We may find in the book of Nehemiah several texts appropriate to the close of the vacation season. It is a book of beginning, and, like all beginnings, it builds upon the old. We read of a new nation, a new city, a new temple, and a new altar. But all these were but continuations and reproductions of their predecessors. So each fresh beginning is based upon what preceded us. Each new year or new day involves repetition and resumption, hence the need for hope and cheer at such times. To make a new start is always harder than to start the first time; to resume and rebuild impresses us with the sameness and monotony of life, and we have to give ourselves anew for the old task and the daily grind.

The returned exiles can help us here. "The people had a mind to work." What a splendid example and motto for workers! "Every one over against his own house" gives us the true method of united team work. And still hear this statement: "We returned all of us to the wall, every one with his work."

Here is a call to the returning churchgoers: "To the wall and to the work!" The words suggest John Wesley's motto: "All at it, and always at it." Notice that all returned to the wall, and not merely the leaders and officers. The men and women and children were all on hand. This is the secret of the successful church. It is not enough for the pastor to be in his place. Even the elders and Sabbath school teachers and the choir are not sufficient. The people, the congregation, are just as much expected, and just as much needed. There is no real reason why the pastor should be present, any more than the hearers. A congregation is as necessary as a preacher. When shall we see every one in his place, "all with one accord in one place; all returning, with cheerful hearts and willing hands, to the wall and to the work?"

For not only did they all return to the wall, but "every one unto his work." All labored on the same wall, but not all did the same work. Some wielded the tools, some held the weapons, and some watched, but all did something to help in the one great task.

So Paul wrote of the diversities of gifts, and urged that each one give himself to his particular task, the work that was needed, and for which he was best fitted. No wonder the walls of Jerusalem went up, with such workers, and such a spirit! And the same zeal and interest in the local church will bring the same results.

The spirit in which we return to our work is the test of our vacation. Says a recent writer: "Your vacation was not a success unless your job looked mighty good to you when you got back to it." It is sometimes hard to take up the old task.

to begin again the weary round of duty and service. But there is no other way. "Life is made up of fresh beginnings." "Over and over again" is the law of the teacher and the Christian worker. Our Master was never weary in well doing. When the multitudes resorted to him, "he taught them again." "And again he began to teach by the seaside." Life is made up of new starts, repeated steps, constant repetition. But there is no need to give way to the feeling of monotony. Rather let us tackle the same old job with a new spirit, and return with fresh zeal, all of us to the wall, and every one to his work! In reality, no day is like another; no task is exactly the same as another. The vacation called us to lay aside one task, and "rest awhile." The close of this vacation summons us back to our places, and our tasks; and even though the same places, and the same tasks, they may be done with a new spirit and zeal, for "Every day is a fresh beginning;

Listen, my soul, to the glad refrain,
And spite of old sorrow and older sinning,
And puzzles forecasted and possible pain,

Take heart with the day, and begin again "

GOSPEL WORK IN SYRIA.

BY REV. W. S. NELSON, D.D.

In the month of August, 1891, I set out from Tripoli on horseback for the village of Amar, to attend the first meeting of the Tripoli Presbytery. It was a most happy experience and marked the beginning of growth and advance which it has been my privilege to follow during thirty years. In August of this year, 1921, I came by train to the city of Homs for the meeting of the same body. It was the same body, but none of the same membership. At that time there were but eight churches in the body, while now there are twelve. There was a complete ignorance of methods of procedure and the missionaries were appealed to at every turn. At this meeting the chair was occupied and the discussions guided by a Syrian pastor, who presided with dignity and good judgment. The minutes were carefully kept by a Syrian clerk and all the work of committees was directed by different members of the presbytery, with little dependence on the foreigners.

This was really the first normal meeting of the presbytery since the interruption caused by the war. The churches have had very imperfect oversight from the missionaries and some of them have been without proper pastoral oversight as well. Notwithstanding this state of affairs, however, there were reported forty-eight new accessions to church membership. All the ordinary work of the meeting was satisfactorily arranged and a man was found for every place, and a budget adopted which lays on the churches about one-third of the amount to be raised. This was a most satisfactory result when we realize the great increase which has been necessary in the scale of expenditures and the great losses which the churches have sustained in numbers and ability as a result of the war.

The culmination of the meeting came when the question arose to the election of the Home Mission Committee. This has always been the brightest spot in the history of the presbytery. It was started entirely by the efforts of a few of the Syrian members many years ago, and did effective work in opening new schools as centers of evangelical influence as the years passed on. The war interrupted this work and when the matter came up at this meeting there was a lack of interest, because the way did not seem open for a renewal of the operations. It appeared that there was a small balance in the treasury from before the war and several persons took the floor in favor of the election of a strong committee and the interest quickly increased, until there was considerable enthusiasm and an enlarged committee was chosen. This committee met at once and arranged to open two schools in very needy villages, involving a budget of more than twice the amount in hand. In the evening a popular meeting was held on this subject and at the close a collection received which amounted to more than a third of the balance needed for the entire year's program.

It has certainly been one of my richest experiences to watch the steady growth in this Tripoli Presbytery, and as I return to active work here again, after my third furlough, I am glad to have this opening of my renewed relations with those with whom I have worked so long.

FROM THE WESTERN OFFICE.

BY REV. B. P. FULLERTON, D.D.

The Presbytery of St. Louis has elected Rev. Dr. Roy C. Dobson, Executive Secretary for the presbytery. This is a very promising position and one that offers great opportunity for a fine work. Presbyterians of St. Louis are a capable people, with great resources of money and men, that have never been called to do their capacity work. Dr. Dobson was at one time the assistant to Dr. Niccolls; then pastor of the Second Church in Bloomington, Ill., and from there he went to Highland Park Church of Chicago, and when the war broke out he entered the service of the Y. M. C. A. and did a conspicuous work in France.

Our superintendent in New Mexico, in sending in a monthly report, giving an account of a camp-meeting which he attended and where he preached seven times in four days, says: "On Monday night fifteen came forward in confession of faith, and on Tuesday night four more followed, and there is now a petition, signed by twenty-six people, asking for the organization of a Presbyterian Church in the community." He tells further that a woman has agreed to give the little church in the place, with one hundred and fifty feet by one hundred and fifty feet of ground to the new church when organized. Now in the face of this, when this church comes to ask for help, unless offerings for this cause come in better, we will be forced to say we are not able to help.

The superintendent of the work in Arkansas writes that there have been 377 infants and 129 adult baptisms in that synod during the past year; 673 have been received on examination and 498 on certificate, and that there has been a net gain in that synod, during the past year, of 612. This is not bad at all when it is considered that the total membership now is 6,223. Offerings to home missions increased the past year $2,200 over the previous year. Five new church houses have been erected and three manses either built or bought, and there have been four new churches organized.

The report from Texas is that during the past year there have been received into the churches of that synod 1,707 people, 585 of whom were on examination; but the offerings for Home Missions did not materially increase over the year previous; but plans are laid by which it is hoped to increase the interest of our people in this cause.

Our superintendent in Montana writes that he is to be from home for some time, but says: "I want to say that I greatly appreciate your offer to help at —. I went to see them Monday night and the half had not been told me. Both banks are closed. The railroad is cutting men and laying others off. The farmers around have had a complete failure and this is the fifth. I wish you could have been with me and see the way the people received your agreement. This is a county seat town of 1,500 people and ours the only Protestant church. They said who will visit our sick, bury our dead and comfort us in our losses? I had in mind to get other churches to share their pastor, though none is nearer than about forty miles. But you have helped out. I know you must have a task just now, and I am doing my best to make it as easy as I can." Now what will the church say to a case like this? Will the Board of Home Missions be given the means to continue this help until times are better in that locality? I know it is easy to say that times are hard where we are, and we are not able to help beyond what we are doing, but here is a place where no one else will minister in the name of Christ unless we do, and we must not fail.

A letter received from the superintendent in North Dakota, gives in detail a situation very similar to that in Montana. Ministers have remained just as long as it was possible, without actual suffering, and have been forced to abandon their fields. Some churches that were self-supporting have had to give up their pastors, and the superintendent writes that to help out he has not taken a vacation since he has been on the field, for some years, and this state has been severely afflicted with successive drouths. I have found running through my mind this Scripture: "We that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak."

I wish we could make real the thing which gave Nehemiah courage to undertake a great thing for God when, from the human side, it seemed impossible of accomplishment. I have on my desk a motto which came to me some time ago, which reads: "The fool did not know it was impossible, and went ahead and did it." If I might translate that I should say: "The church knew it was impossible without God and with him went ahead and did it." This enterprise is God's, and his resources are inexhaustible, and we are certain of victory if we go forward and trust him.

NEW YORK LETTER.

BY REV. CLARENCE G. REYNOLDS, D.D.

Sabbath afternoon, Sept. 18th, on the Hoboken Pier, we attended the service in honor of the three thousand soldiers whose bodies had recently been brought from the battle front. On every side, in every nook in the great building, were the pine boxes, each covered with "Old Glory," each casket bearing the name of the fallen hero and the address of his nearest relative, most frequently his mother. Before and after the service little groups of mourners hunted out their own beloved dead, and in many instances placed wreaths upon the flags. There were caskets directed to almost every state in the Union. About two thousand, mostly relatives and near friends, gathered at the speakers' rostrum before twelve caskets, representative of the rest. The service was quiet and beautiful. When taps were sounded at the caskets and at a distance as an echo, the subdued sobs of mothers, wives and sweethearts was touching beyond description. It was a scene never to be forgotten, and one that argued eloquently for disarmament. Many of the soldiers will be buried at Arlington Cemetery, Washington, D. C., and the remainder will be sent home.

After this service we went to the Fifth Avenue Church and heard Dr. Drummond, of Edinburgh, preach on Faith. The Fifth Avenue Church was closed last Sabbath. Dr. Kelman preaches next Sabbath. At the West End Presbyterian Church, the pastor, Rev. Dr. A. E. Keigwin, just back from his vacation, preached in the evening on "The Madness of Modernism," a strong orthodox sermon, you may be sure.

At a meeting last week, in the Presbyterian Building, representatives of the Presbyterian, Methodist, Baptist, Congregational, Protestant Episcopal and Reformed denominations met and decided upon united work in Westchester County, adjoining New York City, with the hope of reaching the unchurched, particularly the large foreign colonies. Rev. Benjamin Everett, of Ossining, executive secretary of the Presbytery of Westchester, spoke of the large number of foreign-speaking people in Yonkers, White Plains, Mount Vernon, New Rochelle, Port Chester, Peekskill, Tarrytown, Dobbs Ferry, Mamaroneck, Tuckahoe and Elmsford. A Home Missions Council for Westchester County was formed on the lines of the Council of Greater New York. There will be three representatives from each denomination. There will be a large program for the unchurched, especially foreign-speaking groups, on lines of religious and social education. It is expected that the Lutherans will join the movement.

The Evangelistic Committee of New York City will move its headquarters from the Bible Teachers' Training School to the Grand Central Terminal Building. This move is necessary because of the steady growth of the Bible Teachers' Training School, every inch of available room being required for the work. The prospects for the school are brighter than ever. All who are trained there are well grounded in the faith and stand steadfastly for the Fundamentals. The president, Dr. W. W. White, preached last Sabbath in the Marble Collegiate Reformed Church.

A bronze tablet, a memorial to the late John H. Weyburn, who at the time of his death was superintendent of the McAuley Water Street Mission, was unveiled last Sabbath afternoon, Sept. 25th. Mr. F. Murray Oliphant, president of the trustees, presided, and the principal address was made by Mr. Philip I. Roberts, a convert of the mission. Among others who took part was Mr. Weyburn's pastor, Rev. Dr. Edgar W. Work, of the Fourth Presbyterian Church.

A Bible Conference was held at the National Bible Institute Monday and Tuesday of this week. Among the speakers were the Presbyterian pastors, Rev. Dr. John McNeill, of the Fort Washington Church, and Rev. Dr. Robert Watson, of the Second Church.

Sir William M. Ramsey, archaeologist and author, was the guest, last Monday evening, of the young men's class of the Bedford Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn. Sir William will lecture throughout the country in various colleges and theological seminaries. He is always heard in this country with deep interest. In his explorations he is always discovering new proofs of the accuracy of the New Testament record.

New York Presbytery will meet in the First Presbyterian Church next Monday.

The address at the Presbyterian Ministers' Meeting Monday, Sept. 26th, was by Hon. Sara Graham-Munhall, deputy commissioner, New York State Department of Narcotic Drug Control. The subject was, "Am I My Brother's Keeper? The Church and the Drug Addict."

PITTSBURGH AND LAKE MOHONK.

BY REV. S. J. FISHER, D.D.

Under a sky perfectly clear, and with an atmosphere that was remarkably clear, so much so that thirty miles away you could see the Overlook House perched on a slope of the mountain of that name, I followed the direct and steeper path to Sky Top, which is the meaning of the Indian term, Mohonk. There, beside the rising foundations of the new stone tower erected from boulders and huge pieces of stone lying plentifully near, I stood and looked upon a view which is rarely equaled, and in some respects unsurpassed. In the middle distance lay Newburgh Bay, and beyond it the Gate of the Highlands of the Hudson, with Storm King as one of its door posts. Across the river, a dozen miles away, the fair and fertile land spread eastward. Southward were the Traps, as they are called, the sharply-edged precipice, running on toward Minnewaska, and on their western slope covered with forests which should have been primeval if occasional forest fires had not destroyed their fullness, only to be renewed in the course of years. It is to be part of the utility or purpose of this tower that it will be the place of sojourn for the fire warden, so that from this mountain eyrie he can catch a glimpse of such forest fires along this range, and over in the Catskill, and signal to the camps. On such a day the long and mighty range of the Catskills is unexpressibly beautiful. They, too, are covered with great forests, rarely interrupted with a cleaving. The valley between them and us, the Rondout, is wide and fertile, sparsely dotted with farmhouses and barns, little hamlets, from whose groves a church steeple or tower adds a finer character to the view. There are no factories, no smoke or noise of such industries, and it is a vision of quiet peacefulness that opens there below me, so far away, and so silent. Doubtless, for such is life, there are sorrows there, and occasional trouble and distress, but from this height it is like a panorama, and separate from our ordinary life.

As I descend, I pause for a moment, and comment to a stranger in one of the picturesque summer houses placed on an out-jutting crag, upon the beauty of the wide view. Evidently a foreigner, and of no special education, a visitor for a day, he answers: "Yes, God's Nature is wonderful." Peculiar as was his expression, I understood his meaning, and leaving him as I mused, I appreciated his desire to recognize Nature and its beauties, but to also link them to God, to look through Nature up to Nature's God.

Each step of these winding, picturesque paths is delightful. Here are ferns covering large tables of stone, and beside the path is the sweet Fern so fragrant when crushed in your hand. What a riot of mosses of laurel and rhododendron! Do you know the difference? Beautiful moss cover many a rock and stone. In the shadows are the winter-green bushes and berries, and blueberries. The white-stemmed birches brighten the forest gloom, but one regrets that so many passersby strip these of their beautiful bark and mar their perfection. If only lovers tore these pieces from the tree, to indite some heart thoughts, enriched or made lovely by such a medium, I should be mild in censure; but, too often, it is the thoughtless and ignorant.

Today the wind is quiet, the sunshine powerful, the lake so calm and mirrorlike that, looking down upon it "as in a looking glass," every tree and rock and summer house and overhanging bush is doubled in the great picture. The cloudless sky can only repeat its azure, and where a canoe floats idly on the surface, with quiet passengers, perhaps silent in the charm of the hour, or murmuring happy confidences, this, too, is doubled, grace added to grace. Passing the reservoir on the high rock, and enjoying its white and blue lilies, I descend the winding path until from another summer house I look upon the wonderful garden stretched out on the wide hillside, and reaching up into the crowded forest of oaks and cedars and hemlocks and pines and birches and others.

In the sunshine its many colors seem to flash and gleam and wave. Here are large masses of cannas, long beds of roses, winding borders of coleus and ribbon grass, pergolas veiled with clematis, and near them delicious masses of mignonette and heliotropes, while phlox presses close to dahlias, and great bunches of hydrangea hang in the sunbeams. And near it all, and giving each and all a magnificent emphasis and contrast and heightened beauty, are the wide lawns of perfect green, running past summer house and flowers, and like a green billow dashing far up the mountain side, beyond Huguenot Drive.

Seat yourself here, and feast your eyes on this resplendent coloring, occasionally lifting those eyes to the domes and slopes and clouds of the great mountains, growing purple in the advancing day. The Greeks called their mountains the "violet crowned," but the purple and the haze of our ranges is darker. An occasional hawk circles in the distance, the only suggestion of life, except some child dancing happily along the garden paths, or some one in advanced life finding in these perfumed alleys and fragrant seats the things of beauty which are a joy forever, and never more charming than in their maturer years.

One recalls Tennyson's remark, as he noticed the remarkable beauty of a water plant in a pool: "What an imagination God has!" "How wonderful are his works!" said an older and equally wise poet. That there are such numerous and varied beauties in this earth, such hues and tints and colors, such loveliness and fragrance and changing charm, shows that God has made for us these delights, since we are made in his own image. How much of joy and mental pleasure the skeptic or atheist misses who sees nothing of this higher meaning! Let him not imagine Science rudely crushes this fancy or belief. I like the assertion of Lord Kelvin, one of the greatest scientists of any age: "Creative and directive power Science compels us to accept as an article of belief." And another remark by Kelvin is also in point: "Is there, I ask, anything so absurd as to believe that a number of atoms falling together could make a crystal, a sprig of moss, a microbe, a living animal?"

Huxley was wiser than Mark Twain or Ingersoll, for he thought: "Atheism is as absurd, logically speaking, as polytheism." After all, I know no explanation of this world in its lights and shadows, its beauty and terror, like that which God's Word and the great fundamentals of Christianity give us. We can not explain or understand the misery and sorrow and terror of multitudes, and the anguish of innocence, alongside of such delights as this mountain view bestows, and the joy of yonder trustful hearts, to whom love is so wonderful, unless we realize that sin entered this world and death by sin. It is a world scarred by man's selfish heart, defiant of God. It is a creation groaning and travailing in pain through the centuries. The groans cease only when we find God through Christ, and the anguish of Calvary heals a wounded world. In his light we see light. Joyous as is the truth that although "by man came death, by man came also the resurrection from the dead."

Beside the flowers we stand and muse a while
And feel their beauty our tired hearts beguile;

For he who gave the lilies all their loveliness
Has finer gifts with which our lives to bless.

Here mothers strolled and watched their happy boys,
While children's laughter heightened all these joys.

And now in war's dark gloom lies some dear youth
Who gave his life blood for eternal truth.

Yet if these paths recall some vanished, lovely face,
And flowers they loved remind of charm and grace;

We check the sigh, since now, 'mid scenes more bright,
They walk with God, and in his light see light.

CLEVELAND LETTER.

BY REV. GEORGE A. MACKINTOSH, D.D.

Rev. H. M. Gilbert, one of the field secretaries of the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation, is speaking in our churches, presenting the endowment needs of his Board. He addressed the Presbytery of Cleveland on Tuesday, and on Sabbath morning supplied the Bolton Church.

Dr. H. C. Swearingen, our General Assembly Moderator, will speak before the United Presbyterians at the meeting of the First Synod of the West at the Sixth United Presbyterian Church this week. President Charles F. Wishart, of Wooster College, will also speak.

There was a good attendance of ministers at the fall meeting of presbytery at the Seville Church, forty miles south of Cleveland. Arrangements were made for the installation of Rev. Charles G. Darling, Ph.D., in the Boulevard Church. Rev. Peter Monnett, for seventeen years pastor of the Italian Beckwith Memorial Church, was released from his pastorate. Rev. Peter A. Fant, of Chicago, will take up the work Oct. 1st. Mr. Monnett has served faithfully this church and helped in the gathering of three other Italian congregations here. He will go to the Waldensian College in North Carolina for a needed rest.

Rev. Arthur M. Campbell was released from the Linndale Church and was dismissed to Cincinnati Presbytery, in order to accept a call to the Sixth Church.

An interesting event at the meeting of presbytery was the presentation to presbytery of the two young sons of Rev. O. R. Newcomb, pastor of the Parma Church, who were received as candidates. These boys are in the junior and sophomore classes at Oberlin.

CHICAGO LETTER.

BY REV. E. N. WARE, D.D.

The Presbyterian Ministers' Association resumed their Monday morning meetings on Sept. 19th at the Fourth Church chapel. Rev. Emerson O. Houser, pastor of the Lake View Church, was elected president. Rev. S. W. Findley vice-president, Rev. George D. Prentice secretary, and Rev. P. W. Fischer, treasurer. Rev. R. Worth Frank, of McCormick Seminary, is chairman of the Program Committee. The program of the day consisted of a presentation of the program for the stewardship campaign, which the Chicago Presbytery provided for under the leadership of Dr. A. F. McGarrah, of the New Era Committee. The leaders are asking that a three-months' course of study in stewardship, using the little book of thirteen lessons, be put on in the Adult Bible Classes beginning in October, and with the women and the Young People's societies, including both Y. P. S. C. E. and Westminster Guilds. Conferences in each of the three sides of the city were called for last week. A promise was made that Moderator Swearingen would come to Chicago for a week's campaign in October addressing the groups of the three sides. Separate conferences for the men and women are being held and the two are expected to study in separate classes.

A three-days conference of the workers of the Church Extension Board was held in the halls of the University of Evanston, beginning Sept. 14th. Instruction in methods and social fellowship, mingled with games, made up the program of the conference, under the leadership of Rev. Henry S. Brown, Superintendent of the Church Extension Board.

Westminster Church, Rev. Fred M. Newlin, pastor, sold its old property on Adams and Sangamon Streets last July to Mr. Tate, president of the Chicago Job Press Company. It is now leased to the Upper Room Mission, more familiarly known as the Jim Hicks Mission, supt of the American Prison Bible Society, working more especially in the giving of Bibles to men in the prisons. One hundred cots are installed in the auditorium for night lodgers and breakfast is served. Services are held each evening in the basement.

IOWA LETTER.

BY REV. W. H. JORDAN.

The Fairfield Gospel Team, under the leadership of Evangelist A. K. Harper, will hold a tabernacle service in Newton, Iowa, during January and February. Dr. Biedewolf will have a campaign in Marshalltown in October.

Rev. S. R. Ferguson, Sabbath-school missionary for our Board, is busy planning for the institute to be held the day before synod in Cedar Rapids. Drs. Robinson, McAfee and Hyde are expected, along with others, to assist in the excellent program. Our schools should be represented at that pre-synodical convention. It is good from beginning to close.

Rev. Vaclav Hlavaty, for twenty-eight years pastor of the Fourth Church (Bohemian), Cedar Rapids, addressed the Westminster Church recently on conditions in Bohemia. Bohemia is in great need of men and women from America, to aid them in teaching. The big slump from Rome means that unless the Church meets the situation the people will sink into the mire of unbelief and infidelity.

McComb and Clace began a tabernacle union meeting in Marion Sept. 4.

Shenandoah Church, vacant since May 1, has called Rev. James L. Howie, for fourteen years pastor of the Third Church, Sioux City. Mr. Howie has done an excellent work both in his church and in the presbytery, and will find in the Shenandoah Church an appreciative people and a splendid equipment.

Rev. George Lindsay, for many years pastor of the Shellsburg and Pleasant Hill Churches, has resigned and will retire this fall. He has been one of the faithful pastors.

Our colleges are opening with fine prospects. May it be a great year in the classroom. Does the Church remember her colleges or consider her work done when endowments have been raised? How about a revival in our colleges? What great revivals have broken out in other years in educational centers! Some colleges have a revival every year. Shall not the whole Church remember the faculties and students as they enter upon their work and pursue their various courses of study? The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom. Teachers and students need a mighty outpouring of the Holy Ghost, and must have it if the colleges are to send forth Spirit-filled men and women to evangelize the world.

BLACKBURN COLLEGE.

Blackburn College, the self-help school at Carlinville, Ill., opened with all available space filled. On account of the limited dormitory facilities it was necessary to turn away almost two hundred. Students are enrolled from eighteen different states and from four foreign countries. A railroad switch has just been completed into the grounds and part of the material has been unloaded for the new central heating plant. Through the generosity of two trustees, Senator W. B. McKinley and President W. G. Bierd, of the Chicago and Alton railroad, the material for this plant has been furnished and the students will do the work under expert supervision. The city of Carlinville is paving the main approach to the college and when these two improvements are completed, a campaign will be inaugurated for a new dormitory, which is the most pressing need at present, for it seems hardly fair to turn away from education young people who are so eager to work for it.

MONTANA MUSINGS.

BY REV. J. F. SHEPHERD, PH.D., D.D.

The churches of this synod were so well supplied at the meeting of synod in July, that we were congratulating ourselves upon the condition of the work. But the spirit of unrest has been busy since. Rev. W. H. Christian resigned Deer Lodge to accept work in Ohio, and this church remains unsupplied today. Rev. Albert Pfau gave up Glengary and Kolin and Rev. J. P. Schell, D.D., has succeeded him in that field. Rev. William Mason closed his work at Pony and Harrison, and Rev. Joseph A. Barnes at Belgrade, each on Sept. 1st. Mr. Barnes has earned a happy retirement from the active ministry. Rev. W. E. Kuntz resigned our Federated Church at Corvallis to accept the work at Hamilton. Rev. Vernon P. Martin resigned Cut Bank to accept the position of principal of schools at Shelby. Rev. F. W. Thompson resigned Polson and has accepted the work at Three Forks. Rev. H. A. Brown resigned Stanford and accepted the work at Polson. Rev. W. G. Rees resigned at Three Forks. Rev. D. C. Cowan has closed his work at Gilman and taken work in Spokane Presbytery. Gilman will be supplied by the pastor at Augusta. Rev. E. E. Van Ness has taken charge of our mission churches at Joplin, Fresno, Dunkirk and Lothair. He has moved into the manse at Joplin.

The vacancies at the present time are Deer Lodge, Pony-Harrison, Belgrade, Corvallis, Stanford and Cut Bank. The superintendent may be addressed for information.

Our beautiful new church at Whitefish, Rev. Merton S. Fales, pastor, is to be dedicated Oct. 9th and our new church at Troy, Rev. Ira L. Crooks, pastor, on Oct. 23d. In each case the writer has the honor of officiating, a real honor, as each of these are undertakings worthy of our denomination and the minister who have engineered the work.

Rev. Dr. I. I. Gorby has returned from the East and is hard at work in the Central Church of Butte, while Dr. Groeneveld is back from his vacation and at work in the First Church. The Welsh church has voted unanimously to come into the Butte Presbytery, and the plans for a united and aggressive work with these and our Community Center at Immanuel are progressing. A census of certain parts of the city is being taken and it is hoped that a real advance program will be witnessed in Butte this winter.

Mr. Livingston is hard at work visiting and strengthening the churches in their financial plans, while the calls for his help in evangelistic effort are numerous. We need throughout the state a real campaign of evangelism, and to that end all the ministers and elders are urged to pray and plan.

EAST TENNESSEE NOTES.

BY REV. ROBERT I. GAMON, D.D.

The people of this State deplore the death as they appreciated the life of Rev. Dr. R. L. Bachman, a fearless leader in moral reform and constructive Christianity. The Knoxville Second Church will remain a monument to his memory.

The new pastorate of the Second Church, with Dr. Horace C. Wilson, is opening auspiciously. The congregation is well pleased with the outlook and the pastor has assumed the leadership of this important field with enthusiasm and hope.

At a special meeting, Sept. 5th, Mr. Ralph Lloyd, a member of the Second Church, was taken under the care of the Presbytery of Union, as a student for the ministry. This makes sixteen candidates in this presbytery.

Rev. H. V. Carson has been dismissed from the Knoxville Presbytery, U. S., to become the pastor of the U. S. A. Church at Ashland, Ky. He recently resigned from the Fifth Avenue Church of Knoxville.

The Rockwood Church was re-dedicated Sept. 18th, after extended alterations and enlargement. Rev. Jos. H. Miller, a former pastor, now in Knoxville, preached the sermon. The present pastor, Rev. J.

C. Orr, was glad to announce that practically all of the cost had been provided for, including some assistance from the Board of Church Erection. Approximately $15,000 has been expended.

The writer enjoyed the hospitality of the Elizabethton Church, in company with the Holston Presbytery, last week. It was quite refreshing to note the optimistic spirit manifested at this meeting. The local church is in a prosperous condition under the ministry of Rev. A. N. Peiland.

KENTUCKY LETTER.

BY REV. JAMES F. PRICE, D.D.

The women from Bethlehem and Fredonia have formed a mission-study class. They are studying Mr. Eastman's book, "The Unfinished Work of the Presbyterian Church."

The writer preached at Marion last Sabbath and ordained three new elders.

Mrs. Frank Wood and the women of Princeton invited the women of the Missionary Societies of Bethlehem and Fredonia to be their guests on Sept. 1 to meet Miss Starling, of Hopkinsville, who is home on a furlough from Siam. Mrs. Wood served a delightful lunch. Miss Starling talked of her work, and the need of more and better work. The Presbytery of Princeton has three missionaries in the foreign field. Rev. Milo A. V. Hogan and his wife, of Fredonia, Ky., in China, and Miss Starling in Siam. Should not every member of each church in this presbytery pray, at least, for each of these missionaries every day?

Rev. James T. Stewart had a good meeting at Mt. Lebanon Church. He had twenty-three additions to the church. Rev. J. T. Neal and Rev. E. B. Johnson had a good meeting at Oak Grove Church. Rev. E. W. Graves recently had a meeting at Pilot Knob. There were several additions and conversions.

The churches of Mt. Lebanon and Ebenezer have about completed a beautiful manse for their pastor, Rev. James T. Stewart.

Rev. R. T. Gettys has just closed a great meeting at Frances Church in the Presbytery of Princeton. Rev. E. N. Hart of Prestonburg did the preaching. There were forty-one professions of faith; seventy-four pledged themselves to pray in secret every day; fifty-four joined the "Win One Band," six family altars were erected; eight promised to return thanks at the table; twelve promised to give public testimony for Christ; nine promised to pray in public; seventeen joined the church. There were fifty Bibles present the last night of the meeting. It was a great uplift to the church. This is a weak church, but they gave Mr. Hart $125.

EMINENT ARCHAEOLOGIST.

Sir William Mitchell Ramsay, D. C. L., the eminent archaeologist, well known to America through his writings on Biblical subjects, has arrived in this country to deliver lectures in theological seminaries, universities, colleges and other educational institutions pending negotiations for the resumption of his excavations at Antioch in Pisidia which were interrupted by the war. In a garden at Antioch Sir William discovered a tablet which corroborates the references in the second chapter of Luke to the governorship of Cyrenius. Another discovery was that of a balustrade on which is inscribed an account of the reign of Augustus. A few American friends have constituted themselves an informal committee to arrange Sir William's itinerary in this country. The secretary is Miss Alyse Paddock Young, 1237 Pacific Street, Brooklyn, New York.

NEW PUBLICATIONS

The Life and Epistles of Saint Paul. By Rev. W. J. Conybeare and Rev. J. S. Howson, D.D. Cloth. 8 vo. $3.00. George H. Doran Company, New York.

This is an old friend in a new face. For many years this has been a valued work, and it has been consulted and read by many, who have been helped in their understanding of the life and writings of the great Apostle Paul. Suffice it to say at this time that it will be found by all sincere students a great and reliable assistant in the study of these inspired writings. The volume is a credit to the publishers, the pages full and the type and paper good. We are glad to see this fine, new edition and bespeak for it a hearty and general reception by students of the Bible.

Bible Cyclopaedia, Critical and Expository. Compiled and written by Rev. R. A. Fausset. Cloth. 4 to. Pl. 753. $3.00. George H. Doran Company, New York.

This is a fine edition of a monumental work that was familiar years ago, and that deserves to be kept in close touch for many years to come. A great mass of valuable material is crowded on these pages, three columns to each page, in excellent type and on excellent paper, and substantially bound, at an amazingly low price. It is of great interest that there should be the requisite enterprise to reproduce this volume at this time. It is a valuable and attractive work, with an immense amount of trustworthy information. It is illustrated by means of six hundred woodcuts. Those who wish to learn about the Bible as it may be presented in such a work as this will find much to reward them for the careful investigation of the stores accumulated on these pages. It is to be heartily recommended to all careful and thoughtful readers and students.

The Life of Christ. By Rev. Dean Frederick W. Farrar, D.D. Cloth. 8 vo. Pp. 744. $3.00. George H. Doran Company, New York.

This is a work that was more familiar to students and readers forty or fifty years ago than it is today. It is a noteworthy enterprise that has secured the re-printing and issuing of this massive work at this time. It is one of the many books written on the Life of Christ that has stood as literature of a high type, and that is still so to be rated today. It is fascinating reading from beginning to end, with a flow of graceful rhetoric and a manifestation of scholarship that is refreshing. So many reviews of this work were written years ago, and so widely was the book known and appreciated, that it seems almost superfluous to say more than that it is welcomed back as an old and valued friend. We hope that this is but the signal for the reproduction of many books of sterling worth that once had wide circulation but that now are out of print. This generation would be richer if it could have access to many such works.

A Dictionary of the Bible. By Doctor William Smith. Cloth. 8 vo. $3.00. George H. Doran Company, New York.

This massive volume, of over a thousand pages, was a standard many years ago, and is still as valuable and reliable today. That it should be reproduced, so satisfactorily, and at so small a price is a gratifying surprise. Composing a bountiful store of antiquities, biography, geography and natural history, it is a rare guide to the store of sacred truth found in the Holy Scripture. With its numerous illustrations and excellent maps it is an invaluable guide to the sincere student of the Word. It is a pleasure to see this compact and finely arranged volume and to commend it to the devout lovers of the Word of God.

The People of Palestine. By Elihu Grant, Professor of Biblical Literature in Haverford College. Cloth. $2.50. J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia.

This is a peculiarly interesting and valuable description of the present people and conditions in the Holy Land. There have been many books, each with its distinctive interest, that have told of the sights and places in Palestine and that have been of real value. But this one tells of what is to be seen today, and of what the life of the people there is at the present time. There are many illustrations of present conditions. The book is written not by a tryro or an enthusiast, but by one who is acquainted with the life and history of Palestine, and who writes these descriptions knowing what others have written of life and conditions in other days. And yet it is written with sparkling enthusiasm and brimming interest, and any one who desires to see and to learn will find much of real and awakening interest on every page.

Snowden's Sunday School Lessons for 1922. Cloth. $1.50. The Macmillan Company, New York.

This very attractive and handy volume, covering, in 329 pages, the entire course of the International Uniform Sabbath-school lessons for the coming year, is out in good time to get a widely extended circulation and entrance before the opening of the year for which it is prepared. An early start is an excellent business proposition. The volume is one to be commended. The Bible text is printed in the Authorized Version, as it should be, in all due respect to conservative opinion. From six to eight pages are taken for each lesson. Sound views are presented, and valuable instruction. The appearance is attractive and neat, and the arrangement is artistic and pleasing. The volume is light and easily carried in the pocket or hand. The arrangement carries with it the presumption that these lessons, thus prepared, are to be a permanent institution.

The Young Man From Jerusalem. By W. G. Ballentine. Boards. $1.00. Houghton Mifflin Company, Boston.

This can hardly be called a system of theology, and yet it is systematic, dogmatic and polemic. The writer makes the teachings of Jesus to consist of "four principles and three fundamental beliefs," no less and no more; and these are stated as dogmatically and autocratically as if coming straight from the throne of God. Moreover the polemic element is vigorously to the point, even to asserting that the theory of the atonement is "monstrous," that Paul "never understood the principle of common sense," that Jesus taught that "Commonsense is the only infallible rule of faith and practice," and other radical and self-originated notions. Thomas Paine never wrote with a more finger-snap denunciation of all religious law and authority, asserting that "orthodoxy has always meant intelligent paralysis and death."

The trouble with the writer is that he has spent all his life in college restrictions and has grown up to be a narrow dogmatist, who mistakes his own notions for the only form of truth.

Sunday School Builders. By John M. Somerndike. Paper. 75 cents. The Westminster Press, Philadelphia.

This is a very instructive and interesting collection of stories from the field of Sabbath school missions. They are written by one of our experienced and consecrated workers who has been greatly useful and who knows the needs of the field at large. These sketches will be found useful to those engaged in the work of Sabbath Schools, Daily Vacation Bible Schools, and in mission bands and societies. They can be used to great advantage in carrying on all such forms of Christian work.

Heroines of History and Legend. Selected by Elva S. Smith. Cloth. $2.00. Lothrop, Lee and Shepard Company, Boston.

This is a very beautiful and attractive volume, in the preparation of which the fountains of literature have yielded their fresh steam and the most famous paintings have furnished the illustrations. Here are forty-eight stories, ballads and narrative poems telling of heroines in various ages and lands, from sacred and secular history and from the legends of all languages. It is a book that will invite to noble and worthy living in the cause of goodness and truth.

The Bible and Its Enemies. By Hon. William J. Bryan. 25 cents. The Bible Institute Colportage Association, 826 North La Salle Street, Chicago. An address of great power and brilliancy, defending the Bible against such enemies as Agnosticism, Atheism, Destructive Criticism, and atheistic Darwinianism. It is strengthening and refreshing to read its utterances.

Betty Barker, A Little Girl With a Big Heart. By Janet Thomas Van Osdel. Cloth. $1.50. Lothrop, Lee and Shepard Company, Boston.

This is a lovely little book for little children, and it would be hard to imagine more lovely characters than the little girl whose name gives the title to the book. Other charming people are associated with her. The book is beautifully illustrated and printed.

Adele Doring; At Boarding School. By Grace May North. Cloth. $1.75. Lothrop, Lee and Shepard Company, Boston.

There have been some preceding story books written about this nice young girl who has now grown up sufficiently to be at boarding school. She is a sweet and attractive young girl who makes it the law of her life to practice kindness wherever she goes and to all whom she meets. The story is a fine one for all girls to read.

Helen of the Old House. By Harold Bell Wright. Cloth. $2. D. Appleton & Company, New York.

This is one of the most attractive and powerful of the exceedingly popular stories of Mr. Wright. It is a story of social life and conditions in a mill town which might be any one of hundreds of American mill towns, with their various elements, of rich and poor, ignorant and cultured, employers and employed. There are various love stories mingled in the larger story, told with the winning power that characterizes the work of this author. But it is a story with a purpose, and that the discussion of labor problems, with a plan for averting strikes and lockouts, and for counteracting the poisonous work of anarchistic disturbers. There is a very vigorous consideration of all such questions running through the book.

The Book of Cowboys. By Francis Rolt-Wheeler. Cloth. $2.00. Lothrop, Lee and Shepard Company, Boston.

The real cowboy is a historical character, of the era before the railroad took possession of the West, and he did a work of real importance in the earliest settlement of the prairie regions. The author of this book has gathered together many facts and put them together in a story which is enlightening and interesting and stirring. It will help to show how the West has been developed and made a mighty part of the United States.

The Presbytery of Cincinnati met in Mohawk Church, Sept. 19th. Rev. Dr. Peter Robertson, who founded the church, was given a great ovation. He desires to retire from its pastorate, which he has served for thirty-three years, on account of his age, being almost seventy-eight years of age. The recent death of Mrs. Emma L. Robertson, his devoted wife, who, with him, labored from the beginning of the church, has sorely bereaved him, and this, added to neuritis, from which he is a partial cripple, leads him to believe it is time to retire. His eye is not dim, and his natural force, intellectually and spiritually, is not abated. The presbytery received Rev. H. Arndt and Rev. J. P. Leve from the Presbyteries of Whitewater and Dayton, respectively, and dismissed Rev. S. A. Caldwell to the Presbytery of Ebenezer. Rev. H. Arndt is to be installed over Sharonville and West Chester churches, in Sharon-ville Church, Oct. 14th, Rev. J. Glenn to preside and preach, Rev. T. C. McNary to charge the pastor, and Dr. C. E. Walker to charge the people; a resolution of appreciation of Rev. Dr. S. F. Swiggett, S. C.

Stephens, Jr., chairman, to be held in the Walnut Hills First Church, on four successive evenings, Oct. 17th to 20th, from 6 to 9 o'clock, will be well worth the serious attention and attendance of all the young people of all the churches of the presbytery. Dr. McKibbin, of Lane Seminary, was at Pittsburgh for several days last week in attendance upon the Presbyterian Alliance.

Dr. Peter Robertson is authorized by presbytery to raise an endowment for Mohawk Church to the extent of $15,000, which, with what may be raised by its people, will insure its continued existence and work, where it has done large things and where it is greatly needed.

Among the speakers on Sept. 16th, telling of plans for "Rally Day," which occurred last Sabbath, were Rev. N. L. Euwer, of the Second Church, and John H. Scott, of the West Church.

At the last week's meeting of the Presbyterian Ministers' Association, a committee, consisting of Rev. K. F. Wettstone, Dr. Wishart and Dr. Langtry, was appointed to co-operate for the Presbyterians.

DE HAVEN—Thomas Sawyer De Haven was born Oct. 4, 1845, and died Sept. 17, 1921. His paternal great-grandparents, Abraham and Martha De Haven, were charter members of the historic church of North Springfield, O., Cleveland Presbytery, organized in 1809. His maternal grandparents, Thomas and Elizabeth Day Sawyer, came to Springfield, from Union County, Pa., in wagons, October, 1829. They united with the church in 1830. Rev. John D. Hughes baptized their ten children, one of whom, Mary Jane, was the mother of the deceased. Rev. Mr. Hughes' first wife was the daughter of the pioneer, Abraham De Haven. Mr. Hughes, that wife and their son, who died during his last year in the theological seminary, are buried in Springfield's churchyard. The son's classmates attended his funeral in a body. Mr. De Haven's maternal grandfather was an elder in this dear old church until he asked "to be released because of the infirmities of age." The De Haven family hold the enviable distinction of being the only family having a continuous membership in this church during the whole 112 years since its organization. ### BACK TO SCHOOL.

Back again with pencils, back again with pens,

Chalking up the ciphers on the board;
But we sigh for velvet meadows and songs of treetop wrens,
And long to wade the swiftly running ford.

Back again with grammars, back again with maps,

We're tracing out old China's musty wall;
But our thoughts are in the timbers, where the gold-wing pecker taps,
And the saucy blue-winged jaybirds loudly call.

Back again with lessons, back again with slates,

We are poring over half a dozen books;
But we wish that we were fishing with the little fat grub baits
In the shadow of the meadow minnow brooks.

Back again with studies, back again with rules,

And the multiplication-tables now we hear;
But dream of some old place where there aren't any schools,
And vacation is a dozen months a year.

HEARTS AND TARTS.

BY NANCY BYRD TURNER.

There was a good deal of trouble at the palace, for the little Princess Anita had been ill for a long time and was very slow in getting back her strength. The doctor said that the reason she mended so slowly was that she fretted too much. But what she was fretting about no one at the court could tell.

The princess was too weak to explain. Whenever they questioned her she answered, "Hearts." More than that she either could not or would not say.

"What do you want, my child?" the king would ask. Everyone knew he would give her half of his kingdom if she wished it, but—"Hearts," Anita replied every time.

"What do you mean by 'hearts,' Anita?" the queen would say.

But Anita only frowned and turned her head away. "Hearts," she answered wearily and would say nothing more.

"If she means human hearts," said the dowager queen, her grandmother, "then she ought to be satisfied, for she owns the hearts of us all."

The court fool racked his brains. At last he stole away from the palace and stayed a week in the forest. When he came back he brought with him two beautiful stately creatures with graceful legs, spreading antlers and large, dark eyes. He called the princess to the window.

"Hearts," he said, as he pointed to the animals.

Anita smiled as she put out a white hand and touched them. But the man's face fell. He saw that he had not guessed the riddle.

"If the princess would only eat a little more she might grow stronger," the queen mother mourned. "What would you rather have to eat than anything in the world?" she asked.

"Hearts," was all the princess answered, but the queen noticed that her eyes grew brighter as she spoke.

At once the palace cooks were notified. They put on their thinking caps. The next morning a plate of broiled chicken heart was set before Anita; but she turned away her head. The next day the princess found on her tray a delicious-looking dessert—amber jelly moulded in the shape of a heart. But she barely tasted it. The third day they brought her chocolate ice cream in a heart shape; but two spoonfuls was all she would eat. On the fourth day the cooks gave up in despair.

But the king and queen kept on trying. In an effort to guess her wish they gave the princess lovely jewels. One week it was a little heart on a gold chain; the next, a silver bracelet with a coral heart for a bangle; and the third, a ring set with a tiny turquoise heart.

"Thank you, father and mother," said Anita. She put on the beautiful things and seemed to admire them; but as time went on she did not grow any stronger or have any more color in her cheeks.

So the royal family said to one another, "What shall we do?"

Then one day Joan, the little daughter of one of the king's foresters, came up to the palace kitchen on an errand. The cook, who was very talkative, began to tell her about the Princess Anita.

"She won't eat, and she won't play," finished the cook, "and when they ask her what she wants she only says 'hearts.' O dear!"

Joan gazed soberly at the cook. "Well, why don't they give them to her?" she asked.

At that the cook lost her temper. "And haven't we offered her every kind of heart under the sun?" she asked.

"I don't believe you have," said little Joan gently. "Has she had the kind that she had at my house one day?"

The cook gasped. When was the Princess Anita at the forester's house, she wanted to know, and what kind of hearts did she have when she was there?

"One day," Joan said, "she came by herself and stayed an hour, and we had a lovely time."

Then the cook remembered that one day the princess had been missing for an hour or two.

"My mother was not at home," Joan went on. "I made a panful of heart-shaped jelly tarts. The princess ate six of them."

Joan smiled; she had thought it was sweet of the little royal girl to pay her a visit.

"The queen must know this," said the cook. "Meanwhile, do you run home, Joan; later on you will get word to come back to the palace again."

The next morning when the princess started out unwillingly enough to walk in the yard, she stopped short on the lowest marble step with a cry of pleasure. For there right before her, coming up the broad walk, was Joan, the forester's little girl, dressed in a white silk gown with blue velvet train, and carrying high in both hands a dish full of lovely heart-shaped jelly tarts.

Joan curtsied as low as she could without upsetting the dish, and Anita, forgetting that she was a princess, curtsied in return.

"Have a tart?" Joan said with a smile.

The Princess Anita took two. "Are you going to play with me?" she asked eagerly.

"As soon as I put on my brown gingham apron again," said Joan, who had felt very comfortable since the queen had dressed her.

"I, too, will put on an apron," Anita said.

They found that she did not have an apron in her whole wardrobe, but the palace seamstress hastily took a piece of gingham and cut armholes in it, and that did very well.

All that day Anita and Joan romped together in the palace yard; and all the next day they romped together at the forester's house. And the king and queen understood that what Anita wanted all along was another little girl to play with—though, to be sure, what she had said was only, "Hearts."—Ex.

PUPPY'S TRICK.

BY DAISY D. STEPHENSON.

I've got the cutest puppy dog,
He's full of funny tricks;
Of course he's apt to chew things up,
And even mother kicks
When shoes and magazines are chewed,
Or curtains furnish puppy food.

But Susie's maddest of 'em all!
It happened yesterday;
She planted lots of flower seeds,
And when she went away,
He got to work and dug 'em up!
My funny, frisky little pup.

She won't forgive him yet, although
He thought she'd buried bones, I know!

THE CONDUCTOR BOY.

He was broad-shouldered and blue-eyed; with a boyish smile, and pleasant manner that had already won for him many friends along the suburban line.

He was always ready to help on the old ladies and the little children. And when papers were left on the car he took pains to give them to the old man in the shabby coat who rode with him every afternoon, or to the thin lady with glasses who taught school at Maple Grove.

There was a little sweet-faced woman who rode with him occasionally. She always got on at Morningside and got off at Pleasant Plain. He liked her the best of all.

He began to eat his lunch most of the time at Morningside. He boarded with Mrs. Higgins and sometimes he did wish she would put up more appetizing lunches. So many times the bread was soggy and the meat tough and the cake stale. But being young and good-tempered, with a fine appetite and digestion, he made the best of it.

The little sweet-faced woman who got on at Morningside saw him eating his lunch one day. She gave it a swift approving glance before she met the boyish smile with which the young conductor always greeted her.

"Just eating my dinner, ma'am," he said gaily. "Have a copy of the morning paper? There were two left on the car today."

It was not long after that she got on again. That day, somehow, he was not hungry. There would be the same old sandwiches, the same stale cake and the same tough meat.

"Wish Mrs. Higgins would cook her meat until it is done," he thought dolefully. "However, I don't like to leave her. She needs the money and she's good and kind to me if she can't cook."

The sweet-faced little woman got off at Pleasant Plains, as was her custom, and after he rang the bell and helped her off he thought of his lunch.

"Guess I'd better eat something," he thought.

He went back to the rear of the car where he kept his lunch box and lying beside it was a white pastboard box.

Attached to it was a slip of paper on which were these words:

"Conductor boy—This is the kind of a lunch I would have liked my son to have had he lived and was in your place. Please accept it with the grateful thanks of one of the mothers on this suburban line to whom you have been so kind."

The conductor boy whistled a little.

There were no other passengers on the car but an old man and a little girl in a red sweater and cap. Passengers were always few after the city limits were passed.

He opened the white box somewhat eagerly.

He stared at the contents as they came into view.

There were three chicken sandwiches with a lettuce leaf between, a little jar of quince marmalade and one of cold beans. A piece of apple pie and a dainty square of frosted sponge cake and four sweet pickles.

How appetizing it was!

The conductor boy gave another long look at the tempting little lunch and then he read again the slip of paper that had come with it.

"I wonder what made me say I wasn't hungry," he whispered joyfully.—Ex.

A GOOD PLAY.

We built a ship upon the stairs
All made of the back bedroom chairs,
And filled it full of sofa pillows
To go a-sailing on the billows.

We took a saw and several nails,
And water in the nursery pails;
And Tom said, "Let us also take An apple and a slice of cake"—
Which was enough for Tom and me
To go a-sailing on, till tea.

We sailed along for days and days,
And had the very best of plays;
But Tom fell out and hurt his knee,
So there was no one left but me.

THE NAUGHTY DAY.

BY EVA M. TURNER.

Lizette awakened far too early; perhaps that was one reason why it was a naughty day. It did not begin right.

It was a very warm morning but there was a sweet, cool breeze stirring the leaves. Lizette lived just where town and country met. If she had looked out of the window she would have seen that the pool in the meadow looked like a great sun, so much sunshine had been spilled into it. If she had listened she would have heard the blue birds singing and the squirrel talking in the old sweet apple tree, but on a naughty day one doesn't hear or see pleasant things.

Lizette was busy with many troubles. Her curls pulled when she brushed them and her stockings would not come straight. She went down stairs.

Her mother heard her coming and had her breakfast ready on a dear little table, all set with blue and white. It was carried out on a leafy porch, but Lizette did not smile. The oatmeal in the blue bowl did not please her, and her mother took it away and gave her cornflakes, but these suited her no better.

For some reason it made her cry to look at the coddled egg, so she decided not to eat anything and sat with her lips drawn into a pout. Her mother sighed. She dreaded a naughty day.

Finally since no one seemed to care if she did pout, she went out along the path, to Dusty's yard. The shaggy pony saw her coming and whinnied as if to say, "Good morning." He really hoped that Lizette was bringing him a tender little turnip. But Lizette's hands were empty and she gave Dusty a good box on his ears when he put his head through the bars, then went and sat in a very shady nook in the garden. Lizette hadn't planned for this to be a naughty day. There were a lot of pleasant things she had planned to do.

She meant to gather a basket of flowers and carry them to Mrs. Lynch, who kept a candy shop and sold ice cream. Mrs. Lynch liked the fresh flowers, and it made her happy to have them and it made the people who came to eat ice cream happy to see them. It always made Lizette happy to gather the flowers and to walk down the pleasant street with the bright basket. Then, too, Mrs. Lynch always gave her some ice cream.

She had intended to hitch Dusty to the basket carriage and take her doll, Christobel, and ask Letty Mills to go with her for a drive in the park. After dinner they would have a tea party for the dolls—but now she would do none of these things, for one didn't do pleasant things on a naughty day.

Presently, through the trees she saw Letty Mills coming down the street. "She's coming here," thought Lizette and she hid away in the corner behind the lilac bush. She could see Letty from her hiding place and watched her as she came up the porch. She heard the faint tingle of the bell and then heard her mother calling, "Lizette—Liz-ette"—but she did not answer. She could see her mother and Letty sitting on the porch, even hear the murmur of their voices. By and by her mother called again, but no answer came.

Then the little girl who was having a naughty day saw Letty go away, not without looking backward several times.

When Letty was quite out of sight Lizette came out of her hiding place, her pretty dress was soiled and torn but she did not care, for dresses always got dirty on naughty days.

"Where were you?" asked her mother.

"I was behind the lilac bush," answered Lizette, "and," she added, "I heard you calling!"

"I'm sorry, for Letty wanted you to come over and go with her. They are going for a long ride in the auto and are going to have a picnic dinner at Idlewild. They sent Letty for you while they were getting ready."

Lizette didn't answer. She didn't want any one to see her cry, so she ran out into the garden. She loved to ride in the auto and dinner in the woods at Idlewild was a joy. A little bird sang in the tree top, the flowers bloomed about the little girl. "They don't seem to have naughty days," she thought, and wiping away her tears, she said:

"I don't like naughty days," and she went for her basket and began gathering flowers for Mrs. Lynch. Lizette's mother, looking out into the garden, smiled—she was glad that the naughty day had been so very short.

MINDING.

"How do I make him go where I want to?" asked Jimsie. "That's easy. If I pull the right rein, he turns to the right, that's all. He always minds."

"And you can teach a goat all that?" asked Uncle Wesley.

"Sure," answered Jimsie.

"Queer that boys aren't so smart as goats," said his uncle.

"They are heaps smarter," answered Jimsie indignantly.

"So?" questioned his uncle. "Seems to me I heard some boy's mother say this morning that her small son never came when she called him, and she didn't know what she was going to do to teach him to mind. I think she would like to be able to pull a rein to have her boy go where the rein told him to!"

"Humph!" said Jimsie slowly. "I think I'll go and do that errand right now."

And before Uncle Wesley could answer, the goat team under Jimsie's guidance had turned off down the street.—Jewels.

HIS SMILE.

I know a sunny little lad
Who gets up every morning gay.
He's happy all the time. He knows
Such hosts of jolly things to play.

His face is seldom clean,
Except at just his washing time,
For even dirt loves him,
But mother does not mind the grime.

She kisses both his chubby cheeks
And tells him merrily the while,
However thick the dirt may be,
It can not cover up his smile.

And when she cleans him up she laughs
And says 'most every single day
How glad she is no soap that's made
Can ever wash that smile away.

VINCENT'S NEIGHBOR.

The man on the platform talked a good deal about being a good neighbor. Vincent could not understand all he said, because he talked so fast and the words he used were not the words of a boy. But he did understand enough to want very much to be a good neighbor.

In the summer hotel with Vincent and his father and mother were other grown people. He did not see how he could be a neighbor to them.

Of course he could run errands for his mother, and, of course, he would mind quickly when she spoke to him. But that was not being neighborly, not when she was his own mother. A neighbor was some one outside the family. Vincent was sure.

While he was thinking about it he went down the beach to play with his new sailboat. The sailboat was a very wonderful gift from his Uncle Vincent.

I was named "The Clipper," and was painted yellow and black, with snowy white sails. Vincent could wade out in the shallow water for a long way, and by fastening a cord to the boat, so it could not get away, it would sail almost as well as the big boats on the lake.

Vincent had sailed his boat up and down the beach for a while and had forgotten all about being neighborly, when he chanced to look toward the shore. A little Chinese bays felt about sailboats. If it sat there watching him.

Now, Vincent did not know just how Chinese boys felt about sailboats. If it had been an American boy, he would have known at once that he ought to ask him to come on out and have some fun. But this little boy looked so different that Vincent thought he might feel different. So he played by himself, while the brown eyes of the little dark-skinned boy followed him.

"Don't you want to sail her?" Vincent asked at last. "You have to hang on tight, so she won't get away."

The dark eyes danced, and the little fellow jumped up and took the cord from

Vincent. He splashed out into the water, and "The Clipper" spread her white sails proudly, as she floated off. The Chinese boy shouted and laughed, just as Vincent had the first time he sailed her.

"Here! I got some more string," he said to Vincent. "Let's tie that on. Then we can both sail her."

The two boys played very happily together until Vincent's mother came down to tell him it was almost time for dinner. Then he remembered the question he had been wondering about in the afternoon—how to be a good neighbor. He wondered whether letting the little Chinese boy play with his sailboat would be counted neighborly. He hadn't really done anything; he had only helped him to have a good time.—Ex.

HOW CHICKENS EAT.

BY LUCIA B. COOK.

My chickens' table manners
Are just a little rude;
They crowd themselves together
And scramble for their food.
Instead of eating slowly,
As mother says is right,
They seem in such a hurry,
It's really impolite.

A MONKEY TRICK.

In the beautiful garden of a large house in Huntingdonshire, lay a little baby, sleeping peacefully in a cradle. The baby was a sturdy boy, and he had been brought by his mother specially that his grandfather might see him once again, for the old man was very fond of the child, and often used to ask for him. The little child could neither walk nor talk; but it cooed and smiled, and that pleased the old gentleman.

And now, after a romp, the child had been put to sleep, and as the day was bright and warm, his cradle was placed in the shade of the trees, where the healthy breezes could play upon him.

Some time later, the mother went out into the garden to see if her baby was still sleeping when, to her surprise, she found the cradle empty and the baby gone. Where could he be? He had not fallen out, for the cradle was not overturned, but remained in exactly the same position.

A search was made in the garden without result. Then suddenly one of the maids gave a scream.

"There's the baby—upon the roof!" she cried. And, sure enough, the child was seen upon the roof, not lying on the leads, but in the arms of a large monkey, which leered down upon the distracted relations, but made no effort to move.

There was a sudden silence, for none dared to shout at the animal in case it should get alarmed or annoyed and throw the baby down. Then, after a pause, some of the party went quickly indoors and hurried up to the bedrooms, from which they dragged out all the featherbeds and put them on the ground beneath where the monkey was looking down so unconcerned.

Some of the men ran for ladders, the intention being to climb up on the roof from the other side of the house, and, if possible, to creep upon the monkey unawares; but all felt that this was so risky a proceeding as to be almost a forlorn hope. Others went to a neighboring house to call the owner of the monkey, who came hurriedly, and tried to persuade it to bring the child back.

But everything was without effect.

There sat the monkey, attentative, but quite unmoved by the appeals.

A quarter of an hour went by, and then suddenly, while all the spectators held their breath, the monkey rose from its haunches, and, still holding the baby carefully, began to climb down from the roof. With what an agonizing thrill its progress was watched. But at last it landed safely upon the ground. Before anyone could get hold of the baby, which all this time had remained as unconcerned as the monkey, and apparently perfectly happy, the creature carried it to the cradle and put it back carefully on the cushions, uninjured, and none the worse for its strange adventure.

The baby grew up to be a strong man, and became known to all the world as Oliver Cromwell, Lord Protector of the Realm of England.

POLITENESS.

"True politeness is perfect ease and freedom. It consists in treating others as you love to be treated yourself." This is one way of saying that politeness is simply a heeding of the Golden Rule. Of all the accomplishments of life none counts for more than sincere politeness, and it is an accomplishment that may be acquired. An illiterate, rough-mannered, and sharp-tongued woman in Vermont was telling a neighbor about a gentleman and a lady who had driven into her dooryard.

"I was plum out o' sorts an' ready to snap up any one that spoke to me," she said. "Soon as I see them comin' into the yard I made up my mind to give 'em sass o'some sort. I was just that ugly in my feelin's, but they had such beautiful manners an' spoke so nice an' polite to me they made me feel as if I was a lady myself, an' first thing I knowed I was askin' 'em if they wouldn't like to have a glass o' milk an' some fresh cookies I had just baked!"

Politeness sometimes has the effect of raising people in their own esteem, and creating self-respect just as it made this rude woman feel for the moment that she was herself a lady.

COURAGE.

BY DR. W. P. MERRILL.

In old days men needed great self-respect and independence in the face of kings and mighty men. Now they need these qualities in the face of the crowd, to keep them from being lost in the great common currents of thought and opinion and prejudice and passion. The main reason why progress halts, and wrong lingers on, and indefensible things remain unchanged, is that there are so many who, caught in the throng, paralyzed by the crowd, dare not call their souls their own, but drift with the popular fashion and current.

The kind of courage that can stand alone, quietly and without fuss, taking the position and speaking the word that is unpopular but right, is one of the qualities most sorely needed in church and state today. I recall a meeting of ministers some years ago, where a matter came up for action, as to which popular sentiment set strongly in one direction. One man alone rose and voiced his objections, and voted against the popular side. After the meeting, man after man took him aside and said, "I am glad you said what you did; I felt just as you did; but there were reasons why I could not take such a stand." Had every man there dared act in accord with his best judgment, the vote would probably have been reversed. There is no greater need in a democracy, whether ecclesiastical or political, than the need of men and women fearlessly independent, ready to say what they think, and to do what they judge right, however strongly the current of popular feeling and opinion may be setting the other way.

FAITH IN ACTION.

It is work that keeps faith sweet and strong; and though we leave the Mount of Vision, we do not leave the Lord. He is with us in the shop, the office, and the place of toil. The only way to lose the Lord would be to refuse to leave the holy Mount. If Peter had stayed on the hill, he would have found himself alone.

"Not for the eyes of men

May this day's work be done,

But unto Thee, O God,

That, with the setting sun,

My heart may know the matchless prize
Of sure approval in Thine eyes."

Lesson II—October 9.

PAUL AT EPHESUS.

(Acts 19:8-20.)

8. And he went into the synagogue, and spake boldly for the space of three months, disputing and persuading the things concerning the kingdom of God.

9. But when divers were hardened, and believed not, but spake evil of that way before the multitude, he departed from them, and separated the disciples, disputing daily in the school of one Tyrannus.

10. And this continued by the space of two years; so that all they which dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord Jesus, both Jews and Greeks.

11. And God wrought special miracles by the hands of Paul:

12. So that from his body were brought unto the sick handkerchiefs or aprons, and the diseases departed from them, and the evil spirit went out of them.

13. Then certain of the vagabond Jews, exorcists, took upon them to call over them which had evil spirits the name of the Lord Jesus, saying, We adjure you by Jesus whom Paul preacheth.

14. And there were seven sons of one Sceva, a Jew, and chief of the priests, which did so.

15. And the evil spirit answered and said, Jesus I know, and Paul I know; but who are ye?

16. And the man in whom the evil spirit was leaped on them, and overcame them, and prevailed against them, so that they fled out of that house naked and wounded.

17. And this was known to all the Jews and Greeks also dwelling at Ephesus; and fear fell on them all, and the name of the Lord Jesus was magnified.

18. And many that believed came, and confessed, and shewed their deeds.

19. Many of them also which used curious arts brought their books together, and burned them before all men: and they counted the price of them, and found it fifty thousand pieces of silver.

20. So mightily grew the word of God and prevailed.

INTRODUCTORY.

Many interesting and important matters have occurred since our last lesson, in which we studied of Paul's experiences in Corinth. The Jews persecuted Paul, dragged him before Gallio and tried to have his work stopped. But Gallio would not interfere. But Paul went away and went to Ephesus, a great city, where was the temple of Diana, which was one of the Seven Wonders of the World. Here he left Priscilla and Aquila, while he went to Syria, visiting Caesarea and Antioch, and then through Galatia and Phrygia, coming again to Ephesus. We read also of Apollos, reared up to be a mighty preacher of the Gospel. Paul found at Ephesus twelve men, believers, who had never heard of the Holy Spirit. Paul instructed them and they received the Holy Spirit, and were baptized by him as true Christians.

EXPOSITORY.

8-10. Paul went first to the synagogue in Ephesus, as he had been in the habit of doing in other cities, there meeting the Jews who came to worship, and giving them the opportunity to hear of Christ and to accept him as their Savior. For three months he kept up this form of work. He taught the truth of the Gospel very plainly, gave the Jews the reasons why they should accept Christ, and spoke persuasively and tenderly of the kingdom of God. Some believed and became disciples of Christ. Others were hardened, and not only would not believe, but became openly abusive. There was no possibility of doing any more good among them, and so he took all the true believers into a body by themselves, separating them from the unbelieving Jews, and held daily meetings with them in a building, occupied by a teacher named Tyrannus, which Paul used a part of each day. Here he continued to teach and preach for two years. It became a great headquarters of interest. Everybody in the whole region who cared for such things came to hear him. Both Jews and Greeks had the opportunity to learn about Christ. It was a great and long-continued Gospel campaign.

11-12. But it was not simply a time for preaching. God set his seal to the work done by this great apostle, so that there was the sure evidence that he was under the divine commission. It is said that God wrought special miracles by the hands of Paul. Some would say that Paul worked miracles. But the inspired writer says that God wrought them. God is magnified and honored by all who truly love and know him. Some say that men wrote the Bible. We know that God wrote it by means of them, inspiring them to write the Holy Scriptures. So here it is said that God wrought the miracles. The sick were healed. As the touch of Christ's garments was the medium for the healing of the sick woman; and the shadow of Peter as he passed by was blessed to those who had faith, so here the handkerchiefs and aprons brought from Paul were blessed by God to the recovery of the sick from their diseases, and for the casting out of the evil spirits from those who were possessed by devils.

13-17. All of this was a cause for great envy on the part of the conjurers and charlatans of the place, who thought that Paul was in the possession of some new trick which was working well and which they were anxious to copy. They got hold of the words that Paul used and thought there was some spell or incantation in the name of Jesus, and they tried to deceive the people by the use of it. Among these wicked men were seven brothers, Jews, sons of a priest, and one day they tried the spell in casting out an evil spirit. But the evil spirit cried out: "Jesus I know, and Paul I know; but who are ye?" Instead of being cast out by these pretenders, the evil spirit incited the man to fury, who leaped on them, beat them down and drove them out of the house, naked and wounded. Miracle working and evangelism are not to be successfully used by pretenders. There must be in one the very grace of God, if he is to be used by God for good ends. Here is a lesson for all of us in doing the work of Christ in the Church and the world. If we are his he will use us. If we are not, it will not be of any use for us to pretend. This incident became widely known, as well as the fact of the miracles that Paul was working. The people at Ephesus realized, both Jews and Greeks, that Paul was a man of God, and that God was making use of him. A great reverence came over them. Even if they did not all believe in Christ to the saving of their souls, they did believe that he was mighty and holy. The name of Jesus came to be revered and held in respect and awe. Such are the results when men who profess Christ's name live devoted to his service.

18-20. One of the mightiest and most convincing proofs of the power of God's grace in the hearts of men is here recorded. There were many persons in Ephesus who had books in which were recorded the rules for working spells and magic, and what might be called the black arts. They had used these, to make money out of them, and they were highly prized. But they had become convinced of the falseness of all such things. Many of these people were converted. They were repentant. They determined to turn from their sins and their wicked practices, and they brought these books to a public bonfire, which all people could see. Into this fire they flung the evil books, and the earth was rid of them. It was a good proof of their repentance and faith, and good faith, when they were willing to suffer financial loss for the sake of righteousness. Some people do not want to lose anything for the sake of Christ. They are unwilling to part with an evil business, or evil profits, or evil passions. They do not want to lose any money for the sake of Christ, or their souls, or the souls of others. Christ said that even if one's hand, or foot, or eye, offended or led unto sin, it would be better to part with the offending member than for the soul to go to hell. This was what these Ephesians came to think, under the teaching of Paul. They put their faith into practice. The Word of God grew mightily and prevailed. So ought we to practice what we profess, to the glory of God.

MINISTER AND TEACHER.

"Woe unto me, the words ring in my ears,
If I preach not the message of Christ!
And so his voice I'll follow down the years,

To every haunt where ignorance keeps tryst;

To lead the children in the Spirit's way;
To help the aged understand God's will;

To be to all men all a teacher may;
This I resolve, Lord, help me to fulfil!"

"And I did not know why I so longed to be

Of those who carried Learning's torch on high,

But through long years I studied earnestly

Lest that I coveted should pass me by.
But now I know; for all the lore and skill

I garnered has been touched with holy light;

I dedicate it to the Master's will,
And pray that I may teach his Word aright." —Educator.

A PARENT'S SUNDAY IN THE PRIMARY DEPARTMENT.

Nothing in his school life pleases a child more than to have his mother visit his room and meet his teacher. Does not the same hold true of his Sabbath school life?

Little children who are interested and happy in their department and its work are delighted and proud to bring father and mother with them especially so on one of the "special days."

A good time for a Parents' Sunday is the first Sunday of a Children's Week, when the attention of all is focused upon the betterment of little children.

On Parents' Sunday provision should be made for the parents to be seated at the back of the room where they can see and hear, but not absorb the attention of the children as would be the case if they were seated near the front. Of course the superintendent will welcome them as they arrive, and one of two children may stand at the door to hand a flower to each father and mother.

The regular program for the day should be used and not a special program to show off the children. The desire is to show the parents the actual work of the school.

A COLORED BOY'S COPPERS.

Freddy, a little colored boy, was a scholar in Sabbath school. Though a rugged little fellow he contracted a disease which resulted in his death. A few days after the funeral the home was visited by the deaconess of the church who found the heartbroken mother putting Freddy's possessions away. What to do with Freddy's bank, which contained twenty-five cents, she scarcely knew. But the appearance of the deaconess suggested the idea that it be given to her to be used in some good cause.

They had a Mission Circle in the Sabbath school, and after thought and prayer, she told the girls the story of the twenty-five cents and suggested that it be invested in cardboard holders, each with spaces for twenty-five cent pieces. These were distributed among the girls, who, went out collecting for missions. Some of the holders were filled more quickly than others. One girl, whose interest in missions had been difficult to arouse, was inspired with the idea of making as much as possible out of Freddy's quarter; she came to the meeting carrying her holder filled in one hand, and in the other enough twenty-five-cent pieces to fill another. She soon filled a third, collecting nine dollars in all. Forty dollars was the financial result of a group of girls taking Freddy's legacy and using it for the Master's sake.

Freddy had two sisters who joined the Circle and became excellent workers. His mother and grandmother became members of the Woman's Missionary Society. The mother of the girl who collected nine dollars also became a member.

Jesus one day long ago took a boy's lunch consisting of five buns and two fishes and fed a multitude. Who shall say how many hungry hearts have been fed on the bread of life in distant lands because a group of wide-awake girls had placed in their hands Freddy's twenty-five cents and multiplied them into forty dollars?

What wonderful things Jesus can do with coppers, plus consecration!

Rev. Herbert C. Cornuelle, pastor of the First Church of Elwood, Ind., reports an interesting Rally Day exercise. Blanks were passed out, one to each class. During the study period each class adopted a ten-word message to answer the question: "What will your class do between now and next Rally Day?"

The answers were "delivered" at the closing exercises, in which all departments gathered together. Here are some of the messages:

Primary class.—"Each of us is going to bring a new member."

Young Men's class—"We expect to double our membership by Rally Day, 1922."

Faithful Workers, a girl's class—"Increased membership, increased attendance, increased collections, increased interest."

Young Women's class—"Our motto is 'Investigate, consolidate, associate, cooperate, donate, consecrate.'"

Adult Bible Class—"Attempt leadership in attendance and membership, cheerfully do our bit."

SELECT READINGS

"Teach us to look in all our ends
On thee for Judge, and not our friends;
That we, with thee, may walk uncowed
By fear or favor of the crowd."

There is a great deal of real religion in simple kindness. An acid temper has a hard time keeping in sight of Christ.

Every new religion that bids for men's favor has some promise of making the way to heaven easier than Christ made it.

It matters not how deep entrenched the wrong,
How hard the battle goes, the day, how long;
Faint not, fight on! Tomorrow comes the song.

Where your treasure is, there will your heart be. There is no exception to this rule. The things you cherish are the measure of your soul.

A man who criticises others ought not to object to others criticising him. To keep sweet under criticism and to profit by it, is a sign of grace.

I know not the way I am going,
But well do I know my guide;
With a child-like trust, I give my hand
To the loving Friend at my side.
The only thing I say to him
As he takes it, is: "Hold it fast;
Suffer me not to lose my way,
And bring me home at the last."

Spiritual results are very very hard to tabulate. They are like leaven hid in meal. One may sow and another may reap his sowing. God knows, whether you have done your best, and you will not fail of your reward.

At the tap root of every doubt is some sin. Righteousness and love are so sure that they do not doubt.

Oh blessed immortality, to so impress the soul of us on the fleshy tablets of human hearts, and upon the deeds of the generation in which we have wrought our life-work that the ages only build higher, and more enduring monuments to our name.

A STANDARD OF TEMPERANCE.

Jesus gave to the world the highest possible standard of temperance when he said, "My meat is to do the will of him that sent me."

A thing may be good in itself, but our course of its pursuit may be worthy of the highest condemnation and we may have become drunkards with respect to it. Salt is an excellent seasoning, but a diet composed of salt would produce sickness and eventually death if persisted in. A standard of life values is as necessary as is a standard of food values. Are we trying to make our souls live on seasoning?

YOUNG PEOPLE

PRAYER MEETING, OCTOBER 9.

Endeavor Topic: How To Improve the Meetings of Our Society. Matt. 18:19, 20; John 4:23, 24.

We ought to make it a point to have good meetings. It is well worth while to study and work for their improvement. If the weekly prayer meeting is good, the society can not fail to be a help to its members. If the weekly meeting is poor, there can be little about the society that can be very helpful to any one. The meeting is an expression of what is in the hearts of the young people, and it is the weekly opportunity for doing much good to all of them.

The meeting should be worshipful. There should be the cultivation of the spirit of worship. We need this above almost any and everything else. We are common, earthly, material and coarse creatures unless we are worshipful. We ought to have the sense of God's existence and of his personal presence with us. Let us carry this into the meeting, and let each word and action and attitude of the whole occasion be such as to increase and cultivate our reverence. Most carefully should we abstain from, and repress everything that may interfere with the reverence and worship that should characterize all Christian life and every Christian meeting.

The meeting should be prayerful. We often speak of a prayer meeting, and yet there may be less of prayer in it than any other thing. Singing is good, and talking is good, and reports and Bible study and all are good, but we feel as though we lack something that is absolutely essential when the actual fact of much prayer is missing from it. We want to pray, in words, so that others may join with us, and we want to hear words of prayer spoken by others so that we can join with them. A prayer meeting without much prayer, and the real spirit of prayer, is like a dinner without food, or a night's rest without actual sleep.

To improve our meetings we need some special Bible study. The Bible is God's Word and we need to learn from it some special truths of God's own revelation. We carry away with us some actual enrichment and strengthening when we have learned some great verse, or some mighty fact, or some precious comfort. We grasp it and carry it with us to be a part of our life. So we ought to make it an element in each meeting, to have some part of God's Word explained and impressed so that we shall make it a part of our very life. When we pray we talk to God, and this is a precious privilege. When we read the Bible it is God talking to us, and this is an enriching delight. Let us make it a definite part of each meeting to portion out some great thing from the Bible and take it with us.

Another thing in each meeting of great advantage is arranging for some special duty that is to be done. We must not permit the spiritual exaltation of a meeting to spend itself in mere emotion. Let us have something definite outlined which we are to do as a result of the good meeting. As we carry this out we are strengthened and we feel that we have been led to do something that was really worth while.

If the meeting is made more spiritual, more full of prayer, more enriched from the Bible, and more of an impulse to real Christian work, we have made improvement in the right direction.

THE WINNING WAY.

If you put a little lovin' into all the work you do,
And a little bit of gladness and a little bit of you,
And a little bit of sweetness and a little bit of song,
Not a day will seem too toilsome, not a day will seem too long,
And your work will be attractive and the world will stop to look,
And the world will see a sweetness like the tinklin' of a brook;
And you'll find the bit of lovin' you have put into the same
Has come back to you in lovin' and come back to you in fame. —Ex.

MONEY MAKING.

Ruskin says, "The first of all English games is money-making. That is an all-absorbing game, and we knock each other down oftener in playing at that than at football or any other roughest sport. The worst of it is that money-making may become a passion which gets a stronger hold on many than religion. Men fall down to worship the golden calf. "Covetousness is idolatry." Men work harder, run faster, stay up later, put themselves to more inconvenience to worship this God of Gold than the true God. Some stoop low. They exact usury, they break into widow's houses, they oppress the poor, they use false weights and measures,—all for money. All praise to honest and high-minded money makers, but they who stoop to crooked ways are worshiping at the shrine of a false god and dishonoring the Lord of glory.

A PARABLE OF LIFE.

BY J. EDGAR PARK.

Two souls came up to the gate of heaven. One, a comfortable lady, felt it hard to leave her house, her jewels, and her parties, yet the thought that she had patronized many philanthropies comforts her as she walks gracefully up the passageway that leads to heaven.

Upon the pavement before her as though coming forward to greet her walks forth a horrid shape, low-browed, hard and mean aspect, with misshapen form and selfish and greedy eyes.

The other soul, arriving in heaven at the same time is that of a poor mother who had loved her Lord and toiled all her days for her children, working her fingers to the bone in the night watches. She knows herself to be ugly, and ashamed of her deficiencies she creeps up the passageway Lo! on the pavement coming to meet her, a glorious spirit crowned with a halo, radiant in beauty and supernatural grace.

The lady, enraged at the apparition before her, as it comes near her bends down to rush at it and drive it away. The poor mother as the angel approaches kneels and bends her head in reverence. As both women do this they strike their heads against something hard and unyielding. It is a mirror.—Ex.

A NEW CLASSIFICATION.

There are three classes of people in the average church—the Reliables, the Unreliables and the Liables. The first are like never-failing springs and can always be counted on. The second are like stagnant ponds, ever stale and never refreshing. The third are like weather vanes, turning hither or thither according as the wind blows—liable to be right or liable to be wrong, but who knows which?

PUBLISHERS' NOTES

Many subscribers pay their subscriptions at this season, and some are interested in securing new subscribers, and make inquiry as to terms, commissions, etc.

We do not give the paper for less than the price to subscribers, new or old, but we do give to any old subscriber a commission for securing new subscribers. We give this commission in money, $1 for each new subscriber, or in books or other articles at what is practically the wholesale price, being about half the regular retail price.

Among the books which have proved popular with our readers are a number of practical discussions of Christian doctrine and stories. Some of them have appeared in the paper and afterwards been issued in book form.

We will send to any subscriber who sends a new subscription at the price, $2.50, any two of the following books:

Victorious Manhood. By Dr. Howard Agnew Johnston.

A Seed Thought. By Leigh Younge. An interesting and useful story.

Golden Grain. Another good story by Leigh Younge.

The Story of the Four Gospels, for Boys and Girls. By Martha A. Hunter.

Pastoral Memories. By Dr. E. P. Whallon.

The Girl in Jeopardy. By Glenroie MacQueen.

PRAYER MEETING

OCTOBER 5.

CONCERT OF PRAYER FOR MISSIONS.
INDIA.

All those who are concerned in foreign missions have learned something of the intensely interesting work in India. Our own Presbyterian Church has a great company of faithful missionaries who are serving Christ there today. Many of the early missionaries, whose names are fascinatingly familiar, and whose praise is in all the churches, went there. The names of William Carey and Alexander Duff are early in the long list of illustrious men and women who have given their lives in Christ's name for the peoples of this great land.

We have, as Presbyterians, four great missions or clusters of churches. One of these, Assam, has just been taken over since the Welsh Presbyterian Church has been united with ours. The church in Wales has had a large and faithful mission in Assam in the Khásia Hills. A part of this now comes to our Church, with two stations, four American missionaries, sixteen native workers and a promising body of communicants. There is a hospital among them which is doing a good work.

We have had the other three missions for years. The one known as the Punjab Mission is in the extreme northwestern part of India and was started in 1834. The one known as Northern India is to the east of the Punjab, and was started in 1836. The Western India Mission is in the region of Bombay, and was started in 1853. The Punjab Mission has fifteen principal stations, the Northern India has ten and the Western India has seven.

In all we have thirty-four principal stations, where the missionaries, schools, hospitals, dispensaries and printing presses are grouped, and from these as centers the work is carried out to 162 outstations, or churches, and from even these the work radiates into many smaller preaching stations or to groups of believers, and thus the Gospel is spreading.

We have 254 missionaries in India from our American Presbyterian Church, of whom sixty-nine are ordained ministers and twenty-six are male physicians or workers; eighty-four women are the wives of missionaries, six are physicians and sixty-nine are teachers. The native force numbers 1,314, of whom sixty-seven are ordained and 177 are unordained ministers, 854 are teachers and 216 are Bible women. There are 10,983 communicant members of the churches, 36,599 adherents, and 11,928 children are in the Sabbath schools. During the last year 1,202 were added to the membership of the churches. There are nine Presbyterian hospitals, that during the past year had 5,957 inpatients, and at seventeen dispensaries there were 62,943 individual outpatients, while 143,273 visits were made to outside patients.

So the work is being done, patiently and faithfully. From year to year the missionaries and other faithful workers are rendering their service to Jesus Christ. The seed is being sown. The Gospel is being taught and preached. The bodies and souls of the people are being cared for in the name of Christ, and God is blessing what is being done in his name and for his sake.

GOD'S COINAGE.

Gold he giveth, scattered open-handed;
Not the burning gold
With which men's happiness is bought and sold,
By whose searing touch their souls are branded,
But the gold of broom,
Rich sunsets, goldenrod and barley-plume.
Silver hath he—measure never stinted;
Not the sparing piece
Of hard-won ore, the poor man's scant increase,
Sparsely meted, though in plenty minted;
But the silver stream,
Dove's feathers, silver birch and minnow's gleam.
Copper strews he—his full coffers sharing;
Not the meager coin
In search of which the child and pauper join,
One expectant; one, long since despairing;
But the copper trees,
Soil, fir cones, russet apples, brown-ringed bees.

TRUE TO HER FAITH.

A few years since Baron Morimura, president of one of the great banks of Japan and a commercial leader of that country, landed in America, and with his suite took apartments in one of the large hotels of San Francisco. Pressed with business cares and desiring to avoid intrusion, he commanded that if visitors wished to see him they should be told he was out. Before long a caller unexpectedly appeared in his presence. The baron was very angry. Upon investigation, he ascertained that a chambermaid had disobeyed orders and had acknowledged that he was in. He severely reprimanded her, She flung at him the reply, "I can not tell a lie for any man!"

After his anger had subsided Baron Morimura began to think. He became impressed with the belief that the strength of character indicated by the chambermaid must have been based on Christianity. He said: "Nobody but a Christian would stand for not lying." He commenced to study the Bible and became a secret believer. Finally he made public confession of his faith and has been a sturdy advocate of his Lord from that day to this. It has since been his great joy to preach all over Japan.

BLASTING AT THE ROCK OF AGES.

He had been a plumber in the beginning of his business career. He was talking about where he obtained his financial start, and he named the building.

Then he added, "They did a funny thing on that building. The architect's plans called for a basement so deep. That carried it below the hard pan. When they reached the hard pan they blasted that all out, then spread around yards of cement, trying to get a solid foundation for their piers. They never got it. Why didn't they have sense enough to use the foundation they had instead of blowing that out and trying to make another one?"

I had no answer, for I had seen a church building where the same process had been gone through with.

And it seemed like a parable to me. For looking over the daily press, especially the Saturday night and Sunday morning church notice columns, one could see that a lot of people were busy blasting out lot of the hard pan of the foundation of the past days. And what is going in? No matter what it is will it be more solid, or as solid?

It is worth while having something on which to stand.

It was with the same foundation thought that Christ ended the Sermon on the Mount by the story of the two men, one of whom built his house on a rock and the other on the sand. "Whosoever heareth and doeth these sayings of mine" is one man.

"Whosoever heareth these sayings of mine and doeth them not" is the other man. Which is which? And which am I? Selected.

WASTING TIME.

A dear old lady from the country went for the first time on a railway journey of about fifty miles through an interesting and beautiful region. She had looked forward to this trip with great pleasure. She was to see so much, but it took her so long to get her baskets and parcels right, to get her skirt adjusted, her seat comfortably arranged, the shades and shutters right, the anxious questions about all the things she had left behind arranged, that she was just settling down to enjoy the trip, when they called out the name of her station, and she had to get up and hustle out. "Oh, my!" she said, "if I had only known that we would have been there so soon, I wouldn't have wasted my time in fussing." Dear friend, the wheel of time is flying; the last station is at hand; these things are so trifling. Get your mind on the main business of life; live as you would wish to have lived when the Porter calls out the last station, and don't waste any more time "fussing."

"THRONGING" BUT NOT "TOUCHING" JESUS.

BY A. W. ORWIG.

Oh the multitudes that thronged Jesus without savingly touching him! It is declared that "much people followed him and thronged him." Also that "as many as touched him were made whole," that is, of both spiritual and physical maladies. Doubtless some thronged Jesus because of his popularity or from idle curiosity, and received no profit. Undoubtedly it would be so now were he on the earth today in bodily form. Jesus is presented in the Bible and in pulpits, and yet many do not touch him by faith for the salvation of their souls. Various causes may be assigned for this fact. Thousands attend the house of God without a thought of being saved. And when the Holy Spirit convicts them of sin, they stifle such conviction. Others never seek opportunities by which they may touch Jesus and be saved.

VOICE AND MELODY.

In these days when explosions of automobile, truck and motorcycle vie with the crash of the trolley car down the street—worse on Sunday than on any day.—the church bell fails to make its melodious message heard.

There was a day which Burns celebrated in his inimitable "Cotter's Saturday Night." In that day reverence was offered to parents, and the home had leadership; old people enjoyed respect; women expected courtesy; the church was the House of God and the Sabbath, his day.

There was poetic mystery in the bronze throat of the church bell calling families to worship. The white haired went even if the foot faltered, and the child followed with lingering step. The pews were filled with families sitting together and the day and the place were wrapped in fragrance which as years past returned to memory as the choicest of experiences.

GENERAL NEWS

CONGRESS.

Congress met, after its recess, on Sept. 21st. In the Senate, the tax revision bill from the Finance Committee, and the peace treaties with Germany, Austria and Hungary from President Harding, were presented. The peace treaties were referred to the Foreign Relations Committee.

The House, with an understanding that it will take up no important business until Oct. 4th, adjourned until Saturday, after a perfunctory meeting. Three-day recesses of the House will continue until next month.

On Friday the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate reported the treaties with Germany, Austria and Hungary for ratification, with two reservations or interpretations. One would require an act of Congress prior to representation on or participation on foreign agencies or commissions by an American representative whose nomination would have to be confirmed by the Senate. The other is designed to protect the property rights of American citizens as well as of the American Government in the three former enemy countries.

Most of the day's session was devoted to the anti-beer bill, with the prospect that its further consideration would go over for several weeks.

The Senate Finance Committee reported its revision of the House tax bill with a view to gathering $3,324,000,000 in internal revenue in the twelve months ending June 30, 1922.

The estimated total revenue under the bill is $136,000,000 less than Treasury experts have calculated to be returned this fiscal year under the present law, but is $84,000,000 more than the revised total under the House bill.

LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS.

The Committee on Disarmament of the Council of the League of Nations in its report, issued Sept. 19th, finds that the Washington conference can better deal with the question of naval disarmament than the league, and that it can be more effectively secured by common agreement among the powers. With regard to land armaments, the same policy has the upper hand.

A WORLD-WIDE PLOT.

One of five men arrested in the act of bombing a shoe-repair shop in Chicago gave information to the police which led to the discovery of a bomb factory and the center of anarchistic activity. Fourteen hundred sticks of dynamite, three inches in diameter and ten inches long, and one hundred sticks of TNT, sufficient to blow up much of the city, were seized. There is evidence of an international organization to overthrow law in many countries. Great Britain has sent a note to the Soviet Government in Russia charging it with promoting Bolshevik movements in India, Afghanistan and other lands. There have also been disorders in Germany and Holland, led by communistic agitators.

Railroad traffic throughout Austria has been completely tied up by a strike, and thousands of visitors are marooned. The railway workers object to prices fixed by the Government.

A FEARFUL EXPLOSION.

The plant of the Badische Anilin- und Sulfur-Fabrik Company, of Oppau, Germany, was destroyed last week by an explosion. The company was the largest manufacturer of ammonium products in the world. During the war it was the largest German maker of ammunition. Reports are that 1,100 persons were killed and 4,000 injured. The whole town was blown away, and towns within a radius of fifty miles were damaged. At the city of Mannheim, three miles away, every window was shattered. The Oppau plant produced 1,000 tons of ammonium sulphate each day, and there are said to have been 4,000 tons on hand.

The 32d French army corps took hold of the work of relief in a vigorous sympathetic way, and French chemists are investigating whether secret war stores were being manufactured.

ENGLISH COAL.

Americans who began shipping coal to England during the miners' strike lost money. The end of the strike left them with cargoes on hand which they were forced to ship back home. The English mines are busy. Reports indicate that the present production is on practically the same basis as that of one year ago. Labor conditions are promising. Men are working longer and harder in order to offset by increased output the recent wage reduction.

POSSIBLE SOVIET COLLAPSE.

Important, if true, is the announcement by M. Kamenef, member of the Bolshevik cabinet, that the Russian Soviet Government will restore the rights of private capital throughout Russia, and that all Russian industries except railways, textile, metallurgical and fuel sources will be handed back to capital.

London authorities believe that Russia, by admitting the failure of the Soviet Economic Committee policy, paralyzes the red movement in other countries, and that Russia may soon be eligible for recognition as a legitimate member of the family of nations.

Famine, military necessity and collapse of Russian industry under Bolshevik management are back of the Soviet's change of policy. The probability of a further conflict between Russia and Poland may also have an influence. Kamenef now stands in the Soviet Government, abreast with Trotzky and Lenine. He comes from an old Russian military family. He is a brother-in-law of Trotzky and the head of the Moscow Soviet, as well as a member of the Bolshevik cabinet.

ALIEN ADMISSIONS AND DEPARTURES.

Immigrants admitted to the United States, during the fiscal year ending June 30th, numbered 805,228, as compared with 430,001 for the previous fiscal year, and with an average of 1,034,940 during the pre-war years from 1910 to 1914.

Departures from the country during the year included 247,718 immigrants and 178,312 non-immigrant aliens.

During the year, 4,517 aliens were deported from the United States. These included 1,268 Mexicans, 389 English, 360 Russians, 252 Germans and 246 Italians. Of the total, 446 were deported on charges they were anarchists.

RUSSIA.

The situation in Russia is more and more confused and alarming. Colonel Edward W. Ryan, American Red Cross Commissioner, reports from Riga that relief for Russia will cost $1,000,000 a day, and that $2,000,000 will die in spite of all the help the world can give. At the same time reports are that the Bolshevik government is using the most violent means to maintain its power. In one day sixty-one persons were shot in Petrograd, after being sentenced to death by the Cheka.

ROUMANIA.

Swiss papers are giving much attention to Roumanian affairs. Roumania entered into the new international association known as the Little Entente. She represents in Eastern and in Central Europe a factor of equilibrium and peace, for she entertains cordial relations with Czecho-Slovakia and Poland and with the Greece of Constantine. But Roumania as a factor of conciliation can be operative only when Roumania herself has acquired stability and peace. In truth, the internal situation is terribly confused. Violent political strife is paralyzing the recovery of business. Political insecurity resulted naturally in manifestations of Bolshevism. Such manifestations are unquestionably due to foreign propaganda. It must not be forgotten that Roumania's worst enemies, Rakowsky and Bela Kun, are now in Russia. The Geneva Journal says that "the Roumanian nation is the most thoroughly opposed to Bolshevism of all the nations of Eastern Europe, and that this isolated bastion against Bolshevism may in the future be of inestimable service to Western civilization."

A PEACE MONUMENT.

A monument recently erected at Blaine, Wash., a town on the Pacific Coast at the end of the boundary between the United States and Canada, is an object lesson to both countries and the world. One may stroll to the edge of the town and step across the street into Canada. From there, looking east, there stretches an invisible border three thousand miles long, without a fort, a gun or a ship to protect it. It has so stood for a round century. The people of Blaine thought this fact worthy of observance. They erected a monument as a tribute to the successful attempt of two peoples to live side by side in peace and amity, in mutual trust and mutual exchange. There should be another monument at the eastern end of the border, and others scattered along the three thousand miles of its unguarded length, to remind the people on both sides of their priceless possession.

GERMAN MONEY.

For the first time in German financial history the mark has dropped to a point below one cent in its value. Its value before the war was about twenty-four cents. A new issue of paper marks after the payment of her Sept. 1st installment on reparations raised the circulation of the Reichsbank from 68,423,000,000 marks to 71,960,000,000 marks, an increase of 3,500,000,000 marks in two weeks. In the same period the Reichsbank gold reserve was reduced from 1,091,543,000 to 1,023,708,000 marks.

AN OLD SAW.

One of the exhibits at the National Exposition of Chemical Industries will be a silk purse made out of a sow's ear. A scientific writer tells how the ear was treated with chemicals and softened and rolled and shredded and reeled and woven and dried and made into a very pretty purse. He admits that the silk is not of a high quality, but says that it sets at rest and silences the old say: "You can't make a silk purse out of a sow's ear."

AMERICA'S GREATEST CITY, AND YET—

A correspondent of the London Times made the assertion that five-sixths of the inhabitants of New York City were born in Europe. A New Yorker corrects this. Statistics show that about two-fifths of the inhabitants of New York City are foreign-born. To be exact, 1,927,703 "New Yorkers" were not born in the United States. The Americanization of New York would seem to be the problem for New York people. Until this is solved, New York's "leaders of thought" should support immigration laws both in spirit and in letter.

ROAD BUILDING.

According to Ohio officials, the cost of road construction has increased from approximately $10,000 per mile to $36,000 a mile.

The bids upon which they base their figures are as follows:

Brick, average of low bids, $49,249 a mile.

Monolithic brick, average of low bids, $42,228.05 a mile.

Concrete brick, average of low bids, $33,424.04 a mile.

Bituminous macadam, average of low bids, $32,047.17 a mile.

Water-bound macadam, average of low bids, $21,724.50 a mile.

Kentucky rock asphalt, average of low bids, $31,042.12 a mile.

Bituminous concrete, average of low bids, $31,042.12 a mile.

A composite mile of all the above averages $36,722.95. The average cost of all bids is $36,731.70 a mile.

The tide of battle in Asia Minor has turned, at least Turkish dispatches say it has. A dispatch says: "The Turkish advance is developing and the Greeks are abandoning numbers of cannon and machine guns and quantities of material."

The New Mexico election last week resulted in the choice of H. O. Bursum, Republican, as United States Senator.

There were severe local wind and rain storms in Central and Northern Ohio last week. The worst damage was at Zanesville, where a part of the business section was wrecked.

After a long period of depressing heat, the city of Rome had a remarkable cold snap. A cloud-burst occurred Sept. 23d, accompanied by a storm of hail, which covered the streets in some places six inches deep. Much damage resulted.

President Harding has drawn a proclamation calling upon every person in the United States to pause in his task for two minutes at noon on Nov. 11th, to give thought to the achievements of the American soldier dead.

Statisticians have figured out that twenty-four million American boys and girls have started to school this month.

A combination of more than a hundred organizations working with a hundred and fifty manufacturers, wholesalers and retailers, to stimulate healthy people and healthy business, is what Cincinnati offers in its first Health Exposition during the week of Oct. 15 to 22.

Fewer miles of railway were constructed in this country last year than in any year since records regarding railway building have been kept, the total being 314, as compared with 686 miles in 1919. Last year was the fifth year in which the mileage abandoned exceeded the mileage constructed.

It is estimated that 11,775,000 automobiles have been manufactured in the United States since the beginning of the industry, about twenty-five years ago. Of this number more than 700,000 have been exported, 2,000,000 have been worn out, destroyed or abandoned, and 9,000,000 are estimated to be in use.

Business failures for the first seven months of 1921 numbered 10,493, with liabilities totaling $447,301,900. For the same period of 1920 there were 3,520 failures, with liabilities amounting to $151,533,731, while in 1919 for the same period there were 3,278 failures, with liabilities of $76,207,669.

The National Child Health Council has selected the city of Mansfield, O., and the county of Richland, in which that city is located, as the field for its demonstration of the value of a comprehensive program for the health of mothers and children.

Ruins of a great temple have been unearthed at Sikyon, a city on the southern shore of the Gulf of Corinth, which in the fourth century before the Christian era was one of the principal cities of Greece.

The foundations and pillars seem to indicate that the temple was built by the Dorians, who captured the town from the Aegalean Ionians, and held it for several centuries.

THE CHILD MOTHER LOVES BEST.

Isn't it a wonderful thing about mothers, that they can have many children without having a favorite among them? We ought to say, isn't it one of the wonderful things? For pretty nearly everything about a real mother, from the time when she cheerfully risks her own life to give life to the little one, through all the years when her own welfare is second to that of each child is wonderful.

Mothers, however, are but human and subject to human frailty. Some of them feel and show a preference. This is terribly painful to the less favored one. Can you imagine anything more sure to make a child feel lonely and homesick, even in its own home, than the knowledge that brother or sister is held dearer?

Thank heaven, the large majority of mothers are blessed with such love for every one of their children that they themselves could not tell which comes first in their heart. They love the firstborn because he is the first; the latest baby because he is the youngest; the second boy for his manliness, the girl for her unselfishness, or, perhaps, even for her beauty or pretty ways. A mother does not need much excuse for loving, but there comes a time when the most impartial of mothers realize that there is one child whose claim on her tenderness exceeds that of all the rest.

And which child is this? It is the one that needs her most. When it is sick, when it is in trouble, when it grieves, then the mother knows that her whole heart is bound up in that particular child. What a haven of refuge mother's arms then become? How merciful both for child and mother that the supply of love gushes forth to answer the need. This is one of the most precious things in life, and the only pity is that thoughtless youth sometimes does not realize until too late what irreplaceable loveliness goes out of life when mother goes. — American Fruit Grower.

THE SHADOW ON THE BLIND.

Last night I walked among the lamps that gleamed

And saw a shadow on a window blind,
A moving shadow; and the picture seemed
To call some scene to mind.

I looked again; a dark form to and fro
Swayed softly, as to music full of rest;
Bent low—bent lower;—still I did not know.

And then at last I guessed.
And through the night came all old memories flocking,

White memories like the snowflakes round me whirled.

"All's well!" I said; "the mothers still sit rocking

The cradles of the world."

Indian Pudding.—This is baked in a regular bean pot, cooking slowly in the oven all day long, with the cover on. Heat one quart of fresh milk in a double boiler until the milk boils; drop slowly from the hand four tablespoonfuls of yellow cornmeal. Stir from five to ten minutes or longer, to make it perfectly smooth. Add a teaspoonful of molasses, and one teaspoonful of salt, a piece of butter half the size of an egg, and stir thoroughly while on the stove. Remove from the stove and add one well-beaten egg; stir well; turn into a bean pot, and into the latter turn one pint of milk; do not stir. Bake all day. Serve warm with cream.

Mocha Tart.—Weigh four eggs and allow their weight in butter and sugar. Cream butter and sugar very smooth, add the eggs beaten for at least five minutes, stir in any flavoring desired, and when all are blended, add lightly as much prepared flour as will make a batter of the proper consistency. Bake in layers. When cold spread each layer with a filling made by beating butter and sugar and whipping into it enough very strong black coffee to give the desired flavor. Or omit the sugar and whip into the beaten butter enough coffee syrup to make as sweet as desired. The top layer may be ornamented with this cream.

JELLIED VEGETABLES.

"Jellied vegetables are particularly suitable for a luncheon or supper dish to be served as an accompaniment to almost any kind of cold sliced meat," says Fannie Merritt Farmer, in the Woman's Home Companion. "Remove the jelly to a serving dish and surround with the slices of the meat overlapping one another; then garnish with celery tips. Cold meat needs to be very thinly sliced to be at its best, therefore see to it that the closet can boast of sharp knives, for without them the work can not be perfectly done. Soak one tablespoonful of granulated gelatine in one-fourth of a cupful of cold water, and dissolve in one cupful of boiling water; then add one-fourth of a cupful each of sugar and vinegar, two tablespoonfuls of lemon juice and one teaspoonful of salt. Stir in cool, and when beginning to stiffen add one cupful of celery cut in small pieces, one-half cupful of finely-shredded cabbage, and one and one-half canned pimentos, cut in small pieces. Turn into a mold and chill thoroughly.

NEW PLANT FOR AMERICA.

Among the many new plants which are being propagated in this country is the Chinese jujube "Ziziphus jujuba," which is an alkali and drought-resisting fruit tree which heretofore has been grown almost exclusively in China. Now, however, it is being planted in California and the semi-arid South and Southwest and big crops are being secured.

The fruit of the better varieties is about the size of a large prune and is reddish or mahogany brown in color when ripe. It can, of course, be eaten when fresh, but is usually used for the familiar "jujubes" combined with cane sugar or honey.

Another emigrant from the far east among trees is the Tung oil tree, from which drying oils are now secured for the paint manufacturers. It was, it may be added, the war which inadvertently brought about a demand for a new drying oil that led to the bringing to this country of young Tung oil trees from China. So far they seem to be flourishing, but they will not be counted as American trees for some time yet.

OUR FOOD SUPPLY.

The United States Department of Agriculture emphasizes the fact that the white potato crop this year promises to be only 316,000,000 bushels, or 96,500,000 bushels short of the average rate of consumption between 1905 and 1914, and suggests that with the prospective crop of 33,500,000 bushels of rice, and the considerable crop brought over this year, this cereal should take the place of the shortage of potatoes.

It also mentions the fact that the expected wheat surplus of this country is steadily dwindling, and that shipments of wheat are unprecedentedly heavy, and that we may look for a heavy shortage in the supply of wheat later, and before next year's crop can be made available, with a necessarily higher price for wheat and other foodstuffs.

There is a shortage of over 100,000,000 bushels in apples, a great shortage of peaches and other fruits, and in vegetables.

Fortunately there is a large citrus fruit crop in Florida. There will probably be a greater demand for oranges and grapefruit, to take the place of fruits which will be extremely scarce this winter, than ever before in the history of the citrus industry. This should mean very great activity and prosperity for the citrus fruit industry of Florida and California.

CHILD WELFARE IN BELGIUM.

Through the second International Conference on the Protection of Childhood, held at Brussels from July 18 to July 21, the attention of the world has been called to the program Belgium is working out for the conservation of childhood. Of timely interest is an article by Dr. Rene Sand, of the University of Brussels, recently received by the United States Department of Labor through the Children's Bureau. How intelligence, determination and united effort triumph over conquest, war and famine is vividly portrayed in this discussion of "Industrial Medical Reconstruction in Belgium," which appeared in "Living Medicine."

Even during the years of occupation, when the Government had left the Belgian soil and the only central co-ordinating agency was the voluntary "Comite National," public-health activities were started on a hitherto unknown scale, and for the first two years there was an actual decline in infant mortality. Dr. Sand accounts for this in part by the cessation of industrial work for women. The Children's Welfare League, which had begun to function to a limited extent before the war, developed in the midst of the most difficult circumstances until even the smallest village was reached.

In spite of these efforts, the average child was, at the time of the armistice, one full year backward in normal development; the weight of the average Brussels schoolboy was three pounds below normal, and of the average schoolgirl, seven pounds.

The first step in the medical reconstruction of industry, was the establishment of a medical service, which, includes in its functions the protection of expectant and nursing working women and the care of the health of working children. The service immediately formulated a constructive program which enlisted the co-operation of all agencies concerned in the promotion of public health, including the health of working mothers and their children.

In the United States, eighteen states provide for the physical examination of every child entering industry, but no state has provided for examinations of working children at regular intervals. Belgium has adopted the advanced program of a medical examination for every juvenile not later than a month after he has entered an industrial occupation, to be repeated once a year until the child reaches eighteen, and oftener in case of disease.

Belgium has realized that health protection in the community must go hand in hand with health protection in industry, and Dr. Sand emphasizes the following:

points: General public-health work; child welfare; housing; the restriction of alcohol consumption, and education and recreation, both for adults and children.

A national children's board has been established, which is maintained by public and private funds, and which supervises and supports child-welfare organizations meeting certain conditions. The child-welfare program includes the periodical free examination of children under three years of age brought by their mothers for examination; the establishment of free medical dispensaries for expectant mothers; the diffusion of knowledge relating to infant health and maternal nursing; and the supervision of boarded-out children under seven years of age. The cost of child-welfare work will be borne one-half by the state, one-fourth by the province, and one-fourth by the municipality. Provincial and municipal boards are appointed by the national board, and advisory committees are provided for.

A TRUE AMERICAN.

A foreign-born woman now in America and enthusiastically loyal to her adopted country unintentionally gained the ear of a reporter who introduced her to the public. She came from Hungary and heard how Hungarian miners were on a strike. She said:

"What's the matter with them? What do they want? America's a good country. The best country. They get more money here than back in Europe. What they come here for? For the great big money. Now what they want? They try to make America like Europe. Bah!"

All this in a brand of broken language only intelligible to the initiated.

"They not know when they well off. They forget how it was in Europe. If they not like it here, why don't they go back?"

Pointing to our dog's blanket bed, she spat out venomously:

"In Europe they had not that to sleep on. I had not that to sleep on. But I know now I have a good bed.

"I no can read," she railed on. "I no can write. In the old country no poor people can read or write. If I born here, I could read and write. Here everybody go to school.

"Huh! What they want? They make me sick. America's the best country."

Maybe in the press, particularly the foreign-language press, would give some space to the preachings of Americanized folk like this loyal woman, it would open the eyes of some others.

SCHOOL DAYS AND HEALTH.

School days are here and cool weather is due. I know the girls may call me an old crank, and the mothers may say: "Oh, I just can't do anything with my girl. She must just go her own gait, and suffer her own pain. I know you are right about the silly way she dresses, and I know it is dangerous to wear slippers and low necks and short sleeves in winter, and I know she must either completely shun warm underwear if she does, or wear the very thinnest, and it is low-necked and short-sleeved at that—to match her dress waist. The style is to blame, not I."

Haven't you heard mothers talk just so? I know you have, and I have seen fathers look daggers at such styles as are now adopted by all manner of women, skinny or fat. It isn't altogether the girls that set these styles. It is some women far off from our country districts and small cities. It is the thing, though, for women and girls to go daft over every ridiculous style coming on. No wonder the men look daggers. When do you find men acting so? Never. Why, a man married twenty-five years ago could today wear his wedding suit, and people would think he bought it yesterday. Could his wife wear her wedding dress? Not at all, without every woman turning to look and wonder. Why, even one made five years ago would brand the wearer as odd, if worn today.

And so much for the mother who lays all this danger, this forceful disobedience of her school-girl daughter in wearing summer clothes into cold and snow, upon the style. She, with the aggregate of mothers, is responsible for the style.

I know the short sleeve, the low neck, the thin waist are very pretty on a pretty girl, but when you carry this pretty fashion into the schoolroom in winter, as you did last, when you wear thin scarfs on your heads instead of hoods, when the youngest girls among you wear skirts to the knees and thin stockings, then it is time, if the fathers and mothers do nothing about it, for teacher, principal and trustee to call a halt, and give them to understand that this fresh-air business has gone too far, and it was never intended, except for the lungs, through the mouth or nose, never through the pores of the skin, the delicate membrane of the ears, the glands of the throat. It is time, I say, to be fighting tuberculosis in the young from this end of the line—dress.

Certain little health pamphlets on the rules and regulations of how to keep well were placed on the desks of our school last winter. And yet, despite this, many of our girl teachers set the example of going bareheaded in zero weather, and discarding underwear, that short sleeves might be worn handily. Can such teachers teach girls to look after good health in an intelligible way? Scarcely. They simply set a bad example.

I know girls, whose parents have doctored them, at great expense, for catarrhal troubles of throat and head, to come to school wearing fancy slippers, a thin scarf about the head, and low-necked waists. I have known them to go riding after night with young men during the cool spring and fall nights clad still more thinly. Any mother or father who can not control a daughter in this line must be weak, indeed, and not really care whether the girl suffers or not.

But they do. The little mother, who says, "Well, you must just bear your own pain when it comes," does not mean it. She suffers every pang and pain of the dear life born to her, and goes to her grave heart-broken when the child dies of tuberculosis—or any disease based upon neglect—as so many are.

As Mrs. Albion Bacon, the author of our Indianapolis tenement-house law, says: "This may be called an age of barbarism when we allow people to die of preventable diseases."

And the parents who allow their daughters to contract disease because of style, must certainly enter this class right at the head. I have nothing to say to our country boy students, for boys dress sensibly in winter.—Indiana Farmer.

THE BEST FIRM.

A pretty good firm is "Watch & Waite,"
And another is "Attit, Early & Layte";
And still another is "Doo & Dairet";
But the best is probably "Grinn & Barrett."
Walter G. Doty.

"An editor is a man who puts things in the paper, isn't he, pa?"
"Oh, no, my son; an editor keeps things out of the paper."

"Mamma, what does pa work at?"

"He is a tea sampler. He samples the different kinds of teas."

"Do you know what I'm going to be when I grow up?"

"No; what is it, son?"

"I am going to be a pie sampler."—Ex.

One Too Many.—A literary family to which a seventh child had just come was at a country house, and for a time a good deal of the care of the other six children devolved upon the father, who had Spartan ideas as to the up-bringing of his sons. One morning he carried his two-year-old to the creek near his home, to give him a cold plunge. The child objected lustily to this proceeding, but was firmly held and ducked, notwithstanding.

At the instant of the ducking, however, a brawny hand seized the Spartan father by his shoulder and flung him back, while the angry voice of the farmer, who was his nearest neighbor, roared in his ears:

"Here! None of that! I'll have the law on you for this."

