italy. Later he returned to Augusta and Savannah, Ga., and was greeted with hospitality and success.

Upon one of his revisits to his native town, Columbia, Pa., he married Miss Elizabeth A. Bethel Heise, daughter of Solomon and Patience Bethel Heise, of that place. For a time Mr. Mifflin attempted to pursue his favorite art of portrait-painting in Columbia. Its population, however, not furnishing patient sitters to dispute the celerity of the daguerreotype or the rapidity of the photograph, the palette and pencil were laid aside. The management of the landed interests of the family gradually absorbed his time, and he gave much attention to the improvement of this property. He may justly claim to be identified with the growth and development of Columbia, having erected more than forty dwellings within its limits. He also laid out a cemetery adjoining those denominational burial-places which were being overcrowded, and afterwards furnished additional ground for the beautiful spot, chartered under the name of the Mount Bethel Cemetery Association of Columbia, of which he is the president. He has been honored by the confidence and trust of his fellow-citizens, when political partisanship had no influence in their selection, with many positions of importance, such as school director for several terms, treasurer of the Public Grounds Company, and president of some manufacturing companies. He was for thirty successive years elected a trustee of the Presbyterian Church, of which Mrs. Mifflin and most of his relatives are members, although his parents were members of the Society of Friends, which entitled their children to membership in that society. In his political affiliations Mr. Mifflin was formerly a Whig, and subsequently adopted the principles of the Republican party, though he is devoid of ambition for distinctions of a political character.

He has a love for literature, and a facility for writing verse, of which he printed a small volume called "Rhyme of an Artist," for private distribution. He contributed essays and poetical pieces, some of which were set to music, to Graham's Magazine and to Burton's Gentleman's Magazine in Philadelphia, and frequently wrote spicy articles for the local papers of Columbia. He was also an elocutionist as far as dramatic recitation indicated the capacity, and frequently entertained his friends and benevolent organizations with lectures, readings, or recitations. Mr. Mifflin has evinced during his lifetime a desire to become a useful citizen rather than to achieve marked distinction in literature or art, in both of which fields he might, doubtless, with application and study, have won renown.

He is of a cheerful social disposition, beloved by a large number of friends, and most affectionate and devoted to his family as husband and father.

Mr. and Mrs. Mifflin were blessed with several children, of whom Lloyd, Houston, James DeVeaux, and Charles West survive. The eldest, Bethel, Martha Elizabeth, and Mary Bethel, rest in the Mount Bethel Cemetery, beside the grave of their mother.

WILLIAM FORDNEY LOCKARD.

The subject of this biographical sketch was born of German ancestry. His father, Charles Lockard, resided in Columbia, Lancaster Co., Pa., and during the earlier years of his life followed the occupation of pilot on the Susquehanna River. In later years he became a contractor, and died at Peach Bottom, Pa., in 1826, at the early age of thirty years, having been at the time of his death engaged in the construction of a public canal. He married Elizabeth Fordney, daughter of William Fordney, who emigrated from Germany to Columbia, Pa., where he died in 1825. Mrs. Lockard survived her husband fifty years, and died at Columbia, Pa., in 1876, at the ripe age of seventy-nine years. She was a devoted Christian mother through all the vicissitudes of a long and well-spent life. Her beloved and venerated character still lives in the memory of the children who survive.

To Mr. and Mrs. Lockard the following children were born: Sophia, Samuel, Charles O., Hannah, William F., and Eliza. The birth of William F. occurred Jan. 19, 1825, at Columbia, Lancaster Co., Pa., where his boyhood was passed. Soon after his father's death, and when nine years of age, William was indentured to James Moore, a farmer of Union County, Pa., who was also by occupation a bridge-builder, having erected the second bridge across the Susquehanna River, between Columbia and Wrightsville, Pa., in the year 1834. (This bridge was destroyed by fire July, 1863, during the invasion of Gen. Lee's army into Pennsylvania, on the occasion of the battle of Gettysburg.) William F. lived six years in Union County, Pa., and on returning to his native town was employed in the construction of the new line of railroad then being built to avoid the inclined plane at Columbia, Pa. This contract being finished, he engaged upon a canal-boat running between Columbia and Hollidaysburg, Pa., and served his superiors faithfully for two years. He then accepted the position of agent on a train of cars running over the "State Road" between Columbia and Philadelphia, Pa., owned by Messrs. Bingham, Dock & Stratton, one of the few transportation houses then doing business on the Columbia Basin.

At the age of eighteen he became fireman upon a locomotive, and four years later rose to the rank of a locomotive engineer in the employ of the State of Pennsylvania. He continued in that capacity until the year 1857, at which time the main line, owned and controlled by the State, from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh, was sold to the Pennsylvania Central Railroad, they assuming full management of the same. William F. was, in the summer of 1858, made dispatcher of trains at Columbia, and remained thus employed until March 1, 1867, when he was appointed and confirmed by the board of directors of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to the position of superintendent of the Philadelphia Division of said road, with his office in Philadelphia. This caused the removal with his family from Columbia, Pa., and occasioned the separation from many warm personal friends, who, however, rejoiced at his promotion. He continued to fill the position of superintendent for fourteen years, when, in the summer of 1881, owing to continued ill health, contracted by the arduous duties of the office, he was compelled to tender his resignation. It was reluctantly accepted by the board of directors, who, being unwilling to lose his services, appointed him superintendent of the Junction Railroad, a position of like responsibilities though less laborious, which office he now holds.

William Forduey Lockard is essentially a self-made man, and has not depended upon accidental good fortune to make his career one of success. His energy, industry, and inherent force have been the powerful levers which have lifted him from dependence to a position of influence and independence. In the various positions he has held the confidence and respect of his superior officers has invariably been manifested towards him, while the most flattering testimonials have evinced the affection of his subordinates.

William F. Lockard married at Middletown, Dauphin Co., Pa., on the 6th day of March, 1850, Margaret B., daughter of Daniel Fager, formerly of Reading, Pa. Their children are Jennie B., Samuel L., Thomas G., Edwin J., Letitia, Minnie, and Lucy F. All are living with the exception of Letitia, who died in infancy.

The Lockards were from the earliest records of the family in Germany members of the German Lutheran Church. This family still adheres to the faith and worships with the same denomination.

JOHN B. BACHMAN.

Mr. Bachman's paternal ancestors are of German extraction, while on the maternal side is traced a union of Scotch and Irish antecedents. Felix Bachman, his great-grandfather, emigrated from Switzerland about the year 1740, and purchased of the heirs of William Penn six hundred acres of land in Bart township, Lancaster Co.

John B. Bachman

He had two sons, George and Jacob, the latter of whom was born on the ancestral land, and in the dwelling erected by his father soon after his purchase, which is still standing. He was a farmer by occupation, and married Ann Heidlebach, of this same township. Their sons were George, Samuel, and Jacob, and their daughters Ann and Elizabeth.

The birth of Samuel occurred upon the paternal estate in 1791, in the vicinity of which his life was spent as merchant, landlord, and farmer. He was a man of enterprise and judgment, and his services were much sought in the settlement of estates in his native county. He married Rebecca G. Baird, whose grandfather, Thomas Baird, emigrated to America from Tyrone, Ireland, in 1753. John Baird, the father of Mrs. Bachman, was a soldier of the Revolution, and a magistrate both in Bart and Colerain townships. His death occurred in 1822. The children of Samuel and Rebecca were John B., Hiram F., Samuel H., and Ann A.

Mrs. Bachman's death occurred in 1881, and that of her husband April 1, 1882. Their son, John B., was born March 22, 1820, on the homestead in Bart township, and his childhood was spent in the immediate vicinity of his birthplace. His educational advantages were confined to the select schools of the neighborhood, after which he became clerk of a country store, and filled a similar position in the village hotel. At the age of eighteen he became a carpenter's apprentice, and having acquired the trade conducted an extensive business. Desiring a larger field of labor than the country afforded, he removed in 1852 to Columbia, and availing himself of the new inventions in machinery then in use, engaged largely in the manufacture of sash, doors, and blinds. He is doubtless the oldest manufacturer in the State engaged in this branch of industry, and still conducts an extensive planing and lumbering business on the site of his original purchase.

Mr. Bachman was married in 1847 to Miss Isabella, daughter of Matthew Knox, of the same township. Their children are Florence R. (Mrs. Breneman), Hyde L., Jenny Gail, and Mary Gertrude. Mr. Bachman has by his ambition and public spirit added much to the growth and development of Columbia. He has for many years been actively engaged in building, the dwellings he erected having especial reference to the comfort and improved condition of the laboring classes. He has been since the casting of his first ballot on conviction an Old-Line Whig, and readily espoused the platform of the Republican party on its formation. He has been prominent in municipal affairs, and frequently a member of the Council of the borough of Columbia.

Mr. Bachman may justly be regarded as a promoter of all schemes having for their object the improved condition of the community.

FREDERICK BUCHER.

The parents of Frederick Bucher were Joseph Max and Barbara (Bernauer) Bucher, of Deggingen, Würtemberg, Germany, where the former died in 1870, having during his active life been a leading merchant of that village. Here his son Frederick was born, Sept. 18, 1830. On reaching manhood he decided upon America as a future field of labor, and emigrated in 1858. Christian, his brother, followed in 1856, and Max, another brother, in 1858, both of whom are since deceased.

Frederick settled in Columbia, and at once sought employment with Jonas Ruple in the hardware business. After a brief period he engaged with Henry Pfähler, of the same place, with whom he remained until 1860, and later became associated with J. W. Cottrell. In 1866 he embarked in the grocery and hardware business, and has since been thus occupied. He is also largely interested in real estate transactions, and has erected many dwellings in the borough of Columbia.

He was married in 1859 to Miss Louisa, daughter of Michael Bartz, of Chestnut Hill, Lancaster Co., to whom were born children,—Mary, Frederick, Amelia, and William.

Mr. Bucher, in 1857, had partially decided upon California as a future home, but was influenced by circumstances to return to Pennsylvania after an extended tour, including a journey of great interest through the South.

He revisited his native land in 1880, having traveled extensively through Germany, France, and Italy. The journey was made with a view to reviving the scenes of his childhood experiences and enjoying the companionship of his mother and three sisters, who still occupy the parental abode. Mr. Bucher, while in the hardware business, was successful in the invention of a stove for heating purposes, which was patented in 1858. A disastrous fire having destroyed the patterns, prevented the manufacture of the article. He is an active Odd-Fellow and a member of the Susquehanna Lodge, No. 80, of Columbia, as also of the Artisans' Order of Mutual Protection of the same borough.

In politics he is a Republican, though not an active politician.

ANDREW J. MUSSER.

Peter Musser, the great-grandfather of the subject of this biographical sketch, was of Swiss parentage, and married a Miss Dietz, to whom were born children,—John, Christian, Henry, Peter, and Annie. Peter, of this number, was born Nov. 29, 1776, in Lancaster County, and died July 2, 1848, in his seventy-second year. He married Elizabeth Rhorer, of the same county, who was born Aug. 14, 1788, and died Oct. 8, 1822, in her thirty-fifth year. Their children were Henry R., Mary, Annie, Joseph, and Betsey.

Henry R. was born June 18, 1808, and died June 1, 1878, in his sixty-fifth year. He was three times married, the second union having been with Annie, only daughter of John and Barbara Mouk. Their children were Elias H., Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, Andrew Jackson, and Barbara Ann, who became Mrs. Horn. Andrew Jackson was born March 2, 1841, in Lancaster County. The early years of his life were spent in West Hempfield township, his home after his fourth year having been with his maternal grandfather, John Mouk. At the age of eighteen he removed to Columbia, and served an apprenticeship of three years at the trade of cabinet-maker, subsequently pursuing his vocation until Aug. 9, 1862, when he enlisted in Company K, One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and served for a period of nine months, during which time he participated in the battles of Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville. On his return he resumed his trade, which was continued until 1871, when he purchased the old and established business of George Seibert, cabinet-maker and undertaker, which he has greatly enlarged, having added extensive facilities for fine upholstery.

Mr. Musser was married in 1861 to Miss Cassandra E., daughter of John and Mary Shenberger, of York County, Pa. Their children are John S. and Frank B., both of whom are associated with their father in business.<sup>1</sup> Mr. Musser is in politics an active Republican. He has been for three years a member of the Council of the borough of Columbia, and was during the last year its president. He is also an enthusiastic Mason and member of the Columbia Lodge, No. 286, of Free and Accepted Masons. He is a member of the Susquehanna Lodge, No. 80, of Independent Order of Odd-Fellows, in which he has taken all the degrees, and was representative to the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania. He is a member of the Artisans' Order of Mutual Protection of Columbia, and a director of the Commonwealth Mutual Insurance Company of Columbia, as also of the Columbia Building and Loan Association. Mr. Musser, in business enterprise and public spirit, is among the foremost citizens of the place of his residence.

HENRY H. HEISE.

The Heise family are of Swiss extraction and early settlers in Lancaster County. Solomon Heise, the grandfather of Henry H., was a resident of West Hempfield, where he followed farming employments. He married Patience Bethel, of Scotch descent, and had children,—Samuel B., Henry, George W., Frederick K., Susan, and Elizabeth. The death of Mr. Heise occurred on the homestead March 16, 1833, in his seventy-second year, and that of his wife March 28, 1855, aged eighty-two years. His son Henry was born during the year 1804 at the homestead, where he conducted farming on an extensive scale. He married Anna, daughter of John and Franey Forrey, the latter of whom died in West Hempfield township in her one hundred and fourth year. Mr. Heise married a second time Miss Hannah Heidler, niece of John and Franey Forrey, of Rapho township. Their children were Henry H., Benjamin F., Elizabeth (Mrs. Nolt), Anna M. (deceased), Salinda H. (Mrs. Wilmot), Sarah H. (Mrs. Agnew). Mr. Heise died Feb. 10, 1862, in his sixtieth year. Henry H., his son, was born June 30, 1840, in West Hempfield township, his childhood having been spent at the home of his parents. He availed himself of such advantages as the neighboring school afforded, and afterwards engaged in labor on the farm. In 1866 he became a pupil at the People's Business College at Reading, Pa., and in 1867 made an extended tour through Europe. In 1870 he embarked in the hardware business in Columbia, where he is still an active merchant. He was married April 28, 1874, to Miss Susan, daughter of John S. Mellinger, of Creswell, Manor township. Their children are Harry Elvin, <sup>1</sup> The youngest has also acquired the art of telegraphy, in which he is regarded as an expert.

who resides with his uncle, Dr. David Mellinger, in Manor township, and Susan Florence, who died in infancy. Mrs. Heise died Jan. 11, 1877.

The firm of Heise & Kauffman, with which Mr. Heise was formerly connected, is the patentee of Heise & Kauffman's "patent combined feed tobacco and heating steamer," and Mr. Heise is the patentee of H. H. Heise's latest improved "hydraulic ram." For both of these an extended demand has been created. Since the spring of 1888 Mr. Heise has been sole owner of the extensive hardware business formerly conducted with his partner. He is in politics a Republican, but not an ardent politician. He is a director of the Pennsylvania Fire Insurance Company of Columbia and of the Commonwealth Fire Insurance Company, also of Columbia. The family are in their religious belief Presbyterians, and Henry H. has not departed from the faith of his ancestors.

WILLIAM PATTON.

Mr. Patton is of Irish extraction, his grandfather having been Matthew Patton, who resided in the County Tyrone, Ireland. Among his children was James, born in 1788, who still survives in his ninety-fifth year. He emigrated to America in 1817, and having purchased a tract of land in Chester County, Pa., devoted his life to farming employments. He married Ann, daughter of Samuel Ramsey, of County Armagh, Ireland, and had children,—William, Scott, Harriet (who became Mrs. Burton), and five who are deceased. Their son William was born May 12, 1817, in the County Tyrone, Ireland, and with his parents came to America when an infant. His boyhood until his twenty-second year was spent in Chester County, where he was principally engaged in labor upon the farm.

Having received the appointment of State agent on the Philadelphia and Columbia Railroad, he held the office for one year, after which he became connected with the road as locomotive engineer. In the fall of 1841 he married Miss Susan, daughter of Joseph Withers, and granddaughter of John Withers, who was a captain in Col. John Ferree's battalion during the Revolution, and later a farmer in Strasburg township. The children of Mr. Patton are Emma, Anna F., Olivia, Josephine, and Clara (Mrs. Denny). The year of his marriage Mr. Patton purchased a forwarding house, lumber- and coal-yard at Fair View, Lancaster Co. At the expiration of the third year he received an appointment as train dispatcher at Columbia, and also embarked in the lumber and coal business in that borough. Two years later he, with his brother, engaged in mercantile interests, having still retained the former business.

Mr. Patton, in 1852, turned his attention to contracting, having as the initiatory step built the round-house for the State in connection with the Columbia Railroad. He later constructed the larger part of the Huptingdon and Broad Top Railroad and the Stonerstown bridge.

Together with other partners he also built eighty-two miles of the western end of the Philadelphia and Erie Railroad. He returned to Columbia and embarked in the iron business as general manager of the Susquehanna Iron Company's works, with which interest he has been since identified.

This industry, under his competent supervision, has become one of the most successful iron interests of the State, its products being unsurpassed in quality by any rolling-mill in Pennsylvania.

Mr. Patton has been largely identified with the growth and development of the borough of Columbia, and for many years actively interested in building enterprises. He is a director in both the Susquehanna Iron Company and the Keely Stove Company.

In religion he is a supporter and member of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Columbia, with which Mrs. Patton and their daughters are also connected.

In politics he has during his lifetime espoused the principles of the Democratic party.

MILTON WIKE.

George Wike, the grandfather of Milton, emigrated from Germany and settled in Lancaster County, where he followed his trade of shoemaker. Later he removed to Columbia, where he continued to be industriously employed. He was twice married, and had children,—George, John, and three daughters, Mary (Mrs. Henry Mathiot), Sarah (Mrs. John Hudders) and Betsey (Mrs. Mullen). Mr. Wike's death occurred in Columbia in advanced years. His son, George, was born in the above borough, Jan. 11, 1805, in the immediate vicinity of which his life was spent. He acquired the trade of a cooper, but soon after followed the life of a boatman, and became a pilot on the Susquehanna River. Subsequently he engaged in contracting, and built a portion of the Tide-Water Canal, extending from Wrightsville to Havre-de-Grace. He was on the 26th of April, 1827, married to Sarah, daughter of John Eberlin, of Columbia. Their children are Susan, John F. E., Milton, Ann Jane (Mrs. Wall), Nathaniel E., Emma Frances, George Washington, Henry M., Hannah G. (Mrs. Mullen), Samuel F., Andrew J., Albert, Eunice (Mrs. Stair), and Franklin. George Wike died Dec. 31, 1857, in his fifty-second year. His widow, who survives him, resides in Columbia.

Milton Wike was born Jan. 25, 1831, in Manor township, and removed when an infant with his parents to Columbia, where he attended during his youth the public school of the borough. He then became familiar with the business of a butcher, which was for several years successfully conducted, after which he engaged in the purchase and sale of stock. He later retired from active business pursuits and devoted his attention to a farm owned by him in Martic township. He was in January, 1861, married to Elizabeth, daughter of Isaac Hinkel, of Columbia. Their children are George, Edith, and Flora. Mr. Wike is in politics a Republican. He has for three successive terms been elected school director of the borough of Columbia, and was a member of its Council during the period of the late war. He is also one of the board of directors of the Old Columbia Public Grounds. He is a member of Columbia Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons, and of the Cyrene Commandery of Knights Templar of Columbia. Mr. Wike's family worship with the Lutheran denomination, of which he is a liberal supporter.

CHAPTER XXXI.

MOUNT JOY BOROUGH.

THE borough of Mount Joy is a handsome and thrifty town situated upon the Pennsylvania Railroad, twelve miles west of Lancaster. The Lancaster and Harrisburg turnpike passes through the town and forms its principal street. The earliest habitations within the present limits of Mount Joy were two taverns, which were built upon this thoroughfare many years before it was made a turnpike, and they may be considered the nuclei around which the town was developed. The first of these was a house which stood on the northern or Mount Joy side of the turnpike, and now forms a portion of the Exchange Hotel. It was a small brick house, built by Alexander Campbell in 1768. These facts were for many years set forth upon a stone which capped the apex of the brick arch of a dormer-window, so that he who ran might read, but when the structure was altered and improved the stone was dislodged from its position, and it is now said to be in the attic of the hotel. The second tavern was on the southern or Donegal township side of the stage-road, where it is crossed by the Manheim road, in the western part of the town. The farm embracing this neighborhood was purchased at an early day by Michael Nichels, and the house was built by him in 1783. It stood upon the now vacant corner lot adjoining the residence of Mr. Hildebrand, and was known as "The Cross-Keys." Nichels had a wife, Eva, who was a virago, noted for her ungovernable temper. The place thus became widely known as "the three crosses,"—the cross-roads, "The Cross-Keys," and "the cross landlady." This tavern was carried on until a comparatively recent date by various landlords, and was finally destroyed by fire. A stone from the old building is now to be seen in the rear wall of the Washington Hotel or Plummer House. It bears in clearly legible characters this inscription: "Erbaut durch Michael Nichels & Eva, 1783,"—that is, built by Michael and Eva Nichols. "The Cross-Keys" was a favorite place of resort for the roistering convivialists of the region round about in Mount Joy, Rapho, and Donegal townships long years before the town, which afterwards included it within its bounds, was laid out, and while its site was covered with woods. During the Whiskey Insurrection, at a militia training there, several persons spoke loudly in favor of the insurgents, declaring they were ready to go to their assistance. They were subsequently arrested and taken to Lancaster, but excused themselves by saying that their apparent disloyalty was only the result of a drinking bout.

Rohrerstown.—The first or eastern portion of the town was laid out in September, 1811, by Jacob Rohrer, who came from Sporting Hill, and was called Rohrerstown. It consisted of one hundred and thirty-four lots, laid out around a centre square, and equally divided by the Lancaster and Harrisburg turnpike. A lottery was devised for the distribution of lots, after a common custom of the time, and tickets were sold at eighty-five dollars each. They were not all immediately disposed of, but those remaining in Rohrer's possession were sold within two or three years. Rohrer built the wooden portion of the Exchange Hotel as an addition to the old tavern erected in 1768, which has already been described, and a small building adjoining the site of the present National Bank, in which he kept the first store within the present limits of Mount Joy. Prior to this time the nearest store had been one kept by a Mr. Reeser, one mile west of the site of Mount Joy, on the Manheim road, where now is the farm-house of Abram Hiestand, in Rapho township.

Rohrer removed soon after the war of 1812 to Marietta, and became president of a bank organized there, which finally met with disaster. Prior to that time, however, he returned to the town which he had founded, and served here many years as magistrate. He died in Mount Joy about 1840.

The newly laid out village was settled with considerable rapidity during the war of 1812 and the few years following, but afterwards, for a score of years, the accessions of population were few.

One of the early residents<sup>1</sup> of Mount Joy, or Rohrerstown, has given the writer facts concerning the early history of the village, which enable him to present quite a complete view of the place as it appeared in the war of 1812 period. He estimates that it then contained thirty-three families, and identifies the locations of all the houses. Where Dr. Zeigler now lives, on the north side of the Main Street and the corner of the Centre Square, was a house built by Brice Curran, in 1812, for a residence, but soon given up by him to James Sterrett, who kept in it the second store that was opened in the village. On the adjoining property west was a house built in 1812 by a Mr. Wilkinson, who became afterwards a justice of the peace. There were two houses between this and the place where the railroad crosses, the first occupied by a Mr. Earl and the second by the Galbraith family. Beyond, where the Exchange Hotel now is, was the small tavern, built in 1768, which has been described, and beyond that came what is now the bank building, Rohrer's store. When Rohrer left the new village his stock in this store was taken by Jacob Myers, who sold goods for many years. Myers lived beyond this store in a one-story log house which had been built before the town was laid out, and probably as early as 1780. This house is still standing, and is weather-boarded, so that it does not look much older than some of its neighboring dwellings. It is occupied by the widow of Jacob Myers, Jr. Henry Myers is now the oldest native-born resident of the borough.

On the same side of the street and east of the square, in the order given, were houses built and occupied by Mr. Mencer, John Mateer, and Frederick Hoffman, and at the extreme east end was the gate-house of the turnpike. Another toll-house was soon after built, to take the place of this one, and it was removed into a more central location, and became the first shop of the town. It has been for more than half a century occupied as a shoe-shop by Alexander Dysart. Altogether there were twelve houses on the north side of the street in 1812.

On the south side of the street there were seven. The first one which would appear to a traveler approaching the village from the east was a small house owned by Mrs. Jane Dysart. Back of it was another log habitation. These houses were built by Martin Krider, probably in 1810. They were not within the limits of the town proper. Going west, the next house was a two-story brick, built by Mr. Mancer, and now owned and occupied by James A. Patterson. Near the upper corner of the square was a double log house, which was built by Perry Woods. It is now weather-boarded. The building now occupied as a newspaper office by Mr. Hoffer was not in existence in the period of which we write, but was erected by John Brindler about 1817. The next house, now used as a restaurant by James Mooney, was built in 1816, and owned until very recently by Robert Dysart. Then came the Red Lion tavern, built by a Mr. Navy, a cabinet-maker. It forms a part of the present large building. The original structure was occupied at different periods both for store and tavern purposes, its best-known proprietor in the latter being Oakey Henderson, who began as landlord about 1818, and kept it for many years. Just before coming to the Marietta turnpike the traveler would see the two houses now owned by Messrs. McFarland and Longnecker. The first of these, like Myers', on the opposite side of the turnpike, was probably built before the town was laid out. This house was owned by David McNeely, from Bucks County, who added a second story, and the adjoining one by his son, who bore the same name and was a captain.

On Donegal Street, the first house on the south side was a small one, built prior to 1812 by a weaver named Snell, who lived in it during the war. Andrew and Nancy Dysart, father and mother of Robert and Alexander Dysart, lived in a double log house on the right-hand side of the street, nearly opposite Snell's. This house was built by Alexander Patterson. Farther westward was the log residence of John Hayes, who owned a number of lots on this street.

On Barbara Street there were in 1812 ten houses, five of which were on the northern side. The first, counting from the east, belonged to a Widow Tod, and the next, a small log, to one Craig, while the third, a double log house, was occupied by James Laird, the fourth was the property of John Alsbaugh, a cooper, and the fifth a house which John Mateer had built for his daughter, a widow. On the south side of the street, James Laird had a butcher-shop at the corner of the street which runs north and south through the square, and a little west of this street was the residence of the Donahue family, of which one of the sons, James, is still a resident of the borough. Still farther west were the houses of Mrs. Sherrer and Mary Eshelman, and the last of the five was a small log house owned by Joseph Lytle and built before the town was laid out. This was on the lot now owned by McFarland and Breneman.

These were all the houses in Rohrerstown during the period of the second war with Great Britain, but many others were built soon after its close, among them the Bell school-house. In the mean time, however, another town had been platted, which was ultimately to be merged with that which we have described.

Richland.—The period of the war of 1812 was one prolific in projects for land speculation, and among them was the laying out of a town at the cross-roads as a rival of Rohrerstown. This flat embraced lands lying both north and south of the turnpike from Lancaster to Harrisburg, in Mount Joy and Donegal townships, and included the old "Cross-Keys" tavern, which was spoken of at the outset of this chapter. The lands lying in proximity to this tavern had been owned by Michael Nichols. The deeds set forth that his executors sold to Peter Linderwood and Peter Bishop, who sold to Christian Leib, who in turn sold to John Bartruff, of Manheim, and that he then laid out one hundred and twenty-two lots in 1812. It also appears that Hoffer and Roth were engaged in the enterprise, and it is certain that their plans in laying out the town were not consummated until 1814, and even then many of the lots were not sold. Richland did not grow so fast as Rohrerstown, but made some progress. The taverns of Richland and Rohrerstown did a more thriving business than any other institution, and their patronage was derived principally from the teamsters of the great Conestoga wagons. One old resident of Mount Joy says that he has often seen at early day over fifty of these teams, each of four horses, quartered for the night at the stables of the two taverns, while the drivers crowded the houses to their utmost capacity.