For some time the father endeavored to convince the farmer that he was not trying to drown the child. Even then he wasn't wholly convinced. To the very last minute he kept shaking his head skeptically and saying:

"Well, I dunno about that. I dunno. You got six besides this."

Willing to Do His Part.—An American who has spent much time in Scotland tells of an old farmer who once took tea with a former Duke and Duchess of Buccleugh at Drumlanrig Castle. His Grace's Dumfriesshire estate.

His first cup of tea was swallowed almost immediately the duchess gave it to him. Again and again his cup was passed along to the head of the table. At the tenth cup the duchess grew uneasy about the supply on hand.

"How many cups do you take, David?" she asked.

"How mony do ye gie?" John asked, cannily.

WORKING THEIR WAY IN UTAH

Never have there been so many boys and girls working their way through Utah's Westminster College as this year. Good, paying jobs were scarce last summer and many parents could find little ready money for education. One boy came with no money; another brought $50; another had $60; one other came with $100, and many others must add materially to their slender store if they are to get through the year.

A goodly number of the girls are working their way in private homes, but most of the boys are provided work on the campus, where they milk the cows, gather the fruit and vegetables, and do the many things which come along with farming and gardening. We will need to provide a good many with student scholarships. Couldn't you care for one or more student sat $50 each?

For particulars address H. W. Reherd, D.D., Westminster College, Salt Lake City, Utah.

THE BIBLE and Its Enemies

With great boldness and plainness of speech Mr. Bryan paints the Atheist, the Agnostic, the Higher Critic, and the Evolutionist as they are—enemies of our country, of Christ, and of the Word.

"Is There No One to Help?"

My Dear President:

I am so disappointed. I had set my heart on entering college this fall. I felt sure you could help me with a scholarship as you said you would try to do. It looks as if this is my only chance. Is there no one to help?
A MOUNTAIN GIRL.

The college president's mouth quivered as he told the story. Every scholarship had been assigned, but he had promised to do his best to secure one more, so that he could assure that much help to a girl from a mountain home who was eager to take the college course. But he had failed and had been obliged to write that he could do nothing. Then came the letter, in substance as above.

If You Had Known, Would You Not Have Supplied the Need?

Well, there are many such cases every year and more than one Presbyterian college president is sad at heart because he is unable to extend more widely the service for the giving of which the college was founded. Why not establish some scholarships? Write us about it.

TRUST

The camel, at the close of day,
Kneels down upon the sandy plain
To have his burden lifted off,
And rest again.

Thou, too, O traveler, to thy knee
When daylight draweth to a close,
And let the Master lift the load
And grant repose.

Else how could'st thou tomorrow meet,
With all tomorrow's work to do,
If thou the burden all the night
Dost carry through?

The camel kneels at break of day
To have his guide replace the load,
Then rises up anew to take
The desert road.

So, pilgrim, kneel at morning's dawn,
That God may give thee daily care,
Assured that he no load to great
Will make thee bear.

YES, THE CHURCH IS SOUND.

There are occasional intimations that the Church of today has departed from the old doctrinal positions so far that it is no longer to be considered sound. The evangelical sometimes speak of it sorrowfully, and with grief and foreboding. The unevangelical laugh and scoff over it with a ring of malicious glee and triumph.

The enemies of Christ and his cause have been plotting to destroy his Church all through the centuries. There have been many bloody and sweeping persecutions which have swept away millions of Christians by fire and sword, in Rome, France, Spain, Holland, England and Scotland, and Armenia. But persecutions have always driven Christians nearer to Christ, and so it has been true that the blood of the martyrs has been the seed of the Church.

But a far more effective influence wielded against the life of the Church has been the continued and determined effort to pervert the Christian faith, and through materialistic and rationalistic teachings to blind the eyes and harden the hearts of believers, and draw them back into essential heathenism, or to a condition that simply ignores the positive and inspired teachings of the Holy Scriptures. If that can be done the Church is destroyed, so far as being a vital and divine influence and power in the world is concerned.

There have been various schemes for robbing the Church of its distinctive faith.

There have been arguments brought against the Bible to show that it is not divinely inspired, but that it is full of errors and of merely human origin. Voltaire declared that in a hundred years from his day the Bible would be driven out of the world, but now, more than a hundred years after, more Bibles are printed every year, probably, than the full number to be found at that time. Ingersoll blasphemed and said that soon no one would believe the Bible. The Bible holds on its way still, but no one believes Ingersoll who has any regard for truth. Infidel books and lectures have been delivered to break up faith in God, in Christ's divinity, in the Atonement, in prayer, in miracles, in the future life, and in every other great and sacred truth. But Christian people go on believing as they always did. The Sun still shines. God still lives.

Then there have been schemes of modern rationalists, to denaturalize, or devitalize, or despiritualize the whole scheme of revealed religion, and, without the sound of blasphemy or infidelity, effectually sweep away everything divine from Christianity, and make it all a merely human development. Thus the Bible is called a good book, Christ is called a good man, Christian life is considered, not as a regenerate life brought about by being born again by the Holy Spirit, but only as an effort to be amiable and good. Social service rather than regeneration is to be relied on. Many colleges, and some theological seminaries, are teaching, from chairs that were endowed by Christian gifts, that mere evolution is to be depended on rather than the work of God's Spirit, and some missionaries, under false pretenses, are accepting commissions and are going out to teach heathen people the latest dicta of rationalism rather than the eternal truths of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Is the Church still sound? Yes, the Church is sound. All there is of the Church in the sight of God, is, of right must be, and by the grace of God will continue to be, sound and loyal and true to the deathless Gospel that has come to us from the Son of God. God has not changed the Gospel and no human being can do it.

Our Presbyterian Church is sound as tested by its standards. Its confession of faith and its catechisms agree with the Word of God, as the shadow on the dial agrees with the sun. The deliverances of our General Assembly, on all doctrinal matters, in resolutions and actions, are true to the Word of God as the needle is to the pole. Tried by every actual and official test, our Church is true to Jesus Christ.

Any man who in a theological chair or pulpit, or public print, departs from the teachings of evangelical truth as laid down in the Bible and defined officially by the Church, is the same sort of a person, relatively and morally, as the bootlegger or the burglar is in social life. The law of the land is right, but the criminal is an anarchist. The Church is sound in its testimony before God and the world, but the modernist, or rationalist, is an anarchist. Thanks be to God that the anarchists, although they make a loud noise, are the exception and not the rule.

A NATIONAL PERIL.

Many writers deplore the growth of radical Socialism and I. W. W.-ism with the increase of crime and general disregard of law. The common sentiment seems to be that these are the result of the war and must be endured until we can educate people out of them or stop them by legal proceedings. The Manufacturers' Record replies to one who takes this view. It says:

"The socialistic agitation of the hour has not come as a result of the war. The war has been only one factor in this movement. For a great many years we have had a distinct socialistic trend in the teaching of many of our colleges and universities. Much of this came from the socialistic doctrines preached in Germany and sent broadcast through the world through the followers of Marx. Many of our professors fell an easy victim to these false doctrines, just as some ministers of the Gospel fell easy victims to the atheistic teachings of German universities. Marx proclaimed socialism, and out of that phase of German life has come the Bolshevistic, socialistic chaos throughout the world. German universities and German philosophers denied the divinity of the Bible and proclaimed their atheism until their doctrines reached a point where their influence was felt not only in the secular colleges and universities of the country, but in many theological seminaries and in the pulpit itself."

These doctrines have permeated our educational work for the last twenty-five years, and during that time there has been a growth of disregard of law and an increase of disobedience in family life. "The world is,"

as one writer puts it, "at the crossroads"; or, may we change it and say, the world has been walking straight toward a bottomless abyss? It has gone stumbling down the hill that leads to ruin. And yet despite the fact that other civilizations have gone the same way and ended in a bottomless abyss, there are leaders who are saying, "Come on, come on. This is the way."

Unless the world disregards the teachings of these false leaders and faces about and accepts the Divine law as the only course of safety, we shall follow the road that leads downward to ruin.

The Record concludes: "Without genuine religion, without an acceptance of the teachings of the Bible, there can be no individual or national salvation.

"Against the false doctrines of Radicalism and Marxism, against the Bolshevik cry of down with churches and synagogues and all governments, we must hold up the standard and proclaim the truths which have come to mankind by the teachings of the Almighty. From our schools, and pulpits, and theological seminaries must be rooted out the doctrines of Atheism, Socialism and Bolshevism. They are all of similar birth, and their outcome, if followed to the end, will be the same.

"We are optimists as to the advancement of the world and the building of a nigher civilization on the wreck and ruin of the war. But we are optimists not because the signs are in evidence, but because we believe that the Almighty is leading us that way. 'He moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform.'"

CARELESSNESS AND FIRES.

The destruction of property by fire has assumed such proportions that it is a very serious menace to any possible material prosperity in our country. It has come to be more than a financial or material question. It is so affected by the mental and social habits of the people as to rise to the attitude and proportions of a moral consideration. So large a proportion of the losses are said to be occasioned by heedlessness, developed by a sense of irresponsibility, that it seems to be necessary to do something to arouse the moral natures of the people to the point where they will feel it incumbent upon them to be careful.

It is stated by Captain J. J. Conway, Superintendent of the Underwriters Salvage Corps, that 92 per cent of all fires are due to carelessness, and he urges that a campaign of education for fire prevention be carried on in public schools, churches, clubs and newspapers, in order to bring people to an intelligent comprehension of the enormity of the danger and loss through fires, and to a moral sense of duty to reduce them to a minimum.

During the year 1920 he reports that, in the United States, over 15,000 persons were burned to death, and that 17,000 others were injured by fire, 82 per cent of these being women and children. An average of five public schools per day took fire. The use of gasoline in the home was responsible for the death of 797 women, and he insists that its use for cleaning purposes should be absolutely avoided. Five hundred million dollars worth of buildings and products were consumed by fire last year, or an average of five dollars for every man, woman and child, a clear destruction of these values from the face of the earth. He says that a lighted cigarette caused the Baltimore fire with its loss of forty million dollars, and that the Triangle shirt waist factory fire, where 145 lives were lost, was caused by a cigarette. A fire in Augusta, Ga., costing five million dollars, was caused by leaving an electric iron with the current turned on.

All of this is very disheartening. The fiftieth anniversary of the great Chicago fire occurs on Oct. 9th, and ministers are asked, not to devote the whole day or sermon to it, but to call the attention of the people to the matter and urge the duty of fire prevention for the saving of property and life.

If every man and woman and child in the United States could give five dollars each to religious work next year, instead of burning it up, it would be for a great advance. If fifteen thousand lives can be saved next year, instead of burning them to death, as last year, it will be a course of philanthropy well worth pursuing.

THE SOURCE OF STRENGTH.

The strength of Presbyterianism is its loyalty to Jesus Christ, the divine and only Savior, who by his atoning death procured for us salvation, and to the Holy Scriptures, the Word of God, the only infallible rule of faith and practice. Standing firmly here one is not to be moved by any form of false doctrine, any assault of worldliness, any deceptive allurements of modern philosophy, any enticement of frivolous fad or foolish fancy, any besetment of long-robed heathenism, or any attraction in the way of false religion. He who is a true, intelligent and regenerate Presbyterian, is in conscious and abiding relationship with Jesus Christ, and trusts not his own strength, but the keeping power of his Lord, who is the same yesterday and today and forever.

A CALL FOR INTELLIGENT METHODS.

It is high time the Senate of the United States were amending its rule so that it may attend to the legitimate business for which its members are elected, and not be held up at the mercy of a bare handful of men who represent the criminal element of the land, and who are determined to prevent any beneficent legislation to which their petty minority is disinclined.

Here is this anti-beer bill which has been before the Senate for months, and which four-fifths of its members would vote for any minute if they had opportunity, held up by a corporal's guard who filibuster, and threaten to continue their filibuster, to prevent the passage of a measure which is for the enforcement of what is already a part of the Constitution of the United States. It is a most humiliating thing that the men of this legislative body do not lay aside the puerile form of proceedings which nullifies intelligence and defies patriotic duty, and leaves the country at the mercy of a few men who are working to protect bootleggers and neutralize the plain intent and purpose of constitutional law.

The sober and patriotic citizens of this nation want to have clean-cut laws passed to enforce prohibition, and put a stop to lawlessness and crime. They have gone through the long and hard routine prescribed for the amending of the Constitution, and have elected a Congress that, in both its houses, is overwhelming in favor of strict enforcement. The House has passed a proper law. The Senate would do so any day. Is this country to be governed by three filibustering Senators, or will the good men who are ready to do their duty rise in righteous impatience and sweep away the antediluvian rules that have kept them from acting like men.

There are millions of persons in our United States who are not yet members of any church. There is ample material to be worked upon, and worked for, by every church, engaging systematically in the business of gathering souls into Christ's kingdom.

There should be a steady and determined plan, worked ambitiously and enterprisingly, by every minister and every church, to bring souls to the confession of Christ and into a place in his church. Last year is said to have been the greatest in the evangelizing history of the churches in the United States. Next year should be still greater.

There is abundance of food in our country for all our necessities, notwithstanding the reduction by early frosts and midsummer drought, and with much to spare for others. We have supplies of the Bread of Life, in the Gospel, sufficient for all the world. Let us divide.

Many Synods meet in October. Instead of being a mere "fifth-wheel," the Synod is coming to be a meeting of real importance in unifying and emphasizing the work done throughout a whole state. In reality it has always been an important part of our Church life, and only those minimized it who did not understand or take hold of its work.

The steady stroke and power of constructive work is needed in order to build up the Church and advance the cause of Christ. It is one thing to fight error and oppose the various evils of the day, and this must be done. But the work of saving souls and giving religious instruction must never be neglected. It is one thing to fight the weeds, but unless good seed is planted and the crop cultivated, there will be no harvest.

There are more Bibles made and sold now than in any preceding age of the world. If we want these Bibles to do all the good possible, we must see that they are read and studied and taught and lived. Let every Christian read and study and teach the Bible so much that he will know how to be a living Bible.

There is much evil being done in the world, but let us not forget that there is immense activity for good on every hand, and by many persons, and in every form of effort and organization. Think of the great number of persons who are working to counteract evil, and to bless the world by their faithful and persistent and organized efforts.

The United Presbyterian Assembly has a "Committee on Enlarged Service of the Boards," which seems intended to do for that Church what the New Era Committee is supposed to do for ours. It meets with criticisms as our New Era has done. A contributor in the United Presbyterian says its name in a misnomer and its work untimely. He explains: "Untimely, because its recommendations, if adopted, would completely disarrange the institutions of the Church in the midst of the New World Five-Year period, and thereby endanger the receipts of the New World fund and the use of that already received. The committee's report says the time is peculiarly opportune. The fact is the time is peculiarly inopportune. The name 'Committee on Enlarged Service,' too, is a wrong designation, because its report recommends enlarged machinery, but does not warrant any assurance of enlarged service."

The St. Louis Presbytery lays it upon all its pastors and churches, as a duty for this winter, to add ten per cent to the membership of all the churches. This might be done with work and faith and prayer, if all will be at it, and at it all through the winter.

The presbyteries have been almost unanimous in taking action in favor of disarmament, and in praying for the success of the Conference of Nov. 11th. Very generally they ask pastors and churches to use Sabbath, Nov. 6th as a day of special prayer for God's blessings on the Conference.

Presbyteries very generally express concern over prohibition enforcement, and urge Congressmen and Senators to take speedy action to pass the anti-beer bill. Every day's delay is giving opportunity for the growth of lawlessness and presumption, and for all sorts of propaganda for the wrong.

President Harding asks every one to pray for two minutes on Nov. 11th, the day of the meeting of the Disarmament Conference, for the success of the meeting. Let every one heed the call, and pray not only on that day, but every day preceding it.

Christians are not to be discouraged, neither are they to be unduly elated, by anything that appears of surface or temporal conditions. Our source of strength and encouragement is in God and his promises and covenant. We look not at the things that are seen. Our help is in the Lord who made the heavens and the earth. And so, we will not fear even though the earth be removed.

There are a great many labor-saving devices in the work-day world, and they are used to good advantage. But there is no device that permits one to increase his store of knowledge without study, or to become holy without faith and prayer, or to do the Lord's spiritual work without consecration and effort. It used to be said that there is "no royal road to learning." It means that there is no way for a lazy and good-for-nothing person to be good and great.

Advocates of the organic union of churches are sometimes over-enthusiastic. They told us some time ago that the union of Methodist, Presbyterian and Congregationalist churches in Australia had succeeded. Now it is announced that it has temporarily failed, and that a step has been taken to federate them. A Council of Co-operation has been formed, consisting of thirty-six members, twelve from each denomination, and plans of work have been adopted. The avowed object of the organization is to promote the movement for union by encouraging inter-church relations and co-operation in all matters where common action may be practicable.

THY SORROWS AND JOYS.

BY MARGARET H. BARNETT.

All the trials, cares and losses,
Which throughout thy life befall,
Meet them fearlessly and bravely,
Infinite wisdom sends them all.
It can ne'er mistaken be,
Even though griefs it sends to thee.

Though across life's noon-tide brightness
Sorrows spread their gloomy pall,
Forward go, in faith and courage,
Infinite love hath sent them all.
There can no unkindness be,
In the griefs that come to thee.

Though thy joys, like bright flowers wither,
And thy sorrows still increase,
Never falter, never waver,
Rest thee still in perfect peace.
All that comes to thee shall prove,
Sent in wisdom, sent in love.
New Bloomfield, Pa.

GOD.

BY REV. JOHN Y. EWART, D.D.

I can not think without thinking of God.
I can not reason without taking God into account.
I can not study any department of human knowledge without finding God there, without finding traces of his knowledge, power, wisdom, love. God is the one all-comprehensive and all-pervasive fact in the universe.

I study a flower, a plant, a tree. I am impressed that a master workman designed it; gave it life, symmetry, beauty. Study the earth's surface; see its rich soil, its beautiful landscapes, its mighty rivers, its towering mountains, its quiet valleys, its lovely lakes—no human workman could have constructed these. No human builder could have erected a home for man so well adapted to his use, so abundantly furnished with everything necessary to his welfare and happiness. Study the world above us, the stars, the planets, and our wonder increases. We are amazed by the evidences of design, by the proofs that and that he is almighty, all-wise and all-loving.

God Is

And the more I think and consult the testimony of the Book, the more I am sure that God is a Person; that he thinks and reasons and therefore has intellect; that he feels, loves, hates and therefore has affections; that he chooses, determines, plans and therefore has a will of his own. God has, therefore, the elements of Personality, he is a Person.

Again, when I go to a home of sorrow and see a loved form lying cold and still in the embrace of death, see hearts saddened over the parting with the dear one, life-plans interrupted, life-hopes blasted, a home left desolate; and when I know that God is a God of Love, then I feel sure—it is an intuition born in my very soul, even though I had no other source of information—I feel very sure that there will be a resurrection into new life, there will be another sphere of existence in which this broken life will be completed, these half-realized hopes may be fulfilled, this home circle reunited. There is a future life, a heaven, an immortality for God's own. So I find God even in the home of sorrow, and in the hour of trial.

Furthermore, I find many involved problems in my own questions and meditations, much that I can not understand, mysteries my mind can not fathom. I find these mysteries in my own nature. Why was I made thus and so? And in my own history—why did that event come into my life, why this disappointment, why this burden? I can not explain the presence of sin and sorrow in this world. But these problems lead me back to God. I believe in him, in his wisdom, goodness and love. Therefore I trust where I can not see. I leave these questions with him. I believe the day will come when all mysteries will be resolved, all perplexing questions answered. There will then be light everywhere, for "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all" (I John 1:5).

Again, I study the history of the world. What a variety of lights and shades! What grandeur and what degradation! What nobility of character and what depravity in the men and women of whom we read! Here is a towering figure mighty in word and deed by whose life the world has been set forward and mankind blessed. But here, also, is a base wretch who has tried to drag the world backward. But through the good and the bad, through the lights and the shadows "one increasing purpose runs." I can see God in his body. I can discover the traces of his providential guidance at every step. He is at the helm. He doeth all things well.

And when I find in history the well-authenticated record of Jesus of Nazareth; when I read of his pure life, his most helpful ministry, his words of wisdom, his sympathy with the poor and downtrodden, and especially his self-sacrificing death in obedience to the will of his heavenly Father, I see still another proof that God is in history, I am convinced both of the divinity and humanity of Jesus.

And when I read the inspired record of God's repeated manifestations of himself to mankind, culminating in the incarnation, death and resurrection of the Son of God, it seems to me that a light from heaven shines within me and all along the path I want to tread. I can join the poet Wordsworth in his jubilant refrain:

"Hence in a season of calm weather,
Though inland far we be,
Our souls have sight of that immortal sea
Which brought us hither;
Can in a moment travel thither—
And see the children sport upon the shore,
And hear the mighty waters rolling evermore."

But, finally, I find God most of all in his Word. The longer I live the more precious does the Book of books become to me, for I find in its pages repeated and overwhelming proofs of everything I have been trying to say about God. His omnipotence, omniscience, holiness, justice and love find in this marvelous record repeated illustration, and the story of Jesus is to me the Magna Charta of mankind's spiritual liberty, and ought to be the most cherished volume among the literatures of men.

For here we find our perfect man. In him we find love linked with purity and power and both guided by wisdom, and all at the service of the neediest, sinfulest mortal. It is a wonderful story, the story of the cross. It should melt our hearts and move our wills to self-surrender, to gratitude, to praise forever.

"Come, gracious Spirit, heavenly Dove;
With light and comfort from above;
Be thou our Guardian, thou our Guide;
O'er every thought and step preside.
"The light of truth to us display.
And make us know and choose thy way:
Plant holy fear in every heart,
That we from God may ne'er depart."
Colorado Springs, Col.

NEW YORK LETTER.

BY REV. CLARENCE G. REYNOLDS, D.D.

The Administrative Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America suggests that Sabbath, Nov. 6th, be observed by the churches as widely as possible throughout the country as a day for special prayer, self-examination, and supplication for God's blessing upon the International Conference on Limitation of Armaments.

The work against violation of the prohibition laws goes steadily on. In a report of New York City's Health Department it was shown that the total deaths from alcoholism in the city have decreased since 1916 as follows: 687 in 1916; 560 in 1917; 252 in 1918; 176 in 1919; 98 in 1920. In New York City the number of commitments to the workhouse, for intoxication, fell from 4,926 in 1915 to 176 in 1920.

The American Bible Society is ready to assist the churches in celebrating Bible Sabbath, Nov. 27th, by sending a four-page exercise to be used at the church service or in the Sabbath school, entitled "The Only Way Out of the Dark," written by Charles A. McAlpine. Address the American Bible Society, Bible House, Astor Place, New York.

Many pastors have just returned from abroad. Among them was the pastor of the Greenwich Presbyterian Church, Rev. William H. Matthews, D.D., who spent his vacation in England. He preached five Sabbaths in and around London. One Sabbath afternoon he addressed over a thousand men, and there were over a thousand people at two evening services. We are glad that our American preachers are appreciated in England. Certainly English, Scotch and Irish preachers are appreciated in this country, especially in New York City.

Rev. Dr. David G. Burrell, "the old man eloquent," for so many years in the Marble Collegiate Church, preached, last Sabbath morning, on "The Red Trail." New features in connection with the Sabbath evening service in this church include a half-hour organ recital, with violin; also a special musical program in connection with the regular services, at which the choir gives a series of oratorio praise services. Selections from "Elijah" were sung last Sabbath. The speaker was Mr. Fred B. Smith, one of the best known and ablest laymen in America. The subject of the address was "Moral Robbery."

Rutgers Presbyterian Church, Rev. Dr. Daniel Russell, pastor, has introduced "The Happy Sabbath Evening" feature into the second service, which means much music and a fifteen-minute sermon. Rutgers and Fourth churches have thus far failed to effect a union, which is greatly desired by a large number of both congregations. The presbytery has not yet given permission.

Rev. Joseph G. Snyder, for ten years Stated Clerk of the Brooklyn-Nassau Presbytery, has offered his resignation, rather than sign a license permitting R. C. White, a candidate charged with having unorthodox beliefs, to preach. To affix his name to the license, Mr. Snyder holds, would be a violation of his own religious vows. Mr. White twice failed to pass his examinations, but succeeded on his third attempt last spring. Since that time the license has been upon the Stated Clerk's desk unsigned. "Mr. White's beliefs are not in accord with the teachings of our Church," said Mr. Snyder in explanation of his resignation. "They violate the fundamentals of our faith. The man does not hold to the teachings of Christ." It is stated that Mr. White passed the third examination when only thirty of the one hundred and fifty members of presbytery were present. Of the thirty, twenty-eight were known to be in favor of the candidate.

Rev. Dr. J. Ross Stevenson, president of Princeton Theological Seminary, and formerly pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, has declined the call to the presidency of Washington and Jefferson College, made vacant by the death of Rev. Dr. Samuel Charles Black. We rejoice at Dr. Stevenson's decision.

The Bible Teachers' Training School, Rev. Dr. W. W. White, president, will continue under the name of "The Bible Seminary." The school was started at Montclair, N. J. There are more students this year than ever before, nearly three hundred.

Commissioner Booth Tucker, of India, was welcomed by the Salvation Army of New York last Saturday evening. Commander Eva Booth presided.

THE PRESBYTERIAN ALLIANCE.

BY REV. S. J. FISHER, D.D.

The Eleventh Council of the Alliance of the Reformed Churches holding the Presbyterian System met at Pittsburgh, Pa., in the large auditorium of the First Church on the morning of Sept. 17th. Many of its members had become acquainted through the reception given at the William Penn Hotel the evening before. There were 270 delegates of a possible 350, many from America, but some from Russia, Africa and the Orient. They found the galleries of the church decorated with the flags of all the countries represented except Germany, for which two banners of the Red Cross were substituted. The president of the Alliance, Rev. Dr. William Park, of Belfast, presided, a man of impressive character, in his seventy-seventh year, and the fifty-first of his ministry. In his address he appealed to the delegates to support disarmament, expressed the gratitude of Great Britain for ex-President Wilson, for his self-sacrifice, and told of the high esteem in which President Harding is held. Emphasizing the duty to help the weak Reformed churches, he referred to the proposals of the Lambeth Anglican Conference, to be discussed later, and said: "Whether the administration by bishops has been more used to advance the kingdom of God than that by our Presbyterian democratic form is something we must think about. As I read history, it has not."

Then followed an address of welcome by Hon. E. V. Babcock, Mayor of Pittsburgh; the reading of a letter from President Harding, commending the Council, which letter was heard standing; an address of welcome by Rev. Dr. John McClurkin in behalf of the churches of the city, and a response by Sheriff Watson, of Scotland, in behalf of the foreign delegates.

In the afternoon an automobile excursion through the East End was provided for every delegate, returning in time for the great dinner and reception at the William Penn Hotel under the auspices of the Presbyterian Social Union. All receptions and daily luncheons were provided for the delegates at this hotel at the expense of the local committee. The interesting fact was noted in the handbook provided for the Council that this hotel occupies the site of the former Third Church, now removed to the East End, and in that church the Assembly of the New School Presbyterian Church met in 1869, and thence marched to the First Church, where the Old School Presbyterian Church was in session, and together these assemblies returned to the Third Church, a reunited Church, with hymns of praise.

Sabbath morning a great throng listened to a sermon of great fervor and power by Rev. John A. Hutton, D.D., of Glasgow, declaring that all true churches had the same great concern, that of saving men from their sins. He also said concerning the Reformation: "Our fathers took down the crucifix in the churches. I think, on the whole, they were justified on the one condition only if they had the spiritual fact of the crucifixion in their lives. But that figure of the crucified Christ must rise in the imagination wherever any group of people are gathered in a Christian church. It is not a church unless dominated by that silent figure." He also said the church should be a place of refuge from temptation, but with the majority religion was an after-thought.

In the afternoon the communion was administered by Rev. Dr. Park, with the pre-communion address by Rev. H. C. Swearingen, D.D., of St. Paul, emphasizing the fact: "The supreme disclosure of life is found in Jesus' death. The controlling idea of that death is love." The post-communion address was made by Prof. William Fulton, of Aberdeen. It was noted that each meditation was closed with: "Glory be to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost."

In the evening Rev. Norman McLean, D.D., of Edinburgh, spoke on "Thy God is King," when he asserted there could be no peace in the world until the world adopts the ethical standard, viz.: that God is King, and men should love one another.

Monday morning, after reports on Sabbath Schools and Young People by Rev. R. J. Drummond, D.D., of the Eastern (or Foreign) Section, and by Rev. Robert Hunter, D.D., for the Western Section, each heard with much interest, a paper was read by Prof. James H. Snowden, D.D., on "The Written Word," admirable in style and thought, and discussing the power of words. It did not deal with the problem of inspiration, but the transfer of the truth to the hearts of men. It was followed by an equally forcible paper by Rev. John A. Hutton, D.D., on "The Living Word," and displaying Christ as the Incarnate Word. A very helpful paper was read by Prof. Edward Naville, of Switzerland, on "Exploration in Bible Lands," showing that recent explorations confirm the statements of the Holy Scriptures.

In the afternoon a characteristically energetic and clearly expressed paper was read by Rev. D. J. Burrell, D.D., on "The Unity of the Church," remarking that it was the high churchmen and heretics who were crying the loudest for church unity. He questioned the value of any but a spiritual unity. He was followed by Prof. P. Carnegie Simpson, of Cambridge, England, with a paper on "The Conception of the Ministry in Relation to the Problems Raised by the Lambeth and Other Conferences." He spoke in opposition to the necessity of Episcopal reordination. "It is an act which can not claim to be counter-signed by any act of the Holy Spirit of God in Christendom. It can not be too plainly said that the first and indispensable step in reunion is recognition of our ordination." The following discussion reiterated his principles, though Rev. Matthew B. Lang, of Scotland, a brother of the Archbishop of York, proposed the Council spend an hour in silence, following the example of the Anglican bishops at Lambeth when perplexed over this problem. No action was taken upon his proposal, and later a committee of six foreign delegates and six from America was appointed to voice the sentiment of the Alliance. Just here the pith of that committee's report may be summarized. Expressing a fraternal interest in every call to closer fellowship, the report observed that, as this body was not legislative, the responsibility of an authoritative answer rested with the churches here represented, but it recorded its opinion that any such conference must be as between churches resting on equal terms, and must be unrestricted as to all questions of ecclesiastical order. There will be substantial progress only when the conferring churches are ready to recognize one another's church standing, and to accompany words of unity by acts of fellowship, in the Lord's table, and elsewhere. The whole matter was commended to the prayers and interest of believing people that it may be made manifest that the Church is one in Christ Jesus.

Monday evening was devoted to a paper by Rev. William Crowe, D.D., of St. Louis, on "Calvinism and the Spirit of the Age," in which he said: "If the world had the Puritan theology it would be a happy world now. For Calvinism teaches a man to face his Creator." He was followed by Prof. W. H. Curtis, of Edinburgh, who spoke on "Christianity a Force in National Life and International Relations."

Tuesday morning brought reports by Prof. Curtis, of the Committee on Work on the European Continent for the Eastern Section, and by Prof. James I. Good, D.D., for the Western Section. Then ten-minute speeches were made by nine representatives of the continental churches. Among the reports, the wonderful advance of the Church in Bohemia shone conspicuous for its hope, as the Czecho-Slovak Church claims 850,000 members, all former Romanists, repudiating the authority of the Pope, permitting the priests to marry, and the worship in the Bohemian language instead of Latin. The strong churches of the Alliance must aid the weak churches of our faith on the Continent. Then followed a paper by Rev. C. E. McCarty, D.D., of Philadelphia, on "The Place of Women in the Church," opposing their ordination as ministers and elders, but granting their election as deacons. In the discussion, some opposed his views. Secretary A. J. Brown, of the Foreign Board, asserted that there had been six times more trouble caused by men in the mission field than by women. Several from abroad favored women preachers.

In the evening addresses were made by Rev. Dr. R. J. Drummond, of Edinburgh, on "The Principles of Christ as Applied to Industrial and Social Problems." His line of thought is familiar to many earnest and thoughtful Christians at the present moment. "When you look into the situation," he said, "you find, on the one hand, those who are eager to destroy the whole system of capitalism, and there are those who still cling to the old system and say it is best. As the Savior bridged the racial gulf between Jew and Gentile, Christians should try to bridge the gulf between capital and labor." Mr. Robert P. Wilder delivered an address on "The Church and International Humanitarianism." It was an interesting review of the terrible conditions in Europe and India, and the call to the Church.

On Wednesday the morning session was devoted to the internal organization and future of the Alliance. In the afternoon, Rev. Norman McLean, D.D., spoke on "Temperance in the Old World," and said: "In the old country the problem is a social one. The people have flocked to the cities. In Glasgow 130,000 families live in a one-room house; half a million people live in a one-room and kitchen house. When the Scotsman or Englishman comes home from his toil to his one room with wife and family, and often a lodger, life is unendurable, but there are public houses beckoning to him on every hand." Still Dr. McLean says: "We have great reasons to be encouraged." He was followed by Hon. W. J. Bryan on "World-Wide Prohibition" in an address that was heard with profound interest and pleasure by more than twenty-five hundred auditors, the auditorium and the large chapel behind the pulpit, with its huge opened doors, making a great audience hall. His address lasted one hour and thirty-five minutes, though the rule for each address was twenty minutes, and prolixity checked by the stroke of the bell. But the exceptional was recognized and rightly. Rev. Dr. Park expressed his own opinion and that of his colleagues that this one address repaid them for their long journey. Mr. Bryan gently scored the ignorant arguments of some New York newspapers by saying: "If you read them you would think prohibition was suggested one night and put into effect before morning" (instead of being discussed and fought over for fifty years). "Don't let these New York newspapers deceive you. These newspapers think unless a reform does not start in New York it does not amount to anything, and no reform ever does start in New York." "Our worst 'leak' just now is the Bahama Islands. Do you think Great Britain is going to continue a silent partner in smuggling in $10,000,000 worth of liquor—that she would lend her flag to this? No. I am proposing that our Congress should withdraw American citizenship from those who use the British or any other flag to protect violation of this American law."

In the evening the subject of "Christian Education" was considered, when Rev. H. M. Robinson, D.D., presented the report of the Committee on Education, followed by a paper by Rev. T. C. Jones, of the Welsh Church, on "Christian Education in the Home and Sabbath School." Then President W. O. Thompson, of Columbus, O., spoke on "Christian Education in Colleges and Schools." His experience is wide, and information in this line unusual. He thought the Presbyterian and Reformed churches have not quite kept pace with their relative interest in the cause of higher Christian education, or in the production of teachable books and a literature, suited to arouse interest in Biblical research and religious education.

Thursday morning, through a paper on Home Missions, by Rev. John Hall, of Edinburgh, "the present and prospective dearth of ministers," as expressed by the Church of England, came up. Dr. Hall said the shortage of men practically dominates the home mission situation at the present moment. "The Presbyterian Church has flourished by the preaching of the Word handled, for the most part, by educated men, and to abandon this is, in the long run, to court disaster. But this stringency in the supply of candidates for the ministry is forcing the Church to look more closely to its immense reserve of strength in lay workers, men and women." "This, however, on one condition, that the Church itself undertakes the task of training." Then followed an address on Home Missions in Canada, by Dr. W. H. Sedgwick, and the report on Evangelism in the United States of America, by Mr. Huston, of Coatesville, Pa. Dr. Henry Montgomery, of Belfast, spoke on "Home Missions in the British Isles," and, referring to Ireland, said the Roman Catholic priests in Ireland would not permit their people to read the Bible: At this session Rev. Dr. John D. McNaugher, president of the Pittsburgh Theological Seminary of the United Presbyterian Church, was elected President of the Alliance, succeeding Rev. Dr. William Parks, an honor justly deserved by one who has not only been tireless in his service to the Alliance and foremost in the preparations for this Council, but is, by character, scholarship and evangelical principles, well fitted for this task. A large sympathy, a true liberality, a sure love for Christ and a true love of the brethren makes this election admirable. Rev. J. R. Fleming, D.D., of Edinburgh, was elected Foreign Secretary, and Rev. H. B. Master, D.D., of Philadelphia, American Secretary, and Cardiff, Wales, was chosen for the twelfth Council in 1925.

The afternoon was devoted to greetings from other churches. Rev. Charles H. Brent, D.D., of Buffalo, Protestant Episcopal bishop of the Western Diocese of New York, commenting on the Lambeth proposals of the Anglican Church, said the Lambeth message is an humble appeal, an appeal for a conference. "It is a starting point. Society today is without a united voice on moral principles. The Church has no united voice as to what constitutes marriage, or on the industrial question, or on education and religious instruction." Then addresses were made by President McCrory, of Biddle University, Charlotte, N. C., and Drs. Shaw and Lee, on "The Negro Problem." These three speakers made a very happy impression as they discussed the interests and progress of their race. They were followed by a vigorous attack on the Ku-Klux-Klan, by Nolan R. Best, who characterized it as a traitor against God, and a defier of God's will among men. "What we want in this country," he said, "is Christian supremacy, and not the supremacy of any one class or race." This criticism was indorsed by Rev. I. S. McElroy, of Columbus, Ga., who charged it with lawlessness. Rev. John McDowell, D.D., spoke on "Home Missions in Their Evangelistic and Sociological Aspects."

In the evening, when Rev. Dr. Lowe, of Belfast, presided, he said that Francis Makemie, the Ulster man, organized the first presbytery formed on American soil. Rev. Oliver Russell, of Scotland, spoke on "The Evangelical Program," and Rev. Charles E. Schaeffer, D.D., of Philadelphia, on "Our Churches and the Immigrant," saying the immigrant has been a great contribution to our American life.

Friday brought out the question of World Evangelism. The addresses of Rev. S. M. Zwemer, D.D., and Rev. Dr. C. R. Watson, of Cairo University, were of striking import and information. Missionaries from Africa, China, Korea, Formosa, Cawnpore, Persia, Siam and Brazil stirred the minds and hearts of great audiences. Here it may be said that it was remarked that at no previous Council has the attendance on the meetings been so large and appreciative.

On Saturday an address was made by Rev. Dr. W. C. Covert, of Chicago, on "The Christian Sabbath," and in the afternoon an automobile excursion, forty miles in length, was given the delegates, traversing the residential and industrial sections, the parks and suburbs, with glimpses of rivers and the rural environment.

Sabbath evening closed the exercises, when a telegram of "Hearty greetings" was received from the Swiss Evangelical Society, celebrating their fiftieth anniversary. The retiring President, Dr. Park, made an eloquent address, and Dr. McNaugher, in the name of the Council, expressed a wish for a safe voyage for the departing delegates to their desired haven and bade them God speed. After varied votes of thanks to the First and other churches, to Mr. John A. Bell, the organist, who skillfully arranged the musical program, to citizens and the public press, the closing address was made by Prof. J. Ritchie Smith, of Princeton, on "The Church and the Future." He doubted the Church would ever be united into the particular faith of a Calvin, a Luther, or a Wesley. "All varieties of Christian faith can not be forced into a single system. The kingdom is far larger than the Church, as the spirit is far larger than the body. It is the Holy Catholic Church divided in creed, but one in Christ." Rev. J. I. Good, D.D., offered the closing prayer.

The Handbook published by the local committee, and edited by your correspondent, proved very useful and interesting to the delegates and others, and noted the seventh Conference of the International Union of Women's Foreign Missionary Societies of the Presbyterian and Reformed Churches, held Sept. 22d in the Grace Reformed Church, Bellefield, which was of great interest.

COLUMBUS LETTER.

BY REV. WILLIAM ANDREW FERRINS, D.D.

Dr. Robert F. Horton, in his masterly essay on "Life," with striking illustration and attractive phraseology, presses the import of life in the following manner: "The fourth step in life is to gain the sense of humanity, to believe in its solidarity, and to hold oneself a debtor to the whole world. That life has become truly good and worthy of immortality, which throbs with the life of the whole. It could be wished that over every human grave might be written the epitaph which marks John Howard's resting-place in Russia: 'Reader, whosoever thou art, know that thou standest by the grave of a friend.'" The American Red Cross is now holding its National Convention in our city. Among the important features of the work is the fact that 37,787 nurses are now on the rolls of the society; service costing $10,000,000 a year is being provided for disabled ex-service men, and the budget for the coming year is $19,361,657.-67. Among those attending the convention are Dr. Livingston Farrand, the president of the society; Theodore Roosevelt, Jr., General John J. Pershing, Mrs. August Belmont, and Mrs. W. K. Draper. President Harding may also attend.

The Welsh Presbyterian Church is to be dedicated about the first of December. A committee is now in communication with Lloyd George, the famous Welshman, who is expected to attend the Disarmament Conference, asking him to deliver the dedicatory address. This is to be one of the finest church buildings in the State. The pastor, Rev. E. E. Jones, is to be congratulated.

Nelson Memorial Church, Rev. W. M. Jennings, D.D., pastor, has been beautifully decorated and inverted lights have been installed. A splendid spirit is manifested by his people, and the immediate future will hold for pastor and people a deserved success.

The Synod's Committee on Men's Work held its annual meeting here. Dr. W. L. Whallon, the chairman, presided over the meeting, and outlined aggressive schemes, the adoption of which will mean a new era for the brotherhoods and men's Bible classes of our Church. Dr. W. F. Weir, the general secretary, was the guest of the meeting.

The Central Church, Rev. J. T. Britan, D.D., the pastor, has undergone extensive repairs. The church has also been refrescoed and inverted lights have been introduced. This is the most churchly auditorium in the city. Dr. Britan has started the evening services and, though a distinctively down-town church, the attendance is large.

The First Church, Rev. B. F. Brundage, D.D., pastor, is successfully grappling with its long-standing debt. Since the coming of the present pastor one thousand dollars each month has been paid, so about $6,000 has been realized. This debt will soon be paid off, and the church then hopes to carry out a great program for the community.

The Church Federation of this city is to have a "retreat" at Westerville for the ministers of the Protestant churches. Among the speakers is Rev. A. W. Blackwood, D.D., the pastor of the Indianola Presbyterian Church.

There will be a College of Wooster Alumni banquet in the Chittenden Hotel on Monday evening. President Wishart is the guest. A new enthusiasm and a large service for the college will be instituted. Rev. Eugene W. Pocock, the assistant pastor of the Board Street Church, is in charge of this ev. nt.

ST. LOUIS AND VICINITY.

Dr. J. M. Patterson, Southwestern Secretary of the Foreign Mission Board, announces that he has completed his tour of missions in Africa, and expects to sail for home from Liverpool on Oct. 11th.

Rally Day services were held by the children, at the North Church, Dr. James Hardin Smith, pastor, on Sabbath, Sept. 18th, with a program for children and adults. Most of the Presbyterian churches had Rally Day on Sept. 25th.

The Missouri State Meeting of Congregationalists, held at the Fountain Park Church here last week, brought together an enthusiastic body, representing sixty-four churches. It was voted to make the pledges $80,000 for state work in the coming year, exactly twice what was given last year. Rev. Charles F. Aked, D.D., preached a sermon urging disarmament on the opening evening. He was later elected state moderator, and his church, the First Congregational in Kansas City, was chosen for the place of meeting in 1922.

Among Presbyterian ministers speaking in shop meetings in the last week were Rev. Howard Billman, Rev. W. A. Clemmer, Rev. W. H. Kendall and Rev. Jerre Johnson. The Church Federation estimates that in these noon meetings in shops and factories, in the last year, 100,000 persons have been reached.

Rev. Charles L. Overstreet, D.D. was received from the Presbytery of El Paso, Texas, last week, by the St. Louis Presbytery. He has recently transferred his offices to this city from Texas, as secretary of the Southwest District of the New Era.

Dr. John Stewart Conning will be invited to address the St. Louis Presbytery, on "Jewish Evangelization," at the presbytery's November meeting, and it is hoped that an interdenominational mission for the Jews may be established here. Rev. George W. King says that there are 60,000 Jews resident in this city.

Following a report on evangelism, presented by Rev. F. K. Wettstone, the balance of indebtedness, about $500, was wiped out by subscriptions on the floor, from churches and individuals. Mr. Wettstone indicated the encouraging progress along evangelistic lines in the church generally, and said that the Missouri Synod has passed its goal of 50,000, and numbers now 53,000 members in its constituent presbyteries. The Sabbath-school enrollment was increased by 10,000 last year in the Synod.

In connection with the Home Missions report, Rev. R. Calvin Dobson, D.D., the new Church Extension secretary, was presented to the presbytery. Dr. S. A. Soile urged the establishment of schools of missions in the churches, citing the general school of missions just completed at the West Church. Following the report on education, by Dr. Skilling, the presbytery voted to hold a conference, Monday morning of this week, with representatives of the campaigns of Westminster and Missouri Valley Colleges. The work of the daily vacation Bible schools were commended. There were 2,319 children enrolled, at a total cost of $2,764 for the season, or about $1.15 per pupil.

St. Louis Presbytery has approved action taken by the Ministerial Alliance and Church Federation, as a goal for the coming winter: Workers trained for personal evangelism under pastoral leadership; the practice of family worship established in every church home; the habit of daily devotional Bible reading encouraged among individuals; an instruction or catechetical class for prospective members, younger and older; one or more intensive efforts for personal decisions, through special meetings or other methods; a prayer-wrought purpose to reach an average addition in church membership of not less than 10 per cent; the choice of some form of Christian service as a lifework by at least one member of each congregation; the adoption of the practice of Christian stewardship by a proportion of the membership of the church; an Easter ingathering as the climax of the year's campaign; an after-Easter conservation effort for the spiritual grounding of new recruits to the church.

Paul was released from Spring Hill. In view of the successful evangelistic campaign last winter the same committee was continued, and instructed to make plans for another campaign, to hold meetings in every church, the work to be done by the local pastors through an exchange of pulpits. The overtures were both answered in the negative. Rev. Albert I. Good, of West Africa, addressed the popular meeting.—R. F. Smith, S. C.

HOME CIRCLE

JANE MCGREW.

BY GEORGE B. CHILD.

Out here on Common Avenue
Lives little Mrs. Jane McGrew.
I hear you say: "That's nothing rare.
You see McGrews 'most everywhere."
Yes, sir, of course, it's very true
Our little Mrs. Jane McGrew
Is unknown in the Hall of Fame;
The critics there ne'er heard her name.
She does not have a limousine,
No motor-driven wash machine.
But watch her spritely, buoyant stride.
She does not envy those who ride.
And if you'd see a pretty sight,
Clothes on the line, 'most lily white,
Next Monday morning steal a view
Over the fence of Jane McGrew.
"Why out on Common Avenue
Do we so love Jennie McGrew?
Why, sir, no matter what the ills—Mumps, measles, rash, or that which kills—
She's always there, devoid of fear,
To minister, to help and cheer.
There's nothing that she will not do
For those in trouble, Jane McGrew."
Often somehow it seems to me
At Sunday morning church I see
A sort of halo o'er the pew
Of little Mrs. Jane McGrew.
Not as McGrew she's always known.
She might be Smith or Brown or Stone.
You've got her on your avenue,
A Smith or Brown or Jane McGrew.

A FRIDAY WITH NO FISH.

BY MARJORIE PECK WHEELER.

Let's go and fish in Old Sam's pool," said Harold to his brother Ted, one summer afternoon. "He doesn't work his sawmill on Friday. Come on—I dare you!"

"I will, if you will," said Ted. A thrill ran down his spine at the thought of Old Sam, who seemed to the boys of the village a kind of cross giant.

They got their poles and started off, calling to mother that they were going "up toward the reservoir." Old Sam's pool lay in the woods through which the reservoir road ran.

"Let's go down and have a look at the mill before we start fishing," suggested
Ted. "Old Sam won't be there today."

In a few minutes Harold discovered a flat car on a track. The track had been laid on a slight elevation and ran from the mill quite a distance into the woods.
The car was used to bring logs from the woods to the mill.

"It looks like one of those hand-cars on the railroad," said Harold. "Think we can run it?"

After working at the handle for some time the boys at last managed to start the car. An iron stake planted in the ground at the end of the track brought them to a stop with a jerk.

Up and down the track they went, going faster each time as they grew more used to the motion of the handle. They did not notice that every time the car bumped against the iron stake it pushed the stake forward a little.

"One more ride and then we'll fish!"
shouted Harold, and away they went, faster, than ever. Bump! went the car against the iron stake, pushing it half over. With a sickening jolt the front wheels of the car left the track and came thudding down into the soft leafy soil of the woods! Ted flew in one direction, into a heap of leaves; Harold in another, landing among some scratchy bushes.

"Now we have done it!" he cried as he crawled out of the bushes. "Old Sam will skin us alive! He always finds out who does things. Come on Ted, we've got to fix it."

Both boys were already tired from working in the hand-car. When they first tried to push the heavy thing back on to the track they thought they never could do it. In the mill they found a stout rope which they tied to the rear end of the car. Ted got up on the track and pulled with all his might while Harold, with a pole thrust under the front wheels, pushed and pushed. But the car would not move.
They sat down and groaned. Their beautiful afternoon was almost at an end.

"We've got to do this, Ted," said Harold grimly. "Come on, we're going to do it this time!"

The boys threw all their strength and all their will into the work and at last they saw the back wheels of the car begin to slip along the track. With one more push and pull the front wheels were on the track. But they still had the task of taking the car back to the mill where they had found it. With aching backs and arms they bent over the handle and worked like two machines, until the car was at the mill-end of the track.

"I bet we'll never touch that again," said Harold with a rueful look at the car as he picked up his fishing pole.

"I guess you won't." There before them stood Old Sam, looking very grim in the dusk of the woods.

"I've been watching you for some time," the old man went on. "I'll say one thing for you—you're the only boys I ever saw who put something back where it belonged after they'd been meddling with it. Been fishing in my pool?" he snapped, with a glance at their poles.

"N-no, sir," faltered the frightened boys.
This was the truth. They had not had time to lower a single worm into the famous pool.

Better try your luck there some day," said Old Sam. "There are some big trout in that pool." There was a friendly twinkle in his eyes as he watched the surprised boys.

"W-why," stammered Harold, "I thought you didn't want boys to fish in your pool!"

"I don't care if you fish in my pool. But I do care if you meddle with my mill. The boys who came around here have always meddled and broken things, and sneaked off without trying to make it right. "Come and try your luck some day," he added kindly. "And now you'd better put for home. Your ma will think you're drowned."

Through the warm summer dark the boys trudged toward home. They felt stiff and lame in every muscle, and very, very hungry. Soon they heard a horse and carriage approaching. In the light of a swinging lantern they recognized old brown Jenny, their father's horse.

"Hello, dad!" they shouted.

"Well, you young rascals!" exclaimed father. "Mother was sure you must be drowned in the reservoir or had broken your legs. So she sent me out as a search party. Climb in!"

This the boys were glad to do, but they could not keep back a few groans as they climbered over the wheel.

"What's the matter?" asked father.

"Lame," said both boys briefly.

"Well," said father, "you must have caught some pretty big fish to make you as lame as that. How many did you get for Friday night supper?"

"None," the boys giggled.

Nobody spoke for a moment. Then Harold spoke out: "Say dad, we met Old Sam in the woods and he said we might try our luck in his pool some time! The fellows all say he's so awfully cross. We didn't find him so. Won't the fellows be surprised when we come home with some of those big trout?"

"Fine!" said father thoughtfully. He knew there must be more of a story than he had heard. But he had been a boy once, so he asked no more questions.—

SOME WISE MINDS.

Mind your eyes; don't let them see Things you know ought not to be.

Mind your tongue; don't let it say
Unkind, cruel words today.

Mind your ears; don't let them hear
Gossip. Of it stand in fear.

Mind your hands; don't let them do
What may bring deep grief to you.

Mind your feet; don't let them go
Where your conscience tells you, No!

NO USE.

"What are you doing, dear?" asked the little girl's mother as she paused to look at some very strange marks the child was making on a piece of paper.

"I'm writing a letter to Lillie Smith," was the answer.

"But, my dear," laughed the mother,
"you don't know how to write."

"Oh, that doesn't matter, mother! Lillie doesn't know how to read."

TRUST IN GOD.

"Mother," said a little girl, "what did
David mean when he said, 'Preserve me,
O God, for in thee do I put my trust?'"

"Do you remember," said her mother,
"the little girl we saw walking with her father in the woods?"

"Oh, yes, mother; wasn't she beautiful?"

"She was a gentle, loving little thing, and her father was very kind to her. Do you remember what she said when they came to the narrow bridge over the brook?"

"I don't like to think about that bridge, mother; it makes me giddy. Don't you think it is very dangerous, just those two loose planks laid across, and no railing?
If she had stepped a little on either side she would have fallen into the water."

"Do you remember what she said?"
asked the mother.

"Yes, mamma she stopped a minute, as if afraid and then asked her father to take hold of her hand. And her father took a tight hold of her hand as if she were very precious to him."

"Well, my child," said the mother, "I think David felt just like that little girl when he wrote those words you asked me about."

"Was David going over a bridge, mother?"

"Not such a bridge as the one we saw in the woods; but he had come to some difficult place in his life—there was some trouble before him that made him feel afraid, and he looked up to God, just as that little girl looked up to her father, and said, 'Preserve me, O God, for in thee do I put my trust.' It is just as if he had said, 'Please take care of me, my kind, heavenly Father; I do not feel afraid when thou art with me, and taking hold of my hand."—Ex.

CHARITY THINKETH NO EVIL.

Oh, be not the first to discover
A flaw in the fame of a friend,
A fault in the faith of a brother,
Whose heart may be true to the end;
A hint or a nod may awaken
Suspicion most false and undue,
And thus our belief may be shaken
In those who are honest and true.

We none of us know one another,
And oft into error we fall,
Then let us speak well of our brother;
Or not speak of him at all.
And often the light smile of gladness
Is worn by the friends that we meet
To cover a soul full of sadness,
Too proud to acknowledge defeat.

Leave base minds to harbor suspicion
And low ones to trace our defects;
Let ours be the noble ambition.
For base is the mind that suspects,
For often the friends we hold dearest
Their noblest emotion conceal,
For bosoms the purest, sincerest,
Have thoughts they can never reveal.

ELLEN MAY'S PRAYER.

Ellen May was a salesman's wife. Her last name was Smith; but that doesn't matter really, for every one called her Ellen May instead of Mrs. Smith.

Ellen May's husband was a tall thin, worried looking man. He was trying to make good in a difficult territory, and he wasn't at home very often. "My dear," he said to Ellen May once, as he hurried stationward after a flying visit, "it seems as if I never see you any more. It seems as if I'm always going away from you." And his worried mouth twitched, and he winked his eyes as if he wanted to keep back the—well, tears.

Ellen May was a blond, fluffy little thing with a sunny smile and, at times, a childish serious manner. "You mustn't look at it that way," said Ellen May, touching his coat sleeve with her slender little hand. "Sometimes when you're as far away from me as—Los Angeles—I feel as if you're near—near!"

"When is that?" questioned Ellen May's husband.

"When I say my prayers," answered Ellen May softly.

"Darling," breathed Ellen May's husband.

They were almost in sight of the station before Ellen May spoke again, and said, "Let's say our prayers, each of us, at exactly nine thirty every night, so we'll know really that we're together."

That night when she knelt down at nine thirty to say her prayers, she wasn't alone. For some hundred miles away in a dingy hotel bedroom her husband knelt and reverently asked God to keep her safe.

Every night they knelt down at the same time—Ellen May and her husband—although the hundred miles that stretched between them lengthened out to a thousand and then two thousand. Every night at nine thirty they were together, really together. And then one day, when Ellen May's husband was on his return trip, the great flood came. And report had it that railroad trains were washed away. There were other wives in Ellen May's town who had salesman husbands on the road; and when the news of the flood came flashing across the wires, there were many drawn faces and tearful eyes and tortured hearts. Perhaps a score of women gathered at the railroad station to send telegrams and watch the trains. Ellen May was there with a white little face and the sunny smile quite gone from her lips.

"My husband"—a frail, middle-aged woman touched Ellen May on the arm—"is on a train that was just in the flood district. Do you 'spose"—

Ellen May looked at her pitifully. "So was mine," said Ellen May. Her lips quivered.

The day wore on. Morning lengthened into afternoon, and afternoon crept into dusk, and dusk turned of a sudden into night. And still the women waited for word there at the station. Trains had stopped coming through, and many of the wires were down. Somewhere a clock struck nine, and the women sobbed pitifully as they huddled together in a corner. The oldest of them looked almost broken as she sat there; even the youth of Ellen May had been crushed from her soul. The moments dragged on, and from somewhere the same clock chimed a half hour. And then, all at once, with an inarticulate little cry, Ellen May dropped to her knees. In after years she never tells what made her pray, whether it was impulse or divine guidance or just habit. But she did pray.

"O God," said Ellen May, "please—he's out there—in danger. Keep him safe if," she faltered, "if it be thy will; and let him know that I'm with him, with him"—Her voice trailed into nothingness.

Suddenly the other women were on their knees besides Ellen May. One of them raised a quivering voice: "Father," said the voice, "we'll have been married forty years come June. This was his last trip. Bring him safe home to me."

"If it be thy will," finished a younger voice that shook.

And the women knelt there, each one silent saying her own prayer to her own God—a prayer for her man in danger and distress.

The telegraph operator found them so when he came in fifteen minutes later, telegraph blank in hand. He cleared his throat several times before he spoke. "The messages," he said softly, are beginning to come through. No trains have been swept away, after all, I guess." Then he stopped talking, for Ellen May had quietly fainted.

And that is why in Ellen May's little town every woman with a husband on the road kneels down at half after nine and says a little prayer to God—a prayer for a man who is far away and may be going into danger.—Margaret E. Songster.

A POUND PARTY.

"I didn't know it would be so much fun," laughed Tommy as he looked up at the high school boy by whose side he was proudly walking.

"Almost like a Hallowe'en frolic," replied the big boy, who appeared to have been having a pretty good time himself.

These two had just left a group of school girls and boys who had been "pounding" an old couple who lived on the outskirts of the town.

How could pounding an old man and woman be fun? It was not the sort of pounding you have in mind.

The school pupils of the Mooresville Junior American Red Cross had discovered a man and his wife living in great poverty and had decided that each Junior should bring to school a pound of something to eat or to wear, and when all of the "pounds" were assembled that they should deliver them to the needy couple.

The high school Juniors were given charge of the work and supervised the collection of the food and clothing in the grade schools. Then came the afternoon when they surprised the old people with their great pile of gifts. Tommy and the high school boy had been members of the committee that brought happiness into the little cottage.

Tommy said it had been great fun and the high school boy agreed with him.

THE GRANDPA WHO THREW PILLOWS.

"Surely an innocent amusement," you will say, but pillows in Korea are solid wooden logs, of four inches in diameter.

Nearly all the men in the village were related to the old man. When they became Christians, they gave up liquor. They thought it a sinful and hurtful waste and did not see how they could conscientiously make beer for the old man.

But grandpa wanted beer, and this Jesus doctrine, over which the village had gone mad came between him and his desires.

So, when the villagers met for worship, grandpa came in quietly and, picking up a pillow, hurled it at some one's low bowed head.

But one thing surprised and bothered him; no one resented his new recreation.

One day he waited a minute and heard his name mentioned in prayer. Were they praying for death and destruction for him? He listened; no, it was penitence and faith and peace of mind, and eternal blessing they sought.

That was too much for grandpa; he went out without quenching his thirst for revenge.

The next time grandpa came in they were praying for him again, and he sat down among them, then bowed his head to the floor.

When the writer visited the group for the senior missionary, he heard an old man, out in the yard, earnestly urging a crony to hasten and make his peace with God, for the time was short.

Impressed by his earnest plea, the writer asked who he was. They replied, "The old man who used to throw pillows."

THE MIDNIGHT CALL.

I am lonely tonight, dear boy,
Waiting, and thinking of thee.
The step and call I hear
Is the mocking-bird, out in a tree.

Hark! The mid-night train rolls by
That sped you away at country's plea.
And the step and call tonight
Is the mocking-bird, out in the tree.

The mocking-bird knew you flew and he
Still is keeping tryst with me,
For the song and call I hear
Is the mocking-bird, out in the tree.

Oh, sad and lonely heart, be still!
I'm not alone, God cares for me.
But the song and call tonight
Is the mocking-bird, out in the tree.

PAUL WRITES TO THE CORINTHIANS AT CORINTH.

(I Cor. 1:10, 11; ch. 13.)

Ch. 1:10. Now I beseech you, brethren, by the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, that ye all speak the same thing, and that there be no divisions among you; but that ye be perfectly joined together in the same mind and in the same judgment.
11. For it hath been declared unto me of you, my brethren, by them which are of the house of Chloe, that there are contentions among you.

Ch. 13:1. Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal.

2. And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing.

3. And though I bestow all my goods to feed the poor, and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing.

4. Charity suffereth long, and is kind; charity envieth not; charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up.

5. Doth not behave itself unseemly, seeketh not her own, is not easily provoked, thinketh not evil;

6. Rejoiceth not in iniquity, but rejoiceth in the truth;

7. Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things.

8. Charity never faileth: but whether there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away.

9. For we know in part, and we prophesy in part.

10. But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away.

11. When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things.

12. For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then I shall know even as I am known.

13. And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity.

Golden Text: "And now abideth faith, hope, charity," these three; but the greatest of these is charity."

Catechism—Q. 43. What is the preface to the Ten Commandments? A. The preface to the Ten Commandments is in these words, I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage.

INTRODUCTORY.

Having established the church in Corinth, bringing the people to God's divine grace out from heathenism into Christian faith and life, Paul was deeply concerned in coming days as to their continuance and progress in spiritual life. There were some sorrowful troubles among the people of the Corinthian Church. There were some who failed in holding to the truth in its purity, and souls who failed to live the pure life in fidelity to Christ. It was to be expected that there would be some failures, but in each case it was a great grief to Paul, as every such case in the Church today is a great grief to the true pastor. Paul wrote the letters to the Church of Corinth out of a loving and sorrowing heart, and they are great books for every pastor, and every real Christian, to study today. Paul realized that what every Christian needs, and what all the members of a church needs is a real love for one another, for sinners and for God. If there is this sort of love abounding in the heart, one will live a good and happy Christian life, and will be able to honor God and be a blessing in the Church. There had been some divisions among professed Christians in Corinth, and Paul writes to urge that there should be unity and love among them. Let us take these lessons to heart.

EXPOSITORY.

1: 10, 11. Paul's letter was not merely a friendly and loving message, but it was inspired from on high, and was in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. We are to remember this as we read the Bible. It is the Word of God. It is profitable for doctrine, and for reproof and correction, and for instruction in righteousness. Contentions among Christians are very reprehensible and dangerous. Church members should be one in the work of Jesus Christ. They should speak the same things. That is, they should all accept the great truths of the Gospel in the same way and there should be no differences of opinion as to the way of salvation. And if they are agreed as to this matter of infinite importance, they should be united as to all minor points and should be at perfect peace among themselves.

13: 1. Here is a most beautiful and impressive discourse on the subject of charity, or Christian love, which he says is absolutely essential in all Christian life. Impressive power of speech seemed to Paul the highest human endowment, and, as he had spoken in the name of Christ in public and in private, he had been carrying out the provisions of the Great Commission and giving the Gospel to every creature whom he could bring under the power of his eloquence. But Paul saw that even this could not take the place of love. One might be eloquent, as an orator or rhetorician, in public speech and in written letters, and yet be lacking in that personal love which is necessary if one would reach and win his fellow men. The brass cornet or the musical cymbal make loud and pleasing sounds, but to win souls we must be and do more than this. We must have love.

2. Even the power of prophecy, and the finest scholarship, and discerning wisdom, and the power to work miracles, could not take the place of real love. However brilliantly one might be endowed, he would be nothing in God's sight without pure love in his heart and life. No one ever doubted that Christ, with all his power, had this love.

3. Even the giving of alms, or charities, would not take the place of Christian love; and even being willing to die at the stake, or in battle, would not be sufficient to prove that one's heart was full of love. There might be some human motive of vainglory, or self-satisfaction in those attitudes.

4. Here is a particularly descriptive presentation of Christian love. It suffers long or is patient; is kind, full of gentleness and good actions; envieth not, or has no hateful feelings; vaunteth not itself, or is not boastful; not puffed up, or is not proud and vain.

5. It is not self-seeking, ill-behaved, attracting attention to itself; is not selfish; is not given to being angry or rude; even thinks sweetly and lovingly of those who are enemies. If one is wise and righteous, he is sure to know the evil that is being done by others, but he is not seeking to think and to say harsh and unkind things.

6. If one is full of love he gets no pleasure from anything that is wrong, but finds joy and gladness in the things that are good and true and kind. It is very easy to see the difference in these two sorts or lives.

7. The one who is full of Christian love bears wrong treatment rather than trying to get even; is glad to believe good of others and tries to be unsuspecting; is hoping good things for others; and bears losses and sacrifices rather than betray his trust.

8. Everything else but love will and and must break down and pass away. Even the best scholarship and wisdom must prove inadequate; but true love will go on forever, and is sure to win out at last.

9-12. We are in a world in which we are only children, after all. We are learning many things, and learning to use many things, and in doing God's work we are called on to make use of many instrumentalities. But even though many influences seem to break down, there is one power that is possible for us all to make use of, always and in every place, and that is the power of Christian love. He who has this in his heart will never need to lay it aside. It will never wear out. It will always do to use, here in this world, and in the world to come. If we have love in our souls we shall be the wisest here, and it will prove, in eternity, that we are among the wisest and greatest there.

13. Faith is indispensable, as the condition of salvation. Hope is unmeasurable in importance, as a comfort and a power. But love is a gift and attainment that is not simply for ourselves, but for the blessing of others and for the glory of God. He who is known to be good and kind and gentle and loving will prove to be the very greatest, most influential and best beloved among Christians. Everything else is less than this one great quality of being like Jesus Christ, who was so full of love.

Suppose we test ourselves. Let each one go through this chapter, and put his or her own name, wherever the word charity is found. How would it sound? How would it sound to ourselves, or to others or to Christ? What would be the matter?

Now let us see how perfectly Christ fits in here. Take Christ's name and put it wherever the word charity is, and see how exactly it meets all the meaning. If Christ shall be in us and abound, we can put our own name there and it will all be true of us!

DETERMINED TED.
BY HILERY CARROLL CLAPP.

"He couldn't lead a meeting!"
That's what his chums all said,
And every time he thought of it
With fright he 'most fell dead.
But, "I've got to, and I'm goin' to!"
Came a-ringing in his head.

"You'll have stage fright, I know it;
Don't try," his sister pled.
But something kept him thinking
And it sort of eased the dread—
'Twas, "I've got to and I'm goin' to!"
Kept a-ringing in his head.

When Sunday night had come at last,
The Scripture first he read,
"And can he really make a prayer?"
One to another said.
While "I've got to and I'm goin' to!"
Was still ringing in his head.

Now when 'twas done that evening
And souls were touched and fed
His pastor knew and thanked him.
And asked "How?" Replied our Ted,
"Twas that 'Got to—and you're going to,'
And it rang out all my dread."

One thing this generation needs is to have the fear of God before its eyes.

We may make mistakes in life, but let us not defend them. Along that path lies spiritual degeneration.

It is easy enough to say, God is in the world and every thing will come out right, but that is not God's way. The job has been delegated to us, and we can not shirk it without suffering the penalty.

YOUNG PEOPLE

PRAYER MEETING, OCTOBER 16.

Endeavor Topic: Lessons From Patriots of the Past and Present. Nehemiah 4:1-14.

This is known as Good Citizenship Day, and when we seek for good citizens to be considered part of our lives, we may well go to the Bible and study the life and words of men who have lived in the love and fear of God, and have tried to do their whole work in life as he would have them do it.

We ought to be good citizens. It is a duty to be patriotic. It should be a very positive part of our lives to help make our Country as good and safe as we can possibly make it. God has made our duties toward our own country very prominent and very positive.

As it is our duty to be earnest and careful in maintaining the Family and Home with which we are connected; and especially the Church which is another institution derived from God; so is it our duty to do our part in the State, the third divine institution on earth. These three are called into being for the sake of the domestic, the social and the religious life, and we fail in our duty to God and our fellow-men if we fail in any of these departments.

The Bible has many examples of eminent patriots. Abraham was the father and founder of the Jewish nation, and as he went to Canaan, at the command of God, and laid claim to that land in God's name, and for the sake of the nation which he was to found, he became not only a great religious leader, and Father of the faithful, but he became the great and illustrious patriot, who loved his country and spent all his life there, and did all in his power for the well-being of its people, his descendants.

David was a great patriot, who, as a warrior and king, extended the borders of his land and built it up in magnificence and wealth and territory to an extent it had not previously enjoyed. But he was concerned not only in its temporal welfare, but sought, above all this, for its spiritual life and advancement. He desired to build up its religious life by providing for a great temple and a devotional life of worship, and wrote the most wonderful book of poems, to lead his people into reverence for God, that has been prepared for the use of men. He loved his country, and was able, at his death, to turn it over, in all its glory, to his son Solomon.

Nehemiah was one of the most illustrious examples of a true patriot and worthy public official that we have any account of in the Bible. One among the captives in Babylon, he rejoiced in the order that made possible the return of many of his people to Jerusalem, and the rebuilding of the city and temple. It was a joy to him that this sacred place, which had been lying in ruins, was to be restored, and he watched and waited for the tidings that should tell him, back in Babylon, of the success of those who went on this sacred enterprise to Jerusalem. At last the tidings came. Those who had gone back to Jerusalem were hindered in their work by hostile forces. They were fought against and thwarted. It was not possible for them to make any headway. A leader was needed, and real authority from Babylon.

So Nehemiah understood the enterprise. He secured permission from the king. He secured authority, by means of which he broke down the enemies and encouraged the distressed Jewish people. He organized their forces. He set them to building the walls, and then the homes of the city. He became the head of the Jewish people. He shows us what the governor of a province should be, and how the mayor of a city should enforce the laws. He was persistent and wise and courageous. He kept at the work and he kept the people at the work until it was finished. The city was rebuilt. Its life was re-established. Its religious services were reinstated. Religion was made a power once more in the life of the nation.

The fearlessness, the unselfishness, the efficiency, and the true-hearted, patriotic leadership of this good and great man have been a blessing to the world ever since. He not only helped his own people and his own times, but he set an example for all men in public life to follow.

All men in official positions today should be patriots, of the high and unselfish and religious type shown us in the life of Nehemiah.

PRAYER MEETING

OCTOBER 12.

CASTING OUR BURDEN UPON THE LORD.

Psalm 55:16-22.

One of the great blessings of a true religious faith is that it brings so much of comfort and consolation to the soul. The sense that one belongs to God, and that God has come to dwell with him and be his God, is of the most comforting nature. If we have this personal experience of the goodness and grace of God, let us rejoice and be full of loving gratitude.

A great physician said not long ago that he wished, very often, and for many of his patients, that they knew how to pray. So many of them, nervously excited and burdened and sleepless, might quiet down and become serene in mind and heart, if they only knew how to pray and to cast their burden on the Lord. Faith and prayer are healing to the being, and they who know how to pray and trust in the Lord are in condition much more conducive to recovery than if they lacked this gracious element. Let us trust and pray, and we shall be more likely to be delivered out of many a serious trouble of sickness and distress.

Some one, writing about the camel, says that every evening it kneels to have the burden taken off from its back so that it may sleep and rest. So he urges that we should be down on our knees in prayer at night, that God may lift all the burdens of anxiety and fear and labor from us, and that we may then be able to rest and sleep, free from the load, knowing that God is around us and about us, to do us good. It is a great blessing to know that God is our friend and helper, ever ready to sympathize with us and give us his grace and support.

If people knew how to pray to God and tell him all that is in their hearts, they would not be so much of a burden to other people, and would not make themselves so greatly dreaded by them. Many a person, who is irreligious and consequently without any sense of God's near and comforting presence, feeling trouble and anxious to have sympathy, insists on unburdening his heart to some other person or persons, and thus drawing on their very life, while if he knew how to pray, he would take it all to God and would grow calm and rested. Nearly every one has some burden, and instead of laying additional loads upon others we should take our own trouble to God and let his infinite grace support and strengthen and console.

David knew what it was to pray. He made it his frequently repeated course and habit to call on God. He said that he would pray morning and evening and at noon, and he was sure that God would hear and answer him. With this as the habits of his life, he had the opportunity for many happy experiences of answered prayer. He was sure that God had answered many a prayer. The trouble with many people, who have doubt as to prayer, and who do not know whether or not God ever answers prayer, is that they have not been enough in the habit of prayer to put him to the test. But David had been in the habit of praying and he knew that God did answer his prayers. He said: "He shall hear my voice"; "He hath delivered my soul"; "God shall hear." With this faith, growing out of his knowledge and experience, he was serene, and he left an example that we might well follow.

It is a great privilege to be a Christian, and to know the Lord Jesus Christ, and trust in him, and be at peace. The Christian has the experience of knowing that God for Christ's sake has pardoned his sins, and taken them away from him forever. This is the greatest favor that God can do to any soul. Sin is the burden on any heart. If God has lifted this burden then he can lift any burden, and he will be willing to do anything for us if we will only ask him and trust him.

It is a great joy to know that God is our ever-present friend and helper, and that he is ready to do for us exceeding abundantly above all that we can ask or think.

The following excerpt from an editorial in "The Presbyterian Magazine" should command the earnest attention of thoughtful Presbyterians:

"But he that provides not for his own in the things of the spirit is a greater and more dangerous infidel than he that provides not for them in the things of the body. The church college, or education under distinctively religious influence, still has a mission of fundamental importance. We must maintain it as we would maintain our life, and we let it languish and wither because of insufficient support at our peril and guilt.

"The Presbyterian Church has an honorable history in the field of education. But we have not kept pace with the steps of our fathers. Our performance has fallen behind their programs. We still have a large and promising educational plant, which has in it the seeds and potency of great achievements, but it needs new life and immediate substantial help."

GENERAL NEWS

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

The Assembly of the League of Nations, at its meeting in Geneva, has cleared the air of some clouds. It has overcome some difficulties and brought others to the front.

It has organized the Permanent Court of International Justice. This court consists of eleven judges and four deputy judges. Thirty-five countries put forward eighty-nine different candidates. The United States representative is Hon. John Bassett Moore.

Bolivia raised a serious question. In 1904 it signed a treaty with Chile confirming the latter's possession of the Province of Antofagasta. It now appeals for a revision of the treaty so as to provide Bolivia with access to the sea. The Assembly appears loath to take up the matter.

The Assembly, as we have already noticed, did not take action looking toward the limitation of armaments, on the ground that the conference called for Nov. 11th by the United States can best handle the matter.

The Committee on Amendments decided in favor of maintenance of the principle set out in Article X. "Exclusion of acts of aggression" says the report, "as a means of modifying the territorial integrity and political independence of States is the very essence of the League of Nations." However, it put an interpretation on the article to the effect that members of the League are not obliged to take part in any military action, but are free to decide for themselves whether or not to participate.

The committee also suggested that the Covenant be amended so as to make awards of the Permanent Court binding on Member States as are decisions of the Council and Assembly. It also recommended that the Assembly should propose amendments henceforth.

THE JAPANESE QUESTION.

It is said that Secretary Hughes has been exchanging views with Ambassador Shidehara on the Yap cable questions and the mandate given by the League to Japan over the islands in the Pacific, and that both these matters will probably be settled before the beginning of November. The press of Tokio has published an abstract of the terms of agreement. Japan and China are actively engaged in efforts to adjust their differences on the Shantung question and other matters of controversy.

ONLY A FEW HUNDRED MILLION STILL NEEDED.

The Shipping Board, which President Harding recently stated had entailed expenditures from the Treasury of approximately $3,500,000,000, "is nearly in sight of the end of the need of asking great sums," Chairman A. D. Lasker has announced.

The Board Chairman made his announcement in connection with submission to Director of the Budget Charles G. Dawes, of additional estimates amounting to $26,500,000, which he said would be needed by the Board to continue operations this fiscal year. Next year, however, the Chairman added, Board operations should not cost the Government more than $50,000,000, one half of the amount estimated as necessary this year.

The appropriations for the two years, totalling $150,000,000, Chairman Lasker said, if construction were left out of consideration, should tide the Board over until world wide trade conditions improve and the provisions of the merchant marine act come fully into effect.

"If world business improves," he added, "the whole operating loss sustained by the Board is expected to be eliminated. In addition, as we collect back debts due to the Board, our appropriations will become smaller until, we hope, there will come a time when the receipts and expenditures will balance."

RESERVE OF 4,000,000 MEN PROVIDED FOR.

Comprehensive plans for formation of the organized reserves of the army, on a basis that will permit quick mobilization of more than 4,000,000 fighting men, have been prepared by the General Staff. An outline of the preliminary steps now in progress was made public last week by acting Secretary I. M. Wainwright.

The plan, which was developed under authority of Congress, contemplates virtually no expenditures in its present stages but, in the opinion of Major General James G. Harbord, Acting Chief of Staff, it would furnish the framework of mobilization of the nation in arms in a matter of weeks instead of months.

Twenty-seven infantry divisions of the reserve are provided for, numbering from the Seventy-sixth to the One Hundred and Fourth, thus preserving, both in number and in the geographical location were each originated, the sixteen wartime national army divisions.

The same territorial distribution as to armies and army corps areas is followed as in the regular army organization, and the present structure of the national guard.

RAILWAY STRIKE IN PROSPECT.

President W. G. Lee, of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, announced last week that if the strike vote cast by ninety per cent of the 186,000 members in the recent referendum on the wage reduction should be supported by the Grievance Committee a tentative strike order would be issued, effective only when and if other unions should strike.

With this parting declaration President W. G. Lee dispatched fifty-seven General Chairmen of unions to their homes with written instructions to call their Grievance Committees, obtain their approval or disapproval of the strike vote.

PLANS FOR A GREAT RAILROAD TRUST.

A tentative plan for consolidation of all major American railroads into nineteen great non-competing companies was announced last week by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The proposed combination, authorized under the transportation act, is designed to remove weaknesses in the national railroad system, shown by the operation of the rate-making power of the commission, and to effect readjustment of terminal and other subsidiary facilities with reluctant economy in operation and delivery of shipments.

Lieutenant John A. McCready, pilot at McCook Field, last week broke the world's altitude record, flying alone in a LaPere plane, when he ascended to a height of 40,800 feet, remaining in the air one hour and forty-seven minutes.

China's third great disaster within a year has been recorded in Anhwei province, where an area larger than the state of Connecticut has been flooded, with the loss of thousands of lives, and property damage estimated at $80,000,000.

The Anhwei catastrophe followed the famine in the seven northern provinces of the republic, in which millions literally perished, and the earthquake in Kansu province, in which 40,000 people are estimated to have been killed by tremors that devastated entire counties.

The United States Submarine, R-6, attached to the Pacific Squadron, sank in San Pedro harbor, Calif., last week, while tied up to the mother ship, Camden.

The Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors of the United States Army, in a report made public last week, took a stand against construction at the present time of and canal between Lake Erie and the Ohio River.

Recommending that the United States, notwithstanding the ZR-2 disaster, should continue the development and construction of dirigibles, the National Advisory Committee on Aeronautics has advised that this country should go to Germany, the founder of the Zeppelin, for a modern airship.

SECRET OF GOOD CROQUETTES.

A good croquette is a credit to the best of cooks. A poor croquette is an abomination. Nowadays, when the price of meat daily soars higher, it is clearly the duty of every cook and housewife to learn the possibilities of croquettes, for there is no better way of making a little meat go a long way or making yesterday's roast or joint take on new and interesting possibilities than through the dainty known as the croquette.

To the Frenchman the mere word croquette suggests the most essential qualification of the good croquette, for the word croquette means a crisp cake. The good croquette is always crisp; the soggy article that reeks of lard and lies on the platter like a ball of lead does not deserve the name.

Here are some of the don'ts and rules for croquette making:

The meat used in croquettes must be finely chopped. If you use a meat chopper, run it through two or three times to make sure it is thoroughly cut up.

Mix all ingredients thoroughly, and have the final mixture as soft as it can be handled.

Use only a little mixture in each croquette ball. One tablespoonful is enough. If you use more, the center is not thoroughly heated when it is dipped into the hot fat.

The cracker crumbs used to roll on the outside of croquettes should be rolled very fine. Instead of dipping the croquettes into the beaten egg, paint them with the egg mixture by means of a paint brush. This applies the egg evenly and minimizes the possibility of having the croquette fall to pieces in the process.

After the croquettes have been dipped in the boiling fat, they should be drained on a sheet of brown paper and placed in a warm oven to drain till needed. If possible, croquettes should be cooked just before serving. Although reheated croquettes are sometimes served, they are not in the same class, as far as taste goes, with the freshly-cooked ones.—Ex.

To prevent berry, or juicy pies of any kind, from running out at the edges, bind the edge with a strip of old muslin, one and one-half inches wide. When the pie is done remove the muslin and you will have a perfect pie.—Ex.

Sandpaper is very good for dressing corns, far better than using a knife.—Ex.

To keep the ordinary cooked salad dressing from curdling, as it often does, heat the vinegar before pouring it into the other ingredients.—Ex.

To Cook Meats.—For soup making we want to draw out the flavor of the meat; therefore, soak the meat in cold water for one hour. Place the kettle containing this water and meat over a slow fire and heat gradually. This will make soup of fine flavor.

This meat will be tasteless, but will still contain a great deal of the proteid or nourishing matter. It should be seasoned well, and may then be used for hash, croquettes and make-over dishes.

If you want to use boiled meat for dinner, not for soup, put the meat in boiling water and cook quickly for a few moments, then slowly.

For a stew, where you wish to use the meat and the juice, the process is different. In this case you want some goodness in the meat and some in the gravy, so you must put the meat into cold water and put it over a very hot fire where it will boil quickly. Then cook slowly for several hours, until tender. Some people boil meat so hard that it becomes stringy. There is no better way of making stews than by using cheap cuts of meat, such as the lower round, adding vegetables as desired, and cooking it in the oven instead of on top of the stove.

Salt meats should be soaked, the water changed once or twice, and then the meat must be cooked long and slowly.—Mary F. Rausch, Colorado Agricultural College, Fort Collins.

APPLES.

The apple long since won its way to popularity. It is one of the most widely diffused of fruits. In the list of orchard fruits the apple has decidedly first place.

The majority of fruit trees in the United States are apple trees. This fruit makes up nearly eighty-five per cent of the total number of bushels of orchard fruit produced. It has reached the grand total of over two hundred million bushels in a single year.

The possible range of apple growing in the United States is very great. It is stated that at least two-thirds of the settled portion of our country is more or less adapted to its growth, and within that range there are but few cases where the farmer's family must go hungry for apples.

The beginning of apple culture goes back into the years before A. D. Nobody knows just when it began. The apple, it is certain, was extensively cultivated by the Romans, who, no doubt, introduced it into Britain.

THE WILLOW PLUME.

BY AN OLD CONTRIBUTOR.

The city missionary told this story of the frail girl on her deathbed in a house of sin. Her first downfall she traced to a willow plume that cost twenty-five dollars. Like many working girls, she had an inordinate love of dress, and her salary was small. She saw the daughters of the favored rich wearing plumes, diamonds and sealskin. Why couldn't she? She was young and beautiful. Others sought "the easiest way," and the "primrose path" was alluring with the flowers of pleasure on either side. If I had a daughter, I should aim to instill good principles in her mind before she left the roof tree.

I have read silly letters from young girls to strange young men, and the twaddling talk of "love and kisses" is nauseating to a mature mind. These may be average persons, but of the flirting "variety." They play at the game of love, first with one partner, then another, and pretend that love is the greatest thing in the world, while they debate it, even prostitute it, to a common level. I once listened to a woman lecturer, who was likewise a physician and writer. The keynote of her talk to girls was: "Do not make yourselves cheap." The average intelligent young man seldom marries the girl who was "dying for his kisses," or who closes her letters with "love and a bushel of kisses."

Let not the private stenographer be deluded by the "vows" of her employer when he tells her how he "longs for her sympathy," and how the "dream of his life will be to make her happy." Pay no attention to the married man who is "lonely." Turn a deaf ear to the man who complains that "his wife is too intellectual to sympathize with his emotions." He likewise "requires the sweet tenderness of a girl to cheer him with her vivacity." Look out for such male fools. They are sensually greedy! When a man honestly loves a girl, he will want to protect her from harm.

I have heard of silly girls who affect "platonian" friendships, but after a while men crave the human kind. I recently read a letter from a silly miss who wrote: "I never expect to marry any one, so then I will be free to love you, Jacky, through a long lifetime." What a delusion! Did she not know that her roses would fade and her dimples turn to wrinkles? Foolish little "Jill." Would not "Jack" grow as wrinkled as an old baboon, and maybe have corns, gout and dyspepsia! It is hard to put old heads on young shoulders.

A girl should maintain her dignity and have no interchange of kisses unless their friendship ripens into honest love, for is not a kiss a pledge? Do not make yourselves "cheap." We value that most that is hardest to get. An old poet said:

"The fruit that falls without plucking
Is indeed too mellow for me."

You, gentle girl, can make the application.

The greatest danger to girlhood is an inordinate love of admiration. Beauty is a divine gift. Why not use it to God's glory? In the Florence Crittenden homes are sad girls, bright and stupid. Some have been betrayed by promises of marriage. Some were given to making "dates" on street corners with no hesitancy. Let good sense be cultivated.

The very best way to succeed in anything is to learn how to think quickly. A famous doctor started out as a very poor boy. Applying for work in a store, he was tested by a few questions. Taking down a box of lace from a shelf, the proprietor asked: "What would you do with this?"

The boy replied, tracing with his finger on the box lid: "Dust it." He got the position.—The King's Own.

THE CROWNING OF THE KING

BY MISS JULIET NICHOLS.

Up to Jerusalem the King would go
And there be crowned as other kings before him;
Up in Jerusalem his followers
Would hear the shouts and see the crowds adore him:
Jerusalem the beautiful, Jerusalem the fair,
Jerusalem beloved of God! The King is riding there!

Up to Jerusalem the King did come:
There crafty men made plans to overthrow him;
There in Jerusalem the howling mobs,
Blinded with rage, refused to heed or know him:
Up in Jerusalem no throne had king or priest to spare,
Behold a cross! Jerusalem, thy King is hanging there!

To thee, Jerusalem, the King will come,
And there you'll crown where once before you spurned him.
Is it not soon? For lo, you wailed and wept, *Till Christians met your enemy and turned him.
"Ye shall see me no more till ye shall say, (Hear his sure word!)
"Blessed is he that cometh in the name of Christ the Lord!"

OUR EXCHANGES

OUR SABBATH.

There are a lot of people in this country who are becoming very weary of the mud-slinging of some of their fellow-citizens who are proposing to lead our nation to the slaughter pen by the destruction of our American Sabbath.—Intelligencer.

TWO VIEWS.

Secretary Mellon wants a tax on checks, but what the country really wants is a check on taxes.—Columbus Dispatch.

THE WAY, THE TRUTH AND THE LIFE.

Some have attacked Christianity in the name of scientific Truth. Forsooth. But what has become of what was held as scientific truth fifty years ago? Never fear! Christianity can not be damaged by the truth. Jesus said, "I am the Truth." When we invent something more true than the ethics and example of Jesus, we may calculate that Christianity will vanish. But we will be some time dead before that is done.—Central Christian Advocate.

BASEBALL AND THE NEWS-PAPERS

For a generation or more the American press has been buffaloes by professional baseball in a manner that is truly marvelous. Editors and business managers are keen, and in the case of the big papers they are very powerful; but the biggest vied with the littlest in capitulating to the demands of professional baseball. In fact, the bigger the paper the more complete was its surrender. You couldn't get a line of free advertising for any ordinary business enterprise in a metropolitan paper any more than you could get an unknown check cashed at a strange bank. But a handful of men operating a team as a money-making machine could get unlimited free advertising, and out of it coin tens and hundreds of thousands of dollars.—Adrian Telegram.

PEACE.

If the world will resolve not to have another war until the recent one is paid for, everlasting peace will be assured.—Greenville Piedmont.

FAME.

Fame is a funny thing. There are thousands of great men to fame and fortune unknown. Who are the famous ones, according to the newspapers? Charlie Chaplin and Jack Dempsey, Mary Pickford and Babe Ruth, etc. What a commentary upon our times!—Methodist Protestant.

KEEP THEM FRIGHTENED.

Motion picture producers are evidently pretty thoroughly frightened over the revelations in connection with the Arbuckle case. They have good reasons to be, for many of the things which are being brought out are startling and disgusting. Allowing a large margin for exaggeration, there is still enough left to arouse the whole country.—Presbyterian Advance.

A COMPOSITE PRAYER.

What would be the composite prayer of the members of a church? Suppose a pastor were to write out a prayer made up of the desires and even the words of his members. Would it not be a helpful service? Such a composite prayer was made by a pastor from the petitions of his probationer's class, and it was soon committed to memory by them and often used at home.—Western Christian Advocate.

OUT OF SEVERAL BINS NOW.

Scientists assert that the coal supply will give out in a few million years. Commercial statisticians intimate that the public will not have to wait so long for the interesting experience.—Washington Star.

PEACE AND COMMERCE.

An obstacle in the way of peace is the fact that the milk of human kindness won't satisfy a thirst for the cream of foreign trade.—Muncie Star.

THE END OF WAR.

The President and Secretary Hughes have shown modesty and discretion in cautioning the world that the coming conference is to be designated as the Conference for the Limitation of Armaments, and not the Disarmament Conference. They evidently do not wish to suffer the humiliation that comes to those who promise much and achieve little.—Commercial Tribune.

THE TROUBLE IN RUSSIA.

"Lenine says he is disappointed in the Russian people." Probably thought they could live without eating.—Toledo Blade.

THE ARMAMENT CONFERENCE.

The armament conference at Washington, is to discuss not the possibility of a navyless world, but the possibility of a reasonable limitation of naval armament. Any expectation that the leading sea powers—America, Britain and Japan—will sink their navies is bound to be disappointed, and it is not good statesmanship to raise extravagant expectations that can only result in such disappointment.—Kansas City Star.

AN EVIL AND ITS REMEDY.

"America is a free country, and the guarantee of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness is so broad that it frequently invites abuse from those who are discontented and easily led. Public sentiment can be molded through no more appropriate agency than the 4,000,000 men who took up arms for the defense of the nation. They can bring the profiteer to book, they can silence the agitator who arrays class against class. They can drive crooked politicians from public life, and scotch the snake of bolshevism. The veterans possess a purifying effect upon the national life which they apparently do not yet realize, but which opens for them the opportunity for service unparalleled in history."—Washington Post.

WHAT I GAVE I HAVE.

God said through James: "Your gold and silver are cankered, and the rust of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire." Rust only comes on unused metal. While there is so much need, and so many perishing without the Bread of Life, let there be no rusting money, but let there be faithfulness and promptitude in our stewardship.—Bombay Guardian.

WISE JOURNALISM.

"A correspondent impugns our fairness because the editor declines to print his article in defense of the Ku Klux Klan as a Christian and 100 per cent American organization. We probably must accept the imputation. We have no space for the defense of a secret league which professes to take the law into its own hands and which uses terror to accomplish its end. That is neither Christian nor American."—Christian Advocate.

SHORTER AND LONGER BIBLE.

The unbelievable effrontery of the "Shorter Bible" authors, and the monumental conceit of H. G. Wells, in proposing a new and "Longer Bible" to "Salvage Civilization" have a significance that God's people dare not let pass unmarked. It is nothing less than that the proposition to discard Christianity and establish a pagan religion, based on the evolution theory, is now openly championed by the literary and scholastic atheists and infidels.—Western Recorder.

THE VILLAGE CHURCH.

The New York Herald has finely said: "The village church remains the center of good works. In it gather earnest men and women, striving as best they may to make their neighborhood better, their neighbors and themselves happier, more useful. In thousands of such churches gifts are cheerfully made for medical work, educational work, religious work in foreign lands as well as nearer home. In them real sacrifices for mankind are made without expectation of applause. Unfortunate would be an American community without a church; unfortunate would be its inhabitants."—N. Y. Herald.

DIVINE DESIGN IN NATURE.

An intelligent design in Creation is apparent to all who do not seal up their eyes with the hoodwink of atheism. Granted the infinite Creator, and all the processes of creation are capable of explanation. It matters not how many ages the processes have occupied, there is, back of them all, persistently and intelligently working according to a fixed plan, the great Creator.

A Darwinian conception of development, according to chance and natural selection, is essentially a baseless and impossible dream. There must have been directing intelligence and previous design and personal agency, or there could have been no development of blind matter along the lines that have characterized the advances in the material universe.

Design is everywhere apparent in the worlds about us. The complicated machinery in the human body, in the insect world, in the field of vegetation and in the heavenly bodies proclaims that some one must have devised and ordered them. Evidences of skill are everywhere apparent. But skill is a manifestation of thought. There is no thought without a thinker. A thinker is and must be a person, and the person who has thought out and designed and accomplished this universe is the Infinite and Eternal God.

The one who paints a rose is called an artist. Is not he an infinite artist who has made all the roses and all the blossoms, given them their exquisite forms and colorings, endowed them with their marvelous perfume, and made them a delight to all intelligent and sensitive souls? Here is design that calls for an infinite Creator.

The one who produces a statue is lauded as a sculptor. But is not he the infinite sculptor who has made all the wonderful forms of man and bird and beast, with their admirable adjustments and beauties and grace, and powers of motion and achievement and reproduction, and made them capable of high and distinguished functions?

The one who produces a piece of machinery, as a watch, a telescope or a musical instrument, is admired and praised for his skill and his efficiency. But much more must he be praised who has made the complicated mechanism of the human eye and brain and body, the musical apparatus of the human throat and the singing bird and the changeless and invariable march of the planets in their trackless revolutions.

Such results are not reached by mere chance. Such ends are not attained by blind matter adapting itself to unseen possibilities and stretching itself out to take on new forms and complete powers. It is wild and insane to try to explain the existence and the conditions of this universe without an infinite designer and Creator behind it and above it. Difficult as it may be for one to conceive of a person able to design and execute all this, the difficulty is infinitesimal as compared with the difficulty of conceiving of the universe existing without the Eternal and Infinite God as its Creator.

A smattering, would-be scientist said, not long ago, "We can not any longer admit an argument for the existence of God from what is called 'design' in nature, since we no longer admit that there is design." By such begging the question, reasoning in a circle, and shallow self-conceit, would some of these persons bow God out of his own universe and enthrone chance in the orphaned world.

Normal intelligences among men stand today, as they always have stood, for design in nature as one proof of a God above nature. Whatever his methods in creation, and however long his processes, they believe in the creative spirit, the God of Creation, superior to and pre-existing all that we find in the natural world, who has brought about these conditions by the exercise of his infinite wisdom and skill and goodness and power.

THE LORD'S PRAYER.

Every one in Christian lands is supposed to know enough of the Gospel to be able to repeat the Lord's Prayer. This is found in only one place in complete form, Matthew 6: 9-13, and it should always be repeated in this form if we have respect for the inspired language of the Holy Scriptures. One mark of a Presbyterian is to be able and willing to use the exact words of the Lord's Prayer as here recorded. It is as follows:

"Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil: For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen."

It is thus our Presbyterian Standards quote it, and it is thus that good Presbyterians use it. It is a good thing in quoting scripture to follow it exactly, and not allow ourselves to make free with its words lest we come to be careless as to its teaching. Some one may smartly quote that "the letter killeth but the spirit giveth life." But this does not and can not refer to the letter given by divine inspiration. Else, why was it given? There is no text more abused than this very one.

The good Presbyterian does not say "who art in heaven" but "which," this being literally exact, and grammatically accurate, and more reverent, because less colloquially personal, than "who." He does not say "on earth" but "in" earth, as it is not a matter of geography but of human life. He does not say "forever and ever," not wishing to be unmeaningly verbose, and thus add words without meaning to the simple words of Christ.

But some Churches use a form containing the word "trespasses," and some people think that this is in the Bible. But they are mistaken. It is in the Episcopal Prayer Book, and some other Churches, as the Methodists, choose to go here for their form of the prayer rather than to the Bible. There is only one other place in the Gospels, outside of Matthew, where the Lord's Prayer is given, and that is in Luke 11:2-4, as follows, and in an incomplete form, something obviously being lost from the manuscript:

"Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done, as in heaven, so in earth. Give us day by day our daily bread. And forgive us our sins; for we also forgive every one that is indebted to us. And lead us not into temptation; but deliver us from evil."

There is not a word about "trespasses" here. As we have regard for the words of Scripture let us give it as it is in Matthew, or in Luke, remembering, however, that Christ must have used the longer form as Matthew gives it, as Matthew would not have presumed to add to the words of Christ. It is well to use one or the other scriptural form, and if we would employ a complete form to take that recorded by Matthew, but it is not well, in any case, to compound a form to suit ourselves, and give to it the name of the "Lord's Prayer."

We find in the Revised Version certain changes and eliminations and abridgements that are a grief to contemplate, and that are without reverence or reason. The changes in Matthew are bad enough, but those in Luke are sufficient to drive the Version back to the consulting library, it may be, but certainly out of the pulpit and classroom of the Sabbath school. It is here given:

"Father, Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Give us by day our daily bread. And forgive us our sins; for we ourselves also forgive every one that is indebted to us. And bring us not into temptation."

It is with a great sense of refreshment and reverence that we go back to the full, simple, beautiful words that are recorded for our use in the Gospel of Matthew. As we have said, good Presbyterians may be known by their sticking to the plain words of the Scriptures, and we prefer to repeat this prayer in the full and exact form it came to us, as we are told, from the lips of our Lord. As for ourselves, when we are repeating it in public, and variations are made from its exact scriptural form, we prefer to keep silent while others are using the human variations, and then join with them in the words that come through the inspired writer from the lips of Christ.

STATE LOTTERIES.

Many Americans have received letters from European countries urging them to take chances in state lotteries. Several states have established such lotteries in order to raise revenues. Even some British colonies are discussing their establishment. The Australian Baptist deplors the introduction of a state lottery bill in New South Wales. It says: "The only excuse either Premier Storey or his government has to offer for imposing this state lottery upon the people is that he can not see any other way of raising the necessary money for motherhood endowment." This was his reply to a deputation of citizens who opposed the bill. It says: "The majority on this question of a state lottery is represented by members with pronounced Irish names, and even more pronounced Irish brogues. We all know where the Roman Catholic Irish stand as to the ethics of gambling. Mr. Storey's reply to the deputation showed conclusively that he had been well coached as to his answer, and by whom 'Remember,' he told the deputation, 'it has been said that one must do a slightly wrong thing sometimes in order to do a big right.' That is Roman doctrine pure and simple, wherever Mr. Storey may have imbibed it. But a higher authority has declared that dictum to be unsound morally, and un-Christian."

Our Government has taken its stand against lotteries, either state or private.

Lottery literature is unmailable and a question may be raised as to the carrying of lottery circulars mailed in other countries. Honest people, however, can settle matters for themselves by throwing such circulars into the fire.

MODERNISM.

Several of our exchanges mention the fact that advocates of modernism and the destructive theology often evade discussion by assuming that their differences evangelically are "matters of definition and of theories of inspiration." One asks, "What do you mean by modernism?" And another says all depends on one's definition of "destructive theology."

The Baptist, having followed the discussion of fundamentalism and modernism raised in the Northern Baptist Convention, and continued in the Baptist papers, says:

"Modernism is a system of thought exhibited in denials of a personal God, of revelation, of Christ, of the Bible, of the atonement, of salvation by faith, and of practically the entire range of Christian truth which is involved in these central conceptions. Its essential notion is that modern rational and scientific investigation have superseded and invalidated faith in any revealed religion." It adds: "Modernism is a system of philosophy which, in the name of modern reason and science, denies the essential truth of the Christian religion."

The contention of modern destructive critics is not over "theories of inspiration," but over the question of whether there is any inspiration at all.

YOUNG PEOPLE AT COLLEGE.

Young people are flocking to the colleges this fall in unprecedented numbers. Nearly all institutions, large and small, report that the attendance is beyond all previous records. There are many reasons for this, there being a general awakening to the realization of the advantages of the higher education, and an increased financial ability to secure the advantages.

Our large universities report their students by the thousands, many of these institutions having from three to eight thousand in attendance. Especially is this true of Eastern colleges, and of state and city universities. Increasingly important is it that college pastors be sustained by the churches in their institutions, since many denominations find more of their own young people in these than in their own church colleges. This work of providing college pastors is one of the large developments in our essential work of caring religiously for our young people today.

But our church colleges make the same report, of increased attendance, limited only by the accommodations. Western College at Oxford has had to turn away 300 applicants this fall, every room being full. Wabash has enrolled 450, of whom 228 are new, a gain of 111 over last year. Hanover had 204 at its summer school and 337 this fall, or a gain of 104 over last year. James Milliken has 28 more than last year, Centre 28 more; Lindenwood 23, and Lafayette 38. Glendale has more than twice as many as last year. Wooster has several hundred more than last year, or a 77 per cent gain in men and 11 per cent gain in women, with 315 in the Freshman Class. A compiled report from the theological seminaries states that there is an increased attendance of at least ten per cent over last year.

All of this is encouraging, showing, for one thing, a recovery from war conditions and the prospect of still further recovery in the near future.

And now let there be increased prayer, and diligence, that these young people, who are in the way of preparation for large influence in the life and work of the country and world, may be kept true to the Gospel, and thus ready to serve Christ, and bless their fellow men. There are days and a special week, for prayer for colleges. Christian people who realize all that is involved in the life of these young men and women will be often in prayer for them, asking, every week and every day, that they may be trained up to live to the glory of God, and to accept the indwelling grace of Jesus Christ.

HEALTH EXPOSITION.

The Cincinnati Health Exposition, to be held in Music Hall, for a week beginning next Saturday, Oct. 15, should have large attention and attendance. Great preparations have been made for it and exhibits will be made of startling interest and importance. Speakers of national reputation are on the program to give valuable instruction. The whole move is in the interest of the public welfare. The Executive Committee of the Federation of Churches has given its hearty endorsement to the exposition, and the program of Sabbath afternoon will be under Federation auspices. No admission will be charged for this meeting. The speakers will be Rev. C. M. Smith of Toledo, Ohio. The public health is a matter for great and philanthropic concern. Where Christian principles are inculcated and observed, and Christian intelligence and enterprise prevail, ignorance will be dissipated, vices will be counteracted, crimes will be prevented, living conditions will be ameliorated and higher standards for individual and social life will prevail. Every such united effort as this exposition will benefit any community.

DISARMAMENT CONVOCATION.

While all Christian people are asked to pray for the success of the Conference called by President Harding to meet in Washington City, on November 11, Armistice Day, to consider the limitation of armaments by all the nations of the world, it has been deemed fitting that there should be a special Convocation of Christian forces held in Washington previous to the Conference, there to engage in united prayer that the blessing of God may rest upon President Harding and all who shall compose that great Conference. There can be no success to the deliberations there entered into by national representatives unless the Spirit of God guide the minds and hearts of the participants.

As Benjamin Franklin urged that the meetings of the Continental Congress be opened with prayer, insisting that there could be no assurance of success without the divine blessing, so all Christian people realize that this Conference can not be successful unless God makes it successful. President Harding has asked that there be universal prayer for God's blessing upon this great meeting.

The National Reform Association has sent out the call for this Convocation, October 30 to November 2, at the suggestion of, and in agreement with many eminent religious leaders. A strong program has been prepared and acceptances have been received from many prominent men and women, as Bishop Anderson of Cincinnati, Senator Willis of Ohio, Representative Kelly of Pennsylvania, and others. Church organizations are asked to send delegates, and individuals are asked to attend. Dr. James S. Martin is diligently at work. No enrollment or other fees will be required. For detail program and room reservation, write to Miss Laura R. Church, legislative Superintendent National Reform Association, 634 Munsey Building, Washington, D. C., stating price of room desired.

LAW ENFORCEMENT.

Claims that the Federal Courts are hindered from doing their regular business by the tremendous rush of prohibition cases, were shown to be misrepresentations and for mere liquor propaganda, by the statement of Chief Justice Taft the other day, before the United States Judiciary Committee. He said that the liquor law prosecutions were only about eight per cent of the cases. The fact is that out of 142,402 cases pending in the federal courts on July 21, only 10,365, or over seven per cent, were liquor cases. It might be said that other sorts of litigation hinder the proper disposition of these liquor cases. If all the states would attend to liquor law enforcement there would be no clogging of the United States Courts. Rhode Island, Louisiana, Massachusetts, and California are delinquent in this matter.

If there is unbelief in the world today, there are evidences that it was just as reckless and defiant in the ages gone by. The declarations, for instance, of our Presbyterian General Assembly a century ago, show infidelity more rampant than it is today. It is against such influences of sin that the Church of Jesus Christ must struggle, and against them it has been making magnificent advances, all the time. There is not half the reason for discouragement that there was a century ago.

There is much immorality in the world today. There always has been. God's people are in the world to combat it, and to give a helping hand to the weak and tempted. That is what we are here for. We are not to lie down and give up. Suppose our worthy predecessors in Christ's Church, under more discouraging circumstances, had given up?

Many fears are expressed, periodically, that the earth's stock of fuel may, some day, be exhausted and the earth be left to freeze. But there is no danger of this. The sun's direct heat, if utilized and stored away in the form of electricity, would be far more than could be used for all purposes of light and heat and power. It has been scientifically stated that the heat poured out on the Sahara Desert every day, absolutely unutilized, is the equivalent of 6,000,000,000 bushels of coal. Some Edison or Marconi will learn how to use this heat and light.

There is the element of monotonousness in every-day life, whether in the home, the school-room, the office or the field. But it is a blessed thing, and productive of great results, if we may go on in peace and quiet to do these things that count so greatly for all that is valuable and precious.

WE LOVE TO ROAM THE MEADOWS.

BY MRS. J. M. HUNTER.

When the earth is bright with blossoms,
And the birds are gay with song,
When the summer skies are cloudless,
As the summer days are long,
When the busy bee is humming,
And the partridge calls his mate,
Oh, we love to roam the meadows,
Early morn or evening late.

When arrayed is Mother Nature
In her lovely emerald dress,
And the cooling summer zephyrs
With their softest touch caress,
Then the heart is filled with gladness,
And we hum a happy tune,
And we love to roam the meadows
In the merry month of June.

Now the summertime is over,
And the autumn coming on,
Soon the flowers will be sleeping,
And a haze will dim the dawn;
But the thought is full of sweetness,
As the seasons take their flight,
That no frost can touch the meadows
In the Father's world of light.

THE SOVEREIGNTY OF GOD.

BY REV. JOHN Y. EWART, D.D.

That was a most significant statement by James A. Garfield when a great mob was surging through Wall Street, New York, the day the tragic news flashed over the wires from the National Capital that Abraham Lincoln was shot!

And wonderful was the calming effect upon that mob when Garfield, from a balcony, said:

"Clouds and darkness are round about him; righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne. Fellow-citizens, God reigns, and the Government at Washington still lives."

Would that some voice of stirring power and eloquence might be heard by the restless millions today, to quiet the fevered pulse of the nations, and assert once more the Sovereignty of God.

For there is needed just such a voice of Almighty power. There is a Babel of voices in the air. There are movings to and fro in the earth. There is resistance to authority. There is rebellion against God.

Will not men learn that there is indeed a God? "And he doeth according to his will in the army of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth: and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What doest thou?" Dan. 4: 35).

It will do us all good to learn again the old truth which the world seems to have forgotten. The language will seem strange to many, for God has not been in all their thoughts. Have you ever seen these texts in your Bible?

"Predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will" (Eph. 1: 11).

"To do whatsoever thy hand and thy counsel determined before to be done."

These words make it plain that an omnipotent power is at the helm of the universe, and we are sure that "God is a Spirit, infinite, eternal and unchangeable in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness and truth." (Shorter Catechism, Ques. 4).

We are sure that nothing occurs by chance; that nothing occurs beyond the knowledge and control of God.

This doctrine is by no means to be considered as teaching that God is the author of sin, nor that he interferes with the free agency of man, so as to destroy or impair the accountability of man.

This is a most gracious truth. There is comfort in it for the Christian and for all men. It tells me of the superintending and most benign care of my Heavenly Father over all my affairs to the minutest detail.

"Why should one want to be rid of this great sweet truth," asks Henry Ward Beecher. "I can conceive reasons why men should undertake to rid themselves of the doctrine of responsibility; I can understand how men should wish to rid themselves of the restraints that are imposed upon their appetites; but why men should seek to disabuse themselves of faith in one of the most benign of doctrines, and why a world that is full of the sunshine of God's thought and love should be changed into a world without a God that cares for it, I can not understand. I can understand why men should try to kick winter out of Lapland; but how, when summer comes to the Laplander, he should attempt to kick it out, I never could understand. And why men should attempt to destroy the faith in an overruling mind and substitute for it a belief in fatalism, I never could understand."

Again, Beecher:

"The doctrine of Providence is the doctrine of the inspection of God. Known unto God are his and ours from the beginning. That his eye should mark the path of nations, and that, in their slow march from day to day, he should watch the individual elements in national life, is an infinitely pleasant thought."

I had a narrow escape the other day. While passing under a tree the broken end of a small branch very nearly ran into my eyes. If half an inch on one side, that sharp splinter would have penetrated my eye-ball. I was grateful to God for that narrow escape.

But I had passed under that tree many times, and every other time had a more complete escape. On every other occasion no splintered branch had come anywhere near entering my eye. Therefore, if grateful for what I called my narrow escape, I should be even more grateful every day for the complete escape I have had from that and many other forms of accident and injury.

We forget that "God is not far from every one of us" (Acts 17: 27). His sheltering care is ever about us. He bids us cast all our care upon him, for he careth for us. (1 Peter v. 7). Even the very hairs of our heads are all numbered by his infinite love. Then should not our hearts be filled to overflowing with praise, as was Joseph Addison's when he sang:

"Ten thousand thousand precious gifts
My daily thanks employ;
Nor is the least a cheerful heart
That takes those gifts with joy."

Then why spend time trying to reconcile the overruling Providence of God and the free will of man? The day is coming when to God's people there will be no more mystery. We shall know as we are known. We shall have a full, clear vision of Jesus Christ. We shall perfectly understand the things which have perplexed us here below. And that revelation "within the veil" will thoroughly vindicate God. All his dealings with us, and with the world, will be fully justified. We shall then discover more and more reason for adoring his matchless wisdom and boundless love.

Our proper attitude, therefore, is Trust. William E. Gladstone's long life and conspicuous success are attributed partly and with much reason to "his sturdy and assured faith in the government of the universe." He believed in God and in his Son Jesus Christ. This gave him peace of mind. Over the mantelpiece in Mr. Gladstone's bedroom in Hawarden Castle is inscribed this Scripture text:

"Thou shalt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee; because he trusteth in thee." (Isa. 26: 3.)

Dear friend, if you would have truest peace, and be made strong for the conflicts of life, put all your affairs for time and eternity into the hands of God by a humble act of self-surrender and trust. His Providence is over all. You are infinitely dear to him, and, "He that spared not his own Son, but delivered him up for us all, how shall he not with him also freely give us all things?" (Rom. 8: 32.) Colorado Springs, Col.

CONFUSION OF SCRIPTURE CHARACTERS.

BY REV. J. GIBSON LOWRIE, D.D.

It is not uncommon for careless readers of the Bible to fall into confusion in regard to the narratives of the Gospels that relate similar but separate incidents. Such confusion has long attached to the stories of the anointing of Jesus by the woman that was a sinner, recorded by Luke, the anointing by Mary of Bethany, as recorded by John, and the accounts of Mary Magdalene. Tradition and popular interpretation have indeed long identified the woman that was a sinner with Mary of Magdala, out of whom our Lord cast seven devils, and who afterward, with other women, ministered to him of her substance. The chapter heading of Luke 7 (A. V.) unfortunately gives color to this view, but it is quite unlikely that they were the same persons. When Luke mentions "Mary called Magdalene" in the beginning of the next chapter, he introduces her as a new and separate character. Still more inexcusable is the blunder which confounds Mary, the sister of Lazarus, who anointed the feet of Jesus at Bethany, with the woman that was a sinner. The scene of the anointing by the latter was at the house of Simon the Pharisee, in Galilee; that by Mary was at the house of Simon the Leper at Bethany. We need not be misled by the name Simon, occurring in each narrative. There was a large number of Simons. They may be called the Smiths of the Bible, while Judas is by no means a singular name, even among the apostles.

Sir Edwin Arnold, in his poem, "The Light of the World," not only adopts this baseless tradition of the Dark Ages, which affixes a stain to the name of Mary Magdalene, but assumes that Mary of Bethany is also the same person—thus blending in one character three different individuals, representing three most distinct types of womanhood. Yet this may surprise us less than to find Professor David Smith in "The Days of His Flesh" accepting the same verdict.

We carefully distinguish between these three women. One came to Christ burdened with the consciousness of sin. She sought pardon and received it. Jesus said to her, "Go in peace." He did not bid her come after him as one of his attendants. That was the "woman that was a sinner," who loved much—we do not know her name and have no right to call her Mary. The second woman came to Christ for healing; for demoniacal possession implied only infirmity and not guilt—and Christ healed her; and moved with gratitude she followed him and ministered to him of her substance. That was Mary Magdalene. The third woman, the sister of Lazarus and Martha, was drawn to Christ by her love of the truth. She chose the better part and delighted to sit at his feet and hear his words. That was Mary of Bethany, whom Jesus loved, and of whose act in anointing his body beforehand for burial he said: "Whosoever this Gospel shall be preached in the whole world, there shall also this, that this woman hath done, be told for a memorial of her."

"Oh, that the loving woman, she who sat
So long a listener at her Master's feet,
Had left us Mary's Gospel; all she heard, Too sweet, too subtle for the ear of man."

From "The Joyful Hours of Jesus."

OBEDIENCE TO HEAVENLY VISIONS.

BY REV. CHRISTOPHER G. HAZARD, D.D.

People are alienated from the invisible and glorious life and work of God by the ignorance that is in them. If they could know of the horses and chariots of fire that are upon the mountains they would not fear. If they could be conscious of the divine and saving presence they would not be troubled. They possess knowledge, but without love. They have a creed and believe it, but do not discern its spirit. Faith in Christ is more than faith in his principles. Belief in Christ is more than belief in his skeleton. Their Christ is such a crude Christ, not even a gentleman! If they could only humanize their divine creed!

Therefore there come from heaven from time to time flashes of revealing light. Old men dream dreams and young men see visions. Revelation glows with new meaning as feeling suffuses the letter of the law. Heaven is opened to prayer, and angels of God are seen ascending and descending upon the Son of man. Masters of fiction minister to souls accesses of noble sentiment and purpose. Men are made splendidly conscious of human possibilities as they contemplate the histories of the truly great.

But all this may be a matter of fruitless experience. Things only felt and purposed are not yet done. They may be of no more practical value than a lovely song; they may have no more permanent worth than a splendid sunset. What one feels but does not act upon hardens the heart rather than softens it. Fiction may offer a knowledge of real life, but gives only a knowledge of unseal life, when our sentiments evaporate while we are disobedient to them. They are never given to us without some direction as to what we are to do. They aim at product as truly as sunlight does.

All the visionaries of the Old Testament became obedient to their visions, excepting Balaam and Jonah, and Jonah reconsidered his disobedience. All the visionaries of the New Testament followed their gleam, excepting the son of perdition and such as loved darkness rather than light. In the Holy Land they are digging up ancient lamps, such as the wise virgins used.

It is thus that vision succeeds vision: Thus the path of the just shineth more and more unto perfect day. Light is given to walk by and to work by. To the upright it drives away all darkness. What difference were made in the life and history of the apostle Paul, because he was able to say, after the glorious vision of Jesus that came to him by the way, "I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision!"

NEW YORK LETTER.

BY REV. CLARENCE G. REYNOLDS, D.D.

The American Bible Society, Bible House, Astor Place, New York, offers without charge, a program to be used by the churches or Sabbath schools on Bible Day, Nov. 27th. The exercise, prepared by Charles A. McAlpine, is entitled "The Only Way Out of the Dark," and is in the form of a dialogue. The exercise if used as printed requires twenty copies. Although thirty million copies of the Scriptures are printed every year it will take, at this rate, fifty years to supply the present population of the world. Where all the churches do not find it feasible to give all the program as written, pastors will find material and suggestive points which can be developed into a sermon on some phase of the Bible. The use of this exercise does not involve obligation to make an offering for the Bible Society, although an offering is always welcome.

Another special program for churches and Sabbath schools is that of the Temperance and Moral Welfare Board of our Presbyterian Church, to be used on Temperance Sabbath. This exercise may be obtained without cost from the Board's headquarters, Columbia Bank Building, Pittsburgh. The secretary, Rev. Dr. Charles Scanlon, was unable to attend the conference of Board Secretaries held in New York, Oct. 6th, on account of the death of his brother in West Virginia, by an automobile accident.

There is great need for the continuance of vigorous and intelligent propaganda against strong drink, drugs and kindred evils. In New York City, Roy A. Haynes, the National Prohibition Chief, has taken personal charge of the dry law situation. Mr. Haynes is laying the foundation for swift and sweeping readjustments of enforcement work in New York. Prohibition officials have plans for a stiff drive to totally defeat the liquor lawbreakers in New York, and to remove every possible trace of complicity between enforcement agents and outsiders who profiteer in illegal liquor deals. Agents who have been false to their trust are being dismissed. Last Sabbath Mr. William H. Anderson, Superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of New York State, spoke at the West End Presbyterian Church, of which Rev. Dr. A. E. Keigwin is pastor. Mr. Haynes, the Federal Prohibition Commissioner, spoke in the afternoon at the West Side Y. M. C. A. on "Law Enforcement as Related to Americanism." We rejoice that the Presbyterian Church is standing so valiantly for the great cause of Prohibition.

The Bible Conference and Missionary Convention of the Christian and Missionary Alliance is in session this week. Capt. Gypsy Pat Smith, the evangelist, spoke Saturday evening, and Monday The Bosworths, who claim to be experts in divine healing, attended the convention. Rev. Paul Rader is president of the Alliance.

A conference for older boys will be held, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A., at University Heights Presbyterian Church and New York University next Saturday and Sabbath, with a banquet Saturday evening.

Captain Gypsy Smith is conducting an evangelistic campaign in the Hanson Place M. E. Church, Brooklyn.

Last Monday Rev. James D. Steele, pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Passaic, N. J., read a paper at the New York Presbyterian Ministers' Meeting, on "Progressive Disarmament."

Next Monday, Oct. 17th, Rev. Dr.

Charles Scanlon, General Secretary of the Temperance and Moral Welfare Board of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., will address the ministers on "The Meaning of Social Religion."

New York Presbytery urges all its churches to observe Armistice Day as recommended by President Harding, and also to set apart Sabbath, Nov. 6th, for the discussion of the question of disarmament and for intercession for the international conference which is to assemble on Armistice Day.

FROM THE WESTERN OFFICE.

BY REV. R. P. FULLERTON, D.D.

Some time ago an elder said to me that I ought to quit the little job of home missions and take a pastorate. If that elder could see what I have seen in the last few days, and hear what I have heard, he would change his ideas. I have seen Los Angeles and New York meeting for the consideration of their home mission task, and likewise Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota and Alabama, and, at the conclusion, I have heard them say that it will take the combined wisdom and force of the great Church to overtake the task. Then here we have this great Central West, with its growing cities and increasing country population, and in them all we have a rare opportunity to impress the people with the importance of the Gospel, in the solution of our economic, social and political problems. When one thinks of the situation, he feels the impotency of the whole organized force outside the Church.

I am now in New York, where politicians and papers are at war over their perplexing problems, and where men by the thousands are out of work, and where the city and the state are trying to devise some method of relief. The situation is serious, and what is true here is equally true in cities throughout the whole country. These cities may devise ways of temporary relief, but none of them will be able to find permanent relief until the attitude of the spirits of men is changed, and the Church has that task assigned to it.

Then, whatever laws may be passed to prevent immigration, people are coming, and will continue to come, and who can blame them when their helpless condition on the other side is considered. A pathetic report was published in the city papers, a few days ago, about certain Armenians who had arrived at Ellis Island with passports from the Turkish Government, and were about to be denied entrance because the full quota of Turks had already been admitted. The report went on to say that the girls who were in the number had said that before they would return they would throw themselves in the bay. The only passport they could get was Turkish, and they would not return to suffer as they had suffered.

Men are asking for food and shelter, while others right in their view are feasting on the best the land can furnish. They love their families, where they have them, and for them to see their children suffer, while others have abundance, and at the same time they are not able to find employment to care for them, is more than they can bear. Whatever we may say about their prodigality when they were making large wages does not change the situation now. They are out of work, the winter is coming on, they do not know where they can secure work, to care for these when the winter blasts sweep over the country, and they would be less than human if they did not feel keenly the condition. It seems to me the Church never had a better chance to imitate its Master than now. It must not be satisfied merely to relieve temporary conditions, but it must pour into this troubled stream the wealth of its Christ-like love and sympathy, and do as its Master, a work on the spirits of men that will make impossible a repetition of such a condition.

There is work for all, not at the wage that all desire, nor in the place all desire, but this country offers the opportunity to every man to make an honest living, if he will only be willing to take it. A few weeks since I was in a country place where farmers were discussing the need of laborers, and where good wages and favorable conditions could be found, and the men were not to be found who were willing to go into the country to do the work that needed to be done.

Then the conclusion is that what is needed today is some one who will act as big brother to these men out of work, and point them to these country opportunities, and cultivate in them the spirit which they must have in order to take what is opened to them. There is no better agency for this task than the Church, and we must not be content to worship and care for our own, but we must regard our task undone until we have gone out to help those in need of our help.

But what of the men in the ministry? One of the men in the conference of representatives of self-supporting synods and the Home Board said that he had not been able to get ministers for his country fields, but that most of the ministers who applied to him for fields wanted a place where they could be at home, and where there were good schools and social conditions favorable to young people.

In our office we have found this in a good many cases, but why? One of the sweetest pastorates I ever had was two country churches eight miles apart, and which could be reached only on horseback. These were real country fields, but I always knew I would have a good congregation, and eager to hear the Gospel. Here are the young to be directed and the old to be comforted, and there is no place where we have a more open door for teaching the things of God without a pre-occupied mind. Yet too many men, laborers and ministers, are headed for the city. If we can save the country, then we may hope to save the city.

CHICAGO LETTER.

BY REV. E. N. WARE, D.D.

Rev. Charles S. Stevens, D.D., pastor of the Third Church, remained at home during the summer and occupied his pulpit, giving a series of sermons on marriage. He and Mrs. Stevens are spending September in and about Philadelphia. President James G. K. McClure, of McCormick Theological Seminary, has supplied the pulpit at the morning service, with various other men taking the evening service. Dr. McClure's sermon on last Sabbath was in accord with the action of the Chicago Presbytery in its suggestion that pastors preach on "Disarmament."

It is reported that Granville Avenue Church, vacant since last spring, when Rev. C. E. Peterson resigned to take up work with the Illinois Anti-Saloon League, has called Rev. Francis J. Martin, of Virden, Ill. Mr. Martin is not a stranger to Chicago nor to Chicago Presbytery. He served several years, with good success, the Jefferson Park Church, which, in the palmiest days of the West Side, Dr. Francis L. Patton, then of McCormick Seminary, served. Following him was Rev. Frank Talmage, the illustrious son of his more illustrious father, T. Dewitt Talmage. Another distinguishing feature in the life of this pioneer church is that it is the home church of Evangelist and Mrs. "Billy" Sunday. Here he met Miss Thompson, who is now Mrs. Sunday. He was its Sabbath-school superintendent and one of its elders for a time. Its glory is not all in the past. Rev. William J. Du Bourdieu, the present pastor, is leading the old church in a most excellent community service, a community so changed that Dr. Patton would think himself in another country should he stand in the pulpit which once was his throne.

The summer did not bring to Dr. John H. Boyd, of McCormick Seminary, the measure of health which he had hoped. Dr. W. C. Covert, pastor of the First Church, and Professor R. Worth Frank are sharing with Dr. Boyd the teaching in his department, that of homiletics.

A large, up-to-date world map, beautifully mounted under glass on a substantial oak table, was presented to the seminary missionary room this summer by Mr. Cyrus H. McCormick. It is part of the devotional program of the seminary to have some one specifically mentioned in the chapel prayers each morning. The seminary handbook gives the list of missionaries who are thus to be remembered.

With the coming of Dr. Asa J. Ferry from Bethany Temple, of Philadelphia, to the Edgewater Church, it is rumored that steps will be inaugurated to move the location of the church from its present site at Bryn Mawr and Kenmore Avenues to some location on the Lake Shore Drive, and there to erect a more commodious and elegant building. Dr. Ferry is expected to preach his initial sermon in the Edgewater Church Oct. 23d.

Dr. John Timothy Stone, pastor of the Fourth Church, returned from his summer vacation in Estes Park about the middle of September, and has been taking the three services each Sabbath since. His first public service after his return was to lead the interdenominational prayer conference, which marked the beginning of the evangelistic campaign under the auspices of the Church Federation Council of Chicago for the united Protestantism of the city and suburbs.

The annual convention of Hospital Superintendents, which met at West Baden, Ind., the middle of September, made Mr. Asa S. Bacon, superintendent of the Presbyterian Hospital of Chicago, president of the organization. A more fitting act was not on the program of the convention. Mr. Bacon is one of the foremost superintendents of the country and has long been actively associated with the superintendents' organization.

TO NEW YORK AND BEYOND.

BY REV. S. J. FISHER, D.D.

At noon I was to turn my face away from the wonderful view of the Rondout Valley, and its border line of the Catskills, so I enjoyed once more the brief prayer service in the large parlor, where a passage of the Bible was read after one of the great hymns of the Church had been sung, with music by the chorcello, a remarkable musical instrument, played most skillfully by the daughter-in-law of the proprietor. Then a very fitting prayer was read by the proprietor, who conducts the entire service, and we all united in the Lord's Prayer. To sit there and look out through the large window of a single pane of glass, at the cliff-like walls of Sky Top, and the reflected light of the beautiful lake, was beyond words. What is there in a worldly life, and godless pleasure, to compare with the sweet influences of such a morning gathering, so sanctified by God, so rich in hope, so full of melody in our hearts, and praise for all the saints who from their labors rest!

Ere long we rode to Mountain Rest, the gateway of Mohonk, past the garden so like Joseph's coat of many colors, radiant in the clear air, and thence, by automobile, descending the mountain side, we rode to Poughkeepsie by a long detour, made necessary by road improvements. Past attractive farms and homes with the mountain view from their porches, past apple and pear trees so heavily loaded the branches had to be propped, and vineyards with darkening clusters, and through pleasant villages, we rode to the ferry at Highland on the Hudson. I could not but call my friend's attention to the charm and wholesomeness and joy of these hamlets and homes, and lament that the dwellers in the crowded tenements of New York had neither appreciation of or liking for such richer, and more healthful conditions, for themselves and their children. What a contrast there was in the neatly clothed children on sidewalk and shadowed dooryards, with those of the odorous streets and alleys of the big city!

Waiting for our train at Poughkeepsie beside the Hudson, we looked back westward, and yielded ourselves to the spell of the legends of the Catskills. We heard again the laughter of the gnomes in the vast forest, but it was too clear and beautiful a day to hear the roll of their games of bowls, which the thunderstorm suggests. Not many miles away was the traditional village to which Rip Van Winkle, the modern repetition of the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus, returned ragged, gray of beard, with rusted gun, to find his contemporaries passed away. Ah, it is not only Rip's twenty years of sleep that creates such vacancies and grievous changes!

It was with minds and hearts open to such pleasing thoughts and reflections that we entered our train and sped southward, and across Newburgh Bay saw the buildings and steeples and residences of Newburgh rise on the slope which ascends from the river. They now call the village opposite Newburgh, Beacon. Back of it is Fishkill, a reminder of Dutch days, and here, pardon a personal allusion, for in a house still standing dwelt an ancestor of mine, Colonel Brinkerhoff (mark the Holland suggestion), and often had General Washington as his guest, when Washington had his camp at Newburgh. The first morning, when Washington descended from his bedroom, his host remarked that as the General was supreme in his army, so he, also, commanded his own household, and, as it was his custom to have family worship, he would make no difference on account of his guest. One can imagine Washington's appreciation of his host's principles and humor, as he gladly remained and participated, and perhaps returned to his great tasks and responsibilities refreshed by visions of God, and a walk upon "those shining tablelands of which our God is sun and moon." Perhaps this incident made him stronger for such hours as Valley Forge and Arnold's treachery, for "from scenes like these" our largest strength must rise.

Below Newburgh Bay, as we entered the Gate of the Highlands, we saw the long scar upon the rocky western side and around Storm King, of the new motor road which is being cut into the mountain wall. It reminds you of the Axenstrasse on Lake Lucerne, though I know of no tunnels here, and it will offer a wonderfully beautiful roadway and entrancing views.

Not far from West Point, and opposite, we passed the little island where the Misses Warner lived, and one sister created the famous "Wide, Wide World," and "Queechy," more familiar doubtless to the gray-haired now than to the younger generations who scorn "The Lamplighter" and "Ministering Children," and have been reared as to literary tastes upon the colored supplement of the Sunday newspaper. "Facilis decorous!" Doubtless "Queechy" was lachrymose, and sobbed too much for a healthy girl, but the gloom of the story was less trying than that of Hall Caine's stories, or the vagaries of the theology of H. G. Wells, whose guesses at history sow the seed of destructive doubt which bear fruit in a religion without morals or a Bible.

The Government may think my criticism of the later building enterprises at West Point is ill-based, but the huge stone building which presents to the river a long and high wall, unrelieved by any device of æsthetic architecture, simply hides the grace and beauty of the great parade ground, and the buildings beyond. Perhaps war is too grave to sympathize with beauty, but I miss the natural grace of the river bank, with its Kosciusko statue and arching trees.

As we near Tappan Zee, the lake formed by the widening of the Hudson, we are again in the land of legend, history and romance. We are passing through the neutral ground of the Revolution, which Cooper loved, and near which he lived. Quite near the track is Sleepy Hollow Cemetery, where lies Washington Irving, and later, our fellow townsman, Andrew Carnegie, and even in this sunny afternoon we see the ghostly form of the Headless Horseman, and hear the hoofbeats of his pursuing steed upon the little wooden bridge. André and his captors pass beside our train, with the gathering shadows of his deplorable end, across the river, where the Americans are encamped. Beneath the bank, shadowed by shubbery and trees, our train passes, and we catch no glimpse of Sunnyside, Irving's picturesque home, and soon the precipitous Palisades across the river shut out all views except of their crags.

Crossing the Harlem, we ride through the noisy city, probably the largest in the world, catching glimpses from the car windows of each street we cross high up, with children playing, and busy crowds. Here again, as we see, though it is late in the afternoon, the windows of even respectable apartments filled with pillows and bedding airing for the nightly use, and once a boy on a high roof trying to fly a kite, the memory of the clean and charming villages in the Walkill Valley create wonder and a sigh for these who repeat the prophet's vision of a happy city, only because the children are playing in the streets. (Zech. 8:5.)

We shall not tarry in this metropolis. It has its treasures of art and science, of wealth and power, and there are here devout, earnest and powerful preachers, and around them noble men and women living those first sentences of the Lord's Prayer. But let no one seek it unnecessarily. It is less productive of true happiness and character and the finer results than many a smaller city, or less notorious town. Most of its greatness comes from the inland cities and homes. Its leaders are not indigenous, and Mr. Bryan, in his great address on Prohibition at the Council of the Reformed Churches in Pittsburgh, truly said: "New York imagines it is all-wise and that its judgments are always correct, but it never began a reform, and it is antagonistic to real progress." It could not be otherwise with a Jewish population no other city knows, more Italians than in Rome, more Russians than many cities of Russia contains a yeasty mass of foreigners, who placed in power a Mayor who gave the honors of the city to the widow of the Irishman who committed suicide in prison! My critic, perhaps, says they make money; but I recall the recent remark of a friend of men, successful in a great business, that it does not require large brains or high character to obtain wealth.

Then, in the morning, we traverse New Jersey, watching from the train, as we pass the Junction, the stately towers and great buildings of the University at Princeton, on the gentle slope, and we recall Matthew Arnold's haunting description of Oxford and its dreamy gardens, and the spirits of the past. There, near where the bell on old Nassau strikes the hours across a campus once filled with battling soldiers, rest Witherspoon and Jonathan Edwards and Aaron Burr and McCosh and Warfield, and others who here sought the highest knowledge, or returned to sleep the dreamless sleep, where youth forever gather, hope forever is cherished, romance is nursed, and visions gained, and, beneath the whispering ivy on the walls, many a lad finds a finer manhood and a nobler purpose, or is too weak to rise.

MICHIGAN LETTER.

BY REV. WILLIAM BRYANT, D.D.

The Presbytery of Detroit did several wise things at its annual fall meeting, and not the least of these was the restoration of Foreign Missions to the dignity of a separate department. It had been merely an appendix to Home Missions and Church Extension, and, very naturally, presbytery hardly knew that such an organization as Foreign Missions still remained in the Presbyterian ecclesia. We may be pardoned also for expressing the opinion that another very wise action was in rejecting both of the General Assembly overtures, that on a double term for some commissioners and that on "female deacons." It was certainly wise to give to General Education a separate department, instead of lumping it with all agencies. Incidentally, it was a right thing to place Dr. J. W. Cochran at the head of that committee.

The church at Big Rapids had the misfortune, last winter, to lose its edifice by fire. But the people were not discouraged, and are planning to have, in a few months, a building worthy of such a live church. Rev. Carl L. Attig is the pastor. One advantage of the enlarged building is that there is to be ample room for the big class of students, taught by Professor Masselink, of the Ferris Institute, which occupies a large place in the prosperity of Big Rapids. As many as 186 were enrolled in the class last year, and this year it will probably run over 200.

We are lamenting the decreased number of candidates for the ministry, but there is one phase of this matter which has pained your correspondent particularly in his oversight of candidates, and that is the large proportion of those who are received by presbytery, and who seem full of enthusiasm for the work, but who, long before their course is completed, drop out, and enter some commercial occupation. Granted that we need consecrated lawyers, doctors, bankers and merchants as certainly as we need ministers, yet how are we to maintain the ministry if the pulpits are depleted, and there is no stirring invitation to our boys to devote themselves to the service of Christ?

We are expecting a large attendance and a fine meeting of synod at Grand Rapids, Oct. 11th to 13th.

Trumbull Avenue Church of Detroit is this week dedicating its new church house and also its fortieth anniversary as a church. Its pastors have been Drs. A. W. Dulles, Robert J. Service, Henry T. Miller, William T. Jaquess, R. M. Huston, all of whom, except Dr. Miller, deceased, are on the program for the celebration. Rev. Harold C. Warren is the present pastor. This church was organized by members of Fort Street Church, some of the elders coming from that church, with an unselfish spirit, worthy of large imitation. Too often men of the caliber of the first session of Trumbull Avenue Church decline to make the sacrifice of leaving the mother church to become the backbone of a new enterprise. The remarkable success of this church through its forty years of history is due quite as much to these noble men as to the ability of the eminent pastors who have led the enterprise, and those certainly have been men who realized their wonderful opportunity and made the most of it.

This week we have Dr. G. Campbell Morgan with us, conducting that particular type of evangelistic meetings in which he stands pre-eminent. He is not only very popular in Detroit, but he always leaves a good influence behind him, after the meetings, which are always crowded.

On Monday morning, Oct. 3, Dr. G. Campbell Morgan addressed the ministers of all denominations at the Detroit Y. M. C. A., on "The Authority of the Bible." He spoke of the Old Testament as the cry of human need, and the New Testament as the answer to that cry in Jesus Christ. The Bible is the final authority. Dr. Morgan had the undivided attention of the large body of ministers included in the Pastors' Union. He gave twelve addresses last week in Detroit.

At noon of this same day the Presbyterian ministers met for a luncheon in honor of Rev. James Davis MacDonald, who is soon to leave us to accept a call to Tucson, Arizona. The speeches referred to the valuable work Mr. MacDonald has done, not only as pastor of Highland Park Church for over eighteen years, but for his activity in having the Bible read in the public schools and in keeping Highland Park free from saloons for its entire history as a village, now grown to nearly 50,000 population.

Henry Ford, of Detroit, is known to the outside world for many reasons, but his latest move is beyond all criticism, political or financial. He has bought a big tract of hardwood timber in the Upper Peninsula, and has declared that by careful selection of the trees to be cut down, and by reforestation he will have more valuable timber on this land in ten years than he has today. That is worth mentioning in these days of wholesale destruction of our forests.

It is difficult to believe perhaps, but it is established on unquestionable evidence by a careful series of experiments, that in Detroit the underfed children are not the Polish, Italian and Hungarian population, as we might naturally suppose, but the children of native born Americans. The answer probably is that the Americans rather than foreigners pamper their children with food lacking in nutrition, while the foreigners, not because of special knowledge of vitamins, proteids and calories, give their children bread and butter and milk, from force of habit. It sometimes pays not to know too much.

We have an interesting letter from a New Jersey pastor, formerly from Michigan, telling of some of the trials that a pastor must meet in that region; and he concludes by saying that only as a Pauline, Augustinian, Calvinist can he maintain his faith that righteousness will finally triumph. He is not the only minister who in these days needs to fall back on the fundamentals to escape losing his faith in the future; for the devil is more politely busy than ever in the world's history, and in many different lines from the coarseness of a California movie-crowd orgy.

ARKANSAS LETTER.

BY REV. C. E. HAYES, D.D.

I am writing this letter at Pittsburgh, Pa., the largest Presbyterian center in the United States, and the city which has the honor to entertain the eleventh meeting of the Alliance of the Reformed Churches holding the Presbyterian system. The presiding officer is Rev. William Park, D.D., Belfast, Ireland. There are about 350 delegates in attendance, sixty of these coming from Europe. The various Presbyterian bodies in this council represent a constituency of over 40,000,000 people. The Pittsburgh churches have entertained the alliance in the most hospitable manner. Perhaps the greatest day during the sittings of this council was Sept. 21st, when William Jennings Bryan made his address on World Wide Prohibition. Many of the delegates from abroad will remain in the United States for several months before returning to their homes. I am delighted to have had the privilege of being one of the members of this body.

Rev. Richard W. Lewis, D.D., who has been holding evangelistic meetings since the first of July in Arkansas, has just closed a great meeting in the Grannis Church, with ninety-eight professions and fifty-three additions to the church. He is now in the midst of a fine meeting at Cove. I am sure every church that Dr. Lewis has visited has been greatly blessed.

It is not too early for me to call attention to our synodical meeting at Russellville, beginning Oct. 18th. The pastor of this church is Rev. W. Lynn Hurie, D.D. He would be pleased to have the names of all who expect to attend the meeting at an early date. I trust that this will be one of the greatest meetings of history in the Synod of Arkansas. I shall leave Pittsburgh on the 21st and arrive in Arkansas on the 22d and will be in two churches during Sept. 25th.

CLEVELAND LETTER.

BY REV. GEORGE A. MACKINTOSH, D.D.

Cleveland Heights Church, Dr. W. F. Dickens-Lewis, pastor, began an extensive addition to their edifice last week. Dr. Thomas J. Mason, rector of the Church of the Epiphany, gave the address at the preparatory service on Friday night. Dr. Lewis is one of the instructors at one of the four training schools for workers, carried on under the auspices of the Cleveland Sabbath-school Association. These schools opened Friday night with an attendance of over five hundred.

Dr. Charles G. Darling, the new pastor at Boulevard Church, welcomed thirty-five new members last Sabbath. Lakewood Church, Rev. A. J. Wright, received sixteen; Windermere Church, Rev. L. F. Ruf, received seven, and Immanuel Church four.

Bolton Church, Rev. Elliott Field, D.D., pastor, is rejoicing over the new interest in the church since Rally Day. Various contests and plans contributed to this result.

Windermere Church contributed, on a recent Sabbath, money for a $100 scholarship for Pikeville College.

The Chinese and Syrian Sabbath schools of the Old Stone Church were opened on a recent Sabbath, after being closed during the summer, and show renewed interest.

Prof. Samuel B. Plattner, for many years an elder in the Church of the Covenant, died at sea recently, while on his way with his wife to spend a year in Italy to complete a book that had been interrupted by the war.

Dr. Paul F. Sutphin preached a notable sermon recently on "Abraham Lincoln," which has been printed and circulated by his officers.

Dr. H. M. Gilbert, a field secretary of the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation, filled the pulpit of Calvary Church last Sabbath, speaking on "Heroes of Flesh and Blood."

A sermon preached at the Old Stone Church in July by Dr. Paul R. Hickok, of Troy, N. Y., and an address on "The Bible," given by Dr. Meldrum at a mass meeting of the men's Bible classes, have been put in print, and are being circulated by the church.

A conference on evangelism will be held this week, Oct. 17th to 21st, under the auspices of the Federated Churches organization. The speakers will be Rev. Clarence A. Barbour, D.D., president of Rochester Theological Seminary; Dr. John Timothy Stone, of Chicago; Prof. George Albert Coe, Dr. John H. Finley, Dr. Sidney Gulick, Dr. Christian F. Reiser and Mrs. Sherwin Eddy. Presbyterian ministers and elders are to have a supper conference with Dr. Stone on personal evangelism.

EAST TENNESSEE NOTES.

BY REV. ROBERT I. GAMON, D.D.

Circulating through this section of the synod, one is impelled to ask, where is the old-fashioned elder, who used to visit the flock as an officer of the church?

May we also suggest that the successful pastor is the one who spends as much time as possible in the homes of his people, not so much socially as with definite religious purposes? The time is past when a minister is only a preacher to meet his appointments at stated times.

Rally Day will be observed at New Prospect Church Oct. 9th. This is one of the churches that is able to go forward with its program even without a pastor. Rev. A. J. Coile, D.D., will be present to conduct the preaching service.

The Knoxville Second Church began its work under the new pastor on Oct. 2d. At the communion service in the morning twenty-six members were received. The installation took place at night, and Rev. Horace Cady Wilson is now pastor. The moderator of presbytery, Rev. W. E. Graham, D.D., presided and propounded the constitutional questions; Rev. W. P. Stevenson, D.D., preached the sermon; Rev. S. M. Glasgow, D.D., delivered the charge to the pastor, and Rev. J. S. Eakirl, D.D., to the people. There were other ministers who took part in the service: Rev. W. M. Gilliam, Rev. J. K. Giffin, Rev. J. H. Miller, Rev. Angus McDonald and Rev. W. R. Dawson.

The Rally Day exercises at the Greeneville Sunday school, on Oct. 2d, gave to all the evidence of renewed interest. The attendance reached 337, with a goal of 300. The men's Bible class alone numbered 106. Hon. J. E. Biddle is the teacher. At a reception for the elders and deacons, given by the pastor, Rev. Jere A. Moore, a contest was introduced, consisting of fourteen questions, such as, "Name two doctrines of the Presbyterian Church." Another is, "How many members in the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A." Here is a good suggestion for any pastor.

During the past three years the three presbyteries in this part of the synod have increased their contributions by 100 per cent. Chattanooga has jumped from $6,484 in 1919 to $11,356 in 1921. The per capita gift is $5.20. Holston increased from $2,930 in 1919 to $5,341 in 1921. This is $3.40 per capita. Union gave in 1919 $14,041, and in 1921 $28,589. The per capita gift is $6.

Knoxville, Tenn., Oct. 7th.

NEW PUBLICATIONS

Making the Bible Real. By Frederic Breeding Oxtoby. Cloth. $1.00 Fleming H. Revell Company, New York.

Dr. Oxtoby is Professor of Biblical Literature and Religious Education in Huron College, and shows his competency for his chair by the production of this valuable and attractive volume on the study of the Bible. It is a book to read and to study, and is well illustrated with maps and charts, so that its readers are well started in getting information about the books and the countries of the Scriptures.

The Economic Eden, and Other Sermons. By Frederick F. Shannon. Cloth. $1.25. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York.

This is another attractive volume of sermons from the brilliant preacher of the Central Church of Chicago, the successor of Dr. Gunsaulus and Dr. Hillis. He has issued several other volumes of sermons. They are readable and are profitable, throbbing with spiritual vitality, and robust with intellectual strength.

William McCutchan Morrison: Twenty Years in Central Africa. Paper. 50 cents. Presbyterian Committee of Publication, Richmond, Va. By Rev. T. C. Vinson.

This is a most interesting account of the life and work of a devoted and useful foreign missionary of the Southern Presbyterian Church. The writer says he had material for a much larger and fuller volume, but was compelled to condense. The missionary was a very attractive and forceful Christian character, and his early death was a great loss to a great cause. The iniquities of the Belgian administration on the Congo necessarily have a large place in the biography.

Old Testament Prophecy. By Frank K. Sanders. Cloth. $1.25. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York.

This is an interesting study of some of the spiritual work done by the great preachers of righteousness of the Old Testament. The writer has been well known as a professor of Biblical Literature in Yale University. The presentation of the Old Testament prophets takes into consideration their duties to the people at the various critical ages in which they were called to serve, and study is made of the evils they had to meet and the difficulties they aroused the nation to face and overcome. The element of predictive prophecy, calling for the special inspiration of the revealing Spirit of God, is too lightly passed over, or ignored, as in the case of supposing a second Isaiah. No study is satisfactory which does not take into full consideration the fact that the predictions of prophecy and their fulfillment are one proof of the distinct divine inspiration of the Holy Scriptures.

Making Good in Business. By Roger W. Babson. Cloth. $1.25. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York.

The author of this thoughtful and thought-compelling "self-help" book is the well-known president of the great Babson's Statistical Organization, whose counsel has so much weight in the financial affairs of our nation. This is a book that is well worth heeding by young men entering business, as it is full of the most valuable sort of hints and suggestions for the attainment of a successful career. It is a book that is worthy of careful reading and study.

Self-Help in Teaching. By Huber W. Hurt. Cloth. $1.25. The Macmillan Company, New York.

This is a thoughtful and helpful book for those who are engaged in teaching and who wish to make a real success of their work. Those who are teachers must not simply get over certain lessons, but they must keep on growing so that their pupils shall also grow. The suggestions in this concise and analytical little manual are valuable for those who really wish to be growing teachers and who would do work that is to be of lasting value.

To Be or Not To Be. By S. D. Chambers. Cloth. $1.25. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York.

This is a volume of short addresses or sermons to children. They are thoughtful, religious, sturdy, Christian addresses. They are such as compel those who listen to them to look up and think. The great matters of faith are put distinctly and forcefully, and, while they are just adapted to the capacities of children, they are calculated to make them think and believe and act, in the fear and love of God.

Self-Development. A Handbook for the Ambitious. By H. Addington Bruce. Cloth. $1.50. Funk & Wagnalls Company, New York.

It is not often that one finds so much really valuable, everyday, sensible counsel packed into the compass afforded by the pages of this invigorating and wholesome volume. The author seeks to stimulate his readers to high ambitions in seeking a large and high place in life, but he does not believe that all the wealth and fame and power imaginable can take the place of real character. It is then, in the first place, to stimulate his readers and all young people to a true self-development that he writes. He believes that he who becomes great himself can accomplish all greatness.

The Lure of the Leopard Skin. Cloth. $1.25. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York.

This is a missionary story from beginning to ending, and full of the fine spirit of missions, but it is told in a way to attract and hold the attention of those who think highly of adventures. A young man goes into that part of Africa where Roosevelt hunted, seeking for game himself. He finds much and what he did with it is told in a vigorous way. But he comes across some missionaries, and, instead of avoiding them, falls in with them, and gets full of their spirit. All this adds interest and power and makes it a fine book.

Every Day Poems. By George Elliston. Cloth. $1.50. Stewart Kidd Company, Cincinnati.

Those who have been acquainted with the newspaper folk of Cincinnati have known the enterprising, talented and sincere little woman who has written this book of poems, and while they applaud her for her ambition and industry, they congratulate her upon her real success. There are no mere surface and shimmering rhymes on these pages. All the expressions are sincere outbreathings of real thought and feeling and desire. What if a great many of these verses are constructed without much rhythm or much respect for rhyme? They are none the worse for moving on a little ruggedly. They express the everyday feelings of a real woman, and they are poetry in essence even if not always in meticulous form.

Methods With Beginners. By Frances Weld Donaldson. Cloth. 60 cents. Pilgrim Press, Boston.

This is a well-prepared volume of suggestions and instructions as to Sabbath-school work for little children, and is approved by the "Sunday-school Council of Evangelical Denominations." Many points are covered as to the matter and manner of teaching, and of dealing wisely and well with the little beginners.

The Silver Bear. By Edna A. Brown. Cloth. $1.50. Lothrop, Lee and Shepard Co., Boston.

This is a very fine little story, in a beautifully printed and illustrated book for little girls, but good for much older people. It tells very charmingly about two little girls, and the pleasant things they did one beautiful summer, with books and picnics and many lovely matters for vacation enjoyment.

Safed and Keturah. By Rev. William E. Barton, D.D. Cloth. $1.25. The Pilgrim Press, Boston.

The parables, in various series and volumes, from the pen of Safed and the Sage, otherwise Dr. Barton, are all of them very readable, and many of them very rich in suggestions. Many of them contain lessons of homely wisdom, carried on a current of humor, so that they are pleasantly received and long remembered. This is a very interesting collection of them in this volume.

When Gretel Was Fifteen. By Nina Rhoades. Cloth. $1.75. Lothrop, Lee & Shepard, Boston.

This is a book for young girls, as may be guessed from the title, and it tells the story, in an entertaining way, of an enterprising girl who was forced in early life to take up real duties and to make her way. There is a good deal of real young womanhood developed in her life, and the story is one that will help other girls to think and to plan and to work.

Dorothy Dainty's Red Letter Days. By Amy Brooks. Cloth. $1.35. Lothrop, Lee and Shepard Co., Boston.

For a good many years this delightful series of books for little girls has been coming out, year after year, until each new one is looked for in glad anticipation. It is, perhaps, enough to say that this is worthy of its place in the procession, and that as a story and in its appearance it will please all those who have been in the habit of being pleased by reading of dainty little Dorothy.

The King's Trumpet. By Jasper Seaton Hughes. Cloth. $2. Published by the Author, Holland, Mich.

Dr. Hughes has given much study to the Book of the Revelation, and has delivered many sermons and lectures on it, and now he has prepared in its present form this attractive volume, containing the sum of his discoveries as to its contents and meaning. One takes up newspaper work, one works at home decorating, and the third has aspirations for the stage. WYOMING.

Rev. C. A. Marshall, of Casper, 1009 North Durbin Street, has a newly organized church, among 2,000 people, where his is the only evangelical church. He is visiting from house to house, and would be very thankful for church and Sabbath-school papers and picture cards left over, in good condition, to distribute in his work.

Rev. Hugh W. Rankin, Synodical Superintendent of Sabbath-School Work for years in Utah, Colorado and Wyoming, is to spend the fall and winter in Indiana, presenting the cause. He has had thirty years of pioneer work in the Rocky Mountains, and has organized many churches which have developed from Sabbath schools which he started in the early days. Hundreds have been converted during that time in his evangelistic services. Fifty-seven signed cards in North Casper this last month, and the church was aroused to work with deep consecration. He can unfold tales of cow-boys attempting to break up his meetings, which Owen Wister might have weaved into The Virginian with telling effect; saloons converted into meeting houses, towns gone dry before the Volstead Act became a law; one saloon-keeper in a mining town piously wished to heaven that preacher would quit the town, for he was not making his salt; a Jew in a railroad division point, on Mr. Rankin's second visit, hailed him with delight, was glad to see him back, saying, "I believe in your kind of religion, for after your last revival a lot of my bad accounts were settled by your converts." When the history of Presbyterianism in the Rocky Mountains is written his name will be associated with Sheldon Jackson and Thomas Kirkwood, as a pioneer organizer. He was a deacon in the Central Church of Denver, when Dr. George P. Hays, afterwards Moderator of the General Assembly, discovered his talents and sent him out on trial trips to Brighton, Brush and Ft. Morgan to organize Sabbath schools and churches and he has been active in the work ever since, doing the work of an evangelist. His itinerary will be arranged by Mr. John M. Somerndike, Witherspoon Building, Philadelphia, with whom any desiring to hear him may communicate.—Henry W. Bainton, S. C.

Thompson, of Des Moines, Iowa, evangelist, is holding successful meetings in the presbytery.—Ralph J. Lamb, S. C.

Hodges showed that during the past thirteen years the membership of the presbytery has increased 31 per cent, and the offerings to the boards 724 per cent. The next meeting will be in Corsicana.—W. B. Preston, S. C.

LOWRY—Rev. W. S. Lowry was born sixty-two years ago near Smithville, Va., lived there until his early manhood, when he entered the Southwestern Presbyterian University, at Columbia, S. C. He graduated from this institution, then took a course in medicine at Johns Hopkins University in Baltimore. After leaving Johns Hopkins, he went overseas to the New College, Theological Seminary, in Edinburgh, Scotland. He remained abroad two years, when he returned to this country. He was licensed to preach by the Western District Presbytery of Tennessee in 1884, before he went to Edinburgh to study. He was ordained in 1886 by the Presbytery of Dallas, Texas. He had charge of the following churches: McKinney, Texas; Kurka Springs, Ark.; Princeton, Ky.; Evanston, Ind.; The Church of the Redeemer, in Los Angeles, Cal., and a church in Berkeley, Cal. In 1912 he became pastor-at-large for the Presbytery of Walla Walla, Washington. He continued serving in this capacity successfully until the spring of 1917. In the fall of that year he became the pastor of the Asotin Church. For two and one-half years he served that church most acceptably. In the spring of 1920 he was called to the Wapato field, and had great success in his work there. In the first year he had the privilege and honor of receiving over seventy persons into the church. He carried his people on his heart in all his churches, and was indefatigable in his efforts to build them up in faith and good works. June 27 of this year he left Wapato for a two months' vacation, autoing to Livermore, Cal., where he had a small ranch. He had not been feeling well for some time, though he cherished no serious apprehensions of being in a critical condition of health. However, he had been at Livermore only a few days until he was attacked by a virulent type of erysipelas. This attack came on the 15th of July and he died on the 18th. He seemed doomed from the first, on account of his extreme exhaustion, for he had worked to the last limit of his strength. The funeral services were held in Livermore Presbyterian Church, Rev. Ficus, pastor of the church, officiating. Mr. Lowry is survived by his wife and a son, who lives in Los Angeles, and a daughter, at present in New York City. He was a devoted minister, thoroughly educated, very capable and of sound judgment, with ability to get along anywhere. He built up every work he took in hand. He is remembered for his single-mindedness to promote the kingdom of God, to minister to the members of his congregation spiritually and to interest himself in everything pertaining to the welfare of the community. The clerk of session of the Wapato Church writes of him, that "He always kept in mind the building up of the church and the erection of a new building, and said very little about his own feelings." Mr. Lowry was a man who took an interest in the problems in the community worth while. He was one of the men who do the world's work quietly and persistently, looking to God for his reward. A memorial service was held for Mr. Lowry at the Wapato Church, of which he was pastor at the time of his death, and another, at the Asotin Church, from which he went to his last charge. At both these services very appreciative tributes to Mr. Lowry's worth and faithfulness were spoken. His wife and children were very lovingly commended to the comforting mercies of the Lord whom their father and husband had so earnestly served during his whole ministry. James H. Shields.

AN INDIAN LULLABY.

The wind is whispering that day is done.
Sleep, sleep my little papoose.
The flowers are nodding good-night to the sun.

Sleep, sleep my little papoose.
Mother will watch while her small brave goes

Off to the land where the dream tree grows,
And the wonderful river of Wish-come-true flows.

Sleep, sleep my little papoose.
The stars are beginning to wink in the sky—

Sleep, sleep my little papoose.
And the moon looks on you with big round eye.

Sleep, sleep my little papoose.
Mother will guard her small brave from fright,

So rest and grow all the long, long night.
Nor wake till the sun brings back the light.

Sleep, sleep my little papoose.

THE SAILOR BOY'S MOTHER.

The faithful servant who in my childhood days went by the name of "Cookie" remains still a very prominent figure in my memory-picture.

The sight of orange marmalade (somewhat irrelevantly suggests to me the hymn, "There's a land of pure delight," because for some unexplained reason, she always sang it, in subdued tones, when busy over the manufacture of that article.

When engaged in jam-making she never failed to choose "Though troubles assail," and if pressed for an explanation would only say it was a "way" she had got into and saw no reason for giving it up.

I was only tolerated in the kitchen on very rare occasions, which to me were red-letter days because I could lead Cookie into conversation. I learned that in her childhood she was one of "a long family" and had begun to work for her living at ten years old. This she considered as the right and proper thing for youth; and she held "eddication" to be a mistake.

"I can read a bit, and what more do I want?" she would say. "Seems to me that when I stand afore the judgment seat the Lord won't ask how far I've got in 'rithmetic, or what I know of jography. He'll be for asking if I've lived honest and done my daily work as well as I know how, and I hope I'll answer 'Yes.'"

A proud and happy mother was Cookie when, in a clean white apron, she would come upstairs to ask if "Master" or "Missie" would read her the letter which had just come from her boy.

There came one day in late October when my father laid down the Times with an exclamation of something like horror.

"Isn't Joe Collyer's ship the 'Adelaide'?" he asked.

There was a chorus of "yes."

"Well, then, the 'Adelaide' has gone down and all on board perished."

The paragraph was read aloud—no! it was not another "Adelaide." Joe was lost like his father before him, and what could be done to comfort his mother?

No one would accept the duty of breaking the news to her; it must be done, of course.

Strangely enough, Cookie began about that time to talk more than usual of her boy.

"It's pleasant to think that I'm to have him home for his holiday on my birthday, for he always tries to spend it with me." she would say with a smile. Besides, she "felt in her bones," that he would soon be back, and though we never quite understood what she meant by that assertion, we had heard it so often that we knew it meant absolutely certainty, and that further argument was useless.

Inquiries were made of the owners of the "Adelaide"—They could only repeat the tidings that all on board had perished.

I can remember now the awful silence which fell upon us all, as we heard the door of the library close behind our dear old servant who had come from the kitchen hearing that she was "wanted," and never guessed that she was about to hear that her plans and her hopes were useless.

The interview seemed long; at any rate to us who waited. At last it came to an end, and mother returned, looking rather bewildered.

"I told her."

"And what did she say?"

She said it was very kind of 'the Master' to take so much trouble, but he need not have done it. Joe would come back safe and sound, and she must soon be seeing about getting a room ready for him in the gardener's cottage."

We decided that the sudden shock had unhinged her brain—poor Cookie was slightly off her head and must be watched carefully.

However, though the household was on the alert, no symptoms of mental weakness no indisposition of any kind could be detected. The supposed invalid seemed well and cheerful, and managed kitchen affairs just as she had always done.

We avoided speaking of Joe as much as possible, but we knew that her constant thought was of his speedy return.

We were in November, when again the Times was destined to astonish us—this time agreeably.

It announced that two of the missing crew of the "Adelaide" had been picked up by an outgoing vessel, and, having waited at a distant port for a chance return, were only just landed in London.

Here were tidings to take to the kitchen, and yet we thought the wiser plan would be to wait till Joe himself made his safety known.

One day a tall, trim, manly fellow in sailor's dress was seen coming up the carriage drive and making for the kitchen entrance as one who was familiar with the place—but it did not seem possible that this should be the boyish, rather "lubberly" fellow we had last seen. He was intercepted, and invited into the hall so that any surprise might not come too suddenly on Cookie.

"Yes," he said. "We were picked up by another ship and I could not get word of it sent for ever so long. Does mother know?"

"She would never believe you were lost; she is expecting you. Go and find her and she will say that her words have come true indeed."

Cookie was triumphant. Here was proof positive that the "feeling in her bones," had not played her false. But when Joe sat down and described the terrors of that night at sea, or how—but for what might seem chance, yet was surely God's providence—he had so nearly perished like others of the ships crew, Cookie cried with joy and thankfulness.

A GOOD MOTTO.

Is life a fret and tangle?
And everything gone wrong?
Are friends a bit disloyal,
And enemies too strong?
Is there no bright side showing?
Then—as a sage hath said—
"Polish up the dark side,
And look at that instead!"

The darkest plank of oak will show
Sometimes the finest grain;
The roughest rock will sometimes yield
A gleaming golden vein;
Don't rail at fate, declaring
That no brightness shows ahead,
But "polish up the dark side,
And look at that instead!"

—Priscilla Leonard.

A MEASURE OF LEAVEN.

BY WILLIE C. PAGE.

Mrs. Ellis was busily finishing some little garments, when above the whir of the sewing machine she heard a car come to a standstill on the curb near her home. Soon she heard a soft tap on the door. "Come in," she called out cheerily. "Why, Marion, my dear, I am so glad you came by this morning. I was just going to telephone you to carry me out to the factory district in your car. There have been much sickness and distress among the workers of late. I am making these little clothes for the sick children."

"A modern Dorcas," said the pretty, popular Mrs. Hillton.

After chatting pleasantly for a while, Mrs. Ellis said: "Marion, how are your new neighbors? We hear that little Robbie has been quite ill."

"Why, Aunt Elinor, I really don't know anything about them. I have actually been afraid to call for fear they would worry me by borrowing or trespassing. I do not care for new people. I did see the doctor go to their home early this morning."

"My child, there is an ancient custom that we of modern times can ill afford to disregard—the gracious and friendly habit of being neighborly."

"I am friendly to people I like, but I don't go around visiting all kinds of outsiders and inviting them to our home. I have enough to attend to my own affairs," said Marion Hillton.

"Yes, often the cares of life and the absorption of our affairs make us forget to be neighborly. Sometimes weeks will pass without even exchanging a pleasant greeting. 'Love thy neighbor as thyself' is being forgotten in the stress of times, I fear," replied her aunt.

"Oh, I never refuse to speak to people," said Mrs. Hillton.

Mrs. Ellis wrapped the garments and got a well-filled basket. "Come, first we will go to the factory, then to visit your neighbors," she said.

Leaving her niece in the car, Mrs. Ellis made many calls and kindly inquiries, leaving delicacies here and clothing there. Wherever there was sickness or distress she went, carrying sunshine and good cheer. Mrs. Ellis saw by Marion's face that she was thinking seriously.

In response to their ring the new neighbor opened the door. They saw at once she had been weeping. She invited them to a room where a little boy lay with his throat bandaged, his face flushed with fever. "Yes," said Mrs. Newcome, "I have been up all night for more than a week. Our little Robbie has been very sick. His father works at night. We are strangers; so no one has called."

"Ise so tired, muizzer. Hold me in your arms, but don't hurt me. Ise so tired," moaned the little boy.

This appealing cry touched the heart of Mrs. Hillton to its deepest chord. "Let me take care of Robbie and amuse him while you sleep."

glad smile brightened the tear-stained eyes of the young mother. "I shall be so glad if you will."

And this was the measure of leaven that changed the whole town from one of ultra exclusiveness to one of loving kindness. Each vied with the other in service of love and the spirit of unselfishness in doing good. No stranger came within its gates that was not visited and made to feel at home.

"REASON."

The lion cub was taught by his mother the humiliating lesson that, in spite of his greater strength, he must never venture an encounter with a man. But when he grew older, in his conceit he fancied that he could neglect his mother's lesson, and he set out to find a man. First he came upon an ox.

"Are you a man?" he asked.

"God forbid!" answered the ox. "A man is a terrible creature. He makes slaves of us oxen, fastening us to plows, which we have to pull until we are tired to death. When we are old and can work no more he kills us and eats our flesh, and our skin he makes into shoes for his own feet. Keep clear of men!" the ox ended solemnly.

Impressed, but unconvinced, the lion continued his way until he saw a camel, big, long-legged, strong.

"Are you a man?" he questioned.

"I a man?" snorted the camel. "Why, I am a slave to a man. They catch us, these men, pierce our noses, put rings in them tie ropes to the rings and lead us wherever they will. And on our backs they put great loads, which we must carry. Don't say man to me!"

Still undiscouraged, the lion went on and soon met an elephant—a mountain in size, with huge tusks—tied to a stake.

"Good morning, my lord," he said. "Are you a man?"

"Hooroo!" trumpeted the elephant. "A man? No! But a man is my master, and he has tied me to this post. Men are cruel brutes. They mount us, a dozen of them at a time, and drive us by sticking a sharp spike in our heads. Don't go near a man, he will make mincemeat of a little creature like you!"

The lion was now very much puzzled. As he walked along, he met a little, puny thing, walking upright on two legs, looking something like a monkey.

"My friend," said the lion, "can you tell me where I can find a man?"

"I am a man," was the reply.

The lion was incredulous. "Why, you are not a strong creature!" he exclaimed. "I am much stronger than you."

"Oh, no, you are not," answered the man. For I have a power that you lack, the power of reason."

"What is reason?" asked the lion.

"I will show you," returned the man.

Now the man was a woodcutter, and he had his ax on his shoulder. With a few blows he split a stout sapling and then made a wedge and drove in into the cleft.

"Just put your claw in that crack!" he said to the lion.

Obediently, the lion did so, and the man knocked out the wedge. "There," he said when he saw that the lion was safely caught, "that is reason."

But the lion could not free himself and at last died there.—From "Hindu Stories in American Negro Folk-Lore," by W. Norman Brown, in "Asia" Magazine.

SEEDS AND WORDS.

I dropped a seed beside a path,
And went my busy way,
Till chance or fate—I say not which—
Led me, one summer day,
Along the self-same path, and lo!
A flower blooming there,
As fair as eye hath looked upon,
And sweet as it was fair.

I dropped a sympathetic word,
Nor stayed to watch it grow,
For little tending's needed, when
The seed is good we sow;
But once I met the man again,
And by the gladsome way
He took my hand I knew I sowed
The best of seed that day.

TIM'S GAME.

School was out now, and Carlton felt that he could do as he pleased all day long. He spent most of the time playing at the barn or down at the pasture branch or out at the fields where the men were at work. He seldom came to the house from morning until dinner time. Then he was always very hungry, and mother always had a good dinner ready for him and his father and little sister Lula. If he had noticed, he would have seen that mother always looked tired when he came in to dinner; and if he had thought about it, he would have known that she had to bring in several buckets of water from the well, besides many other things that a boy ten years old could do as well as play all the time. But somehow he did not notice, and he did not think. Mother knew that if she waited for Carlton to notice and think she would have to keep on doing everything herself all summer. But she thought about how long he had been going to school and how glad he must be to get out, and she kept on bringing wood and water and doing other things and let him play all day long for a whole week.

Then, as Carlton came up to the house one Monday morning, he was surprised to find a notice written in large letters on a piece of white paper pinned to the kitchen door, "Boy Wanted Here."

Carlton did not go in just then. After a while his mother heard a knock at the kitchen door, and when she opened it there stood Carlton in overalls and wide straw hat.

"Morn' lady!" he said, taking the big hat from his head. "My name is Tim. I came here to get a job if you want a boy. I haven't had any breakfast."

"I am glad you came, Tim," said the lady. "I need a boy about your size very much. Are you hungry?"

"No'm, not much," said Tim. "I can begin work right now if you want me to."

"What can you do, Tim? And what wages are you willing to work for?"

"I can carry in wood and bring water and cut some wood, too, if the logs are not too big. I can go to the store for you and—and I can set the table, and wash dishes and sweep floors; but I don't like too much. I will help you do that kind of work, though sometimes, till your little girl grows up big enough to help you," he said, glancingly at Lula, who was standing behind her mother, laughing.

"I think you are just the boy I want, Tim. I should like to engage you right off if we can agree about the wages."

"Oh," said Tim, "never mind about that. Wait till next Saturday."

"Very well, you may consider yourself engaged for a week. Would you mind feeding the little chickens while I finish getting breakfast ready? Here is some wheat. You will not have any trouble to find the coops. They are in the back yard."

Away ran the boy in the overalls and big straw hat, and when breakfast was ready he came in with rosy cheeks and a hearty appetite. "Tim," was a willing helper about the place all that week. Mother didn't look nearly so tired after he came. And the strangest part about it was that "Tim" seemed to be as happy and have as much fun as Carlton had while playing all the time.

When Saturday evening came, mother said she didn't know how she had ever gotten along without the boy. "What shall I pay you Tim?" she asked. "I like you better than any helper I ever had."

"Oh, nothing, mamma!" said Carlton, catching his mother around the neck. "I'd be ashamed not to help you; and it's fun to play Tim."—Ex.

A CHIMNEY HOME.

If you hear queer noises in your chimney, don't be frightened and think thieves are trying to come down your fireplace. I'll tell you why.

Early one morning I heard the queerest noises in my chimney. I couldn't think for a moment what was the matter.

Then I laughed, for I decided it was a bird that had flown down my chimney, and wanted to get out.

It seemed to tumble all up and down that chimney, and at last I felt I must cut out the paper that covered the stovepipe hole, and let the poor little bird out.

I was so excited when I cut that paper from the hole, and you would have been, too, for I expected a sooty, half smothered, little bird to fly out in my face.

So I pulled the paper very carefully and bless you, there, in a cute little mud and stick nest (which was glued to the back of the chimney) were three little baby birds.

Little chimney swallows, with three little mouths wide open, screaming for their breakfast, looking out at me.

They seemed to think I had food for them, and screamed louder and louder. Then I heard a great flutter down the chimney, and stepped aside just in time to see the mother bird fly down with a nice fat worm in her bill, for her babies.

Well, I just left that hole uncovered to watch those baby birds grow day by day. Then one morning a strange thing happened.

I awoke to find two of the baby swallows perched upon the foot of my bed, looking at me.

Yes, indeed, they had left their nest and were trying their wings, by flying all about my room. Then back to their nests they would go, when the mother called them to a meal.

I had such a good time watching those little fellows fluttering from one chair to the other, in my room, then I left for a while, with one baby swallow sitting on my clock.

But when I came back my room seemed so quiet, and when I peeped into their nest it was empty. The babies had learned to fly, and had gone up the chimney, and out into the big world.

HER NAMES.

I'm mother's precious baby,
And daddy's sugar plum,
And sister's little sweetheart,
And brother's little chum.

Grandpa calls me "Honey,"
And grandma calls me "Pet,"
And uncle says, "Here's Dimples"—
That's quite the queerest yet.

It seems to me I have a different
Name for every place.
It's hard to keep remembering
I'm just Virginia Grace.

WHO AM I?

I have destroyed more than all the wars.
I am more deadly than bullets, and I have wrecked more homes than Big Bertha.

I steal in the United States alone over $300,000,000 each year.

I spare no one, and I find my victims among the rich and poor alike, the young and old, the strong and weak.

I loom up to such proportions that I cast my shadow over every field of labor, from the turning of the grindstone to the moving of every railroad train.

I massacre thousands upon thousands of wage-earners in a year.

I lurk in unseen places, and do most of my work silently. You are warned against me, but you heed not.

I am relentless.

I am everywhere—in the house, on the streets, in the factory, at railroad crossings, and on the sea.

I bring sickness, degradation and death,
and yet few seek to avoid me.

I destroy, crush or maim; I give venoming, but take all.

I am your worst enemy.

I am carelessness.—Ex.

BETWEEN BIRTHS.

It is reported from Brussels that an applicant for poor relief stated that his only brother died one hundred and twenty-five years ago, and that, although his state-was at first disbelieved, it turned out to be true.

A still more extraordinary lapse of time between the birth of two brothers is recorded of a well-known lawyer of the early nineteenth century. One of the witnesses in a probate action in which the lawyer held a brief was asked whether he had any brothers or sisters. "My only brother," he replied, "died one hundred and fifty years ago."

Murmur of incredulity ran through the court, yet documentary evidence was produced to confirm the old man's statement.
His father had married at the age of nineteen, and by this wife had a son who died in infancy. He married again at the age of seventy five and had another son, the witness who was ninety-six when he gave his evidence.

EXTRAVAGANCE.

National extravagance began long before the present era of inflated currencies, and high wages for the workingman. So with many boys and girls of well-to-do parents it begins as soon as they get out of the nursery. I have known of little children eight of ten years old daily drinking half a dozen bottles of sweet drinks or buying half as many dishes of ice cream.

It is all very well to preach economy to grown-up people; but their habits are formed, and are hard to change.

Education in our homes and schools is vitaly necessary if habits of economy are to be formed, education in regard to the value and uses of money, that both recklessness and parsimony may be avoided in later life.—Endeavor World.

A STRANGE BABY.

"Mother has put my bed right beside daddy's said the little visitor, and he can put his hand over on me."

That made the lady she was visiting ask,
"What would you think of a great big baby, as big as our piano, who didn't like to be all alone at night?"

The little visitor did not answer, for she couldn't imagine any baby as big as a piano.

"It was a baby elephant," said the lady,
"and it was being taken from one place to another on a train. It had to ride in the baggage car. Even a baby elephant can make a terrible noise, called trumpeting, and whenever the keeper left this baby, it began to trumpet so loudly that nobody else could stay in the car. So a cot was brought in, and the keeper rolled up in a blanket and went to sleep.

"All night long the big gray baby stood up, for it seemed to be afraid to lie down in the train. Every little while it would reach out with its long trunk and very gently feel of its keeper, as if to make quite sure that he was near.

"I think we can easily guess how that keeper treated the elephant, dont you?"
For if he had not been gentle and kind, the big baby would not have loved and trusted him as it did.—Exchange.

FIRST LESSONS.

Baby was just learning about the things around him. He looked at the trees and said, "Trees." He pointed to the blossoms and said, "Frowers." When he saw a bird fly, he called, "Birdie." When he heard the birds singing, he said,
"Birdies sing." He does not understand about the Father in heaven, but mother is singing a song every day that is helping him to know the great, good, loving Father-God. This is mother's song:

"Who made the pretty lillies?

God did, God did.

Who made the pretty lilies?

God did, we know.

God made the lillies pure and white,
God made the stars that shine so bright,
God gave the world his life and light,
God did, we know.

Baby listened. He knew that Daddy made his kiddy car and so he understood that the one who made the flowers was
God. He listened as mother sang again:

"Who loves the little children?

God does, God does.

Who loves the little children?

God made the lillies pure and white,
God made the stars that shine so bright,
God does, we know.

God gave the world his life and light,
God did, we know."

Mother cuddled Baby close when she said, "I love my boy." He understood love. The one who made the flowers loved him too, and so Baby learned about God, the heavenly Father.

SELECT READINGS

The consciousness of God, and the yearning after him are the vestiges of Paradise Lost, and the assurance of Paradise Regained.

Some people complain that the church doesn't interest them, but how could they expect interest where they have no investment?

The flag stands for the civic ideals of our people, and the cross stands for the spiritual faith of our people, and we must defend both with our last life's blood.

Though devils rage and woe on woe beset;
Though consternations sweep from pole to pole;

Through arching skies and ocean's deep to deep;

Though mountains rock and cataclysms roll,

And agonies unspeakable confound;

Though sun and moon and primal planets fall,

Hold fast! Unfathomable are his ways!

But God Almighty, still, is over all!

THE POWER OF PRAYER.

When Peter was in prison, the record says: "Instant and earnest prayer was made by the Church of God for him." As the prayer proceeded, wonderful things began to happen in the world of material things. Chains locked and secure fell off the body of the apostle, and doors fast closed opened wide, and Peter walked out of the prison in the fellowship of an angel. Prayer is an instrument whose potency is more marvelous than even the best saint imagined.

BUT ONE PATH.

If a man is not willing to go to heaven by the way of Calvary he can not go at all. Many men want a religion in which there is no cross, but they can not enter heaven that way. If we are to be disciples of Jesus Christ we must deny ourselves, and take up our cross, and follow him. Do not think that you will have no battles if you follow the Nazarene; many battles are before you. Men do not object to a battle if they are confident that they will have victory, and, thank God, every one of us may have the victory if we will.—D. L. Moody.

"AND PETER."

The spirit of the resurrected Christ is shown in the message he sent to Peter after the resurrection. When he would have his disciples meet him in Galilee, he sent word to all of them in company, but he added with a touch of tenderness, "And Peter." It is an exquisite touch of tactful tenderness. The last time his eyes had rested on Peter, the man had just sworn with vehement oaths he had never known Jesus, but the Master had seen the quick tears of penitence, and he knew what horrors memory was inflicting on him now, and so a special message goes to Peter. It was as if the Master had said,
"Let Peter know I have forgiven him and I love him still." The risen Christ was still the incarnation of love Jivin'. He will not break the bruised reed, nor quench the smoking flax."—Selected.

PAUL'S LAST JOURNEY TO JERUSALEM.
(Acts 21:1-7.)

1. And it came to pass, that after we were gotten from them, and had launched, we came with a straight course unto Coos, and the day following unto Rhodes, and from there unto Patara:

2. And finding a ship sailing over unto Phenicia, we went aboard, and set forth.

3. Now when we had discovered Cyprus, we left it on the left hand, and sailed into Syria, and landed at Tyre: for there the ship was to unlade her burden.

4. And finding disciples, we tarried there seven days: who said to Paul through the Spirit, that he should not go up to Jerusalem.

5. And when we had accomplished those days, we departed and went our way; and they all brought us on our way, with wives and children, till we were out of the city: and we kneeled down on the shore, and prayed.

6. And when we had taken our leave one of another, we took ship; and they returned home again.

7. And when we had finished our course from Tyre, we came to Ptolemais, and saluted the brethren, and abode with them one day.

8. And the next day we that were of Paul's company departed, and came unto Caesarea: and we entered into the house of Philip the evangelist, which was one of the seven; and abode with him.

9. And the same man had four daughters, virgins, which did prophesy.

10. And as we tarried there many days, there came down from Judaea a certain prophet, named Agabus.

11. And when he was come unto us, he took Paul's girdle, and bound his own hands and feet, and said, Thus saith the Holy Ghost, So shall the Jews at Jerusalem bind the man that owneth this girdle, and shall deliver him into the hands of the Gentiles.

12. And when we heard these things, both we, and they of that place, besought him not to go up to Jerusalem.

13. Then Paul answered, What mean ye to weep and to break mine heart? for I am ready not to be bound only, but also to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus.

14. And when he would not be persuaded, we ceased, saying, The will of the Lord be done.

15. And after those days we took up our carriage, and went up to Jerusalem.

16. There went with us also certain of the disciples of Caesarea, and brought with them one Mnason of Cyprus, an old disciple, with whom we should lodge.

17. And when we were come to Jerusalem, the brethren received us gladly.

INTRODUCTORY.

Many interesting events in the life of Paul occur in the interval since our last lesson. In the nineteenth chapter is the account of the excitement in Ephesus among the heathen worshippers of Diana, and the shouting of the mob for two hours, crying: "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." Every one should be intelligently familiar with the events of this chapter. Then occurs the account of Paul's visit into Macedonia, accompanied by some of his most faithful friends. He then comes to Troas, where the young man Eutychus was miraculously raised from the dead after his fall from the window, and every one should be familiar with this incident. Then he passes on to several other places, coming to Miletus, where he sent for the Elders of Ephesus to come to him for an interview. A large part of the twentieth chapter is taken up with the very touching and remarkable address made on this occasion. This is a treasure house of pastoral affection and teachings, and is worthy of being read over and over again, a great many times. Then he kneels down with them and prays with them all, and they make a most affectionate farewell, which reveals Paul to us not only a great apostle and infallibly inspired teacher, but as a most tender-hearted and loving friend. From experience and partings such as this we see him proceeding on his journey to Jerusalem, his last visit to that city.

EXPOSITORY.

1-3. Sailing in a general eastward direction they came, after about forty miles, to a small island, called Coos. About fifty miles further on they came to Rhodes, another island, where the famous Colossus, one of the "Seven Wonders of the World," stood in the harbor. They then went on to Patara and here they changed ships, finding one that was going on to Phenicia. Still further on they came to the Island of Cyprus, the home of Barnabas, where Paul spent some time early in his ministry. But they sailed on, leaving it on the left, and made for Syria, the west coast of the Mediterranean Sea, and landed at Tyre.

4-6. Here at Tyre they found some Christian people. We are not told how many they were, or who they were, but Paul and his company remained with them for seven days, and, no doubt, taught and strengthened and greatly helped them spiritually. These disciples, enlightened by God's Spirit to know that persecutions would assail Paul in Jerusalem, told him so, and then out of their own human affection, entreated him not to go there. But Paul was under divine direction to go to Jerusalem and he went on. Persecution was to work out a part of God's plan. When the time came these disciples went down to the seashore with Paul, men and women and children. Paul prayed with them, as real Christians do, and then he took the ship to go on his way, and the Christian people went home again. It is a very simple and affecting incident.

7. From Tyre, Paul and his companions sailed twenty-five miles further south and came to Ptolemais, now known as Acre, where they found some Christians and stayed with them one day.

8. The next day they started again and the next stop was at Caesarea, about thirty miles further on. Here they found Philip the evangelist. We have read of him before. He had been here perhaps twenty years. He was one of the original seven deacons. His home was opened hospitably to Paul.

9. He had four daughters who had grown to be Christian young women walking in their father's footsteps, as religious teachers. This is of course what is meant by their prophesying. It is a great joy when we see the children of Christian fathers and mothers coming into the service of Christ themselves and being useful in his work.

10-12. An extended visit was made here by Paul and his companions, for rendering apostolic service to the Church. While there a prophet, Agabus, came down from Jerusalem and gave a solemn warning to Paul, from God, of the way in which the Jews would seize and imprison him and deliver him to the Romans. This was exactly true, as events proved. But there was no counsel from God that Paul should not go to Jerusalem. It was a part of God's plan that Paul should do just what he did. The pleadings and beseechings came from friends who did not wish to see Paul mistreated and injured. But these were human voices and feelings to which Paul did not give way. He could not.

13. Paul was under God's direction. So he begged the Christian friends not to weep and break his heart. He was tender-hearted, and, no doubt, was affected deeply by the knowledge of his personal danger. But he was not to be moved by fear or by any sort of merely human considerations. He was willing to die, even, for the sake of the Lord Jesus, if that were the divine will.

14. His words had their desired effect. The people were led to see that the important thing in life is not the saving of ourselves from danger or even from death, but have God's will done in us and by us. For this we pray every time we use the prayer the Savior taught us, and we should be willing to have the prayer answered.

15. After these tender experiences they collected all their traveling baggage and belongings and went on to finish their journey. The word "carriage" means here that which they carried, as it did when it was used about David on his way to the battle where he slew Goliath.

16. The company of traveling companions was increased by a number from Caesarea, and a disciple from Cyprus, Mnason, who had a home in Jerusalem, and who was to be Paul's host in that city.

17. The Christians at Jerusalem received them gladly. Probably the Apostle James was there, and there were others. So the journey ended. Here Paul was to meet with violent treatment, and was to be delivered to the Romans and carried to Rome for trial. It was all a part of God's plan for the futherance of the Gospel. But God guards his people all the way. He who led Paul on from city to city, and from church to church, as we see in the lesson before us, to do good and to find friends at each place, will lead us all on, year by year, and step by step, if we allow him to guide and keep us, until he brings us to heaven, the Holy City, the new Jerusalem.

THE BIBLE A BOOK FOR BOYS.

The Bible is a book for boys,
As any one can prove.
It's full of just such stories
As boys are sure to love.

There's Abraham, who left his home
To follow God's command,
And Joseph, Moses, David, too,
And Solomon the grand.

There's Daniel and his Hebrew friends,
Who to their God were true
Through fiery furnace, lion's den,
And all men's hate do.

Then prophets brave, who warned of sin
In no uncertain tone,
Who faced king's wrath, but stood their ground,
Trusting in God alone.

The story of our Lord himself,
Of Peter, John and Paul—
Oh, the Bible is the book for boys!
The best, best book of all.

—Bible Society Record.

PAUL, STOOD FOR JESUS CHRIST AS THE FOUNDATION.

He mentions "Jesus Christ." The doctrine of the incarnation, Christ's absolute divinity, his teaching and miracles, his atonement and resurrection, his ascent into heaven and his place at the Father's right hand till he shall descend again to judge the world;—our faith in all this, as the condition of our hope of salvation, was absolutely necessary, according to his teaching. And there the Church stands today. "To the law and to the testimony." We have no right, whatever changes have been proposed or ever will be proposed, to drop one iota or tittle of what Paul includes in that "Foundation," of which he speaks in I Corinthians 3.

A REFORMED CONVICTS' ADVICE.

He writes from his prison cell: "I have very good prospects of making a suspended sentence by November 1. Since my mother's death, eighteen months ago, I have tried to live a right life, and now all I ask is a chance again to make good. I would be glad to work in the steel plant, if they will take a man with a prison record. This sentence has been the making of me. The person who will not profit by his mistakes is, indeed, a big fool, and I am not going to be one any more. I chose bad associates, and they brought me down. If only other young men would profit by my experience!"

"Tell others," he said, "that it's the end of the day that decides what a good time is; not the beginning. The big glare at the start oftens means a big shadow at the end. It did for me, but I'm through with that kind of a life. If I only had known at the beginning what I know now, and acted accordingly, I would not be here today."

There are lessons to note in the experience of this lad.

DAY BY DAY.

Every day a little knowledge. One fact in a day. How small is one fact! Only one. Ten years pass by. Three thousand six hundred fifty facts are not a small thing.

Every day a little self-denial. The thing that is difficult to do today will be an easy thing to do 365 days hence, if each day it shall have been repeated. What power of self-mastery shall he enjoy who, looking to God for grace, seeks every day to practice the grace he prays for.

Every day a little helpfulness. We live for the good of others, if our living be in any sense true living. It is not in the great deeds of philanthropy that the only blessing is found. In "little deeds of kindness" repeated every day we find true happiness. At home, at school, in the street, in the neighbor's house, in the playground we shall find opportunity every day for usefulness.

Every day a little look into the Bible. One chapter a day. What a treasure of Bible knowledge one may acquire in ten years! Every day a verse committed to memory. What a volume in twenty-five years!

THE RESURRECTION FROM THE DEAD.

At the moment when Christ died, nothing could have seemed more abjectly weak, more pitifully hopeless, more absolutely doomed to scorn and extinction and despair than the church which he had founded. It numbered but a handful of weak followers. They were poor, they were ignorant, they were hopeless. They could not claim a single synagogue or a single sword. So feeble were they and insignificant, that it would have looked like foolish partiality to prophesy for them the limited existence of a Galilean sect. How was it that these dull and ignorant men, with their cross of wood, triumphed over the deadly fascinations of sensual mythologies, conquered kings and their armies, and overcame the world? There is one, and only one, possible answer—the resurrection from the dead. All this vast revolution was due to the power of Christ's resurrection.—Canon Farrar.

NATIONAL CONVENTION IN BRAZIL.

The Fifth National Sunday School Convention of Brazil was held in the First Presbyterian Church of Rio de Janeiro. The pastor of the church, Rev. Alvaro dos Reis, with his wife, attended the World's Sunday School Convention in Japan. There were 138 registered delegates. The object was to consider the means for the greater development of the work. Among the delegates were twenty-seven pastors, thirty-four superintendents, forty-four teachers, thirteen school secretaries and twenty pupils. Five Protestant denominations were represented and the delegates came from eight different states of the Federal Union. In addition to the delegates registered, the sessions were attended by large numbers of visitors, the attendance at several of the evening sessions taxing the capacity of the church, which seats nearly one thousand.

The resolutions and recommendations adopted by the Convention called upon the pastors to develop their Sabbath schools; all classes to open with prayer; organized classes to be promoted to train pastors, officers and teachers through a National Institute of Methods, extension of normal courses to all the provinces, their introduction in theological seminaries and evangelical schools; better equipment for primary workers; employment of a Sabbath-school field worker; introduction of week-day Bible courses in summer for two hours daily, including catechising, diversions and Bible teaching; promote temperance lessons and program; approve school Standard of Excellence covering organization, normal courses, organized classes, Decision Day, missionary instruction, etc.

The passion to "pass it on" is a normal passion when one has come to the experience of salvation. One may well doubt the genuineness of his religion if he is content to have it to himself.

PRAYER MEETING, OCTOBER 23.

Endeavor Topic: What We Know About God. Psalm 139:1-12.

When the members of the Westminster Assembly of Divines were engaged in the preparation of the Shorter Catechism they came to the great question: "What is God?" Before this question they stopped in devout perplexity, and many were the suggested answers and many were the bewilderingments in their minds and hearts. Time passed on and no answer had been framed that was at all adequate or satisfactory. At last some one suggested that, although they had all prayed over the matter individually, there should be special prayer for the divine guidance at this particular time. He asked that they all would pray, and that George Gillespie, the youngest member of the Assembly, lead them in petitioning God for wisdom to frame the proper answer to this great question.

Mr. Gillespie arose, and his first words were: "O God, thou art a Spirit, infinite, eternal and unchangeable in thy being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness and truth." He then went on in his prayer asking that they might have given to them the wisdom and grace to meet and discharge their present duty. The prayer closed. But many remembered the significant and great words with which his prayer opened, and an almost universal expression was made that these were the very words to be accepted as the answer to the question. It was agreed to, and for over three hundred years those words have stood as the finest and best answer to this question that has ever been framed.

It is not that this answer is exhaustive or that it is perfect. It does not tell every thing that may be said about God. It does not exactly define God, for he can not exactly be defined by human words. But it does tell some of the essential truths, and does guard against many possible errors, and it is a help to the thoughts and minds and hearts of God's people, in a devout and dignified statement, as they try to understand who and what is God.

In the first place it states that God is. God exists. The opening words of the Bible are: "In the beginning God." It is only the fool who says that there is no God. There is so much of design and power and wisdom manifested all about us in the natural world, that no one in his right mind can deny that an infinite God must be back of it all. Some one has said that "The undevout astronomer is mad." He who studies the heavenly bodies is of unsound mind if he does not realize and acknowledge God.

The first chapter of the Epistle to the Romans emphasizes this point, and says that even the heathen people, or those who have never had the inspired Scripture to instruct and guide them, know enough about God to condemn them, if they do not obey and serve him. Paul goes on in this first chapter to insist that God's existence, and his power and his wisdom are clearly seen from the visible universe, and that when people know this much about God, they are great sinners if they go on and do what is evil. They know that God has made them and that they ought to live in respect to this infinite being of high and majestic character.

But we know more about God than this. God has given us his Written Word, the sacred volume of revealed truth, in which he has told us more about himself than is seen in the book of Nature. We there learn that he is holy and just and good and true. We who are his creatures ought to obey his holy commandments and do his will and strive by his grace to be like him.

But we know even more about him from the Living Word, the Lord Jesus Christ. We see in his perfect character what God is like and we should strive to be like him.

The one hundred and thirty-ninth Psalm, and all the Bible, tell us much about God, but in Jesus Christ we learn that he wishes to save us from our sins.

LAMPS OF GOD.

His lamps are we,
To shine where he shall say,
And lamps are not for sunny rooms
Nor for the light of day,
But for dark places of the earth,
Where shame and wrong and crime have birth;
Or for the murky twilight gray,
Where wandering sheep have gone astray;
Or where the light of faith grows dim,
And souls are groping after Him;
And as sometimes a flame we find,
Clear shining through the night—
So bright we do not see the lamp,
But only see the light.
So we may shine—his light the flame,
That men may glorify his name.

THE FATHER'S HAND.

A boy was eager to go down to breakfast with his father, but mother had not quite finished dressing him, and so father, without giving the matter special thought, started downstairs without him. And then, suddenly, a childish wail sounded through the house. It was not cross or fretful or passionate, only the voicing of a disappointed longing in the words, "I want his hand." His mother assured him he should follow father in a few minutes. But that did not meet the need. "I want his hand," was the plaintive rejoinder, as a keen sense of loneliness and a longing for companionship filled the little heart.

Out of the heart of babyhood came the wisdom of the philosopher, the expression of the need of mankind. An unconscious longing for leading, for guidance is voiced in the restless dissatisfaction of humanity, the world over, though oftentimes it knows not what it is for which the heart is crying out. The handclasp of one stronger than itself is ever the soul's need. If only we learned wisdom from the little child we, too, would be seeking for Father's guiding hand.

SPREADING CHRISTIANITY BY LIVING IT.

Here is a striking report of one method that is used by a Dutch Mission in New Guinea: "As soon as an opening is gained to a new field, the members of a church already organized elect a group from among their number, usually entire families, and send them out as colonists to the new territory. All that is required is that the inhabitants signify their willingness to hear the 'God-speech,' and to give up their pagan religion. The colonists, followed by the prayers of the home church, settle in little groups and give a living picture of the Christian faith in their walk and conversation. They do not preach, but if occasion arises they witness for Christ. Sometimes the colonists are killed and eaten, in which case others simply take their places."

GOD'S LOVE IS FOR ALL.

The sun does not shine for a few trees and flowers, but for the wide world's joy. The lowly pine on the mountain-top waves its sombre boughs, and cries, "Thou art my sun"; and the little meadow-violet lifts its cup of blue, and whispers with its perfumed breath, "Thou art my sun"; and the grain in a thousand fields rustles in the wind, and makes answer, "Thou art my sun." So God sits effulgent in heaven, not for a favored few, but for the universe of life; and there is no creature so poor or so low that he may not look up with child-like confidence, and say, "My Father, thou art mine."—Beecher.

Religion is not something incidental. It is not here and there an island of goodness and blessedness in the great sea of worldly experience. It is a salt that penetrates every drop of the ocean.

PRAYER MEETING

OCTOBER 19.

FRUITS AS WELL AS LEAVES.
Mark 11:22, 23, 20-24.

The incident of the barren figtree is a lesson impressing upon us very vividly the truth that our lives should be fruitful as well as promising; that there should be reality as well as appearances; that we should produce real results in the service of Christ, as well as having the outward signs and aspects of religious devotion.

The figtree had leaves but no fruit. What was desired was fruit. This alone could be eaten. Christ did not manifest any weak and childish passion, or make an unreasonable outburst of rage against an inanimate object. This would not have been in keeping with his high and holy and dignified character. Nor could he have been disappointed in not finding the fruit, for he certainly knew that there was none on the tree. What he wished was to furnish an object lesson to his disciples to teach that appearances do not answer in the place of reality. Show is not as good as real life.

There is an old Latin proverb: "Esse quam conspici," which has been adopted by a good many societies as a motto, and which may be rendered: "To be rather than to appear to be." It is a poor thing to claim to be something more and better than what we are. One may play the part of character of a king on the stage, but that is a mere theatrical pretense, and we do not want to carry theatrical pretense into our lives, and pretend to be good or great when we are neither.

The word "hypocrite" comes from the stage, and is meant to refer to the mask or costume which the player wears. This will answer for an actor or a play. But we do not wish to be actors or pretenders in real life. We ought to live with simple hearts and purposes, and try to be good, and try to appear to be good. Then our outer life will correspond with the inward reality, and we shall not be hypocrites, but useful and sincere and good people, loving God and doing his will.

The figtree could not be blamed for not having figs on, for the time of figs had not yet come, and the figtree was not a responsible person, as we are, but was simply an inanimate object. But it had leaves on, and looked as if it might have figs on, and so Christ wished to teach the disciples, and all of us, that we ought to live up to our appearances and our possibilities, without false show, or pretenses. If we make any sort of good profession, we ought to live up to that profession. Let us be what we seem to be, or what we claim to be.

It is a fact that all of Christ's miracles except this one and the destruction of the swine, were miracles of mercy, and yet, even these two were not for the injury of human beings. This one teaches so important a lesson that the destruction of one tree was small as compared with its benefit, and the destruction of the swine was a small loss, by the side of the deliverance of the man from the devils that possessed him.

Let us try to be fruitful, useful Christians, bringing forth fruit for God and for man. Let us possess the character of God's children, as well as professing to belong to his family. We want not only the profession of Christian life, but we want the possession of Christian life. Let the leaves be seen, in our words and professions, but let the fruit of holy life and holy love and holy usefulness be in our very beings and abound. Then the world will not be disappointed when it looks for real results from our lives, and God will not be disappointed in us.

OUR PRAYER.

BY ALICE PARMLEE CURTIS.

Our yesterdays, dear Lord, forgive,
And blot them out, we pray.
How could we fail so utterly
To live a worthy day
When Thou wast standing by, in love,
To show us just the way?

New courage comes with morning light,
And so, we ask for grace
To make today, in thought and deed,
Fit for thy dwelling place,
And may the night bring joy and rest,
Content in Thine embrace.

For each tomorrow as it comes
We know thou wilt provide,
And so we leave them all with thee
And pray, whate'er betide,
Thy power may make our faith more bright
And keep us near Thy side.

PROGRESS.

The idea of progress must be dear to every Christian who believes that the present state of things is corrupt and who has learned to pray, "Thy kingdom come." It is true that mere movement is not always progress, but one who believes in the redemption of the world has unquenchable hope that it is being led on toward a goal grander than his best conceptions.—W. H. Freemantle.

FAITH.

Faith is an everyday commodity. It is not intended merely for great occasions and special works, nor is it the gift of those only who are called of God for some special service. It may be the daily possession of the humblest child of God and should be applied to the commonest and smallest things of life. Many persons look for the Lord in great dangers and trials and in the large affairs of life who never think of finding him in the small affairs which are their lot day by day. A life of trust recognizes the presence of God at all times; sees him in all things, and leans upon his arm for strength and succor every hour of the day.

HAVING A GODLY FEAR.

The fear of God makes a hero; the fear of man makes a coward. Fear to do wrong makes a hero; fear to do right makes a coward. Noah was warned of things not seen as yet, and he believed God's warning. Such a thing as a flood the world had never known. It was out of the range of his experience; there were scores of arguments against it; but God's word was stronger than all arguments. The need of this day is a healthy fear; faith in Sinai with its thundering of judgment as strong as faith in Calvary with its whisperings of love; a belief in the words of Christ about the worm that dieth not as strong as a belief in the mansions which he is preparing for his people.

YOUR PART IS IMPORTANT.

A leader stood before an orchestra beating time, when one man who sat away back and played the piccolo thought to himself, "My music will not be missed;" so he attempted to rest. Instantly the leader stopped the whole orchestra and said, "Where is the piccolo?"

Just as the ear of the musician missed the harmony possible only when the smallest instrument was doing its part, so the part of the smallest child in the Church of God is necessary to the harmony of his service and worship.

THE DOWNWARD DRIFT.

Wherever an effort is made to exalt man or to deify him; wherever there is a tendency to minimize the divinity of the Lord Jesus, and to speak of him as a mere man; and wherever the Word of God, or any part of it, is disregarded, ignored, or set aside there the descent from faith to apostasy has revealed its blighting influence. It is impossible that the guiding Spirit of God could lead the proclamation of these fallacies or remain unrieved where they are accepted and embraced.—Selected.

We talk about the telescope of faith, but I think we want even more the microscope of watchful and grateful love. Apply this to the little bits of our daily lives, in the light of the spirit, and how wonderfully they come out!—Frances Ridley Havergal.

GENERAL NEWS

GOVERNMENT PLANS TO HONOR ITS DEAD.

Plans for the solemn ceremonies of Armistice Day, when the nation will pay highest honors to its unidentified dead of the world war, reached a climax when President Harding and his Cabinet decided to march afoot up Pennsylvania Avenue at the head of the funeral cortege.

By presidential proclamation, the business and pleasure of the nation will stand at rest two minutes that day in tribute to the dead, as the body from a nameless grave in a great struggle of the war is carried to its last rest in the peaceful Virginia hills that look down across the Potomac on the nation's Capital.

Under army regulations the escort will be that provided for the highest military rank of the service, a full General.

The pallbearers, eight in number, are selected from among the non-commissioned and warrant officers of the Army and Navy, who have received the decoration for Distinguished Gallantry in Action.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE ARRANGES FOR EMPLOYMENT OF UNEMPLOYED.

Colonel Arthur Woods, former Police Commissioner of New York, will head the central agency to be established by the National Conference on Unemployment to co-ordinate emergency relief for workless wage earners throughout the country.

The conference desires, Secretary of Commerce Herbert C. Hoover said in making the announcement, to see the entire country organized on a community basis, to effect the quick distribution of jobs to the involuntary idle through efficient operation of the emergency program adopted last week.

Informal machinery, voluntary in its nature, is being set up in the form of one of the conference committees, which, under the direction of Colonel Woods, can receive reports from various communities of the progress being made, and transmit to various localities successful employment methods tried out in others.

COLLECTING FROM RUSSIA IS HOPELESS.

Secretary Andrew W. Mellon, in urging legislation for funding and refunding allied war loans, told the House Ways and Means Committee it was utterly impossible to make any schedule of payment because of conditions in creditor nations.

"The loans should be refunded and funded at the earliest time possible to straighten out the treasury," Mr. Mellon said. "There is no authority to accept bonds or currency other than our own in payment of the debts. To a certain extent, in arranging for payment of indebtedness, we have to consider the indebtedness of one allied nation to another. In other words, we have to work with the other creditor nations on a plan of settlement."

Replying to questions, the Secretary said the "big nations," including France and Italy, were more able to pay than were the smaller countries.

"There has been no thought of a general substitution of governments as debtors," he said, "but only a shifting of the character of securities. It is our intention to so fund the debts as to guarantee or assure payment of interest until maturity."

"Do you hope to collect from Russia?" the Secretary was asked.

"It seems to be hopeless," he replied.

BANKERS ARE OPTIMISTIC.

The worst of the credit stringency seems to be over, and it appears that the country has borne the period of stress remarkably well, it was reported to the American Bankers' Association convention by its Economic Policy Commission, of which Paul M. Warburg, of New York, is chairman.

"Natural recuperative forces are now making for recovery," the report said, "and there is every reason to believe that when wages have been readjusted and normal balance is re-established between industries and between nations, our country will enter upon a new career of prosperity and advancement."

When normal balances have been restored, it is natural to expect that normal conditions will be restored.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

The Second Assembly of the League of Nations adjourned last week.

The meeting was notable chiefly for addresses by members from the larger nations, in which they expressed the hope that the Limitation of Armaments Conference might do what the League had failed to do.

CHINA REJECTS JAPANESE TERMS.

The text of China's reply to the proposals of the Japanese Government concerning a settlement of the Shantung controversy was made public last Friday. It declares that Japan has advanced no plan for a settlement that is fundamentally acceptable to the Chinese Government and public, and that the Chinese Government feels that there is much in the new proposals "still incompatible with the Chinese Government's repeated declarations, the Chinese public's hopes and aspirations, and the principles laid down in Chinese treaties with foreign Powers."

It is added that if the proposals comprise Japan's final concessions, "they surely inadequately prove the sincerity of Japan's desire to settle the question."

The note was handed to the Japanese Minister by Dr. Yen, the Chinese Foreign Minister.

At the time the Japanese Minister said that he received the document in a purely unofficial capacity, and that he would return it to Dr. Yen if it were unacceptable to Japan.

Later it was announced at the Japanese Legation that it had not been decided whether to forward the memorandum to Tokyo or return it to Dr. Yen.

REPORT ON UNEMPLOYMENT NEARLY COMPLETE.

Practical completion of a majority report on permanent measures for the betterment of business throughout the country was effected by the Manufacturers Committee of the National Conference on Unemployment.

Whether or not a minority report would be submitted to the full conference when it reassembled this week was not stated.

On the question of business readjustment the majority of the committee holds the view that readjustment of wages and prices downward was a necessary precedent to a commercial readjustment from which a revival of the nation's industry could spring.

In connection with the readjustment process, the report favors lower freight rates to permit a greater flow of commerce.

Passage of the railway funding bill for the financial relief of the carriers, now pending in Congress, is stipulated in the report as being an important step in economic betterment, while the discontinuance of functions of the Railroad Labor Board that conflict with the activities of the Interstate Commerce Commission is regarded favorably.

NEW TAX BILL ALMOST READY.

Amendments to the pending tax revision bill, agreed to by Republican leaders in the Senate, were made public last week, in advance of their consideration by majority members of the Finance Committee.

They provide for:

1. A maximum surtax rate of 50 per cent on that part of incomes in excess of $200,000, in lieu of the committee plan for a 32 per cent maximum on the excess of $86,000.
2. Repeal of the express, freight, passenger and sleeper transportation taxes, effective on passage of the bill.
3. An increase from $2.20 to $4 a gallon in the tax on distilled spirits produced, imported or withdrawn from bond for use for industrial, medicinal or other purposes.
4. Restoration of the capital stock tax of $1 on each $1,000 of invested capital.
5. A graduated increase in the estate tax rates to a maximum of 50 per cent on the excess over $100,000,000, in lieu of the present maximum of 25 per cent over $10,000,000.
6. Repeal of excises on sport goods, chewing gum, perfumes, essences, tooth and mouth washes, and pastes, dentifrices, toilet powders, soap and soap powders, and other miscellaneous taxes sufficient to cover a cut of $37,000,000 annually.
7. Elimination of the proposed tax on hotel accommodations.
8. Reduction in the tax on candy to 3 per cent, with elimination of the committee proposal for a 10 per cent tax on candy selling at wholesale for more than forty cents a pound.

The other excise provisions of the Senate bill stand, including repeal of the excess profits tax next January 1st, a flat tax of 15 per cent on corporation incomes, and increased exemptions for heads of families on account of dependents.

France is insured reparation payments and Germany obtains a means to avoid possible bankruptcy through the agreement signed at Wiesbaden by Louis Luecheur, French Minister of Liberated Regions, and Dr. Walter Rathenau, German Minister of Reconstruction.

The agreement is regarded as of extreme importance, and will permit Germany to pay the equivalent of 7,000,000,000 gold marks in the next five years.

The plan of Herbert C. Hoover, Secretary of Commerce, to preclude possibility of a coal strike when present wage contracts expire April 1st, was brought to a stop when he was informed by union representatives that their convention in Indianapolis last week voted to prevent an agreement being reached before February, when another special convention will be conducted.

President Harding has given full approval to the program of Federal dry law authorities for more vigorous drives to dry up New York and other states in which the liquor traffic is flourishing, it became announced last Sunday.

William Leeds, son of the "tin plate king," will be a very much married young man by the time all the ceremonies, joining him to Princess Xenia of Greece, are completed. The first was the French civil ceremony, followed by one at the American Church of the Holy Trinity, in Paris, and the third at the Russian church.

Predetermination of sex, goal of many scientific experiments with birds and fowls, is being attempted with mammals for the first time at the Carnegie Institution's station on Long Island. A carefully-chosen family of mice has been segregated for the experiment. Biologically, mice are more similar to man than any specimens previously used in seeking predetermination of sex, according to those making the experiments. If successful with mice, they plan to apply the results to humans.

Postal inspectors have announced that they expected to solve the $1,000,000 mail robbery perpetrated at the Union Station in Chicago Jan. 17th, as a result of the arrest last week of three men. They are seeking a fourth.

Four men held up drivers at the station and escaped with several bags of registered mail, chiefly Liberty bonds and other securities.

The nation's gross public debt increased $1,778,000 in September, according to figures made public by the Treasury, which showed the gross national debt Sept. 30th to have been $23,924,108,000. The debt now outstanding, however, is $2,672,593,000 less than the high point of American history, Aug. 31, 1919, when it was $26,596,701,000, and it is also a reduction of $963,248,000 from Sept. 30, 1920.

Fire which broke out in the Michigan State Reformatory at Ionia, Mich., last week, is said to have done $500,000 damage.

A chicken, black skinned from drumsticks to neck, has been developed at the Carnegie Institute Experimental Evolution Station at Cold Spring Harbor, N. Y.

Just what the reason is for this scientific development of a black chicken has not been announced.

Property in Mexico acquired by oil corporations prior to May 1, 1917, can not be construed as coming within the provisions of Article 27 of the Mexican constitution, which nationalizes petroleum deposits. This is the view of several authorities, who have examined the formal decision in the Texas Company Amparo case, which was handed down by the Mexican Supreme Court. Members of the court admitted that paragraph four of Article 27 contained "perplexing problems," but they concurred in the decision that this article could not impair titles to property perfected before the constitution went into effect. George T. Summerlin, American charge d'affairs in Mexico, obtained a copy of the decision last week. He will forward it immediately to the State Department in Washington.

More than 20,000 men and women have been compelled to leave Berlin since 1918, and to return to their home towns, under decrees that forbid persons to be employed in Berlin who were not residents of the city before the war.

An attempt was made to assassinate Gen. Pilsudski, president of the Polish republic at Lemberg, Galicia, Sept. 25th. Three revolver shots were fired at him, but the bullets went wild. The would-be assassin was arrested.

The Massachusetts Commission on Necessities of Life, which leaped into fame recently with the announcement that there are 285 beans to a plate, won additional glory when it found that a four cent doughnut, exclusive of the hole, nets its producers a profit of 300 per cent.

This doughnut, said the commission, costs only 1.03 cents to make. It weighs 2¾ ounces when not dipped in coffee.

And as for that bowl of cereal you pay 15 cents for the privilege of eating, there is a profit of 10.38 cents on every dish. Figuring there are 799¾ flakes in a bowl, you can figure the cost for each flake easily with a slide rule, if you have one.

The Quest, the small ship on which Sir Ernest Shackleton will explore the uncharted sections of the South Atlantic, the Pacific and the Antarctic seas, left the Thames last week on the start of her two-year voyage.

The Quest, which uses both sail and steam, and which may cover more than 30,000 miles before it returns home, was constructed according to the personal ideas of Shackleton, who has made several voyages to the Antarctic. He commanded the British expedition of 1907-09, which reached within 97 miles of the South Pole, and also the expedition of 1914-15 to Weddell Sea.

His present ship is 111 feet long, 23 feet beam and 12 feet in depth. She was built in Norway in 1917 of oak, pine and spruce, and has been tested in heavy ice. Her sides are two feet thick, and her bows are of solid oak, sheathed with steel. Her steaming radius is 9,000 miles, and under sail in a stiff breeze the Quest can make eight knots. She carries wireless equipment.

Mrs. O'Leary and her celebrated cow will have no part in the observance of the semi-centennial of the Chicago fire October 2-15. Records of the Chicago Fire Department show that both Mrs. O'Leary and the cow retired an hour before the fire, and had nothing to do with starting the blaze, although it did start in the O'Leary cow shed.

The records show a report that neighbors had slipped into the barn to milk the cow for materials for an oyster stew, and another that boys were smoking in the barn.

A broken lamp was found in the ruins of the barn the day after the fire, causing the report, now a legend, that Mrs. O'Leary had gone to the barn, carrying a lamp, and that the cow kicked her mistress, who dropped the lamp.

Statistics from sixteen countries, including the United States, which normally produce about forty per cent of the world's wheat, indicate a production this year of approximately 1,953,000,000 bushels, or about 7,000,000 more than last year.

Former U. S. Circuit Court Judge Peter Grosscup died at sea while enroute to Europe last week.

HOME AND FARM

BISCUITS.

The yeast-raised biscuit has its devotees; in fact, many persons rather prefer the raised rolls or biscuits to other forms of bread. A simple easy rule for yeast-raised biscuits that can be used for Parker House rolls, luncheon biscuits or finger rolls is made as follows:

Scald and cool one cup of milk and then let the milk be cold. Turn in a mixing bowl and add four tablespoons of melted butter, three tablespoons of sugar, two tablespoons of boiling water.

Stir to blend and then crumble in one-half yeast cake, and stir to dissolve the yeast cake, then add four cups of sifted flour, two tablespoons of cornstarch.

Work to a smooth, elastic dough, then cover and let rise for three hours. Punch down in the bowl, turn over and let rise for one hour, then turn on a molding board and roll out one-half inch thick. Cut as desired and then place on a baking sheet. Allow all rolls and biscuits that you wish to have a crusted edge, a space fully two inches between each other. If you like them soft, then place one-half inch apart. Let rise for twenty-five minutes and then bake in a moderate oven.

If you wish to glaze them use yolk of egg, one-half cup of water, one tablespoon of sugar.

Dissolve the sugar in water and yolk of egg, and apply with soft brush.

* * *

Yeast Raised Biscuits.—Three particularly fine biscuits are made with the yeast-raised dough, namely:

Southwark currant biscuit,
English tea biscuit,
English muffin or biscuit.

Southwark Currant Biscuit.—Mash one medium-sized boiled potato through a sieve and add one-half cup of scalded and cooled milk, one-half cup of water.

Have the temperature of this mixture 80 degrees Fahrenheit. Now add one-half yeast cake and stir to dissolve the yeast cake. Then add two and one-half cups of flour and beat to a smooth batter, cover and let rise for one and one-half hours. Now place in a mixing bowl one-half cup of sugar, four tablespoons of melted shortening, one egg.

• Cream to blend thoroughly and then add this to the sponge with two and one-half cups of sifted flour, one cup of currants.

Work to a smooth dough by kneading. Cover on a pastry board and let rise for one hour, then roll out two-thirds of an inch thick. Cut with a biscuit cutter and set on a greased baking sheet. Cover and let rise for twenty minutes. Now wash with a mixture of sugar and water, and bake in a hot oven for fifteen minutes.

For English tea biscuit, prepare a dough as for Southwark currant biscuit, and when ready to roll form into a long roll about as thick as a rolling pin and cut off pieces a little larger than an egg. Round up between the hands. Now grease a round pan with straight sides and place the biscuits in close together. Let rise for thirty-five minutes and then brush the tops with sugar and water and bake for eighteen minutes in a hot oven.

English Muffin or Biscuit.—Take the regular light bread dough, and when it is ready for the pans roll out one inch thick and cut with biscuit cutter. Now cover a clean towel with plenty of flour and lay on biscuits fully two inches apart. Sprinkle liberally with flour, cover and let rise for one-half hour. Lift gently from the cloth, and with a soft brush brush off flour. Bake in hot griddle or in oven for one-half hour. Turn every ten minutes on griddle and turn in oven every twelve minutes.

While muffins are not, strictly speaking, classed as biscuits, yet they are biscuit shape and many fine European pastry cooks class them with biscuits. This is particularly true of the whole wheat, rye and corn muffins.

Rye Muffins.—Place in a mixing bowl, one cup of rye flour, one cup of white flour, one-half cup of cornmeal, one teaspoon of salt, five level teaspoons of baking powder, two level tablespoons of sugar.

Sift twice to mix thoroughly and then add one and one-half cups of milk or water, three tablespoons of melted shortening. Beat hard to blend, then fill into well-greased and floured muffin pans and bake twenty-five minutes in a hot oven.

* * *

Whole Wheat Biscuits.—This biscuit is made and served at a famous health resort in the German forests.

Two and one-half cups of whole wheat flour, one teaspoon of salt, three tablespoons of sugar.

Rub between the hands to blend and then rub into the mixture, two tablespoons of lard.

Use two-thirds of a cup of water to form a dough. Put this dough through the food chopper six times and then beat with a rolling pin for ten minutes. Form in thin, round biscuits, about one-half inch thick.

Lay on a baking sheet and brush the tops with cold water. Bake in a hot oven for twenty minutes.

Pork Cake.—One pound of fat (no lean meat) salt pork, chopped fine; one pint of boiling water, one tablespoonful of soda, one cupful of brown sugar, two cupfuls of molasses, one tablespoonful of cinnamon, one tablespoonful cloves, one tablespoonful allspice, one pound seeded raisins, one pound currants, one-half pound citron (shaved fine); flour to make a stiff batter. Bake about three hours, if made in one cake, in a slow oven. If desired, the following may be added to the above: One pound sultana raisins, one-half pound figs (chopped fine), one-half pound dates (chopped fine), one-quarter lemon peel (sliced fine), one-quarter orange peel (sliced fine).—Philadelphia North American.

Oyster Loaf.—Cut the top crust from a loaf of bread and scoop and scrape out the inside, leaving the bottom and sides whole. Set the hollowed loaf, with the top crust laid by it, in an open oven and let get very dry and warm. Cut four dozen oyster in halves and cook them over the fire in their own liquor. When they begin to curl at the edges, add the crumbs of the loaf rubbed very fine, a large tablespoonful of butter rolled in one of flour, and a tea-cupful of milk. Season with salt and pepper, and cook for three minutes after the milk is added. Butter the inside of the dried loaf, fill with the oyster mixture, put on the upper crust and serve.

Cheese and Olive Salad.—Mash one roll cream cheese, moisten with a little cream, season with salt and paprika. Add five olives, finely chopped, and two pimentos, cut very fine. Press into original shape, chill thoroughly, then cut slices and serve on shredded lettuce with mayonnaise dressing.—Ex.

GET BULB BEDS READY EARLY.

Partly because of limited space, but doubtless also due to the human tendency to postpone a task, preparation of beds for spring blooming bulbs is usually deferred until the last moment in the fall. Then everything must be done in haste; the bulb dealer is beset with hurried orders which might have been distributed over the month preceding, the bed is quickly worked over, the bulbs almost thrown in, all to escape a threatened frost. "Now is the time," says the National Garden Bureau, "to prepare ground for tulips, narcissus or hyacinths. It will pay to get it ready right now with deep spading and fine pulverizing of the soil, incorporating a liberal dressing of bone meal. Now is the time, when the bulbs are at hand, to give it a light spading over, and it will be ready and in ideal condition.

and the result next spring will show the advisability of this early preparation.

"But above all, do not use barnyard manure in bulb beds. Thousands of bulbs have been ruined or killed outright because old-fashioned gardeners could not be made to believe that there was any plant that didn't need and wouldn't stand liberal manuring. The so-called Dutch bulbs will not. If manure is to be applied it must be so old and well rotted as to be approaching the humus stage, and if it is not, it should be spaded into the soil at least three or four months before the bulbs are planted, and spaded in so deeply the roots will not strike it before it has a chance to decay and lose its strength.

"There is one fertilizer and only one, for bulbs, which is bone meal, and this should be used liberally. It is a lasting fertilizer, and, incorporated in the soil some time before the bulbs are planted, will be ready to yield them food all the quicker. In big bulbs of the narcissus and hyacinth type, a little bone meal should be dug into the soil under the bulbs. Bone meal with an occasional liming to help free the fertilizing elements are all the fertilizing bulbs need or can stand."—Ex.

DANGEROUS WELLS AND SPRINGS.

It is indeed a modest property owner who will not boast of his well. The coolness, clearness and general excellence of their water supply is a favorite topic of conversation with thousands of people.

When investigations are made by sanitary experts, the water of many of these wells and springs has time and again shown pollution, which means that they are positively dangerous for human consumption. Unfortunately, water may appear clear and be agreeable in taste, when it contains sewage organisms which may cause typhoid fever or dysentery, when taken into the system. Much of our rural typhoid is due to polluted wells and springs.

No well should be located near a cesspool, privy or barnyard where the drainage from these places can reach, directly or indirectly, by seepage through the water-bearing strata. In a limestone country there is particular danger of sewage or animal wastes, which find their way through fissures in the rock, and may reappear many miles away in some subterranean stream which serves as a water supply.

Open wells are particularly liable to pollution, and all wells should be carefully walled and covered, to prevent surface and direct drainage from contaminating them. The close proximity of possible sources of pollution should be sufficient to place any well or spring under suspicion.

Unfortunately, many property owners who strive to keep their houses and grounds in a clean, sanitary condition, overlook this vital factor.

The cost of a water-tight stone or cement covering which will deflect drainage from the well, or the sinking of a new well in a safe locality, is vastly more economical than a single case of typhoid fever.—"Little Talks on Health and Hygiene," by Samuel G. Dixon, M.D., LL.D., Commissioner of Health.

A FOOL'S PARADISE.

BY KITTIE SUMMERS.