As time passed on the lands lying along the turnpike between Rohrerstown and Richland were platted in lots by small parcels. The first was the triangular piece of ground lying between Main Street, the Marietta turnpike, and Delta Street. This five and a half acres was covered with timber when it was bought by Christian Choick, in 1828, for eight hundred dollars. He cleared it and laid it out in lots in 1830.

In 1834 or the following year Jacob Walleck (or Wallich), who had a long, narrow strip of land running across the Lancaster and Harrisburg turnpike to the Manheim road, laid it off in eighty lots, which he disposed of by a lottery. He removed to the West not long after this transaction, some features in which had made him unpopular.

Henry Eshelman laid out a small addition on the south side of the pike and several others surveyed off a few lots, while George Myers laid out what was called the "Richland extension."

Lots were sold in all of these plats and buildings erected, and the two original villages gradually grew together and became practically one, which slowly and evenly increased in population and prosperity.

Incorporation as a Borough.—Mount Joy was incorporated as a borough by act of the Assembly passed Feb. 10, 1851, and its boundaries were made to include Rohrerstown, Richland, and the several other plots or additions lying between them, and upon April 1st of that year the following persons, having received a majority of the votes, were, by Justice of the Peace J. Shertzer, installed as the first officers, viz.: Burgess, Joseph Hougendobler; Clerk, Jacob Stauffer; Treasurer, A. Evangelical Lutheran Church of the Holy Trinity.—Originally the Lutherans of this neighborhood formed a part of the Maytown congregation, but in the year 1827 the Mount Joy members resolved to form a church of their own. They at first met in the school-house, but the society increasing in size they built a church in 1829 (the corner-stone being laid August 15th, on which occasion there was preaching in both English and German). The building committee consisted of the following persons: Samuel Dyer, John Beard, Peter Lindenmuth, Henry Waltman. The society was organized and the church built under the pastoral care of Rev. J. Frederick Ruthrauff, who commenced his labors with the congregation Dec. 15, 1827. He remained as pastor until March 15, 1832, when he was succeeded by Rev. John H. Berneheim. After the severance of his connection with the church, in 1833, Rev. P. Sahn became pastor, and remained until 1835. Since that time to the present the pulpit has been filled by the following ministers, viz.: Rev. Miller, 1835-38; L. Gerhart, 1838-45; W. Heilig, 1845-49; J. W. Menges, 1849-50; G. W. Scheide, for period of three months; J. B. Christ, 1852-55; William G. Laitzell, 1856-62; D. P. Rosenmiller, six months, 1865; a Committee of Conference, 1866-67; J. W. Early, 1867-68; F. W. Weiskatlin, 1868-78; G. H. Trabert, 1873-77; H. J. H. Lamicke, 1877-81. Since the last date the congregation has been served by a Committee of Conference.

United Brethren.—As nearly as can be ascertained, there was preaching by the United Brethren in Mount Joy as early as 1820. Revs. Neidig, Rupp, and the Lights (Felix, John, and Casper) were for years accustomed to preach in what was known as the Old Bell School-house, which was used as a preaching-place by a number of ministers of different denominations before they had their own churches. In 1860 a class was organized in Mount Joy, with George Geyer as leader. He kept up regular class and prayer-meetings for a number of years. In 1865-66, Rev. L. Peters, who was then preaching on Lancaster Circuit, took up a Sunday afternoon appointment in the Lutheran Church of this place, and thus prepared the way for the building of a house of worship. Accordingly the Quarterly Conference of Lancaster Circuit assembled at Springville (now Florin) May 25, 1867, appointed George Geyer, S. S. Royer, George Eby, John Miller, and John Shroff as trustees, with instructions to build a church in Mount Joy, in conformity with the discipline of the United Brethren in Christ. The corner-stone was laid July 28, 1867, by Revs. E. Light and W. S. H. Keys, D.D., and the church building dedicated Jan. 19, 1868, by Bishop J. J. Glosbrenner, D.D., assisted by E. Light, Father Stehman, I. Carpenter, and others. The church edifice was erected under the pastorate of Revs. Hackman and Evers, at an aggregate cost of seven thousand dollars, about five thousand dollars of which amount was paid at the time of dedication and the remainder in 1875, during the pastorate of Rev. J. W. Etter, at which time the interior was also refitted at considerable expense. At the Annual Conference of 1868, Rev. D. O. Farrell was appointed to the circuit and served one year, after which Rev. J. C. Mumma served two years. At the Annual Conference held in Mountville, Pa., March 8, 1871, Mount Joy was constituted a station, embracing Strickler's Church and the town of Mount Joy, and Rev. John Fohl appointed the pastor for one year. The church was served from 1872 to 1875 by Rev. J. R. Meredith, and from 1875 to 1877 by Rev. J. W. Etter. In 1876, Strickler's Church was detached from Mount Joy and united with Spring Garden Circuit. In 1878 a parsonage was built adjoining the church at a cost of about two thousand five hundred dollars, under the pastorate of Rev. J. K. Fisher. In 1879, Rev. M. P. Doyle, of the Allegheny Conference, was appointed preacher in charge until 1881, when he was succeeded by Rev. G. W. M. Rigor, who served two years. The church, since 1868, has been steadily growing in numerical strength and moral influence, and now numbers one hundred and twelve members. Rev. J. W. Etter is the present pastor.

Methodist Episcopal Church.—There was a class-meeting organized here about 1834, of twenty members, of which Samuel Meldrum was the leader. Susquehanna Mission was a circuit, of which Mount Joy was one of the appointments, and the years and preachers as they appear in the general minutes are as follows: 1836, T. B. Tibbles; 1837, T. B. Tibbles and J. A. Watson; 1838, T. Sumption; 1839-40, H. Sutton; 1841, J. Edwards; 1842, J. Edwards and J. H. Wythe; 1848, E. Reed and J. W. Arthur; 1844,

The church was chartered Sept. 2, 1867. The parsonage, valued at $1500, on the same lot as the church, was built in 1877, and has a debt of $1000.

The number of members and probationers is seventy-five; the Sabbath-school, sixteen officers and teachers; seventy-five scholars.

The official members of the church are: Trustees, H. H. Mellinger (president), W. H. Metzgar (secretary), E. M. Trexler (treasurer), A. H. Comp, W. C. T. Reed, A. B. Cling, B. M. First Presbyterian Church.<sup>1</sup>—This church was organized by the Rev. E. Phelps, of the Third Presbytery of Philadelphia, assisted by the Rev. William Ramsey, of the First Presbytery of Philadelphia, on the 1st day of December, 1839, and consisted at that time of eighteen members. William D. Slaymaker and John H. Brown were elected as elders, and David McNeely and Amos H. Slaymaker as deacons. Rev. James W. Phillips, of the Presbytery of Winchester, was unanimously elected pastor Feb. 8, 1840, and installed by the Presbytery of Harrisburg on the 19th of June succeeding. The charter of the church was obtained Aug. 4, 1840, and the present house of worship was erected that year. The trustees under the charter, who presumably superintended the building, were Joseph Pinkerton, David McNeely, Sr., Amos H. Slaymaker, James W. Hendrickson, and James Laird. Rev. James W. Phillips, the first pastor, resigned his charge in the spring of 1841, and from the fall of that year until February, 1845, Rev. H. Loomis served as stated supply. Rev. J. Miller was called as pastor in March, 1845, and resigned in the spring of 1847, being succeeded by Rev. Franklin Harris as stated supply from 1847 to September, 1850. Rev. J. L. Rodgers was elected pastor in May, 1852, installed in November, and remained until 1856. The church in 1852 was transferred, at its own request, from the care of the Presbytery of Harrisburg to the Presbytery of Donegal. In the summer of the same year the church building was removed. Resuming the succession of ministers, we find that the Rev. James Smith was called as pastor in 1857, and resigned after eleven years' service, in 1868. The Rev. John Edgar was elected to fill his place Jan. 13, 1869, installed in April, and resigned in April, 1870. The Rev. James Campbell was given a call in December, 1870, but after supplying the church for three months declined to accept the call. From September, 1871, to April, 1880, the church was served by the Rev. W. B. Browne as stated supply. The Rev. C. B. Whitcomb was called as pastor in November, 1880, installed in April, 1882, and the pastoral relation was dissolved by the Presbytery Sept. 28, 1882. The Presbytery the same month appointed Rev. Robert Gamble as stated supply until the next meeting of the Presbytery, in April, 1883, when, on the unanimous request of the church and congregation, he was again appointed as a supply for six months. The elders elected since the organization of the church have been David McNeely, Sr., Dr. A. Sheller, E. F. Witmer, Jacob Stauffer, Rev. N. Dodge, Thomas G. Wright, S. C. Pinkerton, and John McFarland. Three of the elders died while members of the session, viz., David McNeely, Sr., Rev. N. Dodge, and Dr. A. Sheller. John H. Browne, William D. Slaymaker, Jacob Stauffer, and E. F. Witmer, having removed from the bounds of the church and received their certificates of membership, ceased to act as elders. The present officers of the church are Rev. Robert Gamble, stated supply and moderator of sessions; Thomas G. Wright, S. C. Pinkerton, and John McFarland, elders. The trustees are John Pinkerton, John McFarland, S. C. Pinkerton, Simon J. Eby, and S. S. P. Lytle.

The Evangelical Church.—The first book of records of this church has been lost; but the deed of the lot on which its house of worship stands shows that it was bought Oct. 18, 1843, of D. Maurer. The trustees of the church at that time must have been David Grissinger and Lewis Halmner, of Richland (by which name the western portion of what is now this borough was called), and C. Hannobeger, of Mount Joy township,—at least they were the persons to whom the property was deeded. The same year that this lot was purchased, Rev. John Hensel then being pastor, a church edifice was erected. This was used for thirty-seven years, or until 1880, when the present structure was built. It was dedicated by Rev. W. H. Hershey July 25th, and since July 25, 1881, the society which worships in it has been served by the present pastor, Rev. J. W. Hoover.

St. Mary's Catholic Church.—There being no Catholic Church in Mount Joy, the Rev. Anthony F. Kaul, rector of St. Anthony's Church, Lancaster, took measures in the spring of 1879 to organize a congregation with the few families located there and in the immediate vicinity.

He selected the lots corner of David and New Haven Streets, and purchased the same from Henry Garber for four hundred and fifty dollars. He erected a two story brick building thirty-six by forty feet, of which the first floor is used as a chapel, and the second is a hall divided into rooms suitable for school and parochial residence.

For two years it was attended by Rev. A. Kaul, then the Rev. Charles McMonigle attended for one year, and now Rev. Jules Foin, of Elizabethtown, has charge.

Schools.<sup>1</sup>—The excellence of the public schools the borough of Mount Joy now enjoys had its inception in the old log school-house, which is known as the East Ward Bell school-house. It was built in 1817, on the southern terminus of what is now called Barbara Street. In the little village of Richland, now a part of Mount Joy, nine years later, in 1826, was founded by subscription Richland Academy. This school flourished several years, and at the same time the building was used as a church by different denominations of the community. Later Richland Academy building was used for a public school, known as the West Ward Bell. At that time Mount Joy had the East and the West Ward Bell school-houses and three primary schools,—one in the little brick building near the Mount Joy Academy, a second in the brick school-house on Cemetery road, and another in the frame house on West Donegal Street. In 1855 the West Ward Bell School was organized into a high school, the East Ward Bell and the brick school-house on Cemetery road being used for secondary schools. Another primary school about ten years later was established in the Council chamber on Market Street. In these buildings the schools were conducted until March, 1878. For a decade prior to this time the old log and frame buildings were in a dilapidated condition. There was a crying demand for more suitable accommodations. After a long-continued agitation a fine school-building was erected on a central site, which commands a fine view in any direction. It is a two and a half story building of brick, erected at a cost, including heating apparatus, furniture, and ground, at upwards of twenty thousand dollars. The building, which can accommodate four hundred children, is admirably adapted for them in every particular. The design and its execution reflects credit on Architect Albert N. Dabb and H. H. Nissley, builder, and equally creditable is it to the board of directors, Messrs. John Plinkerton, Benjamin Hostetter, P. A.

Pyle, Peter Brunner, A. D. Hostetter, and Benjamin Root, during whose administration the school-house was erected.

In March, 1878, the schools were transferred to this building, and for the remainder of the term the schools were conducted by the same teachers who taught in the old buildings. In the fall of 1878 the organization of the schools was completed by increasing the number of primary schools from three to four. The corps of teachers embraced seven, including the principal, Mr. Douglass Patterson, of Princeton College, class of 1852. Under his efficient supervision the schools reached a high standard of excellence. At one time there were attending the high school ten pupils, who, the following winter, commenced to teach in the public schools in various parts of the county. Of the schools one who is competent to judge, County Superintendent B. F. Shaub, in his annual report, said, "All the schools of Mount Joy borough were in very good condition. An examination of the work of these schools, now on exhibition in Pennsylvania Educational Hall, will convince any one of the neatness, thoroughness, general excellence, and extended scope of the same."

Among the names of the educators who are prominently identified with the school history of Mount Joy are Rev. N. Dodge, A.M., E. L. Moore, David Denlinger, Matthew Marble, D. M. Martin, and Douglass Patterson.

Rev. Dodge established Cedar Hill Female Seminary in 1837. Young ladies from eleven different States attended this institution. The name of the school was changed to Cedar Hill Seminary in 1874, when Professor D. Denlinger took charge of the school, instructing pupils of both sexes. It is now a defunct institution.

In 1838, J. H. Brown founded the Mount Joy Institute for boys. This school is not in operation.

Mount Joy Academy was chartered in 1851. E. L. Moore and J. W. Simonton were associate principals. This building is now used for a soldiers' orphans' school.

Mount Joy Soldiers' Orphans' School.—The friendless condition of two soldiers' orphans, clad in rags and timidly asking for bread at the Executive mansion, Harrisburg, on Thanksgiving-day, 1863, inspired the patriotic soul of the old "War Governor" with the idea of founding homes and asylums to adopt and educate at the State's expense the children of her fallen dead. The grand thought of Curtin, directed by his untiring energy and stalwart policy, prepared the press and the public to receive and organize his beneficent scheme of placing the destitute and fatherless under the State's providence. It was hailed as a promise to the soldier redeemed. His wife and little ones would be protected, and the loyal heart of the old "Keystone" would dedicate to her fallen sons a beautiful temple of justice, not charity, for her widows and orphans.

Professor J. P. Wickersham, then principal of the State Normal School at Millersville, was requested to prepare a bill embodying the leading ideas and features of the system, which was to be laid before the Legislature. The carefully-prepared bill of Wickersham, after many lengthy discussions, was curtailed to a special enactment instructing the Governor to appropriate the fifty thousand dollar donation of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to the State for the use and protection of the soldier's widow and child. On the 16th of June, 1864, Hon. Thomas H. Burrowes, LL.D., was commissioned superintendent of soldiers' orphans and requested to continue the good work. The several features of the defeated bill were incorporated in the scheme of Burrowes and presented to the Executive. It received his approval, and became the basis of future operations. Homes were secured in the various sections of the State. The Old Guard opened its doors, through Professor J. R. Carothers, at Strasburg, in November of the same year. His school was formally opened on the 20th of December, 1864. But the accommodations being inadequate, the academy buildings at Mount Joy were purchased of Professor E. L. Moore, A.M., and the sixty-four orphans in attendance transferred thither during the annual vacation of 1865. This vacation began July 28th and ended September 4th.

The change from Strasburg to Mount Joy not only secured better facilities to the school, but was an advantage to it in other respects. Its location was now a most desirable one. In a small rural town, beautifully situated, healthful in climate and environments, possessing excellent railroad conveniences, in proximity to Lancaster and Harrisburg, and reputed for the large number of its excellent citizens were certainly all that taste and comfort could desire. The building, a three-story substantial stone structure, with two-story structures of same material on east and west sides, presented an inviting appearance. This edifice is still occupied, and has a beautiful yard in front, laid out in walks and shaded with trees.

The institution continued under the management of Carothers. Additions were made to buildings, and the number of pupils were steadily increasing. Principal Carothers, however, did not satisfy the State authorities in his supervision. A change was contemplated by the school department. Finally Professor Jesse Kennedy, then principal of the McAlisterville S. O. School, was prevailed upon to purchase the property at Mount Joy and assume control of that school. He took possession on the 1st day of December, 1867.

The reputation of Kennedy inspired public confidence. His efficient administration attracted children to the school until there were in attendance nearly three hundred pupils. Improvements were made in yards and buildings, requiring large expenditures of money. The institution rapidly rose in rank to a position among the best of the State.

The various departments of the school were organized under a code of thorough system in this administration, and the discipline characterized by strict conformity to the method and practice of parental authority in the old New England home. During the ten years Mr. Kennedy was principal of this school he educated and schooled for the active duties of life quite a number of young men and women, whose life and influence have been an honorable testimony of his careful training and instruction.

Congressional aspirations induced Kennedy to negotiate with Senator George W. Wright, of Mercér County, Pa., for the sale of the school property. It was bought, and Senator Wright took possession in September, 1877. The change was again a fortunate one. The new proprietor combined with keen executive ability a long and successful experience in schools of this kind. He fully understood the wants and necessities and wisely anticipated the wishes of his students. The comfort and happiness of the children were made prominent features. A home feeling was created that moulded a sentiment for this institution among officials and the public as "a pleasant and happy children's home." New pupils were admitted, swelling the attendance to three hundred and thirty-five, the maximum, and averaging through the ensuing years to the present about three hundred per annum. A two-story frame building was erected; play-rooms for inclement weather built; pipes conducting water from the town reservoir were laid and distributed to the various departments; other changes were made calculated to strengthen the comfort and convenience of the institution; a milder policy in the general discipline of the school was inaugurated, and a new era dawned upon its already prosperous record. Happy days and a contented spirit prevailed among the wards, time sped unconsciously, and warmest words were spoken by its occupants.

Among the principal instructors employed from its foundation were I. M. Gable, from 1869 to 1872, now a minister of the Methodist Episcopal Church; George G. Kunkle, three years principal teacher, and now superintendent public schools, Bethlehem, Pa.; George W. Geiger, two years, now engaged in some Western business; Joseph M. Martin, from 1877 to spring of 1880, now financial clerk of firm of Williamson & Foster, Lancaster, Pa.; M. J. Brecht, from 1880 to fall of 1883, now superintendent of public schools Lancaster County; and J. B. Hipple, a young man of recognized professional merit, its present principal and educator.

Col. Wright has continued as the able manager of the home. While engrossed in various business interests, he ever jealously guarded the trust confided to his charge. Hundreds have gone out from his fostering care to combat with life's difficulties to achieve honor and distinction. A brief résumé of the inner life in the institution under the senator's administration will give the reader a more intelligent idea of the nature and object of these schools. The boys wear a full blue cadet uniform, with State buttons, while the girls are well dressed in neat modern styles of flannel and Gerster goods. Personal cleanliness is taught, and all the children receive regularly an entire bath once a week. The industrial training receives marked attention. Every child obtains daily practice in the regular routine labor of domestic and farm work. The girls are taught to sew by hand and machine, to cut and fit ordinary clothing, to do fancy work, to handle the flat-iron as well as the pen or drawing-pencil.

In moral and religious culture, the child has been taught to appreciate the beautiful in life, the excellent in character. Sabbath-school has been held in the home every Sabbath. Church attendance is enjoined as a regular Sabbath duty. Worship, accompanied by scriptural talks, has been held regularly morning and evening in the chapel.

Visitors are always welcome. Each department is thrown open to public inspection every day. The management encourage visits, as shown by the royal way it takes care of them while guests. Military instruction is given the boys daily. They must master the evolutions of army discipline, together with the manual of arms.

The Mount Joy school enjoys the esteem of the intelligent community in which it is located, and stands high in the affections of the orphans and their mothers. It has done and is doing a noble work, of which the State may be justly proud.

Banking.—The first financial establishment in the borough was the Mount Joy Savings Institution, which was incorporated in 1853. By a supplement to its charter this was made, in 1860, the Mount Joy Bank, and in 1865 it was organized, under the national banking law, with the name Union National Mount Joy Bank. At the time of the original organization, in 1853, Henry Eberle was made president and Andrew Gerber secretary and treasurer. In 1860, J. G. Hoerner was elected president, and in 1865 he was re-elected, and still holds the office. Jacob R. Long, the present cashier, has held that position since 1856. Originally the capital of the bank was $50,000, and it is now $125,000.

Manufacturing forms, in proportion to the size of the town, quite an extensive industry. The earliest enterprises in this line were of the kind common to all villages, wagon-making and blacksmithing. The earliest manufacture of other character than these was that undertaken by one Brady, who early in the twenties began making axes upon a small scale. The business was subsequently carried on by his sons, who enlarged it and for a time were very successful, but finally abandoned the industry when larger works in other localities came into competition with them. Following are brief notes upon the most important of the present manufactories:

The agricultural implement works conducted by Messrs. Marsh & Comp were established in 1853 by a stock company. In 1857–58, Marsh Brothers came in possession of the works, and carried it on until 1872, when they were succeeded by John A. Grier. He in turn was succeeded by the present firm in 1876. This firm has materially enlarged its facilities for manufacturing, and has several extensive buildings, in which about thirty men are employed. They manufacture improved mowers and reapers, land-rollers, separators, portable engines, and other heavy machinery.

Another large manufactory of farm machinery is carried on by the firm of Geyer & Metzler, which grew out of and is the commercial descendant of John Snyder, who began the manufacture of edge-tools in Mount Joy about 1848, and five years later entered upon the manufacture of threshing-machines, horse-powers, etc. In 1872 the firm of Walgemuth & Geyer was formed, and continued the business up to the death of the senior partner in 1876. The present partnership was formed in 1881, and the manufacture of reapers, mowers, threshing-machines, separators, horse-powers, engines, and boilers continued and enlarged.

The Mount Joy Roller Process Flouring-Mills, conducted by Brandt & Manning, were erected in 1855 by Gabriel Bear. J. M. Brandt rented the mill in 1867, and purchased it in 1873. In 1881 he took Mr. Manning into partnership, and very soon thereafter the Hungarian process rollers were substituted for the old-fashioned burrs. This necessitated an addition to the original mill, which is substantially built of stone, four stories in height, and covering an area forty-five by fifty feet. In 1882 a Chase (Chicago) elevator was erected, which affords storage room for upwards of twenty-five thousand bushels of grain. Fifteen men are employed, and a seventy-five horse-power engine is used to propel the machinery. The output of this mill is about one hundred and fifty barrels per day.

The Landis Coach-Works, one of the most important manufacturing establishments in the borough, employing about twenty-five men, and turning out excellent work upon an extensive scale, are carried on by A. B. Landis. The works were established by Christian Landis, in 1824, in East Hempfield, and removed to Mount Joy in 1858 by the present proprietor, who succeeded his father in 1843. Mr. Landis has a very large Southern, as well as Northern, patronage, and his manufactory is constantly run to its fullest capacity.

D. Root, Son & Co. are engaged in the manufacture of plows, cultivators, corn-planter, corn-shellers, shovel-plows, harrows, etc. The business was commenced at Bird-in-Hand, in 1851, by D. Root, and removed to Mount Joy in 1868. Mr. B. M. Root was admitted to a partnership at that time. In 1877 the firm was reorganized, it then being composed of B. M., A. F., and A. B. Root. In the fall of 1881, A. F.

Root's interest was transferred to A. D. Root, and the present partnership was thus formed. This firm has a building of stone, three stories high, and sixty by twenty-five feet in extent, and several others aggregating several times that area. The buildings are supplied with the best machinery, and it is driven by a seventy-five horse-power engine.

The Mount Joy Gray Iron Casting Company was founded in 1881 for the manufacture of H. S. Stauffer's patent post support and Sholl's reversible blind and shutter drop-hinge. Other specialties were afterwards added until a full line of small hardware articles and toys were produced. The business was originally established by Mr. Stauffer, and Mr. S. N. Eby afterwards became a partner. The works employ about twenty-five men, are supplied with a twenty horse-power engine, and have a melting cupola of three tons capacity.

The Mount Joy Malt-House, owned by Philip Frank, employs twelve men in the manufacture of superior malt from Canadian barley. The proprietor began buying and selling grain on a small scale in 1856, and entered his present line of business in 1858. His malt obtained such a reputation that he was soon obliged to erect the building which he now occupies, containing five floors, and covering a space forty by one hundred and seventy-four feet.

Furniture was manufactured in Mount Joy many years ago by Martin Spickler. He was bought out in 1874 by D. H. Engle, who, having enlarged the facilities for manufacturing, is now doing an extensive business.

The Press.—The Mount Joy Herald, which is the leading journal of the town, is one of the oldest newspapers in Lancaster County outside of the city. It was originated in 1854 by Frank H. Stauffer, who is now a popular writer of fiction. In 1863, J. R. Hoffer, the present owner and publisher, bought it from Mr. Stauffer, assuming active control in March of that year. It was started as a four-column folio, but soon enlarged to a six-column folio. With the exception of widening the columns to thirteen and a half ems primer, Mr. Hoffer published the Herald in the same size and form until 1880, when he supplied the office with a cylinder press and steam-power, and enlarged the paper to an eight-column folio. The Herald is and ever has been Republican in politics, and is a valuable local journal ably conducted.

The Star and News, as its name implies, is the product of a consolidation of two newspapers. These were the Milton Grove News and the Mount Joy Star. The latter paper was originally published in Mastersville, on the 8th of November, 1872, by David Courtney and Joseph Stigler, and was a five-column folio. Mr. Courtney retired, and Mr. Stigler removed the paper to this place in April, 1878, where it was rechristened the Mount Joy Star, and soon transferred to L. M. and Harry Gallagher, whose names first appeared at its column head on May 14th. One year later Harry Gallagher retired, L. M. Gallagher remaining as editor and L. D. Gallagher becoming proprietor. The paper at this time was enlarged to seven columns, and during the year L. M. Gallagher became proprietor. In January, 1878, L. D. Gallagher became the publisher, and Milton M. Leib the editor. The other branch of the paper was started March 20, 1875, by J. R. Missemer and S. L. Brandt, under the title of the Milton Grove News, with J. J. Sprenger, of Lancaster, as publisher. After one year's life it was suspended, but was revived Nov. 23, 1876, by J. R. Missemer, editor and proprietor. The papers were merged in 1879 under the title as given at the outset of this paragraph. It has since been conducted by J. R. Missemer, and of late changed from the old form to a six-column quarto.

Water-Works add to the attractiveness of the town as a place of residence. They were built in 1873-74 by the borough, the action having been authorized by a vote taken in 1872. The borough secured water-supply and water-power by purchasing the old Hiestand mill, on Little Chikis Creek. The water is forced from here to a large reservoir on the ridge by the Mount Joy Cemetery, whence it flows through mains to nearly all parts of the town, affording an effective means for fighting fire, as well as for sprinkling the streets and grass-plats. The cost of the works, with the mill, was forty thousand dollars. The building committee consisted of Samuel Kurtz, William Kuhn, and John M. Brandt. From the first William Kuhn has been superintendent, and he is at present in that office.

Gas-Works were constructed in 1879 by a chartered corporation organized by T. S. C. Lowe. Most of the business houses and some residences are lighted by the medium which these works furnish, but the consumption is not large.