Many of us are foolishly visionary and are hoping against hope. John Joseph had dreams of coming wealth when he, as a school teacher of twenty-three, left his desk and went to the Golden State as one of the fabled Argonauts. Sometimes he enjoyed a large salary; often he was without work. Like the average miner, he often staked claims that yielded little. He had no capital to mine them and the mountains were too rough for railroads. Interested capitalists were too wary to advance thousands to a penniless young enthusiast. He pursued this will of the wisp until he was a man of fifty. He never lived to see the fulfillment of his dream. Something more practical, patiently pursued, would have given him a fair competency. John spent twenty-seven years in a fool's paradise.

Frequently men canvass villages, selling mining stock, and unfortunate indeed is the victim who bites at the "bait."

About eight years ago our family invested jointly in some rubber stock. We did it as many level-headed men set the example. We have received not a cent of dividends. The company writes us hopeful letters as to possible results. It has been a "fool's paradise" for us.

I know a young school girl who "led on" a young man with her bewildering beauty just to extort gifts from him. He promised a Victrola as a graduating gift. She shrewdly said: "After that I will let him go, as I care nothing special for him." Her mother permitted all this. The trusting young man thought of marriage, but it was the old story; he, too, had been living in a fool's paradise.

Another young man received adoring letters from a pretty girl who had other admirers. She wrote all manner of affectionate things, but would not commit herself to a permanent betrothal. She had a good mother, too. After a while her letters grew "cool," for the poor moth had fluttered near the blaze. I presume she was tired of him.

I wonder if such silly butterfly girls can settle down to the calm round of domestic life? The admirer had also been living in a fool's paradise.

GLORIFY YOUR JOB.

BY DOLLY GOODWILL.

It is a blazing hot day in July and I am alone at home, resting. My two sons have packed their grips and gone back to their work in the mail cars. My houseful of company is gone. I always entertain during Chautauqua week. I invite country friends to tarry and we all go trooping together to the tent. I like to make people glad with humble hospitality. It has been my lot in life to cheer others and make them jolly; but I am not a clown.

It takes little to make some people glad. I am the only woman on the list of Chautauqua guarantors. I use my telephone and help advertise the good causes. When the men turned out en masse to erect the tent, I simply put on my second best white dress and sat with a pail of ice water and glasses, and bade them quench their thirst, and be of good cheer if they cracked their thumbs. A young girl would not dare do this. My white hair is my protection!

It is well to be joyful in whatever work we do. I am glad to say that in everyday life I have always been a willing burden-bearer. I do not like to hear people talk of "bearing the heat and burden of the day." I am shocked to hear persons groaning about "carrying their cross." There was only one who bore the ignominious cross, and he did not complain! In small places it is usually the lot of a few to carry the church and social burdens. Let such be proud of their efficiency. Preachers and teachers lead.

I recall a dear church brother who finally spoke up and said: "I am the church dog. I am the social dog. I am the school dog. I am my wife's dog! Some are born to be leaders. Some are leaders because others will not lead. Sainted Mary Lyon, of Holyoke fame, said to her girls: "Take the position that no one else wants; that will be your mission."

A SURE CROP.

Old fashioned horse-radish, one of the best known vegetable condiments, is a garden crop that never fails, according to the Department of Horticulture, Ohio Experiment Station.

To start a horse-radish bed, small root cuttings may be secured and kept in moist sand in the cellar over winter. They may be planted in fertile soil in the spring in rows three feet apart and ten to twelve inches apart in the rows.

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE FOR HIGH PRICES?

"Tain't me," says the farmer, "who's getting the stuff." "Tain't me," says the packer; "I get just enough To pay a small profit as fair as can be." And all of them chorus together, "Tain't me." "Tain't me," says the tanner, "who gets the big price. For high shoes, and low ones, for slippers and ties." "Tain't me," says the rancher; "I live, and that's all." "Tain't me," says the dealer; "my profits are small." "Tain't me," says the canner; "my margin's the same." "Tain't me," says the huckster, "who's bracing the game." "Tain't me," says the gardener; "I'm poor all the time." "Tain't me," says the grocer; "I ain't seen a dime." It's surely a puzzle to know where it goes. No maker, no sellers, nor any of those. Partake of high prices, so they all agree. Me—I'm a consumer; I'm certain 'tain't me.—Ex.

Military Preparedness.—The morning before an attack was to be made upon a village occupied by German troops, George Washington Johnson, of the Mississippi colored troops, took his place in line with a large and somewhat battered pan attached to his equipment. This attracted the attention of the officer in charge, who demanded an explanation. "Indeed, sah," said the soldier, "I done headh de boss say dat when we got into dat town yonder we was goin' to cook Fritzie's goose, and I surc doan' wan' to miss dat cookin'."

The Trodden Path.—A Massachusetts man, famed for his dry humor, never having taken a sea trip, conceived the idea one day of making a real voyage. Accordingly, he sailed from Boston in a small schooner.

The first day out a storm was encountered and the old gentleman became violently sick; but after several hours he mustered up courage and strength to look out upon the troubled waters. As he gazed from the side of the little vessel up the trough of the sea, it seemed very smooth to him. The captain's cutting of the waves was senseless, he felt sure. But as this mad steering continued, the unhappy passenger finally crawled out, on hands and knees, to where the captain stood at the wheel, and, raising his voice above the din of waves and wind, shouted: "Man, keep in the ruts, keep in the ruts!"

He Missed the Old Home Church

He is a freshman at the university. It is his first year away from home. He is still lonely. He was especially lonely at the beginning. He wrote home about all of the loved faces and familiar surroundings which he missed so greatly and he said: "Perhaps it is because today is Sunday, but it seems to me that most of all I miss the old home church."

That's a most natural sentiment from a Christian boy, isn't it? But suppose he should go through those university years out of touch with the old home church and with nothing to take its place—no home-like place of worship, no friendly, helpful pastor, no regular religious nourishment!

It is to supply what is missed through absence from the old home church that Presbyterian student pastors are maintained at State universities. They are friends in need to lonely young men and women, guides through the untried paths of a new world. Many more of them are needed. Your liberal gifts are solicited for their support.

A PRAYER FOR THE WORLD

BY EMILY J. BRYANT.

Look, Lord, in pity on the nations' needs,
For thou dost see, with perfect sight and true,
The world o'erswept with selfishness. It heeds
Not heavenly grace distilled as evening's dew;
Thy sacrificial love seems all forgot
And man's tempestuous nature swift and hot.

Bring thou thy strength and beauty to thy saints;
Enrobe them with thy righteousness and power
To face and struggle with the world's sad plaints,
When men are shrinking in this fateful hour.
Oh, may they stand for righteousness and peace.
Oh, may this tide of wrong forever cease.

Lead on thy saints against the rule of sin
Till hate be overwhelmed with brotherhood;
And man shall rise in strong desire to win
Thy likeness true, and seek his brother's good;
Till thy great gift of peace descend on men
And earth proclaim a lasting loud Amen.

Newton, N. J.

OUR EXCHANGES

THE DEITY OF CHRIST.

Deity would appear to be the right word to express the thought that the Lord Jesus was, in the nature of his person, as truly God as he was truly man. Men may talk of the divinity of Jesus who would hesitate to affirm his deity. It is for this very reason that we prefer to use the latter term. It is unambiguous. It goes straight to the mark. It leaves no fair doubt of our meaning.—Christian Standard.

PEACE AT LAST.

We don't know whether the experts are right or not about the ruinous results of another war, but we don't believe we could survive another armistice.—Columbia Record.

A BAD MESS.

What a mess we are in! Thousands of men are walking the streets with nothing to do, while thousands are throwing up jobs and striking because they can not get an increase in wages, although they are getting twice as much as they ever got before. The coal barons are robbing us right and left. They put up prices far above reason, and when the people will not buy they drop a dollar and expect the "poor consumer" to fall for the game. If somebody is not being robbed in this land today, we do not know a thief when we see him. The world is always out of joint when men put money before God.—Methodist Protestant.

A QUANDARY.

Somebody has left two millions and a half for the advancement of liberal views in this country. The papers have not announced whether the three trustees who are to administer the fund will be a Sinn Feiner, an I. W. W. and a pacifist, or whether they will be a Unitarian, Hicksite and anti-fundamentalist.—Congregationalist.

OUR NATIONAL DEBT.

One hundred years ago $9.44 from every person in the United States would have paid off the public debt. In 1916 $9.88 would have done it. Now it would require $235.40 per capita. To keep the wheels of government running this year costs us $62.42 per capita. In 1910 it was $43.79; and the year the war ended, $39.74. In 1916 it was $7.62. The eagle seems to be a fit symbol for our dollar. Surely this mad increase must cease soon. Is not the duty of the church to create a sentiment against such wild extravagance?—United Presbyterian.

COSTLY MACHINERY.

The great Interchurch failure was not simply a spurt—it was a culmination, a crisis in the deadly disease, and the church makes slow recovery from it. The cost of the machinery of the Protestant church today is fabulous. For instance, the salary bill for eight of our own boards for the last year, according to the Report of the Boards, was $380,110. This includes no other expense of incidentals or of commissions or committees. Both the Assembly and some of the boards, even under the present pressure, do not hesitate to increase expenses by the thousands.—Presbyterian.

FEDERAL COUNCIL.

The annual meeting of the Executive Committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America will be held in Chicago Dec. 14th to 16th. Word has been received of the death, on Sept. 26th, of the chairman of the Executive Committee of the Federal Council, Bishop Walter R. Lambuth, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in a hospital at Yokohama, Japan. Bishop Lambuth has been one of the most notable figures in American church life during this generation, having rendered missionary service in China, Japan and Africa. The first vice-chairman, Rev. Frederick W. Burnham, president of the United Christian Missionary Society, will be the acting chairman of the committee.

AID FOR PRESBYTERIANS IN EUROPE.

The American Section of the World Alliance of the Reformed Churches holding the Presbyterian System is issuing an earnest appeal to all Presbyterian and Reformed churches to aid the oppressed and suffering Presbyterian and Reformed churches of Europe. The plan of action is as follows:

1. That Reformation Day, Sabbath, Oct. 30th, be observed in our churches as a day of prayer for the Continent of Europe, especially for the suffering brethren of the Presbyterian faith there. That suitable sermons be preached, and earnest prayer be offered for the suffering ministers and members of their faith in Europe. They also ask that, where possible, money be gathered and sent to the denominational treasurers of European funds, which, in our case, is our Board of Foreign Missions.

2. That a clothing drive be inaugurated for November and December, in which new clothing, clothing slightly worn, underclothing of all kinds, shoes, sheeting for hospitals and orphanages, etc., be gathered. This clothing, etc., will be sent direct to the Reformed and Presbyterian pastors in Europe for distribution. The clothing and shoes, etc., are to be sent to the American-European Transport Co., 40 N. Water Street, Philadelphia, who will forward them. A sum of 15 cents per pound, to pay for the transportation to Europe, should be sent to Mr. Milton Warner, 2232 N. 15th Street, Philadelphia. It is also expected that a Tract, giving fuller details of the needs of those ministers and congregations, will be sent to the ministers of the Presbyterian and Reformed denominations by Oct. 20th.

This movement was commended at the recent World Council of the Reformed Church holding the Presbyterian System at its meeting at Pittsburgh, Sept. 16th to 25th. The great Apostle says, "As we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith." (Gal. 6: 10) These are of our household.

THE ARMY AND THE SABBATH.

An official statement issued by the War Department on Sept. 1st contains a fine acknowledgment of the significance of the Sabbath in the life of the nation. The document has to do with "Conduct of Troops Changing Station by Marching," and is known officially as Circular 229. Among the instructions "published for the guidance of all concerned" is the following:

"The sentiment of the nation concerning Sabbath observance should be respected, and no marches, except in cases of necessity, be made on Sunday. Opportunity should be provided for religious services, conducted by the chaplain or through community co-operation, and dignified publicity of such services should be made."

This action, published by order of the Secretary of War, and signed by General Pershing, as Chief of Staff, is another heartening illustration of the new place which the chaplains have given to religion in the Army.

In connection with this order of the present day, it is interesting to recall an order issued by George Washington at Valley Forge, May 2, 1778, a copy of which the Chief of Chaplains, John T. Axton, has communicated to the Federal Council of the Churches:

"The Commander-in-Chief directs that divine service be performed every Sunday at eleven o'clock in each brigade which has chaplains. Those brigades which have none will attend the places of worship nearest to them. It is expected that officers of all ranks will, by their attendance, set an example to their men. While we are duly performing the duty of good soldiers we certainly ought not to be insoldiers, we certainly ought not to be in-To the distinguishing characteristics of a patriot it should be our highest glory to add the more distinguished characteristic of a Christian."

THE ANTI-BEER BILL.

BY HON. WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN.

The Conference report on the anti-beer bill meets the situation, and should be passed at once by the Senate. The supporters of enforcement do not desire to make the laws any more strict than necessary to compel obedience. A private residence is a permanent building and it is entirely proper to require a warrant for search. This might even be extended to permit any bona-fide resident to protect his home from search without warrant, by making affidavit that he has no liquor unlawfully concealed therein. But it is different with automobiles. To require a warrant before searching a suspected auto would practically nullify the law. The auto could get into another county before a warrant could be secured. It is inconceivable that any dry Senator can be deceived by the mock heroics of the wets.

Liberty to disobey the law is not considered sacred by any large percentage of the American people.

A filibuster by a minority to prevent the enforcement of a constitutional provision is about as undemocratic a procedure as could be imagined, especially a constitutional provision which outlaws a criminal traffic.

A PROMINENT MINISTER COMMENTS BLACKBURN COLLEGE

Rev. F. N. McMillin, D.D., pastor of First Presbyterian Church, Walnut Hills, Cincinnati, writes:

"If every Presbyterian pastor knew how deeply moved our people were, what a blessing came to us and the response that was made when Dr. Wm. M. Hudson, president of Blackburn, told us, with the aid of the stereopticon, the wonderful story of this self-help college, he would ask to have this story told to his people. President Hudson should be heard in every pulpit in America."

Pastors who wish to have this illustrated story of "America's Most Exclusive College" told in their pulpits should write for date to President Wm. Hudson, Carlinville, Ill.

A "SPECIAL OBJECT" IN UTAH

On September 21st the Presbyterian General Board of Education voted to make the equipment and endowment of Utah's Westminster College a "special object."

This action was taken because the Board realized that the case of Westminster was distinct from that of any other Presbyterian college in America in at least three respects—in the size of the college field without a competitor, in the difficulty of the field and in the weakness of the local support.

The Board voted to give Westminster's urgent needs publicity throughout the Church, and employ a special representative to present those needs to Presbyterian givers. This special favor is given this college to enable it to become a well equipped and endowed four-year college in a Mormon state, where it stands as the only Christian college.

Particulars regarding this advanced movement will be gladly given if you will send your name and address to President H. W. Reherd, D.D., Westminster College, Salt Lake City, Utah.

GOD'S LAWS NOT GRIEVOUS.

Some people are always interested in securing better laws, and do a great deal of work in promoting the passage and the enforcement of such legislation as will bring about a more orderly and wholesome life among all the people. Some persons however are very much opposed to any such efforts. They argue against them, sneer at them, are angry over them and fight against them. They vote against any such regulations, deride and abuse them, and then set themselves, as anarchists and rebels, to override and break them, and to break them down. Such laws as those against the liquor traffic, gambling, white slavery and Sabbath desecration might be instanced.

It may be said, without fear of successful contradiction, that no human laws have ever been passed against these evils that have been as strict as God's laws. Those who set themselves against these human laws are assuredly more opposed to the divine laws. Those who rail against the human laws on these subjects, and jeer and sneer at them as "blue laws," are, in their hearts, in secret and determined rebellion against God and his laws of holiness. No Christian man ever has the sneering words, "blue laws," on his lips. He knows that the words are a scoff and gibe against God and morality and holiness.

The immoral man who is bitter and contemptuous against civil laws aimed at vice and crime, and who calls them "blue laws," needs to be reminded that our country passes laws that are "red, white and blue," and that every one who is loyal obeys them, as a good citizen should. He needs to be instructed that all God's laws are "white" laws, calling for strict righteousness and "holiness without which no man shall see the Lord." The man who loves God as a Christian, and who is loyal to his country as a good citizen, will keep the laws of both, and will not think any of them severe.

It is evident that there must be a great difference, morally, between men who so differently regard the laws of God and of their country. Good people love good laws. Immoral and dangerous people hate, oppose and break them.

When the Apostle John cries out earnestly, "His commandments are not grievous," we know that he is in hearty agreement with God. He says that there is no love of God without obedience to his will, insisting: "This is the love of God, that we keep his commandments." It was not hard for him to keep God's laws. To him they were not grievous, nor are they to any one who is a Christian.

To the profane swearer the Third Commandment is grievous; to the murderer, the Sixth; to the libertine, the Seventh; to the thief, the Eighth; to the slanderer, the Ninth; to the irreligious and unbelieving, all the calls to faith and repentance, and all the injunctions to take Jesus Christ as the only hope and Savior. To all such persons God's Commandments are grievous, because they themselves are a grief to God, and rebels against his control. They must be converted, born again, new creatures, or they never will be at peace with God, and in harmony with his holiness and his will.

The Christian loves God. He has been brought into the new life. He is one with God through Jesus Christ, and by the Holy Spirit. He delights to do God's will. Of course to him the Commandments of God are not grievous. The divine yoke is easy and the burden is light. He is obedient. He is a good citizen of the kingdom of God.

THE ERA OF THE GROTESQUE.

We believe in the ultimate triumph of righteousness, but not that all progress is upward, nor that every new era is an improvement on that which preceded it.

Our age may be, as one writer expresses it, "the period in which human reason triumphed over all other forces." It certainly is not the period in which "civilization reaches its highwater mark."

Future historians may write it down as the mechanical era, or the age of invention, but machinery is not the whole of civilization. Some may write it the era of sports or amusements or great fortunes, but these are not the whole of civilization. Indeed the record of history is that with the older civilizations these were premonitions or accompaniments of decay.

Evidences as to the real character and advance of civilization in any era must be found in its laws and moral standards and religious principles, as exhibited in its literature, music and art.

It is easy to flatter ourselves with assertions that ours is the "new era," or the "golden age," or the "post-victorian period," or "the dawn of the millennium," but the facts are not flattering.

A musical authority recently deplored the passing of classical music. The old overtures and cantatas and symphonies are rarely given. The popular music in most quarters is jazz, which is really little more than organized discord.

An authority on the drama says: "There is little demand or support for legitimate plays." "The popular performances are exhibitions of absurdities or depravity." The idols of the stage are its clowns.

Most daily papers print colored supplements filled with fanciful and often offensive pictures, which are as far from true art as jazz is from true music.

The output of literature has greatly increased, but much of it is in harmony with jazz and the colored supplements. Stories with impossible plots and poetry with neither rhyme nor rhythm, and philosophy with all manner of absurd claims and suggestions have largely supplanted the substantial fiction and philosophy and educational literature of the past.

New religions or philosophies or social cults would be laughed out of existence were it not that foolish people accept them. Indeed, the more grotesque they are the more they appeal to a certain class of minds.

We still believe in the ultimate triumph of righteousness and the general prevalence of education and common sense, but we do not lose sight of tendencies which make for decay. The ideals of one generation affect the character of the next.

If our youth are trained to worship the trifling and grotesque, or to make sport the chief end of life, they and possibly the youth who come after them, face the task of learning the principles upon which we can expect individual, social and national success.

UNIVERSAL BIBLE DAY.

It has come to be a widely observed custom to observe one day in the churches as Universal Bible Day. This year it is November 27th, although another day may do as well if this is not convenient. The American Bible Society, at Bible House, Astor Place, New York, will send leaflets and other literature, if asked for, that will help in getting some most valuable facts before the people of the country. The American Bible Society has for its sole object the circulation of the Holy Scriptures without note or comment.

It has issued over 140,000,000 volumes of the Scriptures in more than 150 languages and dialects, and in twelve systems for the blind. Seven million copies were distributed to soldiers and sailors during the World War. The Scriptures are furnished for immigrants of all nationalities from the Bible House. Hospitals and jails are supplied with the Word; colporteurs take the Book to the poor and neglected. It is supported by voluntary contributions. Gifts and legacies are gratefully received. It would be well for every one to write to the society for information and literature, or to become acquainted with its work at the local depository. There should be the real observance of "Bible Day."

FEDERATION AGAINST ALCOHOL.

Representatives of the student bodies of twelve countries became organizers of a world student federation against alcohol in a three day conference held the last of August at Lausanne, Switzerland. Coming immediately after the sessions of the Sixteenth International Congress against Alcoholism, this action is most significant in the international struggle against the alcoholic traffic. The countries represented are: Austria, Sweden, Switzerland, Estonia, United States of America, Belgium, Germany, France, Great Britain, Holland, Bulgaria and Czecho-Slovakia.

The outstanding feature of the conference was the fraternity displayed and the universal good feeling which existed. The gripping needs of a world sick of alcohol brought a union of spirit and feeling which put all past national feelings into oblivion. The spirit of "Everybody's World" was strong upon the students.

In framing the constitution of the new movement, the following items were provided: The name of the organization to be "The World Student Federation Against Alcoholism"; the object "to create, propagate and deepen among the students of the higher institutions of learning in all countries, the study of the causes, effects and prevention of alcoholism"; the membership to embrace all student societies in sympathy with the object; the officary to be chosen on a basis of personal abstinence from the use of beverage alcohol; meetings to be held once each two years; and an executive international committee to govern the affairs of the federation in the interim between the bi-yearly meetings. The officers elected are: President, Dr. Courtenay C. Weeks, London, England; Secretary, Onno van der Veen, Amsterdam, Holland; Treasurer and International Secretary, Harry S. Warner, Chicago, Illinois, U. S. A.

It is a matter of encouragement and congratulation that this work is being done in and by the enterprising student body of the world.

A CALL FOR ARMENIAN RELIEF.

Some people may say they are tired of reading calls for relief for Armenians and other Near East peoples. They would be a good deal more tired if they were, themselves, in the starving and dreadful condition of these mistreated and suffering and forlorn people, who, through persecution and assault and robbery, have been made to suffer the loss of all things.

At few times in the history of civilization has an entire race of people been found in such dire straits as are the Armenians at the present time. It is not enough that their homes have been destroyed, their crops trampled down and cattle confiscated, but to crown it all, cholera is ravaging the country, killing off many whose resistance is low from lack of food. The fact that food and clothing are scarce renders the thousands of homeless refugees easy prey to the plague. It is certain that many thousands will die this winter from cold and hunger even though America does send five million bushels of grain as pledged by American farmers.

The Near East Relief Commission was sent to Armenia by the national headquarters of the organization in New York City to examine at first hand the existing conditions, and to discover if those conditions paralleled with what we had been told regarding them. The Commission, of which Rev. Dr. Sherman Divine, of Spokane, Washington, was chairman, was composed of members of the national organization together with a representation of disinterested men from different sections of the country. E. W. Huelster is Secretary. He says:

"What we observed during our eight weeks' examination more than bears out the facts which have been told during the past few years regarding the conditions in that stricken land. In the face of the existing conditions and with no crops in prospect, affairs in the Near East will reach a crisis by mid-winter. Food is growing scarcer every day. Fuel is difficult to obtain and the only clothing available must come from the outside sources of relief. Unless the food rations are increased, the death rate in our orphanages will advance rapidly.

"Just since the national grain campaign started, conditions in the Near East have rapidly gone from bad to worse, what with renewed outbreaks of cholera and vast refugee movements. The five million bushels of grain pledged by American farmers, Ohio's share, being 97 carloads of corn and 47 of wheat, will help. Lives in the Near East now are being measured by the bushel."

"The total of the bushels of grain given by the farmers of America to aid the starving will be an index to the number of lives that will be saved this winter," says Dr. Huelster, who states that efforts to provide gifts of corn from farmers in Ohio and adjacent states must be redoubled in order to feed the hundreds of thousands beset by starvation and epidemics of cholera.

The headquarters of the Near East Relief Committee is still No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York City, and of the Ohio Near East Relief Agricultural Committee, Cleveland Plain Dealer, Cleveland Ohio.

MONEY AND THE KINGDOM.

People talk about hard times, but the way in which they are spending money shows anything but hard times, except as they bring about such a condition by parting with their money for many things they do not need. The tax collection report from the Bureau of Internal Revenue at Washington City, says that the government received taxes totalling approximately $579,000,000 from purchases of cigars, cigarettes, theatrical tickets, club membership dues, sporting goods and similar matters for the last fiscal year.

The tax on such things is approximately 10 per cent, except on tobacco, where it is slightly below 5 per cent. Tickets for amusement and theaters amounted to $96,000,000. The collection of tobacco taxes was just under $254,000,000.

It was estimated by the Bureau that about $5,080,000,000 was spent by the people for tobacco, on this basis, and that about $960,000,000 was spent on theaters and similar amusements.

These are not guesses made by reformers of any sort, but are the plain, actual figures given by the authorities concerned in the collection of taxes. There can be no successful claim made for the existence of hard times when expenditures of the sort named amount to such figures as those indicated. Whatever may be the differences of opinion as to these things, they can not be claimed to be necessities. The people are spending thousands of millions of dollars annually for that which is not bread.

Our expenditures for religion and education seem paltry when compared with the six thousand millions spoken of above. Our own Presbyterian body, in all of its ten thousand churches last year, from every source and for every object, at home and abroad, raised less than fifty millions, and it was a great year for our Presbyterian Church, and our Church probably stands at the head of the churches.

When shall there come the day when men will be as ready to give for the kingdom of Christ and the uplift of the world as it now gives freely and gladly for mere pleasure and personal gratification? When that day comes the earth will be filled with the knowledge and the glory of God.

A HIGH PRIVILEGE.

It does not always pay to defend one's rights. At times it must be done, but usually the better way is to consider the rights of others as well as their ignorance and weakness, and to eliminate personal pride and resentment.

There may be conflicts of rights, or misunderstanding, or the issue may be unimportant. Let one settle it first, that the right is certainly a right, and second, that it is worth defending. Then let him consider whether, after all, he would not better exercise his right to give it up. It is often the Christian's high privilege to yield what he might defend and to be silent where he might prove claims. It is his right to give up his rights.

An old grandmother, unused to travel, crowded herself with bundles and satchel and a basket of apples and a bird cage into the car seat with a young girl, fairly forcing her out. "Why don't you tell her she is encroaching on your rights?" some one asked. "It is not worth while to trouble the poor old soul. We have only a little way to go together," she replied. Many people do encroach thoughtlessly, some do it through ignorance and some through helplessness and others selfishly. The young girl's words are worth remembering, "We have only a little way to go together."

But if one gets into the habit of yielding, will he not be taken advantage of? Possibly. Nevertheless unselfishness, kindly consideration and the habit of construing the actions of others in the most favorable way pays in the long run.

Almost without exception the presbyteries have expressed their appreciation of President Harding for calling the Disarmament Conference and have asked the churches to observe Sabbath, Nov. 6th, as a day of prayer for divine guidance in the proposed meeting.

Christian people have no reason to be discouraged by the crime and wickedness and falsehood that characterize so many people at this time. It is simply a call for more consecration and faith and prayer. The German armies did not discourage the Allies, and make them give up. Our brave soldiers knew that they were to face and fight those very enemies and they did it. So let all good Christian people today take on more courage, and go on in faith and prayer to win the victories over sin. We know perfectly well that we are on God's side, and of him we read that "he shall not fail nor be discouraged."

The Synod of Texas took sturdy ground as to the evangelical faith of our Presbyterian Church, at its last meeting, and the report of that meeting should be read carefully. Those who charge that our Presbyterian Church has departed from the Gospel faith because it has had an occasional traitor, might as well charge that the people of the United States are unpatriotic because it has had a Benedict Arnold and a John Wilkes Booth.

Sabbath, Oct. 30th, has been named as Reformation Day, and pastors have the opportunity on that day to bring to the remembrance of the people the meaning of that mighty movement which was a change of front for half the world. The Reformation was a vital necessity for the preservation of the purity and power of the Christian religion, and an emphasis of its great principles was never more necessary than it is today. For these principles there should be a place every Sabbath of every year.

A minister and his family were recently going to the Pacific Coast and planned to go by Salt Lake City, but were compelled to change their arrangement and go by another route. Arriving at their destination they found that their intended train had been held up by bandits and the passengers robbed. The minister writes: "You may make whatever interpretation of this you please, but we are nestling in the faith that we have a Father who cares for and favors those who believe in him and trust him when we pray." It is a comfort to be a Christian-believer and to "rest in the Lord."

WITH STEADFAST CHEER.

BY FRED SCOTT SHEPARD.

"Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path."—Psa. 119:106.

A light to mark the pathway,
A lamp unto the feet,
The Word of God unwa'ring gleams;
Across life's darkness ever streams
Its radiance, all complete.

No need to wander longer
In ways so dark and drear,
For, as a beacon shining bright,
God's Word illumines earth's darkest night,
And glows with steadfast cheer.

Seek but to know its message;
The truth it hath to show;
And, though the clouds may shroud the way,
'Twill give safe guidance day by day,
Make clear the path to go.

DEAD OR ALIVE—LOST OR SAVED?

BY REV. JOHN Y. EWART, D.D.

That describes the condition of every living man and woman. We are either spiritually dead or spiritually alive. The Book makes it plain that you and I are either walking about, dead in trespasses and sins, or alive in Christ by virtue of the implanting of divine life in our souls. The issues of life and death are so vast and vital that it surely becomes every one of us to find out at once on which side of the dividing line we are.

There is such a thing as being spiritually dead when you are still busy with the work and warfare of life. Your heart may be far from God. You may be thoroughly engrossed with the things of time and sense. You may be under the dominion of the world, the flesh and the devil. You may be a total stranger to the spiritual life. Or, on the other hand, you may be in daily communion with God through prayer and right living, you may be thoroughly in harmony with his will through conscious obedience to his every command. Now the important thing is for each of us to ask: On which side of the line am I? Am I lost or am I saved?

The Bible was written for our instruction on such vital matters. Salvation has no meaning if there is no difference between a lost man and a saved man. There is a fathomless gulf fixed between salvation and perdition.

How can I know? How can I determine my own spiritual condition? How may I know that I am among the number of the saved? How may I know that I am not among the number of the eternally lost? What is it to be eternally lost as distinguished from being eternally saved? These are all-important questions and should be most earnestly considered by every man and woman.

For the Bible makes a clear and strong distinction between these two opposite conditions of the soul.

Let us study, by way of illustration, Christ's conversation with Nicodemus, recorded in St. John's Gospel, chapter three. We are pondering the words of the Savior himself, let us recollect; let us give them their due weight; they are eternally significant.

This inquirer, distinguished and scholarly, earnestly sought light on the most vital questions in a midnight interview with the Savior of mankind.

Listen to Jesus' first reply:

"Except a man be born again he can not see the kingdom of God" (John 3:3).

Notice, that in the background of this reply there is a recognition by Christ of the eternal separation of good from evil, of right from wrong, of the kingdom of light from the kingdom of darkness. Nicodemus is informed that no soul can cross the border line dividing these two kingdoms except through the new birth. Nicodemus is further informed that "spirit and flesh" represent two different kinds of worlds. A most radical transformation must take place in the soul that crosses from one to the other. The scholarly inquirer is perplexed. The distinction is new to him. He can not understand "the new birth." "How can these things be?" is his astonished remark.

But "the new birth" must take place in any soul that emerges from darkness to light and from the power of Satan unto God. The doomed rich man was informed that "there is a great gulf fixed: so that they that would pass from thence to you can not; neither can they pass to us that would come from thence" (Luke 16:26).

And listen to the terribly pointed alternatives used by the Savior and his apostles:

"He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life: and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life; but the wrath of God abideth on him" (John 3:36).

"For the Son of man is come to seek and to save that which was lost" (Luke 19:10).

"God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life. For God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world; but that the world through him might be saved. He that believeth on him is not condemned: but he that believeth not is condemned already, because he hath not believed in the name of the only begotten Son of God" (John 3:16-18).

Notice, dear friend, the sharply defined antithesis between what Christ says of the saved and the lost. No equivocation! No evasion! No covering up of the tremendous issue! Saved or lost? Which shall it be for you and me?

Do you want to hear from St. Paul on this subject? Listen:

"The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord" (Rom. 6:23).

"You hath he quickened who were dead in trespasses and sins" (Eph. 2:1).

And all through the Bible the choice between life and death is offered to men. The possibility of eternal life or the possibility of eternal death. Alternatives of tremendous moment! Should not mortal men and women pause, reflect and repent before it is too late?

I have been deeply touched and moved by the little book of Dr. E. F. Hallenbeck, entitled, "The Passion for Souls," in which he says:

"I shall never forget the impression made upon my mind by Ruben's famous picture of the crucifixion which hangs in the Royal Gallery at Antwerp. While I stood before it, everything else faded from my vision. There are many figures in the painting, but I saw only the loving, grief-scarred face upon that middle cross. My companions passed on, I was riveted to the spot. And when at length some one reminded me that the moments were slipping by, and I went on to view some of the other pictures in those celebrated corridors, it was to have everything else blurred with the vision of that matchless face. In a little while I was back upon Golgotha, bathing once more in my Savior's love."

Your place and mine is close against the bleeding side, the broken heart of the Son of God. But we are not there alone for refuge. We are there to find a worthy conception of life, and a motive power that will impel us and compel us. Here is the meaning of the Cross:

"The love of Christ constraineth us; because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then all died; and that he died for all, that they which live should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them and rose again" (II Cor. 5:14, 15).

THE BIBLE IN THE SCHOOL.

A decision is to be sought in the Supreme Court of the United States to determine whether or not the Bible can legally be excluded from the public schools. Joint action by various church denominations is being organized to this end by members of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A. The action had its inception in the Synod of Washington, by official vote of that body, and at the head of the movement is R. L. Edmiston, a Presbyterian layman of Spokane, Wash. The state of Washington is made the center of the movement because that state is a notable example of the official exclusion of the Bible from the public schools.

The line of attack for the restoration of the Bible in the public schools throughout the United States will be based on the Declaration of Independence. The Synod of Washington claims that the Declaration of Independence is a covenant between the American nation and God, and that the study of the Bible by American children is essential to an understanding of that covenant and to full knowledge of God.

The synod quotes from the Declaration as "appealing to the Supreme Judge of the World," and that this appeal to God was an admission of the over-all sovereignty of God, and implies that a perpetual covenant existed between the American people and this "Supreme Judge of the World." The synod further contends that the terms and evidence of this covenant were set forth in the Bible and in the "laws of nature and of nature's God." The synod further points out that "so help me God" is an oath required by the federal laws of all officers, judges and servants except the President, and required also of every juror, witness and attorney in every United States court.

To exclude the Bible from the public schools, the synod contends, is to violate one of the essential clauses of the opening paragraph of the Declaration of Independence. For example, in the state of Washington the Attorney-General and later the State Supreme Court have rendered an opinion in which the Bible in effect is adjudged to be a "sectarian" book, and in which it is decreed to be unconstitutional to read or teach the Bible in the state schools. The synod declares "that this ruling, opinion and construction is erroneous, and that the state constitutional provisions so constructed are void as being in conflict with and repugnant to the principles of the Declaration of Independence."

"This ruling," continues the synod in its presentment preparatory to an appeal to the Supreme Court, "is repugnant to and in conflict with the principles in the clause of the Declaration of Independence, 'To assume, among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitles them,' in that all citizens are equally entitled to instruction in 'the Laws of Nature' and also 'of Nature's God,' which latter are spiritual and obtainable from the Bible. This ruling makes it impossible to obtain such knowledge in the school system of the state, although elaborate provisions are made for teaching the 'Law of Nature.'"

The synod further contends: "This ruling is also repugnant to the clause, 'That they (all men) are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness,' in that every man is entitled to knowledge of his Creator and the manner and purpose of these his endowments, knowledge which is obtainable only from the Bible and which is thus excluded from being part of the education of the youth provided to fit them for civil duties of our Christian nation."

Furthermore, according to this Presbyterian presentment, "Under the Declaration of Independence, every child has a paramount civil and political right to be given an education in the truth and science of the religion set forth in the Bible, exclusive of any personal and worshipful element therein, in order that he may intelligently direct his soul or eternal life, and understand the foundations and functioning of our government."

Extensive arguments are presented to show that no state has a right to exclude from its system of education "instruction in the science of religion as set forth in the Bible, the only book which sets forth the existence, laws and other attributes of the Divine Providence to which the Declaration of Independence is committed, without this exclusion being repugnant to the Declaration and therefore void."

Rather than adopt strenuous measures as a single denomination, the Presbyterians of Washington are first perfecting a federated organization representing all denominations, to "establish the teaching of the Bible as a part of the education the constitution requires the state to provide for; and to obtain the opinion of the highest courts thereon, including the opinion or deliverance of the Supreme Court of the United States, and also a plebiscite, if deemed necessary."

Mr. Edmiston, who is preparing the preliminary papers for such court proceedings, speaking officially for the Synod of Washington, said: "We are taking steps to thoroughly test this question, with a view of getting a decision in the United States Supreme Court as to whether total suppression of Biblical instruction in the public school is repugnant to the principles of the Declaration of Independence."

FROM THE WESTERN OFFICE.

BY REV. B. P. FULLERTON, D.D.

Texas Synod met in Wichita Falls, on October 5th and elected Rev. Dr. Glenn L. Sneed as its moderator. I have not been with this synod for a number of years and was able to see great improvement in almost every way.

The last synod appointed a committee to prepare a report on a new form of synodical organization, and much interest was manifested in it, but all seemed to be more concerned about the progress of the kingdom than the particular form the work should take. But after careful consideration and counsel it was decided to await the action of the Assembly's Committee on Organization. A committee was appointed to study the situation, and, when the Assembly's committee reported and the Assembly took action, to prepare a form in harmony with this and report it to the next synod.

The two most important questions before the synod this year were home missions and education, and much time was given to both. Trinity University was given careful and thoughtful consideration, and the synod decided to write into their New Era budget fifteen thousand dollars for the university, as was done last year. The new president was there and made a fine impression on the synod, and all expressed the hope that a new day had dawned on the university. The attendance this year is about equal to the capacity, and an earnest plea was made for more dormitory space.

The Home Mission Committee met Tuesday before the opening of the synod and gave a full day and a half to the consideration of the work. Reports were made by the field men, which showed they had been diligent. The exact situation of the financial condition of the Board was placed before the committee, and, although they were much depressed by it, one member echoed the sentiment of all when he said that, although it looked dark from the report, he believed that the Church would not permit a work that meant so much to the kingdom of God to suffer for want of funds. The committee called upon the local churches to do more for themselves and ask less of the General Board, and there is good hope that this will be the result.

Texas shows a large increase in its membership and its home mission churches are in advance in their per cent of the whole Church in its per cent. The gifts from the churches for this cause were the largest in their history when all things were considered.

The field men's report revealed a very encouraging state of things. At the beginning of their work three years ago there were 140 churches vacant; now there are fifty-three. Eighteen churches that were receiving aid three years ago have come to self-support, and this is a remarkable showing. There have been nine churches organized in this time and there have been raised for new church and manse buildings and for repairs on old ones the sum of $250,770. While this does not meet the need for such things in this great state, it shows that some of the churches at least are in better condition than they have ever been. The pastors' salaries have been greatly increased in the synod, and now they are coming near the minimum at least, and, as soon as conditions improve, I feel sure there will be a rapid increase in this respect, and ministers will be more content to remain on their fields and better work will therefore be done.

This letter is written in Pawnee, Okla., where, on Oct. 9th, I assisted in the dedication of a neat and beautiful church building for this mission church, and where they have great hopes that next year they may come to self-support. They are training people for the larger churches in the state, as they stay here for a time, get a good start, and then move on.

NEW YORK LETTER.

BY REV. CLARENCE G. REYNOLDS, D.D.

The courts have decided that the $500,000 given to the American Bible Society by the late Mrs. Russell Sage, must be included as a part of the bequest of Mrs. Sage's will, of $750,000. The executors of the will have called attention to a provision in the will to the effect that any legatee interposing objections to the terms of the instrument should forfeit any provision made for such objector, and that the action of the American Bible Society has made it amenable to that provision. We sincerely hope that the Society will receive the residue of $250,000, for surely Mrs. Sage, were she living, would not wish the Society to lose the money.

The Surplus Department of the World's Sunday School Association want sent to the children in mission fields all the dressed dolls that can be collected by those interested throughout the country. A leaflet which offers numerous suggestions will be sent to all who write to the Association, Metropolitan Tower, New York.

The fall work of Bethany Presbyterian Church, Rev. David Wylie, pastor, has opened well. Ten new members were received Oct. 9th, seven being by confession. The pastor preached to a large congregation on "The Christian Attitude Toward the Cross." The pastor expects to organize an adult Bible class, a Teacher Training class and Bible study in the Westminster Guild, with the help of Prof. D. Webster Wylie. The activity of the various societies in the church promises a good church year.

Rev. Dr. Edgar W. Work, pastor of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, has fully regained his health and is preaching morning and evening every Sabbath. The Fourth Church steadily prospers under Dr. Work's care.

The McAuley Cremorne Mission, on West Thirty-fifth Street, Mr. William McQuere, superintendent, is giving breakfasts on Sabbath mornings at 10 o'clock to the needy and unemployed, holding an evangelistic service after the people are fed.

The pastor of the Broadway Presbyterian Church, Rev. Walter D. Buchanan, has been laid aside for several weeks after an operation for appendicitis. Dr. Buchanan hopes to be in his pulpit in a short time.

Sabbath, Oct. 9th, in the great structure formerly known as the Hamburg-American Pier, Hoboken, we attended the military funeral service of 2,467 soldiers whose bodies had just been brought over from the other side, and there were in the building on the day of the service no less than 5,000 bodies in all. Either relatives have been slow in claiming their dead boys or there has been delay in taking to Arlington Cemetery, Washington, those designated for burial there. The services the other Sabbath afternoon were very impressive, Hebrew, Protestant and Catholic. Your correspondent's daughter Dorothy had the privilege of singing the opening solo, "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth," the Catholic chaplain from Governor's Island singing "Face to Face" at the close of the service. Addresses were given by United States Senator Calder, of New York, and Brigadier-General Hutcheson.

CHICAGO LETTER.

BY REV. E. N. WARE, D.D.

"The Presbyterian Home" is about to realize in brick and stone its dream of years. The commodious and beautiful "Home" in Evanston is now an assured fact. With dignity and solemnity, mingled with thanksgiving and rejoicing, under the supervision of Dr. W. S. P. Bryan, President of the Home, the corner-stone was laid Thursday, September 29, at 3 P.M. The program was replete with history and prophecy. Scores took part in it: President, directors, managers, officers, ministers, laymen, presbytery, the Home inmates and friends. Dr. David H. Jones, pastor of the First Church of Evanston, prefaced his masterly address by announcing that two members of his congregation had made a recent gift of $5,000 to the Home in memory of their mothers. The ceremony of the laying of the corner-stone included the filling of the box, which was deposited in the stone. Officers of Chicago Presbytery were the initial depositors: Rev. N. B. Barr, the moderator, placing first a copy of the Holy Scriptures; Dr. A. C. Zenos, Stated Clerk, next placed a copy of the Constitution of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A.; then Dr. E. N. Ware, Permanent Clerk, deposited an official roll of the Presbytery; Dr. William Chalmers Covert, a copy of the History of Presbyterianism in Chicago; Mr. Alfred T. Carton, the Secretary, a copy of the seven annual reports of the Home, with other official papers; then a report of the day, many individuals deposited expressions of interest and hope. The box all this time was in care of Mrs. J. Harrison Orsborne, President of the Board of Managers. At the reorganization of the Home seven years ago, there was taken over from the first corporation the sum of $400. In addition to the care of an active Home all this time, the present organization presents today a property of forty acres in a choice location in the west part of the city of Evanston, Ill., which affords a beautiful location amidst trees for the combined homes for the aged, the convalescent, and the orphan; an orchard, already bearing; farm and farm buildings, ample for all needs. This, with money in hand, and that expended in the present building, with pledges yet unpaid, represent a total of nearly $600,000. The confidence and good will and co-operation of the whole presbytery, ministers and churches constitute an asset which is beyond computation. Dr. W. S. P. Bryan, in his untiring devotion, his unflagging zeal, and his masterful direction of the Home affairs, is building for himself an imperishable monument and handing down to posterity a legacy of Christian benevolence and beautiful ministry, which will team with responsibility and blessing.

Clement Church of Cicero, Ill., was dedicated on September 25. The pastor, Rev. Peter W. Fischer, conducted the morning service. At 3 P.M. Dr. R. D. Kearns, pastor of the Calvary Church, preached the dedicatory sermon. The evening sermon was conducted by the choir with a musical service, Rev. Clyde Smith, Associate Superintendent of the Church Extension Board of Chicago Presbytery, speaking. Others taking part in the dedicatory service were Mr. A. H. Clement, for whom the church is named; Dr. Robert Clements, pastor of the Austin Church, which has sponsored the life of the mission; Rev. Robert H. Beattie, who was pastor of the Austin Church when the mission was started, now President of the Presbyterian Training School; Rev. F. M. Newlin, pastor of Westminster Church, and Rev. A. A. Altheide, pastor of Brighton Park Church.

Rev. John Rhind, of McCormick Theological Seminary 1919, and since graduation, pastor at Remington, Ind., has begun his work as instructor of English Bible in the Lake Forest College, his alma mater, and as director of their athletics.

The large army of unemployed in the city has brought again into activity the Chicago Christian Industrial League, of which Rev. George A. Kilbey is superintendent with offices and headquarters at 884 S. State St. Now the superintendent issues a call for a fund by subscription of $5,000 to care for the needy during the coming cold months. Mr. Kilbey has always had the confidence and co-operation of the churches of the presbytery, rarely asking for anything which was not needed and usually getting what he asked for.

The initial meeting of the union interdenominational evangelistic campaign, which is being furthered by the Chicago Church Federation, was held on Monday, Oct. 3, in the Y. M. C. A. auditorium at 11 A.M. The building was crowded. Dr. Howard Agnew Johnston, President of the Federation, stated he had never seen such enthusiasm and zeal among the ministers for any cause. Bishop Nicholson was the local speaker. Dr. Goodell gave the address of the morning. This was followed by denominational gatherings at lunch in the Morrison Hotel. More than one hundred ministers were in attendance. Dr. Hepburn presided and the spirit of the meeting showed the Presbyterians were ready for full co-operation.

MICHIGAN LETTER.

BY REV. WILLIAM BRYANT, D.D.

At a meeting of Detroit Presbytery, Oct. 10th, arrangements were made for the installation of Rev. Llewelyn Evans as pastor of Erin Church, on Oct. 18th. This church, through its sixty years of history in Detroit Presbytery, has never had an installed pastor. Forty years ago it had a stated supply, but since that time has been supplied either from Mt. Clemens or Detroit.

No doubt the daily papers are making the most of the sale of the Detroit Times by the receiver to the Hearst combination. The fact is that the Times was always run at a loss, in trying to decline all advertising that was of questionable character. Certain stockholders who believed in the principles that guided this policy were willing to a certain extent to carry the burden. But the paper was never popular, quite apart from its high plane of exclusion. The editor was not taken seriously by the general public, and the news department was too limited to make the paper interesting. So it is not fair to say that Detroit can not appreciate a clean newspaper. This was not a fair test of clean journalism.

On Oct. 19th, Rev. Edward P. Clark, Stated Clerk of Detroit Presbytery, and the senior minister in that presbytery, will, with Mrs. Clark, celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of their wedding, with a reception, to which all the ministers and many other friends are invited. Mr. Clark was a Michigan pastor from his ordination, in 1871, until a few years ago, with the exception of a seven years' pastorate at Union City, Pa., and is held in the highest esteem by his brethren.

The Woman's Synodical Missionary Society held its annual meeting at Trumbull Avenue Church, October 5, 6. Although under present arrangements, Home and Foreign Missions are harmoniously combined, with Mrs. J. K. Mitchell as the honored president, yet it is still the custom to give one of the days to Home and the other to Foreign Missions, alternately, so that every two years the popular meeting shall be diversified. If a mere man who only attends as a visitor may be allowed to criticize kindly, he would say that speakers should be selected as a rule with voices that carry in a large auditorium. If every speaker had the good fortune to be heard as plainly as the able president, and Mrs. Lattimer, of Pittsburgh, who gave several valuable addresses on the Freedmen, the audience would get much more out of the meetings. The program is too good to miss the devotional part of it.

PITTSBURGH LETTER.

BY REV. S. J. FISHER, D.D.

Our Ministerial Association on Oct. 3 listened to a talk or pulpit address by Prof. Sleeth, a well-known teacher of elocution in our city and region.

Beginning Monday evening, Oct. 3, a series of special sermons has been preached during the week in East Liberty Church, by the pastor, Rev. S. N. Hutchison, D.D., with such subjects as "The Man in the Congregation," "The Far Country," "Judas Iscariot," "The Fine Art of Making Excuse," "Honest Doubt," "Our Only Hope." I have noticed the fact that on each Sabbath Bulletin of this church the requirements for church membership and an invitation are given.

Along this line, I may mention as suggestive to pastors, the series of Sabbath-evening services conducted by Rev. F. H. Stevenson, D.D., in the Church of the Covenant, Cincinnati, with such subjects as: "The Inspired Bible," "Varieties of Churches," "The Products of Christianity," "The Peace That Belongs to a Christian," a series running into November. A good many churches need not do as this church does, issue a Hotel Bulletin, distributed each week, but where a church can reach out for the passing stranger, this is most commendable.

Prof. D. R. Breed, D.D., is in California delivering a course of lectures, and will be absent until December.

The Homewood Church has given a call to Rev. C. C. Bransby, of the Second Church, Auburn, N. Y.

The opening exercises of the Western Theological Seminary were held Sept. 21, with an address by Rev. John A. Hutton, D.D., of Glasgow, on "The Tone of Preaching." Twenty-one new students were enrolled, and Prof. S. F. Vance, D.D., begins his work in the chair of New Testament Literature and Exegesis.

A delightful farewell reception was given Rev. Dr. Charles Schall by the First Church of Greensburg, Pa., from whose pastorate he goes to that of the church at Wayne, Pa. His pastorate is rich in results, the material side including the erection of a handsome stone edifice and manse.

A double communion service was held in the Central Church, McKeesport, the evening one meeting the needs of those prevented from attending in the morning. Thirteen persons were received on confession and ten by letter, and the pastor, Rev. Leroy Lawther, assisted by his people and his new assistant, Miss Niehaus, is developing every line of activity with marked interest and success.

The fertile imaginations of newspaper reporters have announced the names of a number of persons as having been considered for the presidency of Washington and Jefferson College, but the newly-appointed committee of the trustees declares such a list as a fabrication.

Rev. Albert I. Good, whom the Third Church supports and regards as its pastor in West Africa, gave an address on mission work in that country at the morning service, Oct. 2, and a very interesting lecture, illustrated by his own lantern slides, in the chapel, Wednesday evening following. In his arduous and varied work Mr. Good wisely finds recreation in entomology and the study of animal life in Africa. He has in his spare moments, and it is a blessing that he has them, secured rare specimens of butterflies and the skins of animals indigenous to Africa, and presented them to the Carnegie Museum in this city.

A postcard mailed at Cairo shows the safe passage of Rev. W. H. Hezlep and family, returning to their great field in Central Africa.

The Gypsy Smith meetings, held mostly in the East Liberty Church, ended with a very hearty expression of satisfaction over Mr. Smith's deeply earnest and touching sermons. It is remarkable how this man, emerging from conditions presumably unrefined, preaches with a great sobriety of expression, a marked tastefulness in language, unbroken by startling expressions, though suffused with a true emotion. May God give to his words a large and deep result.

On Oct. 9 the East Liberty Church, Rev. S. N. Hutchison, D.D., pastor, received eight new members on confession and twenty by letter.

On Oct. 9 the Oakdale Church, Rev. W. D. Lewis, pastor, received twenty-five new members on confession. During the summer the interior of the church was completely decorated, and now stands beautiful without and "all glorious within."

At the October meeting our presbytery received Rev. Moore Sanborn, Ph.D., from the United Brethren Church, with a view to his receiving a call to the West View Church. If he is there installed, he will, it is said, occupy the largest manse in the country, it being a converted roadhouse or inn, and the furnishings of the barroom, which are said to be quite expensive, are used in the pastor's study. So many are the additions and rooms that Scott's excitable character in Guy Manning, could he see it, would exclaim, "Prodigious!"

On Oct. 9 the Shady Side Church, Rev. H. T. Kerr, D.D., pastor, received ten new members.

The pastor of the Watson Memorial Church, Rev. John W. Claudy, took advantage of his vacation to undergo the removal of his tonsils, and in the absence from his pulpit to obtain complete recovery.

At the midweek prayer meeting, Oct. 12, in the Third Church, the pastor, Rev. W. L. McEwan, D.D., appeared and preached, giving every evidence of a complete restoration of health. He announced his intention to take charge of the same service on the 19th, and thus advance carefully to the resumption of all his pastoral work.

The former Ardmore Church has been renamed the Forest Hills Church, and presbytery indorsed the erection of a chapel costing $25,000, to be financed by the First Church, Wilkinsburg, Rev. George Taylor, Ph.D., pastor. The ultimate plans call for a complete edifice costing $80,000. Its vicinity is growing rapidly under the homeseeking of employees of the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Co.

On Oct. 9 the Central Church, North Side, Rev. P. J. Slonaker, Ph.D., pastor, received ten new members on confession and four by letter.

At a dinner for the men and boys at Shady Side Church, Oct. 28, Rev. John Timothy Stone, D.D., will make the address.

PHILADELPHIA NEWS.

BY REV. W. F. FULTON, D.D.

The Presbytery of Philadelphia met Oct. 3d. Reports were made on foreign, home and synodic missions, evangelism, temperance and moral welfare. Rev. John McDowell, D.D., of the Board of Home Missions, made an excellent address, presenting the work and needs of the Home Board. The pastoral relation existing between Rev. Asa J. Ferry, D.D., and Bethany Temple, was dissolved in order that he might accept a call to the Edgewater Church, Chicago. The call from Bethany Church for Rev. A. Gordon MacLennan was approved. The afternoon session was given to rayer and conference in reference to presbytery's evangelistic campaign now in progress. In the consecration meeting, conducted by Rev. Asa J. Ferry, D.D., the Holy Spirit's presence was manifest. Many expressed a desire that we might have more such meetings.

The semi-annual meeting of the Church Federation of Philadelphia and vicinity was held in the Arch Street Presbyterian Church Oct. 11th. Interesting reports were made and an address was delivered by Judge Raymond McNeille.

The Presbyterian Ministers' Social Union held its first meeting this fall in the Bellevue-Stratford, Oct. 10th. An address was made by Rev. George H. Donald, of Scotland, on "A Crisis in Continental Presbyterianism."

Rev. and Mrs. Roland B. Lutz were tendered a reception by the congregation of Temple Church Oct. 11th.

The congregation of St. Paul Church will tender a reception to Rev. and Mrs. S. Willis McKelvey on Oct. 21st.

On Sabbath, Oct. 9th, Rev. A. Mitchell Hunter, of Scotland, preached in Calvary Church, Rev. J. Ross Stevenson, D.D., in the First Church of Germantown, and

Rev. Hugh L. Hodge in the Central-North-Broad Street Church.

WASHINGTON CITY LETTER.

BY REV. W. F. EAGLESON, D.D.

All pastors have returned from vacations, and are busy with the new work. One of our number has fallen, temporarily only we trust, from our ranks of active workers. Dr. Henry E. Brundage, pastor of the Eckington Church, is encased in a rigid cast about the spine. It would seem that he is urgently needed in the important work and church where his labors have been signally prospered.

The Presbytery of Washington City was entertained by the Kensington Church last week, Rev. Robert Atkinson, pastor. The Vacancy and Supply committee reported that there were but two churches without pastors; and these have supplies. The sermon was by Rev. Hugh K. Fulton, on this occasion. Mr. Fulton took the place of the Moderator, Dr. Wallace Radcliffe, who was rendering service at Princeton on this date. Dr. T. C. Clark was chosen Stated Clerk for three years, Dr. T. J. Jones was dismissed to the Presbytery of New York. Dr. R. R. Littell, of Philadelphia, conducted a conference on evangelism. Rev. Paul L. Berman, of Baltimore, a Jew, gave an instructive address relating to his race.

Dr. W. J. Johnson, of St. Paul, was a welcome visitor in the Capital City recently. After attending to business in Washington and Richmond, he started for Pittsburgh and the West. He was formerly a field representative of the Board of Relief and Sustentation, but is now with the work of Temperance and Moral Welfare. Another welcome visitor was a former pastor of the Sherwood Church, Chaplain T. B. Thompson, stationed in Cuba. While in Washington, he dedicated new furnishings in the church of which he was formerly pastor. This church has welcomed seventy-five new members since the spring meeting of Presbytery. Rev. W. F. Eagleson, D.D., is pastor.

With the recent opening of Congress, the present Convention of Postmasters, and the coming Conference of Disarmament, the Capital has been and is yet to be a very busy place. To be the pastor of a church in the midst of such counter attractions, is a more exacting task than the writer has been accustomed to, back in the states, and yet, in spite of these exciting events, the Presbyterian churches are all pressing for room which they can not supply. The greatest need of Presbyterianism in Washington City is to "find room to receive it!" Our churches need to be enlarged. One overcrowded church has Sabbath-school classes in the church, attic and basement, and rents a lodge-room besides. And even this is not sufficient, and it would rent much larger space if it were available.

The Metropolitan Church, Rev. Freeley Rohrer, pastor, has set a goal of 1,000 members for this year. The enrollment, April 1st, 1921, was 908. A campaign has been launched to attain the goal. The group system has been given a military character, phrased as the Metropolitan Presbyterian Church Militant. The congregation has been divided into ten regiments corresponding to ten geographical districts. An elder is the colonel of each regiment, with a deacon or trustee as lieutenant-colonel. The regiments are divided into companies of ten persons each when complete. But no company as at first mustered is "full," but lacks from one to four members. The company captain is commissioned, but the lieutenant is selected from the company. Men are captains of the companies of men, women of companies of women, and young people of young people. Each company has assigned to it the task of bringing into the church enough members to complete its enrollment. The pastor has been designated as commander-in-chief and he issues a general order in the first day of each month to all officers. The general order on September 1st announced the campaign for 1,000 members, explained the organization, named the tasks to be performed, issued to each officer a complete list of his command and exhorted every officer and member immediately to enter upon the duty assigned him, and to strive to do his part to attain the goal. The second general order on October 1st set a Mustering-in-Day, for Sabbath, Oct. 9, and directed officers to bring to the Session persons who would become members of the church either by certificate or on profession of faith, and then be assigned as comrades in the regiments of workers for the extension of the Master's Kingdom. Later general orders will name methods to be pursued in the campaign and give directions for obtaining objectives.

The Federation of Churches has been considering several propositions for invoking Divine blessing on the efforts of the coming Conference on Limitation of Armaments. Some propose a great convention during the Conference. Some want a demonstration of religion by an exchange of pulpits between prominent British and American clergymen. Others want unceasing daily prayer. The Federation of Churches adopted a policy by which each pastor of the city will be expected to preach an appropriate discourse Nov. 6, at 3 p. m. That day a great mass meeting will be assembled in the Calvary Baptist Church, to be addressed by leading ministers of various denominations, including Dr. Wallace Radcliffe. Each day for two weeks, at the noon hour, intercessory prayers will be offered at the Epiphany Episcopal, Calvary Baptist, and New York Avenue Presbyterian churches. Visiting clergymen who are anticipated in Washington, will be asked to lead these services. The brethren point out, that the meetings at Versailles, France, were devoid of religious recognition, and the purpose of a League of Nations failed. God's blessings should be invoked on the noble ambitions which underlie the Conference on Limitation of Armaments.

SYNOD OF TEXAS.

BY REV. S. M. TEMPLETON, D.D., S. C.

The Synod of Texas met in Wichita Falls, Texas, Oct. 5th. Rev. W. B. Preston, D.D., moderator, preached the opening sermon. Rev. Glen L. Sneed, D.D., of Dallas, was chosen moderator, and Rev. C. W. Yates, of Seymour, was vice-moderator. Drs. Fullerton, Cleaveland, Holt, Clarke, Provine, Horst and Overstreet represented the Boards, and Capt. O. M. McMillan was present from Canton, China. Miss Josephine Petrie attended the Woman's Synodical Missionary Society, which was in session at the same time.

The Reynolds Presbyterian Orphanage and School was transferred to the control and management of the synod by the Presbytery of Abilene. Dr. J. Gilmore Smith is the manager and in five years the institution has acquired a valuable property and has 135 children now in its care. The question of the permanent location of the orphanage, either at Albany or elsewhere, was placed in the hands of a committee, to report its findings to the next meeting of synod. The committee is as follows: Revs. S. D. Crouch, N. F. Grafton, D.D., and M. E. Chappell, D.D., and Elders W. H. Cook and E. A. Skiles.

The synod gave its recognition and commendation to the Presbyterian Hospital of New Orleans, an institution doing a great work under the administration of Rev. J. C. Barr, D.D., and a committee was appointed to confer with the management in the interim, composed of Rev. F. L. Wear, D.D., Rev. J. E. Ferguson, and Elder J. L. Brown. The Oregon Plan was continued under advisement for another year in the hands of the following committee: Rev. Glen L. Sneed, D.D., Rev. R. E. Robinson, D.D., Rev. L. B. Gray, Ph.D., Mrs. W. B. Preston and Mrs. O. H. Chapman.

A committee was appointed to consider and report to the next meeting on a Unified Plan for the work of all the enterprises of the Church within the synod, consisting of Revs. M. S. Templeton, G. W. Fender, L. D. Young, D.D., N. F. Grafton, D.D., and Elders H. C. Glenn, J. C. Rugel and J. W. Crudgington.

The apportionment of the Interchurch and New Era debts was assigned to the New Era Committee of synod.

Some emphatic declarations were made of the fidelity of the synod to the standards of the Church on the Divine Inspiration, integrity and authority of the Holy Scriptures, the Deity and Virgin Birth of Christ and his Resurrection. As an aside it may be said that this was evoked by some hostile activity by parties calling in question our fidelity to these fundamentals. As a further aside it may be recalled that our Presbyterian Church has a history on these issues and that it stands four-square, offering as its credentials the discipline of a number of its men, to say nothing of the alienation of an institution with its million dollars of Presbyterian money; and the criticism of us should not lie in the mouths of those whose churches can show no such costly credentials of their fidelity to these fundamentals.

Synodical communion of the Lord's Supper was followed by memorial service for the following deceased ministers: R. T. Phillips, D.D., C. I. Brown, G. W. C. Self, Charles Henry Mitchelmore, and C. G. Reagan. Messages of loving remembrance were sent to a number of retired ministers who are in much affliction. The 1922 meeting will be in Sherman, Texas.

ARKANSAS LETTER.

BY REV. C. E. HAYES, D.D.

Rev. R. W. Lewis, D.D., and his singer, Mr. Nixon, have just closed a fine meeting in the Cove Church, in which there were 126 professions of faith and forty-two additions to the church so far. The amount of money received for this meeting was $417. Just before coming to Cove Dr. Lewis conducted a meeting of fourteen days at Granis, with ninety-four professions and fifty-three additions to the church. Since July 5th, Dr. Lewis has conducted six evangelistic meetings in this synod, preaching 168 sermons, having 400 professions, 141 additions to the church and offerings to the amount of $1,408. Dr. Lewis has three more meetings to hold before the itinerary closes, at Chidester, Benton and Greenwood, which will take him until about the middle of December. I am hoping to arrange with Dr. Lewis for a campaign, beginning in April next year. I would be glad to have information from churches desiring his services, so that I can plan for this campaign. Dr. Lewis is a fine evangelist, safe and sound in every way, and I most heartily recommend him to our ministers and churches.

Rev. F. Sanders was recently called to the pastorate at Atkins. He and his family drove from Texas in their automobile, stopping with friends enroute. The Atkins Church gave Mr. Sanders and his family a hearty welcome to his old parish.

The Grace Church, Little Rock, received twenty-five members on Oct. 2d. Five infants received baptism. The pastor, Dr. Krauss, and his members are working together most heartily and the outlook is bright.

Rev. Dr. Eells, the pastor-elect at Hot Springs, will be installed on Oct. 23d. Dr. Krauss will preach and preside. Dr. Morris will charge the people and Dr. Hayes the pastor.

I recently spent a Sabbath at Melrose. Mr. T. A. Cornelius was elected, ordained and installed elder and was also elected clerk of session. I arranged for evangelistic meetings there, beginning Oct. 10th, to be conducted by Rev. Dr. Krauss.

Rev. W. H. Howell, pastor at Foreman, reports that he has organized a new church, with thirty-six members, about four miles out from Foreman in the country. Mr. Howell will preach to them regularly.

Rev. E. E. Morris, D.D., is in the midst of a good meeting at Beebe and is being assisted by Dr. F. M. Wiley.

Rev. G. L. Clark was installed at Hartford on Oct. 4th. Rev. H. W. Chamberlin preached, and gave the charge to the people. Rev. L. E. Blakemore presided. Rev. C. E. Hayes gave the charge to the pastor. Mr. Clark received four members recently and has organized a Men's Bible Class with thirty members. The outlook is bright.

The Little Rock Presbytery met in Little Rock, Oct. 3d. The pastors at Hot Springs, Little Rock and Ward presented plans for building operations. Plans were adopted by the presbytery.

A union meeting is in progress at Berryville, where our pastor is Rev. B. Berryhill.

Bentonville Church has called Rev. E. T. Beard, of Savannah, Tenn., and he will begin his work soon.

Springdale Church is prospering under the ministry of Rev. Theron Alexander. A furnace has recently been secured in the church at a cost of $400. The interior of the church has been beautifully decorated and a new lighting system installed.

Rev. T. E. McSpadden, of Rogers, was elected Stated Clerk and Treasurer of the Arkansas Presbytery at its recent meeting, and was made chairman of the New Era Movement, succeeding Rev. Theron Alexander, who found he was unable to carry the work longer. Rev. M. L. Gillespie, D.D., was elected moderator.

The Harmony Church has enjoyed a revival meeting, the pastor, Rev. Otis C. Epperson, being assisted by Rev. E. E. Morris, D.D. There were nine additions to the church.

On Sept. 25th the new church at Chidester was opened and the first service held. Rev. Otis C. Epperson is pastor of the Harmony and Chidester churches.

IDAHO LETTER.

BY REV. J. H. BARTON, D.D.

Fifty-two members have recently been received into the membership of the First Church of Boise, Rev. Jesse H. Baird, pastor.

The Twin Falls Church has extended a unanimous call to Rev. Arthur G. Pearson, D.D., of Kansas City, Mo. It is understood that Dr. Pearson will accept.

On the evening of Oct. 4 a committee of Boise Presbytery installed Rev. Ralph T. Case pastor of the Emmett Church.

The Ririe Church has been grouped with Rigby for the balance of the fiscal year under the pastoral care of Rev. C. W. Clough.

Rev. James Adams has resigned as pastor of the Lower Boise Church and goes to Jolyn, Wash.

Rev. W. S. Williams, M.D., who had been in charge of the work at Malad for seven years, has gone to San Diego, Cal., to make his home, and Rev. E. J. Hanks, formerly of Ferron, Utah, has taken his place at Malad.

Rev. Mortimer M. Stocker, who had been serving the Montpelier Church, has closed his work there. Mr. Stocker won a fellowship in Princeton Seminary, where he graduated in 1920. He goes to Scotland for the year's study to which this fellowship entitles him.

The College of Idaho, our synodical school, begins the year with an unusually large attendance. The freshman class numbers eighty. The college is in better financial condition than it has been for some time, having received sufficient money to pay all its debts. It has at present $300,000 endowment, but needs as much more. It also needs very badly some new buildings.

SYNOD OF NEW MEXICO.

The Synod of New Mexico met at Albuquerque, Sept. 22d. Rev. Rudolph W. Caughey was elected moderator. Rev. Charles R. McKean, of Albuquerque, was elected Stated Clerk, succeeding Rev. J. W. Hamblin, formerly of Santa Fe. Rev. John L. Marquis, D.D., synodical missionary to New Mexico, was elected synodical publicity agent. The following resolution was adopted: "The Synod of New Mexico in annual session assembled expresses its gratitude to President Harding for his efforts in advancing the cause of world peace in calling a disarmament conference for Nov. 11, 1921, at Washington, D. C., and we earnestly request the delegates appointed to that momentous conference to use every available effort to achieve the purpose aimed at. And we pledge them our heartiest support, and pray that Almighty God will grant them wisdom and guidance in their deliberations." A copy was also sent to Dr. H. C. Swearingen, Moderator of the Presbyterian Church in the U. S. A., asking him as Moderator of the General Assembly to call upon the whole Church to engage in earnest prayer on Sabbath, Nov. 6th, for worldwide peace through the Disarmament Conference.

Addresses were made by Dr. W. S. Holt, Board of Relief and Sustentation; Dr. Walter Irwin, District New Era Secretary, Denver; Dr. Horst, Committee on Men's Work. The work in New Mexico is in good condition. Most fields are well manned. The outlook in New Mexico is bright.

SYNOD OF OKLAHOMA.

BY REV. F. L. SCHAUB, S. C.

The Synod of Oklahoma met Oct. 4th, with the First Church of Cushing. Rev. W. A. Roach, former pastor of the Cushing Church, was elected moderator. Rev. Fred L. Schaub was elected Stated Clerk to succeed Rev. L. C. Walter, D.D., who has removed from our bounds. Dr. Walter had been Stated Clerk for twenty years and synod voiced its appreciation of the long and efficient services of Dr. Walter, by appropriate resolutions and the gift of a Bible. Reports indicated that the past year has been one of the best in the history of the synod. The synod reports a membership of 22,411 this year, a net gain of 827 over last year. Accessions during the year were 4,792, a gain of 1,321 over the preceding year. The Boards and Agencies were well represented and had ample time to present their causes.

SYNOD OF COLORADO.

G. R. EDMUNDSON, S. C.

The Synod of Colorado, at its meeting, Sept. 27th-30th, celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of its organization. Rev. Hugh T. Gary, D.D., was elected moderator. Rev. Geo. R. Edmundson, D.D., Stated Clerk, presented a very complete historical sketch of the synod, showing that the synod, when originally organized, comprised the territory now included in the Synods of New Mexico, Montana, Wyoming, Utah, Arizona and Colorado. Rev. Samuel Garvin, D.D., of Colorado Springs, gave an address on "The Acts of the Apostles in the Great West," as a memorial to Dr. Sheldon Jackson; Rev. W. H. Wray Boyle, D.D., of Denver, spoke on "Kirkwood, the Gospel Pathfinder." Greetings from the Synod of Utah were presented by Rev. William Paden, D.D., of Salt Lake City, and from the Synod of Wyoming by Rev. David McMartin, D.D., of Cheyenne. Reminiscences were indulged in by the older members of the synod, and letters read from many who could not be present. The attendance was the largest in the history of the synod. Classes in missions and methods were conducted each day by Rev. William H. Foulkes, D.D., Dr. James J. Coale, Rev. William P. Schell, Dr. Howard I. Kerr and Mr. David McConaughy.

The Women's Synodical presented a program of unusual interest during the same period, having among their speakers Miss Lucy Dawson, General Secretary Woman's Board of Home Missions, and Miss Margaret E. Hodge, President Woman's Board of Foreign Missions. Miss Eliza H. Glassey, a charter member of the synodical, presented a paper on "Thirty-four Years of Women's Work."

THE SYNOD OF TENNESSEE.

BY REV. GEORGE H. MACK, D.D., S. C.

The Synod of Tennessee met at Milan, Oct. 11th. Rev. John S. Eakin, D.D., of Knoxville, was elected moderator. Addresses were made by Rev. C. H. McDonald, D.D., representing Men's Work; L. F. Heimburger, M.D., of Shantung, China, on foreign missions; Rev. A. L. Montgomery, D.D., of St. Louis, on home missions; Rev. John Royal Harris, D.D., of the National Reform Association; Mrs. Andrew Todd Taylor, of the Woman's Foreign Board, Philadelphia; and Miss Sallie Alexander, of Nashville, on furlough from Japan.

The report of the Committee on Home Missions, and the superintendents, Dr. George H. Mack, Dr. J. H. Miller and Dr. R. I. Gamon, reported prosperous conditions in the synod. It was voted to secure, as soon as funds allow, a supervisor for rural churches. A synodical evangelist was also asked of the Assembly's Evangelistic Committee. The Women's Synodical reported $2,600 given to foreign missions and $10,300 given to home missions. The women's meetings were presided over by Mrs. T. S. Rankin.

Splendid reports were made concerning

Maryville College and Cumberland University, the former reporting 933 students last year. The latter reported a splendid opening this fall, with 394 enrolled, being the exact number of last year's entire enrollment. Synod appointed a committee to consider the advisability of holding its sessions in the summer time at Ovoca, and another committee to consider the matter of inviting the Assembly to some center within the state. Maryville was selected as the next place of meeting. Reports showed that excellent progress had been made in the last two years under the New Era Movement, the synod having in the two years attained an increase of 180 per cent in its benevolence offerings to the Boards above the average for five years before.

Such was the interest in having a theological seminary in the South, it was ordered to bring the facts of the situation before the Assembly's Committee on Theological Seminaries.

MISSION WORK

OHIO SYNODICAL.

The Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Synod of Ohio, and the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Synod of Ohio, met at Marion Oct. 4 for their annual and final meetings. The associations of the city with our honored President Harding added immeasurably to the interest. Marion was known to them for its celebrated "porch," but we found it also to be a city of open doors. The spirit was cordially and efficiently hospitable.

Tuesday afternoon and Wednesday morning were devoted to closing up old business preparatory to the dissolution of the organizations. On Wednesday noon they were permanently adjourned and the business of organizing a new missionary society, to be known as the Woman's Missionary Society of the Synod of Ohio, which should embrace the activities of the two former organizations was taken up. During the war this union was proposed and rejected. At this meeting it was unanimously accepted. The line between Home and Foreign Missions was an artificial line. Is not this action of the Presbyterian women of Ohio, following closely in the footsteps of the women of Pennsylvania and Michigan, an indication that the war has brought to the Christian people of this country a more profound sense of world citizenship and world obligation, and that today we are less provincial in our interpretation of the meaning of "Kingdom of God"?

A second noteworthy feature of this new organization was the inclusion in the constitution which it adopted, of a Committee of Christian Social Service, which should meet with a corresponding committee from Synod's Home Missions Committee, to jointly organize and conduct such a plan of Christian social service in Ohio as they may agree upon. There were two very significant features in this provision, and the first one was a recognition of a tendency for men and women to come closer together, a promise of a new day when the sex lines which are now drawn in religious work will be recognized as unchristian and wasteful; and, second, because it is an indication that Christian service is taking a new form of expression. For nearly two thousand years Christian love has expressed itself socially in an attempt to alleviate human physical suffering through hospitals and physicians, and in an effort to contribute to the culture and intelligence of the human family through mission schools. The problem of the modern factory and the problem of congestion in the modern city is gradually forcing itself upon the attention of the Church, and a new comprehension of the fact that the expression of Christian love in each age must be adapted to the needs of that age is dawning in the consciousness of Christian people. It is not enough to build great hospitals in this land and abroad for the healing of human ills. The Christian Church must use its influence to rectify the conditions which produce those ills.

One fact, however, was never lost sight of, and that was, that the one objective, which was the sole reason for the existence of the organization of the Woman's Missionary of the Synod of Ohio, was the interpretation of Jesus to the world today, and that all features of their work must contribute to this one end.

We pray for this new organization a full measure of the spirit of God in the years that stretch out before it. To Mrs. E. E. Lester, the new president, and her associates we pledge our love and devotion as she and her officers take up the leadership of this new organization. We pray for them a joy and satisfaction commensurate with the labor and responsibility, and we bespeak for this new missionary enterprise the good wishes and prayers of the Presbyterian men and women of the State of Ohio.

Glendale, O. Mary Louise Blinn.

CINCINNATI PRESBYTERIAL.

The quarterly meeting of the Woman's Missionary Society of Cincinnati Presbytery was held at the Church of the Covenant, Tuesday, October 11th. Mrs. J. Shane Nicholls, the president in the chair.

The Secretary of Missionary Education, Mrs. Blinn announced a District meeting for the purpose of creating activity along missionary lines at Kennedy Heights, Oct. 29th. Mrs. Ione Bowman, Secretary of Associate members, requests a conference of the Secretaries of her department at the next Executive meeting November 8th.

Miss Schulz, of the Board, spoke on Missionary Education. The object of Missionary Education is not only to teach missions, but also to stir lives into action.

Mrs. Smith, of Wyoming Presbyterian Church, led the devotions.

There will be a bazaar at the Italian mission on Thursday, Nov. 10th. The ladies of the Presbyterial were asked to support it by donations and by their presence.

Miss Mary Forman, of Allahabad, India, addressed the afternoon meeting. She told of the work being done at Etah, India, among the low caste Indians. There are sixty millions of these "untouchables" in India.

Mrs. E. E. Lester's name was placed on the Honor Roll in recognition of her recent election to the Presidency of the Ohio Synodical. This is the first time for a number of years that Cincinnati has furnished the president for the Synodical, and best wishes of the Woman's Missionary Society of Cincinnati Presbytery go with Mrs. Lester as she enters upon her duties.

AN INDIAN BIBLE SCHOOL.

The Daily Vacation Bible School of the Pima First Presbyterian Church at Sacaton has closed a session of four full weeks of work. The school is a new venture in the church and community life of Pima Reservation which has proved a valuable experiment. The enrollment of thirty Indian boys and girls is evidence that interest was not lacking. The principal and all other workers were Indians.

The work embraced devotional exercises, memorizing choice verses and passages from the Bible, dramatizing Bible stories, singing, camp craft, speaking English, group games and athletics. Outside activities included a camping trip for the boys, a picnic and watermelon feast for both boys and girls, a dip in the pool twice a week, educational trip through the United States Experiment Station located at Sacaton, and free admittance to the moving picture shows. The management also took advantage of the presence of the government dentist and had all the children's teeth examined, and where needed, work was done.

W. David Owl, who has directed the school, extends his appreciation and thanks for their loyal and helpful assistance in making the session a success; to Truman Jones, a student of the Phoenix Indian School, to Miss Viola Johnson, a student of the Escuela Training School, and to Miss Alice Enos, for her valuable assistance with the music.

Every Indian community and church, where conditions permit, should make the Daily Vacation Bible School a special feature for the vacation days of our Indian boys and girls. The public good to be accomplished through means of reaching the youth for organized religious, educational and recreational work can not be estimated.

NEW PUBLICATIONS

The Foundations of Faith. By John Kellman, D.D. Cloth. $1.50. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York.

This volume contains the lecture recently delivered at Vanderbilt University on the Cole foundation, and known as the "Cole Lectures of 1921." It deals with old problems and discussions about faith and its foundations. It goes on the principle that men often differ in words and definition more than they do as to the real essence or foundations. If they would only seek for reconciliation they might find it as easily as they do find contradictions and antagonisms. And yet the author does not advise compromise or simple silence and concessions. He seeks for the real and deeper meanings of faith, under the surface of words and statements. He leaves the impression that he believes in the changeless and inspired truth of God. It is not easy, always, to be satisfied with what he says, wishing as one may that he might speak more decidedly on what seems to be the right position, but one will not find him advocating any position that is not right and true. It is a book, as we are told, of reconciliations, for true and real Christians.

The Miracle on Hermon. By John Marvin Dean. Cloth. 60 cents. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York.

This is a beautiful tribute to the love and grace and beauty of the Lord. Told as a story, not claiming to be true in detail, and yet embodying the known facts and the actual spirit of the Savior who went about doing good, it is delightfully and fascinatingly attractive. It tells of a little Gentile crippled lad and his blind sister who learned of Christ and were blessed by him.

The Tree of Light. By James A. B. Scherer. Cloth. $1.35. Thomas Y. Crowell Company, New York.

This is the story of how Christmas and Christianity came into England, through Caradoc, as it comes to us through tradition and legend, partly, and yet essentially true and historical. It tells of the ancient Druids who sacrificed children to their gods, and of Caradoc who met the Apostle Paul at Rome and learned from him the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Sunday Talks to Teachers. By Helen Wodehouse, Ph.D. Cloth. $1.25. The Macmillan Company, New York.

There are a good many good things in these ten talks on faith and courage, and love and service. Good principles and purposes are advocated, and there are many uplifting words and thoughts on the pages and in the atmosphere of the book. The difficulty is that there is too much lack of real personality and too much thought of good and evil as mere principles.

Noel and the Little People of the Woods. By Nellie M. Pairpoint. Cloth. $1.00. W. A. Wilde Company, Boston.

The woods have many charming little people dressed in feathers and fur, and then there are some other imaginary little folks that are very nice to work into pleasing little stories for the delight and gladness of the children. This is a very lovely little book that will meet with a hearty welcome.

What the Wild Flowers Tell Us. By Dudley Oliver Osterhold. Cloth. $1.50. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York.

Here are thirty attractive and suggestive talks, or addresses, or sermons to children, based on facts about as many of the wild flowers or blossoms. They are valuable moral and spiritual lessons, and are especially interesting as being associated with the beautiful objects which are used as illustrations. The author has peculiar talent and tact as an interesting story teller, but many persons can cultivate this, even if they do not already possess it in a marked degree; but above this pleasing ability this author has a downright purpose to make the story the avenue for conveying a real lesson to the young people. This quality any one can have if he wishes it. If he does not wish to have it, and does not have it, all the stories and all the illustrations will do but little good. This is a very gracious volume showing in a very pleasing way how to teach valuable truths.

"Say, Fellows—" By Wade C. Smith. Cloth. $1.25. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York.

Here are fifty talks, each one of which is really and truly worth while. They are given in a straight-forward, manly way, calculated to appeal to boys and young men, and not only gain attention but go to the heart. They are practical and earnest talks on the various big issues of life that every boy ought to learn how to think on in a serious and sensible way. They are easy to read, but rather hard to get out of the mind after they are read. They emphasize the importance of acting with genuine good sense in the places where one is called to be in doing the work of life. Many a boy or young man would be wiser and better off for reading these chapters, acting in accordance with their excellent suggestions, and passing them along to the other fellows.

The Vindication of Robert Creighton. By Daniel Frederick Fox. Cloth. $1.75. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York.

This is the story of a man who comes back. The book is full of descriptions of trying conditions and of adventures and of life among reckless men and classes, but out of them all the man comes back and up into the better life. The story leaves the impression of being told not for the sake of describing the mire, but of showing how one can get out of it, by telling how one person did get out of it, and came to be a good and worthy citizen with true and clean and good life.

Hiking Westward. By Roger W. Conant. Cloth. $1.75. W. A. Wilde Company, Boston.

Here is a story of two manly boys who went out west filled with an ambition to make their way in the world, and to secure a home for their mother. It is a fine glimpse into the early life of the opening up of the great West.

The Valley of Gold. By David Howarth. Cloth. $1.75. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York.

This is a well-written, wide-awake story of life in the West, in Canada, in the Saskatchewan. It abounds in adventure and startling experiences, and depicts life in pioneer times and in conditions of vicissitude. It is especially a pleasing love story, of a true-hearted girl, and all ends in happiness and gladness.

The Young Wireless Operator as a Fire Patrol. By Lewis E. Theiss. Cloth. 1.75. W. A. Wilde Company, Boston.

The wireless operator will find ample scope for usefulness in many directions, and this story tells how one took advantage of his opportunities in a most enterprising and efficient way. Young and old readers will find very much to attract and hold them in this well-written story. It is well-conceived and excellently written.

The Raid of the Ottawa. By D. Lange. Cloth. $1.50. Lothrop, Lee and Shepard Company, Boston.

Indian stories of a great variety may be found, some of them giving very distorted views and utterly unworthy. This story is partly based on history, of the times of the French and Indian wars, and is located in Western Pennsylvania. It tells of two boys following the trail of an Ottawa who had stolen their younger brother, and of their various experiences until, by the aid of an Indian of good character, their brother is rescued. The story is well-written and presents many actual facts as to Indian life and characteristics.

A MISSIONARY INSTITUTE.

Twenty-nine young people of high Christian character, many of them already college trained, volunteered for the foreign field if God should open the way, and scores of men and women testified that they were willing to have their children go and that they would dedicate their business and income to the extension of the Kingdom of God throughout the world, following an address by Dr. C. E. Bradt, of the Foreign Board, in connection with a World Visual Institute conducted by A. Gordon Bradt in the First Presbyterian Church of Albion, Mich., Oct. 7-9, inclusive. Each evening of the institute an illustrated lecture using colored slides was given, visualizing present world facts and the crying need of the world today, showing how our Foreign Board is endeavoring to meet that need through the heroic activities of our missionaries. These lectures were supplemented by motion pictures each evening and a World Curio Exhibit, displaying hundreds of curios, with accompanying lecture. One of the most popular features of the institute was the missionary readings and stories given by Miss Margaret Bradt, the tell-a-tale lady, in costume. The six-reel missionary photoplay, "Problems of Pin-Hole Parish," given on Friday night, was repeated on Sabbath afternoon to a full house. The Albion Church, Rev. A. E. Cameron, is now looking forward to taking the entire support of a missionary on the foreign field.

HOME CIRCLE

THE CROWN OF CHILDHOOD.

The cows are lowing along the lane,
The sheep to the fold have come
And the mother looks from the cottage door,
To see how the night comes over the moor,
And calls the children home.
Their feet are bare in the dusty road,
Their cheeks are tawny and red;
They have waded the shallows below the mill,
They have gathered wild roses up the hill,
A crown for each tangled head.
The days will come, and the days will go,
And life hath many a crown;
But none that will press upon manhood's brow
As light as the roses resting now
On the children's foreheads brown.

THEODORE AND THE GREEN GOGGLES.

BY MINNIE LEONA UPTON.

"Going for the mail pretty soon, Thody?" asked Grandfather Brent, coming in from the orchard with a hatful of big yellow French Sweets.

"Yes, grandfather—right away," answered Theodore, laying down the arrow he was shaping. "There, that's a pretty good arrow, isn't it? Though this old knife can't be made very sharp."

There was to be an archery contest at the Sabbath school picnic. This was Saturday before. Theodore was sure he could shoot well enough so his family would be proud of him, even though he didn't expect to win first prize.

"Yes, that's a good arrow," said grandfather. "Now, Thody, I'm expecting my green goggles to come by mail most any day. I need them these bright, windy, cool days. My eyes are watering now, just from walking about in the orchard a little while."

"That's a shame, grandfather!" said Theodore. "I do hope they'll come today! Now I'm off."

When Theodore unlocked the Brent's rural free delivery mail-box at the Cross-roads, half a mile from the house, there was a narrow, thin parcel, about six inches long. "Hooray!" he cried. "Grandfather'll be glad enough!" He tucked the box into his blouse front, and started briskly for home, eager for Grandfather Brent to have his green goggles. But at the foot of the old orchard, now a chicken yard, he caught sight of old Speckle stealing along, beyond the chicken-wire fence, toward the raspberry thicket.

"Oho, old lady!" he said. "You're stealing your nest, just as mother was afraid you'd do! Now's the time to catch you!"

He hurried to one of the gates, went in softly, and followed the sly old hen. And before long he had traced her to her nest where she already had five eggs. He took them in his cap, much to old Speckle's disgust, and hurried up to the house.

"I've found Speckle's nest, grandfather!" he called.

"Good!" said grandfather, heartily. "Did my goggles come, Thody?"

"Yes, grandfather, here—why—" The box was not in Theodore's blouse. "I must have lost it in those thick raspberry bushes!" said Theodore. "I'll go right down and find it."

"Have your dinner first, Thody," said grandfather. "It's good that you found old Speckle's nest, anyway!"

After dinner Theodore searched till dark in the thick underbrush of the raspberry bushes. And suddenly, just as he was wondering if he'd ever find that box, he found it! Just stubbed his toe against it, under some dead canes!

He rushed to the house. Mr. Ferner, the Brents' nearest neighbor, drove up into the yard. He had been to the village post office, and as he knew there would be no mail delivery on the R. F. D. route that day, he had asked for the Brents' mail. He handed a narrow, thin package about six inches long, to Grandfather Brent. Grandfather opened and a funny little smile in this eyes.

And just then Theodore came into the yard. "I've found the green goggles, grandfather!" he said breathlessly, holding out the box. But grandfather, still smiling, put his thumb and finger in the new box and took out—the green goggles!

"Why—what?" stammered Theodore.

Then grandfather took the box that Theodore had found, opened it, and took out—a beautiful four-bladed, ivory-handled penknife. A fine large one. What a knife for whittling arrows! "It's yours, Thody," he said, putting it into Theodore's hand. "I saw it advertized a week or more ago, and I thought it would be just the thing for you."

"Why, grandfather!" cried Theodore excitedly, "for me? All the time I thought I was looking for your goggles."

Mr. Ferner had heard of Theodore's determined hunt for the green goggles. "Now, aren't you glad you persevered in looking for your grandfather's specs?" he said.

"I'd be glad anyway," said Theodore. "Of course, I was bound to find them."

Then it was time to start for the picnic. And you will be glad to know that Theodore won the first prize.—Ex.

SOMETHING IN A NAME.

Jane sat on the floor looking very cross. "These are the worst old stockings," she cried. "They just won't go on."

"They are your new ones," said mother. "They should slip on without any trouble."

"But my underwear just wrinkles all up," grumbled Jane.

Mother reached down and helped Jane and in a few moments the stockings were on and fastened up without any wrinkles. Jane jumped to her feet. "Where is the button hook, Justin?" she called to her brother.

"There is one hanging in the bath room," Justin answered.

"I will be late for school, I just know I will," said Jane, going after the button hook.

"You have plenty of time," assured her mother, beginning gently to brush out Jane's curls.

"Ouch," cried Jane. "Oh-oo-o-ee but that hurts. I wish I could have my hair cut off. I don't like curls."

Mother tried to tie on a big bow, but Jane wiggled and turned so that mother had to tie it over several times.

"Sit still," called father sharply, and let your mother comb your hair."

"Oh dear me," sighed Jane, "people are always cross to me." But after father spoke she sat still while her mother finished brushing her hair. Then she jumped up and cried: "I wonder where my pencil is? I suppose Justin will take it. He always takes everything of mine."

"Grumble Jane, Grumble Jane," called Justin up the stairs. "Breakfast is ready."

"I am not Grumble Jane," cried Jane. "Yes you are," answered her brother. "You are Grumble Jane because you grumble all the time."

"I am always getting the worst of things," she announced as she sat down to the table.

"Why what is the matter now?" her father asked.

"Justin was calling me names," she answered looking at her brother crossly.

Father looked at the children and then over at mother. Mother looked tired.

"I want you to stop annoying your mother," said father very sternly. He looked directly at both of the children and they finished their breakfasts quietly although Jane wanted to tell everyone that she did not like the new cereal.

On the way to school Jane met her friend Elizabeth. "Come on," cried Elizabeth, "if we hurry we will have plenty of time for a good swing before the last bell."

Jane began to run, but she also began to grumble. "I just know all the swings will be full," she called to Elizabeth, who was flying along. "And no one will pay any attention to our turn."

"We will get a swing," laughed Elizabeth. "If I am there on time I always get one. I am never left out."

"Well, I am," said Jane. "No one seems to care whether I have a swing or not."

When the two little girls got into the school yard the swings were all full.

"I knew we would have no chance," grumbled Jane.

Elizabeth only hurried on and stopped beside a swing that was being pushed by a big girl whom she knew.

"How is little Miss Happiness this morning?" said the big girl, smiling at Elizabeth.

"Oh, dear, no one ever says nice things to me," thought Jane.

"And who is this little girl with the beautiful curls?" asked the big girl, looking down at Jane.

"Grumble Jane" answered a little girl, which made a number of children laugh.

"Sunny Jane, you mean," said the big girl, stopping the swing.

"Now we are going to give Happy Elizabeth and Sunny Jane a swing," she announced with a smile. "There is just about time to give them one."

As they flew up in the air Elizabeth cried, "It is grand to fly like this."

"Yes, but—" Jane began and then stopped. She must not grumble if she was to be Sunny Jane. She said the name over. How much nicer to be called that than Grumble Jane.

"It is beautiful to fly through the air like this," she cried to Elizabeth.

Elizabeth laughed with delight. "I just love to swing," she cried.

"So do I," said Jane. "I never knew how well I liked to swing before."

The last bell began to ring. The swing stopped as if by magic and the children all ran to get in line ready to march into the big school building.

"Thank you for giving us such a fine swing," called Elizabeth to the big girl.

"Thank you," said Jane, "for the swing and for changing my name to Sunny Jane."

The big girl smiled at Jane. "I like it much better than Grumble Jane," she said. "After this I am going to call you Sunny Jane every time I see you."

The next morning Jane put on her stockings and fastened them without a word. When mother brushed her hair she sat perfectly still although the brush did hurt some. Mother then tied on the bow right away and in half of the usual time Jane was ready for school.

Every time she started to grumble she would stop and call herself Sunny Jane. And in a short time she forgot to grumble.

The children stopped calling her Grumble Jane and they all enjoyed playing with her. She had much better times after she became Sunny Jane.—Advance.

BIRD SONGS.

The robin sings: "Cheer up! cheer up!"

The bluebird: "Tru-at-ly!"

The meadowlark: "Spring o' the year!"

Goldfinch: "Per-chic-o-ree!"

The crow sends forth his: "Caw! Caw! caw!"

Redwing his: "O-ka-lee!"

And we all know the blithesome song of merry chicadee.

And then who has not heard of bobwhite

His name call o'er and o'er,

From fence rail or an old stone wall

Where he has preched before?

"Chewink! chewink!" ground robin says,

"Teacher!" the oven bird;

And I suppose there're many notes

That I have never heard.

BILLIE TELL.

BY MARY DAVIS.

After the war Dr. Tell and Billie (who was a girl, by the way) lived very comfortably in a little fishing village for a whole year. Then the Government asked the doctor to do special work among the disabled soldiers, and this meant that little Billie must live with a flock of strange cousins.

Billie and her father were very brave about it. "Tell the truth, Billie, and don't forget to say your prayers," the doctor said in his abrupt, quick little way.

"Yes, father," Billie answered, and I'll mark off the calendar every night."

But Billie wasn't as homesick as she feared. The troop of cousins welcomed her joyfully. The boy cousins found her a good tennis player and able to outwalk the strongest of them. The girl cousins said she was never cross and she was so quick with her needle she was a great help to everybody.

But Billie would tell the whole truth. "Billie, what made you tell my mother that I took you down to Ocean Pier?" demanded handsome Phil.

"She asked me if we went," Billie said in a wondering tone.

"You should have said 'No,'" growled Phil, "now I can't go to see Dondero, the Magician."

Billie threw back her head and shook her mane of short red curls like a spirited colt. "I always tell the whole truth," she said proudly. Then her tone softened. "But I won't go to the Magician's either, and I'll show you how to make peanut Brittle the way Sergeant Campbell taught me."

Cousin Jack grew very red as Billie was talking. "See here, Billie Tell," he growled, "it's all very well for you to talk about telling the truth. You've lived with your father and other folks like him. But in a house like this you have to tell fibs."

Billie's golden eyes shone. "My father says, 'Tell the truth and God will look after the consequences,'" she said in a ringing, fearless voice.

"You wait and see," croaked Jack.

The next day it rained and all the cousins got together to play games. Billie, Phil and Jack loved to dress up and act out favorite stories. When they came to William Tell, of course Billie herself had to shoot the apple from tiny Morton's head. The arrow went wild. There was a crash and down fell the huge blue and white Chinese jar from its stand.

Adele put up her finger for silence. "We'll tell Aunt Amity that the Angora kitten knocked it over. He broke a piece of Dresden ware last week."

Jack and Phil put the huge vase back. "There's only one side smashed," Jack whispered hoarsely, "and nobody will find it out for weeks."

Billie put her fingers in her ears. She was so white that all her freckles showed. "I'm going to find Aunt Amity this minute," she said.

"Billie, dear, listen to me," coaxed Adele; "if you tell Aunt Amity, she will probably send you to Uncle Robert's in Portland. He has been begging for you for months. You've never seen Aunt Amity cross."

"You're silly if you bother mother when she has callers," croaked Jack.

Billie swept her cousins a reproachful glance and went boldly into the white and gold drawing room.

"Excuse me, Aunt Amity," she said in a small, far-away voice, "but I broke your blue and white Chinese jar in the hall."

"Oh, how dreadful!" said Cousin Louise; "you can never duplicate it."

Jack was in front of Billie now. "I told her to turn it around so the cracked part wouldn't show," he confessed.

Adele was scarlet, but she stammered out: "And I told her to say the kitten did it, but she wouldn't."

Billie spoke again. "I had to disturb you when you had callers, because I thought if I waited I'd be afraid to tell you."

"Good for Young America," said a man with bright, keen eyes.

Aunt Amity flushed as she looked into Billie's clear, honest eyes. "Now, Billie, I'll tell the truth, too," she began. "I always hated that blue and white jar, but I pretended to like it because other people did. And I'm rather glad you broke it. And Jack and Phil, if you'll tell the truth the way Billie does, I'll try hard not to scold. Now go out into the kitchen and tell Hannah to let you have a jar of strawberry preserves."

The children departed hastily. Billie ate three crackers and four spoonfuls of marmalade. Then she smiled over at Jack.

Jack took a large bite of his bread and smiled back at Billie. "Let's all do it after this," he proposed.

"The truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," said handsome Phil.—Congregationalist.

BERT'S SALT WATER CURE.

Bert was sitting on the floor, looking over his pictures, and baby toddled up and tore one of the prettiest. Bert called out: "Oh, mother, see what baby has done!" and began to cry.

"Bert," said mother, as she took baby away; "did you know that tears are salt water?"

Bert choked a sob and looked up. "No," he said; "are they? How did you find out, mother?"

"Oh, somebody told me so when I was a little girl, and I tasted a tear, and found it was true."

"Real salt water?" said Bert.

"Yes, try and see."

Bert would very gladly have tried if he could have found a tear. But, by that time there was not one left. He looked at the torn picture, but it did not make him feel badly any more.

All he could think of was whether tears tasted like salt water.

"Next time I cry I will find out," he said.

That very afternoon, while climbing over the top of the rocking chair, he fell and got a great bump. It seemed too much for Bert, and he was just beginning to cry loudly when he happened to think what a good chance this was going to be to catch some tears. He put up his finger, too quickly, in fact, for there had not a tear come yet, and now that his thoughts had wandered from the bump, he could not cry about it any more. So you see, that chance was lost.

"I can't get a single tear to taste, mother!" he said. Which was, perhaps, just what mother had expected.—Ex.

A CURE FOR SLANG.

The boy, a lad of ten, was quick to learn, and particularly good in "lauguage," as his report card showed. His vocabulary was not so choice as varied, and the slang of the street was irresistible.

"By heck, I'm cold!" he would exclaim as he came in, and, at a request from his mother, would inquire, "Who you you think I am?"

She explained to him that these phrases were not used by well-educated people, but he was unconvinced.

"All the fellows talk that way, but I can cut it out if you say so."

But he continued to use the expression; and, while his mother did not wish to "nag," she felt that she ought to show in some way that she disapproved, and that the lauguage was undesirable, even though it was not profane.

One evening as she was reading aloud from "Swiss Family Robinson," and noting its formal, precise sentences, a sudden thought came to her. She acted on it instantly, and continued to read.

"It seems absolutely necessary, my dear wife," I began, "to return at once to the wreck while it is yet calm, that we may save the poor animals left there and bring on shore many articles of infinite value to us, which, if we do not now recover, by heck, we may finally lose entirely. On the other hand, I feel there is an immense deal to be done on shore, and that I ought not to leave you in such an insecure shelter as this tent."

The boy raised his eyes in startled surprise, but the mother continued to read:

"Cut it out. Return to the wreck by all means," replied my wife cheerfully. "Who do you think I am? Patience, order and perserevance will help us through all our work, by heck; and I agree with you that a visit to the wreck is without doubt our first duty. Come, let us wake the children and set to work without delay."

The boy's face was red with embarrassment, which changed to anger as his sister giggled.

"That isn't there," he declared rather impatiently, but the mother continued her reading, with no comment at all, but she inserted no more slang. She had shown him for once just how the words he used so often sounded to her.

He snickered a little during the evening, but was himself at breakfast. And when his mother asked whether he wished another dish of oatmeal, he cried: "Yes, it's good, by—; yes, mother." He did not overcome the habit at once, but he had become conscious of how the words sounded, and in time he succeeded. His mother saw he was trying, and they never spoke of that peculiar page in "Swiss Family Robinson."—Ex.

THE ABBREVIATED LIFE.

A kitchenette is where we cook
Our meals from day to day;
In bedroomette, a tiny nook,
We sleep the nights away.

A picturette adorns our wall;
A carpetette, our floor;
A bathroomette is off our hall,
Exactly three by four.

Within, our bathtubette behold,
With showerette on high.
We've waterette, both hot and cold
Our flesh to purify.

When winter makes its icy threat,
And round our window drums,
We seek our radiatorette,
And up the heatette comes.

Abbreviated lives we live;
But time is passing past;
We have this promise positive—
A roomy tomb at last.

A RAINY DAY JOURNEY.

The poor little birds were shivering in the cold rainstorm. There were big pools of water in the garden where last summer the bright pansy faces had nodded in the sunshine. Louise could not go out of doors to play, but Louis did not care one bit. Usually he would fret and wonder what he could do next, but this day he hardly glanced out of the window.

Only last night the electric express had stopped, and there was a fine rocking horse for Louis. Uncle Luke had sent it from New York for his birthday gift. It was a splendid, big fellow, with a white mane and tail.

"He looks like a real, truly pony, mother!" exclaimed Louis as he climbed up in the saddle for a gallop. "I think his name is Jerry, like grandpa's horse."

Jerry was the reason why he did not fret because it rained next morning.

Louis patted Jerry, gathered up the reins, and was off on his first long ride. Miles and miles he trotted along the play-room floor. Then Louis stopped to let Jerry rest and drink out of a brook by the roadside. Soon they were off again, riding fast until they reached a candy store. Louis ran out into the dining room and came back with two plum chocolates that he had bought from mother for two kisses. He offered one to Jerry. "Well, you are a funny popy," he cried. "Grandpa's horse loves candy. S'pose I'll have to eat it myself, then."

The next stop was at a book store, and Louis bought a picture book. By and by he was hungry. "Get up, Jerry," he coaxed. "I've got to visit Cookie Town and get some luncheon." In a short while he ran into the kitchen. "Oh, I knew I could smell 'em, Maggie," he laughed as he saw the heaps of warm, brown ginger-snaps. "I guess I'll buy half a dozen for my dinner."

Mounting his pony once more, he rode hard until he reached home. He led Jerry into a corner and gave him some hay. Then he went into his little cubby house which Sister Marian had built out of two chairs and an old green couch cover. He cuddled up with his curly head upon the sofa pillow to eat his cookies, while he looked at the pictures in his new birthday book.

When mother peeped into the play-room a little later, Louis was having a nice nap, tired out from his long, exciting horseback journey.—Pittsburgh Christian Advocate.

HOW ANIMALS SLEEP.

Elephants sleep standing up. When in a herd, a certain number will always stand watch while the others sleep, for the big, powerful beasts are timid and cautious at night and will not go to sleep unguarded.

Bats sleep head downward, hanging by their hind claws.

Birds, with few exceptions, sleep with their heads turned tailward over the back and the beak thrust beneath the wing.

Storks, gulls and other long-legged birds sleep standing on one leg.

Ducks sleep on open water. To avoid drifting ashore they keep paddling with one foot, thus making them move in a circle.

Foxes and wolves sleep curled up, their noses and the soles of their feet close together and blanketed by their bushy tails.

Lions, tigers and cat animals stretch themselves out flat upon the side. Their muscles twitch and throb, indicating that they are light and restless sleepers.

Owls, in addition to their eyelids, have screens that they draw sideways across their eyes to shut out the light, for they sleep in the daytime.

MAKING CHARACTER.

Many people seem to forget that character grows; that it is not something to be put on, ready-made, with manhood or womanhood, but day by day, here a little and there a little, it grows with the growth and strength, until good or bad, it becomes a coat of mail.

Look at the model man of business—prompt, reliable, conscientious, cool and cautious, yet clear-headed and energetic. When do you suppose he developed all these admirable qualities? When he was a boy. Let us see the way in which a boy of ten years gets up in the morning, works, plays, studies, and I will tell you what kind of a man he will make. The boy that is late at the breakfast table, late at school, who never does anything at the right time, stands a poor chance to be a prompt man.

The boy who half washes his face, half does his sums, half learns his lessons, will never make a thorough man. The boy who neglects his studies, be they ever so small, and then excuses himself by saying, "Oh, I forgot! I didn't think!" will never be a reliable man.

The boy who finds pleasure in the pain and suffering of weaker things will never be a noble, generous, kindly man—a gentleman.

TESTIMONY AND CONTROVERSY.

The value of personal testimony is immense. To defend the Gospel in controversy is congenial to most Christians; it calls our combative instincts into play, and to debate Christian doctrine in the abstract is an intellectual exercise that implies nothing difficult or distasteful; but to bear personal testimony, to declare what we have felt and seen, to set to our seal that God is true, is often a task calling for courage and sacrifice. Yet such witness is of infinitely more value than all our scholarship and cleverness of argument.—Watkinson.

JUST PLAIN RESPONSIBILITY.

It was said of John Quincy Adams that he was always in his seat in the House of Representatives when it came time for the opening of the session. One day the clock showed the opening hour, but Mr. Adams was not there. "I wonder why he is late," said one member. "More likely," said another, "the clock is fast." The latter guess proved true, and three minutes later, precisely on time, Mr. Adams walked into the chamber and took his seat. Now we can not command the genius of John Quincy Adams, but we can commend his reliability. A man is sure to make his way in the world if people can count on him. Fickleness will ruin the most brilliant lives, but plain dependableness will put anyone in a place of honor and keep him there.

NEGLECT.

The awful punishment to the wicked is the result of doing nothing for the little ones. That people do nothing in unselfish service is the sign that they have not the spirit of Christ. There is a serious thought there. People are condemned for doing nothing. They are simply indifferent. Holy ministries are not considered at all. And they go away, away from Christ.

Lesson V—October 30.

STRONG DRINK IN A NATION'S LIFE.
(World's Temperance Sunday.)
(Isa. 28:1-13.)

1. Woe to the crown of pride, to the drunkards of Ephraim, whose glorious beauty is a fading flower, which are on the head of the fat valleys of them that are overcome with wine!
2. Behold, the Lord hath a mighty and strong one, which as a tempest of hail and a destroying storm, as a flood of mighty water overflowing, shall cast down to the earth with the hand.
3. The crown of pride, the drunkards of Ephraim, shall be trodden under feet:
4. And the glorious beauty, which is on the head of the fat valley, shall be a fading flower, and as the hasty fruit before the summer; which when he that looketh upon it seeth, while it is yet in his hand he eateth it up.
5. In that day shall the Lord of hosts be for a crown of glory, and for a diadem of beauty, unto the residue of his people.
6. And for a spirit of judgment to him that sitteth in judgment, and for strength to them that turn the battle to the gate.
7. But they also have erred through wine, and through strong drink are out of the way; the priest and the prophet have erred through strong drink, they are swallowed up of wine, they are out of the way through strong drink; they err in vision, they stumble in judgment.
8. For all tables are full of vomit and filthiness, so that there is no place clean.
9. Whom shall he teach knowledge? and whom shall we make to understand doctrine? them that are weaned from the milk, and drawn from the breasts.
10. For precept must be upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, and there a little:
11. For with stammering lips and another tongue will he speak to this people.
12. To whom he said, This is the rest wherewith ye may cause the weary to rest; and this is the refreshing; yet they would not hear.
13. But the word of the Lord was unto them precept upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, and there a little; that they might go, and fall backward, and be broken, and snared, and taken.

INTRODUCTION.

For a great many years we have had a quarterly temperance lesson, and this has been one of the great influences for disposing the minds and hearts of large numbers of the people in favor of the destruction of the liquor traffic. We have now come to the point where we have prohibition in our national Constitution, and even before we had attained this, a very large number of the states had prohibition. It is no sudden or spasmodic matter, as many liquor advocates are trying to assume, but the deliberate, intelligent, conscientious conviction of the nation, finally expressed in constitutional law. It is not to be overthrown. It is here to stay. But the liquor element is in a state of rebellious fury, determined to do away with the law by all sorts of criminal opposition to it, and violations of it. They are trying to get weak people to think that, because there is so much violation of the law, it should be repealed. But the American Nation is not made up of cowards and poltroons, and is not in the habit of being dictated to by rebels. This is the very time for more temperance work. We must keep the sentiment worked up for law enforcement. We must emphasize the need for total abstinence. We must be in the constant way of temperance teaching, and, after a time, the worst of the opposition will die out and we shall have a sober and law-abiding nation, as earnest for prohibition as for any other matter of clean and righteous living.

EXPOSITORY.

1. Drunkenness has always been a beset-ting sin. People have had a passion to drink the poison, alcohol, which exhilarates and excites them and makes them imagine they are having enjoyment. The evil effects of this poison have been the same in all lands and ages that they are at present. It is no wonder that good and wise persons have issued warnings and exhortations, always and everywhere, and have tried to induce the foolish and wicked to desist from the evil course of drinking intoxicating liquor. Such a warning is our lesson. The reference here, in speaking of the "crown of pride," is to the capital of Israel, or Samaria. Israel is here called Ephraim, because this was one of the principal tribes. But the glory and beauty were to fade away as a flower. Israel was to be destroyed. The impending judgment of the Assyrian invasion was to follow the protracted sinfulness of the people of Israel. A people that indulges in drunkenness becomes enfeebled and unable to resist attacks. The valleys might be fertile and fat, but if the people engaged in drunkenness and accompanying evils they would soon be at the mercy of invaders.