Friendship Fire Company, No. 1, was organized Jan. 27, 1868. The officers then elected were: President, Henry Shaffner; Vice-Presidents, H. B. Dunlap, John A. Grier; Secretary, F. A. Ricker; Assistant Secretary, J. E. Hoffer; Treasurer, A. B. Landis; Chief Engineer, R. P. Kelly; Assistant Engineers, M. Himelspark, Aaron Smaling, Henry H. Kriner, W. F. Brown, Henry S. Coover, James F. Youtz, George Buckius, Jr.; Chief Hose Director, Robert Whitehead; Assistant Hose Directors, F. G. Pennell, William McNeal, Jr., J. G. Metzger, Henry Peffer, Albert Culp, Jonas E. Risser, W. H. H. Gillums; Investigating Committee, J. W. Gilbert, A. B. Culp, H. H. Kriner; Trustees, William Brady, Charles C. Marsh, John Hildebrand; Collector, Jacob Shelley; Messenger, Col. F. E. Nagle. The members who organized the company on the 27th day of January, 1868, were Henry Shaffner, H. B. Dunlap, John A. Grier, F. A. Ricker, J. E. Hoffer, A. B. Landis, R. P. Kelly, W. F. Brown, Henry S. Coover, James F. Youtz, Michael Himelspark, Aaron Smaling, Henry H. Kriner, George Buckius, Robert Whitehead, F. G. Pen-nell, William McNeal, Jr., J. G. Metzger, Henry Pef-fer, Albert Culp, Jonas E. Risser, A. B. Culp, W. H. H. Gillums, John W. Gilbert, Jacob Shelley, John Hildebrand, Harry H. Nissley, Jerry Hagy, William Brady, John L. Gates, J. V. Long, W. R. Hartman, A. S. Brady, J. T. Miles, Owen P. Bricker, William C. Grier, Stephen J. Owens, Peter Waltz, Charles C. Marsh, Harrison Helman, John Fenstermacher, Cuvier Spangler, Lewis Grogg, L. D. Gallagher, J. D. Good, H. Sholl, Col. F. E. Nagle, M. P. Seltzer, John A. Huber, Samuel Riddle, Michael Dräbenstadt, James Bell, A. B. Welsh, J. S. Welsh, Henry Helman, Jacob S. Carter, B. M. Greider, John H. Dulabon, S. Donovan, A. K. Martin, Jacob Fenstermacher, Samuel Kurtz, Philip A. Pyle, Levi Ricksecker, H. Austin Brady.

The membership at present is the same in numbers as it was at the date of organization. The company is supported by an annual appropriation from the borough Council; has a good first-class Button & Blake hand-engine, which, however, has been in disuse since 1875, as a pressure sufficient to throw water over any house in town is placed on the pipes direct from the water-works in time of fire.

The present officers are: President, Levi Ricksecker; Vice-Presidents, M. Himelspark and Peter Waltz; Secretary, F. G. Pennell; Treasurer, Phillip A. Pyle; Chief Engineer, S. M. Warner; Chief Hose Director, M. Himelspark.

Casiphia Lodge, No. 551, F. and A. M.—This lodge was constituted Sept. 21, 1877, with eighteen charter members. The first officers were J. V. Long, W. M.; Rev. William B. Brown, S. W.; R. N. Long, J. W. Meetings are held Friday, on or before the full moon of each month, in a room over Phillip Pyle's drug-store expressly fitted up for Masonic purposes. The present number of members is forty-nine, and the lodge is in excellent financial condition. The present officers are Henry N. Nissley, W. M.; Dr. James P. Zeigler, S. W.; Henry L. Stager, J. W.; and William M. Speva, Treas.

Mount Joy Lodge, No. 277, I. O. of O. F.—This lodge was chartered by the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, Nov. 7, 1847. Its first officers were: N. G., John Kolp; V. G., Robert Dysart; Sec., Jacob L. Nagle; Asst. Sec., John L. Long; Treas., John Patterson. The present officers are: N. G., J. B. Hipple; V. G., Harrison Helman; Sec., F. G. Pennell; Asst. Sec., C. M. Hershey; Treas., Levi Ricksecker; Trustees, J. V. Long, William Kuhn, and O. M. Hershey. The present number of members is sixty-three. The lodge meets on Tuesday evening of each week in a well-furnished hall; pays to its sick or disabled members five dollars per week benefits, one hundred dollars on the death of a member, and fifty dollars on the death of a member's wife. The lodge has at the present time a well-invested fund of over five thousand dollars.

Cave Lodge, No. 301, K. of P.—This lodge was instituted June 22, 1871. The officers then elected were: V. P., W. S. Bruckart; W. C., Joseph A. Schlegelmilch; V. C., M. M. Brubaker; R. S., J. Vernor Long; F. S., J. W. Roland; Banker, B. F. Eberle; Guide, Harry Sholl; I. S., Henry B. Culp; O. S., Henry F. Brandt. The lodge has a membership at present of one hundred and twelve. On July 1, 1873, the titles of the various officers were changed by the Sovereign Grand Lodge. The present officers are: C. C., William Mooney; V. C., Dr. John J. Newpher; Prelate, S. M. Rupp; M. at A., J. B. S. Zeller; M. of E., M. Himelspark; M. of F., M. M. Brubaker; K. of R. and S., F. G. Pennell; I. G., John W. Brandt; O. G., George Haines.

A. B. Culp was made Sachem, R. P. Kelly, Senior Sagamore, and Mr. Eberle, Treas. The lodge has now fifty-eight members, and is in a flourishing condition, having about sixteen hundred dollars invested in various ways for its own use.

Cemeteries.—The oldest incorporated cemetery association is that which established and now controls Mount Joy Cemetery, which consists of six acres of land on a gently rising ridge, just north of the borough. This land, together with two acres since sold to the borough, to afford a site for the water-works reservoir, was purchased from Peter Heilman, soon after the association was formed in 1868. It has since been very tastefully laid out, and richly beautified by the planting of ornamental trees and shrubbery. Nearly eight hundred and fifty burials have been made in the cemetery during the twenty years since it was laid out. The records show that the date of incorporation was Aug. 19, 1863, and the incorporators B. M. Greider, John Myers, George Wenger, C. M. Martin, Henry Stager, F. A. Ricker, David Brady, Henry Bechtold, S. P. Beckley, David U. Stoner, Alexander Patterson, Lewis P. Brudy, J. M. Culp, F. H. Stauffer, Dr. J. L. Zeigler, A. G. Good, H. H. Landis, Samuel Eshelman, J. R. Hoffer, Henry S. Myers, Alexander D. Reese, Peter Bruner. The officers were: President, George Wenger; Secretary, J. R. Hoffer; Treasurer, B. M. Groider; Superintendent, Jacob Lawrence.

JAMES AGNEW PATTERSON.

The subject of this biographical sketch is the grandson of James and Margaret Agnew Patterson and the son of James and Mary Watson Patterson. The ancestry of the family having been more fully given in the sketch of Judge D. W. Patterson, renders repetition here unnecessary. James Agnew was born Sept. 26, 1810, in Rapho township, on the east bank of the Little Chikis. His youth was spent on the farm of his parents, the log school-house of the neighborhood, supplemented by a brief season at Mount Joy, affording him all the opportunities for education then at command. He early adopted agriculture as a calling, and soon became proficient in the management of a farm. He was married Nov. 14, 1844, to Miss Sarah M., daughter of Thomas Sterrett, of Rapho township. Their children are Mary W., Martha S., J. Howard, William S., Margaret J., and one who died in infancy. Of these Mary W. and William S. survive. The death of Mrs. Patterson occurred in the fall of 1858. By the removal of his father to Mount Joy, Mr. Patterson, just previous to his marriage, became the occupant of the homestead, on which he resided for several years. He later, desiring a respite from active labor, removed to Mount Joy, which has since been his place of residence. He has been identified with the interests of the borough and active in projects having for their object its advancement. All efforts towards the promotion of the cause of education have received his cordial co-operation; the Mount Joy Academy, now the Soldiers' Orphans' School, numbering him among its earnest supporters. He has also served for several terms as school director.

In politics Mr. Patterson was formerly an Old-Line Whig and an Anti-Mason; and later became a Republican. He is not, however, a strong party man, giving his ballot for men of integrity and capacity irrespective of party ties. He is a gentleman of retired habits of life and of no political aspirations. His name will, therefore, not be found on the roll of office-seekers or those who bear the palm of victory in the struggles for place and preferment. Mr. Patterson is in his religious convictions a Presbyterian, and an elder in the Donegal Church of that denomination.

CHAPTER XXXII.

MANHEIM BOROUGH.

The borough of Manheim is situated ten miles north of Lancaster, and on the Reading and Columbia Railroad. It lies wholly within the township of Rapho, and its eastern boundary is partially co-extensive with it, being the mill-race and the Big Chikis Creek.

The town was originally laid out by Henry William Stiegel, late in the year of 1762. The land was taken up by patent in 1788 by James Logan, and reverted to Isaac Norris, who married a daughter of Logan's. In February of 1762, Isaac Norris and his wife, Sarah, deeded to Alexander and Charles Stedman a tract of seven hundred and twenty-nine acres, and they, in September of the same year, deeded an one-third interest to Henry William Stiegel, who immediately thereafter laid out the town of Manheim. The name of the town was derived from the village of Manheim, in Baden, from whence Stiegel came.

Early History.—At the time of the formation of the town there were two houses standing within its limits. These were both log structures, and one of them is yet standing on South Prussian Street. In 1762 there were five houses standing, at least two of them built by Stiegel. He first built a house on West High Street, near Market Square, afterwards on the northeast corner of East High Street and Market Square. This last house is now standing, though it has been nearly rebuilt, and is now the property of Henry Arndt. The office built by Stiegel, on the corner of North Charlotte Street and Market Square, is still standing. Among the earliest settlers in the borough were the Heintzelman, Minnich, Keiser, Long, Nauman, Wherly, and Stauffer families. John Heintzelman built the first hotel, the Black Horse. This house is now standing upon South Prussian Street, though no longer used as a hotel.

Andrew Bartruff was the first store-keeper. The store was located on North Prussian Street, and was also used for many years as a hotel. It was burned down April 19, 1861. The Spread Eagle Hotel was established about 1804, and owned by John Bartruff.

Legendary History.—Of Henry William Stiegel, or Baron Stiegel, as he is generally called, there are a great many stories told, and though they are probably exaggerated, there may be some foundation in fact. He was certainly a very eccentric character, and of a decidedly energetic and speculative disposition. Upon the top of the house corner High and Prussian Streets, built by him, was a cupola in which was stationed a watchman. Stiegel made frequent trips from Manheim to Elizabeth Furnace in a large coach drawn by four (some say eight) beautiful horses. Upon his approaching the town it was the duty of the watchman to fire a cannon, used for that purpose, to let the people know of his arrival. Immediately upon hearing the sound of the cannon the people flocked to the house, and a band of music, made up from among the employes of the factory, proceeded to the cupola, and the baron made his entrance into the town amidst the firing of the cannon, the sound of music, and the cheers of the inhabitants. Among many tales of his eccentricity is a story of recorded fact that the lots upon which the Evangelical Lutheran Church was built were deeded to them for the consideration of a red rose, to be paid yearly upon demand. It is a matter of record that this was paid at two different times; whether these are the only demands made for the rent it is not possible to state.

Baron Stiegel's Houses.—The second house built by Baron Stiegel was upon the corner of East High Street and Market Square. It was a large square building, made of red brick imported for that purpose. The building was about two and one-half stories in height, and its two principal rooms were a dining-room upon the ground-floor, and a chapel or meeting-room on the second floor. The dining-room contained a fireplace at one end, surrounded by Dutch tiles, and was hung with tapestry representing principally figures of the chase, with life-size paintings of horses, dogs, men, etc. The tapestry was in a good state of preservation when taken down about twelve years ago, and many of the tiles may yet be found in the hands of the older citizens and of connoisseurs in the village. The tapestry is now at the rooms of the Historical Society in Philadelphia. The chapel upon the second floor contained a pulpit, from which the baron was wont to preach to his servants and the employés of the glass-factory. When Stiegel's property was sold by the sheriff in 1779 this house was bought by Michael Dieffenderfer, who sold it to William Bauseman. It was afterwards owned by Robert Morris, then James Jenkins. The building is now the property of Henry Arndt, and though its interior arrangement is entirely changed, the south wall is the same as in the original building up to the second story.

About this time Stiegel built a business office on the corner of High and Charlotte Streets. This was also of red brick, and remains to-day in very nearly the same condition, as regards its outward appearance, as when erected.

Land Titles.—The tract of land upon which Manheim was laid out was taken up by James Logan in 1783, and contained about twelve hundred acres. At Logan's death he willed to Sarah, his daughter, and her husband, Isaac Norris, what remained unsold of this tract, in all about seven hundred and twenty-nine acres. On Feb. 17, 1762, Isaac Norris and Sarah, his wife, deeded to Charles and Alexander Stedman this tract of seven hundred and twenty-nine acres, and September 20th of the same year they deeded to Henry William Stiegel an one-third interest in the same. In 1769 (August 4th) the Stedmans sold their interest in the property to Isaac Cox, who sold to Henry William Stiegel, Feb. 1, 1770. At this time, therefore, Stiegel was the sole proprietor of all the land, excepting such lots as had been sold to individuals, including those lots subject to ground-rent. The lots had been sold in three ways,—in fee-simple, by paying in part for the land and a yearly ground-rent, and making no payment whatever but only paying ground-rent. The rent, when no payment was made, was two dollars and twenty cents per year for each lot, without regard to its situation. On March 30, 1775, the property was sold by the sheriff to Michael Dieffenderfer, who deeded to William Bauseman. At Bauseman's death the property was willed to William B. and John B. Bauseman and Elizabeth Hiester. The heirs of William Bauseman deeded their several interests in the ground-rents to John D. Hiester, who became sole owner. The collecting of the rent was allowed to go by default for some years, and when an attempt was made to collect it met with a great deal of opposition. After many years of strife and opposition to the collection of the rent, suit was brought, in 1866-57, to enforce its payment, and a considerable amount was collected. In 1880 a committee was appointed to make a settlement, and an arrangement was made to pay six thousand five hundred dollars for claims amounting to about thirteen thousand dollars. On March 29, 1881, all the interest of the Hiester heirs to ground-rent in the borough was deeded to a committee, composed of Abraham Kline, Dr. John M. Dunlap, Aaron H. Danner, James W. Numbers, Henry M. Ensminger, who in turn deeded to the individual lot-owners.

Erection of the Borough.—In 1830 the question of making the town a borough and incorporating it was a subject of considerable agitation, and the feeling in regard to the matter ran very high. A large number were in favor of it on account of the additional privileges and benefits to be derived from a separate organization, while its opponents were principally afraid of increased taxation. The matter rested till 1837, when a petition was sent to the Legislature for an act of incorporation, which was granted May 16, 1838. The first officers of the borough were David May, burgess; John Rice, John Musser, John Arndt, Jr., Jacob Stauffer, George Eby, and Samuel Deyer, councilmen; Benjamin Hunsinger, constable; David Fisher, supervisor; Thomas W. Veazey, clerk; Daniel Danner, treasurer. The first meeting of the Borough Council was held at the Central School-House, and the first committee appointed was a committee to examine into the condition of the roads and thoroughfares. The first tax levied was for the sum of two hundred dollars. The number of the taxable population being three hundred and sixty-five, the tax per capita was a little less than sixty cents each. Though this seems a very small amount, it caused considerable grumbling.

Early Industries.—Some time between 1763 and 1768, Baron Stiegel erected a large glass-factory upon the corner of South Charlotte and Stiegel Streets. The building was of red brick, and was a very large one. It is stated that from the ground to the cupola, which surmounted the building, was over one hundred feet. The manufacturing of glassware and glass bottles was carried on quite extensively, skilled workmen being brought from Europe to carry on the work. That a very superior article was produced at these works is evidenced by samples in existence now, and by the following extract from a letter written by David Rittenhouse, of Philadelphia, to Rev. Mr. Barton, of Lancaster. "I am obliged to you for the glass tube; it will make a pretty barometer, though the tube is somewhat too small. I have compared it with an English tube, and do not think the preference can with any reason be given to the latter." In the same letter he asks Mr. Barton to procure him "some tubes of a size fit for spirit-levels." This property was sold by the sheriff in 1779, and after being unoccupied for forty years the building was taken down in 1809, and the brick used in building a hotel in Neffsville.<sup>1</sup>

In 1817 the business interests were general stores by John Thorn and Christian Stauffer; tannery, by Jacob Arndt; brickmaking, Dederick Baehler; saddlery, by Peter and George Britz; hardware, Mrs. Heintzelman; shoemakers, Kline & Faertig; cabinet-makers and carpenters, Emanuel Dyer, John Rico, John Wagner; blacksmiths, Joseph Stanem, Joseph Frantz, Jacob Long; cooper, John Schneider, — Schauer; tailors, George D. Miller and David May, Phillip Waltz; wagon-makers, Peter Gruber, George Long, John White; stocking-weaver, Martin Bauder; weavers, Henry Brahm, Adam Danner, — Boehler, William Wagner, John Brosey, Henry Brosey, Jacob Koch; watchmaker, George Rudisell; dyer, — Waltz; locksmith, John Long; painter, Adam Sill; Jonas White and his father made bone combs; the two physicians were Michael Kaufman and John Heintzelman. There were three hotels,—Washington House, kept by Jacob Meyer; Black Horse, by Mrs. Heintzelman; and Spread Eagle, by John Bartruff.

Old Mill.—Much farther back than the oldest inhabitant can remember, nearly south of the present mill of E. B. Bomberger, was standing an old limestone mill. This was built by Peter Longenecker some time between 1763 and 1780. It remained standing till 1838, and in an early day a wooden fulling-mill was attached to it. The present mill was built by Abraham Hostetter, in 1829, and passed through the hands of J. H. Bassler, John Hostetter, and Benjamin M. Stauffer before it came to be the property of its present owner, E. B. Bomberger, in 1866. The mill is a fine property, and is furnished with both steam- and water-power. It contains six run of stone, and has a head of fourteen feet of water.

The Manheim National Bank was organized Feb. 11, 1865. Its first officers were Abraham Kaufman, president; J. Hoffman Hershey, cashier; And. Brubaker, teller. The business was at first conducted in Mrs. Uhler's building, on Market Square and North Prussian Street, and moved to its present location in 1866. Its capital is $150,000, and its stock owned mostly by parties in and around Manheim. The present officers are Jacob L. Stehman, president, and H. C. Gingrich, cashier.

JACOB L. STEHMAN.—The family are of German descent. Christian (whose orthography of the name was Steman), the grandfather of Jacob L., was born March 31, 1771, and resided in Manheim township, where he was a farmer. He was married to Miss Anna Huber on the 18th of November, 1790, whose birth occurred July 7, 1768. Their children were Maria, John, Christian, Anna, Jacob, Elizabeth, Henry, Samuel, Magdalena, Benjamin, and Veronica. Mr. Stehman died July 26, 1844, in Manheim township, in his seventy-fourth year. His son Christian was born June 26, 1795, in Manheim, on the homestead farm, and married Catherine, daughter of Jacob Leib, of Warwick township. Their children were Anna (Mrs. Hershey), Jacob L., Elizabeth (Mrs. Kraatz), Magdalena (Mrs. Becker), and Catherine (Mrs. Buch).

Mr. Stehman after his marriage removed to Warwick township, where the remainder of his life was spent in business or farming occupations. His death took place on the 8th of November, 1877, in his eighty-third year.

His son Jacob L., the subject of this biographical sketch, was born upon the paternal estate on the 28th of September, 1820. Here his growing years were spent, either in labor or at school in the immediate neighborhood or under the instruction of Professor John Beck, of Lititz. Having decided upon an agricultural life, he eventually inherited the farm of his father. He was married in December, 1846, to Eliza, daughter of John Hostetter, of Penn township. His wife having died, he was again married in November, 1881, to Mrs. Eliza McDowell, daughter of Solomon Sell, of Stark County, Ohio. Mr. Stehman, in 1868, retired from his farm, and removed to New Haven, in the same township, and in May, 1882, made Lititz his home. He is in politics a Republican, and has filled the office of school director for twelve successive years, though preferring the quiet of his own fireside to the excitements of a public career. He is president of the Manheim National Bank, and a director of the Northern Mutual Insurance Company of Ephrata, Lancaster Co. He enjoys the confidence of the community to so great an extent as to have been frequently appointed to the office of guardian and selected as the custodian of important trusts.

<sup>1</sup> Rupp's History states that after its sale it was conducted as a glass-factory by James Jenkins. No positive proof can be found of this now.

Jacob L. Stehman

Mr. Stelman was educated a Mennonite in religion, but is a supporter of all evangelical creeds.

The Manheim Mutual Fire Insurance Company was incorporated July 20, 1877, J. M. Dunlap, president; J. M. Ensminger, secretary; Abraham Kline, treasurer. Its officers remain the same in 1883, with the exception that the secretary is now H. S. Danrer.

The most important business industries of to-day are agricultural implements, Abraham Kline, Hershey & Ely; planing-mill, H. E. Shimp & Co.; flour-mills, Eby & Reist and E. B. Bomberger; dry-goods and general stores, George H. Danner, H. C. Boyd, Henry Arndt, and J. M. Hahn; foundry, Eby & Reist; Manheim Coach-Works, Arnold & Ulrich; furniture dealer, A. R. Brandt. The principal tobacco dealers are J. M. Hahn and Bomberger & Becker; clothing dealers, Hostetter & Hummer.

The borough now contains four hotels—Washington House, Martin Schreider; Summy Hotel, S. C. Summy; Centennial, J. D. Warfel; American Hotel, John Boemsnyder.

The Press.—The first printing-office in Manheim was established by Jacob Stauffer in 1830, but the business was not a successful one and was abandoned. In 1838, John M. Ensminger opened a job-office on Market Square, near South Prussian Street. As he made his business a success he enlarged it, and on Jan. 6, 1846, issued the first newspaper of Manheim. This was a small folio, ten by fourteen in size, and containing four columns of matter, and was called The Planet.

In 1849, Mr. Ensminger sold out his interest to D. B. Rock, who changed the name of the paper to the Sentinel. The office was burned out in 1851, and in July, 1851, was carried on in a building opposite the German Reformed Church on North Prussian Street. In 1852, Mr. Ensminger again became owner of the paper, and it has since been in his hands. He moved into the present building on South Prussian Street in 1853, and changed the name of the paper to Sentinel-Advertiser. The paper is now an eight-column folio, and looks very little like the diminutive Planet of 1846. In politics this paper has been independent always. It has now a circulation of about one thousand.

Fire-Engine Companies.—In 1810 the citizens, feeling the need of organized protection in event of fire, started a subscription for the purpose of building a house and purchasing apparatus. An engine was purchased, which was called the "Union," and a house built. The house was painted red, and was known as the "Red House," and the Union Fire Company was organized.

In 1841 a meeting was called to decide what to do with the Union Engine, whether to sell it and purchase a new one, or to keep it as it was. It was decided that nothing would be done at that time. In 1846 the Borough Council decided to purchase a new engine, and bought the Globe Engine and one hundred and thirty-three feet of hose. In 1851 the Union Engine was sold to New Ephrata, now Linden. In 1860 the engine-house was moved from Market Square to North Charlotte Street. The property on North Charlotte Street upon which the engine-house stood was a part of that upon which the Hiesters claimed ground-rent, and being fearful that the building would be levied upon for rent, it was sold to George Long in 1863. The building was removed to his lot on South Prussian Street, and is now used as a shoe-shop. The Council bought a new lot upon North Prussian Street, and erected upon it a two-story building, the first floor to be used as an engine-house, and the second as a Council chamber. The cost of this building was four hundred and fifty dollars. The organization of the department had gradually become broken up and its members discouraged. The engine was neglected and the hose was in poor condition. From 1863 to 1869 there was no company and no organization worthy of the name. In 1869 the Star Fire Company was organized, and also Hose Company No. 1, and the Globe Engine was rebuilt. In December, 1871, a new hose-cart was purchased and the name of the company changed to Hope Fire-Engine Company and Hose Company No. 1. The organizations are in existence at the present time, though in a feeble and unsatisfactory condition.

Schools.—Prior to 1830 there were no schools in the borough except the subscription private schools, and of these none of sufficient distinctive importance to be noted. One of the old teachers, and one who taught for many years, was Adam Smith. Between the years 1830 and 1836 there were three school buildings erected, known respectively as the Upper, Lower, and Central schools. In 1836, after the adoption by Rapho township, of which Manheim was then a part, of the district school system of public schools, the schools of the borough were controlled jointly by the district school board and six trustees for the borough. In 1855 the borough became a separate school district, and shortly after this the schools were graded, the Upper school being the grammar, the Lower secondary, and the Central the primary grades. At this time the school year was five months, and the average salaries of the teachers thirty dollars per month. In 1862 the school year was lengthened to six months, and in 1882 to seven months. In 1868 the present fine large building was erected, and the school was divided into four grades. These have now been increased to six grades, and the school has a fine reputation, both for its high standard of scholarship and its excellent discipline. The present school board is composed of D. W. Erb, president; H. S. Danner, secretary; F. G. Brosey, treasurer. Directors, J. L. Sharpe, George D. Miller, Jr., H. F. McCloud, E. F. Hostetter.

Manheim Lodge, No. 640, I. O. of G. T., organized Sept. 24, 1868, but was discontinued in 1871.

The Young Men's Christian Association of Manheim was organized in 1859, but was discontinued in 1863, a large part of its members entering the service during the civil war. The society was reorganized in 1879, with F. G. Brosey, president; H. H. Gingrich, secretary, who are its present officers (1883).

Kauffman Park.—There was no public park in the borough till 1876, when Abraham Kauffman presented to the Borough Council a tract of land for park purposes. This land was three acres in extent and contained a beautiful spring. The property has been improved and added to until it now contains about ten acres, and is a beautiful park property.

The Evangelical Lutheran Church was built first in 1770, and was rebuilt in 1857. The lot upon which the church was built was given by Baron Stiegel, the consideration being a red rose, to be paid annually. The first minister was Frederick Augustus Muhlenberg. From 1849 to 1851, J. H. Menger was in charge as minister; C. Reese, in 1852; G. Haines, 1857-58; D. P. Rosenmiller, 1858-64; J. R. Focht, 1864-68; — Kemper, 1868; Jacob Peters, 1870.

The Methodist Episcopal Church was built by a Free-Will Baptist Society in 1864. They failed to establish a successful organization, and in 1868-69 the building was purchased by the Methodist Episcopal Society. The first minister was Samuel Huff. The society is small, and has no regular service.

St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church.—The first Episcopal services held in Manheim were conducted by G. W. Mayer in 1861. On Feb. 9, 1862, Rev. A. M. Able conducted services in the German Reformed Church. In 1867, J. Brinton White rented the German Reformed Church and read services. During part of 1868 the Rev. Douglas, of Columbia, and F. B. Barker, of Lancaster, conducted services during the week. In 1869 the parish was organized, and adopted the name of St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church. The corner-stone of the present church was laid in October, 1869, by Rev. A. M. Able and F. B. Barker, and the building was consecrated May 3, 1870, by Rt. Rev. Bishop Stevens. The first regular rector was Rev. A. Bernstein; succeeding him were W. S. Bigton, S. Edwards, E. P. Brown, John Graham, William Thorn, and their present rector, Rev. John Graham. The first warden was J. Brinton White. The church officers (1883) are J. M. Dunlap, senior warden; J. Henry Moore, junior warden.

St. Paul's German Reformed Church.—The exact date of the building of the first German Reformed Church cannot be positively ascertained, though it is claimed to have been built in 1769. The lots upon which the church was built were deeded to Sebastian Witmer, John Dener, and Michael Katz, in trust, by Michael Diffenderfer, May 22, 1775. A new church was built in 1852. The first minister was probably Casper Shaeffer. The present minister is S. B. Sheaffer. Members of consistory, Philip Arndt, Abraham Kline, James M. Dunlap, Henry C. Boyd, John Fulmer, Ephraim Summy, Howard Gingrich.

Evangelical Association.—In 1820 the first society of this denomination in Manheim was organized by Rev. Jacob Albright and John Seybert. As they had no church in which to worship, services were held at the private houses of Catharine Hassler, Jacob Reich, and — Fasig. The first church was built in 1826 by Rev. John Seybert, and was located on the corner of North Charlotte and Cranitz Streets. The building committee was Rev. John Seybert, Jacob Long, Jacob Hassler, Dr. Mellinger, and Joseph Landice, and the edifice was dedicated by Rev. John Seybert, John Kleinfelter, and — Ettinger. This church was used until 1842, when it was removed, and a larger one erected on the same site. This new building was called "Zion's Evangelical Church," and was erected by Rev. John Senszl, John Seybert, and J. C. Reisner. Trustees, Fred. Danner, D. Fisher, and J. Musser. The ministers who have served this charge are John Breidenstein, J. C. Reisner, J. P. Loip, F. Hoffman, L. Neitz, Thomas Sebald, Jacob Adams, Jacob Zern, J. O. Lehr, M. Dissinger. From 1860, Revs. R. Deisher, R. Stetzel, and F. P. Lehr; 1861, Revs. R. Litzenberger and T. Harper; 1862, Revs. R. Litzenberger and O. H. Baker; 1863, Revs. M. Dissinger and S. S. Chubb; 1864, Revs. M. Dissinger and — Ficht; 1865, Revs. O. H. Baker and J. N. Metzgar; 1866, Revs. O. H. Baker and J. O. Hornberger; 1867, Revs. J. Zern and J. Zimmerman; 1868, Revs. J. Zern and A. M. Stirk; 1869, Revs. Joseph Specht and A. M. Stirk; 1870, Revs. Joseph Specht and W. A.

Chas. Reese

Shoemaker; 1871, Revs. William Weidner and U. H. Hershez; 1872, Revs. William Weidner and U. H. Hershez; 1873, Revs. J. Laros and W. Black; 1874, Revs. J. Laros and A. Markley; 1875, Rev. C. S. Brown; 1876, Rev. J. M. Oplinger; 1879, Rev. Joseph M. Specht; 1882, Rev. B. D. Albright; 1883, Rev. B. D. Albright.

The society is now erecting a fine building upon the corner of Market Square and Charlotte Street, to be called "Bishop Seybert's Memorial Church," in honor of the first bishop of the denomination who resided near Manheim, and who built their first church. The church is to be a fine brick structure, two stories in height, surmounted by a cupola containing a clock and a bell, and forty-two by seventy-five feet in size. The building is under the superintendence of the pastor, B. D. Albright. The corner-stone was laid July 29th by Rev. L. Neltz, of Reading, and Rev. B. D. Albright. The trustees of the church are W. Litzenberger, F. G. Brosey, S. Young, Samuel Ruhl, and J. M. Yeager. The Sunday-school connected with this church has a membership of over one hundred. Its superintendents are S. S. Young and A. A. Stauffer.

United Brethren in Christ.—[It has been impossible to obtain any information in regard to this denomination.]

Borough Cemetery.—In connection with most of the churches there is a cemetery where the people of its denomination are buried. The first borough cemetery was given to the borough by Dr. Michael Kaufman, but no deed was made, and at the time of his death no provision was made for conveying the title. The property was then bought by the Borough Council for forty dollars.

Population.—The population of Manheim borough was 778 in 1850, 856 in 1860, 1122 in 1870, and 1666 in 1880.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

SIMEON GUILFORD SUMMY.

The Summy family are of Swiss descent, John, the grandfather of Simeon Guilford, having lived at Sporting Hill, in Rapho township, where he was both a miller and a farmer, and also embarked in various speculations. His children were John, Peter, Christian, Jacob, David, Henry, Elizabeth (Mrs. Ensminger), Anna (Mrs. Gibble), Maria (Mrs. Miller). Jacob, of this number, was born near Neffsville, in Manheim township, and resided in the immediate vicinity during his youth. He succeeded to the occupation of his father, that of a miller, and was also a popular landlord. He married Martha, daughter of Simeon Minnich, and had children,—Angoline, Simeon G., Lavinia, Henry C., Jacob, John, Emma, Catherine, and Anna, of whom four are deceased. Mr. and Mrs. Summy still survive, and reside in Lap-caster County. Their son, Simeon G., was born Sept. 2, 1844, at Manheim, and early removed to Sporting Hill, where his youth was spent. The school of the neighborhood, and subsequently the Mount Joy Academy, afforded him the rudiments of education, after which he engaged in labor on the farm. He afterward embarked in the purchase and sale of cattle, and later became a successful auctioneer. Having discerned in Manheim borough a wider field for his abilities, he made it his residence, and in 1881 erected the "Summy House," one of the most attractive hotels in the north portion of the county, of which he is the successful landlord. Mr. Summy has manifested much interest in the growth and development of Manheim, and was chiefly instrumental in locating the stock-yards at that point. Through his energy a large and growing cattle trade has developed, which is now one of the most active business features of the place. Mr. Summy is a member of the order of American Mechanics, of Manheim. In politics he is a Republican, though not actively identified with the political movements of the day. He is not identified with any religious sect, but is in sympathy with all measures for the promotion of good morals and the welfare of the community. Mr. Summy was married, in 1865, to Miss Mary A., daughter of Jacob Balmer, of Neffsville. Their children are Harry B., Elmer B. (deceased), and Homer B.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

ELIZABETHTOWN BOROUGH.

Titles—The Town Laid Out.—A patent for the land on which Elizabethtown was afterwards built was secured by Thomas Harris, an Indian trader, who then lived on Conewago Creek, on Nov. 12, 1746. Harris and his wife Mary, on July 15, 1751, sold the farm, which included several hundred acres, to Lazarus Lowrey, and he and his wife Ann conveyed the property, on June 13, 1753, to Barnabas Hughes, who laid out what is now the western part of the borough the same year. The town was named after his wife. Hughes was a tavern-keeper, and had lived on the Paxton road a number of years prior to this time. He died in January, 1765, and left his property to his sons Daniel, John, Barnabas, and Samuel. To the last named the other brothers released the land, and he having in the mean time become a resident of Hartford County, Md., sold to Alexander Boggs on Oct. 28, 1790, two hundred and thirty acres on the northwest side of Elizabethtown for £1360.

George Wealand bought this tract from Alexander Boggs and Ann Boggs, his wife, on Feb. 21, 1809, and laid out upon it an addition to the town in 1812.

A portion of the town site was also included in a tract patented in 1785 by Christopher and Mary Etter.

who sold a part Aug. 4, 1791, to Isaac and Barbara Ream, and they sold one-half to Michael and Elizabeth Reeby, Jan. 21, 1795. The main portion of that half was sold by them to Martin Stouffer on May 2, 1814, and by him to Dr. John Eberle, of Salome, and Samuel Z. Geehr, of Manheim, on June 18th of the same year. On Aug. 20, 1814, Eberle and Geehr sold to Henry Brubaker and Mahlon Roberts, both of Manheim, about forty-five acres, receiving therefor nine thousand dollars. Christopher Etter had laid out some lots, probably in 1791; Reeby had laid out some later, and now (1814) Brubaker and Roberts made an addition of one hundred and forty lots, which they advertised to be disposed of by lottery at one hundred and ten dollars per ticket.

Another addition was made as late as 1861, Kirk Few and H. A. Wade laying out on January 20th of that year seven lots of forty feet front each on Manheim Street.

Development of the Town.—Early Settlers.<sup>1</sup>—Returning to the origin of the town, we find that it was a natural sequence of its site having been upon the great trail from Philadelphia to the West. This old Indian path as the country became settled was the road of the whites, and the present Lancaster and Harrisburg turnpike is almost identical with its line throughout its length. As the travel westward increased, and larger numbers of people were obliged by the necessities of trade and public business to pass to and fro between Harrisburg and Philadelphia, taverns were established at frequent intervals along the road, and one of the earliest was within the present limits of Elizabethtown,—a log house, situated on the spot now occupied by Kolp's blacksmith-shop, which withstood the ravages of time until 1835. The second tavern at this place was the "Black Horse," which is still in existence and serving the same purpose for which it was originally built. Just when it was erected is not known, but it was probably prior to the laying out of the village by Barnabas Hughes. Until very recent years a license was in existence which was granted to George Redsecker in the year 1757, and bore the signature of George II., as well as that of the Provincial Governor. It granted the right of selling wine and rum to the general public, but prohibited the sale of any kind of liquor to the Indians under pain of a heavy penalty. The "Black Horse" was constructed of logs, as would be evident now were the more recent weather-boards removed. The stone addition was made about 1790, and another one in 1836.

Around and near these two taverns, well supported by the travelers passing through the country, the settlement grew slowly until at the time of the Revolution quite a thriving little village appeared, and being about equidistant and considerably removed from the larger towns, almost exactly eighteen miles from Lancaster, Harrisburg, and Lebanon, it became a place of rendezvous and a point of trade for the inhabitants of quite a large area of country. Another tavern had been built and named the "General Washington," and another, a small log structure, stood where Mrs. George Patterson now lives. One of the largest of the log dwelling-houses was upon the ground now occupied by the buildings of E. Hoffman and James Lynch. Another stood where John Breneman's residence now is, and the others of most consequence of which the localities can be identified were where the residences of Mrs. Wieland, Mrs. Julia Wade, and George F. Wagner now are, while there was another on the lot west of the "Black Horse" tavern, and altogether probably more than a score.

The war brought hard times to the little village, as it did to nearly all localities. The price of commodities increased to a wonderful extent, and land had fallen to as low a price as nine pounds per acre, Pennsylvania currency. A number of the residents of Elizabethtown were absent from home on military duty, heavy travel upon the wagon-road had almost ceased, and the village wore a deserted and desolate appearance; but after the close of the war affairs at once assumed a promising aspect, and the period of progression lasted until the war of 1812.

By 1790, or very soon afterwards, another tavern had been built. This was in the northernmost part of the town, and was the property of one of the sons of Barnabas Hughes, who laid out the town. It was called the "Black Bear." What is now the Greenwalt House was built not long after the Hughes inn, by a Mr. Coble, who also erected a stone dwelling adjoining it, in which the post-office was at one time kept. Still another tavern was put up by Samuel Ebersole, a brick building, and the second of that kind in town.

A Mr. McClure kept a general store about the close of the last century at the northeast corner of the square, in a frame building. He owned the property for a number of years and carried on business there, but finally sold it to Adam Campbell, who afterwards erected the present brick dwelling and store. On the corner, where Jacob Baxtresser's dwelling and store-room now is, was at that time a log dwelling, occupied by a Mr. Gardner, who also carried on in it a saddle and harness shop, and a short distance back of it was another log building, in which chairs were manufactured by William Wilson.

In 1798, George Redsecker was still the keeper of the "Black Horse," and Caleb Thornberry was landlord of the "Black Bear," while Jacob Eckert kept the "General Washington." The last-named tavern, at the period of which we have been writing, the closing years of the last century and early ones of the present, had come into a prominence which rivaled that of the old "Black Horse," and some time between 1800 and 1810 it surpassed it. A three-story building was put up as an addition, and this structure was at the time the most imposing one in the village. It is to-day one of the most substantial in the borough, notwithstanding the fact that some ambitious examples of modern architecture have taken their places upon the streets. Its outer walls are about twenty inches thick, and a partition wall in the entry, carried clear to the roof, is fourteen inches thick. This building (which has undergone several modifications and changes of ownership, now in possession of the Odd-Fellows) was erected by John R. Montgomery, Esq., a leading lawyer of his time in Lancaster, and the brick of which it is built was nearly all brought from that city. A brick stable was built at the same time the house was put up, in which sixty horses could be stabled. The two buildings cost about seventeen thousand dollars. The large addition to the "General Washington" and the building of the stable were necessities caused by the great increase in public travel by stages (of which we shall have more to say further on in this chapter), and the fact that this tavern had been made the stage-office.

In the southwest part of town was the first brick building put up in its limits, that now owned by A. Dissinger. It was originally a two-story building, and was occupied by Thomas Eagan, who carried on the sale of general merchandise. Below this stood a log or frame building, and then came the stone building known as a tavern-stand for a number of years, and now occupied by Robert Ross as a store. The brick building below this, in which is the Farmers' Bank and residence of Samuel Eby, was built by George Redsecker.

As we have heretofore intimated, the running of stage-coaches and the increased travel by other means had a marked effect upon the liveliness and prosperity of the village. As a preliminary to this was the improvement of the roads, especially the great east-and-west thoroughfare. The Lancaster, Elizabethtown and Middletown turnpike was commenced in 1805, and finished without delay a distance of twenty-six miles. A few years later there was an entire turnpike communication from Philadelphia to Pittsburgh. There was another turnpike which in its palmy days was of great benefit to the place. This was the Fal-mouth pike, commonly called the Hardscrabble pike, and in later years the Pumpkin-Vine pike. The road was built a distance of six miles in 1811. Before the construction of the State Canal there was a very large amount of travel over this road, and it was caused by the fact that until the construction of the State Canal nearly all of the freight shipped up or down the Susquehanna was by this détour brought around the troublesome and dangerous Conewago Falls at Fal-mouth. Upon this pike the heavy Conestoga wagons, drawn by four or six horses, were often seen in lines of twenty or thirty, and they appeared also in great numbers upon the through east-and-west pike, while stage-coaches were also numerous upon the latter.

Caring for the passengers and drivers and horses was a task of considerable magnitude and revenue, and the taverns of that time were well supported. The scene of greatest activity was the "General Washington," which, as has been remarked, was the stage-office, and had the most extensive stable; but the others obtained an incessant and extensive patronage from the drivers of the great Conestoga teams.

The breaking out of the war of 1812 cast a dark cloud over the community for a time, and some of its most active men were drawn away from their home industries by the call for soldiers. Tetrah Jones received the appointment for enlisting soldiers, and had his headquarters at some tents in the upper part of the town. Peter Force, John Negley, Phillip Fisher, and Samuel Gruber all went into the service from this village. Peter Force, who was in the marine service and fought bravely on Lake Erie, died in the borough in 1868, at the age of seventy-three years.

After the war business was more prosperous than ever before, and in a few years some new industries were established which are spoken of at greater length elsewhere in this chapter. By 1820 improvements had been made in the stores, and larger stocks of goods were kept than formerly. The merchants in business during the period extending from this time to the year 1825 were Messrs. Wagner & Brother (where A. Dissinger now is), Adam Campbell, Robert Dempsy, Samuel Redsecker, John Herr, and William Campbell. Produce of all kinds was at that time very low, and was taken at the stores in exchange for groceries, which were relatively much higher. Butter was six and a quarter cents per pound, and eggs six to eight cents per dozen. Coffee sold at forty to fifty cents per pound, sugar from twenty to twenty-five cents per pound, and that which was called loaf-sugar, put up in conical form, forty to fifty cents per pound. Dry-goods were equally high, the common calico selling at more than half a dollar per yard. Whiskey was sold by all of the merchants, and an unadulterated article of good quality could be procured for ten or twelve cents per quart.

At this time (1820-25) there were living in the village a number of the early settlers, men who had lived as far back as the Revolutionary war, and prominent among them was Peter Schaeffer, who had served through its campaigns and returned to enjoy a long and peaceful life in the quiet town. He died here in 1848, and, as he was born in 1751, he was in his ninety-eighth year. George Redsecker, the early landlord of the "Black Horse," was living here nearly as late as the period of which we have spoken. He was a captain in the Revolutionary war, Lowry's battalion, and was at the Brandywine and Germantown. He had one son, Samuel, and a number of his descendants are now residents of the borough. Simon Gross, another Revolutionary character, was also living here about 1820, as well as Frederick Byrod, who had served in the war and settled here soon after its close, probably in 1785. He was a native of Lancaster, and born in 1762. He followed shoemaking after locating in Elizabethtown, and was the first burgess of the borough. He died here in 1840. His son George, the only one of his thirteen children now living, was born in Elizabethtown in 1802, and is probably the oldest person in the borough born here.

Stephen Stephenson, one of the early residents and a store-keeper, was a captain in the Whiskey Rebellion. Some time after that organized opposition to the Federal authority he went to Philadelphia to purchase goods, and soon after he started back was taken sick on the stage with yellow fever. He returned to Philadelphia and died the same day, such was the virulence of the disease.

Among the other settlers living in Elizabethtown between the years 1812 and 1825 were Tetrah Jones (a school-teacher, who died not long after the war of 1812), Alexander Kirchener (landlord of the "General Washington"), Charles Wade (whose grandchildren now live in the borough), Michael Auxer, John Heffley, James Close, George Walfley, Andrew Gross, Thomas Eagan, John Herr, John Walfley, — Engle (a saddler), — Saymiller, Joseph Atwood, Bernhard Klouse, Jacob Gorgas, John George, Dennis Kane, William Youse, Michael Coble, William Wallace, — Merrow, John Willett, John Gross, William Heller, and Caspar Young.

Incorporation—List of Borough Officers, 1828-83.—By 1826 the village had so increased in population that its residents deemed it expedient to have a municipal government organized. Petition was consequently made to the Legislature, and on April 13, 1827, an act was passed incorporating the borough of Elizabethtown. It was the third borough incorporated in the county. Schools.—Little that is authentic can be said concerning the early history of the schools in this borough. The first were, of course, in all essential particulars like the primitive schools of other new settlements.

About the beginning of the present century a log building, which had originally served as a place of worship for the Catholics, was supplanted so far as religious purposes were concerned by a finer structure and devoted instead to educational. A school was kept in it for many years prior to 1840. There was another log school-house in the village, the site of which was afterwards occupied by a brick school-house. This was afterwards used as a public hall and then as a dwelling-house, and is now owned by Henry Boll.

In 1843 the borough accepted by vote the conditions of the free school law of 1834. The western or upper portion of Mount Joy township and also Conoy township then voted here as well as the inhabitants of the borough. The question of "free school" or "no free school" was to be decided in Mount Joy township and Elizabethtown by a majority of the combined vote of town and country; a majority in Elizabethtown were in favor of free schools, but the majority opposed to the system in the country would have overwhelmed them had it not been for an unforeseen circumstance. It so happened that when the sun rose on the day of election it revealed a heavy snow three feet in depth and in many places covering the fences. This prevented the country opposition from coming into town to cast their ballots, and the Elizabethtown voters easily carried the day.

"The following day," says Mr. Baer, in his "Reminiscences," "showed how strong the opposition would have told against the free-schoolers, for the country people came to town on horseback, in sleighs and sleds, and on foot by the hundreds, and sought the justice's office to upset the election of the day previous. Such another hullabaloo among the seemingly quiet and staid country-people you never could have imagined. It was at times thought the matter would end in a row, or that the town would stand in danger of being besieged. An event took place that did more, in all probability, to bring about quiet and peace than forty speeches could have effected." In the office of the justice of the peace (Jacob Redsecker) there was a large box stove, in which roared and crackled a huge fire of dry hickory. The stove was almost red hot, the room crowded and uncomfortably warm, although outside the mercury was down nearly to zero. Finally, when the temper of the angry mob as well as the atmosphere had reached its highest heat, and an outbreak was not unexpected, there came a sudden change. Every man in the room was seized with a short hacking cough or a rasping sneeze. All rushed for the door and fresh air. The room was cleared in less time than it had taken to tell it, and the remonstrators against the result of the election, effectually beaten, in a few hours wended their way homeward. Some mischievous person had thrown a large handful of red pepper upon the stove.

The free schools were put in operation very soon after the acceptance of the law. In 1855 there were two in the borough, each employing one teacher, and the total number of pupils was one hundred and forty-three. The amount of tax levied was three hundred and twenty dollars, and the amount received from the State appropriation sixty-four dollars and five cents. The cost of instruction was three hundred and twenty-five dollars.

Under the old system of schools the best was undoubtedly one kept by Dr. J. W. B. Dobler, and in it a number of the leading citizens of the borough as well as many who have found residence elsewhere obtained their early education.

Under the new system, adopted by the vote of 1843, there was a slow but steady improvement, in which the most noticeable event was the building of the new school-house in 1873-74. This was a step rendered necessary by the increased attendance and growing educational necessities. The first move towards the accomplishment of the result was upon the 7th of October, when A. Harchenrader, Samuel Groff, and Levi Coble were appointed a committee to see where ground could be most advantageously purchased. This was followed, November 5th of the same year, by the whole board constituting themselves as a committee, as follows: A. Harchenrader, president; H. T. Schultz, secretary; Emanuel Hoffman, treasurer; Levi Coble, Cyrus Sweigart, and Samuel Groff; and the result of their conference was the selection, in January, 1873, of the lot on which the present school-house stands, which was purchased of Mr. S. Detweiler for eight hundred dollars. A petition was made to the court to authorize the board to borrow five thousand dollars, and a vote was taken of the taxable citizens, which resulted in a majority in favor of the proceeding. The board subsequently made application for authority to borrow an additional five thousand dollars, which was granted. Ground being broken, the building rose sixty-four by forty-eight. The mason-and brick-work was done by Samuel McLanahan, the carpentry by Cyrus Sweigart, who resigned from the board to take charge of it, and the painting contract was awarded to James Wilson. The dedication of the structure, completed and furnished at a cost of twelve thousand dollars, took place May 5, 1874, under the auspices of the board, to wit: President, Emanuel Hoffman; Treasurer, Levi Coble; Secretary, H. T. Schultz; Robert Ross, Samuel Patterson. A large procession, headed by the band, marched from Boll's Hall to the new building, and addresses were made there by Rev. G. H. Trabert, David Evans, Esq., W. H. Duhling, W. A. Wilson, Esq., William Riddle, and Professor B. F. Shaub, county superintendent. The first teachers in the new building were G. W. Irwin, principal; Miss A. Engle, Miss C. Gable, and Miss M. Kuhns.

The statistical report for 1882 shows that Elizabethtown has four schools, in each of which one teacher is employed, two being gentlemen and two ladies. The number of pupils is two hundred and seventy-one. The total receipts were $4141.62, of which amount only $213.44 was from the State appropriation, and the total expenditures were $3981.15, of which $1190 was paid as teachers' wages, and $2791.15 for all other expenses. The liabilities were put down at $5339.53.

Christ's Evangelical Lutheran Church.<sup>1</sup>—This congregation was in existence long before the Revolutionary war, but as the early records are very defective, its history cannot be as completely presented as we would wish it. According to existing church books the earliest regular pastor who can authoritatively be mentioned as laboring here was the Rev. Mr. England, who began in 1752. Until about 1775 services were held in a dwelling several miles from Elizabethtown, which was subsequently enlarged and converted into a church. About 1780 a log church building was erected in Elizabethtown in which services were held for more than a score of years. On July 1, 1804, the corner-stone of the present church was laid. The house was consecrated Oct. 11, 1807. Following is a list of the pastors from 1752 to the present, with the dates of the beginning of their respective pastorates: Rev. England, 1752; Rev. Thling (date unknown); Rev. Horsel, 1766; Rev. J. H. Chr. Helmuth, 1769; M. Enderline, 1771; J. D. Schroeder, 1778; J. V. Melsheimer, 1782; J. W. Kurz, 1786; P. Bentz, 1792; J. P. Ernst, 1802; J. P. Cramer, 1806; W. G. Ernst, 1812; J. Strein, 1815; J. Speck, 1823; F. Ruthrauff, 1829; J. H. Bernheim, 1832; L. Gerhart, 1838; William Gerhart, 1847; M. Soudhaus, 1852; William G. Laitzle, 1854; J. W. Early, 1866; F. W. Weiskotten, 1868; G. H. Trabert, 1873; H. J. H. Lemcke, 1877; G. S. Seaman, 1882. This congregation was formerly embraced in an extensive pastoral charge which included congregations at Mount Joy, Maytown, Bainbridge, and Colebrook. Gradually the size of the charge was lessened until the spring of 1882, when this congregation decided to call a pastor of its own and constitute a separate charge. The church has now about two hundred and twenty-five communicants and a flourishing Sunday-school.

Christ Reformed Church<sup>2</sup> was organized about the year 1740 in what was then Donegal, now West Donegal township, about one mile south of its present location. In 1767, Peter Blazer and his wife conveyed one acre of land to the congregation for the consideration of twenty shillings, lawful money of Pennsylvania, and an annual rental of one grain of wheat. The deed says that "it is a piece of ground on which the church in which Rev. Conrad Bucher is pastor now stands." The trustees were Leonard Negley, Simon Carbach, Johannes Thommah, Nicholas Rizecker, and George Rizecker. This church was known as Blazer's Church. The early records and some later ones were lost a few years ago in the burning of the house of the secretary of the consistory. Before the pastorate of Rev. Conrad Bucher, Rev. Christian Henry Rauch was pastor in 1746. He performed extensive missionary labors among the Indians. During his ministry the earliest record in our possession begins. His charge covered considerable territory, viz., Heidelberg, Tulpehocken, Mühlbach, Matthias Dietz's, Swatara, Que-to-pa-hil-la, Donegal, Warwick, Leonard Bender's, Lancaster, Mode Creek, Coventry (Chester County), Oley (Berks County), and Skippack and Goshenhoppen in Montgomery County. In 1747 the congregation was visited by Rev. Michael Schlatter, the "father of the Reformed Church in the United States." The next pastor was the Rev. Conrad Templeman. Then came Rev. Bucher, mentioned in the deed. He came to this country as an officer in the Indian wars. His charge was even more extensive than Rauch's. During the war of the Revolution, from 1777 to 1784, Rev. John William Runkel became the pastor. He was succeeded by Rev. Ludwig Lupp. Then came the pastorate of Rev. Jonathan Heister. The old log church no longer met the wants of the congregation, and, inasmuch as a town had been laid out and settled upon the turnpike, a new church was built. Thus in 1815 the corner-stone of the present church was laid. Rev. Henry Shaffner was pastor. His pastorate was the longest in the history of the congregation, extending over a period of thirty-four years. The lot on which the new church was built was donated by Leonard Negley, and a few years later his residence was purchased as a parsonage. This was afterwards sold by the trustees. After his resignation the congregation passed under a cloud of adversity. He was followed by Revs. <sup>SM</sup> Helfenstein and John Hoffhems, who served brief pastorates. Then for many years the church was supplied by ministers from neighboring charges until 1857, when the Rev. John Nailla became pastor. During his pastorate the congregation recovered much of its former strength; the church was modernized at considerable expense. For some reason, however, the latter half of the pastorate witnessed a serious decline in prosperity. He resigned in 1868, and was followed by Rev. J. G. Fritchey as supply. He labored faithfully and successfully for six years, during which time the church was roused into new life. He was instrumental in erecting a fine parsonage. In 1874, Rev. J. H. Pannabecker, the present incumbent, became pastor. During his pastorate the congregation prospered greatly. The membership rose from sixty to one hundred and forty, the church was renovated and beautified, and the congregation may once more be ranked among the leading ecclesiastical organizations in the community.

St. Peter's Roman Catholic Church.<sup>1</sup>—Among the first Catholics who settled near Elizabethtown of whom we have certain knowledge were Henry Eckenroth and family, Conrad and Andrew Gross, George Witman, Peter and Anthony Youtz, John Kauffman, and others, who came here in or about the year 1752. Almost contemporaneous with these were the Eckels (now called Eagles), Allwines, Wades, Myers, Mastersons, Ovendorfs, Wilsons, and others. The first regular divine services were held in the house of Mr. Henry Eckenroth, and as most of the people were Germans, so the priests who at that time attended this mission were German missionaries, whose headquarters were with the Jesuit Fathers at Conewago, a station near Hanover, York Co., Pa. In or about the year 1768 a log church was erected near the present site of St. Peter's, and named St. Mary's of the Assumption. This building was in use until the year 1799, when the new stone church was ready for divine worship and called St. Peter's. Father Louis Barth, who lived and was associated with the Rev. Michael Egan (afterwards the first Bishop of Philadelphia) at Lancaster, had charge of this then growing congregation in the year 1795, and to his zeal and energy this present old church is mainly due, and his memory is still warmly cherished by the children whose parents dearly loved Father Barth.