2. God has various instruments for the punishment of the sinful and unworthy. Sometimes the punishment comes in one form and sometimes in another, but no nation can long endure that gives way to dissipation. In the case of the people of Israel, the scourge was in the form of the Assyrian ruler with his armies. He was a "mighty and strong one." His invading forces were here compared to "a tempest of hail," and "a destroying storm," and a "flood of mighty waters." So it came about. But so it has come to other countries when they have permitted vice to weaken and destroy them. Assyria and Babylon finally, and Greece and Rome, and many another great kingdom, have fallen in turn as they yielded to enfeebling and destructive sins and vices, as drunkenness.

3, 4. Here is a repetition of the warnings, in order to emphasize. The people were told that with all their great advantages they would be swept away. As premature or early fruit is quickly and greedily devoured, so would the Israelitish nation be swept away. The warning is to all of those who are headstrong and conceited and who think they are able to go on into evil habits and defy God. They will fail. The drinker is boastful that drinking "never hurts him," but some day he will be swept away. Poison will poison the ones who take it into their systems.

5. The assurance is here that, when it is too late for those who are destroyed, God will be seen to have spoken the truth, and those who survive, because they have feared God, will have a good life like a crown and diadem of beauty. So it is today. Some people are going on to destroy themselves, determined to get intoxicating liquor, making and selling poison, breaking the laws and being rebels and anarchists against God and their country. But they will be swept away. Righteousness will triumph. Good people will rejoice. A better life will come to all the law-abiding people who will see the good day.

6. God here promised aid to those who were struggling on the right side. He would give them wisdom. He would see to it that justice at last would be done. He would help those who were in the heat of the battle, trying to drive away the enemy. Although he did not turn back the Assyrians, yet he did deliver many individuals. So is the Lord today helping with his wisdom and power those who are battling against unrighteousness. He will see to it that prohibition is successful. He will help his valiant people and will make them triumph over lawlessness and evil.

7, 8. These two verses present a picture of the sad and demoralizing and disgusting orgies in which drinking people engage. Even people who ought to know better have been too often involved. Priests and prophets even, in Judah as well as in Israel, had made the great mistake of indulging in intoxicating drink, with sad results in every department of life. No man, even in the highest places, can presume that he can drink without injury to himself and shame to the cause of Jesus Christ.

9, 10. These words seem to be the insulting jeering of drunkards, resenting the prophet's words, and saying that he talks to them as if they were children. But, after all, it was true. The prophet had to talk in this way, and all prophets and teachers have to talk in this way. Those who grow up in sin are very much younger and lacking in common sense than even children, and they need to be instructed and reproofed, most directly and plainly, but even this will, in many cases, do no good. The best thing is to teach children, in childhood, and let them grow up, knowing the truth, and being wise.

11. God was about to speak to the Israelites in judgment, through people of foreign words and language, as they had not listened to his plain lessons. So if men will not obey God, and keep sober and clean, he will visit them with the bitter results of their sin.

12. How wise and well it is to grow up to obey God, and do his will, and find rest in him. This is the life to which God invites us, obedient and religious and moral. It is the only life to live. Some will not live in this way, and they will be sure to reap awful results.

13. God warns us here, once again, that we are to obey him and his words. If we do this we will find joy and rest and peace. If we do not, our lives will be broken up and snared and taken, as wild beasts are snared and destroyed. Let us heed the words and do the will of God.

MEMORIES.

BY GEORGE VELDEMAN.

How dear to my heart are the scenes of my childhood.

When I was a boy as tall as a chair;
How often together, in summer and winter,
My parents to God would offer up prayer;
I often have wondered when I was a youngster,
What could be the reason of looking aloft,
But now that I'm older, I see it quite plainly,
The hearts of my parents were filled with God's love;
That old-fashioned father, that old-fashioned mother,
That old-fashioned altar, I'll never forget.

And then, when our dinner or supper was over,
The Bible was brought from its place on the shelf,
I hoped they'd forget it, but never, no never,
And soon I was taught to get it myself;
The boys would all stretch their backs like a turtle,
To see if the chapter'd read would be long,
We thought it was foolish, we were not attentive,
But now I perceive that my own thoughts were wrong;
That old-fashioned father, that old-fashioned mother,
That old-fashioned altar, I'll never forget.

But now in these days of our hustle and bustle,
The world rushes on at a sickening pace,
We hardly have time for a talk with the Master,
Whom soon we must meet, as our Lord, face to face;
So give us some more of those homes of devotion,
Where parents and children may live as they ought,
And when I am old, and gray-haired and feeble,
I'll think of my parents, what good they have wrought;
That old-fashioned father, that old-fashioned mother,
That old-fashioned altar, I'll never forget.
—Reformed Church Leader.

THE DETERMINATIVE "I."

It is interesting to note that the central letter in the words "sin" and "faith" is "I." The pivot on which both words—and both facts represented by the words—turn is "I." It is of no use to attempt to saddle responsibility for what one is and does upon anything or anybody but himself. Whatever the circumstances, however difficult to withstand existing conditions it may be, in the last analysis the "I" is determinative.

PATIENCE.

The writer of Hebrews exhorts us to be "followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises." Faith and patience, both are needed if there is to be any worthy spiritual achievement. Faith guides, patience labors at the oars. By faith our thoughts leap from the low level of our present accomplishments to the summit of perfection. By patience we hold ourselves doggedly to the steep rugged path by which that summit is attained. It is no easy task that the Christian sets himself. Men do not slip or slide into holiness. "Agonize," said Jesus, "to enter into the strait gate." "We climb the steep ascent of heaven through peril, toil and pain." And if we would attain, we must have patience as well as faith.

MR. GORTON'S MONOPOLY.

BY RUSSELL SEWALL.

I had not been a member of the Cuyler Class long before I realized what a nuisance Mr. Gorton was. He was a sort of religious monopolist. He was a retired merchant, with nothing to do but read and study. He was interested in theology and the Bible, and had considerable knowledge of both.

As soon as Mr. Bartlett introduced a subject, in would jump Brother Gorton. He had read a very interesting article which touched on that matter, and he proceeded to give a synopsis of the article; an able synopsis, too.

The next subject that Mr. Bartlett brought up, Gorton had a question upon. Mr. Bartlett answered the question, and Gorton declared himself perfectly satisfied; only, if he might be permitted, he had come across an interesting side light on the subject, which would elucidate it still farther.

Mr. Bartlett is very mild and patient. He heard Gorton out, and then quickly asked Sam Cole a question, which Sam answered fairly well. But Sam's answer was too brief. "Mr. Cole might also have said on that point," he began; and what Mr. Cole might also have said occupied fully ten minutes. Cole had said enough in the first place.

As I became acquainted with the Cuyler Class, I saw that all the members were provoked with Mr. Gorton.

"Why don't you put him down?" I asked.

"We can't."

"Why don't you interrupt him?"

"He outtalks us, best we can do."

But at last the matter became evidently serious; we had lost several members, who declared they'd never come back to the class while he stayed in it.

We found out that our teacher was as much disturbed as we were, and aware of the harm it was doing.

We wanted to request him outright to shut up or leave the class, or words to that effect; but Mr. Bartlett wouldn't agree to any such plan.

"The trouble is," said he, "that Mr. Gorton knows his lesson better than anyone else in the class. He is full of it. I don't think that he means to be rude or assertive; but he is running over with the

An Idea Originated by this Cleveland Church Society is Spreading Like Wild Fire

HOW IT HAPPENED

SOME one conceived the idea that Candy Mints would be easy to sell, and every one seemed to agree, so a committee was appointed to call on Strong, Cobb & Company, Cleveland, O., a large manufacturing concern, who were the first in the country to make Mints.

The outcome of this interview resulted in the Company agreeing to get up a special package called "22 Mints," which contained 320 5-cent rolls that cost $9.00 and sell for $16.00, making $7.00 profit. Four Flavors, Peppermint, Wintergreen, Cinnamon and Clove. Packed 80 packages to a box, four boxes to a case.

The sale has proven so easy and successful, and so much enthusiasm has been created by one telling another, that the Company is now filling orders for "22 Mints" from all parts of the country. Here are extracts from some of the letters received.

HOW IT WORKS

Miss Mary E. Orr, 2007 Garrard Ave., Covington, Ky., says: "Enclosed find money order for $9.00. Please send as soon as possible one case of '22 Mints.' I am ordering these for our Young Woman's Society of our church. We have already sold two cases."

Dr. E. L. Chapman, D. O., 1017 Jackson St., Anderson, Ind., says: "Our girls are delighted with the '22 Mints.' They sell fine."

Miss Lillian Caldwell, Freedom School, Alliance, O., says: "Enclosed find order for three cases of '22 Mints.' Please rush this order, as we are having many calls for more candy."

Mrs. Jessie Mevendere, Sturgeon Bay, Wis., says: "Please send another order of Mints. Only had the other case a week, and they are nearly all gone."

Mrs. L. F. Johnson, Corresponding Secretary W. C. T. U., Erie, Pa., says: "The Mints sold like hot cakes and are fine. Have recommended same to others."

Your society can do the same. Send $9.00 now for a case of "22 Mints" and they will be sent prepaid express or parcel post.

subject, and simply has to express himself. Now the way—and the only way—to break this monopoly is for all you others to get just as full of the subject as he is, and just as eager to express yourselves on it."

The next Sabbath the fire of battle was in every eye. We did not even wait for Mr. Bartlett to begin, but Dr. Preston jumped into the arena with a question which gave him a chance to illustrate the lesson with a fine incident from his medical practice. Mrs. Batchelder took up the theme and carried it a little farther. Mr. Bartlett, when her voice fell a little, swiftly got under the debate with another question. Saunders Clay snapped up the question like a hound and was off with a brilliant dissertation. So it went, one passing the subject on to another like a football, and Mr. Bartlett always ready to give a push where it was needed, till the hour was up.

Mr. Gorton had sat there with his mouth open, and had not been able to get in a word. His monopoly was broken.

And what do you think I heard him say as we left the room?

"The best recitation this class has ever had; yes, sir, the very best!"—Ex.

To take Christ's yoke is to be yoked up with Christ, and that is to keep step with him in the furrowed field of time.

PRAYER MEETING, OCTOBER 30.

Endeavor Topic: How Can We Apply the Golden Rule Today? Matthew 7:12.

If we could or would, all of us, apply the Golden Rule to our living today, this would be a happy world to live in. We would think about other people kindly and would try to do to them what we would wish them to do to us if our places were interchanged.

It is not certain that the other person would do that kindness to us. He possibly would not. But after our treating him kindly a few times he might come to have the disposition to treat us, and other people too, in the same kind way. At least we would have followed the lofty teaching of our Savior.

There is a natural disposition in the world to "get even" with the people who have done one an injury. But it is a bad rule to follow. There is no end to it. It is exemplified by the "feuds" that sometimes exist, between families or clans, that keep running on, fighting back and forth for years, and causing bloodshed and bitterness and hatred for even generations. The Golden Rule is a better program for life.

In this beautiful, benevolent, well-working rule laid down by our Savior, we are counseled to lay aside the spirit of revenge; to be above ordinary selfishness and indifference, and to do to others what we would wish them to do to us. There is something positive and active and earnest in this way of living.

It has been said that to return evil for good is Satanic, or devilish; to return evil for evil is brutish; to return good for good is human and exalted; but to return good for evil is divine, and in accordance with the spirit and principles taught by our Lord Jesus Christ. To follow this divine rule would transform our world into a heavenly condition. Just so far as it is practiced there is a bit of Christliness and heaven introduced into the earth-life. We can do it by God's grace, today. Our world needs it today.

Samson had a rule which he followed, but it was not a good rule. It was the old plan of getting even, and more, with his enemies. After he had slain many of them and had worked out his revenge on them, he said: "As they did unto me, so have I done unto them." This was not the Gospel spirit, but he lived before the Gospel times. He was a Bible character, but the Bible does not approve of every one who is mentioned on its pages. The spirit taught by Christ goes on the high level of the divine life. Let us pray that we may have it and put it in practice in our daily living.

It has been said by some that Confucius taught the same thing, and that he was as pure and great a teacher in this matter as was Christ. But this is a mistake. Confucius taught something quite different. He said that we should not do anything to another person that we would not wish that person to do to us. This, if it will be seen, is quite a different thing. It teaches us to avoid doing what is harmful or unkind, but one might do this, and yet never do anything that is really kind. We might be determined never to treat the heathen nations unkindly, and yet we might never go to the point when we would send missionaries to them to do them good. Let us not be willing simply to avoid injuring other people. Let us learn to do them good.

We need to put the Golden Rule into practice today in dealing with others. We will make ourselves active for good, and will be useful if we do this. The teachings of Jesus Christ will never get out of date. They will always do to practice in our daily-life.

TAKE TIME.

There is always time to find Ways of being sweet and kind;
There is always time to share
Smiles and goodness everywhere.

Time to send the frowns away,
Time a gentle word to say,
Time for happiness, and time
To assist the weak to climb.

Time to give a little flower,
Time for friendship any hour,
But there is no time to spare
For unkindness anywhere.

THE VALUE OF LOYALTY.

The longer I live, the more I value loyalty.

When I was young I had the silly notion that loyalty meant being obedient to some one else.

In those blundering days of youth, I thought that the greatest thing was independence.

Today, after many hard lessons, I know that loyalty—sympathetic, intelligent loyalty—is one of the most valuable virtues that a man can have.

Unless you are loyal to others, no one will be loyal to you.

If you are an employer, you must be loyal to your worker.

If you are a worker, you must be loyal to your employer.

No success—no lasting success—can come to any organization unless there is loyalty on both sides.—Herbert N. Casson.

CRITICS.

Criticism when fair and just may do the Church good, but mere fault-finding is worthless. A critic must be qualified for his task. Many men who criticize the Church have no qualification whatsoever for such a task. A man said to me: "I don't see anything in going to church; there is nothing in it." His first premise no doubt was right; he did not see anything in attending church for he never attended but the generalization he made was false. In anxiety to render humanity service the Church has often taken the self-styled critic too seriously. All fault-finders are not critics, and even the critics may be wrong.

From Humble Homes to British Universities

According to a statement made to the House of Commons by Mr. H. A. L. Fisher, President of the British Board of Education, students from humble homes are entering the British universities in increasing numbers. More than 25,000 ex-service men are beneficiaries under the scheme which provides courses for them at universities and technical colleges. "The majority of them were reared in humble circumstances, belonging to families that had never before been represented at British universities," says Mr. Fisher.

Great Britain is determined to take the boys from its humble homes and make them into the nation's future leaders.

There are thousands of boys and girls in the humble Christian homes of America who would make the finest kind of leaders in building the Kingdom of God, if only they could have the encouragement and help necessary to secure adequate training.

Britain's educational budget has increased since the war by over $125,000,000. Is it not time that the Church's educational budget was greatly increased? Will you help make it bigger?

PRAYER MEETING

OCTOBER 26.

DO I DISCOURAGE OTHERS?
Numbers 13-24-33.

A great deal of courage is needed to enable one to make his way, creditably and usefully, through this world. There are so many forms of trouble and opposition and difficulty, that one needs to be strong and fixed in his life in order to be really successful. The question then, for each one of us, is whether we are helping others to be brave in meeting the difficulties of life, and putting a little more wholesome courage in them, or whether we are weakening and discouraging them and making it harder for them to do well and serve God. Especially is it important for us to consider whether we are helping those who are trying to do the work of Jesus Christ in his church, or whether we are discouraging and weakening them as they go on in his service.

How is it in the work of the particular church in which we have our home? Are we trying to build up the church? Are we trying to encourage the minister and strengthen him as he is working for Christ? Let us be among the number of those who are taking the course that will put life and hope and courage into the minister and the other workers of the church.

Moses sent twelve men into the promised land, to see it and bring back a report of it, hoping that what they would have to say would strengthen the whole Israelitish people who had recently come out of Egyptian bondage, and help them to go forward, hopefully and courageously, into the new country. Of these twelve, ten came back with terrifying, cowardly stories of the enemies to be found there and of the dangers and difficulties in the way. Only two of them, Joshua and Caleb, spoke like real men. These two said that it was a fine and fruitful land, that they were well able to take possession of it and defeat all enemies, and that it would be a mark of God's good pleasure if he would bring them into it. But all of the talk of these two could not counteract the cowardly and discouraging words of the ten spies, and the nation was afraid to go on. For this they were compelled to spend forty years in the wilderness, wearing out hope and courage and life, until all the grown men who had come out of Egypt, except Joshua and Caleb, had died. It is a sad and shameful story of ten cowardly men who discouraged others. Let us avoid the course they took.

Some people are discouraging others from doing good and necessary and Christian work by their words. They say, in reference to some forward, essential duty, that it can not be done, or that it will not work, or that it is impossible. They say that money can not be raised, or that a meeting can not succeed, or that some needed work can not possibly be done. They hold back, and hinder, and discourage others. If they would only do their own proper share of the work, and keep still, others would do their share also, and the whole work would be done. Oh, how much some people are answerable for, in the hindering and defeating of Christian enterprises, and in the loss of souls! Let us learn, at least, not to discourage those who are trying to serve Christ.

Some people discourage others by refusing to help, and by declining to co-operate, and by holding back so that they can not be depended on. Some people get to be of that sort. They are just listless, or indifferent, or undependable. A minister lamented, over one of his elders, that he was the most disappointing and discouraging element in the church, because that, while he might have been useful and a leader, he held back and never could be depended on, although he never said any word in opposition. There are those who could be useful and influential, if they only would, but who decline to come up to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty.

What we all need is that happy, obedient, cheerful spirit of co-operation that will lead us to be helpers in doing God's work. Let us put courage and hope and life into others and help forward the good work of God.

THE SET OF THE SAIL.

One ship sails east,
And one sails west,
By the self same wind that blows.
It's the set of the sail,
And not the gale,
That determines the way it goes.

And like the winds of the sea,
Are the ways of fate,
As we journey on through life.
'Tis the set of the soul,
That determines the goal
And not the stress and the strife.

—Selected.

Meditation holds reason and faith to their work and blows the fire till it thoroughly burns. To run a few steps may not get a man heat, but walking an hour may; and though a sudden occasional thought of heaven will not raise our affections to any spiritual heat, yet meditation can continue our thoughts till our hearts grow warm.—Richard Baxter.

Have You Felt the Lack of Befitting Missionary Informa- tion of the Church?

Missionary Committees are often confronted with a deficiency of missionary stories and tableaux appropriately arranged for Junior and Intermediate age group adaptation.

Mr. Somerndike, the Superintendent of Missions of the Board, found a real niche for human interest story material in the Sunday school, et cetera, when he wrote "Sunday-school Missionary Incidents and Exercises," published a few years ago.

It was found, also, that the human interest element in missionary stories from field workers makes far more interesting and attractive material for children and young people than statistics, maps, charts and long, dry descriptions of the Board's work, thus the writing of a new book on Sunday-school missions was actuated.

SUNDAY SCHOOL BUILDERS

Stories from the Field of Sunday School Missions

By JOHN M. SOMERNDIKE

The heroic and self-sacrificing feature of missionary life, always an inspiration to character building, is especially emphasized in all the stories. The people among whom the missionaries labor are characterized, becoming "real," with the human tendencies for good and evil, thus making each narrative strike a concordant note with the reader.

Paper, 152 pages 75 cents, postpaid

The book will meet the need of befitting missionary information for children and young people of the Church.

GENERAL NEWS

UNION LEADERS ORDER RAILROAD STRIKE.

More than half a million American railroad men were ordered by their leaders last Saturday to initiate a strike Oct. 30th, while other unions whose membership brings the total to about 2,000,000, announced unofficially that they were preparing to follow suit and make the walkout general on the same date.

Under this program the tie-up would be complete, according to union predictions, by Nov. 2d.

The hour was fixed for 6 a. m., Oct. 30th, except for one Texas line, whose trainmen were authorized to get out Oct. 22d.

The railroads listed in the first group on which the strike is to become effective touch forty-two of the forty-eight states, with a trackage of 73,000 miles, out of the total United States trackage of approximately 200,000.

The New England states comprise the group that is virtually untouched in the first walkout.

The strike orders were issued to the Big Five brotherhoods, oldest and most powerful of the railway unions, and they specifically included mail trains in the walk-out.

The strike was called because of a 12 per cent reduction authorized by the Railroad Labor Board on July 1st.

DEADLOCK REACHED BY RAILROADS.

Representatives of the nation's railroads, after announcing that they can not reduce freight rates at present without going into bankruptcy, and that they immediately would seek a further reduction in the wages of employes from the United States Railroad Labor Board went into futile conference with labor leaders in an effort to reach an amicable settlement of wage difficulties, which at times have threatened to tie up the transportation system of the country.

LEAGUE COUNCIL SETTLES SILESIAN ISSUE.

The Council of the League of Nations has reached a final decision on the Upper Silesian question, and thereby has accomplished the greatest task set for its consideration. The solution reached by the council involves a new frontier line, together with certain measures providing for guarantees against the dislocation of existing economic conditions.

The members of the council are confident that this solution is the only possible one, and that it will at the same time roll away one of the clouds hovering over Europe and firmly establish the prestige of the League.

The text of the decision will be published simultaneously at Paris, London, Rome and Geneva as soon as delivered to the Berlin and Warsaw Governments.

CONFERENCE ON UNEMPLOYMENT ADJOURNS.

Having agreed upon policies for the emergency and permanent relief of the unemployed, and the return of commerce and business to normal, the national unemployment conference, last Thursday, completed its labors undertaken at the request of President Harding and adjourned without date.

To continue the work of the conference until the present emergency is passed the Organization Committee was ordered to select a standing committee, to be named later, which will be authorized to reconvene the conference at any time.

The final session of the full conference was devoted to the consideration of reports by various sub-committees. In the main these reports were an amplification of general measures already submitted by the conference.

Existing unemployment was found by the conference to be a matter for the communities to handle, with the responsibility of its mitigation placed upon the Mayors. To co-ordinate the relief work of the communities, a central agency was established under Arthur Woods, former Police Commissioner of New York.

AMERICAN DELEGATION TO THE ARMAMENT CONFERENCE FORMS ORGANIZATION.

The American delegation to the armament conference conducted its first meeting last Wednesday, effected a permanent organization, made a general survey of the data gathered for its guidance, and began discussion of the questions of policy that are to characterize the position of this Government in the coming negotiations.

One of the first specific subjects to be considered was the problem of open or closed sessions for the armament conference, and discussion is said to have revealed much sentiment for opening the doors whenever the entire body of delegates meet to register important decisions.

Other and broader questions of policy also received detailed examination during the three-and-a-half-hour meeting of the delegation.

No date was set for the next meeting, but it was indicated that another consultation was probable this week.

UNEMPLOYMENT CONFERENCE RECOMMENDATIONS.

A summary of the more important economic problems faced by the country "that require constructive and immediate settlement," if recovery in business and permanent employment were to be accomplished expeditiously, was agreed upon unanimously by the National Conference on Unemployment.

A general resolution adopted declared for:

"Readjustment of railway rates to a fairer basis of the relative value of commodities, with special consideration of the rates upon primary commodities, at the same time safeguarding the financial stability of the railways.

"Speedy completion of the tax bill, with its contemplated reductions, in order that business now held back pending definite determination may proceed.

"Settlement of the financial relationships between the Government and the railways, having in mind the immediate necessity for increased maintenance and betterment, making effective increased railway employment and stimulation of general employment, in order that the railways may be prepared for enlarged business as it comes.

"Limitation of world armament, and consequent increase of tranquility and further decrease of the tax burdens, not only of the United States, but of other countries.

"Steps looking to the minimizing of fluctuations in exchange, because recovery from the great slump in exports, due to the economic situation in Europe, can not make substantial progress so long as extravagant daily fluctuations continue in foreign exchange, for no merchant can determine the delivery cost of any international shipment.

"Definite programs of action that will lead to elimination of waste and more regular employment in seasonal and intermittent industries, notably in the coal industry, in order that the drain upon capital may be lessened and the annual income of workers may be increased.

"In the field of all different industries and occupations," the resolutions said, "the rapidity of recovery will depend greatly upon the speed of proportionate adjustment of the inequalities in deflation."

Government loans to workers temporarily out of jobs, estimated to involve an outlay of not more than $2,500,000,000, was suggested to the conference as an emergency measure by John L. Lewis, President of the United Mine Workers of America.

Judge Cochran, of the United States District Court at Covington, Ky., has handed down a decision in which he held Section 35 of the Volstead law to be valid, and that the Federal Government, through its Internal Revenue Department, had the right to collect taxes and penalties from persons charged with the violation of the prohibition law and upon whose premises liquor had been seized by prohibition enforcement officers.

General John J. Pershing, Chief of Staff of the American Army, will go to London before Oct. 20th to place the medal of honor voted by Congress on the tomb of the unidentified British soldier in Westminster Abbey, according to an announcement made by the British Foreign Office.

Common Pleas Judge Ritchie, Toledo, O., has announced that he will change the manner in which witnesses take the oath in his court.

"Too many of them lie," he said. Under the present system, the court clerk reads the oath and the witness merely holds up his right hand and seldom knows what it's all about.

"I'm going to make each witness repeat the oath, word for word," Judge Ritchie declared.

A campaign to suppress mirth in theaters, aroused by jokes on prohibition, is being planned by enforcement officers, according to Sherman W. Cuneo, Director of Information of National Prohibition Headquarters in Washington.

A statement by Mr. Cuneo intimated that invitations might be sent to theatrical managers for a conference looking to action to "inculcate respect for the constitution."

A hope that the public press throughout the world will do its part to promote international understanding, and particularly to make easier the tasks of the armament conference, was expressed by President Harding in a message to the Press Congress of the World, at its session at Honolulu.

In solving the problem of the Pacific, the President wrote, the press was in a position to wield a great and beneficent influence. He declared it to be "hard to imagine justifications" for conflict between nations on opposite shores of the Pacific, and added:

"The Pacific ought to be the seat of a generous, free, open-minded competition between the best ideals of Eastern and Western life, being the aspirations and endeavors of the oldest and newest forms of human society."

Senator Philander Chase Knox, junior Senator from Pennsylvania, died at his residence at Washington, a few minutes before seven o'clock on last Wednesday evening. He was in his sixty-ninth year.

The Senator arrived in Washington Monday. He came direct from New York, where he had landed that day from England. He left New York Sept. 3d. The trip was largely for his impaired, but not seriously endangered health.

While in England he remained virtually all of the time at the resort at Bath. He declined all invitations customary to such a high American official. His only engagement was a dinner with the American Ambassador, George W. Harvey.

A crowd of Communists last Wednesday attempted a hostile demonstration in front of the American Embassy, at Rome, as a protest against the sentencing to death of Nicolo Sacco and Bartholomew Vanzetti, Italians convicted of first degree murder in a Massachusetts court last summer. The police finally dispersed the mob and made one hundred arrests.

Ceremonies in celebration of the Spanish race festival were begun throughout Spain last week. The Mayor of Madrid issued a proclamation calling upon the citizens to commemorate the discovery of America and salute the descendants of Spain in the New World.

The Independent Socialist party has introduced in the German Reichstag a bill aiming at the thorough elimination of the last vestiges of monarchistic Germany.

The main clauses of the measure provide that all the property of former Emperor William and the former German Princes, both family and private, shall be confiscated; civil and military functionaries holding monarchist views or tolerating monarchist manifestations, or who refuse allegiance to the Republic shall be dismissed without pension, and military men shall not be permitted to carry arms except while on active service.

The bill proposes the introduction of trial by jury.

Complete settlement of the controversy between Austria and Hungary over the ownership of Burgenland, the strip of West Hungarian territory awarded to Austria by the Trianon treaty, appears to have been reached, according to a dispatch from Venice, which outlines the terms of the protocol signed there last week.

By the close margin of four votes, the House, last Friday, ended a spirited debate by sending back to committee a bill re-apportioning congressional districts and increasing its membership from 435 to 460.

The vote, 146 to 142, shattered party lines.

As the House washed its hands of the matter temporarily, the situation is a complex one.

There is an implied mandate in the Constitution requiring Congress to readjust the membership of the House as the population of the nation increases, but if Congress neglects to act there is no power that could force it.

In the past the membership has been increased after each decennial census, but in recent years a movement to maintain the present number or to reduce it has gained impetus.

The first complete catapult for launching airplanes from the decks of battleships now is ready for installation at the Hampton Roads air station. For some time light, single-seated planes have been flown successfully from platforms built on the tops of battleship turrets; the short run against the wind being sufficient to give the necessary "lift," but the system was not applicable to heavier planes and was found to interfere with the turret operations.

The newly developed catapult, however, gives the necessary impetus under any conditions and will not interfere with functions of the ship. It is believed by navy experts that future battleships will be designed with catapults as an integral part of their equipment.

Members of the Japanese delegation to the Washington conference on armament and Far Eastern questions sailed for the United States last Sunday on board the steamer Kashima Maru.

What purports to be another warning issued at Moscow by the Third Internationale has reached a number of the European capitals. It is signed with the names of the President of the Internationale and eight of its members, including Karl Radek and Bela Kun.

The document, which is addressed to "Our World Comrades," warns them to be on guard. It describes the Russian Soviet Government at the present moment as being "between the hammer and the anvil," and says the danger threatening Soviet Russia is threatening "the entire world revolution."

"Soviet Russia, which up to the present, refused to enter into any compromise with western capital, and, on the contrary, forced western capital to yield," says the document, "now is compelled by force of circumstances to modify its previous tactics and consent to a series of concessions to the kings of world capital, representatives of bourgeois America, and also the representatives of European capital."

The German Government forbade the exhibition of a motion picture depicting alleged atrocities on the part of negro contingents in the French Army on the Rhine. The German Foreign Office has denounced the film as partly untrue and misleading, and it does not want to send forth that kind of propaganda.

An increase in farms by 7,284, and a decrease in farms operated by owners by 23,632, is reported by the Department of Commerce. Thirty-eight per cent of all the farms in this country are operated on a basis of tenancy. During the decade cash tenants decreased by 127,280; share tenants increased by 347,812.

HOME AND FARM

CROQUETTES.

The croquette or cutlet is usually listed under the entree or made dishes and can be made to be very appetizing. It is often appropriate to serve left-over foods in this manner, rather than in hashes, stews or minces. The success of the croquette or cutlet depends upon the decidedly creamed texture, yet withal it must have a firm crust covering the outside, free from grease.

Foundation Sauce.—The sauce used to combine the mixture should be of a consistency that will mold or set firm, and the usual amount of flour required for this purpose is one and three-quarters ounce, or seven level tablespoons, to every cup of milk.

Do not use butter in making this foundation sauce; just place the milk in a small saucepan and add the flour. Stir with a fork to dissolve thoroughly and then place on the fire and bring to a boil. Turn down the flame and cook slowly for five minutes. The mixture must be very thick. Now add the material that you wish to use for the croquettes or cutlets.

The word "croquette" is used to designate the mixture that is formed into cones or cylinders, while the cutlet is that of a flat shape or round and not over two inches thick.

Bread crumbs will give a better finish to the croquette or cutlet. Never use cracker dust, unless it is impossible to obtain the bread crumbs.

To Make Bread Crumbs.—Dry in the oven all crusts and left-over pieces of bread, then put through the food chopper and sift the crumbs through a colander. Serve all that remains in the colander for au gratin dishes. The fine crumbs use for croquettes and cutlets.

How To Fry.—Have sufficient fat to cover the croquettes, usually about three cups of cooking oil or one and one-half pounds of lard or other shortening, in a saucepan, that will hold three or four croquettes—this number will be ample. Do not attempt to cook in small amounts of fat. Have the fat sufficiently hot so that it will brown a crust of bread while you count from 101 to 110. Do not fry more than three croquettes at one time; in fact two is better. Use a small wire basket for frying. I have found that a fine wire strainer, the large size, that usually costs about ten or fifteen cents, makes a good basket. Bend the flat handle up straight and flatten the sieve by pressing against a flat surface.

Lift the croquettes and cutlets when cooked and hold over the hot fat for a few seconds to drain thoroughly. Then turn on a soft paper and set in moderately hot oven to heat thoroughly.

It is usual to serve sauce with croquettes or cutlets and it may be cream sauce, parsley sauce, hollandaise or tomato sauce.

Sweetbreads and Eggplant.—For the family of five people. Select small eggplant. Pare it and cut in slices, then cook until tender. Drain and then cut in a piece of cheesecloth and squeeze out the moisture. Chop fine. Soak one sweetbread for two hours in cold water, to which has been added one tablespoon of vinegar. Then parboil for fifteen minutes and rinse under cold running water. Pat dry on a cloth and chill. Mince fine.

Now prepare the foundation sauce as directed, then add the prepared eggplant and sweetbread and one small green pepper, minced fine, one teaspoon of salt, one half teaspoon of white pepper, one tablespoon of grated onion.

Mix and then turn on a plate and chill for one hour. Now rub the hands lightly with shortening and form the mixture into croquettes or cutlets and roll lightly in flour. Dip in egg dip, then roll in fine bread crumbs, fry in smoking hot fat, then place in hot oven for ten minutes.

Egg and Green Pepper Cutlets.—Mince three green peppers fine, cover with boiling water and cook for five minutes. Drain and then turn in a piece of cheesecloth and squeeze dry. Hard boil three eggs and remove the shells and rub through a fine sieve. Prepare the foundation sauce, add the prepared peppers and eggs and one tablespoon of grated onion, one teaspoon of salt, one-half teaspoon of paprika, tiny pinch of thyme.

Mix and then turn on plate and chill three-quarters of an hour, then form into oblongs or cut in rounds with biscuit cutter. Finish as for eggplant and sweetbread croquettes.

These cutlets may be cut in diamonds or triangles.

Cheese Cutlets.—Make a double portion of the foundation sauce as directed, and while it is hot, after removing from the stove, add one cup of grated cheese, two teaspoons of grated onion, one and one-half teaspoon of salt, one-half teaspoon of paprika.

Beat hard to blend, then turn on a plate and chill for one and one-half hours. Prepare same as for cutlets.

Chicken Cutlet.—The meat may be picked from the back of carcass, neck and wings and put through the food chopper. You will require one and one-half cup of chopped meat. Place in a bowl and add foundation sauce, prepared as directed, and add one and one-fourth teaspoon of salt, one-half teaspoon of white pepper, one teaspoon of grated onion, one-fourth cup of finely minced parsley.

Mix and then turn on a plate to mold for one hour.

Curried Brisket with Rice Border.—Two pounds beef, two cups cut onion, one tablespoon flour, one teaspoon curry powder, or curry to taste, one teaspoon salt, one teaspoon chopped celery tops.

Wipe meat with wet cheesecloth; cut into thin slices; sear in hot iron pan (no fat is added, as the meat is fat enough); sear on all sides a nice brown. Then put into boiler, cover with boiling water. In the pan where the meat was seared put the onions and fry a light brown, add to the meat; add the salt and boil slowly three hours, or until the meat is tender. Mix the flour and curry powder with a little cold water; add and boil three minutes. Serve with boiled rice border.

Shin Meat en Casserole.—Two pounds shinbone of beef, two cups carrots, one-half cut onion, one cup celery, one teaspoon salt, one-eighth teaspoon white pepper, one tablespoon flour.

Cut the meat from the bone in two inch pieces; remove the marrow from bone. Put part of the marrow into bottom of casserole, then half the meat, half the vegetables, the rest of meat and seasoning and the marrow over the top; place in hot oven twenty minutes, covered. Add one cup boiling water, cover, reduce the heat and let bake slowly two and one-half hours, or until tender, in bottom of oven; once or twice water must be added. When meat is tender add the flour, which has been mixed with a little cold water.

If hickory, burr oak and other swamp-loving trees were planted plentifully along banks of creeks and water courses everywhere, a plentiful supply of the most valuable timber in from twenty to forty years would be assured. Small hickories make useful timber for wagon spokes, etc. The black walnut is most precious of all and grows rapidly near water; high water does them great good. Destroying the timber along the creeks and rivers was a great mistake; even little trees of timber varieties are ruthlessly chopped down, when the land they grow on is too close to the water to be of value for anything else. Let those who are trying to arouse farmers and others to improvements remember nothing is so necessary as raising timber; the sooner it is planted, the better.—Ex.

"APPLES ARE LIVING THINGS."

"An apple is a living thing. It breathes like a human being. And it is the air that it inhales which causes the apple to rot in cold storage, unless this air is blown away by good ventilation—or, unless the apple is wrapped in oiled paper."

Dr. Charles Brooks, fruit disease expert of the United States Department of Agriculture, discoverer of a new system of saving apples in cold storage from scald and rot, was listened to with keenest attention as he made the above statement, before the convention of the International Apple Shippers' Association. The discovery, if it works out in commercial storage warehouses as it has worked out in the experimental storage plants of the government, will mean the saving of millions of dollars' worth of apples annually.

Dr. Brooks said that he had tried a great many different methods of preventing apples from scald and rot. Finally he wrapped the apples in oiled paper and they refused to rot, while others not wrapped did rot. Dr. Brooks brought samples of three different varieties of apples that he had kept in storage over ten months. In each case the apples wrapped with oiled paper were in perfect condition, while those unwrapped were in various stages of scald and rot. Some were completely decayed.

Dr. Brooks explained that the fruit, in breathing exhales ester and carbon-dioxide from its skin. The ester contains the aroma of the apple, and it is ester which causes the apple to rot, unless the ester is blown away or absorbed by oiled paper wrapped around the apple.

Dr. Brooks said ester was created by a mixture of acid and alcohol in the living apple. He added that this was not, however, "free alcohol." The oiled paper absorbed the ester, so that when the wrapper was chemically examined, the ester was found in the oiled paper.

No apples have yet been commercially wrapped with oiled paper, but Dr. Brooks said that this year his discovery would be applied for the first time in a number of big commercial storage warehouses. The entire trade is eagerly awaiting the results. Samples of the oiled paper used were also brought from Washington by Dr. Brooks.

INFORMATION, INSPIRATION AND RECREATION.

BY KITTIE SUMMER.

One time during the panic we had just twelve dollars apiece to spend for a summer vacation.

We put on our "thinking caps" and solved the problem. We did not want to "hook on" to tired cousins in the month of August. At this time women in rural places are always tired and busy canning. At this period it is hard to cook for guests when the dog star rages.

We liked encampments, assemblies, conventions and camp meetings, so we chose a pretty spot on Erie's fair shore. I will not mention the place or the editor will think that I am doing free advertising. Suffice to say the place was ideal, as it was an intellectual resort, and now you can almost guess the name. We rented a furnished room and carried with us our two-plate alcohol stove, as we boarded ourselves. We took with us some country ham, some fresh eggs, canned fruit, jellies, jams and canned beef. Ordinary groceries were reasonable. For a refrigerator we kept our supplies under the cottage among the cool rocks.

Fresh fish were cheap, so was milk. Our slim purses did not allow any new clothes. We bathed in a quiet place in our home-made bathing suits and dried them on the rocks.

We attended the lectures, concerts and sermons daily and nightly. It was a joy to inland people to see the great lake steamers plowing through liquid furrows. We could see them from our windows on moonlight nights. There was a peace in it all. The waves dashing on the shores and hoarse tooting of fog horns on dark nights. When we seek vacations we like best to go to places different from home. I knew of two school girls who exchanged homes as a vacation tour. One lived among mountains and the other on the sea shore.

GOD'S POOR.

BY OUR COUNTRY CONTRIBUTOR.

A peculiar impulse sometimes urges us to help others. It is the voice of conscience. A Sabbath-school scholar defined conscience thus: "It is a little bit of God within us." A poor widow told of quiet donations received in strange ways. One time they felt discouraged, for in their dire need they had neither potatoes nor meat. One morning a sack of vegetables and a ham was found at the door and the donor had written a note, saying, "Leave the sack outside and we will get it." My dear mother was impelled to leave some things at the door of a cabin. She peeped in and the family were kneeling at worship. The bundle was hung on the latch. A few weeks later a friendly woman clasped her hand at church and said, "Oh, you sly mouse, I have caught you. I told my Billy and Jacky to watch the kind of pants men and boys wore, and they said that father Bentley and his sons, Isaac and Henry, wore that kind of cloth, and oh how I thank you!" The package contained flannel yarn and trouser material from the woolen factory.

It is generous to help pay for a widow's cow or to assist people who have been burnt out. When we have more than we need, just pass it down the line. A new minister moved into our midst from a region devastated with grasshoppers. We did not wait for the donation party, but bustled around.

We sent him chickens as we laughingly remembered the clerical joke. It was winter and we killed several fat hens and sent the pastor the choice, such as wings, legs, backs, thighs and gizzards. We accompanied the gift with some verses. I recall some of the rhymes.

"Accept this hen chicken, her bones will make pickin',

She was cooped in a bar'l;
She was cross as the "divil," and she so uncivil.

Was killed in a quarrel."
"We know that the preachers are like common creatures,

All fond of good gravy;
So take from this boy, and eat it with joy,
The chicken we send with our Davy."

The parson was a funny man and he sent a jolly answer, thus:

"Dear Madam: My wife and I would like to engage ten 'sittings' of your eggs next spring to raise a wonderful breed of fowls that are composed of all legs an' wings, an' thighs, and hearts an' backs, an' gizzards! In all my ministerial life of forty years never before have I had such a lucky 'find.' We thank you for your remarkable meat. We hope that a kind Providence will guide you in your benevolence. May your poultry yard yield more of such unusual birds.

"Rev. John Jones and Wife."

WIT AND WISDOM

Expert Testimony.—Mrs. Sleightleith had been married but a short time. At an afternoon function she confided to a couple of friends that she was quite sure her husband never played poker at his club, like so many of those horrid men.

"And how," asked one of the other young women, "did you learn that Mr. Slightleith did not play?"

"Oh," explained the bride, with an air of easy confidence. "I met some members of his club the other day and I asked them, 'Can Reginald play poker?' They looked thoughtful for a moment and then answered very sincerely, 'No! He certainly can not.'"

An Eye to Business.—The little daughter of a Congressman was sitting one evening on her father's knee. She had a new little brother whom she regarded with wonder, as children do regard the latest usurper before they have learned to love him.

"To-day," said her father, "a man offered to give me a whole roomful of gold for little brother. Shall I sell him?"

The child shook her head.

"But," said the father, "think how many nice things a roomful of gold would buy! Don't you think I better let the man have him?"

"No," answered the girl, thoughtfully, "let's keep him till he's older; he'll be worth more then."

Re-enforced.—Two contractors, of a type unfortunately too familiar, were talking of some buildings which had collapsed before they were finished.

"Well, Billerton," said one, "you always have better luck than I do."

"Better luck?" How's that?"

"Why, my row of new houses blew down in last week's wind, you know, while yours weren't harmed. All were built the same—same woodwork, same mortar, same everything."

"Yes," said the other, "but you forget that mine had been papered."

Trailed to Its Lair.—During a suit to recover damages following an automobile collision in the Adirondacks, the complainant's attorney, a city lawyer, constantly hectoring the defendant's principal witness, a rough old guide, but was unable to shake his testimony.

During cross-examination the guide mentioned "havin' come across the trail of a Ford." The city lawyer jumped at this chance to discredit the guide's evidence.

"Do you mean to tell this court," he demanded, "that you can determine the make of a car by studying its track? How did you know it was a Ford?"

"Well, sir," drawled the guide, "I followed its trail about a hundred yards and found a Ford at the end of it."

DR. STOCKWELL'S PLEA FOR THE CHURCH COLLEGE

"For the sake of the leadership of tomorrow, we men and women of today must provide the opportunities and means for the training in the Christian fundamentals on the part of those who shall become the leaders in the next generation. Good citizenship and practical Christianity require that the ideals of the Kingdom of Heaven shall be made as much the goal of effort as is the gold of the kingdoms of the earth. Let 'For God, For Country, and For the Kingdom' be our rallying cry. Let us keep the colleges of the Church well to the front, with goals clearly defined, and with gold plentifully supplied."

STILL WITH THEE

Still, still with thee, when purple morning breaketh,
When the bird waketh, and the shadows flee;
Fairer than morning, lovelier than the daylight,
Dawns the sweet consciousness, I am with thee!

Alone with thee, amid the mystic shadows,
The solemn hush of nature newly born;
Alone with thee in breathless adoration,
In the calm dew and freshness of the morn.

When sinks the soul, subdued by toil, to slumber,
Its closing eye looks up to thee in prayer;
Sweet the repose beneath thy wings o'ershading,
But sweeter still, to wake and find thee there.

So shall it be at last, in that bright morning
When the soul waketh and life's shadows flee;
Oh, in that hour, fairer than daylight dawning,
Shall rise the glorious thought, I am with thee!

—Harriet Beecher Stowe.

THE SHIP OF STATE.

WHAT MAKES PRODUCTION COST HIGH?

Some time ago President Harding made a statement to the effect that many people thought the public treasury was inexhaustible. This statement is true not only in the political world, but also in the church. The actions in our church during the last General Assembly illustrate the fact.

Governor Henry J. Allen, of Kansas, in his recent address in Philadelphia said: "It is not the amount of wages that is making production cost high, but the multiplication of unnecessary jobs in all the industries." This statement also is applicable to the church work of the present time. Those in responsible positions are tempted to assume duties which do not belong to their offices. In such a case others must be employed to help them complete them.

Some one has a vision. It must be carried out whether tested or not. This will require new positions and new employes, and thus the machinery of each denomination has become heavy and very expensive. According to the reports of the boards, the expense of our executives and their assistants approaches four hundred thousand dollars. Some have questioned whether all this is necessary and whether there are not "unnecessary jobs."

In addition to the regular agencies, inter-councils have become popular. The Home Missions Council, the Foreign Missions Council, the Educational Council, etc., then finally, the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ. Each and all of these must have their new officers and assistants, the roll becomes long and the cost great, some salaries running up as high as six, seven, eight thousand, or even higher. These are rarely published.

All these have been drawing from the pulpit supplies, and then we learn of five thousand vacant Protestant church pulpits, and we wonder why. Any business project which magnifies its office work and neglects or reduces its sale and production is sure to collapse. The church can not escape the same law.—Presbyterian.

CITY AND COUNTRY POPULATION.

One hundred years ago the population of the United States was two-thirds farming and one-third city population. Today the city population is greatly in excess of the country population.—Chicago Tribune.

PERSONAL LIBERTY.

It is a great achievement of moral reform to have driven the liquor traffic back to what is practically its last line of defence—the plea of personal liberty. The open bar has few advocates today apart from those who have a selfish mercenary interest in it. No man whose opinion is worth minding would defend the old-time saloon. But when it comes to a matter of personal liberty, to a majority, however large or influential, presuming to interfere with a man's habits in his own private life, with what he shall eat and drink at his own table or in the privacy of his home—that, we are told, is a different matter. Whose business is it what a man eats or drinks so long as he does not interfere with the rights and liberties of others? This looks plausible, until you begin to examine it and test its validity and judge it in the light of other facts and circumstances with which it can not be dissociated.

It is childish nonsense to speak of liberty in such a connection where there is so much that is vital to the highest well-being and happiness of society at stake. To permit liquor to be imported into a province by individuals for their private use would simply be to let down the bars for the benefit of all sorts of bootleggers and blind-tigers to carry on their work of corrupting and destroying the youth of our land. The weak and the innocent, the wives and children of this country have rights, as well as the men who love their drink. We owe them the protection which human law was intended to provide, and if this can not be given them without the curtailment of what some are pleased to speak of as their personal liberty, the highest law must rule. Liberty is a relative term. Our personal liberty is restricted on every hand by the consideration of the welfare of others.—Presbyterian Witness.

Blackburn Building Heating Plant

These are busy days at Blackburn College. In addition to their regular duties, the young men are building a central heating plant. This is a fire-proof structure, equipped with the most approved style of Kewanee boiler. All the grading for the railroad switch, all excavations, and all concrete work have been done by the students. These young fellows are learning many valuable lessons working with their hands and in addition are contributing much to their education and to the growth of Blackburn.

You should have a share in this great work. At any rate, I should like to tell you more about it. Address President Wm. M. Hudson, Carlinville, Ill.

Mormon Annual Conference

The annual Mormon conference was held in Salt Lake City as usual during the first week of October. Fair weather brought large crowds. On Sunday, Tabernacle and Assembly Hall overflowed and an open air service was held.

Among others, the missionary note was struck repeatedly. The church reported about 1,800 missionaries in the field and pressed the claim that members should give sons and daughters more freely for missionary service without salary. Parents were rebuked for asking the release of missionaries at the end of eighteen months when the term is two years.

Such missionary zeal in the Mormon Church should stimulate the interest of Protestants in Utah's Westminster College, located at the heart of Mormonism, and standing as the one attempt to change the Mormon Church by means of higher Christian Education.

We shall be glad to tell you how the recent conference revealed favorable changes in the Mormon Church. Address President H. W. Reherd, D.D., Westminster College, Salt Lake City, Utah.

"THE CHRISTIAN COLLEGE THE FEEDER OF THE MINISTRY"

But come now to a truly Christian college; sit through the week of prayer; mark the daily rise of spiritual interest in the student body; hear the challenge of some gifted minister who has come fresh from the battle for God in a great city. He is calling these earnest young people from the best homes in our Church to give their lives to the great enterprise of turning the world from darkness to light and from the power of Satan unto God."—W. H. Crothers.

The problem is to give the Church College sufficient financial strength to attract the strongest young men to its student body.

NO PEACE TO THE WICKED.

Peace does not mean death, nor sleep, nor stagnation, nor silence. There may be peace in the midst of stirring life and activity. But there must be harmony and agreement among the elements that are associated, so that all the parts may be in unison and concord, instead of disagreement and antagonism.

Two singers with their musical instruments may be sitting in perfect silence and there may seem to be peace; but they may strike their instruments and raise their voices, and there may be such perfect concord and harmony between voices and instruments that there is a more beautiful peace than there was in the silence.

But, on the other hand, while one voice may be sweetly trained, and one in perfect tune, the other instrument may be harsh and out of tune and the other voice coarse and uncultured, and, consequently, there will be no harmonious concourse of sweet sounds in music, for the rough and unmusical can not blend with the sweet and mellifluous tones, and there can be no real peace or real music.

One cracked, harsh, jangling voice or instrument may ruin a whole orchestra or chorus, so that the director shall throw down his baton in despair. There must be agreement on the part of all in order to have real music.

So must there be real moral and spiritual agreement in an intelligent universe, in order to peace and happiness. Where sin is in any heart and life, it produces that strife and discord that stirs God, the moral ruler, to rebuke of the sin and the expulsion of the sinner. Men would not wonder at the rebuke or expulsion of an incapable and blaring musician from an orchestra, by a sensitive and capable director, but some profess to be greatly surprised when they read that "there is no peace to the wicked" and that "God is angry with the wicked every day."

The fact is there can be no agreement between God and wickedness, nor between the temple of God and idols. Bring devout worship into God's temple and God is well pleased. Try to force idols and idol worship into those sacred precincts, and God is at war with the desecrations, as Jesus was when he took a whip and drove the traders out of the Temple. There is no place in God's temple for idols and idol worship. There is no place in God's universe for rebellion against God or for any sort of sin. There is no place in heaven for insurrection against God.

When Satan rebelled against God there was war in heaven and Satan was cast out. When Adam and Eve rebelled against God in the Garden of Eden they were expelled. When any human being sins against God in his own heart and life, harmony between that soul and God is at an end, for "there is no peace to the wicked."

Men may bring disturbance into human society by the commission of crime, and if they break the law, or any law, they are transgressors, or breakers of the peace, and they bring upon themselves punishment, for there is no peace to the wicked.

Men may bring disturbance into the Church of Christ by the preaching of error, in which they sin against God, and bring upon themselves rebuke or expulsion. The teachings of false doctrine is a heathenish rebellion against God and sin against the Holy Ghost who inspired the Sacred Scriptures, and such conduct brings disturbance, for "there is no peace to the wicked."

There is peace in the heart, and the Church, and the world, only as men agree with God. Sin in the life, false teaching on the tongue, rebellion against God in any form, break the peace and make the soul a sinner and God the antagonist of the sinner. Through faith in Christ, repentance and submission, one has peace with God. He is a believing and saved child. He is no longer an unsaved and rebellious sinner. He has peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ.

THE OPEN BIBLE.

It is well to study Bible history and Bible geography and the Bible as literature, but more than these is necessary. We need not only to study about the Bible, but to study the Bible itself and to study it with the eye of faith illumined by the Spirit of God.

There is little profit in commentaries on the Bible written by men who deny its inspiration and authority. Isaiah spoke of certain men who were "learned," but to whom the Bible was "sealed." We need an open Bible interpreted by men who understand its spirit and believe its teachings. Nothing can take the place of this. No philosophy nor tradition nor theology can satisfy and save.

The learning which casts doubt on the Bible or leaves it sealed, to search other sources of knowledge and joy, is, the inspired writer tells us, "as when a hungry man dreameth, and behold he eateth, but he awaketh and his soul is empty, or as when a thirsty man dreameth, and behold he drinketh, but he awaketh, and behold he is faint and his soul hath appetite."

Culture is a good thing, just as physical enjoyment is good, but he who attempts to satisfy his soul with these things is dreaming. By and by he will awake hungry and faint. The soul has an appetite which can not be satisfied with study or pleasure. There is a void which can not be filled until the Bible is unsealed in the sense that its principles take hold on the heart.

To the natural man whether learned or unlearned, the Bible is a sealed book. Its doctrines are a mystery. The love of God, the incarnation of Christ and the resurrection of the dead are alike to the philosopher and the child. They must be spiritually discerned. Salvation by faith is a matter not of learning, but of the heart. A scholar who loses his eyes and an ignorant boor who loses his eyes are equally blind, and no amount of study can give either a particle of sight. So no amount of learning can give spiritual discernment. Herein is the mistake of many wise men. They would make religion a mere matter of learning. They would measure the Bible and its plan of salvation by human standards, but God's thoughts and love are too far above human thoughts and love to be reached in any such way. "When in the wisdom of God the world by wisdom knew not God, is pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe;" to reveal himself in the person of Christ in a character incomprehensible to the natural heart, but chiefest among ten thousand and all together lovely to them who receive him by faith. "Unto the Jews a stumbling block and unto the Greeks foolishness, but unto them that are called, whether Greeks or Jews, whether learned or unlearned, the power of God and the wisdom of God."

A man may write essays on love until he is gray-headed, but until he is in love he knows nothing about it. So with the hidden things of God's book. They are known only to those who have experienced them. "If our Gospel is hid," said the apostle, "it is hid to them that are lost." So if the Gospel is unsealed and open, it is unsealed to them that are saved. We should as soon listen to a lecture on color by a man born blind, as to hear the Gospel explained by one who has no faith in Christ or spiritual sight. Faith and faith alone opens the book. It is the only key by which either the learned or unlearned can reach the treasures of truth.

LIMITATION OF ARMAMENTS.

Will the Conference on Limitation of Armaments, to meet on Armistice Day, Nov. 11, accomplish anything to make the world any safer, to remove any of the menace of future wars, and remove any of the burdens that are on the nations today? It is hoped that it may do much, even if it does not accomplish everything that is desired.

The people of the world, for the most part, bowed down under heavy loads that rest on their shoulders and their hearts, are praying that much that is practical and real may be accomplished. The world is in the weariest and most heavy-laden condition that can be imagined. It has never been under such a stress and burden, and is realizing that it must soon have relief or become bankrupt and broken down.

Disarmament, complete and entire, is not anticipated, and might not be desirable, unless there should be an absolute assurance that no nation would make trouble as an outlaw and need to be quelled. There is, of necessity, the demand that a police force shall be maintained, for international safety. It is necessary in our cities and villages at home, as it is necessary on the oceans and seas abroad. But this would be a comparative trifle, if, in general, the great nations will mutually agree to give up the tremendous programs of war which they are now compelled to contemplate.

The great thing, back of it all, is the introduction of a Gospel spirit, in an era of good-will. This is the important and essential matter. Without it there will be wars, of some sort or in some way. The next war, if it occurs, will be fought out not by ships, or armies, or aiplanes, but by means of deadly gas. For this Germany is studying and planning today, or the great explosion of a few weeks ago would not have occurred. We may disarm as to navies and armies and aiplanes, but if some outlaw nation wishes to fight the world, it will be by sweeping away millions at a stroke by some forms of death-dealing gas.

This conference needs to study the whole matter of peace and good-will, and courts and arbitrations, and settlements of difficulties by other methods than those of war. The world can not stand much more of this. The nations, mostly, are already bankrupt and heart-broken. This is a time for universal prayer to God that the hearts of people may be disposed to the attitude of true religion, and the practice of peace and conciliation.

We talk about the United States being the richest and strongest nation in the world today. That may be, but the United States can not stand much more of the burdens it has been compelled to bear. The inventor, Hudson Maxim, who has done much in the way of helping to prepare for war, points out the tremendous expense of the five-year armament program of the United States, and tells what the money could do if applied to other purposes. It would at once do away with the whole non-employment problem, and would equip the country, from east to west, with all the appliances for usefulness and comfort. He says that in five years this money would accomplish the following: "First year: Build 25,000 miles of concrete road twenty feet wide, reaching from ocean to ocean and from the Gulf of Mexico to the great lakes. Second year: Build the proposed intercostal ship and barge canal from Boston to Florida; deepen, dredge and straighten the Mississippi river to St. Louis and the Missouri to Kansas City so as to admit ocean liners to the centers of the west. Third year: Construct a great electrical super-power system connecting the bituminous coal fields of Virginia with the anthracite field of Pennsylvania, utilizing the water power of Niagara, and thus supply unlimited electrical power to the most thickly populated area in America. Fourth year: Build the deep waterway connecting the Atlantic with the great lakes, and make Buffalo, Cleveland, Detroit and Chicago seaport cities, with ocean steamers communicating with all world ports. Fifth year: Redeem 6,000,000 acres of arid lands in the far west, and by means of irrigation systems open 150,000 farms to the people—farms capable of sustaining a population of 1,500,000."

These are not the words of an inexperienced dreamer, but of a hard-headed engineer and practical leader of men. It would be well for the whole nation, and for all the nations, to carefully consider this, and to work together and to pray together for a working plan whereby the best interests of the whole world may be secured and conserved. To this end let prayer be made continually to God.

MANY TIMES BETTER OFF.

There is much violent crime in the world in the last few years, and there is a great tidal wave of divorce and robbery. Much of this is the result of the war. All good citizens must and will be as steadfast as possible, and bring all the influences of religion to bear on the present conditions. There were many hasty marriages during the wartimes, and there has been an unsettling of many natures, who have taken advantage of conditions in an irresponsible way and have become robbers and highwaymen. If all good people will be strong and true, and see that law is enforced and that the weak are restrained and educated, the times will improve. Instead of blaming prohibition with the crime and distress of the day, as the evil-minded and ignorant are doing, let us be thankful that prohibition is in force and the saloon is closed, since, otherwise, the trouble and crime would be many times worse than they are.

"THE CHALLENGE OF THE HIERARCHY."

This is a heading of an article in the Christian Standard, a strong paper of the Disciple, or Christian Church, a Church which from the days of Alexander Campbell, its founder, has stood for the independence of the local organization of all central or superior ecclesiastical control.

Of late the tendency has been toward the centralization of power. This was manifested particularly in the recent denominational convention.

The Standard hoists a danger signal. It prints "a challenge" by the President of the Conference at Winona, that all agencies—missionary, educational and philanthropic—asking the aid and support of the general brotherhood, should report to the Convention, have its books audited by it, and its officers nominated and elected in its general assembly.

This challenge was uttered immediately after a strong public protest against the apparent tendencies of the Convention towards ecclesiasticism, and against its disregard of its solemn pledge to abstain from all show of ecclesiastical authority. The Standard says.

"For twenty years past, and more, the Standard has pointed out sign after sign that it was the deliberate purpose of an official group (herein designated as 'the hierarchy'), favored by the facilities placed in their hands of perpetuating themselves in office, to obtain control of all the common activities of the brethren, and to stifle all voice of protest; that their aim was to prevent operation of other associations and agencies, and to kill opposition by control of the press.

"Year by year these signs have multiplied and have become more bold, until we now have the official announcement that all agencies, including the press—must be subjected to their control and manned by officials appointed by them!

"This is a pitch of arrogance unknown in any other religious community—unless it may be the Roman Catholic. With all its ecclesiastical pretensions, the Methodist hierarchy assumes no such domination—while all Protestants welcome an independent press as the one safeguard against ecclesiastical ambition."

Officials of church societies and boards need great grace, first, that they may endure criticism, and second, that they may not be carried away by ambition, and seek to establish and increase their own power and so to rule the Church.

GOD'S WORD FOR GUIDANCE.

The New York Bible Society announces that word has been received from President Harding that he will be glad to accept a Bible, presented by the Society, for the Disarmament Conference. The Bible is beautifully bound, is one of the finest copies of the Scriptures published, and will be engrossed on the outside as follows: "This Bible is Presented to the Conference for Limitation of Armaments and is Dedicated to the Promotion of Good Will Among the Nations, by the New York Bible Society.—November 11, 1921."

The recognition of God through the presence of his Word at the conference will be right and befitting. All Christians will pray that the principles taught in the Word may guide the Conference in its deliberations.

The Federal Council of Churches has asked that the Sabbath preceding the Disarmament Conference, or Nov. 6th, be made a day of special prayer for God's blessing on that conference. Nearly every presbytery and synod of our Presbyterian Church has joined in the same request. Let there be united and earnest prayer that this great meeting may accomplish real results to the glory of God and the peace and welfare of the world.

The New Orleans liquor crowd arranged to have a great procession on Oct. 1st, to protest against prohibition, and used all the arts for a great display. Outside of the hired bands and the escorting policemen, the whole crowd in the procession numbered 361, and this was the best they were able to do, with half a million people in easy reach. Yet the Senator from this state is one of the filibustering handful that is determined to override the Senate and keep the anti-beer bill from coming to a vote.

George Williams, the founder of the Young Men's Christian Association, was born one hundred years ago last Saturday, and the anniversary has been celebrated throughout the world with fitting exercises. The first association was organized June 6, 1844. The Y. M. C. A. is now known and welcomed everywhere.

When a man says that the prohibition laws should not have been passed, because they make hypocrites and law-breakers out of so many people, it is perfectly fair to tell him that it is exclusively the wet crowd that is so affected. These laws have never had this effect on a single law-abiding citizen. Those who are now "hypocrites" and "law-breakers" would simply have continued to be saloon swillers, carrying their drunken lives out on the streets, in the homes, and everywhere else. It is in this class of people to be troublesome and criminal, but they make less trouble now than when they had the saloons as headquarters.

An occasional missionary in China is reported as being opposed to the "Bible Union of China" and as saying that it unpleasantly discriminates between missionaries, and raises the question of the unsoundness of some in the minds of the Chinese. There are some liberals in our own home Church who oppose all efforts to guard against liberalism here, and restrict its operations. If there were no safeguarding the Church against heresy, it would be very pleasant for all the liberals, but it would be death and destruction to the truth and to the souls of men.

Federal Judge Evans, of Louisville, decided last week that it is perfectly right and legal to seize and search an automobile for liquor without a search warrant. Thus again the highest law is on the side of common-sense and righteousness. Those few filibustering liquor men in the United States Senate who have been holding up the anti-beer bill on the shallow and senseless pretense that such search and seizure is unconstitutional and wrong stand rebuked by this decision, and revealed as mere ignoramus liquor advocates and friends of the boot-leggers. It is to be hoped that the Senate will be able soon to put down this handful of filibusterers and proceed to take the action upon which it has determined.

WHY SHOULD I FEAR?

BY EUNICE L. ALDEN.

Why should I fear, though all alone,
Darkness on every side?
For he "will guide me with his eye,"
Safe in him may I abide.

Why should I fear, though needs abound,
And no supply seems near?
"He is my Shepherd, I'll not want,"
The promise cometh clear.

Why should the loneliness oppress,
And bring me bitter tears,
When he is ever standing near
To quiet all my fears?

Then, Lord, may the sweet consciousness
Of thy blest presence near,
Be mine, through all of life's dark way,
To guide, uphold and cheer.

MY FATHER'S BUSINESS.

BY REV. JOHN Y. EWART, D.D.

A very significant reply that was which Jesus gave to his mother when she chided him for causing her and Joseph to retrace their steps to Jerusalem in the effort to find him:

"How is it that ye sought me? Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?"

Thus early, at twelve years of age, Jesus Christ was conscious of a world-wide mission. He was intrusted with the greatest work in the world.

Soul-winning, character-building; what greater work can there be for mortals? "There are many desires to which we may rightly cling," says Dr. E. F. Hallenbeck, "but there is only one passion for a blood-bought heart; that is the all-controlling purpose which brought the Son of God from the skies and drove him to the Cross—the passion for the salvation of men."

And when Christ began his public work he found thousands and ten thousands needing and waiting for his gracious ministry.

"The Spirit of the Lord is upon me," he said, "because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor: he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord" (Luke 4: 18, 19).

Most lamentable, even awful, was the condition of the world in which Jesus Christ was born. Let Professor Uhlhorn tell it:

"There was nowhere to be found a power competent to the gigantic task of a moral renewal of the ancient world. This power must come from another source, from above. When to those who 'were sometimes foolish, disobedient, deceived, serving divers lusts and pleasures, living in malice and envy, hateful and hating one another,' the kindness and love of God our Savior toward man appeared, then was first opened the fountain from which a new and healthful life flowed forth for diseased humanity; then the Gospel gathered communions the opposite of that which the heathen world had become, modest, chaste, diligent, their affections set upon things above, the salt of the earth, the light of the world" ("Conflict of Christianity with Heathenism," p. 148).

And Jesus passionately loved men because he saw in every individual a possible saint, an image, though marred, distorted, imperfect, of God himself. He believed man capable of receiving and profiting by redeeming grace.

I have read this account of how diamonds were discovered in South Africa. A traveler one day entered the valley and drew near to a settler's door. A boy was amusing himself by throwing stones. One of the stones fell at the stranger's feet, who picked it up. It was a diamond. The child was playing with it as a common stone. The peasant's foot had spurned it; the cart-wheel had crushed it; till the man who knew, saw it and recognized its value.

The common, average soul is Jesus' immortal discovery, the soul of a child, of a woman, yes, of a publican or a sinner. In every child of Adam he perceived the diamond. As Dr. James Stalker says:

"The rags of the beggar could not hide it from his eyes, nor the black skin of the savage, nor even the crimes of the evil-doer. It was true the soul was lost, sunk deep in ignorance and unrighteousness. But this only made it the more interesting; it only stimulated his desire to rescue and cleanse it and set it where it might shine."

How shall you and I, dear friend, kindle this passion for the souls of our fellow men which burned so brightly in the heart of our Savior?

For one thing, the contemplation of the sorrows and distresses of our fellows should be a heart-opener. Mr. Harold Begbie moralizes on the uncounted masses of individual men and women to be found in any large city like London, and asks whether or not in the eye of God each one of the great multitude has an individual identity, and if God has knowledge of and sympathy with each in his individual problems and sorrows. He says:

"Yes, this is probably true. The apprehension that every unit in the multitude has his own individual silence of the soul, his own impenetrable chamber of thought, his own unbroken and incommunicable solitude, brings home to us the knowledge that one's own sense of personal identity is the property of all mankind." Yes, indeed, and more. God is intimately acquainted with the need of each. Does not Jesus say, "The very hairs of your heads are all numbered"? "He telleth the number of the stars and calleth them all by their names." Did not he say of the Israelites, "I know their sorrows"? (Matt. 10: 30; Exod. 3: 7; Psa. 47: 4).

Therefore, if any individual of the race is so intimately known to God, and he is personally interested in each, should not that be a mighty stimulus to personal evangelism? For our Savior came to seek and to save that which was lost. (Luke 19: 10.) The individual sheep, the individual coin is interesting to Jesus—how much more the individual boy, the individual soul?

"A man fell through the ice into the river one bitter cold day," relates Dr. Hallenbeck. "A fellow workman came to his assistance with a plank, one end of which was covered with ice. The struggling man grasped it again and again, but every time his hand slipped off. At last he cried, 'For God's sake, man, give me the other end of the plank.' I fear many of our so-called efforts for the salvation of men are performed with the icy end of a plank. Put out the other end. Better still, throw the plank away and reach down your hand to those struggling ones, and by the power of grace divine you shall save immortal souls from the icy waters of sin."

"Lives of great men all remind us

We can make our lives sublime,

And, departing, leave behind us

Footprints on the shores of time;—

"Footprints that perhaps another,

Sailing o'er life's solemn main,

A forlorn and shipwrecked brother,

Seeing, shall take heart again."

Coolrads Springs, Col.

BEAUTIFUL GARMENTS.

BY REV. CHRISTOPHER G. HAZARD, D.D.

The prophet Isaiah calls for the awakening and the clothing of Zion and Jerusalem; for activities and expression in Church and State; for strength and beauty, force and art in history; for the putting on of the belongings of true and glorious life. "Awake," he says, "put on thy strength, put on thy beautiful garments."

This is no call for the vain-glory of the world. There is nothing in worldliness at last but vanity and vexation of spirit. The experience of Solomon was given to him as a lesson for all time, and it does not need to be renewed. In all his glory this king was not arrayed in the strength and beauty of a frail flower. "The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power, and all that beauty, all that wealth e'er gave" still wait the hour that can not be postponed and proceed to the common destination. The artificialities of society, the things that we naturally put on, do not fit our souls, they have a ready-made look. We try to live up to them, but are uneasy and pretentious in our capped and gowned processions.

Clothing is meant to be the expression of life. Character is written upon it. God makes a lily unfold its dress and bestows so much attention upon its life and habit that he apparently has nothing else to do. It is perfectly arrayed, in harmony with its spirit, and in accordance with a divine purpose. A lily has a sort of priesthood, with holy garments. Christ accepted its testimony to the heavenly Father. It was like a word fitly spoken, a sermon in a beautiful style.

The saints, like the angels, will be clothed in white. As they walk with Christ in heavenly places their worthiness will thus appear. Dressed in the history and the ever new accomplishment of righteous acts, they will be all glorious without; because they will be all glorious within.

The strength of holiness is most strong and the beauty of holiness is most beautiful. The heavenly fashions are worthy of all adoption upon the earth. This is one of God's worlds and one of ours. As he decorates its fields with thousands of reflections of his sunlight, so he would express his truth in all the forms of its human and social life. Art should be the expression of his Spirit. The glory and honor of nations should acknowledge him, be brought into his kingdom, be thus made of eternal worth. Christ is the life of the believer in an outward as well as an inward sense. Christ envelopes the soul in holy history. It is in faith of God's inward working that we undertake to please him. All that God ordains must slowly but surely come to pass, eventuating with the development of life. The real things of spiritual history always have to be done by the Holy Spirit first. We second his motions. Association with great minds is association with great people and the worth of good reading. Associating with divine truth is association with God and the worth of a knowledge of the heavenly oracles.

What a wonderful privilege is contained in the apostle's exhortation to us to put on Christ! What a promise is involved in his assurance that we are God's workmanship! How surely such words support the prophecy of our conformation to the image of God's Son, the changing of this body of humiliation into the likeness of his glorious body, that fashioning anew of us that shall make us satisfied at last, because we shall awake with his form, our souls clothed with the possibility of honorable and powerful expression, after the manners of the heavenly Zion and the new Jerusalem! The century plant waits long, but blooms at its moment: the Christian does not yet appear as he shall be, but when Christ shall appear he will not only see him as he is, he will be like him! He will share his beautiful garments.

FROM THE WESTERN OFFICE.

BY REV. B. P. FULLERTON, D.D.

I closed my last letter with a short account of the dedication of the new church at Pawnee, Okla. The structure is a very modest, yet attractive building, and ample for the needs of the field. The statement was made by the treasurer that something like $1,200 was needed to complete the payments, except what was due the Board of Church Erection, and six hundred and fifty dollars was given. The men of the church felt that it would be an easy matter for them to take care of the remainder. The pastor, Rev. H. C. Millard, is evidently in the hearts of his people, and many good things were said of him by his people.

From Pawnee I went to Emporia, Kan., at the invitation of the Committee on Home Missions of that Synod, to make the opening address before the Synod, which met on Oct. 11th, in the First Church. Fifteen years ago I made my first official visit to that synod, meeting in that church, as field secretary of the South and Southwest, and it was a real pleasure to note the advancement that synod has made during these fifteen years.

A long-standing engagement to meet the Missouri Synod Mission Committee in Kansas City, called me there for Oct. 12th, and so I spent a busy day with that committee. They fell behind with the Board last year, something over eleven thousand dollars, and the Board made a rather large appropriation to them for the current year, with the promise on their part that they would conduct a campaign to raise this deficit and also to provide sufficient funds for the current year. They are now more than half way through the year and much in debt to the Board still, but are determined to keep their pledge with the Board. Three colleges in Missouri are in a campaign now, trying to raise one million dollars for their endowment, and it will be a heroic thing for this committee to meet its obligation, but they have promised to do it and they are ready to do the unusual in order to fulfill this promise. The money is here in the state, and all that is necessary is to lay this work, as well as that of the colleges, on the hearts of the people. This part of the country has not felt the hard times as much as some others. This is the centennial year of the admission of the state into the Union, and this is the time to do big things for that enterprise that has made the state a good place in which to be born and reared.

My next visit was to Arkansas Synod, in Russellville, on Oct. 17th. It must be said that the cry of hard times in this part of the country is without foundation, and I might say the same of some other parts, if reports of the amount of money spent on baseball and other like sports is correct. I know perfectly well that we are told that this money is not in the hands of the church, but I am wondering if those that belong to the church are not spending to excess in other things and making their obligations to the church suffer for it. I am thoroughly convinced that the average church member has never taken seriously what it would mean to him and his family and interests if the church should not be perpetuated.

I am also satisfied that there is money for the benevolent causes now in the hands of local church treasurers that should have been sent in some time since. Their attention has not been called to the fact that the Boards are paying interest on borrowed money. Salaries of missionaries must be paid or their families suffer, and to meet these promptly, Boards are compelled during the year to borrow large sums on which they pay interest. Let every man who reads this ask himself whether he has done his full duty, and, if he finds he has not, let him at once do so, by putting the means in the hands of his local treasurer with the request that it be sent in promptly.

CHICAGO LETTER.

BY REV. E. N. WARE, D.D.

Chicago Presbytery met in the First Church of Kankakee, Rev. David Creighton, pastor. Urged by special interest in a committee's report and a desire to do honor to this far southern church of the presbytery, which Dr. McAfee called a World Factor Church, in reciting its glories in giving men of large caliber and wide influence, such as the missionary Mateer, a large attendance greeted the moderator as he called the session to order. Rev. Francis J. Martin, formerly pastor of the Jefferson Park Church, was received from the Presbytery of Alton to accept the call of the Granville Avenue Church.

Rev. John M. Wishart, D.D., of the Presbytery of Keokuk, U. P., was received and accepted the Crerar Memorial call. The installation will be conducted Oct. 31, 8 p. m., by Rev. N. B. Barr; Dr. C. F. Wishart, president of Wooster College; Dr. John W. Nicely; Dr. Howard Agnew Johnston and Dr. R. H. Beattie.

Rev. Charles T. Shaw, D.D., of Cleveland Presbytery, was received and accepted the call of the Woodlawn Park Church, which he has been serving as supply for several months. The installation will be conducted Oct. 19, at 8 p. m., by Rev. N. B. Barr; Dr. Cleland B. McAfee; Rev. Robert Clements, D.D., and Rev. John A. McIntosh, D.D.

Rev. Joseph Hydahus, Rev. Edward C. Raue, Rev. Wm. O. Timinty and Rev. Willard H. Robinson, Jr., were dismissed to the Ewing, Chippewa, Pendleton and Spokane Presbyteries, respectively.

Dr. Joseph Kranek addressed the presbytery on the present-day condition of religious life in Europe. The New Eighth Church, which was the result of the union a few years ago of the Central Park and the Eighth Churches, made request of presbytery to change its name to Central Presbyterian Church of Chicago. The request was granted.

The fall Day of Prayer of the Chicago Presbytery will be held in the Second Church, Rev. Josiah Sibley, D.D., pastor. This is an annual affair provided for in the standing rules. The program is under the auspices of the Stated Clerk of the presbytery and the chairman of the Department of Evangelism, to-wit: Drs. A. C. Zenos and Henry Hepburn.

The Wilmette Church, Rev. George Paull Magill, D.D., pastor, celebrated its tenth anniversary of organization on Oct. 9th. Rev. Edgar P. Hill, D.D. general secretary of the General Board of Education, preached the sermon in the morning and Rev. Henry S. Brown, D.D., superintendent of the Church Extension Board of Chicago Presbytery, at the five o'clock service. The church was organized with about one hundred members during Dr. Hill's administration of the church extension work in the presbytery. Dr. J. M. Wilson, D.D., president of the Omaha Theological Seminary, is the only other pastor. Dr. Magill came from the presidency of the Highland Park College of Des Moines, Ia., in 1918. Previously Dr. Magill had been pastor of the large Central Church of Des Moines, and in Minneapolis, Minn. The Wilmette Church has grown rapidly under the ministry of Dr. Magill and now has a membership of over five hundred. There is a strong men's organization. The last service of the anniversary week was the Men's Night, on Friday, at which Dr. Weir, of the Assembly's Committee on Men's Work, addressed the men. Other speakers were Dr. John Timothy Stone of the Fourth Church, and Mr. Henry P. Crowell.

Rev. Harry N. Mount, D.D., has come back to the First Church of Chicago Heights after some months of rest and recuperated health, during which time Dr. Robert H. Beattie, of the Training School, supplied the pulpit. Dr. Mount finds the fall opening of the work most encouraging. The attendance upon all the services is better than for years. The spirit of evangelism is also most marked, accessions to the membership being at nearly every service. Rev. George G. Dowey, of New York City, on the staff of the New Era Department of Christian Stewardship, addressed the annual banquet of the Men's Bible Class on Sept. 30th, at which there were present 156 men. Dr. Mount now conducts a morning chapel service in the public school, which is located directly across the street from the church building, for fifteen minutes before the morning hour for school.

McCormick Theological Seminary reports a larger attendance of students than last year. This is very encouraging in view of the conditions throughout the Church.

The opening banquet of the Presbyterian Union will be held Oct. 25th at the Morrison Hotel. Dr. Paul S. Reinsch, former American Minister to China, will be the guest of honor and speaker.

PITTSBURGH LETTER.

BY REV. S. J. FISHER, D.D.

Our Ministerial Association, on Oct. 10th, listened to a very earnest defense of Great Britain in India, by Rev. A. L. Wiley, for more than twenty years a missionary in that empire. His remarks were called out by some statements in the recently issued Study Book on Missions, "The Kingdom and the Nations," prepared by Eric M. Norton, for use by study classes. His criticism of the book related to what he declared were unjust statements concerning the attitude of the British Government toward education, the effect of imports and exports in impoverishing the people, and the comparison of the material condition of the inhabitants with that of those in surrounding countries. From his personal knowledge he asserted those comments were unwarranted and should not have found a place in such a publication. It would have been well if the author in his arraignment of Great Britain had, in connection with it, made the statement which he makes near the end of the book, that by the efforts of the English Government, through its engineers, the recurrence of famine had been largely prevented.

Some of my readers who have often heard the remark made that the miracles of the New Testament have no longer a value as evidence, and also have read the declarations that they should be classed as myths, will be interested and pleasantly astonished by a fine article in the Contemporary Review for July, by Principal D. S. Cairns, D.D., with the title, "The Gospel Miracles." It is a clear and profound discussion which brings out the fact that without these miracles Christ's ministry and character would be weakened. Saying that our Lord always refused to work ordinary portents, he says: "It is abundantly clear that he glorified in the miracles he actually wrought." "Miracles were meant to be something far more than outward credentials of our Lord's Revelation. They are meant to be revelations of the love of God and the ideal destiny of man, of his coming sovereignty over the hampering bonds of materiality when the kingdom of God shall be perfected." "What can we say of a world in which it is impossible that such a one as Christ could not rise from the dead on the third day? It is surely a poorer and sadder world than one in which he could. And in that case must not he who ordained it be a poorer and sadder God? God must be less powerful or less good than we believed. The truth is that once we accept the closed system idea of a physical nature, and abandon to it that faith in the creative freedom of God which finds expression in the idea of the miraculous, we must abandon to it also the freedom and the immortality of man. But the mechanical theory of science is becoming more and more impossible. If we take the sphere of biology, we already find the revolt in full progress. Many biologists tell us they find the fact of life, as they study it, compelling them to use terms and ideas which are wholly inadmissible on the mechanical theory." Again: "By what right do we insist that all those marvelous stories of his healing the sick, etc., must necessarily be unhistorical? In view of the wonder and mystery of the whole story of nature and history, why should we not recognize that this supreme personality must have had supreme powers?" The whole article of Principal Cairns is luminous and convincing.

Over against it put the astonishing statements of Dr. Baskerville, of the College of the City of New York, that modern science is performing the Gospel miracles. Is it? I am waiting to see it give sight to the completely blind by spittle and clay; to see it call back the dead; to see it feed five thousand with five loaves and two fishes; to see it bid the unshod walk the sea. And yet Dr. Baskerville blames scientists for not recognizing spiritual facts!

Here also in the posthumous volume of the wonderful J. H. Fabre, "More Hunting Wasps," is science indorsing the old faith. The story of the Scolia is amazing. As his reviewer declares, "It is quite obvious that Fabre is far from willing to swallow the theory of evolution (i. e., the theory that instinct is an acquired habit). His observations have shown him so many living organisms that have learned nothing through the ages, that have failed to evolve as one would logically deduce that they would, that he is unwilling to accept the Darwinian theory." You can not read his account of the Scolia and its egg and its support, without seeing Divine arrangement and power and foreordination in it all. Shall we not broaden the assertion of the poet, "The undevout astronomer is mad," and say: The undevout biologist, or entomologist, is hopelessly foolish? So as the centuries pass we realize that everything praises God, and the very insects, of whose purpose we often inquire, become in time, with greater knowledge, evidences of an Infinite and intelligent God.

Our Ministerial Association on the 16th listened to an earnest address on the work of the Board of Temperance by Rev. Thomas Watters, D.D., of which he is president. Prohibition in this city and region is apparently being more earnestly enforced. Rev. A. L. Wiley spoke on India, describing the revolutionary and perilous conditions of this part of the Empire of Great Britain.

Rev. George C. Fisher was installed as pastor of Highland Avenue Church, Oct. 5, when Rev. E. R. Tait, moderator of presbytery, presided; Rev. W. R. Farmer, D.D., preached the sermon, and Rev. Drs. P. W. Snyder and W. A. Jones, delivered the charges.

On Oct. 16 the Mt. Washington Church, Rev. C. S. McClelland, D.D., pastor, received eight new members.

At its October communion the Sixth Church, Rev. B. F. Parber, D.D., pastor, received eight new members on profession and twenty-five by letter.

On Oct. 9 the McKees Rocks Church, Rev. O. N. Verner, D.D., pastor, received two new members by certificate and ten on confession.

On Oct. 9 the Point Breeze Church, Rev. P. H. Barker, pastor, received fifty-three new members, making eighty received in the first three months of the new pastorate. This church has installed a radiophone, which, by the aid of the Westinghouse Electric Company, will enable members of the congregation in other parts of the country to hear the sermons of the next three Sabbath evenings on "An Alderman in Sodom," "The Old-Fashioned Home" and "Is Pittsburgh a Heathen City?"

Rev. A. Mackenzie Lamb, of Cheswick, is in Washington, D. C., for two weeks assisting the pastor of the Metropolitan Memorial Methodist Church, in evangelistic meetings.

The Presbytery of Pittsburgh will hold its annual "retreat" on Nov. 7 at the Knoxville Church, which will provide the evening meal. The chief speaker will be Rev. Dr. H. S. Coffin, of New York, who will speak in the afternoon on "The Joys and Problems of the Christian Ministry" and in the evening on "The Gospel in Its Application to Modern Needs."

Rev. Paul G. Miller, of Chartiers Church, Canonsburg, having resigned the pastorate of this church, to accept the call to the East End Church, Bradford, Pa., expects to enter upon his new work about the middle of November. The father of ex-President Woodrow Wilson was for a short time pastor of this famous Chartiers Church, founded by Rev. John McMillan. If he had remained there a few years longer, his son Woodrow Wilson would have been a native of the Keystone State, and Virginia would have lost her claim.

The prayer meeting of the Third Church was again led, on Oct. 19, by the pastor, Rev. W. L. McEwan, D.D., who spoke with much vigor and with no trace of his illness.

SYNOD OF OHIO.

BY REV. E. T. SWIGGETT, D.D., S.C.

Synod met in Cambridge, Oct. 11, and was opened with a sermon by the moderator, Ruling Elder Charles William Dabney, LL.D., on I Cor. 2:5: "That your faith should not stand in the wisdom of men, but in the power of God." It was a masterly discussion. Many expressions of approbation were heard. The first elder moderator of the synod amply fulfilled the expectations of his friends.

Rev. Joseph Taylor Britan, D.D., of Central Church, Columbus, was chosen moderator. Rev. Robert F. Smith was re-elected permanent clerk, and Elder Charles F. Seaman temporary clerk. Other elections included Elders E. B. Proctor and H. Dow Marble as trustees of the synod; Rev. W. L. Schmalhorst, chairman, Rev. E. B. Townsend, and Elders W. O. McClure and D. H. Kohr, members of the Executive Commission.

A gift providing a home for Presbyterian aged and infirm, and for children, near Sidney, was accepted and provisions were made for it.

A judicial case from the Presbytery of Toledo was happily settled out of court. The Women's Synodical Society of Foreign Missions, as usual, presented a gratifying report, showing an increase in receipts of $7,862, the total receipts amounting to $102,516, from 1,281 subsidiary organizations, having 39,000 members. The Home Mission Committee reported $124,000 spent in the synod, and $27,000 sent to the Board. Twenty Daily Vacation Bible Schools were conducted for 2,500 children. Dr. Charles Casey, of the Cambridge Church, presented a highly interesting statement concerning a D. V. B. S. carried on by his men's Bible class in a neighboring village among immigrant coal miners, with outstanding success. Rev. Dr. Calvin D. Wilson presented a glowing report of the prosperity of Lane Seminary, the conditions being emphasized by Rev. W. T. Paterson, president of the Society of the Alumni. A committee was appointed to consider a change in the program for the meetings of the synod, with the suggestion of a change in the date. It was directed that a letter promising support of, and prayer for, the proposed disarmament conference should be sent to the President; also, a letter to Rev. Edward M. McMillin, D.D., who has retired from active work on account of illness.

The synod was addressed by Rev. H. M. Gilbert, Ministerial Relief; Rev. D. G. Wylie, D.D., Church Erection; Rev. W. H. Crothers, D.D., Education; Rev. Dr. William Houston on religious conditions among students at the Ohio State University; Rev. Dr. Frank Marston, American Bible Society; Rev. H. M. Robinson and Rev. J. A. Verbing, Religious Education; Rev. Dr. C. F. Wishart, Wooster College; Rev. R. E. Pugh, D.D., Rev. John Sharpe and Rev. F. Eastman, Home Missions; State Federation of Churches, Rev. B. F. Lamb, Rev. A. W. Moore, India missionary, and Rev. J. G. Grabel, and Mrs. Frances E. Pomerene brought a report from the united women's missionary societies; Rev. C. H. McDonald, D.D., Men's Work; Rev. Dr. H. H. Straub, Lord's Day Alliance. A novel feature was the presentation of a motion picture of a Pilgrim pageant at Wooster College. Synod adjourned to meet in Sidney next year.

Edward T. Swiggett, Stated Clerk.

DISARMAMENT CONVOCATION.

The Convocation of Christian Citizens in Behalf of Limitation of Armament is to be held in the Central High School and new Masonic Auditoriums, Washington, D. C., Sabbath, Oct. 30th, to Wednesday, Nov. 2d. The National Reform Association, Pittsburgh, Pa., has taken the lead in calling the Convocation, to which individuals, as well as representatives of religious and civic bodies, will be admitted without enrollment fee or special credentials. Bishop William F. Anderson, of Cincinnati, Dr. Henry Van Dyke, Clinton N. Howard, Senator Frank B. Willis, of Ohio, and Mrs. Thomas G. Winter, of Minneapolis, will be among the speakers.

PHILADELPHIA NEWS.

BY REV. W. P. FULTON, D.D.

Rev. Hiko de Beer, pastor of Zion German Presbyterian Church, delivered the address before the Presbyterian Ministers' Association last Monday in Westminster Hall.

Rev. Paul Rader is conducting a series of evangelistic services this week at Bethany Presbyterian Church. He is conducting noon-day meetings in the Arch Street Methodist Church. On Monday he addressed the ministers of the city on "A Famine in the Ministry." Tuesday his topic was, "The Price of Preparation," and on Wednesday he spoke on "The Message of the Hour."

The Federation of Churches of Philadelphia met Oct. 11th in the Arch Street Presbyterian Church. Under the auspices of the Federation a "Retreat" was conducted for ministers only, in Holy Trinity Episcopal Church, Monday afternoon and evening, Oct. 17th. Addresses were delivered by Rev. Floyd W. Tomkins, Bishop Berry and Rev. Norman MacLean, of Edinburgh, Scotland. Dr. MacLean preached in Calvary Presbyterian Church last Sabbath.

The new Southwestern Presbyterian Sabbath-school building is about completed and will be dedicated in November. This building is erected by the trustees of presbytery in a new and rapidly growing section of the city at Buist Avenue and Seventieth Street.

The Presbytery of Philadelphia will meet Monday, Nov. 7th, in Chambers-Wylie Church, when arrangements will be made for the installation of Rev. George F. Ellison as pastor of the Reeve Memorial Church, and of Rev. A. Gordon MacLennan as pastor of Bethany Church. Rev. John Conning will address presbytery on "Jewish Evangelization."

NEW YORK LETTER.

BY REV. CLARENCE G. REYNOLDS, D.D.

The arrival last week in New York of General Diaz, the head of the Italian Army, and Lord Beatty, the hero of the British Navy, kept the people busy welcoming the distinguished visitors. Soon the other great men will arrive from across the sea on their way to the Disarmament Conference at Washington. The New York churches will be open for special prayer services Nov. 11th.

Monday evening, Oct. 31st, the Men's Society of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church will tender the pastor, Rev. Dr. John Kelman, a reception, and will have as special guests representatives of the other Presbyterian churches of the city. Dr. Kelman will address the meeting and will give his impressions of his recent trip to China.

We heard Dr. Kelman preach Sabbath afternoon, Oct. 16th, a sermon on "The Grave of Lust," based on the experience of the Israelites in the wilderness when they died after their lust for quails had been satisfied. It was a searching sermon, demanding that all who heard should have it impressed upon their minds and consciences that if they have yielded to desires that God does not approve, there is something dead within their lives, something dead and buried. Then Dr. Kelman, with great force and eloquence, asserted that he who is the Resurrection and the Life can, and will, if asked, bring that which is dead in the soul to a glorious resurrection. At the John Hall Memorial Chapel, under the care of the Fifth Avenue Church, the work of the season is well begun. There is an appeal for workers in the Sabbath School. At the Fifth Avenue Church itself, there are classes for men and women, the former conducted by Rev. Dr. Palmer, the associate minister of the church, and the latter by Rev. Dr. Allen.

At the Brick Presbyterian Church, Rev. Dr. William P. Merrill, pastor, the general theme of the mid-week services during the fall will be "The Presbyterian Church." Special emphasis will be put on those elements of denominational life and practice which make the Presbyterian Church effective in the outworking of the kingdom of God. These mid-week meetings will be held in the Neighborhood House, 28 West Twenty-seventh Street.

Rev. Luther A. Ostrander, pastor of the Presbyterian Church, Lyons, was elected moderator of the Synod of New York, which met in Mt. Vernon Oct. 18th.

The agitation against the Labor Temple in New York City continues. It is charged that many of the teachers connected with the school maintained at the Temple, are radically socialistic. The Home Mission Committee of the Presbytery of New York does not indorse any teaching of that kind, and is determined that there shall be none. Mr. Archibald E. Stevenson, of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, is at the head of the opposition to Labor Temple. The church is in the midst of a densely foreign population and there is great opportunity for the preaching of the Gospel.

MODERATOR AND STATED CLERK.

A COMMUNICATION FROM DR. H. C. SWEARINGEN
TO DR. L. S. MUDGE.

My dear Dr. Mudge:

I have your letter announcing officially your purpose to assume the duties of the office of Stated Clerk October 17th, 1921.

It will be a great gratification to the Church, as it is to me personally, to have this office filled permanently. The manner in which you were chosen to this position, and the confidence in your fitness for it then expressed, give assurance that you will have the united support of the entire denomination in the discharge of the important duties about to be assumed. It gives me real joy to contemplate the privilege of the close fellowship with you which the work for the remaining part of the ecclesiastical year offers.

It would be a singularly unfortunate omission did I not take this occasion to express, both on my own account and in behalf of the Church, the highest appreciation of the manner in which Rev. George B. Stewart, D.D., Acting Stated Clerk of the General Assembly, has discharged the duties of his difficult position. To be the permanent successor of the venerable and revered Dr. William H. Roberts will make sufficient draft upon the abilities of any one, as you no doubt are aware, but to follow him in a temporary capacity, with other duties claiming a good share of one's attention, as Dr. Stewart has done, and to do so to the utmost satisfaction of the Church, is a really distinguishing achievement. Dr. Stewart has been alert, prompt, business-like, courteous, and in every way fully efficient. He stepped into the breach at a trying time, and deserves, as no doubt he will receive, the lasting gratitude of the Church.

Very cordially yours,
Henry Chapman Swearingen.

SYNOD OF FLORIDA.

BY REV. A. W. PIERCE, S.C.

The Synod of Florida was organized in the First Church, Miami, Oct. 11th to 13th. Dr. Barton B. Bigler preached the opening sermon and convened the synod. Rev. W. B. Witherspoon was elected moderator and Rev. Albert W. Pierce, clerk.

Three new presbyteries were organized: North Florida, Dr. B. B. Bigler, moderator; Rev. A. W. Pierce, clerk. Southeast Florida, Rev. J. N. Boyd, moderator; Rev. G. V. Albertson, clerk. Southwest Florida, Dr. J. P. Calhoun, moderator; Rev. E. W. Blew, clerk.

The twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the First Church, Miami, was celebrated, Dr. J. P. Calhoun paying tribute to the pastor emeritus, Dr. William Wallace Faris, the "Veteran Pastor," under whose ministry of twenty years, the church has grown to such power in the wonderful resort city of Miami. Dr. Faris responded in a touching message to the synod.

Resolutions on the death of Rev. R. W. Edwards were adopted, and the convener, the moderator and Stated Clerk were appointed to represent the synod, to hold fitting services and "to bear to the bereaved family tenderest tokens of sympathy and love in behalf of the synod." Mr. Edwards had been pastor evangelist for the past ten years of the work in Florida. Dr. Joseph P. Calhoun was recommended to the office of pastor evangelist for the synod.

Addresses were given by Dr. James F.

Clarke and Hon. William J. Bryan, Dr. Henry B. Masters, of the Board of Ministerial Relief and Sustentation, and Dr. W. M. Cleaveland, of the Board of Foreign Missions.

Mrs. L. J. Schwingle addressed the synod as the representative of the newly-formed Women's Synodical Missionary Society of Florida. Mr. Anton Koerner gave enjoyable organ recitals.

Hon. W. J. Bryan, as an elder of the Miami Church, hospitably entertained the synod in an informal reception at his beautiful home, Villa Serena. The synod covers the entire state, and represents the 2,600 members of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A.

SYNOD OF MISSOURI.

Synod met at Poplar Bluff, Oct. 18th. Rev. Charles P. Foreman, D.D., of Louisiana, Mo., was elected moderator. Rev. John H. Miller, of Kansas City, Stated Clerk, being unable to be present because of injuries he received a short time ago, in an automobile accident, Dr. C. C. McGinley acted as Stated Clerk. Synod had under consideration the question of changing its plans and basis of representation. An overture on changing from a delegated body, elected by the presbyteries, with free entertainment to the delegates, to a basis of one elder from each church together with the ministers of synod, each church to pay the expenses of its delegates, was sent down to the presbyteries for their approval. Dr. Henry C. Swearingen, Moderator of the General Assembly, Dr. William F. Weir, Secretary of Men's Work, and Dr. Johnson of the Board of Temperance and Moral Welfare, made stirring addresses.—E. R. Sentz.

SYNOD OF MICHIGAN.

BY REV. WILLIAM BRYANT, D.D.

The Synod of Michigan met at Grand Rapids, Oct. 11th, for its eighty-seventh annual meeting, the first meeting held in this, the second city of Michigan, in twenty-one years and only the fourth in its entire history. Westminster Church, under its pastor, Rev. William S. Hess, D.D., made this a memorable meeting for its cordial hospitality, in spite of the fact that the national convention of "Women's Clubs" was being held at the same time. This gave an opportunity for a pleasant exchange of courtesies. Dr. W. B. Gantz, of Detroit, was elected moderator by acclamation. Among the speakers were Drs. John McDowell, William F. Weir and Ernest F. Hall. Dr. H. McA. Robinson was detained, and his place was taken by Rev. A. V. King, of Chicago. An unusual feature of this meeting was the rendering of a Pageant on the Christian Home by one hundred young people of the Westminster First and Immanuel churches. There has been a conviction for years that synod should plan new methods for the meetings. The California plan has been discussed, with its sessions continuing for a whole week, and Bible study and practical lines of work occupying more of the time, the afternoons being given to recreation and the evenings to popular meetings. A committee of five, consisting of the moderator, stated and permanent clerks, and Rev. G. E. Barnes and Rev. John Comin, was appointed to work out the plan. The first discovery was that for the first time in the history of the synod, there was no invitation for the meeting next year. So this committee has a double problem to face. The plan of reconstruction of the presbyteries, with new boundaries, goes to the presbyteries as an overture. Alma College was endorsed for an intensified campaign for funds, and new plans adopted for immediate execution. Dr. Joseph A. Vance was re-elected as chairman of the New Era work, with an aggressive policy for the current year. The Home Mission Committee reported a prosperous condition. Rev. F. E. Kuder is the new chairman. The President of the United States was commended for his disarmament conference and promised the prayers and co-operation of the synod. A new permanent committee is planned, that of Sabbath Observance. Five ministers have died since the last meeting of synod: W. H. Jamieson, C. E. Marvin, H. H. Van Auken,

F. E. Armstrong and R. J. Jones, for whom a fitting memorial service was held. One hundred and twenty ministers and thirty-nine elders were in attendance, but only thirty-eight ministers responded to the roll call at 3 p. m. on Thursday, which is not very encouraging for a six-day meeting next year.

ARKANSAS LETTER.

BY REV. C. E. HAYES, D.D.

Grace Church, Little Rock, gave a reception to twenty-five new members on the evening of Oct. 7. Light refreshments were served and addresses were delivered by invited guests.

Trinity Church, Hot Springs, and Grace Church, Little Rock, are the only Presbyterian U. S. A. Churches in these cities, and our people visiting or moving to these cities should introduce themselves to the pastors on arrival. Rev. M. H. Krauss, D.D., is the pastor at Little Rock, and Rev. A. M. Eells, D.D., at Hot Springs.

On Jan. 30, 1922, Rev. J. W. Wilson and Mrs. Wilson will have been married fifty years. Plans are being made to have the children at home on this occasion. There are seven of the eleven children living. Mr. Wilson was ordained in 1884, and has been in the ministry thirty-seven years. He is now honorably retired and living a quiet life near Pine Bluff. He serves the McArthur Church, once each month, as health may permit. Mr. Wilson received into the church the late Rev. Dr. J. Frank Smith.

Chester Boatright, son of Rev. John Boatright, Huntsville, lost by death his wife in his home, Ft. Dodge, Okla., recently. The father and seven small children mourn their loss.

The writer spent Sabbath, Oct. 9, with the church at West Fork, and at night spoke to Dr. Gillespie's church, Fayetteville.

The Mt. Comfort Church, near Fayetteville, recently held meetings in which there were twelve additions to the church. The pastor, Rev. E. M. Freyshlag, had the assistance of Rev. S. E. Marrs, of Cane Hill. Rev. T. E. McSpadden, of Rogers, is assisting Rev. S. E. Marrs in meetings at Clyde. Rev. E. Harris, Lincoln, will have the assistance of Rev. E. M. Freyshlag and Rev. S. E. Marrs in meetings the latter part of October.

The College of the Ozarks at Clarksville had a better opening this fall than last fall. President M. S. Lyle and his faculty are making the students feel at home, and our church and Dr. Hefner, pastor, are doing their part to care for the student body.

Rev. W. C. Wheat, of Bentonville, will supply the church at Gravette.

Plans are being made for the erection of a manse at Dumas. The new minister, Rev. Mr. Preston, also serves Tillar and Watson Chapel.

Rev. D. Art Ray has resigned the pastorate of Greenwood and has entered Omaha Seminary to complete his studies.

Dr. E. E. Morris is having a fine meeting at Beebe, assisted by Dr. F. M. Wylie.

The Board of Home Missions has notified all field men that no more aid can be given to churches during the remainder of this year. I am wondering if churches are sending in money to the Board as they should. A number of our ministers are receiving money from the Board, and I hope they will see to it that the Board does not suffer because of a lack on their part in sending in the money.

THE SYNOD OF KENTUCKY.

BY REV. EDWARD L. WARREN, D.D., S.C.

The Synod of Kentucky met at Frankfort on Oct. 11th. Rev. John A. Marquis, D.D., LL.D., and Rev. Edgar P. Hill, D.D., LL.D., were present. The special object in having these leaders of the church present was to have their council, in view of the successful efforts that have been made in home missions and education.

Within five years the synod has passed, in its contribution for the work of home missions, from $5,600 to $17,300, and Dr. Marquis gave special guidance to the synod in its constructive work. Dr. Hill, the secretary of our General Board of Education, gave aid in our educational policy, and addressed the popular meeting on Wednesday evening, stating that our plans would be a model for other unification work. A campaign for one million dollars will soon be inaugurated in behalf of our educational institutions. The theological seminary is to receive toward its endowment $300,000; Centre College at Danville is to receive $200,000, and $100,000 to provide for the retirement of professors now on the Carnegie Fund, relations with this fund to be discontinued and the college return to synodical control; and $200,000 to be given to Kentucky College for Women, Danville, which has heretofore been under the control of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A. Provision will also be made for mountain educational work.

Under the plan adopted by the two synods, the Southern Synod will be given two-thirds (instead of one-half) of the directors of the theological seminary at Louisville, and other synods of the Southern Church will be invited to unite in the control.

Two-thirds of the trustees of Centre College and the Kentucky College for Women will be nominated by the representatives of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A.

In connection with this equitable arrangement between the two synods of Kentucky, the Southern Synod will be given one-third of the trustees of the Kentucky State College for Women.

This policy had the unanimous indorsement of both synods and looks toward the enlargement of endowment and equipment of the institutions of the synod.

The Synod at Frankfort had a busy session. Rev. George S. Watson, a son of the Frankfort Church, was elected moderator. A number of ministers representing the Boards addressed the body, among whom were Rev. Charles H. McDonald, D.D., representing Men's Work; Rev. John Steele, of Pittsburgh, representing Temperance and Moral Welfare; Rev. Dr. H. M. Gilbert, of St. Louis, representing Ministerial Relief and Sustentation; and Rev. F. B. McCuskey, of India, representing the Foreign Board.

The synod adjourned to meet next year at Harlan, in Buckhorn Presbytery.

MONTANA MUSINGS.

BY J. F. SHEPHERD, D.D.

Rev. L. V. Schermerhorn has closed his pastorate at Ismay. Ministers of the Yellowstone Presbytery and the Superintendent of Missions will supply this church till spring.

The Welsh Church of Butte was recently transferred to the Presbytery of Butte from the Western Calvinistic Presbytery. They are in need of a pastor who is able to preach in both Welsh and English. They have a fine people, a good brick church of two rooms, and a nice manse. The pastor will be asked to revive the work in the city of Great Falls. A good minister is needed. Address the Superintendent of Missions.

Rev. P. E. Wilson, of Illinois, has taken charge of the Federated Church of Corvallis, and Rev. Harry W. Haynes, of Washington, is supplying the Jordan group.

Rev. S. S. White, pastor at Poplar, reports improvements on the church and manse amounting to $800. Boy Scouts and Girl Scouts, a young people's choir and other features are here, where one-third of this large Sabbath school are Indian children.

The Wolf Point Indian Mission school numbers over sixty day pupils this year, and, with Mrs. C. D. King and her able assistants and teachers, blessed with their present fine equipment, we may expect a real work of grace for these people. It is not likely that the eight Indian churches of this state will lack for worthy leadership whose training is begun in this splendid institution.

A petition for the organization of a church at Pablo, a good, new town in the Flathead Lake country, was presented to Kalispell Presbytery, and Rev. Merton S. Fales and Rev. H. A. Brown were appointed to organize the church.

The thirtieth anniversary of the organization of our church at Kalispell was observed Oct. 10th to 17th. The writer preached on Sabbath night, Oct. 10th, on "The Forward Look," while Rev. George McVey Fisher, pioneer preacher, who began and fostered the work, preached a sermon of retrospect Oct. 17th. The occasion will be used to launch a real building movement. Dr. B. Scott Bates, pastor, is doing a real work in building up the spiritual life of this congregation, in addition to the membership and in advance in benevolences, and it is hoped that the new church, so much needed, will be promptly realized.

The dedication of the new church at Whitefish on Oct. 10th was a great day for that congregation. This is one of the best adapted churches to the modern task in the state. Costing $40,000, it is fully equipped for a real program of social, educational and spiritual work, its auditorium appealing to the devotional sense and adapted to devotional needs. Rev. M. S. Fales, the pastor, who was assistant to Dr. Mudge in Harrisburg, Pa., does not believe in social Christianity except as growing out of the preaching of the Cross, but, with this preaching, that other things are to be added. A great work of grace is doing among the Japanese of the city. The church doubled its membership last year and tripled its benevolences, and every communion sees large additions.

Rev. W. L. Livingston, assistant superintendent, is engaged in evangelistic services with Rev. L. J. Hawkins, of Libby. He will go from there to Carter, then to White Sulphur Springs, then to Jordan. He has abundance of calls for help. Brethren should pray, preach and plan for revivals if the 20 per cent additions on confession in the synod are realized. Montana leads all other synods, with 130 per cent increase in the last fifteen years. Shall we continue to advance on our knees?

NEW PUBLICATIONS

The Origin of Paul's Religion. By Rev. Gresham Machen, D.D. Cloth. $3.00. The Macmillan Company, New York.

It has become a fashionable mode of attack on Christianity by its opposers of the present day to consider the teachings of Paul as apart from, and contradictory to the teachings of Jesus Christ as found in the Gospels, and to discard as personal notions of Paul all that lies outside the earlier expressions. It is the task, ably accomplished in these pages, to show that the teachings of Paul had a common origin with the teachings written down by the four evangelists in the four Gospels, and to emphasize the fact that Paul simply expanded and developed, under the inspiring guidance of the Holy Spirit what is to be found in the words of Christ as recorded by the evangelists. It is a strong and readable series of lectures. Dr. Machen is professor of Greek Literature in Princeton Theological Seminary, and this volume grows out of the lectures delivered by him at Union Theological Seminary, Richmond, Va., on the James Sprunt foundation. Paul religion and Paul's teachings are inseparable and both proceed from Jesus Christ.

The Importance and Value of Proper Bible Study. By Rev. R. A. Torrey, D.D. Cloth. $1.00. George H. Doran Company, New York.

Dr. Torrey is dean of the Los Angeles Bible Institute, and has been known for many years as an earnest evangelist who does not deviate from the safe and sure road of Gospel truth. He is a Presbyterian minister, a member of Los Angeles Presbytery. This volume contains the gist of Dr. Torrey's methods of Bible study. He tells how he thinks the Bible should be read, studied and interpreted so that the great truths of Christianity may be clearly understood. Bible readers and teachers will find much help from this volume. Such books have great value in awakening an interest in the Holy Scriptures, and in showing how they may be properly employed so as to secure from them their intended instruction and assistance in Christian living.

The Year Book of Prayer for Missions for 1922, fresh from the press, presents in handy and attractive form a wealth of information concerning the Home and Foreign Mission work of the Presbyterian Church; with prayer topics definitely assigned by months and weeks; with specific information concerning mission institutions and the personality of the workers; with maps of the mission fields and other important facts. It is a complete compendium for its purpose. Copies may be obtained at 25 cents each, to cover cost and postage, from either of the Presbyterian Woman's Boards, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City, or from the Presbyterian depositories.

Sailing Under Sealed Orders. By Commander Thomas D. Parker, U. S. N. (Retired). Cloth. $1.75. W. A. Wilde Company, Boston.

The author of this book of naval life was well acquainted with all that sailors and marines know and has provided a very thrilling story which will be read with much pleasure and profit by many. If one gets started into the narrative he will be certain to hold on to the finish.

PAMPHLETS.

The Modern Readers Calendar. Published and prepared by the Woman's Press of New York. It is very attractive, with a page for each week of the year, and with an interesting and striking quotation from some writer for each day. Thus one has a fine thought suggested for each morning and has made a good start when he gets this into the mind to begin his thinking and working for the day. It is well printed and bound with a cord for hanging up, after it is taken from its box. 60 cents.

THE FUNDAMENTALS.