On the 10th day of July, 1798, the congregation was visited by the Right Rev. Bishop John Carroll, the first and at that time the only bishop in the United States. The church continued to be in charge of the parish priests of Lancaster, notably among whom was the venerable and well-known Father Bernard Keenan, who took charge of this mission in the year 1825, and continued its pastor until 1832, when the Rev. Michael Curran, who resides at Harrisburg, became pastor, under whose administration the rear portion was added to the church, which gives it its present cruciform shape. Father Curran was succeeded in 1835 by the Very Rev. W. Steinbacker, S.J., who in turn was followed by the popular Father Pierce Maher, of Harrisburg, Pa. In the year 1840, the Rev. F. X. Marshall was appointed resident pastor. Besides making many improvements in the church, Father Marshall directed the building of the parsonage which adjoins the church. Father Marshall was succeeded in 1853 by the Rev. M. Filan, at present the honored pastor of the Church of the Annunciation, in Philadelphia, who in turn was followed by the lamented Father John McCosker, who at the opening of the late Rebellion entered the army as chaplain, and after the war the good and patriotic Father John lingered a short time in the hospital at Philadelphia, where he died in 1865. At this time the principal members of the congregation consisted of Messrs. James Ferry, Henry Shitz, Joseph Strauss, J. Lynch, J. Halbleib, Henry Boll, Andrew Wade, Anthony Herkenroether, H. A. Wade, Daniel O'Donnell, John and Francis Eagle, James Boyle, Edward Sweeny, Paul Witman, Conrad Shaffer, S. Ulrick, and others, all well-known families of Elizabethtown and vicinity at the present time. The priest who succeeded Father McCosker was the Rev. Hugh Margorien, who died and was buried here in 1864. Father John J. McIlvaine then took charge, who in turn was followed by the Rev. Charles McMonigle, under whose pastorate an important addition was made to the parsonage. Father Neal McMenamin followed in the year 1877, and to his zeal and energy is especially due the opening of a way leading from the main street to the church, called St. Peter's Avenue, an improvement useful as it is beautiful.

Father McMenamin was succeeded in the year 1879 by the present pastor, Rev. J. C. Foin, who has been very successful in making many new and necessary improvements in and about the church. During his pastorate stained-glass windows of beautiful design and figures were put in the church; also a tower and bell were added. The bell, the largest in town, was presented by Mr. Henry Boll. Other improvements, such as paintings and statuary of rare beauty, were recently added, so that the church is one of the handsomest as well as one of the oldest in the county.

The Church of God (Winebrennerian) was organized in 1837 at the house of Michael Cramer, and originally consisted of just six members,—Abram Brenneman, Michael Cramer, Mrs. M. Cramer, Martha Kopp, Hannah Kopp, and Margaret Cramer. The first preaching to which these people and a limited congregation listened was in the brick school-house. This and other places of worship served the little church as a place for weekly meetings until July, 1853, when their present church was finished and appropriately dedicated, Rev. John Winebrenner preaching the sermon on that occasion. The first settled pastor of the church was Rev. Jacob Keller, who located in Elizabethtown in 1838. Following him, in 1840, came Rev. E. H. Thomas. Since his time the succession has been as follows, the pastors usually serving two years: Revs. Joseph Ross, 1842; E. H. Thomas, 1844; Joseph H. Bamberger, George U. Horn, Thomas Strom, 1845; David Kaylor, 1847; Abram Snider, William Mullenix, Jesse Hasfeigh, Jacob Keller, 1849; Carlton Price, 1850; Abram Swartz, 1852; Jacob Keller, 1853; J. Hasfeigh, 1855; George Zeigler, 1857; Carlton Price, 1861; J. S. Staum, 1863; E. H. Thomas, 1864; A. Swartz, 1865; W. O. Owen, 1866; Thomas Beam, 1868; J. W. Deshong, 1869; J. C. Seabroks, 1872; J. W. Felix, 1873; D. S. Shook, 1874; J. M. Speese, 1877; Joseph B. Lockwood, 1879; S. B. Howard, 1881; S. W. Naill, 1882. The church has a membership of about seventy-five, is in a flourishing condition both spiritually and temporally, and has in the past year given indication of the latter by the erection of a fine parsonage at a cost of twelve hundred dollars.

The United Brethren Church was organized in or prior to 1852. The present house of worship was purchased in the year mentioned from the Winebrennarians, or Church of God. The congregation is small, and is ministered to at present by the Rev. L. R. Kramer, who has three or four other appointments in the county.

Post-Office.—It is probable that the Elizabethtown post-office was established as early as 1781, and that George Redsecker was the first postmaster. The mail was received and dispensed at his tavern, the "Black Horse," for many years. The names of the postmasters prior to the last half-century cannot be obtained, but the succession since 1832 has been as follows: 1832, James McLaughlin; 1836, Jacob Redsecker; 1840, Samuel Redsecker; 1848, John Lynch; 1852, B. F. Baer; 1855, John A. Gross; 1860, William Wagoner; 1866, Miss Annie Wieland; 1878, Miss Rosa Raudabush. The office has been kept successively in the Black Horse tavern, J. Dyers' building, the stone dwelling of Robert Ross, in Andrew Dissenger's store-room, and in that of J. A. & A. G. Gross, in Lewin's building.

Financial—Borough Scrip—A Bank.—During the period of depression following the financial panic of 1837 the borough, like several others in the county, issued promissory notes, or, as they were afterwards contemptuously called, "shinplasters," in denominations of 6½ cents ("fips"), 12½ cents ("levies"), 25 and 50 cents, and probably some for larger amounts. These were quite a convenience to the business community. They were roughly engraved and printed on an old Franklin hand-press in this place by a German printer named Lieth, as were also those issued by the borough of Marietta. When the burgess of the latter place came to foot up his accounts after redeeming in specie the notes that were presented, he found that he had redeemed about six hundred dollars' worth more than had been issued. It was then discovered that many of the notes were counterfeits, and suspicion pointing to the printer steps were taken towards his arrest. Lieth doubtless suspected that he was watched, for a fire occurred in the chimney of his printing-office one morning, which the citizens were very sure destroyed the blocks and other articles which would have criminated him, and he soon after left town.

It was not until 1869 that the people were given the benefit of a regular financial institution. In that year the present Farmers' Bank was organized, with the following officers, viz.: President, Abraham Collins; Cashier, Samuel Eby; Clerk, John Hertzler.

SAMUEL EBY.—The progenitor of the Eby family in America, if tradition be correct, is Theodore Eby, a Swiss Mennonite, who, having suffered religious persecution, left his native place, and about the year 1700 settled for a brief time in the Palatinate, or Pfaltz, in Germany. About the year 1716, Theodore Eby, with several others of kindred belief, came to the United States under the auspices of William Penn, and settled on Mill Creek, in what is now Leacock township. He had six sons, all of whom were industrious mechanics or farmers. A few years later Peter Eby, a relative of Theodore, followed him to America. The sons of Theodore settled in various portions of Lancaster County, one named Christian locating on Hammer Creek, another (probably Peter) choosing a home on Pequea Creek, these two forming the branches of the family known as the Mill Creek, Hammer Creek, and Pequea Ebys. Peter, a grandson of Theodore, was a farmer, and probably the first Mennonite bishop in the county. He was ordained about the year 1800, and creditably filled the position both in the United States and Canada for many years. Peter was a positive man, of clear, native mind, a natural orator, and, though making no pretense to a thorough scholastic training, commanded, both in temporal and spiritual matters, the deference of his brethren. His death occurred April 6, 1843, in his eightieth year.

The great-grandfather of Samuel, the subject of this biographical sketch, was Peter Eby, who settled in what is now Upper Leacock township, on a farm of three hundred acres.

He had sons, Peter, Samuel, Andrew, Henry, David, Christian, and John, all of whom followed farming employments, and one daughter, Ann.

These sons, in accordance with their religious faith, were non-resistants, though during the period of the Revolution, when Washington was hard pressed by the British forces, Peter and Samuel, the eldest sons, voluntarily shouldered their own guns and joined the Continental troops, and were at New York when the city was captured. After the seizure of a quantity of wheat in the barn of Samuel Eby, four of his sons joined the army at Valley Forge during the winter, and, having served as volunteers under Washington, returned in the spring to their farm labor.

Samuel and Peter lived and died upon the mansion farm. John and Christian settled in Dauphin County, Pa., where their lives were spent. Henry and David died in Cumberland County, Pa., and Andrew removed to North Carolina, where he reared a family and spent his declining years.

Samuel, the grandfather of Samuel above named, resided in what is now Upper Leacock township. His children were Samuel, Jonas, Elizabeth, and Barbara, of whom Jonas became possessor of the family property. He married Salome Line, daughter of a neighboring farmer, and had four children. Their son Samuel was born at the ancestral home in Leacock township in 1833. His early youth was spent on the farm, after which he received an academic education, and studied surveying and conveyancing under Israel Carpenter, of Lancaster. In 1858 he engaged in the pursuit of his profession in the borough of Elizabethtown, and after an extended business, in 1870 entered the Farmers' Bank of that place as cashier. He was in 1858 elected director of the Middletown Bank, which office he held for a period of six years. Mr. Eby was elected justice of the peace of the borough of Elizabethtown, and administered the duties of his office with marked discretion and judgment, no appeal having been taken from the decisions on his docket during his period of service. The office, however, not proving congenial to his tastes, he declined a further incumbency. He was chosen president of the Reading, Marietta and Hanover Railroad Company, but, owing to onerous demands upon his time, tendered his resignation, which was laid over for further action. Mr. Eby was married in 1865 to Miss Elizabeth, daughter of Abram Collins. Their children are a son, Abram, and a daughter, Mary. Mr. Eby was reared in the faith of his ancestors, that of the Mennonite Church.

Manufacturing.—Elizabethtown has never attained note as a place for the encouragement of manufacturing. During the thirties the silk-worm excitement was quite prevalent in the country, and Elizabethtown did not escape the fever of speculative investment. The building now owned by William Fletcher was at one time literally filled with silk-worms, and the farmers in the surrounding country raised large quantities of Morus multicaulis. The project of silk production was soon abandoned, and the building which we have mentioned was then used for a time as a starch-factory.

The oldest of the present manufacturing establishments is the large steam tannery carried on by A. G. Redsecker & Son, and started forty years since by Isaac Redsecker.

The foundry and agricultural implement manufactory owned by Buch & Heisey was established on a small scale by the senior member of the present firm in 1868. A partnership was formed, one year later, between Mr. Buch and a Mr. Groff, and the present one was formed in 1876. In this year the shop was burned down, but it was immediately rebuilt on a much larger scale, and has been constantly carried on and prosperously since that time. The works are run by steam-power and employ about fifteen men.

In 1876, Joseph Groff built a steam flouring-mill in the lower end of the borough, adjoining the agricultural implement factory, which he sold in 1877 to Jacob G. Stauffer, the present proprietor, who enlarged and improved it, and now has four sets or runs of stones in constant operation making flour. Mr. Stauffer also carries on a large warehouse and ships grain quite extensively. Two other warehouses, owned respectively by B. G. Groff and Pierce & Keener, are open to the farmers who seek a market for their grain.

Newspapers.—The Trumpet, started by B. F. Lehman in 1864, is the earliest Elizabethtown newspaper of which we have trustworthy information, although report gives credit to the existence of a newspaper in or before 1838, and it is remembered that several small publications—The Gospel Banner, The Owl, and The Comet—led ephemeral lives subsequently. For all practical purposes The Trumpet may be considered the beginning of newspaper printing in Elizabethtown. The name of this paper was changed to The Gazette soon after it was established, and in 1869 Mr. Lehman, suspending publication here, removed to Mount Union, where he issued The News.

The Chronicle, at present the only journal published in the borough, was established in December, 1869, by Messrs. Westafer & McCord. The former is now the sole proprietor, Mr. McCord having withdrawn in 1872. The Chronicle has been from time to time improved in various ways, and in 1882 was enlarged to an eight-column sheet, twenty-six by forty inches. It has a circulation of upwards of one thousand in Lancaster, Dauphin, and Lebanon Counties, and is a sprightly local news journal. In politics it is independent.

The Thespian Society.—In 1842 the young men of the borough organized a Thespian Society, which remained in existence for a number of years and was a notable institution of the town. A frame hall was built on the lot now owned by Col. N. H. Brenne-man, and a number of amateur dramatic entertainments were given there to good audiences. After a flourishing holiday season the structure was crushed by a heavy snowfall, and the society, having attained a good financial condition, immediately built another hall larger and more substantial than the first. This had seating capacity for over three hundred persons, and during the next holiday season it was repeatedly crowded to its utmost capacity. The performances given were of a good order of merit, and the company achieved a reputation which made it possible for them to visit other places and play before large audiences. Occasionally they were assisted by some strolling actor from Philadelphia or New York, and on those occasions the company was able to produce such plays as "Pizarro," "The School for Scandal," and "The Stranger." The company had an extremely good comedian in Mr. Frederick Leader. The society flourished for several seasons, and doubtless would have done so a considerable time longer but for the damper that was thrown upon their ardor by the absconding of their dishonest treasurer with a fund of several hundred dollars belonging to them.

The Friendship Fire-Engine and Hose Company, No. 1.—This company was organized in the year 1836, and had in use a small Vulcan engine, costing five hundred dollars, bought by subscription and an appropriation of Councils. Isaac Kauffman, Henry Smith, and Michael Kauffman were appointed to take care of and keep in repair the engine, which is yet in possession of the company.

The company was reorganized April 3, 1859, at a meeting of the citizens of the borough of Elizabethtown at the house of Col. A. Greenawalt, and the following members were enrolled, viz.: D. W. Balmer, Gabriel Young, Reuben Bender, Uriah Frank, Jacob A. Coble, Frank S. Andrews, Rufus Frank, Ambrose Shrode, Samuel Hoster, H. A. Wade, John W. Shaffer, Jacob H. Bletz, John Oldweiler, H. M. Breneman, Harrison T. Shultz, Christ. Ebersole, Christ. Foltz, Christ. Mickey, George F. Wagner.

At a meeting held April 26, 1859, a constitution was adopted, of which the following was the preamble:

"WHEREAS, The citizens of the borough of Elizabethtown, Pa., seeing the necessity of more amply securing and protecting their buildings, have deemed it advisable to provide a fire-engine for the protection of their property from the devouring and destructive element of fire, therefore we do hereby organize and form ourselves into a body politic, and adopt the following constitution for the government of the Friendship Fire Company of Elizabethtown, Pa."

At the same meeting the following officers were elected, viz.:

President, Col. A. Greenawalt; Vice-President, John A. Gross; Secretary, Jacob H. Bletz; Treasurer, James Wilson; Chief Engineer, Christian Foltz.

A Rogers engine was purchased from the Friendship Fire Company, of Baltimore, at a cost of eight hundred dollars, during this year, which was in service for twenty years. During the rebel raid into Pennsylvania it was loaned to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, for the purpose of pumping water for their engines at the depot, their water supply not being sufficient, owing to the running of all their trains of this branch of the road.

Monday evening, May 7, 1860, the following officers were elected: A. Dissinger, president; John A. Gross, vice-president; J. H. Bletz, secretary; James Wilson, treasurer.

Monday evening, Dec. 3, 1860, the company met in their new engine-house for the first time. It is yet used for that purpose, and in the mean time has been used for Council chamber and school-house. It was built at a cost of four hundred and eighty-nine dollars and twenty-two cents, and Col. A. Greenawalt, Samuel Eby, Peter Hoffer, Jacob Felix, and F. S. Bryans were appointed trustees; Samuel Eby, president; Jacob Felix, vice-president; George F. Wilson, secretary; H. M. Breneman, treasurer. These officers were re-elected for the following year.

The company disbanded in 1862, many of its members having enlisted in the Union army, and the Friendship was reorganized July 26, 1867, by the following gentlemen: S. H. Brubaker, A. Breneman, F. G. Saylor, A. B. Rult, Henry Boll, Reuben Coble, J. W. Shaffer, Reuben Betz, C. Brinsor, Charles Hoster, J. F. Rothermal, George Weber, Samuel Foltz, Abram Balmer, Ellis Haldeman, Emanuel Hippard, John Wiegand, John H. Stöiner. Samuel Brubaker was elected president; Amos Gantz, vice-president; Abram Balmer, secretary; A. Breneman, treasurer; Harry White, chief engineer. This organization continued but one year.

The last and present organization was effected July 14, 1876, when Samuel Eby was elected president; A. Eby, vice-president; J. G. Westafer, secretary; Joseph Heise, treasurer; Tobias Nissley, chief engineer.

Aug. 8, 1878, the following officers were elected: President, D. D. Courtney; Vice-President, J. G. Westafer; Secretary, Milton Wealand; Assistant Secretary, H. C. Lewis; Treasurer, Tobias Kehlor; Engineer, Tobias Nissley; Assistant Engineers, George W. Redsecker, Sebastian Keller, Jr.

A meeting was held Dec. 19, 1878, in the engine-house by citizens and members of the company, when some able remarks were made by Mr. A. Dissinger and others in regard to the purchasing of a steam fire-engine. A committee consisting of J. H. Brubaker, George Bynd, E. Hoffman, Tobias Kehlor, B. G. Groff was appointed to solicit petitioners for a new steam fire-engine, and to present the same to the Council for their consideration.

The Friendship Fire-Engine and Hose Company was chartered Dec. 30, 1878.

The new steam fire-engine manufactured by Clapp & Jones, Hudson, N. Y., arrived in June, 1879, when it was thoroughly tested and accepted by the Council.

The following officers were elected for 1880: President, D. D. Courtney; Vice-President, J. C. Redsecker; Secretary, H. C. Lewis; Assistant Secretary, W. A. Laird; Treasurer, Tobias Kehlor; Foreman, Harry Starlach; Assistant Foreman, William M. Barttels; Chief Engineer, T. W. Nissley; Chief Hose Director, R. S. Ross.

The first inspection of the company with their steam-engine and apparatus took place on Jan. 1, 1880, being conducted by the Burgess and Council.

Speeches were made by J. H. Brubaker, Burgess, and Councilmen H. A. Wade, B. G. Groff, and M. Hess, expressing themselves as well pleased with the condition of the company and its apparatus. Speeches in response were made by President D. D. Courtney, R. S. Ross, J. G. Westofer, and others.

The first fire that the company were at with their steamer was at Mr. Sweeny's, on May 29, 1880, when they did efficient service in keeping the fire under control and saving the large warehouse opposite.

In January, 1881, the company elected officers as follows: President, D. D. Courtney; Vice-President, J. C. Redsecker; Secretary, H. C. Lewis.

Sept. 5, 1881, D. D. Courtney was elected delegate to Fireman's Association, held in Maennerchor Hall, city of Reading.

The company elected officers for 1882, as follows: President, D. D. Courtney; Vice-President, J. C. Redsecker; Secretary, R. J. Seitz.

In January, 1882, the company held a ladies' fair, from which they realized nine hundred and forty-two dollars and ninety-six cents, with which it is intended at some time to build an engine-house.

The following are the officers of the company at the present time: President, D. D. Courtney; Vice-President, J. C. Redsecker; Secretary, J. D. Weigand; Assistant Secretary, Harry Huntsberger; Treasurer, Tobias Kehlor; Foreman, J. R. Dickr; Assistant Foreman, J. D. Weigand; Chief Engineer, G. W. Redsecker; Assistant Engineers, J. D. Weigand, R. J. Seitz, J. B. Buch, E. E. Coble, J. G. Stauffer; Chief Hose Director, J. S. Groff; Assistant Hose Directors, Tobias Kehlor, S. Y. Heiscy, D. D. Courtney, H. H. Brubaker, R. S. Ross; Firemen, H. C. Bryan, H. U. Coble; Finance Committee, A. Dissinger, R. S. Ross; Property Protectors, J. G. Stauffer, A. Dissinger, Tobias Kehlor; Janitor, George W. Redsecker.

The company at the present time has forty-five men on the roll as active members, and is in a flourishing condition, with the prospect of increasing its strength.

Cornet Band.—As early as 1840 there was a brass band in the borough which had been organized by Dr. S. Keller, an effective instructor, whose activity in musical matters has extended through a period of nearly half a century. The band had much to do in the famous Harrison campaign of 1840, but became more meritorious by 1848, and from that time to 1856 had a reputation that extended to other towns. At this time the band had a uniform and a full line of fine brass instruments. The present Elizabethtown Cornet Band was organized July 19, 1867, and the body comprised Dr. S. Keller, Sr., as president; S. L. Yetter, vice-president; W. K. Jeffries, secretary; Jacob Buch, treasurer; and S. Keller, Jr., leader. The band was uniformed in the following year. In 1876 it was incorporated with the following charter members, viz., S. Keller, Jr., W. H. Duhling, Henry Sharlock, John C. Redsecker, J. P. Oeschgan, J. W. Murray, E. Greiser, H. J. Greenwalt, Philip Singer, J. D. Weigand, B. F. Dohner, J. A. Goble, L. Scheetz, J. C. Stambaugh, G. A. Schwan, C. B. Sherbahn, H. Louer, Frank Rutherford, H. J. Seitz, and R. J. Seitz.

Elizabethtown Lodge, No. 128, I. O. O. F., was instituted Sept. 29, 1845, with Jacob Redsecker, Jackson Sheaffer, Sebastian Keller, Benjamin Sheffer, and Joseph Buchanan as charter members. Jacob Redsecker was elected Noble Grand; Jackson Sheaffer, Vice Grand; Joseph Buchanan, Secretary; and Sebastian Keller, Treasurer. The lodge has now forty members, and owns the building, valued at three thousand dollars, in which is its hall.

Fidelity Beneficial Society.—This organization was chartered and opened business on the 17th of September, 1879. The following were the original officers: President, Col. H. M. Brenneman; Vice-President, Daniel S. Will; Secretary, E. B. Bierman; Treasurer, A. Dissinger; General Agent, S. R. Hackenberger; Medical Director, J. W. Coble, M.D.; Solicitor, William A. ## CHAPTER XXXIV.

BOROUGH OF MARIETTA.

MARIETTA is located on the left bank of the Susquehanna River, forty-eight miles from its mouth, and twenty-five miles below Harrisburg, the capital of the State. It is two miles long and one-fourth of a mile in width. In population it is the third town in the county.

Along the river shore the ground is level, extending back from four to six hundred feet, and is sometimes overflowed with water during a freshet. From the first alley, running parallel with Front Street, the ground in Waterford, or the western half of the town, rises gradually for a distance of two hundred feet to a terrace three hundred feet wide, when another and more abrupt ascent commences, and runs for a distance of four hundred feet to level ground. The ground in the lower half of the town ascends more abruptly, and continues to the level ground along the northern boundary of the town. The turnpike, or Second Street, was cut and leveled along the side of the sloping hill.

Through the centre there runs from north to south a stream of water, which rises upon the farm now owned by Abraham N. Cassel, and passes through the farms of James Duffy; it passes the borough line at a point between the lands formerly owned by James Anderson and David Cook, and thence through the land of the latter to the Pennsylvania Canal, into which it now empties.

The Town Laid Out.—Waterford was laid out upon land, containing three hundred acres, taken up by Robert Wilkins, an Indian trader, in the year 1719. In the year 1727 he sold it to James Anderson, the minister of Donegal Church, who, in 1740, by will gave it to his sons James and Thomas. Thomas and Mr. Anderson's widow released their interest to James, who gave the same to his son James, who gave it to his son James, who laid out the town of Waterford.

In 1719, George Stewart took up several hundred acres of land adjoining Robert Wilkins on the east. He died in January, 1743, and his eldest son, John, came into possession of the land, and in 1738 he took out a patent for three hundred and fifty acres and allowance. On the 25th day of November, 1748, John Stewart and his wife, Ann, sold the land to David Cook, who gave his son David two hundred and twelve acres adjoining Mr. Anderson's land, who gave the same to his son David, who laid out the town of New Haven.

David Cook also gave to his son James one hundred and fifty-nine acres adjoining his son David's tract on the east. On the 1st day of May, 1786, James sold his farm to Jacob Neff, of Hempfield township, who died in the year 1798, leaving several children, among whom was a daughter, Catharine, who married Henry Cassel after her father's death. On the 17th day of April, 1806, Henry Acher, the executor of Jacob Neff's estate, sold to Henry Cassel one hundred and sixty-two acres of the Stewart land, which was probably his wife's share in Mr. Neff's estate. On the 1st day of January, 1814, Mr. Cassel sold off forty-five acres of this farm, fronting on the river, to Jacob Grosh, for fifty-eight thousand five hundred dollars. Grosh laid the same out into building lots, which now constitute the eastern section of the borough, which he called Moravian Town, but it was nicknamed Bungletown, which latter name it retained for many years.

By reference to the plan of the borough, it will be seen that the boundary lines of the farms belonging to Mr. Anderson, Cook, and Cassel formed an acute angle with the river front. The surveyor, Isaac Taylor, commenced to lay out lands for the Indian traders in 1719, at a point a short distance below Conoy Creek, and ran his lines at right angles with the river front. The several farms to the south of that line were surveyed in the same week and year, and the side lines were made parallel to each other. Where the river approached the lower surveys, now embraced in Marietta, its course turned suddenly and ran in an easterly direction, which made the river front an acute angle with these division lines. Thus much in explanation of what seems to have been a very awkwardly drawn plan of the town.

Additions.—On Nov. 19, 1803, David Cook gave public notice that he was the proprietor of a "tract of land adjoining Mr. Anderson's plantation at Anderson's Ferry, and that he had laid out a town, to be named New Haven, containing one hundred and one lots, which he intended to dispose of by lottery, each ticket commanding a prize; the price of each ticket to be fifty dollars, and the titles to the lots were to be in fee simple and free from ground rents."

This plan extended to Lumber Alley, a few hundred feet east of the "run" spoken of. This alley was laid out at right angles with the river shore, and extended north until it intersected the line of James Anderson's land, forming a triangle.

A few years later Mr. Cook laid out forty-eight building-lots adjoining his first town plan upon the east side, which he called "New Haven Continued."

At the time this town was projected measures had been taken to construct a turnpike leading from Anderson's Ferry to Lancaster, for the river business had increased wonderfully. Lots sold rapidly, and we find in the first year (1805) the following lot-holders: Shews Baugh, Adam Bahn, Barlin English, Martin Orider, John Coble, Henry Conn, John Longenecker, Lewis Leader, Jacob Bitner, Henry Sharer, John Smith, Henry Witmer, John White.

The following is a list of taxables for the year 1807, in addition to the other list, which indicates the rapid growth of the place: Philip Giesey, Widow Hyland, Alexander McCullough, Christian Longenecker, Frederick Heinselmann, James Mehaffey, James Walton, James Agnew, John Hess, William Hamilton, Reuben Armstrong (colored), Thomas Clark.

On the 16th day of November, 1804, James Anderson announced that he had "appropriated a tract of land on the north side of the Susquehanna River, at Anderson's Ferry, for a new town to be called Waterford, and wished to dispose of the same by a lottery." He also announced that the drawing of the lottery was expected to commence in the month of February or early in the month of March; tickets at sixty dollars each. And on the 14th day of June, 1805, he gave public notice that the deeds were all executed and ready for delivery. The water lots were forty by one hundred and thirty-two feet, and upper lots fifty by two hundred and six feet. "The bank of the river was to be kept open for the use of the town lots, clear of ground-rent."

Although Mr. Anderson started his town one year later than Mr. Cook, from the start it grew more rapidly, and kept ahead of New Haven until the two were consolidated.

A few of these lot-owners resided in the neighborhood. There were also a few "tenants" and "free-men" not in the above list.

In November, 1813, David Cook (who then resided in Lancaster, with his son-in-law, Hugh Wilson) sold eighteen acres and eight perches for twenty-nine thousand six hundred and fifty dollars, fronting on the river, to John Myers, who laid it out into eighty-three building lots, and called it "J. Myers' Addition." This land extended from the east line of "Cook's Addition to New Haven," and to the land sold by Henry Cassel to Jacob Grosh.

When James Anderson laid out Waterford he did not include the ferry-house and about twenty acres of land adjoining the ferry. He afterwards sold his ferry right and the land adjoining to Henry Sharer, Matthias Rank, James Mehaffey, John Pedan, James Duffy, and — Haines for one hundred and ten thousand dollars. This purchase also included a bridge charter. They laid this tract out into one hundred and six building lots, and named it "Henry Sharer & Co.'s Addition."

"Irishtown," although not within the corporate limits of the borough, is practically a part of Marietta, and is so regarded generally. On the 2d day of April, 1813, John Pedan, James Mehaffey, and James Duffy purchased from Mrs. Frances Evans one hundred and sixty-one acres of land adjoining the Anderson farm on the west, and laid out the entire tract into five hundred and sixty-two building lots. The town plan was distinct and separate from Waterford, and the streets did not connect in a straight line with those of the latter place. In the centre of the plat ground was reserved for a "market-house," and also for public buildings. In their advertisement to the public announcing that they had laid out a town they designated the place as "Marietta."

When the charter of the borough of Marietta was granted it did not include that part laid out by James Mehaffey and his associates. This was not an accidental omission. The place was never incorporated, and up to the present time the citizens have resolutely resisted the extension of the borough line to include their property.

Mr. Anderson laid out "High Street" along the edge of a terrace, which is and probably will ever remain the principal street in the borough. Mr. Cook called the street which is a continuation of High, Second Street. In order to get level ground for this street he was compelled to cut into the side of the hill.

Benjamin Long purchased about thirty acres of the Anderson farm, upon the top of the hill and down its southern slope, which he laid out into two hundred and eighty-two building lots, and called the same "B. Long's Addition."

At the time these towns were laid out the river trade had assumed large proportions, and the principal business for many years was carried on along the river shore. This fact probably was the principal reason which induced Mr. Anderson and Cook to take up the entire river front in their "plans," and in depth only about one-fourth of the distance.

After procuring a charter for the erection of a bridge over the river, Mr. Anderson expended several thousand dollars in grading a road from the south side of his ferry over the hills. The bridge was not built, and he became greatly embarrassed, and removed to the borough of York.

Mr. Anderson and Mr. Cook finally agreed to procure a charter from the Legislature, which was granted, and the name agreed upon by them was Marietta. The town was said to be so named in honor of their wives.

In this list there are the names of thirty-eight carpenters, which indicates that buildings were being erected very rapidly. The list of taverns, storekeepers, merchants, and tradespeople was large also.

The first half of the second decade of this century was one of speculation, succeeded by disaster in every branch of business throughout the country.

The State Legislature was kept busy chartering banks, turnpikes, bridges, and trading companies of various kinds.

This extraordinary stimulation of business ran through the country like "wildfire." One of the outgrowths of this craze was the desire to lay out towns and speculate in building lots. By reference to the township histories may be seen a number of "lost towns," besides many that have an existence which they owe to this speculative era.

The extraordinary increase in the river business started a number of towns along the river a few years before the war of 1812, and each became the rival of the other and hoped to get the bulk of the business. Columbia had the start of Marietta by eighteen years, but the latter sprang into existence as if by magic, and commenced to crowd the heels of their Quaker neighbors, and for a few years rivaled the former in population. The place grew too fast; a large class of disreputable persons followed the stream of speculators who overflowed the place, and, like birds of prey, lived off the earnings of others. When the final crash came but few were able to weather the storm. The recovery of business prosperity was gradual but assured.

Market-Houses.—The old market-house that once stood in the public square was built at a date to which the memory of man runneth not back. However, it was one of those quaint old structures standing on stilts that in after-years became an eye-sore to the more sensitive and progressive citizens of the borough, and in due time the old, unsightly thing was removed.

In 1874 a stock company was formed, a lot purchased on Walnut Street, and the present neat and commodious brick building erected at a cost of five thousand five hundred dollars, and first occupied in May, 1875. The stalls are rented to farmers and truck-raisers in the vicinity of Marietta, and are bountifully supplied twice each week with the best of everything in the market line that the surrounding country affords. The officers of the company are: President, B. F. Hiestand; Treasurer, John Spangler; Secretary, George F. Stibgen.

Town Halls.—For many years the upper part or room of the old market-house was occupied as a town hall. In 1847 the borough of Marietta purchased the diamond-shaped lot between or at the intersection of Walnut Street and Elbow Lane, and erected thereon what is now the old town hall. The two lower or first stories were built by the borough, and the third story by the Sons of Temperance, who at that time had a flourishing division in Marietta. The third story is now owned and occupied by the Knights of Pythias, the second story by the borough and Marietta Lyceum, and the lower story by the Marietta School Board. The new or Central Hall was built in 1874, and is located on Second. The lower story was built by the borough of Marietta, and is occupied by the post-office, E. D. Roath (justice's office), the fire department, and the Town Council, each having ample accommodations for each of their departments. The second story was built by the Central Hall Association, and contains one of the finest halls in the county for all purposes for which it was intended, being fitted up with a capacious stage and stage properties. The third story was built by the Odd-Fellows, and contains, besides their fine hall, another society hall, with all the necessary rooms for lodge purposes. The building is of brick, and built in the most substantial manner and heated throughout by steam, and lighted by gas.

Financial.—The First National Bank of Marietta was organized and chartered in 1868, and opened for the transaction of business July 21st of that year. Its original number was twenty-five. The first directors and officers were elected April 28, 1863, as follows: Directors, John Hollinger, S. F. Eagle, John Haldeman, John Musser, J. E. Kreybill, Abram H. Musselman, James Mehaffy, B. F. Hiestand, and Barr Spangler; President, John Hollinger; Vice-President, James Mehaffy; Cashier, Amos Bowman. The present substantial banking-house, located on Market Street, which for comfort and convenience in all its appointments is not surpassed by any in the county, was built in the summer and fall of 1875, and occupied in the spring of 1876. The old charter having expired, the bank was rechartered May 27, 1882, as No. 2710, with a capital stock of one hundred thousand dollars, and a surplus of one hundred thousand dollars. The present directors are John Musser, S. F. Eagle, Henry S. Musser, John Zeigler, John Correll, Paris Haldeman, H. L. Haldeman, John S. Garber, and Barr Spangler; President, John Musser; Vice-President, P. Haldeman; Cashier, Amos Bowman.

The Exchange Bank was established in 1874, by several residents of Marietta and vicinity, and chartered by State authority in the same year, with a capital stock of fifty thousand dollars. The first officers of the bank were B. F. Hiestand, president; J. J. Gilbert, vice-president; Joseph Clarkson, cashier. The banking-house is located on Second Street, a few doors west from Central Hall. The present officers are: President, B. F. Hiestand; Vice-President, Joseph Miller; Cashier, Joseph L. Brandt.

JOSEPH L. BRANDT is a descendant of one of the earliest settlers in the county, the name of Adam Brand being found among a number of Germans who settled in the county previous to 1718.

His great-grandfather, John Brandt, resided in Londonderry township, Lancaster Co., where he was born about 1740, and died 1784. His children were Christian, born 1765; John, born 1767; Barbara, born 1769; Samuel, born 1771; and Michael, born 1774.

His grandfather, John Brandt, was born Feb. 24, 1767, and indentured to George Root in 1784 to learn the joiner and spinning-wheel maker trade, where he served an apprenticeship of three years and eight months. He was married (1791) to Frena Bucher, born 1772, died 1857, a sister to Anna Bucher, born 1769, the paternal grandmother of Bayard Taylor, the noted traveler, author, and poet, of Chester County, and removed to what has since been known as the "old Brandt homestead," near Maytown. His children were Varonica (born 1792), married to James McGinnis, and after his death to Samuel Bossler, who died 1874; Anna (born 1793), married to Joseph Clepper, and after his death to Jacob S. Haldeman, who died 1880; Christian, born 1795, died 1870; John (born 1797), married to Catharine Hossler, died 1854; Joseph (born 1800), married to Anna Niesley (widow), who died 1845; Elizabeth (born 1803), married to John Hollinger, who died 1829. Mr. Brandt was a house-carpenter during the few years after his marriage, and then became a farmer. He died Dec. 14, 1842.

His father, Christian Brandt, was born Sept. 12, 1795, and married (1827) to Elizabeth Long (born 1808), daughter of Abraham Long, who resided near Donegal Springs. He was a farmer, and resided on the old Brandt homestead during his lifetime. He was a member of the Mennonite Church, and an exemplary Christian. His death occurred Jan. 7, 1870. His eight sons were Jacob, born Oct. 11, 1829, who died from accidental scalding at the age of three years; John, born Jan. 1, 1831, and married to Mary Ann Hossler; Abraham, born Aug. 19, 1833, married to Anna Mary Creider; Christian, born April 19, 1836, married to Susan Rhoads; David, born April 6, 1840, married to Maria Hess; Samuel, born Oct. 16, 1841, married to Mary Stauffer; Solomon, born Feb. 8, 1845; and Joseph, the subject of this article, who was born May 21, 1847, about one and a half miles northwest of Maytown, where his father, brothers, and sisters were born and reared. He worked on his father's farm and attended the public school of the neighborhood until eighteen years of age, when he began teaching school, and continued in the profession until 1878. In 1867 he attended a summer session at the Millersville Normal School, and the following year graduated from Crittenden's Commercial College, Philadelphia. In 1875 he received a teacher's permanent State certificate. In 1876 he was the chosen candidate of the Democratic party for the State Legislature, but the county having been overwhelmingly Republican at that time, he was defeated. The same year Mr. Brandt was married to Miss Agnes May Nissley, oldest daughter of Rev. Joseph Nissley, residing near Hummelstown, Dauphin Co., and removed to Maytown. In 1878 he was elected justice of the peace for his township, East Donegal, and fulfilled the duties of the office, in connection with surveying and conveyancing, until the spring of 1880, when he was appointed cashier of the Exchange Bank of Marietta, which position he still holds.

Industries.—The present Marietta Hollow-Ware and Enameling Company was organized and commenced business in 1876. Their works are located on the north side of Pennsylvania Railroad, a short distance west from the railroad station, and cover one acre of land, donated by Mr. James Duffy, who also subscribed ten thousand dollars towards the original twenty-three thousand dollars stock of the company. The present company secured by purchase at a nominal sum the plant, blocks, machinery, etc., of a former company, whose buildings and property were destroyed by fire, and have also added new machinery, tools, etc., to facilitate work and lessen the cost of production of this kind of goods. Seventy-five men are employed annually by this company in the manufacture of their goods. The officers for 1883 were: President, James Duffy; Treasurer and Secretary, George W. Mehaffy; Manager, George F. Stibgen.

The Marietta Marble-Works were established on Walnut Street in 1842 by M. Gable, who is still engaged in supplying all kinds of marble-work for Marietta and the surrounding country.

The Marietta Machine-Shop and Foundry was established by George Roath, and it is now owned by Spangler & Rich, and operated by Samuel B. Gramm.

In 1807 or 1808, Henry Cassel established the lumber business on the site now occupied by his son, A. N. Cassel, who, in 1843, became identified with the business, and in 1872 built the planing-mill now operated by him. About three acres of ground are covered by the lumber and buildings of Mr. Cassel. His transportation facilities are of the best, being supplied by both canal and railroad. The business office is adjoining his lumber-yard, corner of Bank and Third Streets. This firm gives employment to about fifteen men.

The saw-, planing-mills, and lumber-yard of B. F. Hiestand & Sons was established in 1850 by B. F. Hiestand. The mills are at Chikis, and the machinery driven by water-power, while the lumber-yard and business office is at Bank and Second Streets, Marietta. They also have canal and railroad facilities equal to any other firm, and are connected with Columbia, York, and Lancaster by telephone. They employ about twenty men in their business.

In 1858 a steam saw-mill was built on the site now occupied by the depot of the Pennsylvania Railroad by G. W. Mehaffy, James Duffy, and a Mr. Vandervoort, and subsequently destroyed by fire and never rebuilt.

Klumpp's tannery is located on Locust, between Second Street and Prospect Alley, and was built as early as 1815 or 1816, by P. Moyer, who conducted the tanning business here for several years, when it became the property of Kline & Wolf, who operated it for many years, when it finally passed into the ownership of the present proprietor, John C. Klumpp, who remodeled the tannery and applied steam-power in the process of tanning, and is now able to turn out nearly ten thousand sides of first-class leather per annum.

The Sultzbach tannery is located on the corner of Locust and Walnut Streets, and was built by Henry Sultzbach, who was a native of Switzerland. Just when it was built is not now known, but no doubt as early as 1812 or 1815. It subsequently passed into the hands of his son John, thence to Henry Sultzbach, father of Henry L. Sultzbach, the present owner, who took possession in 1870. Since his occupancy he has added one story to the main building, which is of brick, re-sunk the yard, and added steam to the motive-power. The tannery has at present a capacity of ten thousand sides of leather annually, and employs six men in their manufacture.

The "Lancaster County Vaccine Farm" was established in April, 1882, under the firm-name of Alexander & Grove, consisting of Dr. H. M. Alexander and David M. Grove. In October, 1882, Mr. Grove withdrew, and Dr. H. M. Alexander became sole proprietor. The buildings erected for this special purpose are as well arranged and equipped as any in the country. The stables are the only heated vaccine stables in the United States. Shipments of virus in large orders are made to all surrounding States, as well as to Missouri, New Mexico, Texas, California, Montana, Georgia, Louisiana, Florida, and all New England States. It was sent safely to Canada and South America.

Schools.—Joseph Jeffries, an Irishman, was one of the first teachers in the place. Prior to the time he taught in Marietta he had been teaching at the log school-house at Donegal Church, and he also taught at Brenneman's, near Canoy. He did not stay long in one place. The only scholars now living who went to his school are Dr. Nathaniel Watson, John Paulis, Hon. A. E. Roberts (now of Lancaster), Rev. A. B. Grosh, Mrs. Ann Strickler.

William Pierce taught school for a few seasons, and in its connection was also a scrivener. He gave up teaching, and devoted his whole time to the publication of his newspaper and magazine. He came to Marietta after the war of 1812, and remained there several years.

Samuel Ross was the first person who taught school in the hall over the market-house, about the year 1817. He was also chief burgess, and was a person of some prominence.

James Townsen was contemporaneous with Ross, but taught school only one or two winters.

William Ebbles came from Elizabethtown to Marietta in 1817. He opened a scrivener's office, and also for a short time taught school.

William Hull taught school in 1820. There were several other teachers during the first decade in the history of the town, whose names are not now remembered; none of them, however, are worth particular mention. They belonged to that peripatetic class of teachers who came around in the fall of the year and remained three or four months, and then took up their line of march for some other locality.

During that time no effort was made to establish a classical or higher grade school; that was left for a future and more progressive generation.

A person named Stoner and a Yankee named Whitman also taught in the Bell school-house. Mr. Geary taught school where Brisco was in 1820.

Mr. Stansbury was one of the first teachers in the place. He removed to Columbia sixty years ago, where he opened a school, and taught there a number of years.

John V. Smith taught school in 1822, and remained for two years.

George Briscoe was one of the earliest teachers in the borough. He taught school for a number of years in the one-story brick house east of the market-house, adjoining Maj. Huss' printing-office. The last of his scholars now living is the venerable ex-Judge John J. Libhart.

William Rankin belonged to the old school of teachers. He was an Englishman, and was one of the few classical scholars of his calling. He taught at Maytown some years, and came from that place to Marietta about the year 1822, and opened a school in the large room above the market-house. He believed in corporal punishment, and the writer can bear witness to its practical operation. He is gone, but not forgotten.

Aaron B. Grosh, son of Judge Jacob Grosh, was a bright and talented young man who taught school a few years in the Bell school-house, commencing about the year 1822. A year or two later he and his brother published a newspaper. He also became attached to the Universalist Church, and at different periods of his honorable career preached for that denomination. Of the teachers born in Marietta he was the most brilliant. He was equally distinguished in the realm of letters. He is living in New York State, aged eighty.

William Carter, a young man who had been studying law in the borough of York, came to Marietta about the year 1827, and taught school for several years. He returned to York, and commenced to gather material for a history of York County. He and Mr. Glossbrenner published the history about fifty years ago. It was about as large as the New Testament.

Rev. Abel Charles Thomas, the most accomplished and gifted of all the early teachers, came to Marietta about the year 1828, and taught school in the log building east of the Cross-Keys tavern, on Second Street. He was a Universalist preacher, and a fine elocutionist and writer. His character was above reproach, and he died loved and respected by his friends and neighbors. He moved to Philadelphia about forty-eight years ago. He embraced Universalism probably after he came to Marietta, and became a preacher.

Rev. Thomas Marshall Boggs, the pastor of Donegal and Marietta Presbyterian Churches, was a trained teacher of a number of years' experience. Both in Marietta and Mount Joy he had a class of boys he prepared for college. His brother, John Boggs, who was a graduate of college, started an academy, and taught the higher branches. The school went down for want of patronage. Mr. Boggs was a most excellent and competent teacher, and it was a subject of regret among the citizens that his school was not a success. He entered the ministry of the Presbyterian Church.

Rev. Timothy Simpson, a graduate of Montpelier College, Vt., came to Marietta in 1831, and took charge of the school above the market-house, which

Mr. Rankin left in rather a demoralized condition. He taught there one or two years, when he moved into a new two-story frame school-house built by the late James Wilson, one square northeast from the market-house. His school gradually increased, when he commenced to teach the higher branches.

One other college student, named Graves, came from a Vermont college to assist Mr. Simpson. He had a Latin class, composed of eight or ten students, whom he prepared to enter college. The last two years of his term the school assumed the dignity of an academy. Mr. Simpson became a Presbyterian minister, and was stationed at Harper's Ferry before the war. He was the first teacher in Marietta who introduced into the school at the close of each session what was then called an exhibition. It was a pleasing feature in the exercises, and the boys looked forward with a good deal of trepidation lest there might be some failure on their part. The boys that were ambitious and sharp went through easily.

George M. Clawges came from Clermont, Delaware State, where he had been teaching, to Marietta in 1836, and took charge of Mr. Simpson's academy.

He became a zealous member of the Presbyterian Church, and afterwards of the Methodist Church, in which for twenty-five years he was a local preacher.

He had been a wild young man. He became an ardent friend of the cause of total abstinence. He has been a teacher for fifty years, forty-eight of which was spent in this county in various towns and districts.

G. Washington Baker established a school for advanced scholars in 1847. He first taught in the "St. John's House," and from there he went to the Susquehanna Institute, and had charge of that institution for a short time. He was an accomplished scholar and a brilliant man, but somewhat erratic. He studied law and was admitted to the bar in Lancaster in 1847. He married a niece of President Buchanan. He went to California some years ago.

Marietta Academy.—The academy started by Mr. Baker formed the nucleus for another academy that was destined to longer life and greater success. This also started in the St. John's House, by a young man who had been teaching in the lower end of the county, who was a native of Chester County, and was educated in the Quaker schools of that county, which have always and deservedly stood high in the community. He had but little experience as a teacher, but it was soon demonstrated that he was fully equipped in "each and every particular" to make his school a great success. This young man's name was James P. Wickersham, so well known in school circles throughout the country. His success was phenomenal from the start. He purchased the large three-story brick building on the southwest corner of Market Square, and also erected a two-story brick academy building adjoining it on the east. His academy soon filled up, and many scholars came from a distance. The late Maj. Pyfer, of Lancaster, and Dr. Pugh, ex-member of Congress from New Jersey, were some of his pupils.

The school, under his master management, flourished while he had charge of it. He was called to a larger and wider field of usefulness, and was compelled to give up the school he created and made a grand success.

I need not follow him any further in this connection.

High School.—After Mr. Wickersham left Marietta, the citizens, despairing of securing the services of a successful teacher, turned their attention to a public high school, which was soon erected at the rear end of the old Bell school-house. J. R. Sypher, who had been one of Mr. Wickersham's scholars, and a young man of unusual promise, was called to take charge of the school. He was a successful teacher, but ambition led him to seek a wider field, where there was a better prospect of being advanced in the legal profession.

He was followed by Professor Isaac S. Geist, who took charge of the high school in 1863. He filled the chair of Natural Science at Millersville State Normal School. From thence he took charge of a school in Rohrerstown, and remained there five years. From thence he removed to Magnolia, Putnam Co., Ill., where he took charge of an academy. From thence he came to Marietta, as before stated, where he has continued in charge of the high school to the present time.

The common schools of Marietta are excelled by few in the State. The board of public school directors have wisely selected teachers who are best fitted for their vocation, and not chosen from favoritism. Much more might be said in commendation of her schools, but space will not permit a more extended notice.

A Female Seminary was established in the second story of the school building erected by Mr. Wilson, where Mr. Simpson and Mr. Clawges taught. It lasted about two years, when it became a public school.

Susquehanna Institute.—Judge John J. Libhart, James Mehaffey, A. N. Cassel, and several other public-spirited citizens organized a boarding-school by issuing stock and raising a fund from that source. In the year 1840 the large three-story brick building at the eastern end of the town, built by the late Henry Cassel, was fitted up and arranged for an academy.

Edward A. Seiker and a corps of able teachers were selected. The school started fairly, and was quite successful for some time. The stockholders sold their interest to Mr. Seiker, who reorganized the academy and made an effort to establish it upon a firm basis. Although an accomplished scholar, he was no manager. He became involved financially, and the academy was sold by the sheriff.

Newspapers.—Few towns in the State outside of the cities have been more prolific in the publication of newspapers than Marietta. In the month of November, 1813, John Huss, who had just graduated from the Journal office in Lancaster, then under the management of William Hamilton, came to Marietta and established a newspaper called The Pilot, which he printed in the long one-story brick house on the south side of High Street, just below the market-house. In September, 1814, he closed his printing-office and marched to Marcus Hook as lieutenant of Capt. Grosh's company of volunteers, and when Capt. Grosh went to Harrisburg to take his seat as a legislator, Lieut. Huss took command of the company.

William Pierce purchased or took charge of the Pilot office and published a newspaper called the Village Chronicle. In 1816 this publication ceased, and he then commenced the publication of a monthly called the Ladies' Visitor, which was continued about two years, when he again embarked in the newspaper business and established the Pioneer in the fall of 1826, which he named after a steamboat of that name which worked its way up the river from the bay. In 1827 he sold the paper to Charles Nagle, who in the year 1828 sold it to A. Bayard Grosh and his brother, Rufus K. Grosh, who conducted the paper with great ability. Under their management it became a political paper, and supported the "Adams" party. In the year 1829 they sold the paper and presses to Sheaff & Heinitsh, who had just started the Courant in Columbia, who served subscribers of both papers.

The Marietta Advocate was started by William R. McKay. Dr. Woodhull, who was an accomplished speaker and writer, took charge of the editorial department. He came from New Jersey, and returned there in the fall of 1833. The paper lived until the following spring, when it was taken to Lewistown, Pa.

The Ant was started in 1840 by Thomas Taylor, and was followed in 1841 by the Orb, published by Israel Goodman. In 1842, Taylor & Goodman started the Washingtonian, a temperance paper. In the year 1844 the Weekly Argus was started by Israel Goodman and Frederick L. Baker as a Whig paper.

The Little Missionary, published by John F. Weischampel, was contemporaneous with the Argus.

The Mariettian was established on the 11th day of April, 1854, by a joint-stock company, with the view of advancing the material interests of the borough. It was neutral in politics. It was published by Israel Goodman; James P. Wickersham, late superintendent of the schools of the State, then principal of the Marietta Academy; John Jay Libhart, one of the associate judges of the County Court; Abraham N. Cassel, formerly a member of the Legislature of the State and a prominent business man; and Samuel Patterson, a prominent business man; and in 1856, Dr. William K. Mehaffey became sole editor, and Frederick L. Baker publisher. In 1860, Mr. Baker purchased the outstanding stock and became sole proprietor, and he published it as an Independent Republican journal. Its name was changed to Marietta Register. In 1874 he sold the paper to Joseph L. Wolfensberger, who was one of the publishers of the Columbia Spy. In 1875 he sold the paper to Percy P. Shrock and Linville Hendrickson, and in 1880 the latter sold to Mr. Schrock, who is now the sole editor and owner.

The Marietta Times was established Nov. 25, 1876, by George Gilbert Cameron, by whom it is still published. It was originally a four-page, seven-column paper, twenty-four by thirty-six inches. April 1, 1883, the paper was enlarged to nine columns, and size of sheet twenty-eight by forty-two inches.

Marietta Lyceum.<sup>1</sup>—During the winter of 1836–37, Josiah Holbrook made a scientific missionary tour through parts of Lancaster County, lecturing on the natural sciences, and stimulating the establishment of lyceums and the formation of libraries, and the collection of natural objects. Among other places, he sojourned for a short season at Marietta, Pa., which resulted in the organization of the Marietta Lyceum of Natural Sciences. This association continued for some years, its places of meeting being the old Bell school-house and the Mennonite meeting-house, on Walnut Street, and occasionally the Bazaar Cotillion Hall. It held lectures and discussions on scientific and other subjects, procured a set of philosophical implements, and made a respectable collection of books, minerals, etc. Mr. E. Code, Professor Haldeman, Judge Libhart, A. N. Cassel, Esq., and others, delivered lectures before it. Although it stimulated the pursuit of the natural sciences in a few, yet the general interest in it soon waned, and after an active existence of three or four years it was dissolved, the individual property in it withdrawn, and the remainder either divided or specially deposited elsewhere. It never revived, and therefore became extinct. Its influence, however, so far as it pervaded the minds of its members, never died, and perhaps never will.

The Libhart-Marietta Museum.<sup>1</sup>—John Jay Libhart was an artist by profession, a man of marked scientific attainments and more than ordinary mechanical skill; and, even before the organization of the Lyceum, had commenced a collection of objects of vertu. His specialty in natural science was ornithology, and soon after the dissolution of the Lyceum much of the available space in his house was devoted to prepared specimens of birds, mammals, reptiles, fishes, shells, fossils, minerals, etc. These, with the addition of works of art, soon culminated in a museum; and, about 1840, he effected a lease on the large upper room of the market-house, which at that period, and for a long time previous, had occupied a part of the Centre Square of Marietta, and the Libhart Museum accordingly went into active operation.

This museum was very artistically arranged in portable cases, and for a period of ten years was the only museum open to the public in the county of Lancaster. The market building had been erected during the "speculation fever," soon after the incorporation of the borough, about 1815, but never had been a very firm structure, and about 1860 it was declared insecure, and under a decree of the Town Council it was torn down and a market-house built on Walnut Street. No other room in the borough at that period being available for the reception of the museum, it became disintegrated, if not obliterated, but perhaps not entirely extinct, except as a whole. Many of the mammals, birds, fishes, reptiles, and minerals were donated specially to the Lancaster Athenæum, and subsequently transferred to the Linnaean Society. Another portion was transferred to the upper rooms of the old town hall, on Walnut Street, and others (drawer specimens) the proprietor retained in his own possession. But, as a living, active, public institution, it has been as thoroughly extinguished as has been the building that once contained it.

The Pioneer Fire Company of Marietta<sup>1</sup> was incorporated by the Legislature May 21, 1840, the incorporators being James Wilson, Samuel M. Yost, Jacob Stibgen, Robert Ramsey, John Bell, John Huston, William A. Spangler, Henry Charles, James T. Anderson, Samuel Algier, David Rinehart, John Park, Samuel Oberlin, John B. Maloney, Simon S. Nagle, John J. Libhart, Samuel D. Miller, Joseph Inhoff, and A. N. Cassel, of whom Simon S. Nagle, Hon. John J. Libhart, Joseph Inhoff, and Hon. A. N. Cassel are living. The first meeting of the company was held at the public-house of John Barr on Tuesday evening, Jan. 19, 1841. John Jay Libhart presided; A. N. Cassel was chosen secretary. The act of incorporation was read. A. N. Cassel, Henry Charles, John Huston, J. T. Anderson, and John Jay Libhart were selected a committee to draft by-laws for the company. Adjourned to meet Saturday evening, 23d, at same place. The second meeting: The company met agreeably to adjournment Saturday evening, Jan. 23, 1841. The English Presbyterian Church was commenced A. D. 1821, and completed October, 1822. The building here referred to was located on Gay Street, between Walnut and Fairview Streets, nearly opposite the cemetery.

A meeting was held at the church by the appointment of the New Castle Presbytery, present, Rev. Stephen Boyer and Rev. James Latta, committee of said Presbytery for the ordination of elders, when the Rev. Stephen Boyer was called to the chair and David C. Whitehill appointed secretary, and the following persons were nominated and elected elders: John Wilson, Thomas Dickey, Jr., William H. Duffield, James Sterritt, and James Agnew, who were by the said committee regularly ordained and set apart as elders over the English Presbyterian Church in Marietta.

Duffield be a committee to make application to the New Castle Presbytery, now sitting in Lancaster, to be received under their care. The said committee reported on the 28th that they had attended to the duty of their appointment, and the church was received as a member of the Presbytery of New Castle on the same footing as the other churches.