I like your stand on the fundamentals of Christianity. There is so much effort made to call every rule of life laid down in the Bible a blue law that it behooves us to stand squarely and firmly for the truth.

I have sent you some criticisms, but I felt it to be my right. There seems to be so much criticism of good Christian men for party reasons, while not a word of criticism of putting one at the head of our Government that denies the divinity of Christ and now at the head of our judiciary one who is a denier of Christ, but also an anti-prohibitionist. Will God look with pleasure on a nation that prefers rulers that repudiate his Son? I think not, no difference what party he belongs to.

TEN NEW BIBLES.

BY W. H. MOORE, M.D.

The Patpatar Bible!

Ever hear about it? As the name is pronounced, one naturally connects it with Ireland. Quite right, but it is New Ireland. Instinctively one asks if that is what Mr. DeValera and the Sinn Fein are calling the Emerald Isle? Not at all. New Ireland is a Polynesian island in the South Pacific, close to New Guinea, and its inhabitants, like all South Sea Islanders, are pagan. Some years ago, when some German traders settled there, a Methodist mission was established, and work among the people has been carried on with some considerable encouragement, under the control of the English Wesleyans. Among the missionaries is Rev. Alfons Pratsch, a clergyman of German birth. Feeling the necessity of having the Scripture in all the languages and dialects of the island, he went to work and produced a translation into one of these, the Patpatar, which, it is understood, is comprehended by all New Ireland races. The Gospel of John has been published, and is in the hands of the people, who manifest much interest in it. The rest of the Bible will be in print soon.

The interesting thing about this Patpatar Scripture is that it is the youngest of Scriptures! During the past twelve months ten new languages have been added to the list of those in which the Bible is published or circulated, and the last and latest is Patpatar. The ten additions bring the total number of languages in which God's Word is published, up to 538. It should be noticed that Rev. Mr. Pratsch, although a German, has, with the other New Ireland missionaries, placed his work under the Australasian Methodist Mission Board.

The other nine "new Bibles" are all interesting. Eight of these are for Africa, and one for Asia. The Asiatic translation is in Hmar, and was done by Rev. F. J. Sandy, a Welsh Presbyterian. The Hmar tribe is sometimes called Mhar, and live among the northern Lushai hills of Assam, speaking their own dialect.

Of the African "new Bibles" the one that will perhaps be of largest circulation is the Afrikaans, which is intended for a million and a half of the people of the Cape, including half a million colored people. Finding the people unable to follow the classical Dutch Bible, all the Dutch Reformed synods of South Africa went to work and made a translation.

Venda is the speech of a tribe in the Northern Transvaal, among whom German missionaries have worked for several years, and meanwhile have made a translation, which is now in print.

On the West African coast is Togoland, where the Wesleyan Methodist Missionary Society is working. The principal language is known as Popo, and with the assistance of native converts, the missionaries have prepared a Popo Scripture. On the same coast is Portuguese West Africa, where Chokwe is the language of nearly a million people in a territory to the northeast of Angola. This section is evangelized by the "Open Brethren," who have prepared a translation. The Sudan Interior Mission has published the Word in Tangale, which is the speech of fifty thousand negroes living on the uplands of northern Nigeria.

The Congo region has three of the "new Bibles." There is first, the Songi, for the use of a tribe in the south of Belgian Congo, where the missionaries are American Methodists. Then there is the Ngandu for the people of equatorial Belgian Congo, the translation done by men of the Congo Balolo Mission. The third is the Swahili or Ituri, a kind of lingua franca among several neighboring tribes in the north of the Belgian Congo. The missionaries of the Presbyterian "Heart of Africa" mission, together with others from the Africa Inland Mission, were the translators.

Another notable work in addition to the publication of these ten books is a new revision of the Bulgarian Bible by Rev. R. Thomson, the American Presbyterian missionary, who died July 18th.

CHICAGO LETTER.

BY REV. E. N. WARE, D.D.

Chicago Presbytery at its adjourned meeting in the Fourth Church, Oct. 17, adopted a recommendation of the Church Extension Board, which will bring an exchange of pulpits throughout the presbytery on Nov. 27, when the work of the Board is to be presented and an opportunity given in every church to give directly to the Board's work. This exchange will be under the direction of the Board, of which Rev. Henry S. Brown, D.D., is superintendent.

Our church is worshipping in the basement of what is to be a splendid brick church. Presbytery met at Wichita Falls in connection with the meeting of Texas Synod. Reynolds Presbyterian Orphan Home, located at Albany, Tex., and in the bounds of the Presbytery of Abilene, was transferred to the Synod. This Home, now caring for about 125 dependent children, will become a great institution. The church at Rochester, Tex., was declared vacant, because the stated supply, Rev. F. Leroy Litchfield, left the field several weeks ago without notice. During these two recent meetings of presbytery, the necessary steps were taken and charges preferred against Rev. F. Leroy Litchfield because of certain alleged offenses and conduct unbecoming a minister of the Gospel. Rev. H. M. Peebles has resigned at Anson, and will probably locate in Pennsylvania. We regret to lose him from this presbytery.—Jas. H. Tate, S. C.

ALABAMA.

Fifth Avenue Church, Birmingham, Rev. J. M. Broady, pastor, celebrated its fiftieth anniversary during last week. The church now has a membership of over 700 and a Sabbath school of 552. Sharpless is the only living member of the committee which organized the church, April 26, 1896. Rev. W. H. Kearns, D.D., synodical superintendent, assisted in raising $12,468.66 at the dedication. Monday evening was given over to addresses by Dr. S. F. Sharpless, Rev. Edward F. Hammond, Rev. A. R. Jones and Rev. E. J. Nickerson. On Tuesday evening was a laymen's meeting, with Judge M. S. CARNINE—Miss Ruth Carnine, daughter of H. E. and Rebecca Carnine, of Pleasant, Ind., died Oct. 13, 1921, after a long illness of eight months. She was born at the place of her death, Oct. 27, 1887. She has been a member and worker in the Presbyterian Church since the age of fourteen. "Asleep in Jesus! blessed sleep, from which none ever wakes to weep!" T. N. C.

HUGHES—Morris R. Hughes was born in Mogadore, O., July 24, 1842. He died at his home, 1864 East 87th Street, Cleveland, O., Oct. 7, 1921. He was the son of Rev. John D. Hughes, who came to the North Springfield (Cleveland Presbytery) Church in November, 1929, direct from his seminary course in Princeton. Mr. Hughes was ordained in the North Springfield Church (then in the Presbytery of Portage) June 15, 1830. He served the church as pastor continuously until April 25, 1866. He died in Newburg (now a part of Cleveland) March 3, 1870, aged seventy years. Mr. Hughes' first wife, Lydia (De Haven) Hughes, died Nov. 30, 1836. Their son, John Watson, was baptized Dec. 4, 1836. Reading between the lines, we can picture a heart-broken young minister, bereft of his wife that his son might have life. The Sawyer De Haven obituary (in Sept. 28, 1921 issue) told under what circumstances this son died. Studying the old church record, the writer finds that Harriet (Hathaway) Kent joined the old North Springfield Church Feb. 25, 1838. Studying further, she finds that Mrs. Kent (widow of Martin Kent) had her two little girls, Emily Elizabeth (who died Oct. 18, 1842) and Charity M. (who married Stanley Treat, of Tallmadge, and who died not so very many years ago) baptized in the old church April 15, 1838. Later Mrs. Kent married Rev. John D. Hughes, and the Morris R. Hughes subject of this sketch was their son. He was baptized in the old church Oct. 24, 1842, six days after the death of his half sister, Emily Elizabeth Kent. Mrs. Hughes died at the home of Mrs. Treat, surviving her husband by several years. Morris R. Hughes is survived by his wife, Agnes, two sons and two grandchildren. He was a veteran of the Civil War, having enlisted in the Seventh Regiment of O. V. I. For a number of years he was secretary of the White Sewing Machine Company, of Cleveland. Fifteen years ago he was stricken with paralysis and was an invalid from that time until his death. How closely entwined around the hearts and lives of people ("near and afar") are the cords of this dear old North Springfield Church! May its light ever since to glorify God! Minnie J. Ellet. ### THE FAIRY LAND OF PLAY.

'Tis a land of fun and fancy,
The Fairy Land of Play;
Of its scenes you never weary,
Though you stay there all the day;
For there's all things heart can wish for,
And no one says you nay.
Who, then, could not be happy
In the Fairy Land of Play?

There are tigers in the jungles
And Indians on the plain;
There are eagles in their aeries,
All waiting to be slain;
There are giants in their castles,
Just waiting for a fray,
And orgies if you want them
In the Fairy Land of Play.

Sometimes it's kings and courtiers
Or queens and ladies fair;
Perhaps a fiery dragon
Has a princess in his liar;
Then comes the prince a-prancing,
The dragon's brought to bay.
Oh, the glory and the shouting
In the Fairy Land of Play!

But yet this lovely country
Is only just for play,
It would not do for children
To all go there to stay;
For the world is full of duties
That no one ought to shirk,
And the land that is the finest
Is the truly Land of Work.

A THREE MONTHS' NOTE.

"So ye want to hire a hundred dollars so ye can buy a power-dory, Obed," remarked David Story. "What's to hinder ye usin' consider'ble elbow grease an' pullin' out to the fishin'-grounds same as your father did afore ye?"

"I can't do it an' make connections with the market," replied Obed Cooper. "Thar didn't used to be no trouble a-doin' it when the hull on us rowed out to the fishin'-grounds, but now that they all has power-boats, they gets back afore I can make it, an' ha'f the time the fish is shipped to market when I reach landin'. The result on it all is that Perkins won't take my fish. I give way more'n three hundred pounds o' haddock an' cod yesterday, an' that wasn't no uncommon thing, nuther."

"I does put yet in a purty bad hole, Obed, an' no mistake," declared Seaburg's wealthiest native townsman. "Now, if I felt sure ye was o' the same stripe as your father, I'd let ye have the money. Sayin' I was to advance ye the money, when could ye meet your note?"

"Inside o' three months, Mr. Story, I can fetch it."

"Wall, Obed, I'm goin' to advance ye the money," said Story, after a moment or two of reflection.

"I'll meet it promptly, Mr. Story," declared the young man.

"That's all I ask, Obed," remarked Mr. Story picking up his hat.

The following day Obed purchased a power-dory in the adjacent city, paying somewhat over a hundred dollars for it, making up the balance with the little he had saved from time to time. It took him but a short time to master the running of the boat, and very soon he was bringing back to the landing each day his quota of fish.

All went well for a time, until one unhappy night some rascal, or rascals, "borrowed" the dory, and the following morning it was found wrecked on the outside shore, having been battered to pieces on the rocks. As no one was reported missing in Seabury or the adjoining towns, it was presumed that the occupants of the dory escaped with their lives.

"I'm up agin it, Mr. Story," choked Obed that morning, chancing to meet his townsman in the general store and postoffice; "but don't ye worry more 'bout that note, 'cause I'm goin' to fetch it in the time I told ye. I've got sompin' saved toward it, an' I'm goin' to keep at it until I get the hull of it. As luck 'ould have it, I ain't sold my old dory."

"I ain't worryin' none, Obed," replied the rich man.

The following morning Obed was off long before daylight. As a matter of fact, he was on the fishing-grounds, seven miles off Seabury Point, before many of the Seabury power-dories showed up, and an hour before his fellow-fishermen weighed anchor Obed was on his way back to the landing, contenting himself with a somewhat moderate fare of fish.

Numerous other days he did the same, but there were occasional ones when he missed connections, and days when the water was too rough for fishing. As the time drew near for the meeting of the note, he worked early and late. The days were long, and when the tide favored, having sold his fish, he would return to the flat and dig a bushel or two of clams, thus earning a little more.

As a result of his efforts to meet the note, Obed lost flesh and grew hollow-eyed. Story noted his condition one afternoon four days before the note was due, but he said nothing.

"That boy is sure a true chip o' the old block, 'Siah," remarked Story, addressing Josiah King, the proprietor of the general store. "I had a notion to tell him this afternoon to ease up an' make a payment on that note he signed, an' that I'd get it renewed. 'Bout twenty years' go I advanced his father two hundred on a note. I stuck the note in a bank over to the city. The day it was due thar was a wet snow that blocked the roads. What did the old man do but jump into his dory an' row round to the city an' take the note up. I never forgot that. Had it in mind the day that Obed asked me to advance him a hundred to get his power-dory with."

Try as he would, however, the morning that the note was due Obed found himself a few dollars short of the required amount. Without doubt he could have easily borrowed the balance, but he sturdily refused to entertain such a thought. Instead, he disposed of his dory to one of the clammers, receiving for it a matter of fifteen dollars and the promise of transportation to and from the clam-flats for the period of one month.

"How is it that ye ain't usin' your dory, Obed?" questioned Story one afternoon three or four days after the note was paid. "I see that ye come up with Aaron. Your boat sprung a leak?"

"Wall, no, Mr. Story, the boat don't leak none, so fur as I know," replied Obed. "Fact is, I had to sell it, bein' a bit short t'other day at the bank. I'm earnin' nother one. Guess I can fetch it inside a month."

"Sold it, eh? Speaking of boats reminds me. What do ye think o' the power-dory yender—that new one?"

"That's a nice one, Mr. Story," replied Obed. "I see that as I was comin' up to the landin' with Aaron. Must have come in while I was down on the flats. Wonder whose boat that is."

"B'longs to one o' the fishermen here in town."

"Want to know! That's consider'ble better boat than most on 'em here."

"Ye likt it, eh?"

"That's some boat, Mr. Story! What do ye suppose that cost?"

"I can tell ye jest what it cost, Obed. Got the bill on it here in my pocket. Here it is, all receipted."

"W-why-why, how come my name on that bill?" gasped Obed, staring at the bill which Story handed him.

"I'll tell ye, Obed; it's 'cause ye took car' o' that note ye signed," replied Story, grinning. "I slipped over to the city yesterday an' bought it. Had the bill made out to ye. Now tuck it in your pocket an' let's ye an' me make a trip down-river in your boat."

"Y don't mean that ye give me that boat?" asked Obed, his chin wabbling.

"That's jest 'bout the size on't, Obed."

"I don't know what to say to ye, Mr. Story," choked the young man.

"Don't say nothin'. Jest wade out an' pull the tern in, so I can get 'board with-out gettin' wet."

"Thar ain't many men like ye, Mr. Story," said Obed, pulling up his high rubber boots.

"Thar'd be more o' 'em if tha was more young men o' your stripe, Obed."—Ex.

HOW TWO HEARTS WERE MENDED.

Yes, you did, too!"
"I did not!"

Thus the little quarrel started,
Thus by unkind little words
Two fond friends were parted.

"I am sorry."
"So am I."

Thus the little quarrel ended,
Thus, by loving little words,
Two fond hearts were mended.

HOW GOOD IT TASTED.

"I touched the goal first!" cried Carrie. The rest came running up one by one, all of them just as hot and tired as Carrie.

"I wish I had a drink," said Clare.

"So do I," said Rob.

"I think I saw a drinking fountain down at the end of this path," said mamma. "Suppose we all go and look for it?"

In a few minutes the children were drinking to their hearts' content, giving the first drink to Bennie and Baby May.

"Isn't it good!" said Carrie. "It just seemed as if I couldn't wait another minute, my throat was all so dried up, and now I am ready to play again."

"Yes, indeed, water is one of our best friends," said mamma. "What should we do without it?"

"We'd have to drink lemonade," said Clare.

"But how could we make lemonade without water?" asked Rob, laughing.

"Well then we could drink milk," said Clare.

"But the cows would not give milk very long if they did not have nice fresh water to drink," said mamma.

"And the grass would dry up so they wouldn't have anything to eat," Rob said.

Mamma smiled. "Yes that is true, Rob. Everything would dry up pretty soon without the rain and the dew which God sends so lovingly. One year when I was a girl, we lived in a part of the country where there was never very much water, and that year especially the wells and cisterns became dry all around us. We had to get all our water from a river five miles away, and it was brought in barrels, so you see it did not taste very fresh when we got it. And we had to be careful to use as little as we could for cooking and housekeeping and everything. How glad we were when the rains came!"

"I'm glad we have plenty of water at home," said Carrie, and all the children thought the same.—Apples of Gold.

LUCKY TED.

That was the nickname they called him by—

The boys at his school—and this was why: He was bound to win from the start, they said:

It was always the way of Lucky Ted!

The earliest flowers in his garden grew; The sums on his slate came soonest true; He could sail a boat, or throw a ball, Or guess a riddle, the best of all.

You wondered what could his secret be, But watch him a while and you would see. He thought it out till the thing was plain, And then went at it with might and main.

Trusting but little to chance or guess, He learned the letters that spell Success. A ready hand and thoughtful head— So much for the "luck" of Lucky Ted! Blanche Trennor Heath.

THE BAD MANNERS OF BILLY BOY AND FUDGE.

BY MABEL GRAHAM KNIPE.

Emily Elizabeth, Fudge, and Billy Boy sat on the front porch steps looking expectantly down the street.

Emily Elizabeth was a pink-and-white little girl, Fudge a big yellow kitty, and Billy Boy a fluffy, brown poodle dog.

It was almost time for Mr. Brown to come. Emily Elizabeth called him "Big Sister's young man" when speaking of him to her pets. Now, Mr. Brown called very regularly to see big sister, and as regularly brought her a box of sweets—a box filled with fat brown chocolates wrapped in shiny coats of tinfoil and dainty, white nut-filled creams in gold colored cases.

Each time big sister gave Emily Elizabeth a piece of candy for herself and one to divide between Fudge and Billy Boy.

Presently a neat little runabout came purring gayly down the street and stopped in front of Emily Elizabeth's house. A young man sprang out and hurried up the walk. Mr. Brown had arrived.

Fudge and Billy Boy were as delighted to see him as Emily Elizabeth. Fudge purred and brushed around his feet, while Billy Boy excitedly chased his tail in dizzying circles in the excess of his joy.

Big sister came out on the porch, and she and Mr. Brown stood planning about their drive.

As the minutes passed and the young man did not draw the usual candy box from his pocket, Emily Elizabeth's heart felt queer and heavy. She knew the candy was there, for she could see the big bulge in the pocket of his ulster.

"He's going to forget to give it to sister until they are out in the car," she told herself. "And, Emily Elizabeth," she added sternly, "you must not be a baby and cry."

Just then big sister went into the house for her coat and Mr. Brown pulled Emily Elizabeth's curls and asked her if she had been a very good girl that day, and she answered, "Yes," and tried to smile, but it was a very twisted little smile; for, oh, she wanted the candy so dreadfully.

But she was a well-trained little girl and never dreamed of hinting for it.

Fudge and Billy Boy, as bewildered and worried as Elizabeth, were not so polite, as Mr. Brown soon discovered.

First came a tug at his shoestrings, and when he looked down Billy Boy dropped the shoe lace, sat up on his haunches and gazed pleadingly into the young man's face.

"What's the matter with Billy Boy?" asked the puzzled Mr. Brown. "He acts as if he wants something."

At that instant he felt a light tap on his arm, and there, perched on the back of a porch rocker, sat Fudge, first reaching one paw, and then the other, to touch the young man on the sleeve and looking as wistful as a kitty could.

"Well, of all things—" began Mr. Brown, and then he understood.

"It's the candy you want, isn't it?" he cried. "And I was about to forget it. Such a careless person as I am."

Two minutes later Emily Elizabeth again sat on the step, this time with her piece of candy wrapped in shiny tinfoil lying in her lap, while she carefully divided the one for her pets. Billy Boy stood with both paws in her lap, while his tail beat a happy tattoo on the step. Fudge purred loudly and brushed his head against Emily Elizabeth's arm, getting his nose as close to the candy as he dared.

"It was dreadfully impolite to hint the way you two did," said Emily Elizabeth, trying to be severe. Then she sighed happily. "But, oh, this candy is perfectly 'licious,'" she added.—Western Christian Advocate.

HOW A GIRL AWOKE TO HER PRIVILEGE.

A terrible railroad accident had happened and Marjorie Graydon's mother was instantly killed. When Lois Martin excitedly told her aunt about it, Aunt Jane looked at her niece grimly and remarked, "There are tragedies and tragedies. The slow kind is where people are giving up their whole lives for others who are too blind to appreciate their efforts, or even say a kind word. Yes, there are quick tragedies and slow ones, but when a mother is gone, she's gone."

Wondering over her aunt's speech, Lois went in search of her mother. On the kitchen table she found the pretty dish of salad and the roll of pressed meat which she had promised and her mother had prepared for the company that evening. On the rack was the weekly ironing, and the greater part of it was the summer apparel belonging to Lois. The beautifully ironed white dress which she was to wear the next afternoon required an hour of mother's skillful work, and Lois wondered casually how she ever accomplished so much in a day. She found her mother in the sewing room, putting the finishing touches on a filmy frock, which Lois was to wear that evening. How tired her mother looked Lois saw for the first time. What if the tragedy had come to her instead of to Marjorie? Aunt Jane's words rang in her ears—"There are quick tragedies and slow ones, but when a mother's gone she's gone."

Lois took the dress from her mother's hands saying, "You are going right down stairs this minute and you are to lie on the couch and rest until father comes home."

"But you want the dress for tonight," her mother objected.

"Yes, and I know who is going to finish it. I'll take it down stairs and sit right by you, to see that you lie still."

Mrs. Martin lay quite still, watching Lois with loving eyes, wondering what had made her daughter suddenly thoughtful of her comfort; but she understood a little later when Lois dropped beside the couch, threw her arms about her mother, and said in a choked whisper, "O mother, dear, what if it had happened to me instead of to Marjorie!" And that night Lois prayed, "If you'll only spare her to me, I'll be more thoughtful."—Adapted.

A PAIR OF SHOES.

BY FELICIA BUTTZ CLARK.

When Mary Haven started for the shop that morning, she was "dead tired." Most of the night she had watched by her mother's side and was relieved to know that she was better. But that did not make her less tired.

It was Friday, and each day in the shoe department of Swift and Jones' big store had been harder than the one before it. Five nights she had sat up with mother. There was no money to pay for a nurse. By day Mrs. Mulligan, their neighbor, had come in to help. She said that she could not forget how good mother had been to her when the baby died.

"I believe that girl is half asleep today," the floor-walker said to the elaborately gowned assistant. "She is so stupid." "Been out all night to a dance, I suppose," was the answer.

"Well, the clerks must learn that they've got to attend to business."

He told this to Mary in no mild words. It was about eleven o'clock and the crowd was coming in when a woman sat down and desired to see some shoes. Mary did her best to suit her, though her head ached badly. She was pleasant and smiling, feeling the floor-walker's sharp eyes upon her and well knowing what it meant for her if she made a blunder. Mother was better, but needed good food and medicines. New places were hard to find.

One after another, six pairs of shoes were tried on and thrown aside. Mary went to search for others.

When she returned, a new customer had taken her seat next to the exacting lady. She was very quietly dressed and looked as if she were a suburbanite.

"I can wait," she said pleasantly.

But her expression was not so pleasant when she saw Mary vainly trying to suit the purchaser. In fact, a blaze of anger came into her dark eyes when she heard the other lady say, impatiently: "Oh, well, you can put on my old shoes again. None of these suit, and I really did not intend to buy shoes today. I had to put in half an hour somewhere before lunch and I thought I'd see what the latest styles were."

Mary stared after the receding form as if she were dazed. Picking up the scattered shoes, she put them away, forgetting the waiting customer until the floor-walker spoke to her.

"I'm thinking this will be your last day here, Miss Haven," he said in a dry, hard voice. "All the week you've been losing business for us. That lady would have bought shoes if you'd treated her right."

"But she said—" began Mary.

"It doesn't matter what she said. Get on to your job now, lively."

Mary tried to keep back her tears.

"What can I do for you, ma'am?" she asked, in the old-fashioned way that her mother had taught her.

"A pair of Oxfords, please—comfortable, broad toes and heels."

Mary brought three pairs, one of which fitted nicely, so the woman said.

"I heard what that person said to you," she spoke out, suddenly. "It was not your fault at all."

Mary looked up into her face and saw a pair of keen but kindly eyes.

"If you wouldn't mind telling Mr. Thomson so, I'd be grateful, ma'am. He will report me, and Mr. Swift will dismiss me. Of course, business must be first, I s'pose."

"Of course," replied the lady. Her tone sounded sarcastic. "Tell me what's the matter with you, child."

Mary glanced around to see if there were other customers; seeing none, she opened her heart to the stranger. "Mother's sickness, the night-watches, dead tired, headache; if job was lost, what would they do?"

"Oh, I oughtn't to tell you this, ma'am. But I've tried so hard, and it's all for nothing."

"Why didn't you say your mother was ill, and you had a headache?" asked Mr. Thomson that evening.

"I—couldn't explain," Mary stammered.

"The boss says that you're to go home, and as to-morrow's early closing, you're not to come back till Monday."

"Oh!" said Mary.

"The lady who bought the Oxfords is Mrs. Swift," explained the floor-walker. "And, look-a-here, Miss Haven, I guess you ain't the kind that dances all night an' can't work next day. If ever you're under the weather, you're to tell me right off, an' don't be scared, will you?"

The floor-walker was kind-looking when he smiled.

"I guess he has his worries, too," thought Mary, hurrying home, where Mrs. Mulligan put her straight to bed.

The sun was low when she awoke, and the headache was gone. In mother's room was a big basket of oranges and grapes, and a bouquet of such flowers as had never graced the plain home. "Mrs. James Swift" was the name on the card.

"She's the boss's wife," Mary said, as she prepared an orange. "Mother, the world looks hard, but there are a lot of kind folks in it. Even Mr. Thomson is good-looking when he smiles. I waited on Mrs. Swift today—"

"And met an angel unawares," added mother softly.—Ex.

It isn't a good plan to allow your regrets for yesterday to overshadow your hopes for tomorrow.

You will find as you look back upon your life that the moments that stand out are the moments when you have done things in the spirit of love.

To thee for help we fly;
Thine eye alone our wants can see,
Thy hand alone supply.

O Lord our God, grant us grace to desire thee with our whole heart; that, so desiring, we may seek and find thee; and so finding thee, may love thee; and loving thee, may hate those sins for which thou hast redeemed us.—Anselm.

Let us have our loins girt and our lights brightly burning, so that others may see the way and not walk in darkness!—D. L. Moody.

"QUIETISM" AND HERESY.

In the seventeenth century a Spanish priest named Miguel de Molines gathered about him a company of like-minded men who devoted themselves to the passive contemplation of God. They were called "quietists;" and so disastrous was their influence on the efficiency of the church that their system was finally condemned as heresy. That judgment was none too severe. "Quietism" is the bane of the Church today.

"Jesus, Master, I am thine,
Keep me faithful; keep me near;
Let thy presence in me shine,
All my homeward way to cheer.

SMALL AND GREAT.

You have trusted God in a few things, and he has not failed you. Trust him now for every thing, and see if he does not do for you exceeding abundantly above all that you could ever have asked or thought, not according to your power or capacity, but according to his own mighty power. You find no difficulty in trusting the Lord with the management of the universe and all the outward creation, and can your case be any more complex or difficult than these, that you need to be anxious or troubled about his management of it?—Hannah Whitall Smith.

BACK-SEAT PEOPLE.

This caption suggests a condition that is as old as the Gospel, and a failing among church members as universal as Christian thought. It is a weakness that we tolerate. It calls to mind what we read of many who "followed afar off" when Christ was on his way to Calvary. They saw at a distance the greatest tragedy of all ages. The distance between them and the cross demanded courage to traverse which they did not possess. The same shrinking spirit has been passed on from age to age, and the church has always suffered from this modified form of relationship. And the outlook for improvement in this respect is not especially encouraging. Then, too, there are times when interested observers are inclined to believe that the number of those who readily yield to this tendency to remain permanently in the background, is increasing.

A SUCCESSFUL LIFE.

To make life as successful as you can, you should not go away by yourself and say that you will live a good life, and then do nothing else. To cherish self is not the way to do service. You must lose self. Make yourself so strongly a part of the whole world that you influence all the other parts and the more strongly cement them together. Take in some other life. Serve it and show it that there is a divine image hidden in it. Develop that image, and in so doing you beautify your own life.—Phillips Brooks.

WHAT TO DO IN AN EMERGENCY.

BY WAYLAND HOYT.

When confronted by some emergency which, at first look, seems altogether to outmeasure your ability, do such things as these:

Make inventory of what resources and ability you do possess. "And Jesus asked the disciples, How many loaves have ye? And they said, seven; and a few little fishes." This is always Christ's question when emergency confronts—How many loaves have ye? Have you not a little knowledge, energy, love, opportunity? Make inventory of them.

Then, in emergencies, remember past mercies. Remember what the Lord has already done for you.

Then, in emergencies, with your seven meager loaves and few little fishes, enter into special partnership with Jesus. "And he took the seven loaves and the few small fishes." And the shining fact is, the disciples let him take them, when it forces us into more dependence on, and closer nearness to Jesus.

Then, in emergencies, practice, as far as you can discover it, what you think to be the will of Jesus. "And he commanded the people to sit down on the ground." And they sat there. Obedience is the open secret. Says Jesus, "He that is willing to do my will shall know."

Then, in emergency, go on in the brave, use of consecrated and present resources. "And gave to the disciples, and they did set before the multitude."

Confronting emergency as the disciples did, you shall master yours, as they did theirs.—Ex.

SOLOMON GRAY.

BY AUNT KITTY.

In a little brown house, just over the way,
With vines overhanging the door,
All alone sits the weaver, old Solomon Gray,
Busy dreaming of glad days of yore.

He's a cheery old man, dispelling all gloom,
Though of sorrow he's had his share,
And he hums a sweet tune as he sits at his loom
With a heart that ne'er yields to despair.

Sometimes as the shadows of evening fall
And his work for the day is done,
His old arm chair he draws from its place near the wall,
Just to watch the last rays of the sun.

Then memories of other days crowd thick and fast,
And he sits in the fireside glow
With his wife and his child as in years long since past,
How he loved them, God only could know!

"Men ought not to faint, but always to pray,"
And he hastily brushes the tears;
This mandate from God he e'er strives to obey—
It has strengthened him all through the years.

In the days of his youth he accepted the Truth,
With comfort and peace the reward;
Ah, few men there be who are richer than he,
For in heaven his treasure has stored.

PAUL'S EXPERIENCES AT JERUSALEM.
(Acts 21:27 to 22:1.)

Ch. 21:27. And when the seven days were almost ended, the Jews which were of Asia, when they saw him in the temple, stirred up all the people, and laid hands on him.

28. Crying out, Men of Israel, help: This is the man, that teacheth all men every where against the people, and the law, and this place: and further brought Greeks also into the temple, and hath polluted this holy place.

29. (For they had seen before with him in the city Trophimus an Ephesian, whom they supposed that Paul had brought into the temple.)

30. And all the city was moved, and the people ran together: and they took Paul, and drew him out of the temple: and forthwith the doors were shut.

31. And as they went about to kill him, tidings came unto the chief captain of the band, that all Jerusalem was in an uproar.

32. Who immediately took soldiers and centurions, and ran down unto them: and when they saw the chief captain and the soldiers, they left beating of Paul.

33. Then the chief captain came near, and took him, and commanded him to be bound with two chains; and demanded who he was, and what he had done.

34. And some cried one thing, some another, among the multitude: and when he could not know the certainty for the tumult, he commanded him to be carried into the castle.

35. And when he came upon the stairs, so it was, that he was borne of the soldiers for the violence of the people.

36. For the multitude of the people followed after, crying, Away with him.

37. And as Paul was to be led into the castle, he said unto the chief captain, May I speak unto thee? Who said, Canst thou speak Greek?

38. Art not thou that Egyptian, which before these days madest an uproar, and leddest out into the wilderness four thousand men that were murderers?

39. But Paul said, I am a man which am a Jew of Tarsus, a city in Cilicia, a citizen of no mean city: and, I beseech thee, suffer me to speak unto the people.

40. And when he had given him license, Paul stood upon the stairs, and beckoned with the hand unto the people. And when there was made a great silence, he spake unto them in the Hebrew tongue, saying,

Ch. 22:1. Men, brethren, and fathers, hear ye my defense which I make now unto you.

Golden Text: "God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will we not fear" (Psa. 46:1, 2).

Catechism—Q. 46. What is required in the First Commandment? A. The First Commandment requireth us to know and acknowledge God to be the only true God, and our God; and to worship and glorify him accordingly.

INTRODUCTORY.

After Paul had returned to Jerusalem, after his perilous journey and his great missionary operations, he was received gladly by the leading brethren of the church, who realized that he had been doing a notable and difficult work among the Gentile nations and the Jewish people who were scattered abroad in these foreign lands. He had led many to Christ, both Jews and Gentiles. He had not forbidden the Jewish converts to hold on to their Jewish customs, as circumcision, although they had come to believe in Christ for their salvation. But, on the other hand, he had not compelled the Gentile converts to take up these Jewish customs, although many of the Jews insisted that he should do so. When he came to Jerusalem this controversy was opened again. Many believing Jews thought that Paul was a hurtful influence. So James and some of the others advised Paul to propitiate these narrow-minded and mistaken Jews, by a course which would show that he was in full sympathy with the Jewish customs. We can now see that they did this on their own judgment, and not by inspiration, and that it was a mistake. If Paul had just gone on to preach Christ, it would have been in line with his work. It did no good. The conflict was sure to come, and our lesson tells how it came and how it resulted.

EXPOSITORY.

27-29. Some of the Jews when they saw Paul in the temple were greatly enraged. They knew that he was a Christian, and they did not believe that he had gone into the temple with any good or proper purpose or feelings, and as they hated him, they determined to bring a charge against him and make trouble for him. They had seen him in the city with Trophimus, an Ephesian, and they had also seen Paul with some strange men in the temple, and it was very easy to imagine what was harmful, and to spread a charge. So they said he had taken Gentiles into the temple. This was an offense, very grave, and punishable by death. So they said he had been guilty of this crime, and they hoped to have his life.

30. The rumor spread, a great mob was formed. Paul was seized by the mob, and so great was the excitement that, as Paul was dragged out of the temple, the doors of the edifice, for safety, were shut, and the city was in an uproar.

31, 32. Word was carried to the Roman commander of the troops that the city was in an uproar, and he, taking several companies of soldiers, with their captains, or centurions, hastened to the place of the mob, which was quieted at once on their approach.

33. The mob had ceased to beat Paul, and as he seemed to be the center of the disturbance, the officers seized him and chained him, and after all this, demanded to know who he was and what he had done. It was for Paul's safety, of course, but the people of the mob were the ones who should have been put in chains. But the innocent often suffer instead of the guilty.

34-36. Failing to get any satisfying information, and only confusion existing, the chief-captain, or colonel, ordered Paul to be carried into the castle, under arrest. The mob came rushing on, shouting "Away with him!" as they had once shouted about Christ, so that the soldiers had really to carry Paul to get him out of the hands of the furious mob. And so they started up the outside stairs that led into the prison of the castle.

37-39. The commanding officer was a man of intelligence and character, and, as soon as he had a proper understanding of the matter, was ready to treat Paul with all due courtesy. No doubt some one in the confusion had told him that the prisoner was a violent and dangerous man, and had intimated that he was the leader of a recent uprising of desperate characters. He was therefore surprised to hear from Paul a respectful, dignified and manly request for an interview and explanation. The request was granted. Paul always had the respect of officials, when they came to know him, and to know who he was. Paul was a great man and a Christian gentleman. We may learn from him the secret of polite address and of tact, in the name and for the sake of Christ. We should make it the rule of our lives to make friends of as many as possible, so that we may be the better able to advance the cause of the Gospel. Paul made himself known to the officer, and his request was not that he might have vengeance on the people for their mistreatment of him, but that he might have the opportunity of addressing, or preaching to them, so that he might try to win them to Christ.

40, 41. The request being granted, Paul was ready to speak, just where he was, with the stairs for a pulpit. Wherever a great preacher is, a pulpit is easy to find, and wherever a company of people are ready to listen to the Gospel, there is a house of God, with the Lord above them ready to bless the service. And so, in most conciliatory words, he began to make this great address. That they were not all won to Christ was no fault of Paul. They had the Gospel preached to them in power and in love, and every person there should have turned in repentance and faith to be saved by Jesus Christ.

THE LITTLE CHURCHES.

BY DONNIE MINTON.

God bless the little churches
With their heaven-pointed spires,
With their message of salvation,
And their sacred altar fires;
Where the lips of little children
Learn to lisp the story old;
Where the aged dream of heaven
With its streets of crystal gold.

God bless the little churches,
Where the hearts with sorrow bowed,
Catch a gleam of heaven's glory
Through the rifting of the cloud;
Where the souls, grown coarse and sordid
In their daily quest for gold,
Come with humble hearts like children,
Seeking entrance to the fold.

God bless the little churches
Where we bring our treasured dead,
When our hearts are torn and bleeding
As the last farewell is said.
As the preacher-prophet tells us
Of a home where none e'er die,
Where our dear ones never suffer
And we'll greet them by and by.

God have mercy on the people
Where the little churches close;
Where the window panes are broken
And the "hoot owls" calmly doze;
Where no chiming bells on Sunday
Call the people out to prayer,
Where no evening psalm is chanted
And no gleaming light is there;
Where no message from the preacher
Calls the sinner to repent;
Where no handclasp of a brother
Brings a smile of sweet content.

God have mercy on the nation
When its church bells cease to call;
For a land is nigh to cursing
When its sacred altars fall.

—Telescope.

A LITTLE OLD MOTHER'S SECRET.

The car was crowded. A fine motherly old lady came down the aisle. She had two grips. Both full. We asked her to share our seat. We took care of her grips. She sat down and she was willing to talk. Seventy-three years old. Going to the city to see one of her sons. Had attended Methodist church services in one church for forty-one years.

She was the mother of five stalwart sons. They were widely scattered as follows: Michigan, Texas, Boston, Mass., Columbus and Cincinnati, Ohio. She was a widow and had been for many years.

By her efforts, energy and will power she had raised the five boys. The youngest would graduate from a technical school in Boston next spring. He has a good position ready for him as soon as he is through school. The other four are married and living useful, happy and successful lives and raising good families.

The longer we talked to her the more we got interested in the success she had in raising this bunch of boys. We asked: "How does it happen that you have had such good luck in raising these boys, when so many boys make failures in life?"

She answered: "I don't know the secret. I just took good care of them and had them start in the kindergarten of our Sabbath school and they came up through all the courses we had for young folks in our home church. My boys were not inclined to form bad habits."

After she had made her little speech, we knew the secret of her triumph as a mother.

The church is worth all its costs. Its influences are lifelong and safety first guard-rails along the pathway of life. How much is a mother like this worth? Each of those sons had insisted on that mother making her home with him. When the youngest finishes school, she will be in his home.

WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

"Don't talk to me!" The young man accompanied his laughing remark with a significant forward motion of his hand and forearm. "I had enough of that sort of thing when I was young. Fed up with it in fact."

The older man looked him over—a long scrutinizing stare. "Do you mind telling me Sam, which one of your parents you mean to insult?" he said. "Father, or mother or both?"

Sam reddened. "Insult?" he asked. "Insult? What do you mean, Mr. Bush? Why, I wouldn't insult either of them for the world, and you know it. They're old-fashioned, of course, and a little straight-laced and behind the times, but they're right-down good, both of 'em; and mother, especially would cut off her right hand any day if it would save mine."

"Well, more shame to you, then!" Mr. Bush's voice was very stern now. "More shame to you, I say, Sam, for the insulting, disloyal way in which you have just spoken! Yes, I mean it; and there's no use in your getting angry and arguing with me about it. I've pretty nearly got to where I feel as a friend of mine says he does—that such a speech as that settles a man in his mind forever.

"When any fellow says as often as you do, 'I had enough of that when I was young,' what can he mean except a very decided and open criticism of the people under whose guidance he did those things with which he is now so 'fed up'—as you put it? And when those people are a loving father and mother, who, he admits, had his best welfare at heart, what is such criticism except disloyalty and insult?"

"Oh, I know you didn't think of it that way, Sam; but I want you to 'think' next time; and I want you to think of something else, too. Do you often, if ever, hear any one say that he had enough when he was young of things that were really bad and harmful? When they use that phrase, isn't it usually about going to church or Sunday school, or keeping the pledge, or saying one's prayers, or doing something else that they consider—not bad—but too good nowadays?"

"And, believe me, Sam, people had better be pretty careful about leaving off a good habit until they can replace it with a better one. There is no vacuum in the habit world any more than there is in nature. When they've done that—found the better habit, I mean—why, then they can make your little speech all they like, because—"

"Because," interrupted Sam, "they'll have have sense enough to see what such a speech means—and won't risk it. Come on, Mr. Bush, if we're late to church I shan't be able to send mother the text this afternoon."—Ex.

THE DIVINE FRIENDSHIP.

What will it do for you? To put the answer in a sentence, such an experience of friendship with God will do for you just what any real and noble friendship will do, only with greater steadiness and power than characterizes any earthly friendship. Religion is simply friendship at its best, love at its purest and strongest.

One of the sure results of living thus in the consciousness of the abiding friendship of God is moral restraint and stimulus. Probably there is no one of us who would not do when alone some things which he would refrain from doing in the presence of his best friend. And in the presence of a true friend one can do what he could not do alone. His presence puts both restraint and stimulus into our souls. One of the chief values of a noble friendship is that it keeps one living at his best.

What must it not mean then to live in the consciousness that your every word and act is in the presence of the holiest and highest of all friends? If you could honestly believe that, wherever you walk, there walks with you one like unto the Son of Man, a presence that shames the worst in you and calls out the best, would not your life be set up on a higher plane of conduct and thought?

YOUNG PEOPLE

PRAYER MEETING, NOVEMBER 6.

Endeavor Topic: Thy Will Be Done. V. With My Money. Matthew 6:7-15.

We have been having this petition from the Lord's Prayer, "Thy will be done," as the thought for our consecration meetings now for many months. We have studied how God's will may be done by us with our Strength, then with our Pleasures, then with our Mind, then with our Time, and now, at this meeting, we are to consider how God's will may be done with our Money.

It is exceedingly important that we learn what is the true Christian attitude toward money. If one learns to conduct his life properly in this department and does so, it becomes almost a certainty that he will be right in every other thing and in every other way. A great many people break down right here. Men and institutions become stranded on the money difficulty. They who commit themselves to the Lord right here, so that they are determined that in all money matters they will live to the glory of God, and let his will be done in them and by them, are well determined in regard to many of the most difficult matters of life. So it is well to make a study of this question.

It is said that a miserly man was once listening to a sermon that was being preached by a great minister, and he was very much in doubt as to whether he would be pleased or not. The subject of the sermon was on the same general line that we have before us at this time. After a time the minister said that he had three things to present, and the first was, "Make all the money you can," and he urged his hearers to be industrious and enterprising and honest and wideawake, so that they might succeed. This pleased his hearer and he settled down in great expectation of something else good.

The second point was, "Save all the money you can," and he urged economy and prudence and wisdom in all of this. Of course, he said, money had to be spent for the necessities and conveniences and comforts of life, and for religious and home life, and all of that, but that one should avoid all wastefulness and prodigality and save up for a rainy day and in order to be safe and independent. The hearer of whom we have been speaking thought this could not be improved on, for he was anxious to save and even to hoard his money.

But the third point was a great disappointment to this hearer, and greatly disapproved by him, for the minister said: "Give all you can." This spoiled it all for this man, for he did not wish to give at all. He had not learned the duty and the pleasure of Christian giving. He had not come to think that we are in the world to do all the good we can, and that in the course of giving money we have a great opportunity to do good, and to serve God and our fellowmen. But this is very important. God expects us to give, and the Bible has a great many injunctions about giving, or one-tenth of the income in the service of God. In fact, many think that this is only a proper amount of interest to pay on what the Lord has placed in our keeping, and that we are giving only after we have paid the tithe. But God certainly expects us to give to the work of his kingdom.

We can scarcely think of a better line of thoughts for our consideration just now, that this of money-making, money-saving and spending, and money-giving. If we learn to do these properly, as God would have us do them, we come to do God's will and let God's will be done in us, in reference to money. How one gets his money and what he does with his money is a real index to his life.

So in the first place let us be careful that we make our money just as God would have us. Let us make it on six days of the week, for "six days thou shalt labor and do all thy work." Let us make it honestly and justly. Let us be enterprising and industrious, and correct in all our ways.

In the second place let us shun the ways of the spendthrift, the intemperate, the foolish and the worldly. Let us spend our money for what God would have us purchase, for home and family and education, and only for what is good and right, and let us save so that we may not become dependent.

In the last place let us give the full right share to God, for the work of the Church, the cause of religion, and the help of the needy, and this will be a blessing and a joy.

PRAYER MEETING

NOVEMBER 2.
CONCERT OF PRAYER FOR MISSIONS.
SIAM.

The work in Siam began in 1840. Only in this year has all the work been consolidated so that it is now known as the Siam Mission. There are eleven principal stations: Bangkok, Petchaburi, Chiengmai, Lakawn, Poal, Nan, Chiengrai, Pitsanuloke, Nakawn, Trang, Chieng-rung. There are 123 outstations, where we have 112 missionaries from the United States under our Foreign Mission Board. Of these 30 are ordained ministers, and fifteen other men including ten physicians; 25 single women and 42 wives. There is a native force of 509 Christian workers, including 9 ordained ministers, 245 unordained ministers, and 156 teachers. There are 50 organized churches, and 176 unorganized groups of Christians, the total number of communicants being 7,958, of whom 586 were added during the last year. 325 children were baptized last year. The school work is pressed for the children, and we have 9 hospitals and 12 dispensaries, where 29,429 patients have been treated and many have been led to Christ.

In 1838, Rev. R. W. Orr spent a month in Bangkok, and recommended to our Board this country as a field of effort, not only for the Chinese, but for the Siamese themselves. Rev. W. P. Buell was sent to Bangkok in 1840. Remaining until 1844, and doing good foundation work, he was compelled to leave the field, and it was not until 1847 that the next missionaries reached Siam. From that time until the present, continuous work has been maintained. For several years following 1847 the foothold of the missionaries was precarious, as the king so exerted his despotic influence upon the people that none of them could be induced to rent or sell any house to the missionaries. The first convert was the Chinese teacher, Qua-Kieng, who was baptized in 1844 and died in the faith in 1859. A good record is also given of the first native Siamese convert in 1859. Bangkok was for many years the only center of missionary work. A school for boys was opened in 1852 which, in 1889, was merged into the Boys' Christian High School. The Harriet House School for Girls was begun in 1874. Medical work was the chief means of gaining favor. American missionary physicians have always been the trusted advisers of the king in introducing modern medical methods. In 1869 a printing press was sent out. It is now the most complete publishing establishment in Siam. The whole New Testament was first printed in 1843.

The missionaries in Siam were first led to consider the northern part of the field by encountering a settlement of Laos refugees near Petchaburi. Rev. Daniel McGilvary and Rev. Jonathan Wilson in 1863 were authorized to explore the unknown regions to the north and see what the prospects might be for a mission. Reaching Chiengmai, they were kindly received by the governor, who invited them to settle there, and promised land for a residence. In 1867 Rev. and Mrs. McGilvary reached Chiengmai and established the first mission among the Laos. Dr. and Mrs. Wilson followed the next year. These pioneers were each permitted an active service on the field of more than 40 years. In 1878 an incident occurred in connection with the mission work which led to an appeal to the king. This resulted in a "Proclamation of Religious Liberty to the Laos." It was not until 1883 that reinforcements to the force of workers arrived. Stations were opened at Prae, at Nan and at Chiengrai. From the Chiengmai mother church 13 others churches have been organized. The growth has been due, first of all, to the Christians themselves. The people have become Christians by families and have endeavored to win their own relatives first. The Scriptures have always had a prominent part.

These people are not counted great among the nations of the earth, but as they believe and are saved, they become great in the measurement of the kingdom of heaven, and, if Siam becomes Christian, it is sure to become great in earthly life and influence.

THE MIDNIGHT CALL.

I am lonely tonight, dear boy.
Waiting, and thinking of thee.
The step and cail I hear
Is the mocking-bird, out in a tree.
Hark! The mid-night train rolls by
That sped you away at country's plea.
And the step and call tonight
Is the mocking-bird out in the tree.
The mocking-bird knew you flew, and he
Still is keeping tryst with me,
For the song and call I hear
Is the mocking-bird, out in the tree.
Oh, sad and lonely heart, be still!
I'm not alone, God cares for me.
But the song and call tonight
Is the mocking-bird, out in the tree.
M. E. M.

How We Strengthened His Faith

Yes, WE did it—certain generous Presbyterians and the General Board of Education, working together.

THIS IS THE STORY:

He was a poor boy, his heart set on a college education. He worked hard, but could not earn enough for the expenses of the first year. He was about to give up the undertaking. His pastor advised him to make a start anyway, and put his faith in God.

He started. No help came. He prayed. There seemed to be no answer. "My faith was almost gone," he said. Then—was it the answer?—he saw an announcement about the Rotary Loan Fund. He wrote to the Board, which made him a loan. So he went through the year. He gained greater culture. Also, stronger faith.

There will be others like him this year. That's certain. Would that it were as certain that the Fund will be made sufficient for the needs. You have it in your power to increase the culture—and the faith—of some other boy or girl who will need help.

Were YOU included in the "we" of last year? Would you not like to be able to say, "We did it?"

GENERAL NEWS

PEACE AFTER THREE YEARS OF PEACE.

The Administration's peace treaties with Germany, Austria and Hungary were ratified by the Senate last week, the vote on the first two being sixty-six to twenty, or eight more than the necessary two-thirds, and in the case of the Hungarian treaty, due to the absence of three Senators, being sixty-six to seventeen.

The Senate action completed the Administration's immediate peace program and brought a full state of peace with the principal enemy Powers. Remaining now only are the formal exchanges of ratification, except in the case of the Hungarian treaty, as that government alone has to complete parliamentary action on the treaty.

Formal exchange of the ratification is expected to take place in Berlin within a week, or as soon as the formalities can be arranged.

SILESIAN FRONTIER DEFINED.

The decision of the Council of the League of Nations on the Upper Silesian question, made public last week, divides the plebiscite area into almost equal parts between Poland and Germany, as to the number of communes, and provides administrative machinery for the gradual inauguration of the new regime over a period of fifteen years.

The long-awaited boundary line, according to an official communique, will follow the Oder River to Niebetschau, assigning twenty-two communes in the southern sections to Germany and nineteen to Poland.

The line is traced in detail further by the names of villages, the communique stating that in this more northerly section Germany obtains twenty communes and Poland twenty-one.

North of Lissau the frontier will follow the old boundary line to the point where it joins that already fixed between Germany and Poland.

The German mark is designated as the monetary standard of the area for not more than fifteen years.

The customs frontier is to coincide with the political frontier, and a customs tariff is provided for, with certain exceptions concerning raw materials or unfinished goods.

FEDERAL LABOR BOARD ORDERS STRIKE CALLED OFF.

Railway union leaders and road executives last Friday were ordered by the Railroad Labor Board to halt their plans for the threatened strike, set for Oct. 30.

Both the road officials and the big five Brotherhood chiefs were cited to appear before the board on Wednesday of this week in a renewed effort to avert the crisis.

In issuing the order the board assumed jurisdiction over the dispute on the grounds that it is "likely substantially to interrupt commerce."

The Government's plan for restoring peace will be presented to both sides. The unions, it is believed, will be told to call off the strike entirely, and the roads will be told to withhold their request for a new wage cut of 10 per cent.

Whether the proposals are accepted immediately or not, it is believed the strike will be called off, as the board ordered both sides to "maintain the status quo until after the hearing and a decision."

The word "decision" is taken to indicate that if the contestants can not reach an agreement, the board will settle it for them. This probably will be in favor of the public, judging from previous statements of board members.

The board did not say what penalties would be restored to if either side violates the order to stop strike preparations.

TRAFFIC TO BE KEPT MOVING.

Plans for the movement of essential commodities in event of a general railroad strike have been completed by the Commerce Department, Secretary Herbert C. Hoover has announced.

Mr. Hoover said his department was prepared to co-ordinate the efforts of Governors of states and municipalities in continuing the transportation of food, fuel and other primary commodities in the event of a tie-up of the railroads. He indicated that the use of trucks and water transportation would be resorted to as well as the rail carriers.

After a conference at the White House between President Harding, Chairman C. C. McChord, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and Acting Attorney-General Guy D. Goff, the decided impression was given that an order could be expected soon from the commission putting into effect a reduction in freight rates.

Secretary Hoover, in announcing the program of his department, said that traffic experts have computed that through the proper use of motor equipment the average American city can draw subsistence from contiguous territory within a radius of fifty miles. Under this plan, it was said, a community would not feel the effects of a national strike before several weeks had passed, instead of in a few days, as would have been the case ten years ago.

Plans of the Government to keep traffic moving, coupled with announcements from New York and other cities, that large numbers of skilled machinists and engineers had volunteered their services, have created the impression that the proposed strike will not occur. This belief was further strengthened by the action of 34,000 Pennsylvania railroad employes in voting to ignore the strike order.

By the first of this week it had become probable that the strike, if it is attempted, is doomed to failure, as three-fourths of the railway employes, members of nine unions, had notified the big five that they would not support the strike.

The actions of these nine leaves the signal men and the telegraphers the only organizations in the eleven "standard" rail unions which may join the conductors, firemen, engineers, trainmen and switchmen in the strike they have called.

PARIS ANARCHISTS DECLARE WAR ON AMERICAN OFFICIALS.

A plot by French Communists to take retaliatory measures against all American officials in France in the event of the execution of Nicolo Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti, convicted of murder in a Massachusetts Court, was revealed when it became known that threats had been made to blow up the offices of the American Reparations Commission and the passport bureau.

Threatening letters, warning of reprisals in the event of the death of the two men, also were received by the American Consul General, Alexander M. Thackara, and the American Consuls at Marseilles, Bordeaux and Lyons.

In consequence of this strong forces of police were guarding the new building near the Place de L'Etoile, occupied by the reparations and passport offices, and also the consulate in the Rue Des Italien.

Police in Bordeaux, Lyons and Marseilles are guarding the consulates there.

An attempt last week to kill the American Ambassador at Paris, failed.

KING OF HUNGARY SEEKS TO REGAIN THRONE.

Former Emperor Charles, escaped from Switzerland and returned to Hungary, last Friday, where he was proclaimed King by the garrison at Oedenburg. With a force of royalist troops, he is now reported to be marching on Budapest.

Unofficial dispatches say that Admiral Horthy, regent and active head of the government, has fled from Budapest, and that a provisional government, under Count Julius Andrassy, already has been set up in favor of the former Emperor.

Other reports, however, indicate that this new effort on the part of Charles will meet with powerful and widespread opposition. News of fighting is expected.

It is reported that the Hungarian Government has decided to use every possible means to expel the former Emperor, and another dispatch from Vienna says that the Austrian Cabinet has been summoned hastily to take action in view of the fact that Charles returned in defiance of the allies and an order of the Swiss Government.

JAPAN WILLING TO REOPEN NEGOTIATIONS.

The text of the latest note of the Japanese Government to China, under date of Oct. 19th, relative to the proposed Shantung settlement, was made public at the Japanese Embassy.

It expressed a readiness to embark upon negotiations on the question at once whenever the Chinese Government, "in full appreciation of the main purpose of the Japanese proposal and upon giving more deliberate consideration to the question now at issue, and in the interest of cordial relations between China and Japan, shall express their willingness to open negotiations."

The note reviewed the events involving the Shantung question over a period of several months, and asserts that Japan hitherto had "spared no efforts to achieve a speedy settlement of this question."

A list of stockyards which, under the packers and stockyards act, will come under supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture Nov. 1st, was made public Oct. 20th. Fifty-four yards are included in the list, and it was announced at least sixteen others will be added as their status is confirmed officially.

Tentative regulations for the control of the yards, as well as commission men and market agencies, will be published soon, the department announcing, however, that these are "Open to modification upon suggestion or criticism from interested firms and persons."

An Exchange telegraph dispatch from Vienna states that a report has been received there of the death of Ludwig III, former King of Bavaria, at Sarvar Castle, in Hungary. Owing to the Burgenland trouble in Hungary, telegraphing virtually is suspended.

"Remarkable improvement" in the health of former President Woodrow Wilson was reported by Josephus Daniels, former Secretary of the Navy, following a call at the Wilson residence last Sunday. Mr. Wilson was in excellent spirits, Mr. Daniels said, with excellent color and sparkling eyes.

One of the main tax revision issues in the Senate was settled with the adoption, 54 to 13, of the Republican compromise income surtax rates with the maximum of 50 per cent.

With the arrest of alleged leaders of a "bootleg ring" in Philadelphia, Baltimore and New York, Federal prohibition authorities are piecing together evidence expected to link them with operations extending over the entire Eastern and Central sectors of the United States.

New liquid frauds, involving illegal withdrawal of $30,000,000 worth of whisky from bonded warehouses in recent months would lead to the arrest of twenty or more persons in several large cities, and the seizure of distilleries in several states, it was announced.

Announcement that the origin of the cancer germ has been discovered by a German scientist was made from New York last week, when experiments were begun with a view to putting the discovery to use as a preventive.

An earth larva carried by angle worms is said to be the origin of the disease, and the larva can find its way into the human stomach through the medium of vegetables.

The discovery was made by Dr. Franz Kopsch, of Berlin, who has undertaken experimentation with frogs.

Latest statistics of naval establishments of the world leading maritime powers, compiled by Washington officials, indicate that the American navy still will be established in second place when building programs now under way are completed.

According to the tabulation of fighting ships, Great Britain leads, with 533 ships, with an aggregate tonnage of 1,860,480; the United States has 463 ships of 1,289,463 tons, and Japan 99 of 528,689 tons.

France and Italy hold fourth and fifth positions, with fighting tonnage totaling 462,000 and 275,000, respectively.

Completion of present programs will add seventeen ships to the British navy, or 199,380 tons, sixty-nine to the American with a total of 734,928 tons and eighty-five to the Japanese, of 805,188 tons, exclusive of a special submarine program comprising 120 submersibles.

American participation in an exposition at Rio de Janeiro next year to celebrate the centennial of Brazilian independence was provided for in a bill passed by Congress. The bill carries an appropriation of $1,000,000 to provide for an American building and exhibit.

An alleged conspiracy by which liquor, valued at almost $15,000,000, was withdrawn from distilleries in many states through the issuance of fraudulent permits, was revealed by high prohibition officers, who announced that warrants had been issued for the arrest of two former officials in the office of W. C. McConnell, Director of Federal Prohibition Enforcement in Pennsylvania.

An inventory loss of $90,000,000 in the value of surplus supplies and materials held by the Shipping Board was indicated in the report filed by the commission which has completed a survey of the board's physical assets. Other items in which large decreases in value were shown included:

Shipyards, equipment, land, buildings and drydocks, original cost $117,000,000, present value, $22,437,000.

Uncompleted wooden hulls cost $58,475,000, present value $199,000.

According to report the "physical assets" of the board, exclusive of completed ships, housing and railroad projects, represented an outlay of $389,780,000. No aggregate present value was given.

The Munich correspondent of the London Times is informed by an unnamed expert that the Germans have perfected a triple-barreled machine gun, electrically operated, weighing 22 pounds and capable of spreading 2,000 rounds a minute in a complete circle.

The three barrels could be operated by a gunner on land a half mile distant.

This is cited as instancing how German industries are devising engines of war and, the correspondent further declares, that Germany is concealing her armies under civilian guise and that chemists are conducting researches into poisonous gasses and bacteriological possibilities of destruction.

Favorable report authorizing the formation of a commission to arrange for funding and refunding of the foreign debt has been made by the House Ways and Means Committee. The measure is a substitute for the Administration bill which would have given to the Secretary of the Treasury blanket authority over foreign debt negotiations.

Thorough reorganization of the administrative machinery in the Panama canal zone is recommended in the preliminary report submitted to Secretary Weeks by the commission which recently investigated conditions in the canal zone at his request. The commission estimates that an annual saving of $5,000,000 would result from adoption of its suggestions.

"The commission expresses the belief that if its recommendations are adopted, the returns to the Government will increase year by year, and that within a period of ten or fifteen years the canal will return a fair income on the investment of the Federal Government therein, and estimates the total cost to date of the canal at about $500,000,000.

"It is further recommended," the report says, "that the open shop principle be actually put into effect on the Isthmus, and that in all departments a substantial proportion of non-union men be employed."

A billion more cigars, almost two billions fewer cigarettes, and 14,000,000 pounds less of manufactured tobacco were produced during 1920 than during 1919. Census Bureau statistics compiled from internal revenue reports show

You are worth your weight in gold,
Wife o' mine,
You have made our home enfold
All the good this world can hold,
And the half can not be told,
Wife o' mine.

I can see you yet a bride,
Wife o' mine,
As you stood close by my side,
With no fear of time or tide,
And your sweet face glorified,
Wife o' mine.

You are faithful, good, and true,
Wife o' mine.
With your eyes of truest hue,
And your soul as pure as dew,
All my heart goes out to you,
Wife o' mine.

There are snowflakes in your hair,
Wife o' mine.
Care and toil have put them there,
And of both you've had your share,
But there'll be none "over there,"

SPONGE CORNSTARCH CUSTARDS.

Place in a mixing bowl three-quarters cup of sugar, yolks of two eggs, one tablespoon of melted butter.

Cream until light lemon color, and then add four tablespoons of water, one cup of sifted flour and two level teaspoons of baking powder.

Beat to mix, and then fold in the stiffly-beaten whites of two eggs. Bake in well-greased and floured deep muffin pans in a moderate oven for twenty-two minutes. Remove, cool, and then cut a thin slice from the top; and with a spoon remove the crumb of the cake, taking care not to break the shell. Now place in a saucepan one-half cup of sugar, one and one-half cup of milk, and six level tablespoons of cornstarch.

Stir to dissolve the starch and sugar and then bring to a boil. Cook slowly for five minutes, and then add one whole egg, yolk of one egg, juice of one-half lemon, one teaspoon of grated rind of lemon, one tablespoon of melted butter, and one teaspoon of vanilla extract.

Beat well before adding to the custard, and then beat hard while adding. Cook for one minute and then pour, while hot, in the prepared shells. Let cool, and then place thinly-sliced top cut from the cakes in position. Garnish with Caledonian cream, piled high on top, and a maraschino cherry.

Use the white of egg left over and one-third glass of apple jelly. Beat, using the Dover egg-beater, until the mixture holds its shape.

* * *

These cakes are very good when served for afternoon or high tea.

Then, too, English dishes such as these are would never be complete without Devonshire or clotted cream. This cream is usually served with plain bread and butter or cheese and jam sandwiches, but for a real treat, serve Devonshire cream with a bit of sponge cake for Sunday or high tea.

To prepare the Devonshire cream: Place one pint of grade A cream and one and one-half cups of milk in a pudding pan, sweeten, and flavor to taste. Heat very slowly to the boiling point, and then place where it will remain just below this temperature for one-half hour. Remove and allow to cool, then chill.

Remove the cream from the top of the pan with a skimmer or wire spoon and place in a low, flat bowl. Send to the table. Make sandwiches as described for the bread and butter, and then place a thin shaving of cheese between and spread with Devonshire cream and dot with a bit of plum preserve. This will be delicious.

Mashed Carrots.—Cook the desired number of carrots in salted water until tender. Drain, add a hot boiled potato, season with salt, pepper and a piece of butter and mash fine. Beat in a little cream to make it light and fluffy.

Apple Custard Pie.—Line a pie plate with plain pastry and then place in a mixing bowl, one and one-half cup of thick apple sauce, sweetened to taste, one cup of milk, yolks of two eggs, four tablespoons of flour, one-half teaspoon of salt, one-half teaspoon of nutmeg. Beat with dover egg-beater to blend thoroughly and then turn in prepared pastry and bake in a slow oven for thirty minutes. Place the whites of eggs in a bowl and add two-thirds glass of apple jelly. Beat until mixture holds its shape. Pile on pie when cooked and brown lightly in hot oven.

Use the alarm clock when cooking and baking. If certain dishes require twenty or thirty minutes, set the alarm when they are placed in the oven to cook and the alarm will ring the time when they are finished. Also set the clock to the hour needed for the time to begin the preparations for the meal. This will prevent lateness or hurriedly cooked meals.

Reserve the white of one egg when making custards for meringues. It adds to the appearance of the custard. The Caledonian cream makes a splendid meringue.

To clean the casserole of particles of food which are burned or bits of baked foods which cling persistently to the top, place the dish in a deep pan of soapy water and let it soak overnight, then use the scrubbing brush and cleanse thoroughly.

When making bread crumbs by putting the dried bread through a food chopper, slip the large size bag over the chopper and fasten to the chopper with a couple of rubber bands. This prevents the crumbs from making a mess of things.

Roast Shoulder of Pork.—Have the butcher bone, roll and tie the shoulder, and then wipe with a damp cloth and prepare the following filling: Soak stale bread in cold water until soft and then turn in a cloth and squeeze dry. Rub through a sieve and then place in a bowl three cups of prepared bread, one cup of finely chopped onions, one and one-half cup of finely chopped green tops of celery, one bunch of soup greens, one teaspoon of salt, one-half teaspoon of pepper, one teaspoon of sage, one-half teaspoon of thyme.

Mix and then pack in the cut opening of the rolled shoulder of pork. Now add to the balance of filling one cup of flour, two teaspoons of baking powder.

Mix well and then form into loaf shape and place in a pan with meat. Pat three-quarters cup of flour into the meat. Place in hot oven and as soon as it commences to brown reduce the heat to moderate oven and cook one-half hour per pound. Pork must be well cooked, and after this meat is rolled tightly it will require three and one-half hours in the oven. Baste frequently with boiling water.

BEFORE STITCH IN TIME.

A stitch in time saves nine. True, but why take the stitch at all? Why not pursue a plan that will reduce mending to a minimum?

Some women are so inept in the use of a needle that they would rather take a little pains in planning and ordering their clothes, than have to bother with mending later on. Take buttons, for instance. Could anything be more irritating and soul trying than to find, just as you have allowed ten minutes to change costume, that buttons on the blouse you have planned to wear were partly lost, strayed or stolen?

If buttons are firmly secured on blouses to begin with, they really will stay on for the life of the blouse. If you buy good blouses it is not too much to ask the people of whom you buy them, to make sure that the buttons are on firmly before sending the blouse. Certainly it is ridiculous to pay a good price for buttons that hang by a single stitch, and the sooner women who buy make the protest, the sooner merchants will demand more attention to this matter from the manufacturers.

Careless methods in laundries rob many a blouse of its buttons. If you have your washing done at home, make a special rule that all blouses or other light buttoned garments be wrung by hand.—Ex.

THE PLEASANTEST ROOM IN THE HOUSE.

"I must have a large, sunny kitchen," said a woman. "I do my own housework and spend most of my time there."

She spent most of her days washing dishes, cooking, preserving fruit, or washing and ironing. Her meals were the boast of her family.

But the children were in the way, even in the large kitchen. "Don't disturb mother when she's cooking," was a frequent injunction. When the children had gone to bed, the father and the mother sat in the "den," cosy enough in the evening with its drawn curtains and lighted fire.

"I must have a sewing room that is large and sunny," said another woman, "because I do all my own sewing, and I spend most of my time there. The children can play in the corner."

Her children were well dressed, and the mending was promptly done. If the sewing room was the center of the household, no one offered complaint or criticism.

"We have a living room that is the largest, sunniest room in the house," said still another woman, "so we all love to be there. It is the place where we live. I want the pictures and books and flowers to be the background that the children will remember. That room is the heart of the home."

It was. The kitchen, the sewing room, the husband's den, all were accessories and contributed in a measure to the health and happiness of the household, but they were not ends in themselves.

"We shall be sure to gather in the pleasantest room," the mother reasoned, "and the home that keeps the best balance lays only enough stress on the kitchen to provide wholesome food, only enough in the bath-room to attain cleanliness, only enough on the sewing room to furnish the things that must be made at home. But the living room, with its fireplace, its books, its lights, and its easy-chair, holds the best of the home life."—Ex.

FALL DAYS.

With the keen hint of frosty days to come, the autumn market stalls are in a blaze of real glory with mother nature's offering of fruits and vegetables. Fresh country sausage is beginning to come in and the new buckwheat looms big in the offering. Plan to purchase a basket of apples this week. Can a few jars of apple sauce and then let the family have a real treat. This is the time to think about laying in a few bushels of potatoes for winter use.

Turnips, Brussels sprouts, onions, Swiss chard, spinach and cauliflower are to be found in the market during the fall, and are rich in the lime, iron and other needed mineral salts or vitamins. These should be included in our daily diet to keep us physically fit.

A diet of just bread, meat and potatoes and gravy during the fall and winter will make Jack a duff boy, indeed, and will bring a host of ills that are peculiar to this season.

Even though the fresh vegetables are an additional and material increase in the cost of the table budget, now, for safety sake, rather economize on something else and have an abundance of them daily, particularly during the fall.

Serve creamed vegetables for the noon luncheon for the children during the week. They are healthful and satisfying.

CONVERTING THE FLOTSAM.

Dr. Carroll D. Wright, formerly Commissioner of Labor for the United States, has said:

"The conspicuous and decided effect of kindergartens in preventing the inception of criminal tendencies in children exposed by their homes, or neglect, to such tendencies, proves most conclusively that the kindergarten effects an immense pecuniary saving to the community, not only in diminishing expenditures otherwise necessary for police and protective measures, but in rendering what would otherwise be a criminal population a part of a useful, law-abiding, self-supporting membership of the State.

CONTROLLING CHILDREN.

BY MARGARET WRIGHT NORTH.

The adage that a man is not fit to command others until he can command himself is never more true than in the training of children. A mother who has acquired self-control has more than half won the struggle of controlling her children.

In the course of a conversation the other day, a mother remarked to me, "I don't see why Charles has to pick just the time when I am busiest to be the most exasperating." What a picture that gave me of that mother!

I could see her in the afternoon sitting quietly with her mending basket, answering Charles' interminable questions with tact and patience, entering into his "pretends," and making the child feel that his mother was a real pal and playmate.

Then I could see her a little while later, bustling about the kitchen getting supper, Charles still asking questions. After a few half-hearted replies, mother turns on Charles with an impatient, "Charles, if you don't stop asking me questions, I'll send you to bed; you drive me wild." There is a moment of silence and then another question. "What did I tell you? Now not another word." Another moment and then a hesitant, "Say, mother?" "Charles! Go right upstairs, take your clothes off and go to bed."

Now where was the fault? Was Charles being "most exasperating," or was it just that mother was not in the mood and lost her patience?

That mother was expecting too much of her child. She wanted him to appreciate the strain that getting supper put upon her mind, body and nerves. Since cooking was outside his experience, he could not put himself in her position. Even if she had quietly told him that she could not play with him any more, giving the reason, he would not have been able to change his play without her help.

How easy it would have been, when she could not work with his chatter going on, to have suggested that he go to the front window and count the number of white horses going by while she was getting supper; and tell how many windows he could see in the houses across the street; or that he show her how nice a house he could build with his blocks.

Because the mother expected the child to have the self-control which she herself lacked, displeasure and resentment replaced the sympathetic friendliness of the afternoon, and Charles was unjustly punished.

Let us remember that children are very much like rivers, it is impossible to stop them, but comparatively easy to change their course.—Ex.

WIT AND WISDOM

A Timely Caution.—A matron of great beauty was calling one day on a friend, accompanied by her ten-year-old daughter, who promised to be as handsome as her mother.

They were shown into a room where the friend had been receiving a milliner and many hats were scattered about. During the conversation the ten-year-old amused herself by trying these on. She was particularly pleased by the effect of the last one. Turning to her mother, she said:

"Mother, I look just like you now, don't I?"

"Hush!" cautioned the mother with uplifted finger. "Don't be vain, dear."

A Psychic Problem.—Two powerful colored stevedores, who had had some sort of falling out, were engaged in unloading a vessel at a St. Louis dock. Uncomplimentary remarks and warnings of intended violence were exchanged whenever the two passed each other with their trucks.

"You jest keep on pesticator' around wid me," declared one of the men, "an' you is gwine be able to settle a mighty big question for de sciumtific folks!"

"What question dat?" asked the other.

"Kin de dead speak!"

"I say, man, you're badly smashed up, ain't you? Anybody with you?"

"Yes, the chap who was trying to sell me this used car."

OUR EXCHANGES

GO YE.

There are more unsaved people in the world than the ministry can possibly reach. Every man should feel that it is his business to go into the highway and hedges and bring men to accept the faith that has saved him. When a man tells of his love it grows from much to more.—Western Christian Advocate.

WORTH REMEMBERING.

The saloon keeper can not make a sot unless some fine young man furnishes the raw material.—Epworth Herald.

WHAT NEXT?

Vacations over, what next? Shall pews continue to be vacated, or be well filled? Would it not be a good plan to revive the old custom of getting children, boys and girls, to help fill the pews? Some one speaks of fall housecleaning for churches and suggests the removal of old chairs, old carpets, wornout hymnbooks and the like. How would it be to do a little housecleaning along spiritual lines and remove indifference, worldliness and all forms of entertainment that do not become the sanctity of the Lord's House and the Lord's work?—Lutheran.

PERSONAL LIBERTY AND LAW.

If one class decides that it does not like a law, and therefore flaunts it, and another treats another law in the same manner it is apparent that we should soon reach a condition when this nation would cease to be a government by law. Personal liberty always was subordinate to law since there has been law and always will be so long as there is law. We seek to punish the bandit for exercising a "personal liberty" in plying his trade because it is recognized that there is no such right. Neither is there a right to do anything else which is forbidden in effect by the punishments fixed for the violation.—Gazette-Times.

A GREAT STATESMAN.

Senator Knox's brilliant mind and piercing perception never shone to greater advantage than in dealing with the larger relationships of this country with the world. At this juncture of our national and international affairs, with so much still hanging in the balance, his death is a very great loss.—New York Herald.

RESPECT FOR LAW.

The Kansas mine fight has experienced a change of aspect. Whenever violation of a contract between employers and workers is penalized—no matter which side is at fault—the welfare of both capital and labor has been advanced.—St. Louis Times.

FINANCIAL LEADERSHIP.

The logical leader of the church is the pastor. In evangelism, in organization, in indoctrination, he sets the pace. Yet convention has tended to make impossible the pastor's vigorous leadership in financial matters. So long as it has to do with the increase of his personal fortune, the preacher undertakes to be a financial leader at his very great peril. But in leading his church to the acceptance and practice of the doctrine of stewardship, with all that it implies, the preacher is under as much obligation as to teach any other of the fundamental doctrines of the Scriptures.—Home and Foreign Fields.

FRENCH VIEWS.

While for France's sake we regret that the United States did not see its way to ratify the defense compact of the Rhine, we understand that American interests are sufficiently remote from our own to justify this attitude.—Echo de Paris.

It is said that America by this treaty refuses to recognize the new frontiers of Europe. That is inexact. She refuses to assume any obligation for these frontiers, which is at least frank.—Paris Nation.

A WORD FOR OUR TIMES.

War has been reduced to a tragic absurdity. The next great war would mean that every man, woman, and child, and every resource of the country to the last halfpenny, the last piece of material, and the last ounce of effort, would be engaged from the first moment. And nobody could win—at least if the losers were extinguished the winners would be bankrupt and dying. If we are to assume that it is necessary to prepare for war on this scale, every great country will accept bankruptcy in the present in order to avoid the danger of ruin on some future occasion.—London Spectator.

A PESSIMISTIC OPINION.

The orator said: "This 'ere government is like the hostrich rushin' blindly forward with 'is 'ead 'idden in the sand."—Punch, London.

THE TREATY WITH GERMANY.

A spirit of real peace undoubtedly existed on the part of America during the negotiations just concluded. America has particularly promised us fair treatment in the matter of German property, and the more uprightly the German republic on its part endeavors to fulfill the obligations assumed by it, the more surely can it count on cashing in this promise of justice by the American people.—Deutsche Tageszeitung.

STRAINED MUSIC.

The organist at Gloucester Cathedral declares that the present vogue of wearing hair over the ears is responsible for a lot of poor singing. His opinion is open to criticism, but it is generally admitted that it would be better if some singers wore the hair over their mouths instead.—London Evening.

DEMOCRACY.

Our American democracy is no exception for other democracies. It can not survive, much less thrive, unless law and order burn with steady flame.—World's Work.

THE CHURCH PAPER AND THE HOME.

A reason which makes a high-class religious paper a desideratum for all our homes is the need of something to counteract the materializing and often demoralizing reading matter so aggressively thrust upon the attention of the young, and to interest them in the things that are worth while. When we see the floods of trashy, worthless and worse than worthless periodicals of one kind or another with which some of our homes are inundated, we realize how great is the need for such a paper to interpret the great religious, social and political movements of the day from a Christian point of view, as well as to furnish wholesome reading matter for all members of the family— young and old.—Presbyterian Witness.

THE OLD ORDER CHANGETH NOT.

We are being told that we must adapt Christianity to the changing order. But in what, we may ask, is the order changing? Essential, genuine Christianity is unchanged and unchangeable. World conditions change on the surface. Sin remains, and is indissolubly related to death as cause to effect. To this deep tragic, unchanging order, Christianity is everywhere and always adapted.

All of these conditions are recognized and provided for in the vicarious sufferings and atoning death of Christ. There is no other remedy for sin. There is no other hope for sinful, perishing men. There is salvation in no other name. There is no call to adapt Christianity to the changing order.—Word and Way.

PATIENCE.

One of the great curses of modern life is impatience. People see others making money rapidly and they want to get the same proportion of wealth and get it quickly. It ought to be remembered that money is far from being the best prize of life. But even that prize is more certain to be possession of those who are industrious and honest and patient.—United Presbyterian.

GREAT ISSUES.

An issue is something that walks right down the middle of the road, while all the politicians are anxiously hiding out in the tall timbers observing the direction it takes.—Columbia Record.

BLACKBURN Trains Many Missionaries.

One in seven of all the students enrolled at Blackburn College this year is preparing for some form of missionary service. Preaching, medical missions, nursing, teaching better agriculture in foreign lands, these and other forms of service represent the fields into which these young people are planning to go.

Probably no other college has a larger percentage. Blackburn will be training many more as more friends share in this wonderful work. Let me tell you about it. Address President Wm. M. Hudson, Carlinville, Ill.

Mormonism Rapidly Spreading

Do you know that there are more Mormons in America west of the Dakotas, Nebraska, Kansas and Texas than there are Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Baptists combined? This statement is borne out by the last United States Religious Census.

Do you know that the Mormon Church has more missionaries at work than any Protestant Foreign Mission Board in the world? The Mormon Church pays its missionaries neither salary nor expenses, but they work with a loyalty and perseverance worthy of a better faith. Back of this Church stands the best and most efficient organization in the world.

We shall never crush this Mormon Church. We must try to lead it to our Christ. To gain this end no one force is so hopeful as is Westminster College of Salt Lake City. Higher Christian education has changed the Mormon Church and it will change it yet more profoundly if the great Church will give Westminster the help she needs. For information address President H. W. Reherd, D.D., Westminster College, Salt Lake City, Utah.

EDITORIALS

THE BIBLE AND PUBLIC SAFETY.

There are too many matters in which a vicious and dangerous minority assumes the power to control in this country, and in which it does, in fact, exert this control. It is one of the theories of a republic, such as ours, that the majority rules. In a great many cases it does no such thing, but permits the minority to rule, even when it is seen that the minority is exerting an influence which is injurious to public welfare, and morally wrong.

It is assumed, superficially and harmfully, too often, that the minority has rights which the majority must not trample upon, it being assumed that, in certain cases, majority rule is a trampling upon the rights of the minority. It is not their "rights" that are trampled upon, but their preferences, or wishes, or tastes, in cases where the majority rules and the minority does not like to be ruled. But this takes place every time a President of the United States is elected, or a Governor of one of the states. But the majority does not yield its judgment, which has been intelligently and constitutionally expressed, and permit the whim of the minority to place its candidate in office.

But the Bible is kept out of the public schools, in some of the states, and in some of the cities and communities, in supposed deference to the rights or the whims of a minority of the people. It has been decided by courts in some of the states that the Bible is a "sectarian book," because certain elements, atheistic, or autocratic, or irreligious, insist that they do not wish it used. But it is not proved to be "sectarian" because some are prejudiced or bitter against it. It is not a sectarian book, but a universal book, essential to the life of our republic, and in line with the very Constitution of the United States, and the Declaration of Independence, which it was the most important factor in suggesting and securing.

Our nation can exist only as its people have the proper character, and this character can be attained and maintained only as the people are acquainted with the truths and teachings of the Bible. From this Bible come the only sufficient teachings as to God and truth and justice and law and obedience and order and human welfare. Destroy the knowledge of these great truths and human character becomes depraved and unworthy. The attacks of Bolsheviks and I. W. W. organizations are not only against organized society, but against all religion which makes social order possible.

There is today a world-wide attack by Bolshevik and kindred influences against all law and order, social, religious and governmental, and those who desire society and government to stand should beware how they lend aid to these red influences in their assaults on religion and the church, for all these stand or fall together.

If we would have a citizenship in our land that will continue to stand for law and order, we must see that it is instructed in the principles of true religion, as presented in the truths of the Bible. The Declaration of Independence "appeals to the Supreme Judge of the World," but people can know of this Supreme Judge only as they know what is taught about him in the Bible. The "laws of Nature and of Nature's God" are known only as we read of the revelation of his laws as they are found in the Bible. To keep this Bible away from the children at the very time when they are being fitted by their school life for their life and work as citizens, is a course which is most fatal to good hopes and prospects for the future strength and welfare of the people.

Deep in the convictions of the great mass of our people is the belief that we should know about God and that we should do his will and keep his laws. This was the underlying conviction of the men who laid the foundation of our nation, and of the great majority of all those who have been advanced to places of authority. We must train the children of the nation to know God and his laws, even if a minority of anarchists and absolutists inveigh against it. We can not keep from making and enforcing health measures at the cry of an ignorant or prejudiced minority.

The Synod of the State of Washington is instituting measures, to be participated in by patriotic, and intelligent, and religious masses of the people of all the states, to test before the United States Supreme Court whether the Bible can be forced out of the public schools by unpatriotic influences, or, in other words, whether the minority, of the dangerous elements, shall rule in place of the majority.

WAR MUST STOP OR THE WORLD WILL PERISH.

God did not create man, and set him in countries and nations, intending that he should devote his time and strength and income to the wastefulness and woe of war. The divine instruction to our first parents was to dress and keep the garden, to till the earth, to keep the paradise of the world. Murder and war came in as manifestations and results of sin. But the divine purpose and direction to our human race was that a peaceful and productive life should be maintained.

Today we are almost a bankrupt world. We have been passing through a war that cost approximately $348,000,000,000 in property and production, and that led to the death of 12,000,000 of the sturdiest and strongest men of the race. Instead of learning the lesson of the uselessness and destructiveness of war, and agreeing mutually to quit this awful business and try to recover from the fearful losses, there is an unheard of preparation for other wars, or for what is called self-defense. Great Britain that in 1912 made army and navy appropriations of $351,044,000, has made $1,121,318,000 for 1921. Japan has advanced from $93,576,000 in 1912, to $282,357,000 in 1921. Our United States, in the same time, has advanced from $244,177,000 to $1,422,752,000, and is contemplating expenditures that amount to $5,000,000 for every day in the year 1922. It is a fact that with the tremendous debts produced by the war, and hanging over the nations, such additional and contemplated expenses are simply suicidal.

If it were left to the people of the nations, the fathers and mothers, the brothers and sisters, the wives and daughters, wars would cease. As an actual fact, there is no more sense nor need for the nations to fight and use up all the incomes of the people in war, than there would be in every family in a city waging war upon all the neighboring families and keeping up the fight until all lives and property had disappeared. If left to the judgment and common-sense of common people, a way for the settlement of international difficulties would be as practicable and easy as the maintenance of peace among the families of a city.

General Pershing says: "It is time for an awakening among enlightened peoples to the end that the leading powers may reach some rational agreement which would not only relieve the world of this terrible financial load, but which in itself would be a long step toward the prevention of war. If other nations have the same attitude, it seems unreasonable not to believe that all will be willing to prove it by consenting to limit armaments. Unless some such move be made, we may well ask ourselves whether civilization does not really reach a point where it begins to destroy itself and whether we are thus doomed to go headlong down through destructive war and darkness to barbarism."

General Tasker H. Bliss says: "Why should not the United States take the lead in the definite proposal and demand for a reasonable limitation of armaments? Who can do it better than we?"

Herbert Hoover says: "There is no more conceivable folly than this continual riot of expenditure on battleships at a time when great masses of humanity are dying of starvation."

Senator Hitchcock says: "The question of disarming the nations was formerly a moral or ethical one, but it is now economic and is rapidly becoming a governmental necessity. It is the only way to prevent bankruptcy."

We could fill the paper with such expressions from good men of high rank in all the nations. Something definite must be done soon, and done at the Conference which has been called for considering disarmament at Washington on Nov. 11th. The people of this country must insist and demand that a sound business course be taken, in accordance with Christian principles. Let there be much earnest expression made on the matter from every pulpit and forum and home of the land, and let there be united, daily, incessant prayer for the blessing of God.

FORCED TO SUSPEND.

A Canadian paper announces that it must suspend publication. It says: "During the past four years the cost of production has increased from 200 to 300 per cent, while the income is practically the same. This has caused the suspension or amalgamation of over 200 newspapers in Canada."

Looking more closely at the reasons for this suspension, as also for that of 4,000 newspapers in the United States, the editor figures out that in 1907 wages were at 100. In 1914, they had advanced to 178, and in 1921, to 393. Newsprint from 100 jumped to 177 in 1914, and to 623 in 1921. Newspaper postage was 147 in 1914, and 337 in 1921. Ink was 100 in 1907, 200 in 1914 and later 331.

OHIO PRESBYTERIAN HOME.

For a long time there has been the desire for a Home for aged and homeless Presbyterians in Ohio. This has been often discussed. We have often been asked whether we have such a home and have always been compelled, sadly, to admit that we have none. The Presbytery of Dayton recently took action in the matter, and appointed a committee to see what could be done, in connection with the other presbyteries of the synod. All the presbyteries agreed that such a home is imperatively needed, and the synod, at its meeting in Cambridge in October, took action founding such an institution.

An offer, most opportunely, has been made of property near Sidney which is finely adapted for such a home and which makes it possible at a very early date. The offer was made by Moses Russell and two maiden sisters, Elizabeth and Martha, of Sidney, and comprises 295 acres located on the Dixie Highway, three miles west of Sidney. It has on it the farmhouse which has been the Russell home, and the land has been in the possession of the family for three generations of Presbyterian elders. One farm of eighty acres was given by Mr. Russell, to be used for a children's home, as a memorial to the little daughter of Rev. William Blake Love, of the Sidney Church, who was killed by an automobile in May. Condition of the gift was that the buildings be started not later than March, 1923. One home will be erected for children and one for aged people.

A committee of business men from Sidney promised to donate $10,000 toward buildings, etc., providing the synod raised $90,000 for the same purpose, outside of Shelby county.

The offers of the Russells and of Sidney business men were unanimously accepted by the synod.

Trustees were elected for the Memorial Home as follows: Rev. W. Blake Love, Rev. E. H. Montgomery, Rev. D. L. Myers; and Laymen M. E. Williams, E. B. Proctor, Charles S. Johnston, D. W. Frackelton, Charles H. Parsons and Standish Meacham.

The name is to be "The Presbyterian Home for Aged and Infirm, In Memory of the Moses and Mary Russell Heirs," and "The Dorothy Love Memorial Presbyterian Home for Children." Several legacies have already been announced to come to this home on the death of various persons.

We are sure that this home will become one of the greatly prized and loved institutions of our Presbyterian Church of Ohio.

RAILROAD STRIKE AVERTED.

It is a matter for general rejoicing that the menace of the railroad strike which has been hanging over the country has been removed, and that the strike will not occur. The nation could not have experienced such a condition without a great shock to all classes, and there would have been immeasurable suffering. The interruption to life and business would have set back the prospects for the speedy recovery of prosperity, and confusion and disaster would have been faced at every turn. On no class of persons would the injury have fallen more heavily than upon the very employes who have been contemplating the step, and it is a triumph of good sense and proper prudence, for the exercise of which all may be thankful to God, for his good providence.

A SCANDAL?

A writer in Christian Work, in discussing church union, and particularly the Lambeth Appeal, says: "There is a universal admission of the scandal of the present disunion."

We respectfully dissent. There is no universal admission that the separate organizations of Presbyterians, Methodists, Episcopalians, etc., is a scandal.

Much is made of the brotherly tone of the Lambeth proposals, but the proposals themselves are no more brotherly than those of ten and twenty years ago. They insist on the historic episcopate and the reordination of ministers of other churches. It is no scandal that Methodists and Presbyterians believe their ministers as truly ordained and their sacraments as valid as those of the Episcopal church.

It is no scandal that people who accept God's Word as an inspired rule of faith and hope, and interpret it, and affirm a system of doctrine, should maintain their own denominational organization.

It was no scandal that Scottish ministers and churches withdrew from the established church, giving up salaries and buildings, and organized the Free Church. Some church divisions may be unwise and their promoters over positive and unwise, but men of positive convictions can not always agree, even in the interpretation of Scripture, and their determination to worship and organize separate from others is no scandal.

Great harm is done to the cause of Christian unity by those who belittle conscientious convictions and think and speak harshly of others who do not agree with them as to universal church union. There are advocates of such union who magnify the spirit of disunion and strife in their habitual severity with those who, through conscientious convictions or over-conscientiousness or ignorance can not agree with them.

Pleas for help continue to come from the Near East Relief, the Ohio division of which is located in Schofield Building, Cleveland. The food conditions in Armenia have never been so bad as they are now. Hostile forces occupied the country until it was too late to cultivate the fields. When they left they carried off all surplus food and almost all live stock. The Armenian people are helpless unless they have assistance. America is their only hope.

There are movies and movies. Some are good and clean and educational, and some are unclean and demoralizing. Petitions are in circulation in many states asking the United States Senate and House of Representatives "to enact a law prohibiting and punishing the transportation through the United States mail, and the interstate transportation by any common carrier or by means of any other method of transportation, of any moving-picture film of any indecent, obscene or lascivious matter, thing or occurrence, and of any moving-picture film illustrating or representing stories or scenes of immorality, illicit love, infidelity in family relations, crimes and disrespect for law."

Any one who realizes the need of such a law may help to secure it by signing and inducing others to sign and send such petition to their Senators and Representatives.

General Foch has shown his greatness, for one thing, in announcing that he intends to conform himself to the prohibitory law while in this country. He is a gentleman as well as a soldier. He has fought for the preservation of civilization and he is in favor of maintaining civilization by standing up for law and order. His attitude is a rebuke to every man who chooses to be a criminal in defying the law because he does not like it.

The responsible members of the United States Senate have determined not to submit to the filibustering tactics of the evil-minded minority, who have been working to break down prohibition and prevent the passage of the anti-beer bill. They intend to pass this bill at an early date, and have secured an agreement among themselves whereby they may break down the opposition of the liquor advocates.

Those persons who are sneering at Mr. Bryan for his opposition to the essential atheism of Darwinianism, seem to forget that the Darwinian theory is only a guess, and a godless guess at that. Mr. Bryan is right in asserting that "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." He has good authority for it. Whatever processes of evolution have been at work during the ages since have been under the divine providence and direction. We have not got to the point when we can banish God from his own universe. Mr. Bryan is not so ignorant as some people seem to think. According to God's Word the fool is he who says: "There is no God."

What is known as "National Father and Son Week" comes this year Nov. 6th to 12th, and will be observed in many churches and communities, especial stress being laid upon it by the Young Men's Christian Associations. It is well to do this in the hope of bringing many of the boys and young men, through the influence of their fathers, into closer relationship with the church. In many churches banquets will be held with the thought of reaching both fathers and sons with the grace and help of Christ.

Election day is at hand. Of course it is a comparatively unimportant election, but no occasion is unimportant that calls for the discharge of the duties of good citizenship and true patriotism. On just such elections as this evil forces try to get in their work when they think that few are watching them.

The eleven theological seminaries of our Presbyterian Church show an increase of ninety-one in attendance this fall as compared with last year, with the expectation of others coming in later in the season. This is encouraging and gives ground for believing that the movement has set in for a considerable increase in the number of young men preparing for the ministry.

The Week of Prayer for Young Men comes this year Nov. 13-19, and all Christian people are urged to unite in earnest prayer to God for the salvation and preservation of the young men, that they may be on the side of the Lord and his Church. This will be observed by all Young Men's Christian Associations and they ask all Christian people to join with them in these petitions.

AT SIMON'S HOUSE.

(Matt. 26: 7-14.)

BY HELEN PURSELL-ROADS.

Junc-pulsed and argent-sandaed, garnered she

From fair Judaeen gardenside and grove,
The thyme of faith, the mystic nard of love,

The rose of joy, the bay of loyalty,
Sweet spirit dreams from youth's pomegranate tree,

Her heart the vase, a priceless treasure-trove;

Then brought her gift, soft winged as temple dove,

Unto the altar of the Pharisee
Whose priests disdained her, spirit-blind always,

While she, with eyes pain-smitten, stood alone,

Her wreck of days to wastes of Paran strown.

Then came a shining Guest to Bethany—
She saw, and brake her heart to him; a ray

Of deathless glory leaped athwart the sky!

BIBLE TRUTHS THAT HAVE HELPED ME.

BY REV. JOHN Y. EWART, D.D.

The Bible is a magazine of power. It is an arsenal of ammunition. It is a storehouse of food. It is a light in the darkness. It is a comfort in every kind of distress and need.

I want to put down here some of the ways in which the truths of the Word have helped me, and thousands of others who have the same needs as I have.

First, it is an unspeakable help to know that the great God who made the heavens and the earth, the Omnipotent One, is interested in me as an individual. He is benevolently interested in all my affairs. Jesus said to his disciples:

"The very hairs of your head are all numbered" (Matt. 10: 30).

What intimate knowledge, what detailed supervision and tender, personal interest that indicates.

And what a world of comfort this fact opens up! For he who is interested in us permits us to become acquainted with him, to love him, to carry to him the knowledge of our needs, to commune with him in prayer and praise, confess to him our sins, to beseech him for help in every emergency of our lives. Thus all the resources of high heaven are put at the service of the humblest disciple. For "he is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think" (Eph. 3: 20).

Second: Thus is revealed to us the great God as a magazine of power, as well as of love. There is no limit to his strength. He is the infinitely mighty One. There is absolutely nothing that he can not accomplish for the good of those who trust him. Listen to the prophet Isaiah: looking up at night into the heavens, spangled with stars, he exclaims:

"Lift up your eyes on high, and behold who hath created these things; that bringeth out their host by number; he calleth them all by names in the greatness of his might, for that he is strong in power; not one faileth" (Isa. 40: 26).

Why then should any soul on earth feel that the great God is indifferent to his needs or lacks sympathy with him? Listen:

"He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might he increaseth strength. Even the youth shall faint and be weary and the young men shall utterly fall; but they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run and not be weary; and they shall walk and not faint" (Isa. 40: 29-31).

I visit many churches that seem to have forgotten these words of authority, grace and power; for they are weak and discouraged today. Concerning these churches we might ask the question the Psalmist asks:

"Why hast thou then broken down her hedges, so that all they that pass by the way do pluck her? The boar out of the wood doth waste it, and the wild beast doth devour it. Return, we beseech thee, O Lord of hosts: look down from heaven and behold and visit this vine; and the vineyard which thy right hand hath planted, and the branch which thou madest strong for thyself. It is burned with fire, it is cut down: they perish at the rebuke of thy countenance" (Psa. 80: 12-16).

Permit a suggestion. Let the people in these churches, though few in number, have a gathering for prayer. Exercise faith in the Divine Shepherd of the sheep who went out into the wilderness of this world, searching for the lost individual and the lost church. Let them lay hold of the promise:

"Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there I am in the midst of them," and

"If two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of my Father which is in heaven" (Matt. 18: 19, 20).

"Nothing shall be impossible to you," said Christ to his disciples at one time when they were face to face with an unusually hard task. "Why could not we accomplish this?" they asked him. "Because of your unbelief. For verily I say unto you, If you have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence to yonder place, and it shall remove; and nothing shall be impossible unto you" (Matt. 17: 14-20). But the Master added: "However, this kind goeth not out but by prayer and fasting."

To accomplish the revival of some churches that have long been pastorless, or whose pastors have neglected them by being "busy here and there," it takes unusual faith, persistence and prayer. But in the end, under God, real success will crown the faithful efforts of the few. For "will not God avenge the wrongs of his own people who cry aloud to him day and night, although he seems slow in taking action in their behalf? Yes, he will soon avenge their wrongs. Yet when the Son of Man comes: will he find faith on earth." (Luke 18: 7, 8, "The New Testament in Modern Speech".)

Let the following true incident be an encouragement to all of us not to give up interest in the unsaved soul or the back-slidden church:

A Sabbath-school teacher, because no conversions had occurred in her class of sixteen young men, resigned, thinking herself to blame or unfitted for the great work. Seeing the unflagging interest of her pupils, neither superintendent nor pastor would consent to it. In her anxiety she prayed more earnestly for the Holy Spirit's help.

One day while thus pleading she was so strongly moved to go and see a certain one of her pupils at his home, that she at once yielded, and in that home parlor she so told her anxiety that, when prayer was suggested, the pupil kneeled with her and soon yielded to Christ, and was most happily converted. Thus encouraged, she visited another and another in turn, as opportunity opened, till the whole sixteen were converted and added to the church.

As vacancies occurred in her class, others joined, who were often converted. These pupils passing out into the business world were urged by her to write annually a letter as to their Christian life, till finally she was receiving, as years rolled on, over two hundred letters from missionaries, lawyers, merchants, mechanics, farmers, physicians and others from various parts of the world, still busy in pulpit, in Sabbath school or other church work.

Colorado Springs, Col.

REV. R. M. MATEER, D.D.

BY REV. W. M. HAYES, D.D.

In the release on Sept. 5th, 1921, of Robert M. Mateer, the Shantung Presbyterian Mission and Church have lost one who, while a leader in all its activities, was pre-eminently so in the organization and extension of its evangelistic work, recognized by Chinese and foreigners alike throughout Central and Southern Shantung, as the central figure in plans for the development of the church.

Dr. Mateer was born near Gettysburg, Pa., Feb. 8, 1853, and early manifested, in a way peculiarly his own, the strong, resolute, and efficient traits which characterized other members of the family. The first years of his college course were spent at Monmouth, Illinois, a school for which he always cherished a warm regard. The last two years were spent in Princeton University, from which he graduated in 1878. Entering Princeton Theological Seminary in the autumn of the same year, he graduated in May, 1881. While yet in the Seminary he had given evidence of his evangelistic and organizing abilities; the former in the evangelistic campaign which, in company with his classmates, J. H. Laughlin and L. D. Wishard, he carried on both in New England and in the vicinity of Princeton; the latter as leader in the organization of the Inter-Seminary Foreign Mission Convention which for a number of years was a marked agency in arousing missionary interest, throughout the theological schools in America.

In the autumn of 1881, in company with Rev. and Mrs. J. H. Laughlin and Dr. and Mrs. Horace Smith, he sailed for China with the intention of opening a new station in the interior of Shantung. The first sixteen months were mainly spent at Tengchow in language study and in acquainting himself with the intricacies of mission finance of former times. During these months he took a long itinerating tour with Dr. Corbett at which time Weihsien was definitely decided on for the location of the new station and land secured for that purpose. Early in the spring of 1883, he and Mrs. Mateer, formerly Miss Sadie Archibald, removed to Weihsien, living in a small Chinese house in a little village near the present compound. Mr. and Mrs. Laughlin came later, the former engaging in evangelistic work along with Dr. Nevius, so the burden of establishing the new station fell on Dr. Mateer. Night after night, being unable to secure a trusty watchman, he slept beside his lumber to prevent it being stolen; walls put up during the day were pushed down before morning so as to prolong employment for the workmen. Finally an efficient overseer offered his services, the house was finished, and Dr. Mateer at once began work in the two hundred towns and villages in the adjacent territory, walking with his faithful assistant, Mr. Hing Ta Ming, from place to place and eating whatever the inns might afford. Even then his mind was not free from anxiety, for the city at that time was intensely hostile and Mrs. Mateer narrowly escaped death from a shot fired at night through her bedroom window.

The next summer little Jean was so weakened by long illness that it was necessary to take her to Tengchow, a five days journey overland. Fearing that she would not reach the coast alive; they carried a little coffin along with them. Dr. Mateer returning shortly after arrival to his field. The next April his able and devoted wife was called to the heavenly home. After taking little Jean, now Mrs. William Beaman of Seattle, to her aunt in Tengchow, he returned, though in ill-health, to his lonely home, where he labored faithfully until the mission seeing that the trials through which he had passed were beginning to tell seriously on his health, insisted much against his will on a furlough to the homeland. The year spent in America, during which he labored earnestly to secure recruits for opening the new stations of Tsinichow and Ichowfu, doubtless prolonged his life, though he never fully recovered from the strain of those first five years in China. While all knew that they were years of trial, yet probably few of us realize the stress of his anxieties and so failed to give him that sympathy in his deep loneliness which we should have done.

In 1891 Dr. Mateer found another able, devoted, and efficient helpmeet in Dr. Madge Dickson, who not only took active part in his work, but also strengthened him by her counsel and sympathy during the remaining years of his life, though sorrow again, three times in succession entered the home, taking away each of the three children.

Of the varied and eminently successful labors of Dr. Mateer, it is impossible to do more than to indicate briefly the apparently more important factors, such as the founding of the Boys' High School at Weihsien; his efficient aid in securing the funds for the Girls' High School and the opening of the same, together with his active interest in promoting other forms of educational work for women and girls of this large field; his energy and zeal in devising plans for the support of the Chinese pastorate, this vital matter being one to which he always gave time and thought; the foundings of numerous churches and his continual efforts to secure pastors for them; his untiring efforts toward securing a properly educated, competent Chinese ministry, spending his own money freely in order to accomplish this end; the establishment, in memory of his brother, Dr. C. W. Mateer, through funds obtained from his brother's estate and elsewhere, of the Mateer Memorial Institute at Tenghsien, a school which is already affecting the church life of Southern Shantung and which gives promise of further development in the near future; and the establishment of the Cities Evangelization Project which the 1921 report of the Shantung Mission refers to as "born of the far sighted vision of our beloved fellow-worker, Rev. Robert M. Mateer, D.D., where some of the ablest Chinese in our midst, the finest product of our education, secular and religious, have been put in charge of extensive educational and evangelistic work, and given a free hand in its development." While the idea of co-operative committees, consisting equally of Chinese and foreigners, in each of our stations, did not originate with him, yet it was due to his efforts that the same became a regular feature of our Mission policy. Nor were his activities limited to the work on the field; in company with his friend and classmate, Rev. Dr. John A. Marquis, he was active in promoting the District Secretaryship of the Foreign Board at home. All honor to our able, indefatigable worker, who though at times discouraged by opposition, never gave up, because, as he said to the writer shortly before his last illness: "The Lord has never failed me yet." He put trust in him rather than in men, and the Lord honored the trust.

Dr. Mateer was particularly loved and trusted by the Chinese. They were thoroughly convinced that in whatever he did, he sought only their highest interests. He trusted them and wished to see them take places of responsibility unhampered by extraneous restrictions. As a result, they believed in him, and, while they might not agree with him in all details, yet they knew that he regarded these as of but small moment, so long as the final objective was reached and the work went forward in a healthy, natural way. Their love for him was shown when the twelve or thirteen pastors, who reached Weihsien in time for the funeral, each one insisted on helping to carry the casket to the cemetery and in lowering it to its final resting place; while their addresses and prayers showed their feeling, love, and appreciation, such as they themselves said, sons might show to a father. Between him and them, lines east and west were obliterated and all were simply servants of one Master. Though honored by Monmouth with the title which he held, yet his highest honor is the regard in which he is held by our large body of Chinese pastors and church-workers, an honor which any one might covet.

He was a man who kept in touch with God through his well-worn Bible and prayer. As to the former, he accepted both the Bible of Jesus and the New Testament as God's revelation of himself and the Way of Life. No doubts disturbed his faith in it or its teachings. As to prayer, he had great faith in the personal presence of his Master and in his being a very present aid at all times. His habit of seeking divine guidance and his willingness to abide by it had much to do with his resolute firmness in carrying out what he believed should be done. As is not infrequently the case with men of his type, he was at times more fortiter in re than suaviter in modo, but his heart was always in the right place and he never harbored resentment.

When first laid aside from active work in February, 1920, it was a hard struggle to realize that his work was done, but when he did realize it, he was eager to go. Instead of dreading death, he yearned for release, and the burden of his heart was "to go up yonder." "Don't let any one detain me." Faithful above all things to his calling as a missionary, he was also, to the few who really knew him, a true friend whose friendship never failed at the critical moment; whose counsel came from the heart, unsullied by any ulterior motive; whose consistent love was not to be shaken by the dislikes of others nor by considerations of mere policy. True himself to his Master, his vocation, and his friends, he could brook no equivocation in others; nothing that was not clear and above board. Such a character has left a deep impression on the church which he served so faithfully the last forty years, and his memory will be especially cherished by those of whom it is a high honor to be held in remembrance, the people for whom he labored. The memory of the righteousness is blessed, and the name of Robert M. Mateer stands high among the pioneers who laid the foundations of the church in Shantung.

FROM THE WESTERN OFFICE.

BY REV. B. P. FULLERTON, D.D.

In a letter the other day, one of our superintendents wrote, saying that he was having trouble to get men to be prompt in their correspondence, but, said he, in a note of despair, "I can not make them over." Why men accept responsibility, and then treat it lightly, is more than I can understand. Just now there comes to this desk a wire from another superintendent, saying that a certain home missionary is in great distress, because he has not received his money from the Board, and the reason he has not received it is that the chairman of the Presbyterial Home Mission committee has not notified this office that this missionary is on his field, and when he went to it. So the Board is censured because of the failure of a committeeman to do his duty promptly, and a missionary and his family are in need because he failed.

I wonder what can be done, with men to whom letters go asking that such and such things be done, and who persistently delay their reply? I wish that this note might secure a more prompt response to letters that go from this office. I hear the complaint, wherever I go, that men do not write promptly, in reply to letters sent them. I wish something could be done to move these dilatory men.

I had the pleasure of meeting with the Synod of Arkansas on October 18. I met with this synod in the same church in 1906 on my first official visit and great changes have occurred since then. The synod has done a splendid piece of work. The men are forward looking and anxious to do more than they are now doing for the kingdom.

It was the general consensus that what is most needed now in the synod is more evangelism. Dr. Lewis, who has been working in the synod for the past few months, has done a good work, and women are needed to husband the work which he has done and make it more effective, in permanently building up the kingdom. All agree that evangelism is the great need of the hour. Some think the pastor should be his own evangelist, while others think they should have outside help. Great gains have been made in almost every direction in the synod in Home Mission work, and plans were laid for greater development.

The synod heard the pastors from Little Rock and Hot Springs with interest, telling of the work that had been done and what ought to be done. Little Rock is fast getting the ear of the people and is doing a really great piece of work, and if we were able now to do what those in charge want us to do, I feel sure that in a very short time we would have a church in that city of which we would be justly proud, although a short time ago some people thought we had no business there whatever. The present pastor has been at Hot Springs too short a time to show what can be done there, but we are all agreed that, that is a very important place for our work if we are to do our share in the state.

The synod raised the question of having the time of the meeting lengthened somewhat after the Oregon plan and it is probable that something of this kind will be the outcome.

WOOSTER LETTER.

BY WILLIAM ELLSWORTH BRYCE, D.D.

The College of Wooster opened in September with over 700 students, 119 more than at the same date last year, and the largest attendance in the history of the college. Of the large Freshman class of 315 students, 160 are men and 155 women. The number of men shows an increase of 77 per cent and the number of women an increase of 11 per cent.

One of the great problems has been the housing of the increased number of students. This was partially met by the building of an annex at the rear of Holden Hall to accommodate fifty-six girls. All the dormitories together, Holden Hall, Holden Annex, Kenarden Lodge, Hoover Cottage and Long Hall, will hold only 380 students; the remainder have been taken care of in approved private homes. Already there are growing waiting lists for 1922, 1923 and 1924. Prospective students should make their application for room and reservations a year ahead to avoid disappointment.

Perhaps the greatest problem of the college now is the financial one. When the fact is taken into consideration that a hundred or more of the students are on scholarships, and that even for those who pay their full tuition, the college puts up three dollars for every dollar paid in by the student, it will be seen that an increase of the endowment is imperative. The college deficit last year was $15,000, which added to an accumulated deficit of $30,000 brings the total deficit up to $45,000.

Relief is promised by the generous offer of the Rockefeller Fund of $250,000 on condition that the college secure $750,000 in subscriptions by next June. A campaign has been begun to secure these subscriptions under the direction of Rev. R. A. Basham, a representative of our Presbyterial Board of Education. In addition to this help, the Presbyterial Board of Education has promised the college ten per cent of all funds it receives this year for endowment purposes. Already $50,000 has been subscribed by the faculty and students and $50,000 by the city of Wooster. In addition to this, $50,000 has been subscribed by individuals, one $25,000 contribution being received and two $10,000 contributions. Subscriptions may be paid in four annual installments, as the General Education Board has given until March, 1925 for the payments of all pledges.

The cause of Wooster was given a very enthusiastic reception at the recent meeting of Synod at Cambridge, O. The synod unanimously and heartily passed a resolution commending the college and its canvass to the churches, urging them to open their pulpits to the financial representatives of the college.