A special meeting of the session of the English Presbyterian Church in Marietta was held, according to previous notice from the pulpit, Saturday, April 3, 1824, at which Thomas Dickey was appointed clerk of the session.

In pursuance of previous notice, a meeting of the congregation was held on the same day in the church at eleven o'clock, for the purpose of electing a pastor, when a motion was made by James Wilson that one of the session be appointed moderator. Agreed to after some delay. But few persons being present, it was agreed to adjourn to meet at six o'clock in the evening. Met agreeably to adjournment, when it was unanimously resolved that Orson Doughlass be and he is hereby declared the choice of this congregation as their pastor, and that a regular call be made out to be presented to the Presbytery of New Castle for three-fourths of his time,—on three Sabbath afternoons out of four,—and that James Mehaffy, Elijah Russel, James Sterrett, James Wilson, John Spangler, James Agnew, and Peter Baker be a committee to sign the call, and James Wilson be commissioned to present it to Presbytery.

Agreeably to previous notice, the congregation met on May 5, 1824, and adopted a charter for the government of the church, in which James Mehaffy, Elijah Russel, and James Wilson were made the trustees, to act one, two, and three years, one trustee to be elected annually afterwards. This charter was presented to the Supreme Court May 17th, and approved Oct. 13, 1824.

The call for the services of Orson Doughlass was laid before the Presbytery of New Castle, and being found in order, a committee was appointed to install him on the first Friday in June, services to commence at eleven o'clock in the morning, Samuel Martin to preach the sermon, Rev. James Latta to give the charge to the pastor and congregation. The said committee attended to the duties of their appointment at the time above specified by installing Rev. Orson Doughlass as pastor.

The Rev. Orson Doughlass supplied the pulpits of the Donegal and Marietta Churches principally from the dedication of the Marietta Church, in 1822, till the time of his installation, in 1824, when he became pastor of both churches. The following persons, members of the Donegal Church, were dismissed from said church to become members of the church in Marietta, as follows: Catherine Dickey, Rebecca Dickey, Alexander Rogers, Hannah Rogers, Peter Baker, Mary Baker, Margaret Jones, Mary Jones, Catherine Longnecker, Elizabeth Jack, Mary Balie, David Ferree, Sophia Moulton, Nancy Smith, Ann Davis, Margaret McColoch, James Steele, C. The foregoing persons made application to the session, and were admitted to membership Aug. 24, 1824.

James Steele and James Wilson were elected and installed elders December, 1826. Several elders removed from the neighborhood. Jacob Stahl and Henry Speice were elected elders Feb. 26, 1836, and ordained by Rev. Orson Doughlass.

The Rev. Orson Doughlass resigned as pastor of the church May 12, 1836.

In pursuance of previous public notice from the pulpit, a meeting of the congregation was held in the church on the third Monday of April, 1837, at which an election for pastor was held, which resulted in the unanimous election of the Rev. Thomas Marshall Boggs to preach every other Sabbath afternoon, he also being pastor of Donegal Church. He continued pastor of both churches to the time of his death in Mount Joy, in October, 1850.

The Rev. William A. Rankin was elected and regularly ordained pastor of the English Presbyterian Church in Marietta for his whole time. It was during his pastorate the present church was built in Market Street; the old church on Gay Street was removed, and materials used in part in the construction of the new church. The building committee of the present church, James Whitehill, Jacob Stahl, A. N. Cassel, and Charles Kelly; John H. Goodman, architect. The church was completed and dedicated January, 1854.

The Rev. William A. Rankin resigned as pastor May, 1854.

The church supplied itself with preachers from the time of the resignation of the Rev. Rankin till the time Rev. P. J. Timlow became stated supply on Nov. 20, 1855, in which position he continued till April 4, 1860, when a call was made and accepted. He was regularly installed pastor of the Presbyterian Church in Marietta May 1, 1860, and continued pastor till his resignation April 18, 1865.

The Rev. William A. Fleming was called as pastor Nov. 7, 1865. Samuel Lindsay and A. N. Cassel were elected and ordained elders March 17, 1867, by him. He resigned as pastor December, 1867. James Ab. Anderson and T. Heastand were elected deacons during his pastorate.

Rev. William J. Bridells was installed pastor of the English Presbyterian Church in Marietta Oct. 21, 1868. Rev. George Gamble preached the sermon; Rev. P. J. Timlow gave the charge to the pastor, Rev. John Elliott the charge to the people. William McAfee and Benjamin Ohmit were elected deacons, and ordained Nov. 30, 1870, by him. He resigned as pastor January, 1878.

The church supplied itself by consent of Presbytery from the time of the resignation of Rev. Bridells till Rev. John McElmoyle became stated supply, November, 1878, and received a regular call, and was ordained and installed pastor of the English Presbyterian Church in Marietta, Pa., April 20, 1879. During his pastorate S. P. Sterrett, Theodore Heistand, and Lewis Z. Lindemuth were elected elders, and ordained July 6, 1879. Theodore Heistand's resignation was accepted November, 1881. Abraham Summy, J. S. Geist, and Daniel Ilgenfritz were also ordained deacons at the same time.

The Rev. John McElmoyle resigned this charge March 1, 1883.

Number of members reported to Westminster Presbytery in regular standing at the last meeting, 170. This church and the Mount Joy Church were originally taken from the Donegal Church.

The Sunday-school connected with the Presbyterian Church in Marietta was one of the first Sunday-schools established in the State, and formed as a Union school, all denominations taking part, in 1819, and was called the Marietta Sunday-School Association.

The following persons were presidents: Rev. William Kerr, 1819-21; Mr. James Mehaffey, 1821-23; Rev. Orson Doughlass, 1823-35; Rev. T. M. Boggs, 1835-50; James Wilson, Samuel Ludwig, and others, from 1850-68; William I. Bridells, 1868-78; and was succeeded by Rev. McElmoyle, 1878-79; Mr. I. S. Geist, 1879 to the present time (1883).

This school was first organized in what was known as the Bell school-house, but afterwards removed to the small building east of Mrs. Eagler, where it remained till the Presbyterian Church was built on Gay Street, when it was taken there. The teachers and managers were then nearly all Presbyterians. It became a Presbyterian Sunday-school in 1823. The following have been elected superintendents of the school: James Parks, 1819-23; John Wilson, 1823-28; James Wilson, 1829; Thomas Dickey, Jr., 1829-30; Lewis Kellog, 1830-33; James Steele, 1833-34; James Wilson, 1834-64; Samuel Lindsay, 1864-77; Theodore Hiestand, 1877-80; superintendent at present, H. B. Cassel, 1880-83.

The school was removed from the Presbyterian Church several years before the removal of the church to the house now on the northeast corner of Gay and Walnut Streets, and in 1854 removed to the room it now occupies in the Presbyterian Church, and that it did not number over twenty since its formation. The Methodist Episcopal, Reformed Lutheran, Catholic, United Brethren, and African have established Sunday-schools, towards which this school contributed a large number of scholars.

The present officers of the church are: Elders, Jacob Stahl, A. N. Cassel, S. P. Sterrett, Louis C. Lindemuth; Trustees, S. P. Sterrett, C. A. Shaffner, B. F. Hiestand; Deacons, William McAfee, Theodore Hiestand, J. S. Griest, Daniel Ilgenfritz.

Methodist Episcopal Church.—Just when the pioneer of Methodism wended his way to what is now the peaceful and quiet borough of Marietta is not definitely known. Neither is it positively known to the writer or any of his informers who he was or how he came, whether on foot, on horseback, or in a canoe. The probabilities are, however, that he came down along the left bank of the noble old Susquehanna, spying out the land as he came, and wherever a pioneer settlement was discovered, there the old-fashioned pioneer itinerant would unfurl the banner of his Master, and in the good old Wesleyan way, without fee or the expectation of reward, urge sinners to flee the wrath to come. The old pioneer preacher was truly a character; dressed in homespun, broad-brim hat, white necktie, if any at all, long, flowing locks of hair, silvered o'er with the frosts of many winters, falling gracefully over his shoulders, he thus appeared the very embodiment of goodness. He always rode his best horse, for he never had but one at a time, and that would last him many years. His outfit for a four or eight weeks' journey around the circuit was an old-fashioned leather portmanteau fastened on behind the saddle, in which was, first, a small Bible and a Methodist hymn-book, next a change of linen (coarse shirt), a small supply of coarse bread and meat, to be eaten in case of necessity, and that necessity came many a time with the old pioneer itinerant on a six or eight hundred mile circuit. To one of these self-sacrificing saints of God, who took their lives in their hand and traversed the then wilds of Pennsylvania, scaling mountains, wandering through valleys, fording rivers, and braving the elements, is due the planting of Methodism as early as 1800 at what is now the town of Marietta. But few inhabitants were here at that time, but it mattered not to the old veteran of the cross, who was simply obeying the divine command, "Go ye into all the world and preach my gospel." He could preach to the poor and lowly in the most unpretentious hut as well or better than to the king in his palace. Like all other places, a "class" was to be formed at Waterford or New Haven as a nucleus around which might grow up a prosperous society, and it is believed that such a class was formed here as early as 1815 or 1820, and possibly earlier. The first class-leader is supposed to have been Benjamin Garman, as he was known to be a leader as early as 1823 or 1825. Preaching services were held at private houses when convenient, and occasionally under the spreading branches of some large tree, and from 1825 to 1830 the Methodists occupied that little long, low brick building on what is now Market Street, and now owned by Barr Spangler. In 1830 the society built a frame meeting-house on what was known for many years as Back Street, now Walnut Street, on the site now occupied by the Evangelical Lutheran Church. Previous to 1830, probably as early as 1825, and no doubt with the view of owning church property, the following trustees were elected for this region of country: Benjamin Garman, Marietta; Henry Haldeman, Locust Grove; and — Lloyd, Esq., of Columbia.

The Methodists continued to occupy their house of worship on Walnut Street until the building of their new brick meeting-house in 1850. From 1830 to 1865, or a little later, the Methodists had within their congregation or adherents of that faith the wealth and aristocracy of the town, and at present stands more than equal with their sister-churches. The original cost of the present church edifice, located on Second Street, was about five thousand dollars, and in 1874 was remodeled and somewhat beautified at an expense of about three thousand dollars. In 1865 the society was incorporated with the following-named trustees: Benjamin Garman, Jacob A. Wisner, Robert Carroll, George W. Clawgus, Alexander Smith, and George W. Worrell.

Among the early members of the society, or those belonging previous to 1840, we find the names of not only those mentioned previous to that date, but a Mr. Wormly, who was a trustee, Catharine Jamison, Catharine McMichael, Mrs. Kelly, Margaret G. Childs, Robert Carroll, Mary Carroll, Hannah Shill, Mrs. Grosh, John B. Carter, a class-leader in 1839, Rebecca Carroll, Helen Cramer, Anna Shill, Maria Martin, Sarah Trump, and Catharine Souders. No doubt there were many more, but we have no means of obtaining their names. From 1840 to 1860 the following-named persons were and are still some of the membership: Robert Turner, George Rodesill, Jacob Wisner, Abram Musser, Mrs. Kramer, Mrs. Longenecker, James McClure and wife, Rachel Bowman, C. Stibian and wife, Mrs. Rathvon.

Among the pastors who have served this people and congregation previous to 1865 we find the following, who are remembered by the older members: Revs. Sutton, Sumption, Edwards, Reed, Greenbank, Berridge, Kurtze, Librand, Petit, Pancoast, Gillingham. From 1863 we have the following complete list of pastors: 1863-65, Joseph Gregg; 1865-66, William Matthias; 1866-68, John Stringer; 1868-71, J. R. Taylor Gray; 1871-73, S. A. Heilman; 1873-75, C. H. McDermond; 1875-77, J. Lindermuth; 1877-79, J. M. Wheeler; 1879-81, J. Wesley Geiger; 1881-84, J. C. Wood.

Officiary, 1888: Stewards, James McClure, Sr., James McClure, Jr., Harry Graybill, M. M. Caracher, and Aaron Sauerbier.

Class-leaders, Robert Turner, George W. Worrell, and M. M. Caracher.

Trustees, Michael Gabel, Frank Lawrence, Adam Wiseman, Aaron Sauerbier, Amos Bowman, and Harry Graybill.

Zion's Church.—The following is a copy of the original subscription-paper for raising money with which to build this church:

To the people of all religious denominations:

"The building of meeting-houses for religious worship is not only laudable, but a duty which men owe their Creator, for the use of themselves and their posterity. It is therefore presumed that no arguments in favor of the building of a meeting-house are necessary; but means to defray the expense of such a building are absolutely wanted. The number of individuals of each denomination being small, it would be very burdensome for each sect to build a meeting-house of their own; but all Christians joining in building one for the common use and benefit of all, the burden will dwindle into almost nothing. It is therefore proposed to build a meeting-house in the borough of Marietta, for the common use and benefit of all denominations of Protestant Christians, to be regulated, in all respects, in such a manner as a majority of subscribers present at a meeting to be called for the purpose by the five first subscribers may direct; at which meeting there shall be appointed persons to fix on the spot whereon the building shall be erected, the size and dimensions thereof, as also persons to collect the money so subscribed, and to provide the material and superintend the building, etc.

"For the purpose above mentioned, and for no other, we, the subscribers hereunto, do promise to pay, on demand, to such person or persons as above mentioned, or their order, the several sums of money by each of us respectively subscribed and annexed to each of our names.

"Witness our hands July, 1817."

The subscriptions reached an aggregate of fourteen hundred and seventy-seven dollars and forty cents, and at a meeting of the subscribers, held in September of the same year, resolutions were adopted pre-scribing rules for their government, among which it was set forth that no sect or denomination should be excluded, "but each shall have an equal right to said church agreeable to the subscription papers."

The borough authorities gave permission for the erection of the church on "the west corner of the burying-ground," "for the use of all Protestant Christian denominations, none to be excluded." The corner-stone was laid on the 23d of August, 1818, and the memorandum deposited in it repeated the condition that the church to be erected there was "for the use of all Protestant Christians residing in Marietta or its neighborhood, and joining this congregation as pew-holders or otherwise."

The church was consecrated June 15, 1823. It appears from the record that no trustees were elected during twenty years, but on the 4th of December, 1843, Samuel Eberly, Samuel Hopkins, Henry Sultzbauch, John Kline, Samuel D. Miller, Philip Ropp, John Paules, and James B. Shaffner were chosen, and trustees were regularly elected afterwards. In 1854 the German Reformed and Lutheran congregations were allowed by the trustees to place an organ in the church. The burial-ground in which the church stood became so full that it was found necessary in 1857 to restrict the privilege of making interments there. An addition to it was made by the borough, but burials there have long since ceased.

The German Reformed and Lutheran congregations used this house as a place of worship during many years. About four years since the Lutherans ceased to worship here. The Reformed Society became practically extinct many years since, but five years ago it was revived, and it has since occupied this house.

Every religious society or church in the borough, except the Catholic Church, has occupied this house in the early period of its existence. The house has not been greatly changed since its erection. A gallery has been added, a bell-tower has been built, and some changes have been made in its internal arrangements. It is a brick structure, and its seating capacity is four hundred.

St. John's Protestant Episcopal Church, of Marietta,<sup>1</sup> located on the corner of Second and Chestnut Streets (south of Second), was incorporated in 1865 (has a seal). The building is a brick structure, is sixty-seven feet in length, and thirty-two feet in width, with steeple and bell, and large basement. The building was commenced and corner-stone laid in 1866, and finished in 1867. The finishing of the church inside—the pulpit, altar, arches of chancel doors, pews, wainscoting, and church furniture—are walnut. The windows are of stained or colored glass of different colors (figures or representations and mottoes on large chancel windows), with arched ceiling. Roving room and pulpit on east side of chancel, and organ and choir on west side, making a very comfortable and pleasant house for worship. The Sunday-school and reciting rooms are in the basement of the church building. First rector called was the Rev. R. C. Russell. First vestry of the new church was S. F. Eagle, Dr. Edwin Haldeman, C. J. Nourse, E. D. Roath, Henry Wolf, William Kendig, Jacob Reth, and Jacob C. Burkert.

Jacob C. Burkhart was elected secretary of vestry. The following were appointed the building committee, viz.: Rev. R. C. Russell, Stephen F. Eagle, Dr. E. Haldeman, and E. D. Roath, treasurer; cost of building proper and ground, nine thousand nine hundred dollars. The church was dedicated Nov. 14, 1872, by the Right Rev. Mark Antony De Wolfe Howe, bishop. The corner-stone was laid by the Right Rev. — Vale, Bishop of the Diocese of Nebraska, Wyoming, and other Territories, composing one diocese.

The church is in good condition and free from debt, and owns a fine brick rectory not far from the church on Second Street. Within the last few years, under the charge of the last rector, Rev. Alonzo Potter Diller, many have been added to the membership. Pews free. The Sunday-school is in a flourishing condition, numbering one hundred and thirty-five pupils, thirteen teachers, and three officers; Albert D. Wike, superintendent. Over two thousand volumes have been purchased since the organization. A number of volumes have become soiled and worn out, and have been replaced by publications of later date.

Names of rectors that have been called and officiated as rectors are, viz.: Revs. Robert C. Russell, Charles H. Meade, William T. Davidson, James O. Drumm, and Alonzo P. Diller. The present vestry consists of the following, viz.: Stephen F. Eagle, rector's warden; E. D. Roath, church warden; George W. Mehaffey, A. D. Wike, H. S. Stauffer, Simon F. Stibgen, Dr. George Reich, George F. Stibgen. A. D. Wike, secretary.

Services were frequently held in Zion's Church prior to building and establishing St. John's parish by Dr. Appleton and others for the membership in this locality.

Zion's German-English Evangelical Lutheran Congregation<sup>2</sup> of the borough of Marietta and vicinity, in Lancaster County, Pa., was organized in the year of our Lord 1855. As early, however, as 1652 the nucleus of the congregation was already formed. Previous to this year the spiritual wants of the Lutherans at Marietta were attended to by the pastors of the Lutheran Church at Columbia, Pa. In 1852 the Lutherans and German Reformed of Marietta organized a so-called union congregation. Rev. — Doer, a Reformed minister, preached for them every two weeks. This arrangement, however, was continued only a little over a year. During the two years following there was preaching occasionally by individuals, some of whom proved themselves very worthless characters.

In the early part of the summer of 1855, Rev. George M. Merz, a Lutheran minister, came to Marietta, and, making himself known, was asked by the Lutherans to remain with them and become their pastor. A congregation was organized and officers elected. No official written documents relating to the congregation exist, as far as we know, of this period save the record of the ministerial acts of Rev. Merz. His first entry is the baptism of a child, dated July 1, 1855, and the last, also an infant baptism, Sept. 19, 1858.

His successor was found in the person of Rev. Joseph Schmalzl, pastor of Salem's German Lutheran Church at Columbia, Pa. His ministrations were brief, about one year. Soon after he was elected pastor the congregation adopted a constitution, on the 7th of November, 1858. It is signed by the pastor and fifty-six male members. The following are the names of those who signed it, and are still living and members of the congregation: Ferdinand Zuch, Christopher Kolb, Wilhelm Theisinger, Johann Meister, George Raum, Friedrich Bink, Wilhelm Westenhofer, Jacob Menge, Dionis Ziegelmeier, and Adam Koehler, Sr. This constitution was superseded by another adopted on the 15th of January, 1860.

In the fall of 1859, Rev. J. A. Darmstaetter, who had completed his studies at the Lutheran Seminary at Gettysburg, Pa., and was called to the pastorate of Salem German Lutheran Church at Columbia, was elected pastor of the congregation. He accepted, and served Marietta in connection with Columbia, residing at the latter place and preaching at the former every two weeks. In 1859 a Sunday-school was organized, of which Mr. Michael Stump has been the efficient superintendent since 1866. Mr. Christian Kolb and Mr. Ferdinand Zuch served in this capacity also. During the long and faithful service of the Rev. Darmstaetter the congregation grew and waxed strong. With great self-denial and sacrifice he earnestly labored to make the congregation self-sustaining, and have it to call a pastor who would reside in Marietta and preach in the German and English language. His labors were crowned with success. After serving the congregation for almost nineteen years, he resigned on the 24th of March, 1878, retaining the congregation at Columbia and Chestnut Hill. He preached his farewell sermon on the 2d of June, 1878.

The congregation, now forming a separate charge, extended a call to its present pastor, Rev. George Ph. Mueller, a graduate of the Lutheran Concordia College at Fort Wayne, Ind., and of the Lutheran Theological Seminary in Philadelphia. He accepted, and was installed on the 14th of July, 1878, by his predecessor, assisted by Rev. F. P. Mayser, of Lancaster, Pa. As one of the conditions of his call was to preach in the German and English language, and also to perform his ministerial acts in both, as might be requested, he reorganized the German congregation into a German-English, when they adopted a new constitution on the 19th of August, 1878. The congregation, not being incorporated, obtained a charter on the 23d of January, 1882.

Until the winter of 1878 the congregation was without a church building of its own. It worshiped in Zion's Church, a building erected by the contribution of the Protestants of this place, and open to all denominations who wish to worship there. Rent was paid for the use of this building. In 1874 the congregation bought a lot on the corner of Walnut Street and Mulberry Alley. Two years later, in 1876, it put in the foundation for a church edifice, but owing to adverse circumstances did not proceed to the building thereof. Thus things stood until the 26th of August, 1878, when a congregational meeting was held and the erection of a church discussed. It was unanimously resolved to build. Matters were now pushed, and on the 15th of September the cornerstone was laid, and three months later the edifice was finished, and dedicated on the 15th of December, 1878. The structure is built of brick, Gothic style, thirty-three by sixty feet, excluding buttresses; walls sixteen feet high. In 1883 the congregation added a tower, and the Women Society presented the bell, in memory of the four-hundredth anniversary of the birth of Dr. Martin Luther, born Nov. 10, 1483. The bell weighs five hundred and eighteen pounds without mountings, which are a present of the Young Folks' Society, and was consecrated on the 15th of July, the fifth anniversary of Rev. Mueller's installation as pastor. The whole property of the congregation is estimated at four thousand dollars, and is free of debt. The congregation numbers one hundred and thirty-six confirmed members, and the Sunday-school one hundred and thirty-nine pupils and nineteen teachers.

From July 1, 1855, to July 27, 1883, the following ministerial acts were performed by the pastors of the congregation, as recorded in the church record: baptisms, 666; confirmations, 201; communions, 2882; marriages, 114; burials, 242.

St. Mary's Catholic Church.—Prior to the year 1870 the Roman Catholics living in Marietta had been obliged to go to Columbia in order to hear mass, except during the time that Father Russell said mass for them in their town hall. For a long time they had manifested an anxiety to have a church in their town, where they might assist at divine service, and with the view of obtaining the erection of the desired church, a suitable site at the intersection of Second and Perry Streets, one hundred and twenty by two hundred and ten feet, was purchased, the deed being made out in the names of the following trustees: Prof. S. S. Haldeman, Jno. K. Fidler, and William H. Eagle. A part of the required sum for the purchase was collected and paid to Mr. Henry Ockard, the owner. In 1867 the deed of the lot was transferred by the trustees to the Right Rev. James F. Wood, Bishop of Philadelphia, in trust for the Roman Catholic congregation of Marietta, Pa. The balance—five hundred dollars—owing on the lot was paid to Mr. Ockard, Sept. 23, 1869, by the Rev. James J. Russell, pastor. On Nov. 4, 1869, the rite of the laying of the cornerstone of the church was performed by the Right Rev. J. F. Shanahan, who, in the preceding year, had been consecrated bishop of the new diocese of Harrisburg. The sermon on the occasion was preached by the Right Rev. Thomas A. Becker, of the diocese of Wilmington, Del. On the 7th of May, 1871, the chapel of the church was dedicated by the Right Rev. J. F. Shanahan to the great joy and delight of the people, and on the same day mass was said in it for the first time. The church is fifty by ninety-eight feet.

The next important events in the history of the church were the opening of a mission by the Redemptorist Fathers, and the blessing at its close on the 16th of June, 1872, of a beautiful cross bestowed on the church by Paris Haldeman, Esq., whose generosity in this and in other ways is held in grateful remembrance by the people of St. Mary's parish. This cross surmounts the steeple of the church. The parochial school was opened on the 2d of September, 1873, and placed under the care of the Sisters of Charity, to whom at the same time was assigned the charge of the Sunday-school, which, up to this date, had, for a number of years, been presided over by Miss Margaret Trainor.

Before the numerical loss (written of further on) which the congregation sustained, the average number of pupils in the Sunday-school had been seventy-five; it is now about forty. Lack of employment in Marietta during the panicky times of recent years compelled many of the families of St. Mary's congregation to migrate to other districts where work could be had. In consequence of this diminution of the number of the parishioners, the fine church is only partially completed. While, however, the church proper is unfinished, the edifice possesses a magnificent basement, in which the children of the parochial school are taught, and on Sunday divine services held. With the record here of the liberal pecuniary aid which the non-Catholics of Marietta gave in the erection of the church, this brief history of its infancy closes.

United Brethren.—This church was organized May 26, 1880, by Rev. William S. Leshner, with the following-named persons as the original members, who were also the first trustees: Abram R. Lutz, D. Detweiler, and Samuel Nye. This organization was at first connected with the German Conference, and subsequently transferred to the English Conference. In the fall of 1880, through the means of a special meeting, about forty persons were added to the church. The house of worship, located in West Marietta, was built by the Methodist Society to be occupied as a chapel, and in May, 1880, sold to the United Brethren, and by them was dedicated in June of the same year. Present membership, twenty-six. The trustees for 1888 were A. R. Lutz, Alexander McAfee, Joseph McFarland, George Geiser, and Samuel Staeks. Value of church property, eleven hundred dollars. Present pastor, Rev. Mr. Kramer.

The Sunday-school connected with this church was organized in April, 1888, with Christian Stibgen as superintendent, with thirty-five pupils.

African Churches.—There are also two African churches or congregations in Marietta, of which no reliable information could be obtained as to date of organization, building of churches, names of pioneer members, first preachers, or present condition of the societies. It was stated, however, by persons cognizant of the fact, that both churches were in a flourishing condition, and well supplied with ministerial assistance.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

JAMES DUFFY.

John Duffy, the grandfather of James, was born in Newtown, Cunningham County, Donegal, Ireland, where he followed the vocation of leather-dressing. He was married to Miss Ann Bradley, and had one son, James, who was born in the same county and township in Ireland, where he was an extensive contractor. He was a man of large acquirements and exceptional business capacity. He was married to Miss Catharine Sheridan, of the same county, and during the year 1800 emigrated to America, and settled in the city of Lancaster, Lancaster Co., from whence he removed to Marietta in the same county.

Mr. Duffy, aside from his business occupations in Ireland, was connected with the military service, and a member of the Light Horse Cavalry. He continued his former business in Pennsylvania, constructed the Marietta and Lancaster turnpike, the turnpike from Elizabethtown to the Susquehanna River, and a large portion of the road from Carlisle to Baltimore via York Springs and Gettysburg.

He also projected a portion of the borough of Marietta. In politics he was a Democrat, and in his religious predilections a Roman Catholic.

Mr. and Mrs. Duffy had twelve children, of whom seven survived. The death of Mrs. Duffy occurred in 1820, and that of Mr. Duffy in 1836, in his sixty-fifth year. Their son James was born in Marietta, Sept. 16, 1818, where the uneventful years of his childhood were spent, in the enjoyment of such limited educational advantages as the public school of the neighborhood afforded. The boatman's craft on the Susquehanna River at that early day offered the most inviting field to young men residing along its shores, and here the young man sought occupation, first as a hand, next as steersman, from which he rose to the rank of pilot. He continued thus employed until 1846, and the following year made a trip to Europe. In 1848 he established a line of boats for the purpose of transporting coal from Pottsville to New York, in the interests of the Schuylkill Navigation Company. In connection with James Mehaffy, a son

Eng. by A. H. Ritchie

James Duffley

Henry Mufson

of his father's former partner in his land operations in Marietta, he embarked in the lumber business, which was continued until 1865. Mr. Duffy was married on the 8th of September, 1863, to Miss Martha, daughter of John Park, of Marietta. Their children are Josephine, Catherine (deceased), James, Donald Cameron, Thomas Bayard, John Park (deceased), Martha Park, John Park, 2d (deceased), and one who died in infancy.

In 1861, Mr. Duffy became a member of a firm engaged in the transportation of government supplies to the forts in New Mexico and the West, including Salt Lake, an enterprise involving many millions of dollars a year and the labor of thirty thousand oxen. He was thus actively interested for a period of seven years, after which he retired from business, and has since devoted his attention principally to his landed investments, and won a reputation as the most extensive tobacco-grower in the State. In 1877 he became interested in the Marietta Hollow-ware and Enamelling Company, in which he controls one-half the capital stock. He was, in 1875, appointed one of the Commissioners of Fisheries for the State of Pennsylvania, and has since been one of the chief promoters of fish culture throughout the State.

He has also been largely identified with the growth and development of the township and borough of his residence. He is an earnest sympathizer with all public improvements, and a director of the Bald Eagle Valley Railroad. Mr. Duffy in politics affiliates with the Democracy, though indifferent to the honors which are the reward of party service. His associations are not confined within the limits of his own county, both business and social matters having led to an intimate acquaintance with men eminent in political, financial, and educational circles. His house is the centre of a liberal hospitality, and the resort of men of distinction, irrespective of creed or party.

Mr. Duffy was educated in the Roman Catholic faith, of which he is a supporter, though a willing contributor to other religious denominations.

HENRY MUSSELMAN.

The Musselman family may be classed as Pennsylvania German, its representatives having for generations resided in the State. The parents of Henry were Henry and Magdalena Musselman. Their son, Henry, was born in Lancaster township, where his father was a successful farmer, on the 4th of October, 1798, his early life having been spent within the bounds of the county at Silver Spring. On reaching manhood he removed to Mount Joy, and engaged in mercantile pursuits, and later embarked in the forwarding business in connection with John Patterson. After a residence of several years at Mount Joy he removed to Marietta, and during the year 1848, with Dr. Shoenberger, of Pittsburgh, erected an extensive furnace. On the death of the latter Henry Watts became a partner in the enterprise. In 1849 another furnace was built, and ultimately a third under the auspices of Henry Musselman & Sons, the property having been disposed of on the death of the members of the latter firm. Henry Musselman was first married to a Miss Rohrer, to whom were born three sons,—John, David, and Christian. By a second marriage, on the 23d of December, 1830, to Miss Anna B., daughter of Abram and Barbara Hackman, of Mount Joy, there were five children,—Abram H., whose birth occurred Nov. 30, 1831, in Mount Joy, and his death Feb. 14, 1877; Samuel, who was born Sept. 5, 1835, and died Nov. 14, 1874; Henry S., born Aug. 10, 1843, who died April 6, 1870, in Baden, Germany, where he had gone to perfect himself in the study of medicine; Anna M., born June 12, 1839, and one who died in early life. Abram H. Musselman was one of the most active men in the iron business, and universally esteemed as a genial, kind-hearted, and enterprising gentleman. He aided largely in the improvement of the village, which he made his home, and was especially zealous for the welfare of the workmen in his employ, to whom his death was a sad calamity.

Samuel Musselman was a man of no less energy and public spirit, and contributed largely by his ability to the success of the industry in which he was engaged. In his intercourse with his fellows he was courteous, kind, and generous, and justly won for himself the appellation, "the noblest work of God," an honest man.

The subject of this sketch was in politics formerly an Old-Line Whig, and subsequently a Republican, though rarely interesting himself beyond the casting of his ballot in the political issues of the day. He was a liberal contributor to all worthy religious objects, though not connected with any denomination. Mr. Musselman's death occurred Dec. 6, 1875, in his seventy-eighth year. This portrait and biographical sketch are inserted by his wife as a tribute of affectionate regard.

DAVID COOK.

David Cook was born in 1750, upon the farm upon which he laid out the town of New Haven, and died at Hagerstown, Md., June 12, 1824. His grandfather, James Cook, was one of the pioneer settlers in Donegal township, who died in 1741, leaving a widow, Elizabeth, and the following children: Thomas, David (father of the subject of this sketch), James, Edward, Joseph, John, Catherine, Jean, and Margaret.

David, the second son of James, and the father of the subject of this sketch, owned and resided upon the farm at Marietta. He died in 1787, and left a wife, Martha, and the following-named children: John (who married Elizabeth Tettle, Sept. 5, 1780), David, Samuel, Grace R., Pedan, and James.

David, married Mary (1766-1820), daughter of Colin McFarquahr, the minister of the Presbyterian Church at Donegal. He was a justice of the peace for many years. He was an amiable and most worthy citizen.

JAMES MEHAFFY.

James Mehaffy was one of the pioneer settlers, and came to Anderson's Ferry about the year 1804. When David Cook laid out New Haven he purchased a lot, erected a house, and opened a store. He moved to Waterford in 1807, where he also was assessed as a store-keeper, and he also commenced the purchase of lumber until he accumulated a large stock. During his time he was the most successful of all the business men in the place. He was the only prominent person in the town who was not ruined by the financial crash which followed the war of 1812. Although his losses were heavy, he gradually accumulated a large estate. He built and resided in the dwelling now owned by Simon S. Nagle.

HENRY CASSEL.

Henry Cassel was born near the junction of Back Run and Big Chikis Creek, in Rapho township, at the base of the northeastern slope of Sporting Hill, on the 12th of March, 1776. His grandfather, Abraham Cassel, settled at this place in the year 1750, where he built a grist-mill. His son, Abraham, was born there, and on the 18th day of April, 1775, he married Esther Weiss. They had the following children: Henry, born March 12, 1776, the subject of this sketch; Maria, born Dec. 18, 1779; and Abraham, born Dec. 14, 1782.

Henry Cassel, being the oldest son, got the homestead and mill, where he carried on an extensive business for several years. Having married Catharine, daughter of John Neff, Esq., of Hempfield, who obtained by inheritance the farm at the eastern limits of Marietta, removed to that place several years before either Waterford or New Haven were laid out. He was the first person along the river that did a commission business. He received immense quantities of flour, grain, whiskey, lumber, and stone-coal, which he shipped to Port Deposit in arks; thence to Baltimore, which he sold for other parties, charging a commission of five per cent.

WILLIAM CHILDS.

William Childs was a hatter by trade. His inclination led him to follow other pursuits more congenial to his taste, for which his abilities seemed better adapted. He was engaged for some years in the lumber and coal business. He was cashier of the Marietta Bank for two or three years, and after its failure he was appointed a justice of the peace, an office he held for many years. He was one of the best scriveners in the county, and it was safe to accept his opinion upon any law question submitted to him. His dwelling stood where the Marietta Bank is, on Market Street. He died about forty years ago, aged eighty years, leaving a family of several children.

REV. ABRAHAM H. LONG.

Rev. Abraham H. Long was born in East Donegal township, Lancaster Co., April 5, 1823. His parents were Mennonites. His grandfather, Herman Long, was one of the early settlers of Lancaster County. Rev. A. H. Long is a minister in the denomination known as "The Church of God." He entered the ministry in 1853, and has been pastor of the Churches of God in Maytown, Bainbridge, Elizabethtown, Mount Joy, Rohrerstown, and Landisville. He has also served a number of churches in Cumberland and other counties, and preached two years in Wooster, Ohio. He has also published a volume of sermons. The book is entitled "Popular Semons." He has preached nearly five thousand sermons.

SAMUEL HOUSTON.

Dr. Samuel Houston came to the place about the close of the war of 1812, and commenced the practice of medicine. He was an ardent supporter of the war, and opposed the Federal party with great bitterness. He was a candidate for the State Senate, but was defeated. A violent personal warfare was made upon him in the Federal newspapers. He engaged in the river business, and purchased great quantities of stone-coal, provisions, grain, flour, and whiskey, which he stored upon the river-bank and in large warehouses. He shipped these articles in arks which ran down the river to Port Deposit, thence transferred to schooners and taken to Baltimore.

He opposed Jackson's election in 1824 and supported Adams', and when the Anti-Masonic party came into existence he became one of its leading members. That party nominated him for the State Senate when York was attached to Lancaster in the senatorial district, and was defeated by Mr. Caldwell, the Democratic candidate. He was an intimate and warm friend of Thaddeus Stevens, and, like him, hated human slavery, and was a sincere friend of the oppressed. He employed colored men whenever he could, and often he not only gave fugitive slaves employment, but when danger threatened them with a return to bondage, he either concealed them in the neighborhood or sent them on the "Underground Railroad" to a place of safety. He was able and ready at all times to discuss with an opponent the most radical views, and was not only gifted with moral courage but physical also. He built and resided in the large two-story brick dwelling at the northwest corner of Market Square. But one daughter and son survive him.

ELIJAH RUSSELL.

Capt. Elijah Russell was in the war of 1812, and came to Marietta about the year 1812 and embarked in the mercantile business and prospered for some years, but finally lost heavily. He married a daughter of Anthony Haines, who owned the Anderson farm. While on his way to York borough, via Vinegar's Ferry, he was thrown from his horse, and died in a few days from the injuries he then received. He left no children surviving him.

DAVID RINEHART.

David Rinehart came from Chester County about the year 1812 and was apprenticed to learn the carpenter trade, and attained his majority about the year 1818. In the following year he enlisted in Capt. Jacob Grosh's company and marched to Marcus Hook. He engaged in the lumber business at Marietta and also at Port Deposit. His residence was situated on Front Street, near Elbow Lane, and adjoining the "Compass and Square," a tavern kept by James Stackhouse, the old river pilot, who had in his employment a young man named Jacob Tome, who attended bar and was always ready and willing to do any kind of work about the hotel in cases of emergency. Mr. Rinehart noticed his industry and discerned qualities of mind which fitted him for a higher sphere in the business walks of life. He took him by the hand and offered him the management of his business at Port Deposit, Md., which he accepted. His success there was phenomenal, and it was but a little while until Mr. Rinehart gave him an interest in the business; and from that small beginning, without any means of his own, he has become a millionaire and one of the most prominent men in Maryland.

Mr. Rinehart was president of the Columbia Bank and Bridge Company for many years, and occupied that honorable position to a period near the close of his earthly career, when he relinquished all business on account of poor health. He married a daughter of Anthony Haines, by whom he had one son, Edwin, who married a daughter of John Kline.

JOHN HUSS.

Maj. John Huss was a member of Assembly for the years 1823 and 1824. He came from Lancaster in 1818 and started the Pilot. When the British burned the capitol at Washington and were threatening Philadelphia, he assisted Capt. Grosh to raise a company of volunteers, and as first lieutenant marched with the company to Marcus Hook. He accepted a position in the bank as clerk in 1817, and after the failure of the bank he resumed the publication of the Pilot, but changed its name to the Pioneer. Mr. Huss never married. He was one of the most intelligent and best-read citizens in the place, and had also a fondness for a military life, and commanded the Donegal Rangers for several years. He was an agreeable and fine conversationalist, and his society was much sought after by those who could appreciate his good qualities. He had many friends, who were warmly attached to him. When a member of the Legislature he was the first person to introduce the name of Andrew Jackson into the politics of the State in connection with the Presidency. He died about forty-five years ago, and was buried with the honors of war.

E. D. ROATH.

Eml. D. Roath was born in the city of Lancaster, Pa., Oct. 4, 1820. When he was about four years of age his father died, leaving a widow and four sons, who moved soon after to the village of Maytown, in what is now East Donegal township. After having qualified himself, young Eml. taught school from 1846 to 1854, and became one of the original members of the Lancaster County Teachers' Institute, the first meeting being held in Lancaster in January, 1853. He subsequently settled in the borough of Marietta, and in 1857 was elected to represent his district in the State Legislature.

At the outbreak of the slaveholders' rebellion in 1861 he received orders from Governor Curtin to raise a company for service in the Union army, which was soon accomplished, when he was assigned to Col. Zeigler's regiment, and became a part of the One Hundred and Seventh Pennsylvania Volunteers, marching to the front with ninety-eight men, and served with distinction nearly four years. He participated in the battles of Cedar Mountain, Rappahannock Station, Thoroughfare Gap, Bull Run (second), Chantilly, where he was in command of the regiment; South Mountain, where for cool bravery he distinguished himself and command; Antietam, where he was slightly wounded; Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Cemetery Hill; commanded right wing at crossing of Rappahannock, Aug. 1, 1863; commanded advance at Mine Run; Spottsylvania Court-House, North Anna, Bethesda, Richmond Road, Tolopotomy, Shady Grove Church, White-Oak Swamp, where he was complimented by commanding general; Norfolk and Petersburg Railroad; Weldon Railroad, where he was taken prisoner, Aug. 19, 1864, and was kept in the prison-pens of Richmond, Salisbury, and Danville for six months, when he was exchanged and sent to Annapolis, Md., where he was discharged by order of the War Department March 5, 1865. While in the army he was brevetted a major, lieutenant-colonel, and colonel for meritorious services. Returning to his home in Marietta, he was in 1866 elected by the Republicans to the State Legislature, and subsequently a justice of the peace, which position he still holds.

GEORGE H. ETTLA.

George H. Ettla, of Marietta, son of Conrad and Anna B. Ettla, was born at Hummelstown, Dauphin Co., Pa., Aug. 15, 1832. He served from 1842 to 1850 as deputy collector in the Union Canal collector's office at Middletown, Pa. Came to Marietta in 1854; has resided there ever since, during which time he served four sessions in the Legislature, 1875-78. During the late war was captain of Company B, Two Hundred and Fifteenth Regiment. Has been engaged, while in Marietta, in the lumber trade, fire and life insurance business; at present is postmaster and conducts a general fire insurance agency. His parents died when he was but two years old.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Location, Railroad, Indians, Water, etc.—The borough of Adamstown is situated in the northern part of Lancaster County, adjoining Berks County line, ten miles from Reading and twenty-one miles from Lancaster, on the old stage route, laid out in 1772, formerly traveled by Eastern members of Congress to and from Washington, D. C.

Its nearest railroad stations are Denver (Union), Reinholt's, and Vinemount, from three to five miles distant on the Reading and Columbia Railroad. The mails are served twice daily, by stage arriving from Denver in the morning at seven o'clock, and in the evening at five o'clock from Reading, thus enabling the citizens to have mail communication with Lancaster, Reading, Harrisburg, Philadelphia, and New York.

From old ruins and numerous relics found, in the shape of stone axes, arrow-heads, and ornamental work, it seems to indicate that an Indian village once covered the site of the present town or close by.

The town has always been noted for its abundance of pure sandstone water, which in many places gushes out from the mountain slope on the north side of the town, as also for its general healthfulness, being protected from the cold northwest winds, and unusually free, with rare exceptions, from bronchial or consumptive complaints.

The convenience of and purity of the water makes this place superior to many others for manufacturing purposes. The boilers are kept from sediment, requiring less labor in cleansing, and last much longer.

Pioneer Settlers.—The first settlement dates back prior to the middle of the last century, and in 1761 William Addams, the elder, laid out the town on a general plan, consisting of twenty-eight lots of one acre each, and twenty-nine lots of half an acre each, and then other lots adjacent, with a street of four perches wide running nearly east and west, and a number of alleys to be fifteen feet wide. This territory occupies ground along the present Main Street, so as to take in the lots of the present owners, to wit: on the north side from Andrew Gottshalk's to Samuel Miller's, and on the south side from Cyrus Miller's to Abram Raudenbush, Sr., inclusive.

After Mr. Addams had laid out the town and made a general plot or draft thereof he called it "Adamsbury," and entered into a written agreement on the 4th day of July, 1761, with the following-named persons as purchasers and occupiers of the several lots therein designated: Frederick Fernsler, Jacob Balde, Balthazer Heining, Christopher Smith, Nicholas Fernsler, Nicholas Seltzinger, Abraham Shonauer, Matthias Abber, Matthias Farntzler, Philip Brendel, John Schwartz, Abraham Kern, John Moore, Peter Freisser, Jacob Freisser, Nicholas Yost, Thomas Kern, George Feiser, Philip Heil, Franz Hahn, Isaac and Phillip Moyer, Christian Richard, John George Shoup, John Stall, Conrad Carroll, Jacob Betz, Peter Negeley, Abraham Kern, Jr., Lorentz Stephan, Cath. Zwalley, Ludwig Herring, Henry Brendel, Ludwig Twinks, Martin Eicholts, Abraham Addams, Christian Hailing, Philip Breidenstein, Isaac Addams, William Addams, Jr., with whom he stipulated to lay out the town aforesaid into sixty lots, with streets and alleys, subject to a yearly ground-rent of sixteen shillings per acre, Pennsylvania currency.

Lease of Lots in Adamsbury.—Subsequently, in order to carry out the provisions and true intent of the original agreement, and to provide each occupier with proper titles, the said William Addams and Ann, his wife, by indenture, did grant and confirm unto the said purchasers of lots, their heirs and assigns forever, the said certain lot of ground as numbered and described, "situate in (then) Coccalico township, in the county of Lancaster aforesaid, in the town called 'Adamsbury,' with a clause or proviso, called 'Memorandum,' that it is covenanted and agreed upon by and between the two parties hereof that the said (purchaser's name), his heirs and assigns, shall, at his or their own proper cost and charges, make, erect, build, and finish on the said premises, within the term of two years from the date hereof, a good, substantial dwelling-house, twenty by sixteen feet at least, with a good chimney of stone or brick, cemented with lime and sand; and, further, that the said (——), his heirs and assigns, shall pay therefor and thereout unto the said William Addams, his heirs and assigns, at the town of Adamsbury, on the twenty-sixth day of June yearly, forever hereafter, the rent of sixteen shillings (if the lot contained one acre, and eight shillings when it contained but half an acre), lawful money of Pennsylvania: Provided always, nevertheless, that if the said yearly rent, or any part thereof, shall happen to be behind and unpaid by the space of sixty days next after any of the days of payment on which the same ought to be paid as aforesaid, that then it shall and may be lawful to and for the said Addams, his heirs and assigns, or any of them, into the said premises with the appurtenances to enter and distrain for the said yearly rent, and the distress and distresses then and there so found to lead, drive, and carry away and impound, and impounded to detain until the said yearly rent be fully paid and satisfied.

"Provided, further, that if no distress can be found upon said premises, that then it shall and may be lawful to and for the said William Addams, his heirs and assigns, into all and singular the hereby granted premises with the appurtenances, or into any part thereof, in the name of the whole, wholly to re-enter, and the same to have again, repossess, and enjoy, as if these presents had never been executed."

The Addams Family.—William Addams, the founder of Adamstown, died in November, 1772, leaving a widow, Anna, and five sons, named Abraham, Samuel, Richard, William, and Isaac, and a daughter married to John Witman. He also left considerable property in and about the vicinity of Adamstown, consisting of a mill and farming lands, as well as the aforesaid town lots. As early as the 1st of August, A.D. 1739, a patent was issued by the commonwealth of Pennsylvania to William Bird, an iron-master, for three hundred and fifty-six acres of land, including what was then known as "Addams' Mill," then as now supposed to contain iron ore, and on March 26, 1747, the said William Bird and Bridget, his wife, sold the same to Christopher Witman. The latter and Barbara, his wife, on the 27th day of April, 1749, sold two hundred and forty-six acres thereof unto the said William Addams, who lived out of the town on a portion thereof, and gave lots to his four sons,—Abraham, Samuel, Richard, and William. To Isaac, the youngest, he gave lots Nos. 31, 32, and 61. The first-named three sons afterwards transferred their rights and title to said lots unto their brother William for three hundred and thirty pounds. Isaac also got the mansion farm and one hundred and thirty-seven acres adjoining the village of Adamstown.

William Addams, the founder, was of English, and his wife, Anna, of German descent. Their descendants are very numerous found in the counties of Lancaster, Berks, Lebanon, Schuylkill, Dauphin, Cumberland, Perry, and other counties in Pennsylvania, as well as in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Missouri, and Oregon.

William Addams, one of the five sons, died in 1774, leaving a widow named Barbara, and a son also named William, who was a minor, to whom he bequeathed the whole of his estate, should he arrive at the age of twenty-one years; but in case of his death before arriving at said age, one-half of his estate should go to his said widow, Barbara, and the remainder to his four brothers,—Abraham, Samuel, Richard, and Isaac. William, the younger, died in his minority, and Isaac afterwards married Barbara, the widow of his late brother William.

The said Abraham, Samuel, Isaac, and Barbara, on the 19th day of April, A.D. 1810, conveyed all their right, title, and interest in the same unto the said Richard Addams, who died in 1816, leaving a widow named Susannah and eight children, viz.: Mary, intermarried with Rudolph Heberling; Anna, intermarried with Jacob Flickinger; Margaretta, intermarried with Henry Flickinger; Susanna, intermarried with John Fisher; Magdalena, intermarried with John Bechtel; William, who inherited the farm; Catherine, single woman; Elizabeth, intermarried with Peter Musser. To these named seven-daughters was bequeathed all the interests in and to the original ground-rents.

To William Addams descended the Addams farm (formerly owned by his uncle, Isaac), and by him owned and occupied until 1852, when he died and left it to his two sons, the Rev. Jacob Addams, deceased, and his brother, Isaac. The latter is still living near Leesport, Berks Co., Pa. The two brothers partitioned the farm, the latter taking the old mansion and part of the land, the former the balance of farm, added to the dwelling he had formerly built for himself as a residence close by.

But few of the descendants of Richard Addams are now living in the borough, the only ones being Mr. John Musser, retired merchant, who is a grandson, his sister, Susannah Musser, Jonathan Flickinger and John Fisher, great-grandsons, and Maggie Billingsfelt (wife of E. Billingsfelt), a great-granddaughter.

Isaac Addams, who was the youngest son of the founder of Adamstown, and brother of Richard Addams, left six sons, viz.: William, who represented Berks County in the Nineteenth and Twentieth Congresses; John, who commanded a brigade of the Pennsylvania militia during the war of 1812; Isaac, Samuel, Peter, and Abraham. The latter's daughter, Ann Eliza Addams, married Jacob Beaver, whose son, Gen. James Addams Beaver, the gallant one-legged Union soldier, was the Republican candidate for Governor during the election campaign of 1882. A combination of circumstances brought three candidates into the field (two Republicans) for the same office, thus rendering the defeat of Gen. Beaver inevitable.

Present Owners of Ground-Rents.—The several lots of ground are still sold and held subject to said yearly ground-rent, which is annually collected and paid to the proprietors, successors, or present owners. By will and divers conveyances the proprietary right became vested in Richard Addams, one of the five sons of the founder, and after his decease, which occurred in 1816, his proprietary right was sold at public sale by his executors, William Addams and Henry Flickinger, and bought by Rudolph Heberling, a son-in-law, and the interest therein divided among heirs or daughters of said deceased in equal shares. The said shares were owned in 1883 by the following parties: The heirs of Magdalena Bechtel, deceased, who was a daughter of the said Richard Addams, one share; the heirs of Anna Flickinger, deceased, also a daughter, one share; Susan Musser, a granddaughter, three shares; estate of Solomon Regar, deceased, purchaser of Mr. Heberling's interest, one share; and Frederick T. Zeigler, purchaser of the share formerly owned by Henry Flickinger, Sr., deceased, one share.

When incorporated its population numbered three hundred, and in 1880, according to the last census, eight hundred and one.

The territory occupied contains about three hundred acres, and was taken mainly from the township of East Cocalico, the balance from Brecknock township, Lancaster Co.

Incorporation of the Borough.—The borough of Adamstown was incorporated by a special act of the Legislature April 2, 1850, and is embraced in the following survey: Beginning at Adams' Spring, in Berks County, and running N. 59½° W. 95.5 perches to Ruth's Spring; thence S. 55½° W. 192 perches to Good's Spring; thence S. 51¼° W. 157 perches to corner of Hest and Regar's land; thence S. 54° E. 113 perches to a willow-tree standing on the bank of Adamstown Branch of Muddy Run; thence N. 60¼° E. 320 perches to Storie and Gehman's line; thence N. 43° W. 65.2 perches to place of beginning in Berks County.

The act of the Legislature erecting the borough authorized the election of the following borough officers, viz.: One chief burgess, three councilmen, three school directors, one justice of the peace, one constable, one street commissioner, one assessor, two assistant assessors, one auditor, and a board of election officers. Having secured all the powers and privileges of a borough, the people soon became indifferent about borough matters, the authorities having but limited powers, until the spring of 1875, when a new régime was inaugurated; application was made to the proper authorities, when the privileges allowed by the act of the Legislature of 1851, and a supplement in 1871, was extended to Adamstown borough, and six councilmen and six school directors and two justices of the peace, instead of three, were to be elected.

Up to that time, 1875, the borough records give no satisfactory list of officers. Since then they have been as follows:

In 1883 the assessor for the borough was William Knauer; assistant assessors were Levi C. Schnader and William Bicher; Constable, Cyrus Miller; Auditor, R. M. Hyman; Treasurer, Levi C. Schnader.

Educational.—On the 14th day of February, 1814, John Frymeyer and his wife, Catharine, by their indenture, did grant and confirm unto Henry Flickering and William Addams, and their successors forever, a tract of land situate in Adamstown, "in trust to and for the use and behoof of the inhabitants of Adamstown and its vicinity, and their successors, for a site or place for erecting churches and houses of religious worship, school-houses and almshouses, and burying-grounds, etc., and the said trustees shall, as soon as conveniently may be, at the cost and expense of the neighbors and those who wish to contribute thereto, erect and build, or cause to be erected and built on the said premises, a house or houses suitable and convenient for keeping or teaching a school for the education of children and grown persons of all denominations whatever that may be desirous of being taught there, for which purpose they shall, with the approbation of the neighbors and contributors, and at the expense of those who send children to be taught or choose to be taught themselves, find and provide a good teacher, if such can conveniently be had, to superintend the school, and shall prevent any other use or occupancy to be made of the lot and premises than what is necessary for the school and teachers for the time being; and in case of the death or incapacity of the said trustees to act, the neighbors and contributors shall choose their successors and fill the vacancies that may arise."

In order to avail themselves of the privileges granted in the aforesaid trust, the citizens of Adamstown and vicinity for miles around, by their assistance and contributions, soon thereafter erected a modest one-story stone school-house, the dimensions being about twenty-five by twenty-five feet, employed a teacher, who was so well patronized that at times the capacity of the building was almost too small to hold all the pupils, during the winter months upwards of seventy being regularly in attendance with but one teacher. The lot upon which the school-house was built being well covered with heavy timber, and coal as fuel not then in use, the larger and older boys of the scholars had to fell trees, cut and split wood between hours, which was used as fuel in a large ten-plated stove of the "George Ego pattern."

Of the earliest teachers in the school were Messrs. Stillwell, Yerkes, Spayd, McDowell, Lightner, Proudfoot, Zimmerman, Dewees, McDonough, and others.

In the year 1855 a new two-story stone school-house, thirty by thirty-six feet, was built near the site of the old one, and near the upper end of what is now Broad Street, and two schools established therein. This house gave place in 1878 to a two-story brick structure, which was destroyed by fire early in the morning of Dec. 13, 1881. This building stood a few rods east of its predecessors, and upon the same foundation was erected in 1882 the present beautiful two-story school building, containing four well-arranged and well-ventilated school-rooms, three of which are occupied by the schools of the borough, with Franklin Wood as principal, assisted by H. W. Harrah and Miss Ida V. Scheats.

The first teachers of the borough schools under the free-school system were Christian Lichty, E. Billingfelt, and Abraham Lutz.

The school directors of the borough for 1852 were Henry Miller, Henry Stauffer, and Benjamin E. Shirk. Between that time and 1857 the name of Rev. Benjamin Adams appears as one of the school board.

The borough record furnish the following school directors for the borough :

Church of the Evangelical Association.—In the earlier days of Adamstown religious worship was held in the pioneer school-house by itinerant preachers and others, and about the year 1840 the Evangelical Association sent their ministers to this place, who frequently held divine service in the school-house, and soon made such a favorable impression upon many of the inhabitants that many converts were gained for their form of service and the doctrines taught by them. Much has been done in the few intervening years to establish true religion in the hearts of many old and young citizens of this town.