The College of Wooster is one of the greatest educational assets of the Presbyterian Church. Few colleges are sending out as many leaders into distinctly Christian service. Under the able administration of its great President, Dr. Charles F. Wishart, with its large body of alumni, and the hearty support of the Church, under God's blessing it is destined to a great future of usefulness in promoting the kingdom of God in the earth.

COLUMBUS LETTER.

BY REV. WILLIAM ANDREW FERRINS, D.D.

Principal D. S. Cairns, of Scotland, is one of the late writers, one who came into international distinction on account of his interpretations of the great world war. In his "Christianity in the Modern World" he makes this observation: "We see each laborer and thinker, taking his place in the march of the same great purpose. Galileo in his turret, Newton in his garden, Kant and Niebuhr, Strauss the iconoclast and Neader the saint and scholar, the pioneer in the tropical forests, the explorer breaking into far-off silent seas, and bringing strange new lands within the reach of civilization and the Christian Gospel . . . are all in the grasp of the same great Purpose today which marshaled the vanguard of the world's life nineteen centuries ago." The Ohio State University, located in our city, has in round numbers about seven thousand students. There are two—"the laborer and the thinker"—Rev. William Houston, D.D., the university pastor, and Rev. W. O. Thompson, LL.D., D.D., President of the university, who take their place "in the march of the same great Purpose"; and that purpose is the reconciliation of the "scientific spirit" and the "Christian program." The university pastor is ingenious in his activities and splendidly sympathetic in his relations to the student body; while the president takes an exalted stand, in his public utterances, on all economic, social, philosophic, and religious questions.

The Bethany Church, the colored congregation of our city, has laid the cornerstone of the first unit of its church building. They have a desirable location, and the building, when ready to occupy, will be commodious and attractive. Rev. Henry W. Cooper, the pastor is a product of the Freedmen's Board. He is a scholarly gentleman and is doing a characteristic work among his people.

The Oakland Park Church, Rev. F. Kirker, pastor, is progressing in every direction of its church life. The sabbath-school is rapidly out-growing its quarters. The Women's Bible Class held its annual dinner, and the speaker of the evening was Dr. H. S. MacAyeal, the State Welfare Director. He spoke of the conditions in the state institutions. He stated there was an over-crowded condition in most places, and advocated most earnestly the segregation of the criminals.

The West Second Avenue Church is meeting with a very encouraging response under the leadership of its pastor, Rev. W. R. Kruse. Special attempt is being made in the Sabbath-school and on a recent Sabbath they had the largest attendance in its history. Arrangements are being made for a Bible Conference conducted by Dr. Samuel Dodds.

The St. Clair Avenue Church, Rev. R. L. Offield, pastor, has made a canvass of the community in the interest of the Sabbath-school, with good results. Rev. W. J. Holmes, of Lancaster, was the preacher at the recent preparatory service. Miss C. L. Smith, of the Ohio Synodical Home Missions, spoke on a recent Sabbath in this church.

Rev. C. W. Maus, pastor of the Calvary Church, is accomplishing a great work. This was, at one time, the Hungarian congregation. The pastor is making a specialty of work among the children of the foreign-speaking people. Last Sabbath they had the largest attendance in the history of the work. They are making special features of Hallowe'en, Thanksgiving and Christmas, which are greatly appreciated by the parents and the children.

CLEVELAND LETTER.

BY REV. GEORGE A. MACKINTOSH, D.D.

It is the intention of the Old Stone, or First Presbyterian, Church to become self-sustaining for all time by the erection of a sky-scraper on the northerly end of the church property. During the centennial exercises last year Elder S. P. Fenn made a gift of $100,000 for the purchase of the adjoining property. Other members made large donations and the property was secured. Before beginning the construction of the proposed new building, it was discovered that the church does not have a title to the property which they have occupied for more than a century, now valued at about $600,000. Suit has been filed which cites that the church is in danger of losing title to the property through an error made in the original turning over of the land. It names the unknown heirs of the original grantors as defendants. The petition cites that a century ago Joel Stratton deeded to ten of his fellow villagers a grassy plot near the town pump. The deed provided that within three years they were to erect a meeting house, and that the property was then to be turned over to the church organization for $400. Where that grassy plot was the Old Stone Church stands today. The petition recites that a meeting house was erected, and that the property was turned over to the church organization. No deed can be found nor a record of one. The county records list the property in the name of the ten men to whom it was originally deeded. The descendants of these ten men are scattered from Maine to California. Many of them are unknown. They will be required to show their right to the property. After hearing their claims and the claims of the church organization, the court will decide to whom the property belongs. The Old Stone Church plans to base its claims on an uncontested tenure of a century.

Rev. A. B. Meldrum, D.D., pastor of the Old Stone Church, preached an anniversary sermon, last Sabbath, at the Dovercourt Road Presbyterian Church of Toronto, Canada. In his absence the pulpit was filled by Prof. T. W. Graham, of Oberlin Theological Seminary.

A prominent member of the Old Stone Church died recently at the age of ninety-one, after a membership lasting exactly fifty years.

The Church of the Covenant, Rev. Dr. P. F. Sutphen and Rev. Dr. Alex. McGaffin, pastors, received eleven new members at the October communion. This church gave a reception last week to the out-of-town students of Western Reserve University and Case School. The Church of the Covenant adjoins the grounds of these two institutions and is the church home for many of the students. Prof. William McKinley Justice, a professor at Pikeville College, was the speaker last Sabbath afternoon at the Church of the Covenant. Professor Justice, a mountaineer, makes a remarkable impression wherever he speaks.

Rev. Arthur H. Limouze, pastor of the Glenville Church, is delivering a series of Sabbath evening sermons on "The Ten Commandments in Modern Life."

Rev. Herbert C. Hinds, Ph.D., filled the pulpit of the Cleveland Heights Church last Sabbath. This church entertained the fall meeting of the Presbyterian Missionary Society last week. The principal speaker was Miss Mabel Rogers of Cuba.

Rev. Clarence S. Gee, one of the pastors of the Miles Park Church, has accepted a call to the Congregational Church of Hudson, O., one of the towns near our city, and is to be a teacher in the Western Reserve Academy, located there, owned by the General Board of Education of the Presbyterian Church.

Several hundred Cleveland Presbyterians were the guests of the Cleveland Alumni Association of Wooster College at the Homecoming Day, Saturday, Oct. 22, when the Wooster College team played Case School. A banquet was given the Cleveland people, when addresses were made by President Wishart, Dr. A. P. Higley and Dr. C. L. Zorbaugh.

PITTSBURGH LETTER.

BY REV. S. J. FISHER, D.D.

At our Ministerial Association, Oct. 24, an interesting and instructive paper was read by Prof. Selby F. Vance, D.D., on, as he whimsically remarked at the beginning, an acquaintance, but not a friend of the essayist, his subject being "Satan." Tracing the progressive meanings or characteristics of this enemy of God, he advanced to the teachings of the New Testament, and the question of demonology, or demonic possession. He emphasized the fact that science, and especially psychology, gave increased interest to such satanic influence, and threw light upon the possibility of the intrusion of such spirit, when the mysteries of subliminal consciousness are faced.

Preceding the paper, Prof. D. S. Schaff drew attention to the Roman Catholic propaganda which revealed itself in advertisements in the secular newspapers, glorifying and boasting of the fame or achievements of certain Roman Catholics. These advertisements acknowledge their expense is defrayed by two business men of that Church in this city, but Prof. Schaff very plainly declared the inference that they are incited and suggested by the Roman Catholic authorities. We have all noted the claims that this country was discovered by a Roman Catholic, a fact no more valuable than that William the Conqueror was also a Roman Catholic, for before the Reformation, Christianity was represented by the Roman Catholic Church. The claims asserted in these advertisements are very amusing, as for example that the man who invented stenography was a member of that Church, and that the first university founded in America was Roman Catholic, at which we were surprised until we learn it was a college in Peru. As Dr. Schaff remarked, these advertisers omit the statement that one of the most prominent Popes was the father of six children, born of mothers whom he had not married. It was Dr. Schaff's opinion that such uncontradicted statements, or uncontradicted upon assertions, might influence ignorant Protestants, e. g. One who had married a Roman Catholic, and might make his advance into that Church much easier. He had prepared, and was paying for the insertion of an advertisement, stating the fact of Church History upon the Reformation, in three issues, and at his suggestion the Association appointed a committee, with Dr. Schaff as counselor, to arrange for a general committee from the other associations to prepare and meet the expense of such advertisements. It is not at all improbable that an occasional presentation of the basis of Protestantism and its relation to the facts of history might be wisely made in most of our churches. Perpetual vigilance is necessary when we have to deal with the leaders of a Church which advocates jesuitism in its defense. If it will reform we shall be glad, but Miss Deanesly in her strong work on the Lollard Bible, has shown that the mediaeval Church forbade laymen to read the Bible in the vernacular, and an Irish speaker, at the Council of the Reformed Churches in this city, asserted that the priesthood in Ireland excluded the Bible from the people. Certainly Protestants should be wisely informed concerning the error of Rome, the fallacies of celibacy, the Immaculate Conception, the doctrine of Infallibility, the Mass and Apostolic Succession.

On Oct. 23d, services were held in Racoon Church for the unveiling of the bronze Tablet erected by our presbytery commemorating the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Ordination and Installation of the pastor, Rev. G. M. Kerr, D.D. The sermon was preached by President James A. Kelso, D.D., LL.D.; greetings from the presbytery were brought by elder Robert J. Gitson, of the First Church, and the address and dedication prayer, following the unveiling, by Prof. G. S. Hunter, LL.D. The bronze tablet is simple and tasteful, and, by direction of presbytery, was prepared and inscribed by a committee consisting of Rev. Stanley A. Hunter, Rev. Joseph M. Duff, D.D., and your correspondent, and reads as follows:

Here, June 14th, 1921
The Presbytery of Pittsburgh
Met to Commemorate the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Pastorate of
Rev. Greer McIlvain Kerr, D.D.,
Who, June 14th, 1871,
Was "Solemnly Ordained
To the Full Work of the Christian Ministry."

The church bulletin for Oct. 23, was embellished with a reproduction of the tablet, a photograph of the church and crowd of automobiles on the 14th of June, and a portrait of Pastor Kerr.

At the communion Oct. 23d, at the Oakland Church, sixteen new members, all adults, and of heads of families, were received, making a total of seventy-nine received since Pastor Geo. L. Glunt began his ministry here last February. The Sabbath school has more than doubled, and the benevolences quadrupled. Eugene Biddle, a student in the Western Theological Seminary has been engaged as pastor's assistant, to have special charge of Boys' Work, and Sabbath School activities.

At the October communion the First Church, Rev. Maitland Alexander, D.D., pastor, received twelve members by profession and ten by certificate.

In the North Church, on Oct. 21st, Rev. W. O. Yates, pastor of the Swissdale Church, described his experiences while a missionary in Siam. A serious illness made his return to that field perilous.

Prof. S. F. Vance will give in November, on five Wednesday evenings, a course of lectures on "Crises in the Life of Christ" in the North Church, as a course of Bible study.

At the Presbyterial "Retreat" to be held Nov. 7th, in the Knoxville Church, Rev. M. M. McDivitt pastor, in addition to those mentioned last week participating, there will be an address by Rev. Maitland Alexander, D.D., on "Mobilizing for Evangelism," by Prof. Chas. R. Erdman on "Philip the Evangelist," and by Rev. S. N. Hutchinson, D.D., on "The Youth and Evangelism." Rev. Kinley McMillan, D.D., will preside at the afternoon service, and Rev. M. M. McDivitt in the evening.

Rev. W. L. M'Ewan, D.D., has resumed his preaching service in the Third Church after an absence of eighteen months, and gives evidence of complete restoration. It is his intention to limit his activities to his own pastoral and pulpit work, and such presbyterial duties are not onerous.

KENTUCKY LETTER.

BY REV. JAMES F. PRICE, D.D.

The writer has been assisting Rev. Geo. S. Watson for the last two weeks. He first held services at Chestnut Gap, an out-station of Booneville. There were several conversions and many reconsecrations. We went to Traveler's Rest and held a great service there, in connection with the high school. We are now holding services at Sugar Camp, another out-station of Booneville.

Rev. J. F. Claycombe has recently held a fine meeting at Chapel Hill. The church has received a great spiritual uplift. Seventeen pledged themselves to institute the family altar. There were ten professions and seven additions to the church. The offering for Mr. Claycombe was $65. The church will be in a fine condition spiritually to begin the work with their new pastor, Rev. E. N. Hart.

From Owsley county, Captain Charles L. Seal, who is superintendent of the Presbyterian Sabbath school at Booneville, led a company of state guards at the drills at Camp Knox this year. This company won the highest honors for marksmanship, competing with nine other companies from over the state.

Rev. E. T. Lawrence, M.D., has been engaged to teach in the high school at Traveler's Rest, Ky. He will also preach regularly to our church there. Dr. Lawrence was medical missionary in Persia for sixteen years. He was also engaged in teaching for six years.

Sugar Camp, an out-station of Booneville Church, has bought thirty acres of land, to be used as a demonstration farm in connection with the work there.

NEW YORK LETTER.

BY REV. CLARENCE G. REYNOLDS, D.D.

The reception of representatives of foreign countries on their way to the Washington Disarmament Conference has become almost an every-day affair in New York, but the opening of America's gates to Marshal Foch last Friday afternoon was the heartiest of them all. We crossed the bay just as the magnificent "Paris" arrived at quarantine, and within thirty minutes the great General reached the Battery amidst the booming of cannon and the shouts of the multitude. Welcomed by General Pershing, the Governor, and other dignitaries and as many Frenchmen as could crowd around, the commander of the allied forces was escorted up Broadway to the City Hall, and afterward to the Pennsylvania station. Here was a man not big physically, but mighty of soul, a scholar and gentleman, best of all, a Christian, who gave God and not himself the glory for the overthrow of the Germans.

Such a man must have been in the mind of Rev. Dr. Dwight W. Wylie, pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church, Sabbath afternoon, Oct. 23, as he preached on the Sin of Moses in taking the credit for the water from the smitten rock in the wilderness. Dr. Wylie is one of the Presbyterian pastors of New York who reaches heart and conscience when he preaches. Every one who heard that sermon must have realized how futile and wicked it is to hope to accomplish anything worth while in life if God is not considered and given the glory for every success.

Still another pastor who gives the right message at the right time is Rev. Dr. Edgar W. Work, of the Fourth Presbyterian Church. Sabbath evening, Oct. 30, the subject of the fourth sermon on Present-Day Topics was entitled "Main Street," the caricature of which, as depicted by both the book and the play, has made the innocent and provincial New Yorker believe that the nice little towns in the West and Northwest are inhabited by uncouth freaks neither pleasing to God or man. We began our ministry in a small Minnesota town, and can testify to the untruthfulness of the general description of the people whose life is spent away from the big city. Be assured that Dr. Work did not forget that he came from just such a town, although not so far west as Minnesota. Much of that which is best in the religion, business and society of the city is from the country, as every one knows, and this without a single reflection upon the multitudes of good folk who have been altogether city bred. Oct. 18, Dr. Work observed the fourteenth anniversary of his pastorate. June 5, thirteen were received into the church, and eight on Oct. 9. At the Fourth Church the Wednesday-evening lessons are on the Fundamentals of the Faith. Last Friday evening the church Brotherhood was addressed by Mr. John Echindler, the head of a detective agency, the topic being "Criminology."

The Mount Washington Church, Riverside Drive and Dyckman Street, celebrated its seventy-fifth anniversary during the week beginning Sabbath, Oct. 23. On that day the Sabbath-school anniversary was held just before the anniversary sermon was preached by Rev. George S. Payson, D.D., for forty-six years pastor. Monday evening the Men's Club had a reception and entertainment. Wednesday evening was the anniversary meeting, with reminiscences by Dr. Payson. Rev. George H. Payson, Elders Perkins and Flitner and others, the greetings from New York Presbytery being given by the moderator, Rev. Dr. H. G. Mendenhall. Thursday the annual meeting of the church was held and officers were elected. Reports of the organizations of the church were given, and greetings given by Rev. Dr. Jesse F. Forbes, Stated Clerk of New York Presbytery.

Rev. Dr. John F. Carson, pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church, is preaching a series of Sabbath-evening sermons on "Urgent Questions," which are attracting wide attention. Many pastors preached memorial sermons in honor of the sixty-third anniversary of the birth of the late Theodore Roosevelt.

The Biblical Seminary in New York, formerly the Bible Teachers' Training School, celebrated its twenty-first birthday Saturday, Oct. 29. Special meetings were held morning, afternoon and evening. Rev. Dr. W. W. White is the president. During the years many ministers and missionaries have been prepared for their work at this school.

Captain Gypsy Pat Smith has closed his evangelistic campaign in Brooklyn, having addressed 50,000 people. The last service was in the Academy of Music Oct. 27, when the evangelist told the story of his life.

The old John Street Methodist Church, New York, has just finished the celebration of its 155th anniversary.

The Evangelistic Committee of New York City has been incorporated.

Rev. Dr. John Kelman, pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, preached Sabbath morning, Oct. 30, on "Disarmament." Dr. Kelman completed the second year of his pastorate last Sabbath.

MICHIGAN LETTER.

BY REV. WILLIAM BRYANT, D.D.

"The Michigan Sunday School Association" is in session this week, Oct. 25-28, at Kalamazoo. The program includes a series of five lectures on "Christian Essentials," by President D. W. Kurtz, D.D.; an address on "Death or Deep Water," by Bishop T. S. Henderson; one on "The Enkindled Life—the Enkindling Life," by Dr. G. G. Atkins; one on "Exalting the Sacred Scriptures," by Dr. F. S. Goodrich; one on "The Call of Mohammedan Childhood," by Dr. Samuel M. Zwemer and others on special themes by men and women of large experience. Emphasis is to be placed in this convention upon the fact that the Michigan S. S. A., is an interdenominational, and not undenominational organization. This year there is a rearrangement that makes all misunderstanding impossible. People who are familiar with the work of the American Sunday School Union, which is of course undenominational and naturally often coming into conflict with the denominational work, find it difficult to understand the particular sphere of an organization which never conflict with the Boards of the various churches. A little one-page leaflet, published by the M. S. S. A., entitled "Twelve Reasons" will make it plain to any one who questions the necessity of this organization and the accompanying appeal for funds. It can be obtained at headquarters in Lansing. But if there were no other good reasons for this Association and the annual meetings, it is beyond question that a convention that can call together every year 1,000 or 1,500 Sabbath school workers to study methods and receive help for better work is worth far more than it costs. This is quite apart from the fact that the various denominations are brought together in this way as they are not in any other way so far discovered. It is a great opportunity and carries a great blessing to those who seek it.

The Alma College campaign for funds did not end with the meeting of synod, which endorsed resolutions to prosecute the work until it was complete. The Stated Clerk of synod was authorized to address a letter to every pastor, clerk of session and chairman of the Board of Trustees in every church, conveying the instructions of synod for a vigorous prosecution of the campaign. Some churches accepted their quota and even surpassed it. Some fell far short. In others the appeal has not yet been made. We can easily excuse ourselves with the plea that financial conditions are unfavorable. But we all know that the most successful campaigns for the Lord's work have always been made when business men declared the time to be unfavorable. The Lord is not governed in his demands by what we call psychological moments. Eternity is God's measurement.

There was a time, before the days of Synodical Self Support in Michigan, when some of the Home Mission churches made their appeal for aid on the basis that somewhere in the East there was an unlimited fund for supplementing salaries. Now we insist on a thorough canvass of the field before we even discuss the matter of aid. What was true of Home Missions in the past still is true to some extent in regard to some other Boards of the Church. There is still a lingering idea that the Board of Church Erection has abilities and big-heartedness to cover all our local shortcomings. Is Michigan so poor that it must receive from the Board of Erection $41,355 and contribute only $5,732 as was the case last year? It is true that in addition to the $5,732 contributed there was secured by recovery of loans $5,000 more. But adding this to the contributions, it is still true that for every dollar received from Michigan there was returned four dollars. That is not the worst of this story of meanness. Some churches made false representations to the Board. For instance, one church after declaring that by the receipt of $6,500 from the Board the entire indebtedness would be canceled, now states that it still owes $10,000 on the building. Business men have a stronger term than the word "mistake" to characterize that sort of a proposition. Other churches are guilty of actions no more honorable. Is it strange then that when a church in a certain rich city asks for an appropriation of $30,000 that the reply is not very satisfactory? Very much the same state of affairs exists as to the Board of Ministerial Relief. Presbyteries are not as a rule dealing fairly with the Boards. They appeal most urgently for gifts out of all proportion to the effort made in behalf of these causes. Committees are either afraid of offending certain churches by insisting upon dealing fairly with all concerned, or they do not take the trouble to get at the actual facts before endorsing applications. As to the Board of Education and candidates for the ministry, practically the same might be said without exaggeration. We appeal from our pulpits for absolute honesty in business and politics. Are we willing to accept for ourselves the same stern standards of honesty and justice?

THE SYNOD OF ILLINOIS.

BY REV. E. N. WARE, D.D.

The first Church of Lincoln, Ill., Rev. H. L. Moore, pastor, entertained the Synod of Illinois October 18-29. The old courthouse in which Mr. Lincoln was often heard, is still standing. When the synod was given a trip about the city no one was heard to do other than comment favorably when the train of automobiles stopped in front of the old courthouse and our ears were greeted with the merry shout of two picaninies who were playing on the doorsteps of one of the two apartments. Did not the beloved Lincoln free their fathers?

In the absence of Rev. H. C. Wilson, retiring Moderator, who has removed from the bounds of the synod during the year, Dr. H. L. Moore called the session to order, and introduced Dr. Frederick F. Shannon, of Chicago Central Church, who preached the opening sermon. Rev. Marion G. Hull, Ph.D., pastor of the United Church at Mattoon was elected Moderator unanimously.

The permanent Committee on Christian Education, through its new chairman, Dr. A. S. C. Clarke, of Evanston, Ill., made what was said to be one of the most commanding reports which synod has heard in years. All of the schools of the synod were represented by speakers, in most cases the president of the school. The Men's Work banquet was attended by several hundred men, and Moderator H. C. Swearingen and Dr. W. F. Weir were the principal speakers. The Moderator's address on Wednesday morning thrilled the synod with its optimism and statesman-like handling of the problems before the Church.

Foreign Missions were presented by Dr. A. J. Brown and Rev. Roy H. Brown.

Home Missions had an able representative in Dr. W. P. Schriver, who gave an illustrated resume of his study of many localities in the synod along industrial and social lines during the past summer.

Synod adopted the suggestion of the Chairman of the Church Extension Committee that the Committee arrange a conference of the Permanent Committee to be held in June, and invite pastors and laymen to attend, thus approaching the California plan without disturbing the regular meeting of synod in fall. Dr. W. C. Covert and Elder Day McBirney were elected Trustees of synod for three years. The request of Chicago Presbytery for enlarged space in the "Appendix" of the Minutes for historical and other informing data was denied on account of the added expense. Rev. E. N. Ware, D.D., was allowed to withdraw his appeal from the action of last year's synod, on the ground that it had been shown that the action in question was the adoption of a resolution and not an amendment to the Standing Rules. No invitation was extended for the place of meeting for next year.

CHICAGO LETTER.

BY REV. E. N. WARE, D.D.

In the interests of the Committee on Near East Relief, the Day of Prayer of the Chicago Presbytery was postponed from October 24 to November 4. It will be held in the Second Church as first planned.

The Presbyterian Training School, under the superintendency of Dr. Robert H. Beattie, is having its best year in the history of the school. The attendance is more than can be accommodated in the home. Mrs. Harriet D. Kerswill is matron of the Home and dean of the school. Rev. F. L. Eversull teaches Religious Education, and his wife, Mrs. Mildred L. Eversull, is instructor in Music and Business branches. Venice Bigelow Jackson is instructor in Story Telling, Elementary and Junior Sabbath School Work. Dr. H. A. Johnston, President of the Board, is teaching Personal Evangelism, while McCormick Seminary professors and others are filling in as in other years.

A FLORIDA CITY AND CHURCH.

BY E. L. FERRAN.

About midway between the Atlantic and the Gulf of Mexico, and also near the center of Florida, North and South, is the County of Lake, so named from the fourteen hundred lakes within its borders, scattered among the pine-clad hills, some of which rise to almost mountainous altitudes. In a number of places springs gush forth with a volume of water almost a river. This section of the state is often called the back-bone of Florida, and has much to commend it, climate, health conditions, pure water, a splendid system of hard-surfaced roads, and a good class of citizenship.

Eustis is a growing town, centrally located, and on the Eastern shore of Lake Eustis, a body of water five by seven miles in extent, and one of a chain of lakes with an estimated shore line of two hundred and fifty miles, which altogether, form the source of the famous Ocklawaha River. Eustis has practically all the conveniences and advantages of larger cities, minus many of the objectionable features.

Our Presbyterian Church building at Eustis is one of the most attractive in the state. The church was organized Feb. 17, 1884, by Dr. J. H. Potter, of sainted memory, who came here from Des Moines, Iowa for his health. He served the church as its pastor until his death nearly twenty years later. The following have since served the church as pastor in the order named: Rev. Francis Lee Goff, Dr. A. H. Jolly, Dr. W. S. P. Cochran and the present pastor, Rev. Samuel H. Moore, D.D., who is ministering to the church to the delight of the membership and the congregation. The membership is growing steadily, and the attendance during the winter season taxes the capacity of the main audience room and the Sabbath-school room combined.

Presbyterians desiring a winter or permanent home will find in Eustis a desirable place to locate, and will receive a warm welcome. Presbyterianism is growing in Florida. The writer came here from Indiana thirty-seven years ago. He is not in the real estate business, but would be glad to give information to Presbyterians who desire to know more of Eustis and vicinity.

OREGON NOTES.

BY REV. J. EDWARD BLAIR.

The Presbytery of Pendleton met in Milton, Oct. 14. Rev. John W. Hood was dismissed to the Presbytery of Seattle and Rev. W. O. Benthin to Columbia River. Rev. Curry H. Love was received from the Presbytery of Southern Arizona, and Rev. W. O. Leninty from Chicago. Mr. Leninty has for some months been in charge at Prinville. Rev. Leon C. Hills, D.D. comes from Capitol Heights Church, Denver, Colo., to the Boardman-Irrigon field, Presbytery of Pendleton. In the bounds of the same presbytery on Oct. 18, Rev. W. H. Boddy was installed in the Federated Church of Hood River. To the church of Moro, Rev. H. G. Hansen of Bethany Church, Grant's Pass, has recently come.

Rev. William Westwood, pastor at Baku, in Grande Ronde Presbytery, has gone to the church in Coer d' Alene, Idaho.

Rev. E. W. Warrington, pastor at Roseburg, in Southern Oregon, has been called to a Y. M. C. A. Secretaryship in the Oregon Agriculture College at Corvallis. Of this school Rev. L. Myron Booser, D.D., is Presbyterian pastor-student. There are over three thousand students in this great school, and it is gratifying to know that such strong, true, evangelical men as Warrington and Booser are in charge of the moral and spiritual welfare of this fine body of students.

Rev. L. B. Quick of Calvary Church, Portland, has accepted a hearty call to Roseburg, made vacant by the resignation of Mr. Warrington. Mr. Quick supplied this church while Mr. Warrington was engaged in over-seas duty during the world war; hence he is no stranger at Roseburg.

Fred W. Davis, who has been working among the lumber-jacks of the Northwest, under our Home Board for the past eighteen years, was ordained as an evangelist at the Oct. meeting of the Presbytery of Portland. This presbytery passed strong resolutions in support of the Christian College. It is to be inferred that this means Presbyterians of Portland are going to get heartily into the campaign now being launched for a larger Albany College.

Portland Presbytery also took high and positive stand on the divorce evil; we might say the divorce mania; for all our courts are busy grinding out a steady grist of divorces, which menas devastated homes. We the people of the West are almost void of a conscience on this evil. It is certainly time the Church was taking an advanced position, and if she can not push back the tide, she can and must show which side she is on.

Albany College opened its fifty-fifth year on Sept. 20. So far eighty-one students have matriculated in the college classes. This is the largest enrollment in its history. The college maintains a high grade conservatory of music. This department is in a flourishing condition. The friends of the college are being led by Rev. W. W. Smith in a campaign looking to a fund sufficiently large to place new and adequate buildings and equipment on the new forty-eight acre campus, and also to add a goodly sum to the present endowment of over a quarter of a million.

SYNOD OF CANADIAN.

The Synod of Canadian (Colored) met on Sept. 21, in Valliant, Okla. This synod covers the states of Texas, Arkansas, and Oklahoma. The members of this synod have long distances to travel to get to their meetings, but they came and entered into their work with an earnestness and interest which was commendable. My visit there was to represent the cause of Foreign Missions. At the close of the address a move was started to take a collection for the Halsey Memorial Fund, and we received $15, or one dollar for each member of the synod. The Halsey Memorial Fund was commended to the churches of the synod, and an attempt will be made to collect one dollar for each member of the churches of the synod.

Denison, Texas. J. S. Hodges.

ARKANSAS LETTER.

BY REV. G. E. HAYES, D.D.

The Synod of Arkansas met at Russellville and its pastor, Rev. W. Lin Humie, D.D., had every detail worked out and the entertainment was first-class in every respect. Rev. E. E. Morris, retiring moderator, invited, Rev. B. P. Fullerton, D.D., Secretary of Home Missions from the Western Office, to preach the opening sermon, and he brought a great message. Rev. M. H. Krauss, D.D., of Little Rock was chosen moderator. Rev. W. B. Miller, D.D., is the Stated Clerk. Just at the opening of the synod, the pastor, Dr. Hurie, and his wife presented their baby May Virginia, and Dr. Fullerton baptized it. Drs. Fullerton, Clarke and Provine made addresses during the meeting. Rev. E. E. Morris, D.D., was chosen Vice-Moderator. Profitable reports were made on all the Boards. Reports stated that work during the past year was the best in our history. The report of the Home Mission Superintendent showed that more money had been given to all the Boards of the Church than in any previous year, and that more members had been received into the Church than any previous year. The "College of the Ozarks," through its President, Dr. H. S. Lyle, and others was presented to the synod and it received most hearty endorsement. The synod will meet at Ft. Smith next year on a self-supporting basis. The women had a helpful and profitable meeting and presented a delightful program on the closing evening of the synod. Next year the women will meet in Fayetteville.

Pea Ridge Church, Rev. A. E. Carnahan, pastor, recently received thirteen members.

Rev. Dr. Hefner, pastor at Clarksville, reports that the new church will be completed at an early date. The building will cost over $100,000.

Rev. Geo. T. Clark, pastor at Hartford, received four new members recently.

The meeting at Beebe, conducted by Rev. Dr. Morris, assisted by Rev. Dr. Wylie, closed recently after three weeks continuance, with twenty-five professions and nine additions. The church is greatly strengthened.

The meeting of one week at Melrose, conducted by Dr. Krauss, resulted in four additions.

Rev. W. D. Orr closed a meeting of six days continuance in the Shady Grove Church recently with four additions. He was assisted by Rev. Mr. West.

Dr. R. W. Lewis is in the midst of a fine meeting at Chidister, Rev. Otis C. Epperson, pastor.

Rev. W. M. Howell will be assisted in a meeting at Mineral Springs, beginning Nov. 13th, by Rev. Dr. Wylie.

I spent one night and most of two days with the Cove Church. The meeting recently held here by Evangelist Lewis strengthened the church greatly. More than sixty members were received. Oct. 16th I spent with the Grannis Church, where Dr. Lewis received fifty-four into church membership at the close of his meeting. Both Cove and Grannis asked the return of Dr. Lewis for a meeting next year.

The church at Kingston, in Arkansas Presbytery, is a denominational center. Rev. J. E. Bouher, the pastor is in his fifth year. The buildings are inadequate and new buildings must be provided in the near future. This church is being supported in part by the Brick Church, Rochester, N. Y. Next month, Mr. Bouher and his wife will guests of the Brick Church and Mr. Bouher will present the work of his church and of Arkansas Synod not only to this church, but to other churches in the East. He is preparing lantern slides to be shown in addresses. We congratulate Mr. Bouher and his church on having this fine opportunity of telling by picture and story of the work in the Arkansas Synod.

Rev. M. E. Morse, pastor of the Rector group will begin a meeting at Bono, Nov. 7. As soon as he can arrange for an evangelist he will hold a meeting at Rector. Mr. Morse has two out-stations.

The installation of Rev. A. M. Eells, D.D., at Hot Springs occurred on Sabbath Oct. 23d. Rev. Dr. M. H. Krauss, pastor at Little Rock, delivered the sermon, presided and charged the people. Dr. C. E. Hayes gave the charge to the pastor. At the evening service Dr. Hayes gave a report of the World's Presbyterian Alliance which was recently held in Pittsburgh, Pa. Dr. Eells is rapidly getting hold of the work in this city and the future of the church looks bright. Presbyterians going to Hot Springs, for health or business, should keep in mind that Trinity Church, on Orange Street, is the only U. S. A. church in the city. Dr. Eells and his church will gladly render any aid they can to strangers coming to the city.

Rev. W. T. Thurman, pastor, at Piggott, was called to Kansas recently to assist Rev. Grover Pollard in laying the cornerstone of his new $12,000 church building. Mr. Pollard was called into the ministry from the Piggott Church.

Rev. T. E. Threlkeld has moved to Ravenen Springs and has taken charge of this church and the Concord Church.

Rev. Dr. G. W. Neal, of Russellville, supplied the Little Rock Church, Oct. 23d, in the absence of the pastor.

OHIO CHURCH FEDERATION.

The Ohio Federation of Churches is to meet in Columbus, Ohio, on Nov. 3d. Last winter, four hundred pastors attended a two-day meeting in Columbus, while seventy-five ministers attended the summer school for rural pastors which was conducted in co-operation with the State University in July. Dr. W. O. Thompson is president of the Federation, Mr. Harvey S. Firestone, of Akron, vice-president, while the Executive Committee is composed of Mrs. W. H. Alexander, Bishop W. F. Anderson, Dr. Robert E. Pugh and nine other leading church men of the State.

IDAHO LETTER.

BY REV. J. H. BARTON, D.D.

The Synod of Idaho met in Twin Falls Oct. 13. Rev. W. J. Boone, D.D., President of the College of Idaho, preached the opening sermon and was elected Moderator. Rev. G. William Barnum was re-elected as Stated Clerk. Elder H. C. Baldrige was appointed Vice-Moderator. Rev. D. H. Hare was elected to represent the synod in the Home Mission Council. Rev. J. H. Burton was elected Superintendent of Home Missions. Ministerial Relief and Sustentation was presented by Dr. W. S. Holt; Foreign Missions by Dr. Weston T. Johnson; Home Missions, Rev. A. B. Keeler; Publication and Sabbath School Work, Rev. William Ralph Hall; New Era Movement, Dr. Walter M. Irwin.

A committee was appointed to meet with similar committees from the other denominations for the purpose of arranging for the organization of a Home Mission Council.

President Boone, of the College of Idaho, stated that the present enrollment in the college is 193. The committee on Bible Chair endowment reported that about $17,000 of the required $25,000 has been subscribed. This school is now a member of the American Association of Colleges.

The committee appointed a year ago to report on the advisability of changing the date of the meeting of synod from October to midsummer, recommended that no change be made and the report was adopted.

The churches of the synod report a net gain in membership of 13 per cent. The increase in benevolences over the preceding year was nearly 10 per cent. The increase in benevolences over the average for the five years preceding the New Era Movement was 121 per cent. There were added to the churches during 1921, 40 per cent more on examination than in 1920.

EAST TENNESSEE NOTES.

BY REV. ROBERT I. GAMON, D.D.

Miss Mary Miles, daughter of Rev. T. J. Miles, D.D., has reached her destination in Japan. Miss Miles left this country about six weeks ago under our Board of Foreign Missions. Before leaving the Union Presbyterial gave her a farewell reception and shower. As a graduate of Maryville College and the Bible school of Dr. W. W. White, of New York, and with two years' experience in teaching in this country, Miss Miles is well equipped for similar service in the Orient. Dr. and Mrs. Miles have been at work in this section for twenty years and have rendered splendid service in our rural churches, and it is with added joy that they give their daughter to the foreign field after the self-denial necessary to prepare her for the service she is to perform.

It was the writer's privilege to spend a Sabbath with the North Side Church of Chattanooga recently. To say the least, was surprised to see the fine work there, so well organized. So great has been the development of the Sabbath school, that a beautiful and well-adapted building is almost completed, in which the school will carry out its program. The pastor, Rev. O. E. Gardner, is an indefatigable worker.

Rev. E. W. Hall, of Rockford, will receive new members at the communion service to be held on Nov. 5. It was a pleasure to me to assist Mr. Hall for a week. Dr. W. P. Stevenson, Rev. H. E. Orr and Mr. Roy Buffat also helped in a fine meeting closing Oct. 23.

A few churches combined in sending $200 to help Cumberland University in a brief campaign for current expenses.

Ten members have already been received into the West Emory Church. The pastor, Rev. W. J. Shelton, is conducting evangelistic meetings, assisted by Mr. Houston. The meeting at Holston, recently held, was very successful. Twenty-five conversions are reported.

Three members were received Oct. 24 into the Knoxville Fourth Church and one at Erin Church. The latter church is conducting a School of Missions in connection with the Sabbath-night service. Rev. W. M. Gilliam is pastor.

Rev. Will Bartlett has begun an evangelistic campaign in the Park City Church, Rev. Joseph H. Miller, pastor. It will continue several weeks.

The Knoxville Second Church gave a delightful reception to their new pastor, Rev. H. C. Wilson, D.D., and wife, also to their former pastor, Rev. R. T. Dosker, and wife, of Japan, on Oct. 24.

For the present Rev. A. J. Coile, D.D., will make his home with his son, Mr. Samuel Coile, of Johnson City. Until recently Dr. Coile was pastor of the Cookeville Church.

THE ASHEVILLE SCHOOLS.

Founders' Day at the Normal and Collegiate Institute, Asheville, N. C., was observed Oct. 5th, by breaking the sod for the new Home School.

Thirty-four years ago industrial work for the mountain girls was begun when Dr. and Mrs. Lewis M. Pease transferred a valuable tract of thirty acres to the Woman's Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church. Miss Florence Stephenson acted as the first principal of the school, where young girls from the mountain region of Western North Carolina were gathered for education and training for the practical duties of life. The following year, 1887, Miss Mary John became assistant principal, remaining until 1911, when Miss Josephine Bundy assumed care of the school. This building has been several times enlarged. In 1892 Dr. Lawrence established the Normal School, where older girls might receive training for the work of teaching. The Pease House was erected in 1908, for the accommodation of little children. That the boys might have training in the best methods of agriculture, the Farm School, ten miles distant, with 640 acres, was opened in 1909. For many years the need of better accommodations for the Home School has been felt, and now its friends rejoice that a fine new building is to be erected.

Today the Asheville Normal and Associated Schools, with John H. Calfee,

LL.D., as president, constitute a great uplifting force in North Carolina; Ione H. Dunn, A.B., is dean of the Normal; Josephine Bundy, principal of the Home School; Christian A. Brown, principal of the Pease House, and Miles E. Marsh, A.M., principal of the Farm School.

Dr. Herbert Booth Smith celebrated, on Oct. 16, the fifth anniversary of his pastorate at the Immanuel Church, Los Angeles. At communion on Oct 9 he had welcomed 111 new members, baptized eight infants and one adult. Five years show: Infant baptism, 160; adult baptism, 135; new members, confession 535, and funerals, 350. Raised for all purposes, about $750,000. The church has a membership of about 3,000 now, being the third largest in the Church. The ground will be broken for the Sabbath school and community service building costing about $250,000 on the coming Easter, and after this building is finished the old frame church will be torn down and the auditorium erected on the site of the present church. Rev. Kenneth D. Miller, associate director of the Department of City and Immigrant Work of the Board of Home Missions, has received word that the Czecho-Slovak Government has conferred on him the Czecho-Slovak Cross of War in recognition of his services in connection with the Czecho-Slovak army in Russia. Mr. Miller will sail from New York Oct. 29, on a special mission to Czecho-Slovakia, as a result of the General Assembly's decision to aid the new national Protestant Church of that Nation in what Mr. Miller terms the greatest religious movement since the Reformation.

I enclose my check for $3. to pay for my subscription to the Herald and Presbyter and take advantage of your offer. You may send me "Pastoral Memories." The good things contained in every number of the Herald and Presbyter are very helpful in my everyday life. S. H. W.

Enclosed find check for $2.50. The Herald and Presbyter has been in our family ever since it was first issued. It is and always has been a source of information and help, as I feel that its news is absolutely reliable. It had as much or perhaps more to do in forming my opinions regarding important questions before the world during the formative years of my life than any other influence. I am so thankful that my parents were wise enough to see that the children had the influence of a Christian paper. So many homes are destitute of such an influence, and I feel so sorry for those children. May the Herald and Presbyter live long and prosper is my wish. M. and E. G.

WHAT CAN A LITTLE CHAP DO?

BY JOHN OXENHAM:

What can a little chap do
For his country and for you?
What can a little chap do?

He can play a straight game all through;
That's one good thing he can do.

He can fight like a knight
For the truth and the right;
That's another good thing he can do.

He can shun all that's mean,
He can keep himself clean,
Both without and within;
That's a very fine thing he can do.

His soul he can brace
Against everything base,
And the trace will be seen
All his life in his face;
That's an excellent thing he can do.

He can look to the light,
He can keep his thoughts white,
He can fight the great fight,
He can do with his might
What is good in God's sight;
Those are truly great things he can do.

Though his years be but few,
If he keep himself true
He can march in the queue
Of the good and the great,
Who battled with fate
And won through;
That's a wonderful thing he can do.

And in each little thing
He can follow the King—
Yes, in each smallest thing
He can follow the King—
He can follow the Christ, the King.

HOW ROBERT'S WISH CAME TRUE.

BY ANNE PORTER JOHNSON.

It was almost time to start back to school after dinner.

"I hate soap!" growled Robert. "It gets into my eyes and makes them smart. When I get big, I'm not going to have any soap in my house. I wish there wasn't any in the world! There isn't any use in being so particular about clean faces and hands, anyway. If I had my way, I'd never touch another bit of soap as long as I live. I don't care if my face is all streaked."

"All right!" replied Robert's mother. "Just as you say. I'll put all the soap out of sight, so you won't even see it."

"Oh! Oh! Good!" cried Robert, clapping his hands. He was very much surprised at his mother's promise, but he was also very happy. No soap, no bother about clean hands and face. He had not expected such good luck. "Can I go to school without washing?" he asked.

His mother nodded smilingly. "Certainly! Just run along. It's almost time. Don't worry about clean hands and face any more."

"Whoop! Whoop!" yelled Robert, going down the path and through the gateway like a cat.

It was all right with the boys at school. They did not seem to take much notice of Robert's smudgy hands and face. In fact, they rather envied him.

The bell rang shortly after he entered the school-grounds. The teacher smiled when she saw Robert. "I think Robert forgot to wash his hands and face," she remarked in perfectly good humor.

All the scholars turned and looked at him. He shook his head. "No, I didn't forget," he said. "I'm not going to any more."

"Oh!" gasped the teacher. The boys and girls giggled. "Well, I don't know just what to do about it," went on the teacher, looking about the room. "Of course the other scholars look so neat and clean, and right in among them you look rather queer—maybe you better take this seat over here."

So Robert sat in a seat over by himself.

After recess there was a knock on the door and some ladies came in to visit the school. They looked at Robert and then smiled behind their hands. The teacher came across the room and whispered to them, they looked at Robert again and laughed. Of course the scholars understood. Harry Williams and Dick Johnson looked at Robert and grinned, and Susie and Kitty giggled aloud.

"Well, they can't make me care!" said Robert to himself. But his face felt rather warm.

"Robert, you may write your lesson on the blackboard," said the teacher.

He went forward and began to write. Beside the chalk his hands showed up pretty black, and when he glanced around, the company ladies were watching him and laughing. At least it looked that way to Robert.

When school was out he started home at once—he thought perhaps the company of the teacher might say something, and, well, he decided he would hurry home.

"What's your hurry, Robert?" someone called from the side of the road. Robert looked up, and there was the grocery-man.

"Well, dear me, wh-ah's the matter! Ha! Ha! Looks like you've been playing in the coal-yard. Ha! Ha! Ha!"

Robert went straight on.

"Want a ride?" asked Dr. Miller from his big machine.

Robert did, of course. He climbed in beside the wheel.

"Well, sonny—" he stopped suddenly and whistled. "Say, Bobby, where in the world have you been?" He laughed, shaking all over.

Robert looked ahead and said nothing.

"Your folks must be out of soap, Bobby. Or maybe you couldn't find it. When I was a boy, I never could find the soap. A boy feels just as good, but he looks mighty funny!" He shook again.

At his gate Robert jumped out. The doctor whizzed on, calling back, "Say, Bobby, what's the difference how you look, just so you feel good! But don't look in the glass, I warn you."

Robert went into the house by the side door. His father looked at him the second time before he spoke. "If I were you, Robert, I wouldn't go in the parlor. Uncle John and Aunt Mary are here for supper. Of course you may do as you please, but I thought they might wonder what was the matter."

Robert's mother was fixing some dishes on a small table in the kitchen. "What's this for, mother?" he asked.

"Why, I'm fixing that table for you," she replied quietly. "The dining table is so clean and white—I think you'll feel more at home eating here by yourself. It will be embarrassing for you, and—"

Before she could finish the sentence Robert had found the soap and was out on the porch pumping water from the cistern. A few minutes later he came in smiling, his face and hands scoured until they were pink.—Ex.

A SPOOL OF WARP.

When I was a child I went one day to the weaver's house with rags that my mother had saved for a carpet. Once there I lingered a while to watch the weaver at his work.

On a shelf at one side of the room were spools of colored string, which he told me were spools of warp. One spool I especially admired. It was a deep red; and the last thing I saw as I turned from the door was that spool standing there on the shelf.

A week later, when the carpet was done, I went back to the weaver's house. Mindful of the pretty spool of warp, I glanced toward the shelf. The spool was gone. When I asked the weaver about it he smiled and pointed to the end of a red cord in the fringe of the carpet.

After I had reached home with the carpet we spread it out on the floor.

"Look at that deep red thread running through it!" exclaimed mother. "It is just the touch needed to set it off. I should never have imagined that a little bit of red could make such a difference."

When I told mother of the spool of red warp at the weaver's and assured her that the thread in the carpet came from the spool she traced the thread as it twined in and out, and said, "Do you remember the thought I was trying to impress on you children last Sabbath? The value of a life depends not on what it is by itself, but on its filling its proper place in God's plan. The spool of warp, beautiful in color though it was, would never have amounted to anything so long as it stood on the shelf. But here in the carpet what a wonderful difference it makes."

Our lives will never amount to anything if we live them selfishly. But if we give ourselves to God, who is the great Weaver in the world, he will fit us into a place in the universe, and we shall serve a noble purpose, even though our lives are but cords running through the pattern of the kingdom.

A QUEER CLOCK.

I know a funny little clock
Which every single night,
Must be laid by upon the shelf
To make it run just right.

Unless its wheels and springs are kept
In trim from top to toe,
You'll find this most exacting clock
Refusing quite to go.

But when it has its nightly rest,
Most faithfully 'twill run,
And never stop a single bit
Until the day is done.

"A tiresome little clock," you say,
Well, that indeed is true;
But listen! here's a secret great—
That little clock is you.

A HANDSOME APOLOGY.

Ned and his grandmother are the best of friends, but sometimes the little boy's tongue is too quick to please the old lady. Then Ned apologizes after a fashion of his own, which his grandmother approves.

"I got tired lugging that wheelbarrow for grandmother while she was changing her plants," Ned said to his mother, recounting the day's events at bedtime, "and I said: 'I wish there wasn't another speck of this hateful dirt in all the world!' But then afterwards I apologized."

"I'm glad of that," said his mother. "Did you tell her you were sorry?"

"No, ma'am; that is not the kind grandmother likes best," said Ned. "I got another wheelbarrowful and just said: 'Don't you want some more of this nice dirt, grandmother? And then we were all right again."—Ex.

WHAT IS LIFE?

BY MAY E. MCMILLAN.

"What is life?" I asked a child, Care-free, happy all the day.
"What is life?" the child replied,
"Lady, life is play."

Next I turned to maiden fair,
Sweet and lovely beyond measure;
"What is life?" I questioned her;
"Life," she murmured, "life is pleasure."

Turning to a soldier brave,
Like to those oft sung in story;
"Just a moment's time I crave,
What is life?" "Why, life is glory."

Mother, toiling all the day
For the child whose radiant beauty
Brightens all the weary way—
"What is life?" "Ah, life is duty."

Father, sailing o'er the sea,
Where the angry waters foam,
"What is life?" I asked, and he Quickly answered, "Life is home."

Then I whispered to my heart:
"What is life where'er we rove?"
Soft and sweet my heart replied:
"Life? Ah, life is only love!"

THE STORY OF A BIRTHDAY ROSE.

BY MARY E. MORRILL.

"Do you think it will be open to-morrow mamma? Oh, it must be! What should I do if it shouldn't be ready? It ought to be fairly in bloom tomorrow—don't you think so, mamma?"

Mrs. Mitchell smiled into the flushed young face.

"Yes, Luella, I think the morning will bring you a dainty rose to reward you for your weeks of tender care."

Luella's eyes shone. "Won't uncle be pleased! He loves roses so, and this will be such a beauty I know. It is just the sort of a birthday gift that he would appreciate most."

The next morning Luella was early down stairs. There in the morning sunshine a beautiful half-blown rose was filling the air with its fragrance, its rich, deep cream petals slowly unfolding their waxen depths.

The girl stood with clasped hands before her treasure. "Oh, oh! was anything ever so lovely! And so sweet! Such a perfect beauty! My birthday rose! I can hardly wait until Uncle Frank sees it."

The morning express was rumbling on its way.

Midway of the coach sat a little old woman with wistful eyes. Her shabby black dress showed signs of much service. A few scant loops of fresh crape had been added to the rusty black bonnet, and there was a pathetic attempt at a mourning veil. At times the wistful eyes scanned timidly the strange faces about her, and then the old lady turned with a little sigh of loneliness to look out of the window at the flying snow drifts.

Luella glanced across the aisle. "She seems to be traveling alone. I wonder if she is, poor old lady?"

She tried to read, but the story was not interesting. She turned the leaves of her magazine uneasily. Another glance across the aisle. The little woman was looking her way. Luella smiled. A ripple of pleased surprise ran all over the old face and the loops of crape nodded in reply. "She's lonely, I know," was Luella's mental comment. Following a sudden impulse, she slipped across the aisle into the other seat.

"Let me show you something pretty," and in a moment she had undone the wrappings from a beautiful cream-tinted rose.

O-o-h!" Volumes could not have told the admiration expressed in that one word and in the look in the old lady's eyes.

"I am taking it to my uncle. It is his birthday gift. I raised it myself from a cutting," Luella explained.

"Oh, miss, it carries me back to a day fifty years ago. It's the very same as my wedding roses." There were tears in the old lady's eyes and her voice trembled.

With a quick look towards the poor little loops of crape, Luella laid her white hand tenderly upon the withered one. "And now you are alone?" she asked in a voice full of sympathy.

The old lady nodded silently. She was bending over the rose touching ever so lightly its pedals. At last she spoke:

"He died just two weeks ago. I'm goin' to my son. He lives in Columbus. He's all I've got now. I hain't seen him in ten years, but he wrote on for me to come right away. He would have come for me if he could. There's a houseful of children there, but he says there's room for grandma. I s'pose it'll seem kind o' strange to me at first, and I'll miss the old home where me and David lived for fifty years. But John'll be kind to me. He was always a good boy. And it won't be for long now, it won't be for long." The faded eyes grew wistful again. The delicate perfume of the rose was scenting the air.

"It smells so kind o' natural," she said after a little. "You can't know, miss, how I love them. Bless your kind heart for givin' me a sight o' this."

Into Luella's mind flashed at that moment a startling thought. Involuntarily she caught her breath and her sunny face grew very serious—almost distressed.

"I can't," she said to herself, "oh, I can't! I have looked forward to it for so long. And it's Uncle Frank's birthday, too."

The little woman was still bending over the rose with a far-away look on her wrinkled face.

"I'll let her enjoy it as long as I can, of course, but I need not give it to her." It was strange, but to Luella the brightness had gone out of the sunshine and even the beautiful rose seemed to have grown paler. She leaned wearily back in her seat. Her companion, still far away, was dreamily taking deep breaths of the roses' fragrance.

"Next station, Wheeler! Wheeler next!" The brakeman closed the door with a slam.

Luella started up. Placing the flower pot in the old lady's lap, she said hurriedly:

"Please let me give you the rose. It may help to keep you from being lonely. No, no; it doesn't matter. Uncle Frank would wish you to have it if he knew, I am sure. I want you to keep it. This is my station. Goodby, and I hope you will enjoy your new home and all the little grandchildren." Luella's face was bright as a May morning as she clasped the trembling hand in hers.

"God bless you, miss! I can't thank you for this, but the dear Lord will remember." Tears were running down the wrinkled face.

When Uncle Frank tucked the warm robes snugly about Luella in the gay cutter she smiled and waved her hand to a face at the window as the train moved away.

A year rolled by and one day Luella carried another rose to Uncle Frank. His pleasure was all the more than she had anticipated, and after the dinner, when they were alone in the library, he said:

"I have something to tell you, Luella. Last fall I was called to Columbus by an old school mate, to attend his mother in her last illness. I found my patient past medical assistance. She was already on the border land. The local physician had done all for her that could be done, but her life was closing. On a stand near her pillow stood a rose in full bloom. When I spoke in admiration of its loveliness, the old lady told me the story of how a sweet young girl, with a face like a ray of sunshine, had been kind to her on the train when she was lonely, and had given her the rose.

"The blessed child had raised it herself," she said, "to carry to her uncle on his birthday. The dear Lord bless her generous heart. It has been my dearest treasure. Like my wedding roses it is, and it makes me think o' David. It's very soon now I am going to see him, praise the Lord."

When she died we placed one blossom in the casket.

"Luella, I recognized in the sweet, patient face the old lady to whom you waved goodby when you stepped from the train here a year ago today. In no way could you have pleased me better, little girl, than you have in this. As often as I look at the lovely rose you have brought me today, I shall think of the other and its beautiful mission."

Luella's eyes were dim with happy tears, and in her heart sweetly sounded, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these.—Advocate and Guardian.

MOTHER SILVER'S SPECTACLES.

When Mrs Silver stopped one day to think about herself, she found that she was past the age at which most people begin to wear glasses. Her husband had put them on long before. It was a wonder she had not realized sooner how much she needed them. A few evenings later she beamed upon her family at dinner time through a brand-new pair of spectacles. "Now this is like living," she exclaimed. "To think that there's a beautiful pattern in the parlor wall paper, and I never knew it till today! Do you hear, father? That paper's been on the wall three years, and I thought 'twas a plain, tan color. And what's this? A new tablecloth?"

Everybody that was looking at her as she sat down protested. "You know when we got this tablecloth and all about it."

"I never saw that rosebud design till this minute," Mrs. Silver declared. "It's lovely, too. Why I feel as if I had a lot of splendid new things."

Just then something called her from the table; and while she was gone, her husband said musingly: "Your mother is just the opposite from my Aunt Cornelia when she first put on glasses. Uncle Robin brought 'em home from town one day—he thought maybe she was beginning to need them—and the first thing she did after she got 'em on was to take one of the children by the shoulders and say: 'Mercy! I didn't know you had freckles.'"

"But that's just like mother, not the opposite," small Tim demurred.

"No; the difference is that my Aunt Cornelia discovered freckles and dust in corners and grease spots and everything bad until life wasn't worth living to the rest of the family."

"I never thought of that," said the grown-up daughter. "Mother must be discovering unpleasant things too. She hasn't spoken of one; but if her eyesight has been affected ever since we put that paper on the parlor, just think—"

"Just think!" Her father took up the words playfully. "Think of the lines and changes in my face alone that she hasn't known were there! But you won't catch her speaking of them. That isn't your mother's way."

"Let's make her tell if father's face does look any different to her," some one proposed, just as Mrs. Silver, quite unconscious that she was the subject of discussion, came back to the table.

Everybody was looking at her as she sat down and met her husband's eyes. Suddenly she leaned a little forward and studied his face intently with an expression that was tender, loving, sorrowing, all in one.

"Caught!" said one of the boys, under his breath. "What have you just found out about father's face, Mamsie? Tell us."

"H'm! What's that?" Mrs. Silver temporized, looking actually guilty.

"Go ahead and tell 'em, Mother," Mr. Silver coaxed. "I shan't mind."

"Mind!" There was a volume in the one word as she spoke it. Then she took off the wonderful glasses and wiped a little dew from them before she answered, glancing round the circle. "You don't know, children, what it means to me to see your father's smile again across the table as plain as ever. I was thinking when I looked at him, how many of 'em I'd missed."—Ex.

A BIG SUBJECT SIMPLIFIED.

BY JULIA H. THAYER.

"Why, Bertie, what nonsense you are talking! No, of course it isn't that way!"

"It is, sister; it is. Aunt Martha said so—didn't you, auntie?"

"Say what, dear?" The little lady appealed to looked up from the book she was reading, as the boy stood before her, a picture of childish perplexity.

"You did say, didn't you, auntie,—that when good folks die it's only their aches and pains and crying—all the things they don't like and the things God don't like—that are put into the ground and left there? The rest of them goes up to heaven. You told me that, didn't you, Aunt Martha?"

The little fellow's face was full of eager questioning as he waited for the answer.

His aunt looked at him uncomprehendingly for a moment, then she remembered—it all came back to her—what she had said to him two months before, and had forgotten—but he had repeated her very words. She caught him to her heart as she answered, "Say so? Of course I did, and it's all true, every word of it."

THE SABBATH AND THE HOME.

We pride ourselves on our American homes. But reflect how dependent the home is on the Sabbath? In these days of hustle and bustle to earn a livelihood, most men leave their homes early every weekday morning—not a few of them so early that the younger children, especially, have not yet arisen. Nor is it at all an infrequent occurrence that many of these same children have retired before their fathers reach home. The Sabbath is the day to become acquainted with wife and children—to bow the knee with one and all about the family altar, to sit together in the family pew in the sanctuary, to gather together about the family board; and oftentimes it is the only day.

HANDICAPPED? NO.

The crutches seemed not to belong to her at all. As she sat beside me on the train that morning, she rose above them, smiling, happy spirited, and ready, I felt, to do her part sanely in office or shop—for, evidently, she was one of the city's workers.

Dear ones, upon whom the touch of misfortune has been laid, why do you so generally wear the expression of morbid self-consciousness, of self-confessed inferiority, as if you had no right to compete with the strong? How often do we see that "the race is not to the swift," that muscle and sinew are merely physical! Some of the finest work of the world has been done by those who have been "not as others are."

A JAPANESE LEGEND.

Hofus was a poor stone-cutter in Japan. His food was coarse, and his clothing was plain, but he was happy and content with his lot, until one day he took a load of stone to the house of a rich man. When Hofus saw the evidence of wealth, he cried, "Oh, that Hofus were rich."

As Hofus said this a fairy cried, "Have thy wish!" and immediately Hofus was rich. He ceased to work and lived in luxury and contentment, until one day he saw a prince with a snowwhite carriage, snowwhite horse, a golden umbrella and many, many servants.

Then cried Hofus, "Oh, that Hofus were a prince!" No sooner had Hofus uttered his wish than he became a prince. Hofus was happy and content as a prince until one day, riding in his beautiful carriage under his golden umbrella, he sweltered and burned in the rays of the sun.

"The sun is greater than I," cried Hofus. "Oh, that Hofus were the sun!" Immediately Hofus became the sun, and he was happy and content, until a great cloud came and entirely hid the sun.

Then cried Hofus, "The cloud is greater than I. Oh, that Hofus were the cloud!" Immediately Hofus became a cloud. Hofus was happy and content as a cloud, until the cloud fell as rain and swept everything before it except a great rock which stood unmoved by the torrent.

Then cried Hofus, "The rock is greater than I. Oh, that Hofus were only a rock!" Immediately Hofus became a rock, and he was happy and content as a rock, until one day a stone-cutter came to the rock and began to split it.

Then cried Hofus, "The stone-cutter is greater than I. Oh, that Hofus were a stone-cutter!" Immediately Hofus became a stone-cutter, as he had been before, and this time Hofus was really happy and content, for he had learned that there are great disadvantages in every station in life, and that the best place for each of us is exactly where God has put us.

LIFE'S JOURNEY.

Give me my scallop-shell of Quiet,

My staff of Faith to walk upon,

My scrip of Joy, immortal diet,

My bottle of Salvation,

My gown of Glory, hope's true gage;

And thus I'll take my pilgrimage.

There is an idea there. Who that has imagination can not from his porch or open window make a pilgrimage to far lands? The reason we must travel is that when we pay out our money we think we have to get our money's worth in return, and so we begin to look at the landscape—we begin to open our eyes to the beauties and infinities of nature, which in very fact are often no more beautiful there than they are at home.

Lesson VII—November 13.

PAUL BEFORE THE ROMAN GOVERNOR.

(Acts 24:10-27.)

Ch. 24:10. Then Paul, after that the governor had beckoned unto him to speak, answered, Forasmuch as I know that thou hast been of many years a judge unto this nation, I do the more cheerfully answer for myself:

11. Because that thou mayest understand, that there are yet but twelve days since I went up to Jerusalem for to worship.

12. And they neither found me in the temple disputing with any man, neither raising up the people, neither in the synagogues, nor in the city:

13. Neither can they prove the things whereof they now accuse me.

14. But this I confess unto thee, that after the way which they call heresy, so worship I the God of my fathers, believing all things which are written in the law and in the prophets:

15. And have hope toward God, which they themselves allow, that there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both the just and the unjust.

16. And herein do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offense toward God, and toward men.

17. Now after many years I come to bring alms to my nation, and offerings.

18. Whereupon certain Jews from Asia found me purified in the temple, neither with multitude, nor with tumult.

19. Who ought to have been here before thee, and object, if they had ought against me.

20. Or else let these same here say, if they have found any evil doing in me while I stood before the council.

21. Except it be for this one voice, that I cried standing among them, Touching the resurrection of the dead I am called in question by you this day.

22. And when Felix heard these things, having more perfect knowledge of that way, he deferred them and said, When Lysias the chief captain shall come down, I will know the uttermost of your matter.

23. And he commanded a centurion to keep Paul, and to let him have liberty, and that he should forbid none of his acquaintance to minister or come unto him.

24. And after certain days, when Felix came with his wife Drusilla, which was a Jewess, he sent for Paul, and heard him concerning the faith in Christ.

25. And as he reasoned of righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come, Felix trembled, and answered, Go thy way for this time; when I have a convenient season, I will call for thee.

26. He hoped also that money should have been given him of Paul, that he might loose him: wherefore he sent for him the oftener, and communed with him.

27. But after two years Porcius Festus came into Felix' room: and Felix, willing to shew the Jews a pleasure, left Paul bound.

Golden Text: "And herein do I exercise myself to have always a conscience void of offense toward God and toward men" (Acts 24:16).

Catechism—Q. 47. What is forbidden in the First Commandment? A. The First Commandment forbiddeth the denying, or not worshiping and glorifying, the true God as God, and our God; and the giving of that worship and glory to any other, which is due to him alone.

INTRODUCTION.

In order to keep up the historical continuity in the study of the life of Paul, it will be necessary to read and study the 22d, 23d and 24th Chapters of the Book of Acts. Our last lesson closed with the beginning of Paul's address to the Jews from the stairs. Most of the 22d chapter is taken up with this address. It was the simple truth, but the Jews were so unreasonably angry that they raised a great cry and wanted to have him killed. So the chief captain took Paul into the prison and was about to have him scourged. But Paul told him that he was a Roman citizen, upon learning which the Chief Captain treated him with great respect. The next morning he gave the chief priests and all their council the opportunity to interview Paul. They, in turn, grew very angry, and became turbulent as a mob, and the chief captain had to rescue Paul out of their hands and take him for safety to prison. There learning, through Paul's nephew, that a band of forty desperate Jews had conspired to kill Paul, by foul means, he concluded to send Paul for safe keeping to the Governor, Felix, at Caesarea. A troop of soldiers took him, starting out by night, taking with them a letter from the chief captain, Claudius Lysias. So, at Caesarea, Paul was put in comfortable quarters by Felix, and five days after, the Chief Priest, Ananias, and certain rulers, and an orator, Tertullus, came to Caesarea, to have Paul convicted and put to death, if possible, and they made their charges against him with all the unfairness and vehemence they could use. Paul then had the opportunity to make his own statement to Felix, and with this our lesson begins.

EXPOSITORY.

10-21. Paul's address before Felix was a masterpiece of clear and strong argument in his own defense. It is entirely different from the shallow and flattering performance of the hired pleader Tertullus. His accuser had not hesitated to speak falsely and bring in ungrounded charges against Paul. He seemed to think that by smooth words he could deceive Felix, and he put on a surface show of believing that the decision was sure to be against Paul. But flattery of the Governor and denunciation of the innocent prisoner did not win at this time. Paul made a straightforward statement of facts. He told of his reverent attitude in the temple. He said that he was not profaning the temple as was charged, but was there simply to worship. He had lived without offense before his fellow-men. He had gone to Jerusalem, after an absence of many years, and had taken financial help to the poor people among the disciples. Verse by verse shows how he refuted the false charges. He insisted that there were no witnesses in the court who could say that he had ever heard him say a word that was wrong or that he had done any wrong, and if any could say so, they should be there as witnesses. He said that the only thing they could bring against him was that he had spoken of the resurrection of Christ, and he knew this to be a historical fact. So he defends himself in this clear address, and there was no one who could make any legal answer to it.

22. Felix knew something about the Christian faith and people, and knew that Paul was right in his claims and defense of himself. So he dismissed these accusers, saying that he would look into the matter. He expected the chief captain Lysias to come to Caesarea, and said that when he came he would investigate the whole matter thoroughly. So there was nothing more for these priests and this abusive orator, Tertullus, to do, and they had to leave the court. The manliness of Paul had made a favorable impression, and we learn the lesson that truthfulness is a strong weapon.

23. Large liberty was granted Paul. He was kept as a prisoner, to be sure, but this insured his safety from the Jews who wished to murder him. He was under the personal care of a centurion, who was directed to allow him all the liberty possible, and all the privileges he could ask, such as permitting his friends to visit him and to pay attention to him. Paul was usually treated with distinguished honor. He was worthy of it. It is well for us all to so conduct ourselves that we shall have the respect of all those who have good character.

24. The wife of Felix was a Jewess, Drusilla by name, and as she had a natural curiosity to hear about matters which affected her faith and her nation, Felix called Paul before them to hear from him his views as to Christ. It is possible, too, that Felix thought he might gain something from her counsel in the matter. So Paul had another opportunity to make an address and to plead for his life and liberty.

25. But Paul did not plead for himself. He preached a sermon, calculated to reach and win and save Felix and Drusilla, if only they had been willing to listen and heed. But they did not seem to know that they had before them an inspired apostle and one of the very greatest men the world has even seen. They heard without accepting Christ, or repenting of their sins. Paul preached of righteousness and told them of the holiness of God and of the holiness that sinners must seek for through Christ. He told them of temperance, of the good, clean life to which sinners should turn and in which they should live. He told them of God as the great Judge, and of the great Judgment Day to which all human lives are hastening. But instead of repenting of sin, and believing in Christ, and being saved, we read that Felix trembled and yet procrastinated. He told Paul that at some convenient time he would call for him, but he was not now ready for a new life. Alas for the way in which Christ is dismissed by many who tell him that they are not yet ready to be saved. This means death, for, unless one is saved, he is dead and remains dead.

26. The trouble was that Felix would rather make a little money than to do what was just, or to take the course that would save his soul. He had many interviews with Paul, but he was anxious for a ransom from some of Paul's friends and never became a saved man or a just judge.

27. So two whole years went by. Festus came to take the place that Felix held. The term of office closed with Paul still in custody. Rather than offend the Jews, Felix went out of office with this injustice still in existence. Like Pilate, he left his own name to go down into history as an undecided, timorous, unjust official who knew his duty but was unwilling to do it.

THE UNIVERSAL NAME.

BY ALVIN L. SNOW.

'Tis a name that through the ages
Rings and rings and rings the same,
Voiced by peasants or by sages—
Ah, that universal Name!
Now their faults and sins confessing,
Now with words profanely spiced,
Now in cursing, now in blessing,
Utter men the name of Christ.

Oh, that Name! It falls as lightly
From the careless, godless lip
As the dew descending nightly
On the rose whence wild bees sip.
From the tongue of adoration
Full as easily it falls,
Famed 'mid scenes of desolation
Or in earth's most crowded halls.

By that Name what strength is given
To the weary and the weak!
By that Name what bonds are riven
For the souls that freedom seek!
Sweetest peace or widest terror
That most magic Name inspires,
As the soul is cleansed from error
Or remorse awakes its fires.

Oh, that Name! Breathed in disfavor
'Tis a savor but of death;
Breathed with reverence 'tis a savor
Of the life of ceaseless breath.
Oh, that Name above all others,
Ringing evermore the same!
Everywhere it makes us brothers,
And we conquer in that Name!

Circumstances are beyond the control of man, but his conduct is in his own power.—Disraeli.

THE SPIRIT OF WORSHIP.

Some Sabbath schools are entirely barren of the spirit of worship. Late comers interrupt the opening services; and the closing services are noise and confusion. Many Sabbath schools are noisy almost beyond belief. Children play and laugh and older people visit with each other. Boys and girls read the Sabbath-school paper, which is handed to them unfolded, with noise and confusion. All of this can be easily remedied. These same children are perfectly quiet in school five days a week. The Sabbath school is what is simply from lack of management. In other schools quiet prevails from the opening to the close, and young and old are hushed with a spirit of reverence. Late comers have to stand in the lobbies, and wait until intervals between songs, when everything stops while they are taking their seats.

In all meetings for worship, from the first note of the opening voluntary until the benediction, there should be the hush and quiet of the sincere spirit of worship, wherein the soul finds it easy to meditate upon how lovingly kind and adorable God is.

POWER.

The thing in which Christianity differs fundamentally from other religions is power.

Christianity is a religion of power—power from on high.

Moralists appeal to the will. Use your will-power, they say, and force yourself to be good.

And men fail.

The Indian poet tersely expressed a great truth when he wrote:

"O fool, to try to carry thyself upon thine own shoulders!
O beggar, to come to beg at thine own door!"

When the will is sapped and weak, how can it help us? When the cupboard is bare, how can we spread our table?

Christ gives power, heals our sick wills and enables them to function as they should, creates new faith and courage and confidence, and arms us with new strength.

The Christian is carried not "on his own shoulders," but by the power of God.—Ex.

MY VIEWS UPON RELIGION.

All my life I have attended Sabbath school and church. When I was young I went because my parents took me, but now I go because I feel that something is lacking when I stay away. This is the first time I have been compelled to express my views upon the general subject of religion. It may be they will be vague and scattered when I write them, although I have definite thoughts upon the subject in my own mind.

Religion is a necessary part of every man's life. It is the expression of one of the three parts of man's triune nature, the spiritual. There are two great forces in conflict in the world all the time—the good and the evil, for Christ and against Christ. Every one either consciously or unconsciously takes one side or the other in his thought and deeds. There is no compromise. One must determine what is right and wrong for himself, then prayer, study of the Bible, and his conscience.

I believe in getting all the joy and happiness there is out of life. But lasting happiness is not to be gained by satisfying one's personal wants, but by giving. Christ believed in joy, and he himself enjoyed friendship, human society and nature. The Christian religion has in it all the things which are worth living for or attempting to live for. It is practical, because Jesus himself lived the lofty ideals which he taught.—Gladys McKinnie.

TELL HIM SO.

"When a man is doing good work it is good to tell him so while he is doing it rather than to wait until the work is finished. Encouragement while the game is in progress are of more value than praise after the game is over, although both may be welcome." These are the opening words of a letter written to a man who was leading in a difficult and important work. Think of the good this letter must have done the hard-pressed worker!

Now there are many hard-pressed workers who might be helped by good letters, and there are many people who could write these good letters if they only would.

"Only a longed-for letter,
And the writer little knew,
As she penned the loving message,
Of the good that it would do."

A NEW CREATION.

The Bible opens with an account of creation, and before it closes the promise is given of a new creation. Man is to be a new creature. Light was one of the agents employed in the first creation, and it is to be an agency in the new creation. "God, who commanded the light to shine out of the darkness, hath shined into our hearts, to give the light of knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."

Without light there could be no life. What the sun does in the physical world, that the light which comes from the face of Jesus Christ does in the moral and spiritual world.

A new heaven and a new earth would be in vain unless a new heart is put into man. But put a new heart into man and a new heaven and a new earth will be the natural result. The more the heart is exposed to that light, the greater will be the transformation into his likeness. Man is made a new creature only by the light of God which shines in the face of his Son.—United Presbyterian.

"I POUR CONTEMPT ON ALL MY PRIDE."

The life and death of our Lord Jesus Christ are a standing rebuke to every form of pride to which men are liable. Take, for instance:

Pride of birth and rank. "Is not this the carpenter's son?"

Pride of wealth. "The Son of man hath not where to lay his head."

thing come out of Nazareth?" "He shall Pride of respectability. "Can any good be called a Nazarene."

Pride of personal appearance. "He hath no form nor comeliness."

Pride of reputation. "Behold a man gluttonous and wine-bibber, a friend of publicans and sinners"

Pride of independence. "Many others who ministered to him of their substance."
Pride of learning. "How knoweth this man letters, having never learned?"

Pride of superiority. "I am among you as he that serveth." "He humbled himself." "Made a curse for us."

Pride of success. "He came unto his own and his own received him not." "Neither did his brethren believe on him." "He was despised and rejected of men."

Pride of bigotry. "Forbid him not, for he that is not against us is on our part."

Pride of resentment. "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do."
"Friend, wherefore art thou come?"

Pride of reserve. "My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death. Tarry ye here and watch with me." "The Son of man must suffer many things and be rejected."

Pride of sanctity. "This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them."—Indian Witness.

The College and Religious Life

"The Christian college has its place in the life of America today because it recognizes the importance of the individual, and also because the Christian college believes that the goals of democracy can be attained not merely along intellectual and vocational lines, but also along the lines of religious and spiritual development. The Christian college will continue to hold its place in the educational life of our country so long as there are educational leaders who believe, as does the Presbyterian Church, that it is not a sane method nor a safe policy for a community to educate its youth without full and due attention to the development of the moral and spiritual sense."—Dr. Stockwell.

To the above should be added the further condition that the Christian college be given adequate endowment to enable it to compete with the tax-supported institutions.

YOUNG PEOPLE

PRAYER MEETING, NOVEMBER 13.

Endeavor Topic: Bible Examples of Personal Evangelism. Matt. 4:18-22; 9:9, 10.

Christ gave very distinct and direct commands to his disciples, before his Ascension, to go out into all the world and evangelize the people of all the nations. It was his desire and purpose that all the world should become Christian and be saved. It was to be led into this relation to Christ and his Church through the preaching of the Gospel, and the laying down of the conditions of life. Salvation depended on faith in Christ as the Savior, and he instructed his disciples to tell this plainly. They were to make every one know that if they believed in Christ and were baptized they would be saved, but that if they did not believe they would be damned, and lost forever.

It is this work that the Church of Jesus Christ is engaged in today. It is for this it exists. It must never forget that it is to be busy in seeking souls, that they may be saved. The Gospel is to be preached in home lands and in foreign lands, with the purpose of leading souls to salvation. This is the work of evangelization. It is the chief work of the Christian Church, and must never be forgotten nor neglected.

Of course we see that this is the work of the foreign missionary in foreign lands. The people there do not know about Christ, or the Gospel, or the Bible. They must be told in plain and simple language. They need instruction in the fundamental truths of Christianity, and then, after learning these they need to be led to accept Christ, individually, as their own Savior. We expect to hear from our missionaries that the Gospel is making progress and that many are accepting Christ as their own Savior. If they do not do this work they are not doing what foreign missionaries are expected to do.

But it is just as necessary in our own land. There are many professing Christians here, but there are tens of millions who are not. Over fifty millions of persons in our United States are not yet professed followers of Christ and members of his Church. If they do not personally believe in Christ they are not saved, and if they are not saved they are lost. The great work of the Church in our own country is to reach these lost souls, tell them of their need of Christ and try to win them to salvation. These millions are to be led to faith in Christ, and into a place in his Church. Let the Church never forget this. It is not sufficient to be busy in schemes of social service and all of that. The first and all-important work is the salvation of souls, and there are millions here who are unsaved as surely as are the millions of India and China.

Christ made definite calls to various persons to believe in him and follow him. They heard his voice and yielded their lives to him and became, many of them, his personal disciples. Twelve of them became, in a very peculiar way, his followers, and personal workers, and were sent out by him to evangelize the Jewish people, and afterward, to evangelize the world. But before these men could do work for saving the souls of others, their own souls must be saved. So he called them to believe and follow him. So, before we ourselves can do anything to evangelize and save the world today, we must, first of all, be saved ourselves.

But Christ called many people to love and trust him, and be saved. We read of his anxious and loving efforts for the salvation of the multitudes. Christ set the example of general work for the saving of souls, and sent his disciples out into the world to do the very work that they had seen him doing. It is this work that we ourselves must be doing in our own day and our own land.

It is amazing that in many churches there is no report of a single soul being saved, for years at a time. Every minister, and every elder, and every church member should be on the continual search for souls, and should be urging them to give themselves to Christ and become members of his Church. Over two million persons became members of the churches in the United States last year, the largest number in any one year in the history of the country. But there are many millions more to be reached.

TWO MEN.

"How much can I get?" a young man said:
The morning of life was fair,
And the things to have and the things to hoard

Were glittering everywhere.
"It's every man for himself," said he,
"And I'm going to have my share."

"How much can I give?" a young man said;
The morning of life was fair,
And the things to do and the things to be
Were beckoning everywhere.
"It's every man for his brother," said he,
"And I'm going to do my share."

At last, as the evening shadows fell,
A millionaire lay ill,
Served and tended by hireling hands,
Unerring and deft and chill;
There were those who knew him and loved him not—
But they wanted his money so!
And they waited and fretted and sighed and said:
"Why doesn't he hurry and go?"

At last, as the evening shadows fell,
A penniless man lay ill,
Watched and tended by loving hands,
And their voices were hushed and still;
And pale and saddened, they wept and said:
"We can not let him go!
If God would but spare him a few years more—Because we need him so!"

—Ruby Elizabeth Hines, in Epworth Herald.

HOW TO ENJOY YOUR WORK.

A cheery business man called to a passerby as he hurried down the front step to catch a suburban train, "This is a great morning, isn't it?"

A moody student, looking up from his contemplation of the sidewalk, in surprise, thought, "Why, this is a fine morning." he unconsciously straightened up his shoulders and went on his way with a brisker step.

As the cheery business man entered his office he said to his stenographer, "Isn't this a great day?" The thought cheered the girl in her work and her fingers flew faster, the keys clicked merrily, and she went on with her work, putting more heart into it.

Business over, as he returned to his home he greeted his wife with, "This has been a great day," as with a sigh of comfort he sank into his easy chair.

She smiled and echoed softly, "A great day!"

PRAYER MEETING

NOVEMBER 9.
THE CHRISTIAN IN POLITICS
I Peter 2:11-17.

It is the duty of every Christian to be interested in politics. It is a gross neglect of duty for any one to fail to do his full share in caring for the Government under which he lives. He should be sure to vote and to vote for good men, and then to make known to those who are in office his desires in regard to law and its enforcement.

Our lives are affected, very much more intimately than we sometimes think, by the kind of government under which we live. We have a good Government, with a strong Constitution, and good laws, and we have the opportunity of voting, year after year, on who shall be our officers and what shall be our laws. It is our duty to see that all this is maintained and preserved. If we do not we may lose it. It is utterly preposterous and unchristian for any one not to take advantage of his opportunities, and vote and work for the preservation of our own excellent Government, and see that it is properly administered by good officials.

Suppose we were so unfortunate as to live under the control of such influences as govern in Turkey. How difficult we would find it to be Christians, and to maintain our Christian homes and churches, and have any of the liberties that we prize so highly. God has been good to us in giving us the best Government in the world, but we must be wise and faithful and diligent in taking care of it, or it may deteriorate and be lost.

Suppose we were so circumstanced as to live under the horrible oppressions that have come to the Christian people of Armenia because they have so weak a country; or if as Protestants we lived in Italy, or Spain, or Mexico, and were deprived of the things we prize so highly, or were surrounded by influences that took away from us the best enjoyments of life? Let us thank God for our free and blessed country and do all we can to safeguard it.

Politics is not something base or debasing. It is simply taking care of our country and its public institutions. It is base and debasing only because a great many base and evil men see in the administration of public affairs the opportunity to serve themselves and their own interests, and to do what is dishonest and dishonorable, and want to keep good people from finding them out and interfering with their plans and operations. It is the duty of all good people to take an earnest interest in public matters, and to see that everything in the city life and national life is carried on as purely as in the home and church. If they would do this there would be no more talk about politics being impure, or about the duty of clean people to keep out of unclean political life.

A city should be conducted just as economically and safely as one would carry on his home or his own private business. It is even more important that it should be so carried on, because the welfare of so many more persons is concerned. It is a strange thing that a city, in which the life and comfort and health and welfare of many men and women and children are concerned, should be carried on in a way that is for their injury and robbery.

Let us be good citizens. Let us be determined that our country and our city life shall be well guarded and honestly carried on. Now that women are voters, it should be their determination to help all good men carry on public life as purely and as well as a good home is carried on. We suffer when political matters are neglected. We are advantaged when political matters are carried on in a pure and proper way. We owe it to God, and to our families, and to all the people, as well as to ourselves, to be good and upright and Christian citizens.

THE OLD MINISTER.

BY CHARLES W. FLETCHER.

His work is done; his strength no more
In flow, unmeasured, can he pour,
That he may good impart.
His form is bent in weakness now,
Deep furrows seam his whitened brow;
Let's keep them from his heart.

Another voice proclaims the Word
Where once his messages were heard;
He sits, infirm, apart.
His day of work has quickly sped,
The snow of age is on his head;
Let's keep it off his heart.

His wife beside him, bravely shares
His twilight years, his evening cares,
And tries to do her part.
They've spent their lives in high employ
To bring to us abiding joy;
Let's keep that in their heart!
—Standard.

"BE COURTEOUS."

These are words of Scripture. Our dictionary tells us that this means: "Of courtlike, or elegant and condescending manners; manifesting courtesy; obliging polite; civil; complaisant." All the assets of a good Christian. How much more can be accomplished in every walk of life if we have regard for the opinion of our fellowman. And is this not one of the first principles of courtesy? There is never any real regret for having manifested that spirit. The following simple lines easily remembered taught to the young, might be helpful possibly also to their elders, which convey the spirit of courtesy:

"Hearts like doors can open with ease
To very, very little keys
And don't forget that two are these
I thank you, sir, and if you please?"

"I SHALL BE SATISFIED."

"Sin is a blunder," says some one, and he has put the case most mildly. It is all of that and much more. But its early promises are flattering. Over and over does the warning come to us, not only from God's Word, but from the facts of every day life, "Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Righteousness and faith in God have the promise of satisfaction. Whatever life's trials the Christian can say: "I shall be satisfied when I awake in thy likeness." This assurance gives satisfaction even in the most disturbing experience of the present life, but the way of sin is the path of bitter disappointment and eventual shame.

Lord Byron at the age of thirty-three, after he had had his fill from the cup of sin wrote these lines:

"Fame, wisdom, love, and power were mine,
And health and youth possessed me;
My goblets blushed from every vine,
And lovely forms caressed me;
I sunned my heart in beauty's eyes
And felt my soul grow tender;
All earth can give or mortal prize
Was mine of regal splendor.
I strive to number o'er what days
Remembrance can discover,
Which all that life or earth displays
Would lure me to live over.
There rose no day, there rolled no hour
Of pleasure unembittered;
And not a trapping deak'd my power
That galled not while it glittered."

In the darkness of this world the only light that never goes out is the light of love.

RAILROAD STRIKE CALLED OFF.

The railroad strike, called for Oct. 30th, was called off by the leaders of the railway brotherhoods last Friday.

A statement for the Brotherhoods, issued by L. E. Sheppard, President of the Order of Railway Conductors, said that the unions had decided to call off the strike because of "the growing public opinion that the strike would be against the Labor Board, and consequently the Government, and not against the railroads. It was evident, also, that the entire Washington Administration was opposed to us, and that we have had little chance of gaining our objectives."

RAIL BOARD HEAD SAYS BOARD LACKS POWER.

The transportation act needs legislative dentistry to provide against future railroad strikes, Ben W. Hooper, vice-chairman of the United States Railroad Labor Board, asserted last Sunday in an address before the men's class of a Chicago church.

"In my judgment, Congress should not have perpetrated the irony of pulling the board's teeth and then telling it to go forth and bite those who interrupt traffic and strangled commerce," he said.

"The transportation act, under which the board operates, is unique in one respect. There is no other court, tribunal or agency of the Government that does not possess the power to inflict penalties for the violation of its decisions.

"The transportation act uses the word 'shall' up to a certain point and there its mandatory powers cease.

"It says the carriers and employes 'shall' confer and negotiate for the settlement of their disputes, but if they do not agree they 'shall' take the matter up to the Railroad Labor Board, and that the board 'shall' decide the dispute.

"Here the law ceases to be imperative. It provides that if the board, upon inquiry, finds that its decision has been violated it 'may make public its decision in such a manner as it may determine.'

"In other words, the board may point the finger of scorn at the violator, and call down upon its head the denunciation of the public."

JAP MINISTER READY TO REDUCE NAVY.

Japan stands ready to cut down her navy if the Powers reach an understanding at the forthcoming conference at Washington on limitation of armament and Far Eastern questions, according to Admiral Tomosaburo Kato, member of the Japanese delegation to Washington.

The Admiral, who is Japan's Naval Minister, made this statement in an address to the passengers of the vessel upon which the delegation is traveling.

He declared that, although he had been criticised as the man responsible for Japan's eight-and-eight naval building program and therefore, loath to undo his work, nothing was farther from the truth.

Admiral Kato asserted that his position had been outlined in an interview given to the Associated Press at Tokyo last year, and he asserted that Japan was the first of the Powers definitely to set a limit to which she was willing to cut her navy.

On the other hand, the Japanese delegate said, if no national accord is reached at Washington, Japan would not and could not curtail her navy program an inch.

HUNGARIAN UPRISING SHORT LIVED.

The attempt of former Emperor Charles to again sit on the Hungarian throne came to a sudden end. After the first skirmish with Hungarian troops, Charles surrendered and is now imprisoned in the Benedictine Abbey of Tipany, on Platten Lake, where he will live until further orders.

Members of Charles' Cabinet and other prisoners have been removed to military prisons in Budapest. Besides members of the Cabinet there are being held as prisoners a large number of Royalist officers and prominent Legitimists, including Prince Ludwich Windisch-Graetz.

EXPORTS SHOW DECREASE.

Exports to Europe during September fell off by about $31,000,000 as compared with August, while imports increased by approximately $4,000,000, according to foreign trade figures issued by the Commerce Department. Imports from South America during the month increased by about $6,000,000, while exports remained practically unchanged.

During September exports to Europe aggregated $178,000,000, as compared with $209,000,000 in August, and with $313,000,000 in September, 1920. Imports from Europe for the month, aggregated $63,000,000 as against $59,000,000 in August and $91,000,000 in September a year ago.

Exports to Europe during the nine months ended with September aggregated $1,860,000,000 as compared with $3,297,000,000 during the corresponding months of 1920, while imports for the nine months aggregated $555,000,000 against $990,000,000 during the same period last year.

Exports to South America during September aggregated $13,913,000 as compared with $13,919,000 in August, and with $54,000,000 in September, 1920, while imports for the month totaled $17,000,000 as against $23,000,000 in August and $62,000,000 in September a year ago.

The Carolina and East and West Florida coast was swept by a tropical storm last week, with a resulting loss of upwards of a million dollars.

Only the narrow margin of eight votes prevented the expulsion of Representative Blanton, of Texas, from the House. He was charged with having used the privilege of "extending his remarks in the Record" to publish a document described at his trial as "unspeakably vile."

The result of the vote carried with it public censure by the Speaker of the House.

After Jan. 1, 1922, the excess profits tax will not be operative and one of the biggest drawbacks to the resumption of industrial activity will be out of the way.

This was settled when the Senate voiced its approval of the repeal of the tax embodied in the revenue revision passed by the House and recommended by the Senate Finance Committee.

Plans for the establishment of a "Bank of United States and Europe," which would have a capital of $1,000,000,000, were presented to President Pilsudski, former Minister Skirmunt and Minister of Finance Michalski of Poland, by Frank A. Vanderlip, the New York financier. Under Mr. Vanderlip's plan subsidiary banks would be established and exchange of products between nations would be on the dollar basis.

Philadelphia police are to have a "gas battalion," which will be utilized to repel disorderly mobs and in cases where criminals barricade themselves in buildings and defy authorities.

Council's Finance Committee has approved an appropriation of $2,500 to purchase tear gas, gas bombs, masks and other equipment.

A portrait of Theodore Roosevelt will appear for the first time on a Government security, Secretary of the Treasury Andrew W. Mellon has announced, in the issuance of the new Treasury savings certificates. The $25 denomination has been selected to honor the former President, since the issue will be most available to the general public.

An announcement from Washington states that the war debt of the United States is being retired at a rate of almost $1,000,000,000 a year as a result of thrift and general economies.

The debt now stands at slightly less than $24,000,000,000, including unfunded loans.

At the present rate of reduction the debt will be eliminated in less than twenty years, provided that the funding of the foreign loans of almost $10,000,000,000 is accomplished.

Total earnings of the United States Steel Corporation for the third quarter of the current year, announced after last week's meeting of the directors, dwindled to $18,918,068. This is the smallest total of any quarter since March, 1915, when the earnings fell to $12,457,809 and no dividends were paid on the common stock.

Nearly $2,000,000 in currency and negotiable securities was stolen from a Post office truck in New York City last week.

Railroad heads declared the nation's carriers will go ahead with their plans to seek new wage cuts through Railroad Labor Board hearings, despite the announcement from the unions that their action in calling off the strike scheduled for Oct. 30 had been influenced by the board's announcement that pay reduction petitions for any class would not be considered until working conditions for that class had been settled.

"The calling off of the strike will have no effect on the plans announced by the carriers, Oct. 14, to seek immediate wage reductions so that rates could be reduced," said Samuel Felton, president of the Chicago, Great Western, and chairman of the Association of Western Railroad Executives.

Marshal Foch, commander-in-chief of the allied armies during the war, arrived in this country last week, to act as military adviser to the French commissioners during the Armament Conference.

The committee charged with reducing the number of Russian Government employes announces that 2,500,000 are to be discharged.

The entire union policy has been changed by the union's representatives, arranging conditions to suit the Government's new economic policy.

It has been decided to admit the principle of private management, and scales of wages are to be determined in accordance with the fluctuation of market prices where the work is done.

These steps are to be taken in an effort to give living wages to workers, thus inducing them to cease thievery and speculative activities, which until recently have been necessary in order that they might gain a living.

In addition, health and disability insurance plans are to be re-established, partly at the expense of the lessees of factories.

The United States has a potential voting strength of 54,421,832, the Census Bureau has announced. The 1920 poll of the nation shows 27,661,880 men and 26,759,952 women twenty-one years of age and over classed as citizens. In the male division were included 2,972,006 negroes, 61,229 Indians, 53,411 Japanese, 46,979 Chinese and 7,345 of other races.

Twenty-seven persons, eight of whom lost their lives when attempting to save the lives of others, were recognized formally by the Carnegie Hero Fund Commission at its fall meeting. Four heroes received silver medals and the others medals of bronze.

Construction of a modern tramway system will wipe out the ancient walls of Peking, called by the populace "the glory of the city," if plans submitted by the Peking Tramway Company materialize.

The company, in its memorandum, refers to the city walls as "useless" and cites the "fine example of Tientsin," where the walls were razed several years ago.

The proposal has called forth strong opposition from foreigners and Chinese alike, and pressure is being brought to bear upon the municipality to preserve the ancient walls at any cost.

French equipment would be used in building the new tramway system, it is stated here.

A plan for linking up Sweden with England by means of a train ferry to cost £10,000,000 ($50,000,000) is being considered by business men of the two nations. The scheme aims at establishment of a daily service by at least six 13,000-ton ships of 18 knots speed, each capable of carrying fifty railroad cars. The Swedish government is understood to be willing to guarantee a 10 per cent return over a given number of years, if Britain will guarantee the capital necessary. The route suggested runs from Hull to Gothenburg and there is suggestion of an extension across the Baltic, to provide direct communication between Hull and Petrograd.

Centre College, famous for three generations as the college in which great statesmen were trained, added athletics to its list of achievements last Saturday. The Centre football team defeated Harvard, on Harvard's own grounds, by a score of 6 to 0.

Thirty-six persons were killed and fifty out of the 110 houses comprising the mining town of Britannia Beach, B. C., were swept away by a cloudburst and flood Oct. 31.

Marshal Foch broke the order of official receptions last Saturday to call and pay his respects to former President Wilson, but Mr. Wilson's condition made it impossible for him to receive the French Marshal.

Based on the statistics of thirty-two cities, the cost of living in the United States decreased 1.7 per cent from last May to September and 18.1 per cent from June, 1920, announced by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The increase from May to September ranged from 0.1 per cent for Portland, Me., to 3.8 per cent for Jacksonville, Fla., with New York showing a decrease of 1.1 per cent; Boston, 0.9 per cent; Cincinnati, 2.8 per cent; Denver, 0.6 per cent; Houston, 2.6 per cent; Memphis, 1.3 per cent; San Francisco, 1.3 per cent, and Seattle, 2.6 per cent.

The situation in England as regards trade and unemployment is worse than at any time since the end of the Napoleonic Wars, declared Prime Minister David Lloyd George, in the House of Commons, in outlining the government's policy on these two subjects.

At present, he said, there are 1,750,000 persons unemployed, and added that the greatest unemployment, to the extent of 17 per cent, was in the metal trades.

He declared that the causes for this situation could all be summed up in one word—war.

As a part of the government's plan of alleviation, he said the government proposed to ask Parliament for an appropriation of another £300,000 to enable former service men to emigrate to the Dominions, where he said 60,000 already had settled with government assistance.

Turning to the question of trade, Mr. Lloyd George said there undoubtedly were signs of revival, but that also there were very important industries which were not showing signs of revival.

He said it was true that trade was beginning to move, but that a man would have to be very sanguine who could predict a return to normal conditions at an early date.

Miss Caroline Ewen, who occupied the family property in a suburb of New York for years with her two sisters, had a passion for caring for cats. It was her dream that every cat should have plenty of catnip, milk and a comfortable backyard fence to play on during every one of its nine lives.

She devoted her life to establishing sanatoriums and relief organizations for stray cats, and when she died left all her estate, amounting to $60,000, save $500, for carrying on the work. She cut off her two sisters in her will because they were not sufficiently enthusiastic about cats.

Ordinary expenditures of the Government fell off by nearly $25,000,000 during September, as compared with August, according to the monthly statement by the Treasury, while payments on the public debts increased by more than $800,000,000.

During September ordinary expenditures totaled $266,523,932, as against $291,157,847 in August, while public debt, disbursements aggregated $1,173,842,743, compared with $237,519,233 in the previous month.

Redemption of certificates of indebtedness amounting to $1,051,903,950 accounted for the bulk of the disbursements.

HOME AND FARM

GULYAS.

The gulyas, or as the Americanized version is, goulash, is essentially a national meat dish of Hungary. Folklore has it that this dish was handed down from the early Tartars, and that it consisted of meat cut in blocks of suitable size of easy eating, a mess of onions, and highly seasoned with paprika.

Cut three-fourths pound of beef from the neck or shin in two-inch pieces. Cut three-fourths pound of veal from scrag end of neck or from knuckle in the same size pieces. Place five tablespoons of melted suet in a heavy saucepan and when smoking add the meat and stir with a large spoon for five minutes. Now add ten small onions, pared and cut in halves, one-half cup of boiling water, cover closely and let smother on the simmer burner.

Add a clove or garlic and scald one-half dozen red peppers with boiling water, then cut in half and remove the seeds. Now lay the peppers on the cutting board or table, and with a blunt knife scrape the pulp of the pepper from the skin and add to the gulyas. Now, about one-half hour before the stew is ready, add one cup of stewed tomatoes, drained dry, one-fourth cup of water, three tablespoons of cornstarch, dissolved in water. Bring quickly to a boil and then add three-fourths cup of thick sour cream, one-fourth teaspoon of caraway seeds, one teaspoon of paprika, one teaspoon of salt. Serve scalding-hot.

This dish has many varieties, as it is served in different parts of the country. The farm people prepare gulyas as given, but add dumplings, prepared as follows. When ready to serve, and while the gulyas is cooking, mince fine three onions, four strips of bacon. Cook slowly until the bacon is nicely browned and then add one cup of bread crumbs, one-half teaspoon of paprika, one-half teaspoon of thyme, one teaspoon of salt. Mix, then turn into a bowl to let cool, then add one cup of mashed potatoes, one well-beaten egg, three tablespoons of water, three-fourths cup of flour, sifted into mixture, two level teaspoons of baking powder.

Work to form a dough and then form into balls the size of an egg. About twenty minutes before serving the gulyas drop the dumplings in the large pot of boiling water and cook for twenty minutes. Lift and then drain on a cloth and serve with gulyas.

A gulyas made of lamb or chicken is delicious.

Cut two pounds of breast of lamb in small pieces and wash and then drain on a cloth and roll in flour. Place in a large sausepan on the fire and shake every little while; the meat must become very brown. Add one cup of water, one and one-half cups of sliced onions, one-half cup of sliced carrots, three red peppers, prepared as directed in Hungarian gulyas. Allow the mixture to cook very slowly and stir frequently. Cook for one and one-half hour and then add one and one-half teaspoons of salt, one teaspoon of paprika, one-half cup of cold water, four tablespoons of cornstarch and one cup of thick sour cream. Dissolve four tablespoons of cornstarch in the one-half cup of cold water. Bring the gulyas to a boil, cook ten minutes and sprinkle with finely minced parsley, then serve.

Butter-Scotch Pie.—One cup brown sugar, yolks of two eggs, two cups sweet milk, one cup water, lump of butter size of small egg, one tablespoonful flour. Mix sugar and flour, cream in butter and yolks of eggs, add one cup of milk, having remainder of milk and the water heating on stove; stir all together and cook until it thickens; flavor with vanilla. Pour into crust already baked. Beat whites of eggs stiff, add three tablespoons sugar, spread over top and set in oven until the whites are light and slightly browned.

This makes two small pies or one large one. You may substitute maple sugar for brown, and another variation used is a cup of maple sirup with two tablespoonfuls sugar and then using only one-half cup water. When you do this beat the sirup and water together, mixing the two tablespoons of sugar with the flour, butter and eggs.

With Macaroni.—A left over of macaroni combines delightfully with a few oysters. Use a layer of the macaroni and a layer of oysters, as for scalloped oysters. Season in the same way, and if cheese is liked, cover the top with it before baking. Any white sauce left over and added to the dish improves it. Cook until most of sauce or moisture is absorbed, as few things are more unpalatable than a scallop that suggests bread-and-milk poultice.

Braised Beef with Vegetables.—Two pounds beef, one cup cut carrots, one cup cut onions, one cup cut and skinned tomatoes, one-half cup cut celery, one tablespoon salt, two tablespoons sugar, one-eighth teaspoon white pepper, one-eighth teaspoon paprika, one tablespoon flour, one tablespoon caramel.

Wipe the meat with piece of wet cheesecloth, put into braising pan (double roast pan), with all the vegetables, salt, pepper, add one cup water and reduce the heat of cover, place in hot oven. After one hour add one cup water and reduce the heat of the oven; bake two hours. Remove the meat to large platter; to the gravy add the flour, mixed with a little cold water and the caramel; boil three minutes; pour over the meat and garnish with parsley. Serve with border of boiled rice or hominy.

The tender leaves and small ends of the stalks of celery should never be thrown away. If dried they are found excellent for flavoring soups.

WHO IS JANE'S TEACHER?

BY ANNE GOODWIN WILLIAMS.

National Kindergarten and Elementary College.

"Who is Jane's teacher?" we asked of the mother of a charming little eight year old girl. The mother mentioned the name of Jane's teacher in the public school and then together we performed some arithmetical problems to prove that "Miss Bennett" was only one of Jane's many teachers and that her teaching hours were less than those of some of the others.

Suppose, we said, that Jane sleeps from seven o'clock until seven, then in a year she has 4,380 waking hours—and only 1,000 of those are spent in school during the year—What of the 3,380 hours remaining? Who is teaching Jane, then? She is certainly learning. Sometimes her playmates are her teachers, with lessons sometimes helpful, sometimes harmful. The father's teaching hours are limited to Sundays and holidays with an occasional evening hour; the Sunday school teacher may get twenty-five hours a year, but of course, the real teacher is the mother. Every day of the year, she teaches her little daughter; even during the child's sickness lessons continue, lessons of patience, gentleness and self-control.

If any one were to ask of the school teacher that she teach music, art, literature, domestic science and manual training, she would know it was impossible. And yet, that is just what is demanded of the mother as an educator.

Music! Yes, she is teaching music when she sings at her work or helps Jane select good music for the Victrola instead of jazz. And as she arranges pictures, she tastefully, with appropriate pictures, she is often unconsciously forming the child's taste in art.

"What stories shall I read to the children?" we kindergartners are asked again and again by eager mothers, who feel that ordinary "trashy" stories are not good enough for the children who are so greatly influenced by the stories they hear and read.

The mother knows—this wise mother-educator, who is asked to teach domestic science, how necessary it is for her little daughter to learn helpfulness in household duties. "I can't iron big things yet, but I can iron all the handkerchiefs, daddy's and mother's and John's and mine," said little Jane with pride.

Actions are judged right or wrong according to mother's approval or disapproval. She is, indeed, the great teacher of morals. "Slip in behind those people, so the conductor won't see you," I heard a woman say to a little boy one day as I was boarding a crowded street car. He succeeded in "fooling the conductor," and in getting a definite lesson in cheating and in dishonor.

Religious training, as well as moral, is part of the great task and the joyous task of the teacher-mother—and is it not a glad sign for future America that so many mothers of our great country are, in their hearts, uniting in the prayer of "Motherhood," so beautifully given by Eleanor Robbins Wilson, in a recent number of Good Housekeeping?

"So short a time at my command
These children that I hold tonight,
God give me grace to understand,
Wisdom to guide their steps aright.
That I may be throughout the land,
A lamp unto their feet for light.

"So short a time do small hands cling,
With confidence of babyhood,
Let me not idly dream the thing,
But live the noble part I should,
That henceforth from such mothering
They shall instinctively seek good.

"So short a time for my embrace,
For love, cheer, comfort, lullabies,
God help me hallow the brief space
That turns to gold each sacrifice—
So surely does a mother's grace
Build her soul's mansion in the skies."

HOW SOME FLOWERS GOT THEIR NAMES.

The names of flowers are often very interesting. The iris, that tall, purple, lily-like flower that grows wild amid long green rushes, has one of the old names for the rainbow. It is called "fleur de lys," lily flower. The gladiolus means little sword, so named for the sharp-pointed green leaves, which are much like the iris leaves, though they grow differently. The primrose is really the prim-ola, or "first little flower of the spring," but its name sounds as if it meant a prim or very neat and tidy little rose. The tuberose is another flower that sounds as if it were a kind of rose, but the name refers to the form of the root, which grows in tubers. A potato is a tuberous root, too.

The sunflower's name is easily to understand. Hollyhock is said to be really holy hock, so named because it was brought from the Holy Land. Tulip is from a word meaning a turban or head dress. Crocus is from a Greek name word meaning saffron or yellow. Narcissus and hyacinth are both names of beautiful youths of whom old-time stories are told. Narcissus was the vain youth who stood with bent head to look at himself in the water. This flower grows with its head bent at right angles from the stem.—Ex.

COMMON SENSE.
BY A BUSINESS WOMAN.

In the business world there are many "traps" and "snares" for girls who are prone to be fast. A practical friend said that "it was in the blood." People can be decent if they want to be so. There are many conscientious, self-respecting working girls who attend to their vocations and draw their salaries. A jolly employer congratulates himself on the possession of a valuable secretary. She is very homely and no silly dudes make dates with her. Her bank account is growing and she is to be congratulated. Some girls pretend to work, but under it all they make it an opportunity for sentiment, otherwise "slush." Employers pay them to be busy, and not be continually patronizing the beauty box and mirror and powdering the nose!

There are veritable "man hunters," and these girls know the size of young men's salaries. Others are dignified and have educated wills. Beauty often besieges the business man. An employer rebuked his stenographer, and she wept like a child; then the silly thing threw herself into his arms, without an invitation; she whimpered and whispered, "You know I love you." He was a gray-haired man of fifty, with a wife and grown children. He gently placed her in a chair and gave her a glass of ice water. Later he gave her an envelope containing her salary one month in advance and bade her seek another situation.

A handsome young secretary was annoyed with attentions of the girls in the office. A bunch of beauty roses were placed on his desk with this note: "We are in love with you. We would like to be your best girls." Signed, "Three Girl Admirers."

His dignified reply was: "My wife is my 'best girl' and my two little children are my jewels." That was sufficient.

AN INDIAN CANOE.

"Oh, Uncle Henry," cried a small boy, "where did you get that little boat? Isn't it a fine one?"

"That came from up North, Donald," said Uncle Henry. "It's an Indian canoe, and I saw the Indian who made it."

"Oh, Uncle Henry, did you really?"

"Yes, indeed," replied his uncle, "and it took a good deal of skill to make it. Every Indian boy is ambitious to learn how to make a good canoe. How would you like to own this one, Donald?"

"Own it? I own that canoe?" gasped Donald, pleased and surprised at so generous an offer.

"Certainly. That very canoe. Why not?"

"Oh, oh, Uncle—"

"If you will cut the grass in my yard, and do it well, I'll pay you by giving you the canoe."

"Where's your lawn-mower?" asked Donald, eagerly, "I'll begin this minute."

"It's in the tool house," answered his uncle.

So Donald ran off to the tool house and soon returned with the lawn-mower. For over an hour he pushed it up and down the yard; then he ran into the house and called "Uncle Henry, please bring me the canoe. I'm all through."

"Oh, are you?" asked his uncle in great surprise, "there's a patch over there by the garden—and another by the kitchen walk that don't look as though they had been touched since last week. Of course, if you'd rather not finish your job, I'll pay you fifteen cents for what you've done. But that little canoe—you see it's made of real birch-bark and by a genuine Indian—and well made, too—sewed and bound firmly and neatly. It wouldn't be right for me to give you that unless you had done the whole job, Donald, and done it well. I'm sorry, but I can't do it."

Back to the yard went Donald. "I'll try it again," he said.

For an hour longer he cut and trimmed, till the lawn was as smooth as a green rug.

Then he brought Uncle Henry out to inspect the job. "All right, my boy," said Uncle Henry. "Here is your canoe."—Ex.

My young son used to have a great deal of trouble in getting his stockings pulled up smoothly over his underwear, and would always call me to help him. I solved this problem by sewing a short piece of white elastic, about a quarter of an inch wide, at the bottom of the leg of the underwear, tacking it on each side. The elastic slips underneath the foot and holds the leg down smoothly, so that the stockings may be pulled up without any effort. I have used this several years and am still using it. Try it.—Ex.

Family Affection.—Henry's father, a farmer and stockgrower, took several carloads of hogs, reared on his own farm, to Chicago, where he sold them to a great pork-packing firm.

While in Chicago Henry's father received the following letter from his little boy:

"Dear Papa,—Did you see Mr. Armour kill the big fat hog with the black tail and didn't he think it was a buster? I was sorry to see the hogs leave the farm, and you most of all.

Theology or Ornithology.—A woman entered the Naval Academy library at Annapolis and approached the attendant at the desk.

"Can you think of something interesting that I have not read?" she asked.

"You might like James Lane Allen's 'A Kentucky Cardinal,'" he suggested.

The seeker for the interesting looked doubtful. "But—it sounds like a religious book. I don't believe I want a religious book."

The attendant smiled reassuringly. "This cardinal is a bird," he replied.

She drew herself up indignantly at once and said, sharply, "That is no recommendation to me whatever, sir!"

"Begorra," said his neighbor, sympathetically, "it can't be very pleasant for either of you!"

GOD'S WAY OF PEACE

"Many nations shall come, and say: Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths.

"And he shall judge among many people, and rebuke strong nations afar off; and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more.

"But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid: for the mouth of the Lord of hosts hath spoken it."

—Micah 4: 2-4.

"Unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulder; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The Mighty God, The Everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end."—Isaiah 6: 7

OUR EXCHANGES

MAJORITY AND MINORITY.

The rights of the minority in any social organizations are not so important as to nullify the rights of the majority. The majority should study considerateness; the minority, obedience.—Western Christian Advocate.

THE ORDER OF THE THOUSAND-FOLD."

The unique title is that of a group of church people, who have bound themselves "to pray daily to be made a thousandfold more useful than ever before. The intention is that those who co-operate by prayer and service in the work of the church, paying no dues, not waiting to be elected or enrolled, will have their names written in heaven and the angels will know the number, though it may be hidden from us.—Living Church.

PARASITES.

Capital and labor would get along better if there weren't so many men trying to get capital without labor.—New Haven Register.

A SERIOUS OBSTACLE.

An obstacle in the way of peace is the fact that the milk of human kindness won't satisfy a thirst for the cream of foreign trade.—Muncie Star.

MAKING THE SERMON IMPORTANT.

There has been a marked tendency in some other circles to re-enlist the wavering interest of an amusement-mad public by turning the church service into disguised Sunday entertainments, with musical numbers featured and a so-called sermon apologetically squeezed in. And even the "sermon" has in many cases become a denaturated product hardly worthy of the name. Let us in a dignified manner feature and emphasize the proclamation of the old Gospel truths in our churches.—American Lutheran.

TO EVERY MAN HIS WORK.

Dreams and visions have their use and time; but the mystic who contents himself with "sweetness and light" instead of coveting the baptism of fire and power will find but a meager heaven awaiting him. We cannot "sit and sing ourselves away to everlasting bliss," when the fields are white unto the harvest and there is a shortage of workmen. The church is a labor guild; and to every one, even the humblest follower of Christ, come the injunction, "Go work today!"—Intelligencer.

A COSTLY EXPERIMENT.

The costly failure of Lenine to establish communism in Russia should serve as a warning to other politicians, and to churchmen as well, not to be too sure that their cherished theories will work. Lenine is reported to have admitted his mistakes in a letter to a friend. Untold misery and enormous loss of life have been the lot of Russia, and the immediate future is dark indeed. In ecclesiastical circles mistaken estimates are made the basis of costly experiments. Pastors attempt to work out their theories that are not fitted to the case in hand. In church and state alike education is needed in sound principles of organization and method, and these principles must be based on experience rather than on theory.—Congregationalist.

THE PHILIPPINES.

The United States has been patient and generous in treatment of the Filipinos. They can not be granted self government until they can take care of themselves in a way which will not menace the foreign interests of the United States.—Scranton Republican.

WILD CAT MYTHOLOGY.

"Ever hear the story of Midas?" "No," said the busy man. "Everything he touched turned to gold." "Sounds interesting. But the authorities are suspicious these days. If he's a friend of yours, tell him to go slow about opening offices and trying to sell stock."—Washington Star.

CHURCH PAPER WEEK.

The Southern Presbyterian Church U. S., in accord with the action of its General Assembly, is devoting the week Nov. 6-13 to persuading every family, which is not now reading a church paper, to subscribe for one. Elaborate plans have been made by pastors, sessions and missionary societies to make this canvass as thorough as possible. The Church has no subsidized organ, but it has excellent weekly journals, and does well to make this special effort to aid them. Speaking of this canvas the "Christian Observer" says, the papers in previous years gave a commission for each new subscriber obtained. But this year they can not give a commission because the continued high cost of publishing is so great, that they, with great difficulty, can pay running expenses. It says also: The congregations that are growing in numbers and spirituality, and gifts to benevolences, are those in which a church paper is extensively read. The people who are interested in doing God's work naturally take a church paper in order to keep themselves informed. The placing of a church paper in the homes of those not interested in religious matters often stimulates their interest and makes them more earnest in their Christian life and efficient workers in their church.—Presbyterian Banner.

Synod of Illinois Endorses

BLACKBURN COLLEGE

At the annual meeting of the Synod of Illinois, the committee on Christian Education recommended that Blackburn College be granted the sum of two thousand dollars for current expense during the current year.

Friends of the college were urged to unite in the movement to secure a new dormitory. This is deemed most important in view of the number of students that are turned away each year and the fact that one hundred more could be carried at small additional overhead cost.

Col. R. W. Stewart, Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Standard Oil Company of Indiana, was endorsed for place on the Board of Trustees, to which he had recently been nominated.

Special mention was made of the fact that one in seven of the students at Blackburn is preparing for some form of missionary service.

Those wishing to know in detail the resolutions passed by synod in endorsing Blackburn should write President Wm. M. Hudson, Carlinville, Ill.

A GREAT WORLD CRISIS.

One of the greatest conferences in the history of the world is to be held in the Capital City of our own nation this week, commencing on Friday, November 11th, the anniversary of Armistice Day, when, three years ago, the armed activities of the great World War came to a close.

It is the hope and prayer of hundreds of millions of people, that, at this conference, agreements will be entered into and plans be agreed upon that will forever end the danger of armed hostilities between the great and responsible nations of our civilized world.

It is too much to hope that there will be the absolute termination of all wars, with the dismantling of all forts and navies, and the dispersion of all armies. This would not be the best assurance of abiding peace. It might be the forerunner of much disturbances and difficulty.

Until our whole world is evangelized and all its people regenerated, there is sure to be more or less crime among men and nations, and protection is needed, by means of an adequate police force and systems of courts, for the control and punishment of lawless marauders. To secure a peaceful city we do not close the courts and dismiss the police. It is necessary to put a stop to law-breaking first. When crime disappears then there can be a diminution of the crime-controlling agencies.

But there can be such an understanding among all the good citizens of a town as will not make it necessary for every home to be an armed fort, and for every man to be a walking arsenal. Such functions may be turned over to a small and efficient police force, while the main body of the people, with lightened burdens, go about the ordinary duties of peaceful life.

So there can be an understanding among civilized nations that will make it unnecessary to expend nine-tenths of all their public revenues in maintaining armies, and forts, and airplanes and poison gas factories. They can lay aside nearly all this tremendous expense and burden, and maintain only a sufficient force to quell rebellions and subdue the outlaw people who are bent on disturbing the world's peace and welfare.

This is not a merely secular matter. It is of the most profoundly sacred significance and importance. It calls for all that is religious in the nature of our race. It is a subject to take to God in prayer. It is possible of accomplishment only as God, who turns the hearts of kings as the rivers of water are turned, shall lead them to be willing for world-wide peace and welfare. It must come from God if an enduring and acceptable agreement comes at all. "Except the Lord built the house, they labor in vain who build it. Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain." Therefore, let this be a time of prayer for all who know God, asking him to bring about results that shall be for his own glory and for the blessing of our human race.

We need not expect that a perfect plan shall be formulated and agreed to. It is certain, however, that much may be done, and that much must be done, to alleviate conditions in the world that today are almost unbearable. Our civilization can not endure much more of the sort that it has gone through in recent years. Financially, morally, spiritually and socially we have been driven almost to the very verge of bankruptcy. May God in his great mercy incline the assembled delegates of this great conference to devise some plans that will lift the crushing burdens from the hearts and lives of starving, unemployed, suffering, overburdened men and women and little children, and let the peace and quiet of a better life come into our world.

Christianity is to be on trial during this conference, as it was not even during the great war. Delegates from every land will be here as guests of our so-called Christian nation. Shall they see evidences of prayer to God, deference to his will and desire for his guidance? Shall they see a kindly-disposed, reasonable and loving people here, or must they witness ostentation, recklessness as to God and his law, and irreligious boastfulness and self-conceit? God grant that our own people may know how to bear themselves while these visitors and witnesses are here, so that they may go back home realizing that this is indeed a land where God is feared and loved.

FUNDAMENTALISM.

We have referred several times to contentions in the Northern Baptist Convention over "fundamentalism." The word was emphasized by modernists as one of reproach; their apparent purpose being to draw a line between liberals and conservatives.

The word has heretofore had its own definition. It is the theology which accepts the fundamentals of the Christian faith, and is in opposition to modernism or destructive criticism, which denies the inspiration and final authority of the Bible. Modernists, however, attempt to identify it with pre-millennialism, and so draw to their side all orthodox conservatives who do not accept that view as to Christ's return to earth. Apparently they attempted the same thing in their attack on the Bible Union of China, an orthodox conservative association of missionaries, zealous for the purity of the faith.

The attempt to write this a pre-millennialism organization and so draw a line through the orthodox camp failed. Some in the Bible Union are pre-millennialists, but their statement of doctrine simply affirms the accepted fundamentals of the evangelical faith.

The attempt to divide conservatives in the Baptist camp has also failed, though the contention was sharp and resulted in misunderstanding and confusion. The Baptist urges its people to "keep cool heads and pure hearts." It says:

"In times of confusion such as that through which the Baptists of the North are passing, there is only one safe course to pursue. It is that of open, clear, frank, courteous and courageous discussion. The heart of the denomination is right, and when our people come to see clearly what the issues are, there is no doubt what they will do. The only real dangers to the denomination peculiar to the present juncture are tendencies to set up schemes in the dark, to seek factional victories, to substitute emotional intensity for clear thinking, to resort to words of double meaning for the purpose of avoiding the consequences of clearly definite statement, and to use the denomination as a field of propaganda for outside and alien movements. Guard against these and the denomination, in its fellowship, its orthodoxy and its program, is safe."

This prescription is good for others as well as Baptists. Modernism is the same in all churches, and the best resistance is in courage and loyalty to the Word of God.

MISSIONS AND MODERNISM.

"Home and Foreign Fields," the missionary magazine of the Southern Baptist Church, discusses the growth of Modernism or rationalism in mission lands, and throws light on the methods of Modernist advocates. It says: "Error is a great traveler. It uses many means of transportation and propagation. It is frequently a stow-away, and gets to the mission fields in the baggage of some missionaries, tourists and others who touch the lives of foreign peoples. Some mission boards have grown lax in the doctrinal requirements of candidates. The number of foreign students in the American schools have greatly multiplied, and many of these return to their home-lands with their heads stuffed with 'the philosophy of Christianity,' rather than the Gospel of Christ. The free lance university professor has his chance with large numbers of these foreign students, who, in their immaturity, are easy victims to the all too common university views of Christian truth."

It also contends that union movements and the persistent putting of unity above all else has wrought serious damage in some sections. It feels that "union movements have fostered indiscrimination for truth, taken the edge off personal conviction, and opened the doors of sentiment, through which pass the enemies of Christian truth on the arms of those who, to prove themselves big brothers, have discarded distinctive faith. The apostle of the brotherhood of man fraternizes with the enemies of God and the Gospel."

We note these utterances particularly because the same questions have been raised in our mission fields, and were brought to the attention of the Church by the controversy over the China Bible Union. Some of our people were disposed to resent the protest of the Bible Union against unsound teaching and the demand that mission boards send out only evangelical men, as an unwarrantable and damaging attack on the boards and missionaries. The Baptist Board, however, took a different view and did not allow any sensitiveness to criticism to influence its opinions or action. The editor says: "We are gratified to reflect that the Foreign Mission Board of the Southern Baptist Convention saw the dangers of the union movement, and defined its missionary policies in 1916, and seeing that error ran in the wake of this movement, in 1919 prepared a "Statement of Belief" for the examination of its candidates which has made it almost impossible for a man to receive appointment by this board who has, by whatever influence, been robbed of the faith of the Commission under which mission boards are supposed to operate."

A GRATIFYING ANNOUNCEMENT.

Some fears have been expressed that the foreign delegates to the Armament Conference might not respect our prohibitory laws, and the liquor element of our nation has, with great glee, given assurance that Washington City would be the very center of anti-prohibition activities, and a perfect carnival of drinking during this world meeting. But now the very gratifying announcement is made that all the formal functions during the Armament Conference will be law-abiding and in conformity with the prohibition laws of the United States. Of course all the State affairs given by the United States will be in accordance with our own laws, but it is announced in addition that the receptions and dinners and luncheons given by the foreign embassies and the foreign delegates will be free from all intoxicants. The British Embassy has taken pains to let it be known that the prohibition laws of this country will be respected at their headquarters, and the indications are that the other nations will also maintain the same high standard. This was really to be expected. It would seem to be impossible that men called together to formulate a program for the peace and welfare of the world should defy the moral regulations of the country where they assemble, and disgrace themselves, at first blush, as a mob of undisciplined and uncontrollable law-breakers. They come together for a great purpose, and, if they can not control their own appetites and obey good laws, they can not be expected to make regulations that will safeguard the life of the world.

THE GRACE OF PROMPT PAYING.

The Mission Boards of our Presbyterian Church are called to pay their bills, including the salaries of their missionaries, regularly, all through the year. Any other course would cause great suffering among the missionaries and their families, and would work a general loss of credit in the business world. The money comes into the treasury of the Boards at some time during the year, much of it during the last month. But if the money is not in the treasury at any particular time, it must be borrowed from a bank and interest must be paid on the loan. If the churches sent in the money regularly, so that there would not have to be borrowing and interest-paying, there would be much saving to the Boards and missionary enterprises of the Church.

During the last year closing March 31, 1921, the various Boards expended for interest, on money borrowed to meet monthly bills, about $75,000. Three Boards paid $51,000 of this; one of them, Home Missions, expended $34,979.50. This is bad. This amount of money would have met many pressing needs if it could have been directly applied to the work instead of being used up for interest. If the churches will only learn to pay promptly they will add this large sum of $75,000 to the amount which they furnish to the Boards.

Most churches raise their income by weekly offerings. It is the approved and general method. If each church treasurer would send the benevolent offerings regularly each month, or, at most, every quarter, a great bill for interest would be saved for missions. Many church treasurers let it accumulate all year, and then send it in at the last moment, thereby overworking the officers of the Boards, and doing nothing to keep down the interest charges. This is not a good way to do the Lord's business.

The Ohio clearing house records show that last year 74 churches sent their benevolent contributions regularly every 30 days, 52 every 60 days, 125 quarterly, and 90 only once during the year, and that in the month of March. The total amount received by the clearing house was $514,430; of this $148,000 was received during March, almost one-third the entire amount, and $48,000 came in on the last day of March, or almost 10 per cent of the total for the year. Other synods have had similar experiences.

The Women's Missionary Boards are urging regularly quarterly payments, and are bringing the presbyterial and church societies into the spirit and practice of it. This is right and commendable. Every church treasurer should learn the same lesson. It is a sure and easy way to make many thousands of dollars for the work of missions.

Thanksgiving Day comes this year on Nov. 24th, the last Thursday of this month being understood, by general custom and agreement, to be our annual national day for thanksgiving to God for his preserving providence and gracious goodness. Let the day be set apart for sacred uses, and let the spirit of worship and prayer fill the hearts of the people of the nation.

Armistice Day, Nov. 11th, has been designated by special act of Congress as a National holiday and will be very generally observed. In Washington City the burial of the "Unknown Soldier" representative of the many missing soldiers, thus honored by the nation, will be conducted with imposing exercises. Religious services will be held in many places all over the county, in special prayer for the divine guidance of the Conference for Limitation of Armaments, called for that day. It will be a day for the whole nation to be in prayer.

Congress is asked for ten million dollars for prohibition enforcement. Some people think that prohibition is very expensive. Let them think, however, that the fines assessed on law-breakers much more than amounts to all this. Let them also remember the financial saving secured to the people by the disuse of asylums, prisons, workhouses and infirmaries. Let them also remember that over two billions of dollars would be squandered for intoxicating drink annually if it were not for prohibition.

Lenine, the dictator of Russia, writing in "Pravada," the official journal, declared it necessary for the Soviet Government to abandon the strict Communism which it has labored in vain four years to enforce. He has said practically the same thing on several occasions before. English papers regard it as a confession that Soviet Government is a failure. The peasants would not continue to feed the rank and file of the Bolshevik machine. This was partly because they did not have surplus food to give, and partly because they objected to giving something for nothing. The opinion is expressed that while Lenine had been an affliction to Russia, he has unwittingly been of use to the world in that he has demonstrated by experiment that Marxism won't work.

Lackwanna Presbytery is to be commended for one more, among many Presbyterian actions: It has changed the name of its annual meetings of ministers for prayer and study from "Retreat" to "Conference." We have always been unwilling to use that name "retreat" for a Presbyterian meeting. It looks and sounds like a word with its collar buttoned behind, and we have had no patience with it. We hope that all presbyteries will have the Presbyterian grace to follow the example of Lackawanna Presbytery.

The Permanent Committee on Men's Work, Dr. W. F. Weir, General Secretary, finds that, although its work is growing so rapidly that it is very hard to keep up with it, the income is reduced on account of stringency in money matters. Some contributions are being received from the churches, but not nearly enough. All the agencies of the Church should be adequately provided for.

The people of our country generally regard with great disapprobation the recent order permitting the distribution of medicinal beer, and floods of letters and telegrams are said to be going in to members of the Senate, demanding the early passage of the "anti-beer bill," which would put a stop to this foolishness and wickedness. Beer is not a medicine, and the effort to have its manufacture and sale permitted for "medical" use is simply for the purpose of neutralizing and destroying the force of the Prohibition Amendment.

A correspondent, who has "lately attended a meeting called to discuss the problem of unemployment," thinks "the Herald and Presbyter does not grasp the real reason that four million men are out of employment." He says: "It is all right to urge people to build or make repairs in order to furnish jobs, but so long as wages are so high they will not do it." There is force in his statement. High cost is one reason people are slow to do more than make necessary repairs. However, there are other reasons, and it is to be hoped that conferences, such as he refers to, will rouse interest and devise plans to overcome the difficulties of the present situation.

A man is the authorized guardian and protector of his own house. The police force guards the city. The standing army is the police force of the nation. A serious need of the world is some force to withstand the outlaw nations that impose on and ravage small and defenseless countries, as Turkey has wasted Armenia and destroyed its homes and people. As a whole this is a poorly governed world.

Wooster College is making a special effort to secure its endowment fund, and Sabbath, Dec. 11, is to be known in the Synod of Ohio as Wooster Day, in which all the people of all the churches are to be given the opportunity to subscribe. This is the date of the fire in 1901, and of the rededication of the new buildings in 1902. This college belongs in a very special sense to our Presbyterian Church, and it was never so prosperous and promising as now under President Wishart. All the more is more money needed just now.

"UNTIL HE COME."

(I Cor. 11: 26.)

BY REV. S. M. MORTON, D.D.

"Until he come!" Oh blessed word!
We wait the coming of our Lord,
Keeping our watch in sweet accord,
"Until he come."

His body broken is the bread
Of life for us; for in our stead
He died: He is the church's head,
"Until he come."

His blood so freely shed for us
Gives us a hope most glorious,
Waiting, o'er death victorious,
"Until he come."

Until the final trump be heard,
Until the ancient graves be stirred,
And with his loud commanding word,
Our Lord shall "come."

Oh hope divine! with this elate,
Our hearts shall ne'er be desolate,
But, strong in faith, we'll calmly wait,
"Until he come."

WHAT CHRIST DID AND IS NOW DOING FOR THE BELIEVER.

BY REV. JOHN Y. EWART, D.D.

No human language can ever express the value of the service of our Divine Savior and Lord. He could truly say:

"My country is as boundless as the sea,
My love as deep,
The more I give to thee the more I have,
For both are infinite."

No wonder the Apostle Paul recognized his obligation to his Divine Savior as so measurelessly great that he said:

"I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ and him crucified." (I Cor. 2: 2.)

St. Paul was a scholar, had read widely and deeply the literature of his day, but since the eventful hour on the Damascus road when Jesus Christ revealed himself to him in such a marvelous way (Acts 9), everything else in life became uninteresting to Paul except the carrying out of the missionary program which his Divine Master entrusted to him. And what was that program? He outlines it himself in his well-known address to Agrippa, as follows:

"At midday, O King, I saw in the way, a light from heaven, above the brightness of the sun, shining round about me and them which journeyed with me. And when we were all fallen to the earth I heard a voice speaking unto me, and saying in the Hebrew tongue, 'Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks.' And I said,
'Who art thou, Lord?' And he said, 'I am Jesus whom thou persecutest. But rise, and stand upon thy feet, for I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness both of these things which thou hast seen, and of those things in which I will appear unto thee.'" (Acts 26: 13-16.)

Then we read: "He was three days without sight, and neither did eat nor drink." (Acts 9: 9.) Why was he blinded to all other sights and scenes? Undoubtedly in order that the eyes of his soul might be opened "to behold the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." (II Cor. 4: 6.)

Writing in a hotel office not long ago, all the electric lights in the building went out. Oil lamps were lit. Then after about ten minutes the electricity was turned on again. No more use for the oil lamps!

They were useless in presence of the greater and brighter light. St. Paul had comparatively little use for the lesser lights of philosophy and science and literature. They all paled when the Star of Bethlehem beamed with such a heavenly radiance upon his pathway.

He was enamored of Jesus Christ beyond his power to express. He said:

"For me to live is Christ."

"Yea, doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Jesus Christ, my Lord: for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them but refuse, that I may win Christ." (Phil. 3: 8.)

It is difficult to get an expression from the average man as to what, to him, is the greatest thing in the world, for very few men carry their heart upon their sleeve.

But it is not difficult, from the teachings of the New Testament, to learn what Jesus Christ values above all price and what he would have us value better than gold or gems or than anything earthly that can be named. And judging from the prominence he has given his death on the cross, we are by no means at a loss to understand that his vicarious sacrifice for the sins of the world and the meaning of Calvary should have the central place in all pulpit teaching.

1. He made it central and vital to Nicodemus. (John 3: 15, 16). The brazen serpent lifted up in the wilderness was made typical of the Christ exalted on the cross.

2. The hostile mob who asked him for a "sign" were given this:

"Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up."

But he spoke of the temple of his body.

3. He made plain his plan to die for men to the multitude of men and women who were hungry to hear more of his teaching, and to whom he said:

"I am the living bread which came down from heaven; if any man eat of this bread he shall live forever: and the bread that I will give is my flesh, which I will give for the life of the world." (John 6: 51.)

4. Also at the Passover when some Greek-speaking Jews wanted more light, and he foresaw the world-wide interest in his Gospel, and said: "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto me. This he said, signifying what death he should die." (John 12: 32, 33.)

Central in Jesus' teaching is the meaning of his death. Not as an example, although he was our example; not as a reformer, although he was a reformer; or philanthropist, although he was a philanthropist; or a martyr, although he was a martyr. He was each and all these.
But first of all, and most of all, Jesus was our substitute.

He died for us. He was wounded for our transgressions and bruised for our iniquities. (Isa. 53.)

Rev. Stuart Holden has related this true incident. A man, years ago, who afterwards became a famous soldier in the British army, sat in his tent and read the New Testament thus:

"Ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot." (I Pet. 1, 18, 19.) That young soldier knelt down in his tent, and it is on record that he said these words:

"O God, if this is true, I pledge myself to thee tonight to live as a blood-bought soul should live until I see thee face to face."

That vow brought that young soldier to a realization of his own weakness. He was brought to the darkness of self-condemnation. He came to know how impossible it was to fulfill his own promise in his own strength. And back to this word he came: "Yield yourselves unto God." (Rom. 6: 13.)

What other logical, sane, right thing is there for a blood-bought soul to do? Will you, can you tell me, dear friend? Let St.
Paul say it!

"I beseech you, therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that you present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service." (Rom. 12: 1.)

THE ONE TALENT MAN.

BY CHRISTOPHER G. HAZARD, D.D.

The parable of the talents is encouraging to most of us. Some have two talents, a few have five, but the majority of Christ's servants must make their record with one. If these one talent servants better the record of the one talent man in the parable, if they, unlike him, use well the trust committed to them, if they do the best they can with what they have instead of burying it in wordliness, they also shall be called good and faithful and shall enter into the joy of their Lord, for even the Lord only did what he could.

We are in danger of thinking that what we can do is not worth doing. Our eyes are fixed upon the greatly gifted men, the men of large resources, the geniuses of time. We long to do great things and are unwilling to do small things. Assigned to humble fields, we desire to see and serve glorious outlooks from mountain tops.
We forget that Balaam erred upon the heights and was willing to prostitute his gifts for a larger salary, as we would be for applause. Numbered among the minor prophets we envy Isaiah and repine when we are only Amos. So we despise the day of small things.

But the Lord has not called many noble, wise and mighty men into his service. He uses a great company of humble men, lest flesh should glory in his presence. He employs and overrules a large amount of weakness and a good deal of foolishness in saving souls. There are still great prophets and apostles that are the mountains of the religious landscape, but the valleys and plains make up the world in the main. Goodness and faithfulness are the essential elements of service, and these Christ always offers and expects.
The one talent man could have doubled his capital had he used these.

It is not necessary to be great; it is only necessary to be good and faithful.
Unbelief and faith are the fundamental differences of attitude towards the Lord;
the new birth marks the essential difference in the nature of men. Granted that we have faith in Jesus the Christ and thus a new birth, there will be among us all the innumerable variations of characteristics, proportions and emphasis; all the varieties of gift and temperament that we see in men of the world and servants of time. Biography can teach us that, after all, no man does more than one thing on the whole. It takes the whole personality to get the effect of what a man is for. Each member of a body has the whole body behind its act. Goodness and faithfulness can find expression through the smallest member. Nothing counts without these in the divine judgment.

So, let us not mourn our deficiency of gifts, valuable as riches are, but let us use what we have with our whole personality. Gifts are good, but love can do with little. Jesus never wanted anything of anybody but the privilege of serving him. Ambition and self-seeking can not depend upon God for help. If we go upon our own errands the dumb ass may still speak with the voice of a man and rebuke the madness of the candidating prophet. Many a poor preacher, on the contrary, is rich in souls. We must submit to our lot and our allotment. Be it unto us according to God's word. The lowly servant may blush unseen, but he does not waste his sweetness on the desert air. No word of God ever gets back to him without increase. Christ is our peace as to place, gift, power, product and reward. His Spirit appoints all things in his Church, according to his will. The function of that Church is not to please men; it is to help men to please God. The varieties of noble and useful men encourage us to be ourselves rather than imitators of others. Faith is a great, purposeful, powerful thing that acts first without sight and in many trials, but receives in the end both the praise of Christ and his joy.

"AVERAGED WELL FOR THIS COMMUNITY.

BY REV. G. B. F. HALLOCK, D.D.

We all have a tendency to take a wrong standard for character measure. People "compare themselves among themselves," and the Bible says that in so doing they are "not wise." Measuring themselves by themselves, or by others, they soon conclude that they are "as good as the average." But average Christians is not what the Bible requires, "For not he that commendeth himself is approved, but whom the Lord commendeth."

A recent writer well says: "Tombstones are not noted for telling the truth. Sometimes they are rather cryptic in expression. That would seem true of the epitaph found in an old English burial ground: 'She averaged well for this community.' Whether that be a compliment for the woman or the community remains to be surmised. But every church member and every minister ought to ask frequently just how the neighborhood measures up. There is no question but that there is a community spirit. Sometimes it is hard to define, but it is there. Outsiders may sense it more readily than residents. The very atmosphere is perceptible. Does it help one to measure up to the standard you would want? Does it tend to breed men and women who come up toward the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ? Is there existing a rebuke to sin, or a half surrender to it? Again, is the church simply a product of the neighborhood, or is it a constant inspiration and corrector of its shortcomings? If some one were to write the epitaph of your community what would be his appraisal. Or, suppose the epitaph were that of your own life."

There is a tendency ever to take a wrong standard of measure. We compare ourselves with others and say, "I am as good as ordinary Christians." What is wanted is not just "ordinary Christians." We ought to pray with Wesley, "Lord, make me an extraordinary Christian." There is a call today for Christians above the ordinary. They will not be found in large numbers until people adopt a higher standard than the character of those whom they see about them. We must quit measuring ourselves by ourselves, and take the character of Christ as our standard. Like the business man comparing his weights and measures with the great government standards, we have a true test when we compare ourselves with the true standard—the character of Christ. He said, "Learn of me." "Let the same mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus." Paul never told us to follow him except in so far as he followed Christ. A man five feet six inches tall comparing himself with a man five feet three inches tall might conclude that he is of quite good size, but how he does shrink when you place him besides a man six feet tall! Average Christians comparing themselves with the average Christians may think they are about right, but let them compare themselves with Christ and they soon see how far they fall below measure by the perfect standard. That is the only way to hope to grow better.

Consider also how practical this is for testing the measure of our self-sacrifice. Many people want to get to heaven as cheaply as they can. They give as little as possible, and then justify themselves by saying that they give as much as others. They do not deny themselves worldly indulgences, and then justify themselves by saying that other Christians do the same things they do. A man sees his neighbor do certain things on the Sabbath, therefore he claims a right to do them. His neighbor goes to certain questionable places, and at once he claims the right to do the same. But how does his character measure up with Christ's requirements? "Not he that commendeth himself is approved, but whom the Lord commendeth." Do you think Christ would commend your standard of character when you measure it up only by what you see in others?

Here is also a standard for testing the measure of our zeal and consecration to God's service. As to work. Do you compare yourself with others? Are you ever tempted to say, "I do as much as my neighbor; I do not like to push myself forward; I never like to seem to take the lead!" Such feelings are born purely of a tendency to compare ourselves among ourselves. A man says, "I go to prayer meeting. I think I am there about as often as anybody." A woman says, "Well, I think I do about as much for the church as the minister's wife or any one else." These are plain cases of wrong self-measurement. When we take Christ's standard we will not be asking how little we can do, but how much we can do. We will perform to the extent of our ability. We will diligently use all the talents we have. We will try to be extraordinary Christians. Let us try to be the best possible Christians. Let us try to be of the utmost use in the world.

It is an old saying: "If you aim at the barn door you will never hit the weather cock on the steeple." That simply means that if we would hit high we must aim high. Let us quit measuring ourselves by ourselves and comparing ourselves among ourselves; aim to have a character, and live a life, like Christ's.

THE FOG BANKS OF UNBELIEF.

BY REV. D. L. CHAPIN.

Fog has been defined as "Clouds at the surface of the earth." One way in which a fog is produced is stated thus: "A gentle current of warm air surcharged with moisture passes over a colder surface." But when we read of railroad trains and sea going ships destroyed by fog, it leads us to think whether very many in the voyage of life are not perishing in the fog banks of unbelief. How indifferent we are about the salvation of our fellow men! But indifference is a very serious form of unbelief.

First of all a dense fog will sometimes cause the steamer to change its course unbeknown to the officers on the boat, and be going in the opposite direction from what they suppose. In conversation with a pilot on the Ohio River he said there was no great difficulty in directing a boat, unless there is a fog.

But on one occasion in a dense fog his steamer was completely turned about and was going in the opposite direction. Befogged men are doing the very same thing now. The fog banks of unbelief blind them, and they are going wrong, in the very opposite direction from that in which they should go. In other words the route that starts with the rejection of Christ will have its termination where? Where Christ is? Impossible, logically as well as theologically. "Whose end is destruction," not salvation.

In 1875 there was a fearful marine disaster off the coast of Ireland, $500,000 in gold were sunk and more than 300 lives lost. What was the cause of it? A dense fog rested over the ship, so that they could not see the lights, though less than a mile away was a large reflector throwing off light at distance of sixteen miles. A fog, a dense fog, that was all. But that was enough. The fog banks of sin make men unable to see Christ, the light of the world.

While wireless fog signals may, and doubtless will be used in the future, in 1914 the most efficient fog signals were horns thirty feet long, with blasts so powerful that they could be heard twenty-five or thirty miles at sea. But as we stop, look and listen, we seem to hear the fog horn of redemption that blows so long and so loud that it compasses the earth and reverberates around the world. Just as the Divine Word has it, the sound has gone into all the earth and their words to the end of the world; yes, the very words of Christ himself, with massive and majestic intonation: "Of sin, because they believed not on me." Is the ship that is befogged doing well enough?

It was in 1907 when a French steamer, La Gascoyne, with 1,200 passengers, narrowly escaped collision with another great ship. By ordering the engines reversed, and thus throwing the passengers from their berths, the collision was averted. But something promptly was done. The Bible says that God has a controversy with impenitent men. In other words, there is a collision. Men are out of harmony with God. "What doth the Lord require of thee but to do justice and love mercy and walk humbly with thy God?" That means harmony with God. Then, instead of fog there is clear sailing.

When our General Assembly met in Dr. Crosby's church in New York, a wealthy Presbyterian took one thousand people upon an ocean trip to Perth Amboy. On the way a fog settled down over the steamer. The captain was anxious. What if some heavy tug dart along upon the deep and strike the ship? But soon the fog lifted and a thousand hearts rejoiced. Oh, when the fogbanks of sin break away, how the light of divine truth shines in and men rejoice; yea, they are exceedingly glad; so he bringeth them unto their desired haven.

CHRIST FOR ME.

BY REV. W. H. JORDAN.

The Lord Jesus has been so misunderstood and underestimated by the world, that a cross was considered none too good for him. Succeeding generations, with the usual worldly wisdom, have cared little for him, if they have not actually been maddened to bitter opposition to all who believed in him.

Not only has the world taken this attitude, but many, many believers have failed to see in him the possible blessing he would be to them. Many have thought of him as Lord and Master. Many have had a vague idea of him as Savior, but failed to grasp his grandeur, grace and glory and his power in their lives for each day.

While to the Greek the Gospel message was foolishness, and to the Jew a stumbling-block, to them that believed it was the power of God unto salvation. God will allow no flesh to glory in his presence. Look now, at what God has done for us in making Christ to be everything to us. "But of him are ye in Christ Jesus, who of God is made unto us wisdom and righteousness and sanctification and redemption."

I have accepted him by faith. By faith then I understand how Christ is a substitute for us, dying for us, being made sin for us, bearing our sicknesses and our sins, wounded for our transgressions, bruised for our iniquities. I learn how the chastisement of our peace was upon him, and that with his stripes and bruises we are healed; how he made his soul an offering for sin, and how he shall justify many because he bare their iniquities.

Yes, I accepted Christ for all that. So also I accept him as my wisdom. I have a right to, since God hath made him to be wisdom for me. I must substitute his wisdom for mine, or, rather, let him substitute his for mine, and his will for mine. It is Galatians 2: 20, over again: "Christ liveth in me." Then of course his wisdom will think and speak and act through me. I open my life to the influence of God. His Holy Spirit dwells within, teaching, guiding. Yes, "Christ liveth in me." Then what wisdom, what sanctified common-sense, others will have a right to expect in me daily.

He is made unto me Wisdom. How simple! Arithmetic, history, chemistry and other branches of knowledge become substitutes for my ordinary ignorance, and so Christ and his wisdom becomes a substitute for my spiritual ignorance. If Christ lives in me I have the mind of Christ. I live and yet not I. Christ liveth in me. The Holy Spirit takes of the things of Christ and shows them unto me. What he hears that he speaks. He is wisdom. Then because I am a believer, I shall not be only a little wiser, but shall have stepped into the counsels of the Eternal, and heard things not possible even to be put in human speech. He is made unto me Wisdom. "Oh, the depth both of the wisdom and knowledge of God."

And he is made unto me Righteousness, legal righteousness. Then I must reckon myself dead indeed unto sin and alive unto God. Sin can have no further claim or dominion within me.

Righteousness is described under many different figures in the Bible. I read of the gates, the paths of righteousness; of a girdle, a shield, of the sacrifices of righteousness; of righteousness as an attribute of God; as the habitation of his throne; of the sceptre of righteousness; how God's throne is established by righteousness; that righteousness is a place and a power; a standard, "ye are far from righteousness."

Daniel speaks of righteousness as a weapon or tool that every man should use when he says: "Break off thy sins in righteousness." It is a possession: "Righteousness belongeth unto thee." It is as the showers: "I will rain righteousness upon you;" "Righteousness shall run down as a stream." It is food that is worth hungering and thirsting for. It is light; a very sun that shines with untold blessings. It is a seal of believers and fruit that is peaceable and beautiful. And Christ is made all this to me. He is the power, the cause, the result. He sanctifies through his truth. We are sanctified through Christ Jesus. We are saints. Let us be saintly. "Ye are washed, sanctified, justified." Ye are "elected unto sanctification of the Spirit and unto obedience, and unto sprinkling of the blood." "God has from the beginning chosen us unto salvation through sanctification of the Spirit, and belief of the truth." Yes, blessed be his name, "He is made unto us sanctification."

And he is made unto us Redemption or Ransom. He is the price. The cross is God's pricemark—his value of a life.

But redemption is the great, all-inclusive word. It includes the finished work of Christ. "I will ransom thee from the power of the grave. I will redeem them from death. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?"

Yes, it is such an inclusive word, for "he gave himself that he might redeem us from this present evil age." What a redemption! Not with thousands or millions of silver and gold, but with "the precious blood of Christ."

How rich we are in Christ Jesus, "who is made unto us wisdom and righteousness and sanctification and redemption." Truly can I say, and daily would I prove, that "Christ liveth in me, and the life that I now live I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me and gave himself for me."

FROM THE WESTERN OFFICE.

BY REV. B. P. FULLERTON, D.D.

Dr. King, Dr. Montgomery and Dr. Wilson are now in Texas, at the head of three teams, in an endeavor to present to the churches of that synod the exact condition of the Home Mission task, not only from the national point of view, but also from the point of view of the synod itself. Then the effort will be made to set in motion those forces that will result in providing the budget asked by the New Era Committee, and to this end Dr. Overstreet, representing the New Era for the Southwest, is with them. It is our conviction that, if the Church understands the need of this work, the necessary means will be forthcoming.

Times are hard, they say, but I feel sure, that the heart of the Church is right, and when the facts are known, the Church will rise to the situation. So it is the purpose of this itinerary to start the study of the whole task of the Church, and especially the part of it that is in the United States. At no time has the board better literature than at this time, and it is being used more economically than ever before, as we are sending only samples, unless there is an order for it. When any one receives these samples, let him understand that this is an assurance that the board is able to furnish this literature in such quantities as may be necessary.

Every church should study the "Unfinished Business of the Presbyterian Church," by Mr. Eastman, and also the other book, "Playing Square with Tomorrow," by the same author, for young people. These two books set forth in most interesting fashion this task, and every church should have the books and study them. They are published at just about cost of printing, advertising and mailing, and the returns, the board hopes, will be in quickened interest in the cause.

The hope of this work lies with the pastors, and we are trying to help these men on whom the whole cause rests. I know what a pastor has to contend with these days, and he needs and should have all the help that can be given him, by all our boards and agencies.

There lies on my desk an order for literature, from one of our pastors, and we are sending what we have and are asking the board to send him a full supply. These are the men we must help, and to the fullest extent of our ability. If we could help the pastors, and if they, in turn, would help their people, these itineraries to which I have referred, would not be necessary.

The men in Arkansas, as I have said, plead for closer supervision, by an enlarged field force, and they are right, because, as they say, they are not able to give the time necessary to this work because of the heavy demands made on them by their own pastorates. They are right, and if we could meet the expense of such a force in every synod desiring it, I believe that a lot of our trouble would be over. But here we meet an old criticism, that we do not need these supervisors, but with a sincere desire to conserve the best interests of the Church I would put these men in the field if I had the means, just where they were called for, but no where else, as I feel sure that the presbyteries and synods have the right to say what they want.

After this itinerary is completed Dr. King will take two teams and conduct a similar tour in the Synod of Oklahoma. Already the plan is laid, and the itinerary is being completed, and some time, about the middle of the last of November, this itinerary will be followed out. We are hoping that this will stir Oklahoma to such an extent that this year we shall receive from that synod the amount we spend in it. This will enable us to assist others more liberally, and bring one after another to the same condition.

These are great days for the Church in the United States, as the politicians are trying to work out a policy of perpetual peace, and they deserve all the help the Church can give at a time like this. I pity the ministers who has no great concern at this time for the welfare of the land, and who will permit the opportunity to pass unimproved, because there will never be another time like this for the Church to show what it can do in building a Christian Republic.

Missouri is to make an effort, November 13-14, to provide for its deficit with the Home Board from last year, and also provide for the needs of the work of the present year. It will require something like $30,000 to meet this demand, but the money is in the hands of the Presbyterians of the synod, and what is needed is that they should know all the facts in the case, and then act upon them.

MICHIGAN LETTER.

BY REV. WILLIAM BRYANT, D.D.

It is a good evidence of the interest of the Christian workers of Michigan in children and youth, that the annual meeting of the "Michigan Sunday School Association" is better attended than any other gathering held in the state. At the meeting this week at Kalamazoo, there were over 2,000 registered and paid delegates, coming from every part of the Upper and Lower Peninsula, some of them for over 300 miles, met for the one purpose of studying problems of Sabbath school advancement. This year the entire system of work is being reorganized, so as to meet all reasonable denominational requirements. Henceforth the management will be partly denominational.

The State Executive Committee entrusted to your correspondent the task of writing the platform of the new organization, and it is a very simple, but a very definite one. The first plank emphasizes the interdenominational character and control; the second, absolute loyalty to the inspired Word of God, and the objective of giving it a place in our public schools and state institutions; the third, personal evangelism, with the purpose of bringing every child and youth to acceptance of Jesus Christ as a personal Savior; the fourth, co-operation with all the evangelical denominations in world-wide missionary extension, and the thorough training of teachers for their task; the fifth, obedience to law, and especially at present the rigid enforcement of state and national prohibition; the sixth, international brotherhood and universal peace, and, for this end, hearty appreciation and co-operation in disarmament.

The new executive committee will consist of about 70 members, instead of about 20 as at present. It will be too large a committee to meet as often as the present committee meets, but most of the work will necessarily be done by a central committee. It will take possibly three months to complete the organization. Meanwhile the present officers will hold over. Of the speakers no one was more welcome than Dr. Samuel M. Zwemer, who belongs to Michigan, and who always has a thrilling story to tell of the Moslem world. Other most acceptable speakers were Bishop T. S. Henderson, of Detroit, who has always a burning message of a wonderful Savior for a lost world, and Mr. A. M. Locker, of the International Association. It was largely on his recommendation that we called Mr. J. H. Engle from a 25 years' experience in Kansas to be our new State Secretary. If any of us had a little natural prejudice because Mr. Engle is a Dunkard, we are disarmed as we see his broad, progressive spirit and his warm evangelical enthusiasm. He brought to us Dr. D. W. Kurtz, president of McPherson College, as the teacher of "Christian Essentials." He is good; but we have a rather distinct impression that we had heard somewhat clearer theological teaching from some of our own leaders.

Sometimes a casual remark throws a good deal of light on our thinking. Bishop Henderson, for instance, in one of his addresses, uttered some very marked Calvinism. He saw the point, and said, "Do not misunderstand me; I am not teaching Calvinism, of which I know nothing, except when I pray." If some of us smiled, it was in all friendliness. We are all Calvinists when we pray, and some who are not aware of the fact are Calvinists when they preach.

We prefer the fourth answer in the Shorter Catechism as a definition of God to that quoted by Dr. Kurtz from Dr. Clark—"God is the personal spirit, perfectly good, who in holy love creates, sustains and orders all." The truth is that to say what Dr. Kurtz wanted to say as to God he had to fall back on "infinite, eternal and unchangeable." But a Sabbath-school interdenominational convention must have variety even in its theology. At any rate it was always evangelical and evangelistic.

Detroit, for reasons of its own, rarely attends state conventions not held in Detroit, or contributes to causes that do not center in Detroit. So there is to be a smaller Sabbath-school convention held here next week, with a fine array of talent. But this week our hands are full with the effort to raise some two and a half millions for the "community drive." The problem of unemployment here is so great that this sum will probably be quite inadequate to meet the situation. It is worse now than it was a month ago, and shows no sign of improving this coming winter. It does not look like a very good time to launch campaigns for religious extension, but the earth is the Lord's.

NEW YORK LETTER.

BY REV. CLARENCE G. REYNOLDS, D.D.

At the meeting of the New York Alumni Association of Princeton Theological Seminary, held Monday, Oct. 31, in the Yale Club, President Hibben of Princeton University spoke to the point concerning the necessity of armament limitation. Rev. John McNeill, who insists that he is not a D.D., was very forceful and accurate in describing the need in New York of greater emphasis in the pulpit of the Gospel note and of having real evangelistic messages in every sermon. He paid his compliments to the New Theology in most sarcastic words. President Stevenson spoke of the fact that Princeton Seminary has about the largest increase in students of all the seminaries, and it was suggested that one reason for the increase at Princeton is the loyalty of that institution to the Word of God and the Fundamentals of the Faith.

Almost every pastor in New York preached last Sabbath on some phase of the Disarmament Conference. There were union meetings in several centers. On Armistice Day the larger Presbyterian churches will be open and their pastors will preach.

The Beverly Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, Rev. Lynn P. Armstrong, pastor, was dedicated Oct. 23, Rev. Dr. David G. Wylie, Secretary of the Board of Church Election, preaching the sermon.

At the Greenwich Presbyterian Church, Rev. William H. Matthews, D.D., the pastor, will give on Wednesday evenings a series of talks on the Pentateuch. Dr. Matthews is preaching a series of Sabbath-evening sermons on The Commandments.

The Presbytery of New York will meet in the First Presbyterian Church, Nov. 14, at 2:30 p. m. After devotional services, Rev. Dr. John Kelman, pastor of the Fifth Avenue Church, will speak on the general subject of Foreign Missions, with special reference to his recent trip to China. Rev. Frank S. Niles, of Hwai Yuen, China, will speak upon the outlook in the Far East.

The Board of Foreign Missions will send free to any address the leaflet entitled "Big Business for Busy People," setting forth the extent of the work, statistics concerning the workers in the field, the receipts of the Board, and the share every Christian has in the work. Sabbath schools are urged to send for the Christmas Exercise at an early date. The exercise for this year is very suitable.

Dr. Daniel A. Poling, associated with Dr. Burrell in the Marble Collegiate Reformed Church, has recovered from his injuries received in an automobile accident last summer, and is preaching on Sabbath evenings. Last Sabbath he preached on "The Next War."

Rev. Kenneth D. Miller, of the Presbyterian Home Mission Board, has sailed for Czecho-Slovakia in connection with the General Assembly and to the new Presbyterian Church in that nation. Mr. Miller has just been awarded the Czecho-Slovak cross of war, for services with the army in Russia.

Since April 1, the National Bible Institute has conducted 2,413 outdoor meetings, with an attendance of 432,838; of these 2,466 have professed conversion and 64,459 tracts and 54,904 gospels were distributed.

PITTSBURGH LETTER.

BY REV. S. J. FISHER, D.D.

Our Ministerial Association, on Oct. 31st, listened to a paper by Prof. W. R. Farmer, D.D., on "Some Present Tendencies, with a Guess at Their Meaning," in which he suggested a watchful attitude toward some tendencies in our church life. Criticism should always be considered where it is sincerely given and kindly, as in this case, and the essayist's remarks upon the lessened emphasis placed upon preaching, and the lowered tone of the pulpit, are worth studying. We are so intent on the social side of religion, so enthusiastic for community service, that some of the important characteristics or purposes of the preacher are minimized or forgotten. But be sure of this, that when the pulpit ceases to grip men's hearts and consciences, and on at least one day of the week draws the heart from the life that now is, all your men's suppering and community work will be as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal.

Stepping into the chapel of the First Church on Thursday, the day in each week when a cafeteria lunch is provided for the girls and women working in the stores and offices, it was delightful to observe that so many, after their luncheon in the basement, came up to the chapel and engaged in a brief worship, enjoying the hymns and encouraged by prayer and counsel. That is the way to write "Holiness unto the Lord" upon more than the bells of the horses, and to glorify God in our eating and drinking. I am no strong advocate of the hermitage, or even the retreat, but these moments of worship, this drinking of the brook by the way, help our souls and our tasks.

The assistant pastor of this church, Rev. Burleigh Crinkshank, has accepted a call to the Westminster Church of Steubenville, O. His time of service with the First Church has been brief, but it has shown him very capable of interesting boys in their sports, and his work among the many boys of the region about the church has been admirable.

A granddaughter of Rev. D. R. Breed, D.D., was married this week to the pastor of St. Mark's Lutheran Evangelical Church, North Side, by Rev. Charles Shelton, D.D., of the Second Church.

We are interested in the choice by Governor Sproull of Rev. George P. Donehoo, D.D., of Couderdport, Pa., as State Librarian, not only on his own account, but also that of his father, the late Rev. E. R. Donehoo, D.D., so long the pastor of our West End Church. Dr. Donehoo has the historical sense, and is fond of all that relates to the traditions and history of our State, as well as having a liking for books.

Hawthorne Avenue Church celebrated its twenty-fifth anniversary last week by a sermon on the 30th, by Pastor A. T. Schleich, an address on Wednesday evening by Dr. A. L. Wiley, of India, and preaching by Rev. Maitland Alexander, D.D., on Friday evening. The growth and development of this church are not spectacular, but deep and lasting and enriching, the result of faithful preaching to an intelligent and willing people.

With varied feelings we of this presbytery note the death of two ministers recently associated with us. At an advanced age, Rev. J. J. Hawk died this week in Wilkinsburg, in the home of a son, and a few days ago the tidings came that Rev. Robert Murray had, after a protracted and painful illness, ceased from his labors, and entered into his rest, at Cleveland, in the home of a daughter. At one time a pastor in England, disabled by illness, he entered upon a business life in this country, and more or less identified himself as a member of our presbytery with Christian work, especially in the Third Church, where his fine spirit revealed him as a gentle and devout character. Led by God to business in Cincinnati and Cleveland, after trials bravely endured, he has met his loving Lord.

A short visit to Erie, Pa., gave a view not only of the beautiful city and its attractive harbor, but of the evangelistic movement undertaken by the Presbytery of Erie to reach and stir each one of its seventy-three churches, and there as "a sound of a going in the tops of the mulberry trees" already.

The pastor of the Park Church, Erie, Rev. Harry Burton Boyd, is specially concerned in the movement, but all the pastors second his efforts. The memory of the former pastor of the First Church, Rev. Robert Clements, is still cherished by church and community and fellow pastors, though his successor, Rev. W. W. Iliffe, D.D., follows on admirably, and proves that in true hearts there is always room for the object of an expanding regard and love. The great promontory which almost encircles the harbor is to be made by the Government and city a public park, and with its many tree-embellished acres, its views of lake and city, it should become one of the great parks of the East.

The Duquesne Church, Rev. W. F. Silveus, D.D., pastor, received at its communion on Oct. 9th, six new members by profession and ten by letter.

By invitation, the pastor of the Third Church, Chester, Pa., Rev. Dr. A. L. Latham, visited Barber Seminary, at Anniston, Ala., and gave a most helpful address upon and explanation of the Vacation Bible School, which he has so wonderfully developed. A hearty believer in the Bible as a richly interesting book for the young; convinced that rightly taught it will win the attention of the youngest and most careless, his advocacy of the Vacation Bible School is so illuminating that it is contagious. His statement of results is remarkable. He advocates the study of the Bible pure and simple, and flings aside all the so-called attractions of play, and industrial teaching, and he counts no scholar enrolled until a week has passed. He is intense not only in his belief that there is a dearth of Bible knowledge, which must be rectified in the children, but that the Bible is the most interesting and winning book in the world. Get him to talk of this school, and show you his methods, and you will understand why the Chester Third backs him financially and cordially. He attracts me, for the first and fundamental principle of the Freedmen's Board is to ground the colored child in the Bible, and lay more stress on, by God's aid, making him a Christian, than a skilled laborer, desirable as that is. That will always come when the heart is right.

We do not need the testimony of Admiral Sims concerning the value of prohibition, yet it is pleasant to hear him answer the question whether he favored prohibition. "Oh, absolutely and whole-heartedly. Of course there is smuggling, but the amount of liquor now drunk is not one-half of one quarter of what it was before prohibition. Our great claim as prohibitionists is that it has shut up the schools of future drunkards, the saloons and clubs. We have saved the rising generation from the drink."

When shall the world learn that except a man be born again he can not see the kingdom of God? We shall not get a new heaven and a new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness, until men's hearts are right. Character development is impossible without divine truths. Here is Ex-Senator Root giving us a dark picture of our people today, and there is a great deal of truth in it. He says:

"All the terrible lessons of the last decade show most clearly that the most insuperable obstacle to peace and happiness and progress and growth of the people is their incapacity to receive the blessings that are ready for them, if they will but take them. The world is full of hatred and strife and murder today because of the incapacity of millions of people in organized states to receive the truth that is being spread throughout all civilization and which is to be theirs in centuries to come, but they are not ready for it. That is a matter not of intellectual power, it is not a matter of learning, it is not a matter of precept; it is a matter of the development of character. . . . The development of character must come through exercise of the virtues that make human character; mercy, compassion, kindly consideration, brotherly affection, sympathy with fellow-men, unselfish willingness to sacrifice for others."

To remedy this something may be done by appeals to prudence and a wise self-love. But it is the pulpit of earnest ambassadors for Christ, it is godly men and women in the home, social life and the world that can make true character. How the old doctrines emerge! Here is a depraved world and a sinful, and men are astonished! Character and development! There is no evolution which does not start with a new nature in Christ Jesus! How shall you get real compassion, unselfishness and brotherly affection, except by the Cross of Christ?

CHICAGO LETTER.

BY REV. E. N. WARE, D.D.

Dr. Charles F. Wishart, President of Wooster College, formerly pastor of the Second Church, supplied the pulpit of Hyde Park Church, October 30th, in the morning. He took part in the installation of his cousin, Dr. J. M. Wishart, in Crerar Memorial Church on Monday evening, October 31st.

The installation of Dr. Asa J. Ferry in Edgewater Church, October 31, was perhaps the most elaborate service of its kind ever conducted in Chicago Presbytery. Twelve ministers took part in the service, eight of whom were members of Chicago Presbytery. Dr. W. S. P. Bryan presided, Dr. W. C. Covert preached the sermon, Dr. John Timothy Stone charged the pastor, Dr. George L. Robinson charged the people, Drs. Hepburn, Selden, Vale, participated in the service. Dr. Henry S. Brown officiated at the presentation of the pulpit gown. Four neighboring pastors of other denominations took part in extending greetings. Dr. Ferry is well-nigh overwhelmed with the gracious welcome which the brethren of the presbytery have accorded him on his coming from the Presbytery of "Brotherly Love." His ministry with this important church is most propitious.

The Presbyterian Department of Publicity is credited with a plan of instruction on the matter of church calendars, to-wit: To send a "durable" folder containing church calendars and bulletins, collected from all over the Church, to the minister whose name first appears on the roll of his presbytery, with instructions to add to it and send to the next name on the roll. It is well that the folder is said to be durable, for, in Chicago Presbytery, to carry out the plan allowing one week for receipt and forwarding the folder, it will require just two years to get to the end of the roll if the Publicity Department begins with the first man in charge of a church. If the first man is literally taken and he is to send it on to the second, it will take nearly five years to get to the end of the roll. Hardly a workable plan it would seem.

Rev. Calvin Pardee Erdman, son of Professor Erdman, of Princeton Seminary, has been received into the Presbytery of Chicago. Mr. Erdman has become an associate-pastor with Dr. Stone of the Fourth Church. This makes four ordained ministers on the staff of the Fourth Church. Mr. Erdman conducted the Young People's Church in the lecture room last Sabbath. The Marquis memorial organ in the lecture room is nearing completion and will be ready for use next Sabbath. Mr. DeLamater will dedicate it.

Mr. Walter R. Mee, an elder in the First Church, was re-elected General Secretary of the Chicago Church Federation at the annual meeting the last week in October. It has been a good year financially with an increase of $9,594.00 over the previous year. Five hundred new contributors shared in the advance. Two hundred and fifteen meetings were held, with a total of more than 75,000 in attendance.

Chicago Presbytery instructed its trustees on the Federation Board to insist on a presbytery referendum when, in their judgment, matters up for consideration of the board were of such a nature as would call for a general expression of denominational opinion, before final action was taken.

Rev. Ward K. Klopp, a senior in McCormick Seminary, has been called to the pastorate of the Braidwood Church, which he has been supplying for some months.

Rev. Francis J. Martin was installed in Granville Avenue Church, November 4th. Rev. N. B. Barr presided, and Dr. C. G. Richards, Prof. R. Worth Frank, Rev. W. J. Du Bourdieu, Rev. L. P. Cain and Rev. P. R. Carlo took part in the service.

Chicago Presbytery, in the Fourth Church, on October 31, took action on the report of its special committee appointed some months ago on reorganization of presbytery. The report, which was adopted by a unanimous vote after an hour's consideration, with practically no serious debate or deliberation, puts Chicago Presbytery on a trying experiment for one year, which will be watched with solicitude, and with much misgiving and fear, but also with much hope and confidence. Chicago Presbytery is suffering greatly in the financial support of its local agencies and institutions, principally the Church Extension Board, and its mission and institutional work, and Olivet Institute. These and other local work have not received any substantial increase of aid from the working of the New Era Movement, while the Movement at large is credited with a gain of some twenty-two million dollars in the Church's benevolence. This new step of Chicago Presbytery was taken on the urgent plea of the Superintendent of its Church Extension. The detail of reorganization is not endorsed in its entirety by any one of the Presbytery, but, for an emergency, all were willing to put aside individual opinions, and try what the committee after three months of deliberation and revision had brought in. The reorganization plan enlarges very greatly the personnel and duties and powers of the Executive Council. It decreases the official makeup of the presbytery to a moderator and a treasurer. A Stated Clerk is named, but he is also made Executive Secretary. The new standing rule on the duties of the Stated Clerk-Executive Secretary, which is as follows, will show how little is reserved for presbytery, per se, to do with the Stated Clerk after he is elected.—

"The Stated Clerk and Executive Secretary shall be ex-officio a member of all departments and agencies of presbytery, and shall be elected annually by Presbytery upon the nomination of the Executive Council. His salary and the expenses of his office shall be fixed by Presbytery upon the recommendation of the Executive Council. He shall be the General Executive Officer of Presbytery and shall report from time to time to the Executive Council, under whose supervision he shall labor."

All departments and agencies of the Presbytery will be required now to confer with the Executive Council and present to the Council the proposed budget for it to consider and pass upon. The business of the Executive Council is to have right of way and precedence over all other business in Presbytery. This is a great experiment by a great presbytery for a great emergency. The great danger lies in the possibility of the Executive Council degenerating into a small group of a bare majority. Even then it is not beyond the services and approval of Presbytery.

SYNOD OF WEST VIRGINIA.

BY REV. J. P. LEYENBERGER, D.D., S. C.

Synod met at Clarksburg, Oct. 18-20. The opening sermon was preached by Rev. W. H. Foulkes, D.D., General Secretary of the New Era Movement. Rev. Albert Evans, D.D., was elected moderator, and Rev. J. V. Koontz temporary clerk.

The matter eliciting the most interest was the campaign for funds, jointly conducted by the synod, U. S., and this synod, for the benefit of all Presbyterian institutions of learning in which the two synods are interested. The work has been well organized, and much preliminary survey accomplished. Dr. O. W. Bushgen, of the U. S. Church, is in general charge. The campaign is upon the basis of joint synodical control of Davis and Elkins College, and of Lewisburg Seminary, and is to include among its objects the Pattie C. Stockdale School, at Colcord, and work among Presbyterian students at the West Virginia University at Morgantown.

Reports from the committees showed that synod shared in the general prosperity, spiritual and financial, of the past year. The reports from the Sabbath-school missionaries, of whom there are three, were full of encouragement. Rev. E. V. Black, senior missionary in point of service, has seen the work in the state develop from smallest beginnings to a well-organized field. The Committee on Home Missions told of the larger receipts, and corresponding growth in the work, with more adequate care for the mountain work. Rev. H. L. Topping, a recent graduate of Auburn, was settled in Jarrold's Valley. The committee can use other workers, if such can be found.

One special feature of synod was a series of Bible readings, conducted by Mr. D. F. Merritt, of Cameron. They were rich with spiritual meaning. A men's supper was held, at which the delegates to synod were guests of the McClelland Bible Class of the entertaining church. Dr. C. H. McDonald, of the Committee on Men's Work, was the speaker. Some of the other speakers were Dr. McDowell, of the Board of Home Missions; Dr. E. C. Cort, of Siam; Rev. M. H. Anderson, D.D., regional secretary for the New Era Movement; Miss Elizabeth Hamilton, of the Woman's Board of Home Missions; Mrs. Andrew Todd Taylor, of the Woman's Board of Foreign Missions, and Prof. W. W. Sanders, state supervisor of schools for colored children.

A special committee, consisting of the stated clerks of the three presbyteries, was appointed to consider an adaptation of the California plan for future meetings. The next meeting is to be held in the First Church of Wheeling.

MONTANA MUSINGS.

BY REV. J. F. SHEPHERD, D.D.

The Kalispell Church, Rev. B. Scott Bates, D.D., pastor, received twenty-eight members at the October communion. The campaign for pledges for the new church has begun in earnest.

Rev. Merton S. Fales, of Whitefish, received sixteen members at the October communion. How many of the churches of synod will report their 25 per cent increase? Rev. T. A. Wickes, moderator of the Presbytery of Kalispell, is asking this question of all the ministers of that presbytery. Ought not other moderators to do the same?

Rev. Harry W. Haynes, the new pastor at Jordan, has received fifteen members in the first month of his work and baptized six. His work is of great promise.

Rev. W. G. Rees, new pastor at Cut Bank, has seen the Sabbath school increase almost 50 per cent in a month, with crowded congregations at both morning and evening services. He is making a systematic visitation of every family in the city and surrounding country. Such work is needed in all our churches.

Rev. J. C. Evans is supplying the Welsh Church of Butte and will hold a series of meetings from Nov. 27 to Dec. 4 in the Welsh Church of Great Falls. This church has been closed for some time, but it is hoped to revive it.

Rev. H. A. Brown, who recently took charge at Polson, reports increased attendance at the services, some additions to the church, and the expectation of securing a new manse very soon. He and Rev. Merton S. Fales organized a church at Pablo, a lumber town connected with Polson, with nineteen members and three elders, Oct. 17.

The new church building at Troy was dedicated free of debt, except the sum furnished by the Board of Church Erection. This is a commodious house of two rooms, a good auditorium and a social room, and is located in the best part of this thriving little city. A great crowd greeted the writer on the morning of the dedication, Oct. 23, to testify their appreciation of the work done by the pastor, Rev. Ira L. Crooks, and his wife. This young church was organized Dec. 5 and now has a membership of fifty-seven, all active, and is fully organized for aggressive work. The pastor's wife is superintendent of the Sabbath school, which is making a specialty of committing to memory and reciting the Holy Bible, and has a campaign on for reciting of both the Shorter and Intermediate Catechism. The youth of this church will be furnished for teaching and for life.

It was the writer's privilege to supply the church at Harlowtown, Oct. 27, Rev. Eliot Porter, pastor. Mr. Porter is an overseas veteran and a member of the Committee on Ritual of the American Legion, hence was needed in the great Legion meeting at Kansas City. In three years, under his care, the Harlowtown Church has increased its membership 165 per cent, its congregational expenses 600 per cent, and its benevolences 1,000 per cent. The explanation of this remarkable work is discoverable in that, added to able preaching and faithful pastoral work, communion cards are regularly sent out, and a record of attendance at the communion is kept. No one can neglect this holy ordinance with impunity and be an efficient Christian. Also the church bulletin contains this standing announcement, "All the collections go to the benevolence fund for the advancement of the kingdom, to whose splendid work for the country and throughout the world this church has pledged its whole-hearted support." Besides this, each one is urged to make a special contribution each communion.

We are in receipt of the "recruiting plan" of the committee of three of the self-supporting synods. They propose to visit "all the leading seminaries" for the recruiting of young ministers to their work. The recruiting for the aid-receiving synods is done by some one in New York, the representatives of the synods being refused the opportunity of presenting our claims, for "prudential reasons." No one in the East knows the needs or opportunities, much less the adaptability of a certain man for a definite task in this great virgin West. How long will it take to bring in the kingdom here if we must be content to receive, where virile young men are most needed, those who are left after the East has made its selections, and to whom no adequate appeal has been made? If the Church wants great results, let us have equipped workers, men who really want to build on no other man's foundation.

The writer had the pleasure of addressing a large crowd at a peace meeting in Harlowtown on Oct. 30, and also delivered the Armistice Day address at Havre.

Great Falls, Mont.

ARKANSAS LETTER.

BY REV. C. E. HAYS, D.D.

It was my pleasure to spend Oct. 26th with Dr. D. T. Waynick and his good people at Siloam Springs, where I was greatly pleased to see the beauty and convenience of the new church building which recently was completed. In the evening, more than forty men met in the dining room of the church to talk over and consider the religious work of the men in that organization. The ladies served a bountiful repast. I was invited especially to address the body upon "The Work of the Men in the Presbyterian Church." Dr. Waynick has a strong hold upon his membership and the entire city. The church is well organized. A new pipe organ has been contracted for and at an early date will be installed. Rev. Dr. Kellogg has a large Bible class composed of the older men and there are two other classes for men also.

At the invitation of Rev. W. M. Howell, the pastor at Foreman, I visited that church on Oct. 30th, preaching in the morning. For several years Mr. Howell has been preaching in the Miller School House, six miles north of Foreman. He took me out to the school house for the afternoon and evening services, where I preached to large congregations. A new church was organized with twenty-eight charter members and three elders were elected, ordained and installed. Five trustees were also elected. One of the members is giving an acre of ground upon which a church building will be erected at a cost of approximately $3,000.

I visited Ashdown Oct. 26th and had a conference with two of the elders of that church. The church building is a neat and attractive building and belongs to our organization. The Southern Presbyterian Church has a strong membership. The two churches are federated, but are now without a minister.

Oct. 27th was spent at Mineral Springs and I held a conference with the officials of that church. Rev. W. M. Howell is the stated supply once a month. On Nov. 21st he will be assisted in a meeting at that place by Dr. Wylie.

Oct. 28th was spent at Ozan. This is the home of W. P. Wallace, who has two sons in the active ministry and three more preparing for the ministry.

Little Rock Presbytery will meet April 4th with the Dumas Church.

Rev. E. E. Morris, D.D., preached in Grace Church, Little Rock, Oct. 30th, for the pastor, Rev. Dr. Krauss. Grace Church has fifty-two students enrolled in the week-day religious instruction, which takes fifteen hours a week. Six members were received into this church during October.

On the evening of Oct. 28th, Trinity Church of Hot Springs gave a reception in the church to the pastor, Rev. Dr. Eells. Dr. Krauss, of Little Rock, was one of the speakers. Several of the local ministers also gave addresses.

Licentiate Boudra is holding a series of meetings in the Coal Hill Church. He is a student in the College of the Ozarks and supplies this church half-time, giving fourth time to each of two other churches.

PRO AND CON

THE SHORTER BIBLE.

BY REV. LEANDER S. KEYSER, D.D.

Permit me to call the attention of all evangelical Christians to some important facts about "The Shorter Bible," which has now been issued in two volumes, so as to include both the Old and New Testaments. The editor-in-chief is Dr. Charles Foster Kent, who is well known as a leader among liberalistic theologians and Biblical critics. He practically accepts the premises of the Graf-Wellhausen-Driver school, and hence cuts the Bible to pieces, believing what suits him and rejecting what does not suit him. "The Shorter Bible," though written in an attractive style (and all the more dangerous on that account), is based throughout on the unproved assumptions of the liberalistic Biblical criticism. Many of the historical parts of the Bible are treated as if they were mere poetry and human tradition; many parts are transposed to fit the authors' liberal theories, and many vital sections are entirely omitted, as if they were of little worth. All of Dr. Kent's many books are of the rationalistic type.

On the title-pages of these two volumes you will find the names of Frederick Harris, a prominent secretary of the Y. M. C. A., and Ethel Cutler, who holds a high position in the Y. M. C. A. They are announced (see title-pages) as "collaborators" with Dr. Kent in this work of mutilation of the Bible. That means that they share his liberalistic views. They will be judged by the company they keep. Thus they compromise themselves and the organizations they represent. Evangelical people ought to know these facts. Since many of them support these Associations, ought they not to enter a vigorous protest? Do they want to continue to help institutions that lend aid and encouragement to liberalism, which undermines the very faith they cherish most dearly? Furthermore, ought not the officials of the Associations to look into this matter and call their secretaries to account.

FREE POMEGRANATE SEED.

In response to any application, along with a two cent stamp, a little package of seed of the rare, attractive pomegranate will be gladly sent, as a starter for next spring. A recipient of several years ago said: "Year after year I have searched in vain the seed catalogs for the little fragrant pomegranate we used to have in the garden at home; and your kind and most unusual offer in the Herald and Presbyter meets with a very warm reception from me." Again, while the undersigned lived in Nebraska, an appreciative recipient said: "A little pomegranate lies on our desk, brought there through the mail from a kind friend. We have not seen one since childhood days. It brings back early memories. It is exactly true to type, with the same delicate colors and markings, the same in size as those that grew on the vines planted by our mother's hands, with the same perfume, delicate, fragrant, and sweet. Wonderful it is that there should be such persistency in retaining, and perpetuating pleasing characteristics. In a thousand generations it will be the same. God blesses his loving obedient people in the same way. To a thousand generations he continues to show his mercy, if they will but love him and keep his commandments. God's providence and grace are both very wonderful and very delightful. We thank him and our friend for the little pomegranate. We will enjoy its fragrance as long it can be preserved, and we will plant its seeds to raise some sweet and worthy successors." With a desire to "brighten the corner," and make some other heart rejoice."—C. P. Graham, Presbyterian Minister, "H. R."; 1120 Montana Street, Chicago, Ill.

MISSION WORK

DR. PATTERSON IN AFRICA.

Dr. J. M. Patterson, Secretary for the Southwest of the Board of Foreign Missions, returned to St. Louis, on Oct. 25, from his tour of inspection of Africa. He and Rev. and Mrs. W. H. Hudnut, of Youngstown, O., made up the party for this 22,000-mile journey, 2,000 miles of which was in Africa, mostly in the interior, in the Cameroons. They landed in Africa July 18, remaining there through August. Travel was made by motor-cycle, automobile trucks, push-carts, backs of natives and by walking. The difficulties of travel may be estimated by the fact that for the first nine miles of the journey, going to the interior in the north, six hours were required, and when the first destination was reached, sixty-five miles inland, Dr. Patterson found that he had reduced his weight nineteen pounds. The point farthest south which he visited was Benito, in Spanish Guinea, which is only about one degree north of the equator. This round trip of more than two hundred miles was made in push-carts along the beach, returning by surf boats. Although this was the "dry" reason, there were terrific rainfalls, in keeping with the weather record of twelve feet of rainfall annually in the Cameroons. It was while going down a hill during one of these blinding rains that Dr. Patterson fell and broke his arm, a serious injury, from which, however, he has now recovered. The party conferred with the French Governor and other officials of Cameroon. At the end of three years, all the mission schools are to be required to teach in the French language. Dr. Patterson says that the French Government is apparently friendly toward American mission work. The commission is recommending a five-year program to the Board, with quite a large increase in the number of American missionaries; the opening of several new stations at strategic points, particularly one at Youande, which has been made the capital; and the employing of one hundred new native evangelists annually for five years. It is believed that the Church in Africa can not be self-governing for several generations to come. A new hospital, along simple lines, which can be built at perhaps an expenditure of $50,000, is greatly needed, as also an enlargement of the industrial plant.

FLORIDA SYNODICAL.

During the week of Oct. 11, when the Synod of Florida was set up, at Miami, the women convened, at the same time and place, to organize the Synodical Society of Florida. Mrs. E. P. Thomson, of Fort Pierce, who has been our Florida Presbyterian President from its beginning in 1919, was unanimously elected President of the Synodical. After the organization business was completed, the women divided into three groups to organize and elect officers for the North, the Southeast, and the Southwest Presbyterian Societies of Florida. For the new Synodical, Mrs. Thomson gave us three goals—a missionary society in every church, every woman in the church a member, and a field secretary. It was decided, if possible, to send ten cents each per member for the Synodical and Presbyterian Contingent Funds. This sum is to be raised as each society deems best. Thursday morning the women of the Synod were formally recognized in a joint meeting with synod.

CHURCH AT LARGE.

DIET AND HEALTH.

The most effective weapon against infection and disease is the building up of the reserve force of the body. This is only possible when a properly balanced diet is part of your regime. The healthy individual has a high resistance against the various germs and bacteria that cause disease, while the ailing person or one with chronic indigestion has a correspondingly low resistance.

A wise diet, combined with proper exercise, go a long way toward health building, and with this idea in mind only can we do our very best to gain a foothold upon the ladder of health.

From two and one-half to three quarts of liquid are necessary every twenty-four hours to keep the blood stream of a desired consistency, as well as to help the body remove the waste from food that has been digested and the waste from worn-out tissues. Failure to provide sufficient water for this work will produce premature old age, constipation and kindred ills, including an over-rich and sluggish blood stream.

The growth and development of the body depends upon the protein and carbohydrates, vitamins and fat, constituents of the food we eat. So if we are under thirty, unless there are serious organic disturbances, we may eat meats, fish, eggs, cheese and the vegetable legumes in sufficient amounts to satisfy our appetites, unless we are sedentary workers.

After thirty-five, unless one is very active and is engaged in hard, laborious work, eat meat or its equivalent once a day, while above fifty years of age only eat meat three or four times each week. Utilize the vegetable proteins, eggs and cheese in place of meat.

Often one meets a housewife who has the mistaken idea that if she uses a variety of foods it becomes expensive. For this reason she gets into a rut with a menu of just bread, meat and potatoes. This is surely wrong. Not only does this style cost more money, but it is also costly from the dietetic standpoint. The family that has a diet of bread, meat and potatoes usually expends considerable money for drugs to overcome constipation, uric acid and other intestinal complications.

Your issue of ——— contained a cut of our church. Thanks. This would be a favorable time for a H. & P. propaganda in the way of new subscriptions. Hence send me a bundle for free distribution. My father took it all his ministry and so shall I. R. M. C.

I regret to state that I will not be able to follow up the marked copies you are sending to a number of my members, as I am now on my vacation. Will be pleased to present the claims of the H. & P. when I get back. That

OBITUARY

Obituary Notices at the rate of 75c per 100 words

LOHR—Berthier Lohr was born in London, O., Nov. 18, 1847, and died in the same city Sept. 20, 1921. To his parents, John and Ann Noteman Lohr, a godly couple, still revered in Madison County, for their piety and useful lives, were born eight children. For more than three-quarters of a century this happy circle of brothers and sisters remained unbroken as if some blood-stained lintel had sheltered them from the destroying angel. Mr. Lohr was united in holy wedlock with Miss Mary Jane Creath, a noble woman and fitting helpmeet, for nearly a half century of wedded bliss. To them were born three sons and two daughters, who, with mother and three grandchildren, are now in the shadow of their great bereavement. The life of the deceased as citizen, neighbor, friend, relative, or in the inner circle of the home, measured by the highest standard, was ideal. Born in a Christian home and dedicated to God in the holy rite of household baptism, in early life he recognized the parental vows assumed in his behalf, accepted his Savior, and joined the Presbyterian Church of London, where he worshiped and wrought for more than half a century. He was soon ordained as ruling elder, serving with his father until his coronation, and later, till his own. He adorned his church with a godly life and her session with a fidelity that never wavered in summer's heat or winter's cold. In this man and his father is seen an impressive illustration of vital family religion. John Lohr, father, was a member of the London Church more than forty years, Berthier more than fifty-five, the two more than ninety-five. The father was ruling elder more than thirty-seven years; the son more than thirty-eight, and both, over seventy-five. Surely a wonderful record. Thus our beloved brother lived, serving well his day and generation, adorning every position in life, honored of man and beloved of God, and now "He is not, for God took him." He bequeathed to his loved ones a priceless legacy, a holy, happy memory, without blot or blemish. John A. Ewalt.

HENDREN—Nancy Fulton Hendren, daughter of Robert and Elizabeth Fulton, was born near Homer, Licking County, Ohio, Jan. 21, 1836, and died Oct. 13, 1921, at Groveport, O., aged 85 years, 8 months and 21 days. She leaves four sons, one daughter, seven grandchildren and one great-grandson. One granddaughter, Ruth Bonebrake, the wife of Rev. Floyd E. Hamilton, is a missionary in Pyeng Yang, Korea.

ROGER'S RHYMES.

LAUGH A BIT.

Tho' it's bad, it might be worse,
So laugh a bit;
Don't get thinking of a hearse,
Laugh a bit;
I've seen folks worse off than you,
And the doctor pulled them through,
Laugh a bit.

Has your girl just turned you down?
Laugh a bit;
There are other girls in town,
So laugh a bit;
And the woods are full of maids,
Every height and all the shades,
Laugh a bit.

Have you got a giant's job?
Laugh a bit;
Don't sit down and start to sob,
Laugh a bit;
There is just one thing to do,
Grit your teeth and see it through,
Then laugh a bit.

Did you tell me there are two?
Laugh a bit;
Twins are double luck to you,
Laugh a bit;
Why not call the first one Kate,
And the second Duplicate?
Then laugh a bit.

SEEING THROUGH SERVICE.

BY CHARLOTTE E. GRAY.

They had saved for this trip for five long years, these two young working girls, and now, fairly started, they were in an ecstasy.

"Oh!" breathed Clarice. "The mountains! The ocean! Harriet, I believe we shall see God on this trip!"

Harriet's eyes widened and she pondered.

"Yes," she decided, lying awake that night from the novelty of being in a sleeper. "Looking at God's wonderful works ought to make us see him."

As the trip progressed, however, it seemed as though something always prevented Harriet from "looking at God's wonderful works." Clarice grew impatient.

"Harriet," she remonstrated once, "let that child alone and enjoy yourself."

Harriet tried to look over the head of the restless child she held and see the great hills which, seeming to grow out of the horizon, were enshrouded with the most enchanting purple tint she had ever seen. It certainly was trying to hold a fretful baby while coming in sight of the first mountains she had ever beheld. A look at the child's mother, however, out of whose tired face sleep was ironing the lines of care, checked Harriet's sigh and she gave her entire attention to the baby.

Clarice raved over the mountains that night; but long after she slept Harriet lay recalling that exquisite purple, and, when her eyes closed, the smile of one who sees a vision was upon her lips.

Early the next morning people began flocking to the observation car. The Rockies were to be crossed that day! The girls, young and quick, secured excellent seats, but when Harriet saw an old lady unable to find a chair she sprang up and put the white-haired woman into her own.

Then, imprisoned behind finely-woven, dust-filled screens, which are the killjoys of Pullman travel, Harriet sat during that magnificent ride. Clarice in the observation car, could see snow glistening on the peaks, and watch the engine as it curved and twisted, seeming to cling, with its train, like a fly to the granite sides. Once, in the afternoon, hearing that an open observation car was being attached to the train, Harriet dashed to the rear, hoping to secure a seat, but once more she encountered the mother and baby.

Harriet glanced at the frail old lady and at the heavy child. "Give him to me," she smiled to the mother.

It was nearly evening when she found a vacant chair near Clarice and sank into it.

"Hasn't it been grand!" she beamed. "Clarice, you must have seen God today!"

Clarice started. So occupied had she been in clinging to the best seat in the car, in straining every nerve to drink in all the beauty, that hardly a thought of the Creator had come to her all day. See God? She glanced sharply at Harriet and, struck by her expression, but words died on her lips. What—whom—was Harriet seeing?

The next day presented a different scene. The face of nature had changed in a night. Gaunt, white hills relieved only by a sage brush and stunted evergreens which stood up stiffly on the crust they had burst through, confronted the travelers. Weary stretches of plains upon which alkali dust lay like snow had to be crossed. The porter closed the windows to keep out the heat, and the passengers began to cultivate each other's acquaintance. The little old lady fluttered over her daughter, who had succumbed to the heat, and lay supine on a seat while Harriet took care of the baby.

"Is it your business to look after that child?" scolded Clarice; but Harriet only smiled.

All day the train flew, like a thing afraid, through desolation, with hardly one human eye to note it as it climbed the chalky mountains and traversed the scorching plains. Now and then passengers would life a shade and peer out. Once the whole carful exclaimed over a beautiful white lake, and again over a lovely blue river, only to laugh at themselves a moment later for being deceived by a mirage.

"Clarice, wasn't it wonderful that we saw God as plainly today as yesterday!" marveled Harriet that night. She did not notice Clarice's stare. She was tired. The baby had been so cross, but his mother had enjoyed a good rest, so Harriet was at peace.

Clarice was sleepless that night, and when morning came she had something to say to her friend.

"Harriet, we are each missing something on this trip. You are missing your fair share of the scenery and I am missing my chance to see God."

"But—but"—puzzled Harriet, "one sees God through his works."

"Yes," replied Clarice; "but one sees him plainer through service. One may view the grandest sights on earth and catch not a glimpse of God, or one may see him constantly, although living in a basement in a city. He anoints the eyes of those who serve him."

Toward evening the train began climbing the Coast Range, and magnificent pines crowded near the track and swept up the mountain sides in miles of marvelous greenness. Clarice insisted upon Harriet's taking turns with her at the window, and she helped care for the weary fellow passengers.

"My husband will be so disappointed," sighed the fagged little mother. "He is a literary man, and I promised to write a description of this scenery for him, but I am unequal to it."

"Let me write it," cried Clarice. "I ought to be able to and I should love to try."

At Los Angeles the girls saw their charges leave the train, and bade them a cheery good-bye.

The two weeks at Coronado were wonderful to the girls. They swam, visited the battleships in the harbor, marveled over the novel sights of a southern city, and every day at high tide they sought a place where, perched on high rocks, they could see and hear the ocean in all its grandeur. On their last night, tanned, wind-blown, and rather serious, they sat in their usual place.

Clarice leaned toward her friend.

"I got a letter today," she stated, "and I have decided it ought to go to you. It is from the man I wrote that description for. He wants me for a private secretary, but you can take the position as well as I. It means good pay, congenial work, and a home in beautiful surroundings."

"Clarice! Clarice!" cried Harriet, nearly falling off the rocks in her excitement. "I got a letter, too. It was from my little old lady, offering me a position as companion to herself, her daughter, and that dear baby. I didn't tell because I wasn't going to leave you."

"Oh, Harriet!" Clarice gasped. "It couldn't be more like a story book, could it? Writing, living here—I can't think it's all true."

"We did see God on this trip, didn't we?" smiled Harriet as they left the rocks an hour later.

"Yes," deliberated Clarice. "You saw him first through service. I saw him afterward through you, and we both have seen him through his works besides."

"And he has seen us," exulted Harriet, clasping the two letters happily.—Western Christian Advocate.

IT'S LOVE MAKES HOME.

There's a stately house with porches wide,

And all that money can buy inside—
Costliest tapestries, paintings and books,
Luxuries greet you wherever one looks;
But alas, fair peace is an absent dove,
For there is no peace where there is no love,

And there is no home where love's not found—

Its only a house on a plot of ground.

I would rather sail on the wild sea's foam
Than live in a place you can't call home,
Or dwell in a hut like a Hottentot
Than a palace of gold where love is not;
For the wealth of life, after all, I hold,
Is not in the things we can buy with gold,
But the wealth of life, 'neath God's azure dome,
Is the grace of love, and love makes home.

A HORNET'S BASKET.

In South America they have some very queer baskets. The hornet makes himself a kind of paper house, light and warm and waterproof, and some man who wants a basket pulls it down, puts a handle on it, takes out the partitions the hornet had for walls to his rooms, and goes off with a fine, light, water-tight basket. Hornets make some trouble if they go too near you; but they also save trouble, as you see, sometimes. No man could make such a basket if he tried.—Selected.

HANNAH HURRY.

BY MRS. RAYMOND PATTERSON.

Small Hannah Martha, when a child,
Was taught with daily care
That promptness was a virtue blest,
And tardiness a snare.

'T was ev'ry day for many years
Impressed upon her mind:
'T far better be an hour ahead
Than just a bit behind!"

And so when Hannah Martha tall
Became of age to wed,
'T was Henry Hiram Hurry's son
Her to the altar sped.

She kept his house with thrift and care,
One thought always in mind;
'Far better be a day ahead,
Than just an hour behind."

She set the clock far on ahead.
Her Henry stopped to speak:
'Is this tomorrow now, my love,
Or Tuesday of next week?"

So great her fear, that time o'ertake
With consequences dire,
She housed the plants one summer day,
And built the furnace fire.

She stored her furs at Christmas-time,
The moths of May to miss;
And when it was nineteen below,
Ironed out her dotted swiss.

She tore the calendar ahead,
The crops grew all awry.
'What season is it?" Henry cried.
'What Anno Domini?"

She even died before her time—
Hypertrophic worry—
Lest she be late when Charon called,
'Hannah Martha Hurry!"

FOOLING ALBERT.

Albert was a little younger than the other children. He was also a very trustful boy. He thought that his friends always means just what they said. Tom liked to play jokes on Albert and see how often he could fool him.

"You'd better not go home by the bridge," Tom called out one day when Albert went past where some of the boys were standing. "I saw a big queer-looking animal there. He might hurt you."

"It's mean to scare Albert, Besides, you told a lie," said Roy.

"No, I did not tell a lie. I saw Mr. Brown's big dog by the bridge, and he is a queer-looking animal. Everybody says so."

The boys laughed at that. They thought Tom was smart.

Now it happened that Mr. Ray had just bought a big and very fierce bull. When Albert told at the store that somebody had said there a big queer-looking animal down by the bridge, a man ran to see if the bull was safe in the field. The bull was lying down in a small hollow, so he could not see it from the road. Tom's father and other men went at once to catch the dangerous animal. By the time they came back it was too late for a ride to the city.

Tom was sorry to miss the trip. He felt ashamed when he had to explain that the big animal he had talked about in such a fearful tone was just good dog Rover.

That night Tom's father told him the story of a shepherd boy of long ago.

He fooled the men so often by crying "Wolf," that they paid no attention to his calls. One day a fierce wolf did come and killed the sheep.

Then Tom said: "After this I want Albert and everybody else to know that what I say is true, so that they can take my words just as they sound."—Ex.

ETHEL AT GRANDFATHER'S.

(A True Story.)

There are not many girls who enjoy being called a tomboy, but it never mattered in the least to Ethel Stirling. Her Cousin Jim was her companion, and there was not a thing this adventurous spirit dared that Ethel was not his admiring follower. On some occasions she even led in rank, and Jim brought up the rear. All sorts of mishaps had befallen her, from the day she had stayed out late to see the horse doctor, and came home grieved because she had found him a mere man, to the time when coasting, face downward, she had run between the wheels of a grocery wagon and came to an abrupt stop between the four legs of a good-natured horse. On this last occasion she gave way to tears, and was taken home to her mother in a state of alarm quite unusual to her.

Portland was a good place to live; but it was when she visited her grandfather's farm that she realized the fullness and freedom of life. Among other products on the farm was one Ethel was never tired watching, and it appeared to hold the same fascination for Jim. Grandfather had large pens filled with pigs, and fenced about them was a strip of ground which Ethel called her summer garden.

One day an original thought came to Ethel. "Jim," she said, you are afraid to take a ride on one of the pigs."

"I'll do it, if you will do it first," said Jim.

Ethel was rather taken aback, but in nowise daunted. She was younger than Jim, but just as brave, if not more so. She gathered her little skirts closely about her, sprang from the fence, where she and Jim had been sitting, into the pigs' summer garden, and, selecting the largest one, she sprang astride his back and grabbed his ears for support. To say there was surprise and consternation in the pigs' garden is to express it mildly. The rest of them all stood back, and Ethel and her gallant steed had a clear track. Round and round the space they went, Ethel clinging on for dear life, and the pig giving vent to his displeasure in loud squeals. There had been nothing said as to how long she could ride, but she concluded she might as well continue as long as she stuck on. Jim was bending double on the fence, his legs dangling in the air, his shrieks of laughter mingling with the squeals of the pig.

In the mad chase, Ethel had not had much time to take in outside surroundings, but she suddenly became conscious that she had an audience. The pigs' pasture land lay along the roadside. Four passing teams had drawn up, and they were watching her with keen interest. The noise brought grandmother from her baking and grandfather from his oat field, and the ride was brought to an abrupt end.

Ethel was a bit indignant when she found that Jim was not to be allowed to take his turn; but, if there was any disappointment felt on Jim's part, he succeeded admirably in concealing it. But he was known to say to the boys that his Cousin Ethel was too gritty by half to be a girl, so that it is certain that he appreciated her, even if he did not always dare to follow her footsteps.—Ex.

GROWING.

BY LOULA FARR YOUNG.

Mother says I'm little,
Father says I'm small,
But the birds all tell me,
"You are tall!
You are tall!"

Brother calls me baby.
I don't believe he knows,
For the frogs sing at twilight,
"How she grows!
How she grows!"

Sister says I'm tiny;
But once I heard a bee
Buz-z-i-n-g, buzzing—and he said,
"Bigger'n me!
Bigger'n me!"

A LITTLE SERMON BY THE ROADSIDE.

BY D. H. TALMADGE.

An old man, holding at the end of a long halter strap an old horse, stood one sunny afternoon at a point where a country lane joined a great highway. The horse nibbled at the grass by the roadside. Immediately behind the man an old dog sat upon his haunches. Automobiles whizzed by, an endless procession, some going toward the city, which lay in a haze in the distance, some going in the other direction where, so far as the eye could discern at that point, were only a mighty forest and a range of mountains.

And it chanced to come about that day that a big touring car, in which were two men, two women and a child, stopped near the place where the old man and the old horse and the old dog were, and its driver was unable to make it go again. The sun blazed down fiercely, and the driver, in his efforts to adjust the difficulty, was soon in a sweat, both physically and mentally. The old man, followed by the horse and the dog, moved forward.

"Better let us pull you into the shade," he suggested.

"Well!" said the driver, wiping the sweat from his eyes, "go ahead."

So, improvising a harness from a rope included in the equipment of the touring car, the old man hitched the old horse to the machine and drew it into the shade.

"Sometimes, it seems to me," spoke the old man then, addressing the smiling women and the frankly grateful men, "as if every living thing was dependent upon every other living thing. It is hard, maybe, to understand it in the broad sense—covering all animalkind, I mean—but if it is true in one instance, it must be true in many. None of us are justified in holding ourselves quite independent of the other animal forms in our creation. Everything, even an old horse, is worthy of our respect and kindly consideration. Yes, and even an old dog, too."

The child—a little girl—had stepped out of the automobile, and, in answer to something in the old man's eyes, had gone to him and taken hold of his hand. He beamed down at her.

"I am going to prove to you what I said about the dog," he chuckled. "The horse has already proved himself. You are thirsty, aren't you?"

"Dweadfully," admitted the child. "So is mamma and all of us."

"I knew it." The old man pointed up the lane. "See that house yonder, with the red barn behind it? That is where we live, the horse and the dog and I and some two-legged folks I think a heap of. Well, in a place up there is a gallon or two of ice-cold buttermilk. Like buttermilk?"

"Yes," came in fervent chorus from the entire party.

"All right." The old man took a book from his hip pocket, tore a leaf from it, and with a stubby pencil wrote a message. Then he called the dog to him and fastened the message to the animal's collar. "Now, Bud," he ordered, "you streak it for home and mother." He waved his hand toward the house, and the dog, wagging his tail frantically and barking, sped in a circle around the horse and was off in a cloud of dust.

"I don't know, I am sure, what I should do if I didn't have that dog to help me," laughed the old man, his eyes affectionately following the cloud of dust. "Now we'll see what happens."

Ten minutes later another cloud of dust appeared in the lane, and presently two barefooted boys, one carrying a covered bucket from which came a sound which could have been made only by ice, the other bearing a tray upon which were a number of glasses under a snow-white napkin, arrived on the scene, trudging grinningly several hundred feet behind the excited dog.

"My grandsons," said the old man. "They and some of the rest of us run the farm, and amongst us two-legged ones and four-legged ones we have heaps of fun." He held up a hand. "No, not a cent. Glad it tasted good to you. You happened to be dependent on us this afternoon, that's all."

The driver turned again to the engine, and of a sudden it began to whir. The child ran to the car, and in a minute, with a waving of hands and a calling of good-byes, the party was on its way again.—Ex.

I WANT A HOUSE.

I want a house and a comfy chair
And a red brick fireplace all my own.
I want a nice soft reading light
And a rug or two and a telephone
That nobody else but me may use.
I want a cat and a dog, and then
I want a garden where flowers grow.
I don't care if it does take men
To tend the furnace and walk and lawn—
I want a house.

I want a house and an apple tree
In a real back yard. And by and by
I want some dishes and silver and things
And room to fuss and scrub and try
Out all the rules in the magazines.
I want a place where I can sew
And then run off without picking up.
I want to watch "just folks" that go
Up and down on a pleasant street
And feel they're there, but my house so clean.
With straight white curtains and bordered walk,
Is a place of refuge that stands between
All folks and me. O, nobody knows
How I want a house.

WHAT ABOUT THE CHURCH?

What is the Church? Not an ethical society, nor a social organization, but a mobilized army. A living organism through which God—by the power of his Spirit, in leading souls to Christ—is bringing the world back to truth and righteousness.

Jesus bade his disciples farewell on the Mount of Ascension, saying, "All power is given unto Me in heaven and on earth; go ye, therefore, and evangelize; ye shall be witnesses unto Me, both in Jerusalem and all Judea and in Samaria and unto the utmost parts of the earth." The plan of campaign was thus marked out.

Here is the franchise of City Missions.
The word was, "beginning at Jerusalem."
Go down into the slums of your home town and tell the submerged masses that Jesus is the mighty to save! "Charity begins at home"—but it does not stay there.

Here is our warrant for Home Missions.
"Go ye into Samaria!" There are "little lonely folds" on the far frontiers of our country that need the Gospel and it devotes upon us to give it.

But the work of the Master has a wider sweep. He bade his disciples go into "the whole world" and keep on going with their message of salvation until they had reached the last man. It thus appears that the terms of our commission were not left to us. They are definitely framed by two obvious facts, namely, the Macedonian call and the Lord's response to it.

I'll find the poetic in Sunny Heart Row.

I'll think cheerful thoughts, I'll watch

I'll dream of the angels, expecting their

I'll play with the children, little maids,

Lesson VIII—November 20.

PAUL BEFORE THE KING.

(Acts 26:19-32.)

Ch. 26:19. Whereupon, O king Agrippa, I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision:

20. But shewed first unto them of Damascus, and at Jerusalem, and throughout all the coasts of Judea, and then to the Gentiles, that they should repent and turn to God, and do works meet for repentance.

21. For these causes the Jews caught me in the temple, and went about to kill me.

22. Having therefore obtained help of God, I continue unto this day, witnessing both to small and great, saying none other things than those which the prophets and Moses did say should come:

23. That Christ should suffer, and that he should be the first that should rise from the dead, and should shew light unto the people, and to the Gentiles.

24. And as he thus spake for himself, Festus said with a loud voice, Paul, thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad.

25. But he said, I am not mad, most noble Festus; but speak forth the words of truth and soberness.

26. For the king knoweth of these things, before whom also I speak freely: for I am persuaded that none of these things are hidden from him; for this thing was not done in a corner.

27. King Agrippa, believest thou the prophets? I know that thou believest.

28. Then Agrippa said unto Paul, Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian.

29. And Paul said, I would to God, that not only thou, but also all that hear me this day, were both almost, and altogether such as I am, except these bonds.

30. And when he had thus spoken, the king rose up, and the governor, and Bernice, and they that sat with them:

31. And when they were gone aside, they talked between themselves, saying, This man doeth nothing worthy of death or of bonds.

32. Then said Agrippa unto Festus, This man might have been set at liberty, if he had not appealed unto Caesar.

Golden Text: "But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that slept" (I Cor. 15:20).

Catechism—Q. 48. What are we especially taught by these words, "before me," in the First Commandment? A. These words, "before me," in the First Commandment teach us, that God, who seeth all things, taketh notice of, and is much displeased with, the sin of having any other God.

INTRODUCTION.

Festus, the new Governor, having come into power, the high priests and leaders of the Jews took their earliest opportunity to try to influence him against Paul. The opportunity came soon, because, three days after coming into office, he went up to Jerusalem from Caesarea, and they met him there and urged him to send Paul to Jerusalem for trial. Festus saw no objection to it and arranged, after another interview at Caesarea with them, to send him to Jerusalem as they desired. The Jews however wished to murder him while on his journey. Paul realized their wicked designs, and told Festus that he refused to be sent back to Jerusalem. He saw that there was no hope for safety and justice, and announced his appeal to Caesar. Festus had no other course open to him than to entertain this appeal and to send Paul on to Rome. Some have wondered that Paul should make this appeal to a heathen emperor, but it was undoubtedly of God's permission and design. A new life and world opened before Paul by this means. He was permitted to visit the capital city of the world and to extend his influence from that point. He would be saved from the malignant Jews and would secure justice in the face of their unjust and unreasonable attacks. Before sending him to Rome the Jewish King Agrippa came to visit Festus, and, at his request, Paul was introduced to him and made before him his defense in an address which is a magnificent specimen of eloquence and logic and religious forcefulness. This whole oration should be carefully read and studied. In it he recounts some of the facts of his early Jewish life and faith, his opposition to Christ, and his persecution of the Christian people, leading up to his conversion, when Christ appeared to him on his way to Damascus.

EXPOSITORY.

19. Christ had met him, had turned him from his wicked way as a persecutor, had claimed him as his servant and follower, and had enlisted him in the Christian life and work. That was the turning point in Paul's life. He rejoiced always, afterward, that he had yielded to Christ as he appeared to him that day. He was happy to remember that he had not been rebellious and disobedient. It was a voice and an appearance from heaven of the risen Christ. It was a heavenly vision. He saw Christ. From this time on he knew for himself that Christ had risen from the dead, and was a witness to this fact, with the other apostles. He himself had seen the risen Lord. He yielded to him. All opposition died out of his heart and he became one of the most positive and determined of the apostles. So may we yield heartily to Christ and never be disobedient to his call.

20. At once, as opportunities came to him, he commenced to witness for Christ; first at Damascus, then at Jerusalem, then to the Jews generally, and then to the Gentiles wherever he met them, and called them to repentance and faith and service of Christ. This is preaching the Gospel. It is not enough to recite the historical facts as to Christ. We must insist that people shall subject themselves to God, and let his truth and personal influence have their rightful effect upon their hearts and lives. We must insist on repentance from sin, faith in Jesus Christ as the only Savior, and confession of him and obedience to him in Christian life. It would be a blessed thing if all the world would so repent and believe and obey.

21. Paul realized that these were the reasons why the Jews hated him. He impressed upon Agrippa and Festus the fact that he had done no crime, and that it was only because the Jews hated Christ, that they hated Paul as the servant and friend of Christ. Happy are we, as Christians, if no fault can be found with us except that we are followers of Jesus Christ and are doing his will. Of course some people will hate Christians for this very thing, even today.

22, 23. Paul was able to testify that he had, during all his ministry, been faithful to his simple and single duty. He had made Christ known to the world. He had been faithful to the truth of God. The Old Testament, which the Jews professed to believe, had told of the coming Lord and Savior. Moses and the prophets had told of him. Christ had fulfilled the Old Testament prophecies, by his wonderful birth, his life and miracles, his atoning death and his resurrection and ascension. There could be no crime in preaching these truths. But the Jews had so hated Christ that they could not bear to have him preached even if he did fulfil the Old Testament promises. Still, against their hatred and malice, Paul had persisted in his work. God had given him strength and grace, and he gave to God all the glory.

24, 25. Here come some personal words to Festus, in answer to an interruption from Festus, who told him that he was mad, or crazy, or the victim of a disordered brain. A good many people would like to believe that Paul was crazy, and so get rid of what he taught. But Paul was not crazy, and he knew it, and Festus knew it, and everyone knows it. He spoke the truth of God, as Christ spoke it, and as John the Baptist spoke it, and as Peter spoke it. We would better attend to it as God's truth, and let God direct our lives.

26, 29. And here are some personal words to Agrippa, with which the address concluded. Agrippa had been reared as a Jew and he knew the teachings of the Old Testament Scriptures, and the general facts of Christ's life, and Paul appealed to him as to his own personal faith. If he believed the Old Testament, as he ought to, there was no escape from the fact that he ought to believe Christ. But Agrippa would not commit himself, except, in a general way, to acknowledge that the words of Paul were very powerful and touching, and that they were calculated to win one to a faith in Christ. But Agrippa would not yield himself to Christ. Salvation was not accepted although it came close to him that day. Once more Paul makes an earnest and affectionate and dignified appeal to Agrippa, and all the rest of them, to become Christians. Having done this he could do no more. No sermon is complete without such an appeal, but, when it is made souls are on their personal responsibility before God to whom they must answer.

The interview closes. All were convinced of Paul's innocence, and Agrippa voiced their judgment when he said there was no reason why he should not be set at liberty except that he had appealed to Caesar and must appear before him. We all know that Paul was not only innocent of crime, but that he was a holy and inspired servant of Christ.

A NEW HYMN FOR CHILDREN.

"I WOULD BE LIKE AN ANGEL."

I would be like an angel,
And fly on love's own wings,
With kindly acts for others
In daily common things;
No crown upon my forehead,
But a smile upon my brow,
And a hand to help another,
Is all I ask for now.

I would be like an angel,
When message of love
Would help to make life brighter
More like the heaven above,
I never would grow weary
Of serving those around,
For life is always sweeter,
Wherever love is found.

I would be like an angel,
Some cup of water give
To those athirst and weary,
Each day that I may live,
My life should be the music
To cheer earth's darkest night,
And thus I'd praise my Maker,
By making life more bright.

—Fairelie Thornton.

LIFE WITH WINGS.

There was a hymn we used to sing entitled "We shall have wings some day," and one of the anticipations of our boyhood days was that some day we would be an angel with wings. There is no Scripture teaching that we shall be fitted with wings like angels when we get to glory. But there is a figurative sense in which a man may have wings not in heaven, but on earth. The prophet wrote that "They that wait upon the Lord shall mount with wings as an eagle." We are to wait upon the Lord, and the word wait means abiding with him, living with him, trusting him every day and all the days of our life. Those who do this shall live the winged life because wings are the type of the life that soars above, and beyond the ordinary and the passing.

A SIGNIFICANT FACT.

It is significant of the deepest feelings of humanity that the first organization formed in a pioneer settlement is commonly either a church or a Sunday school. The mining camp or lumbering camp settlement has hardly got out of the tent stage, before some cheerful home missionary turns up and proceeds to organize for worship and instruction. And the roughest men instinctively welcome this form of association.—Atlantic City Evening Union.

INFECTED.

"Look out for the scratches," said a physician to a friend as they entered his car and drove away from the hospital. "Gage is a pretty sick man, and it all comes from a splinter that lodged under his thumb nail. It brought about blood poisoning. If the system happens to be in a certain condition—weak or run down—a little infection is apt to prove a serious thing."

"Look out for the scratches" is good advice for all of us. Many sins leave but little scars upon the soul; mere pin scratches, so we think. But a little sin may do a lot of damage if left unmolested; the smallest, most insignificant sin in the world can do that. It was not a big sin that wrecked Saul, Israel's first king, nor Gehazi, the prophet's servant. When the virus of sin once gets into the blood it spreads through the whole life, and suffering and tragedy are apt to result.—Ex.

STANDARDIZED.

The committee of the Women's Auxiliary of the Elm Valley Church had met in the Sunday-school room to pack their annual missionary box. A strained silence hung over the room, and as bundle after bundle was opened the silence grew more eloquent.

"There's Mrs. Clade to come," said Mrs. Purdue hopefully. "She always sends something good."

"I suppose it's the way everybody's been sending to Europe and all," Miss Compton remarked.

"I feel ashamed of what I brought myself," Mrs. Elsie put in, "but it's been so hard these four years—"

"There's her car now," a watcher announced eagerly.

Mrs. Purdue hurried to the door, and the chauffeur handed her a large package.

Back in the Sunday-school room the women crowded about while Mrs. Purdue cut the cord. The bundle contained a miscellaneous assortment of shabby evening gowns and slippers, a couple of vases, an elaborate subscription book and a yellow pincushion.

"Well," Mrs. Purdue exploded.

The door opened again, and a small shy woman stood there timidly offering a package. "I—I wish I could do more," she said.

"I'm sure we're very much obliged, Miss Howe," Mrs. Purdue replied perfunctorily.

The little woman slipped out silently. It was half an hour before Miss Compton thought to open her bundle. Her exclamation brought the others round her.

"Will you look?" she cried. "They're new flannel, every one of them. And look at that brier stitching!"

"And let me tell you something," Mrs. Elsie said suddenly. "Emily Howe must have drawn that out of her six hundred, all she has in the world. My nephew's in the bank, you know and he happened to say that Miss Emily had drawn ten dollars."

"Ladies," Mrs. Purdue exclaimed, "I move that we standardize this box. Not a thing shall go into it that does not measure up to at least halfway to Miss Howe's gift. I thought that I couldn't afford more, but I can do it ten times as well as she can."

"I'll buy the material for dresses for the little girls," Mrs. Elsie put in quickly. The others followed no less promptly.

"But what shall we do with these things?" Miss Compton asked.

"Rummage sale. Anything you please," Mrs. Purdue responded. Meanwhile, I move that this committee adjourn for one week. To think of little Emily Howe's clearing the situation like that!"—Ex.

The Lord is not likely to force his blessings upon men who do not appreciate them enough to ask for them.

WORK THAT COUNTS

Recently, Winfield Scott Hall, M. D., Director of the Department of Social Hygiene for the Board of Temperance and Moral Welfare, visited the Dakota Wesleyan University at Mitchell, South Dakota.

Dr. W. D. Schermerhorn, President of the University, writes as follows:

My Dear Dr. Scanlon:

I am writing to thank you for sending to us Dr. Winfield Scott Hall, who spent yesterday with our college and the city high school in his special work. I do not see how any one could have done more or better work than he. He spoke to the high school boys, high school girls and to the Junior high school boys. He spoke at the college Chapel service, and especially to the women and to the men. Also he spoke at a business men's meeting at the lunch hour, making a total of seven addresses and an audience of twelve hundred excluding duplicates.

His work was of an exceptionally high grade and I am sure that we shall be eager to welcome him again when it is possible for him to come this way.

Sincerely yours,

W. D. Schermerhorn.

Those who desire to know more of Dr. Hall's work should ask for a sample package of his bulletins, which will be sent free on request.

YOUNG PEOPLE

PRAYER MEETING, NOVEMBER 20.

ENDEAVOR TOPIC: The Goodness of God. Psalm 34:1-10.

The goodness of God is one of the most frequently mentioned themes of the Holy Scriptures. The sacred writers strive to impress upon the people that, notwithstanding the sinfulness of men, God continues to love them and seek their salvation. Men, as sinners, do not deserve this gracious consideration, but it is to be remembered that grace is goodness to the undeserving, and God's goodness is the goodness of grace.

God showed his goodness in the creation of our human race. He might have lived on in eternal solitude, but his heart was full of love and he called our race into being as those upon whom he could bestow his tenderness and affection. He was not content to live without having those whom he might love. This is a manifestation or expression of his goodness in a way that is greatly forceful.

But God still further showed his goodness by providing salvation for them before he created them. We read in various places in the New Testament that Christ was "a lamb slain before the foundation of the world." The salvation provided by the death of Christ was not a mere afterthought, as though God came to realize after man's sin that something must be done and arranged for salvation through the death of Christ. No, it was not this way at all. The fact is that before God would consent to create man he provided for his salvation, by a covenant with Christ that he would come into the world and die in the fullness of time. Salvation was all provided for, and Christ had bound himself to die, in the case of man's sin, before God would issue the decree of redemption. Here was a marvelous manifestation of divine and gracious love.

The fulfillment of this covenant by the Lord Jesus Christ, at the right time, was another wonderful display of divine love. The whole of the Gospel tells us that God loves us. He does not hate us. He is grieved over our sin. He knows that we are helpless and lost in sin. But the coming of Christ, to die for us, reveals to us God's desire that we shall not perish, and makes it possible for us, if we will only believe, to have eternal life. We are to accept Christ as he is offered to us in the Gospel, as our Savior, and are to rejoice in the love and salvation that he brings to every sinner who will accept him.

While this is the crowning expression of God's love, we are to remember that in our daily life, in the continual providences of God, there are innumerable evidences that God has his children in remembrance, and is ever preparing for them and bestowing upon them the gifts of his tender love. So that while Creation was a proof of God's love to us, and Redemption the supreme proof his Providence is a constantly occurring proof that God loves us and does not forget us, as he is ever crowning us with his loving-kindnesses and tender-mercies.

The Psalm we have before us at this time is one of the very earnest expressions of a Christian man's appreciation of the tender and abiding love of God. Filled with a sense of God's love the writer says that he will respond to that love by a life of praise and obedience. He does not look upon the outspoken praise of God as a thing of which to be ashamed. He does not intend to be reserved or silent. It is a matter for continued and outspoken utterance. How different is this from the mistaken and evil thought that religion is a matter of which one may be ashamed.

If we have the right sort of hearts we will rejoice in the goodness and grace of God. We will be outspoken and joyous in our Christian life and service. We will be thankful that God was willing to love us, and we will be determined, as long as we live, and wherever we live, to bless the Lord at all times and rejoice in his saving goodness and grace.

GIVING AND RECEIVING.

God gives himself to us in proportion as we give ourselves to him. Even in human relations, the calculating, self-withholding friend is necessarily shut out from the best his unselfish friend would give him. He simply can not understand it, share it or enter into it. He lacks the capacity even to receive his friend's best blessing. That could come only as his own self responded to the dominant note of his friend. Still more must this be true in our relation to God.—Henry C. King.

LUTHERANS IN AMERICA.

The Lutheran church is a polyglot church in this country as elsewhere. It is strong in countries from which our best immigrants have come, namely Germany and the Scandinavian countries, not to omit Poland, Austria and Russia. Colonies of Huguenot Lutherans settled in South Carolina and Florida in the middle of the Sixteenth century within fifty years after Luther posted the Theses in 1517. In 1619

Danish Lutherans entered Hudson Bay. Peter Minit, the first governor of the Dutch colony in America, who purchased Manhattan Island from the Indians and founded the village which has become New York City, was a Lutheran. In 1638, Swedish Lutherans came to the shores of the Delaware, translated Luther's Catechism into the Indian language and established the friendly relations with the Indians which prepared the way for William Penn. The first Lutheran church in America was built here in 1646.

ELECTION DAY.

The proudest now is but my peer,
The highest not more high;
Today, of all the weary year,
A king of men am I.
Today, alike are great and small,
The nameless and the known;
My palace is the people's hall,
The ballot-box my throne!

Who serves today upon the list
Beside the served shall stand;
Alike the brown and wrinkled fist,
The gloved and dainty hand!
The rich is level with the poor,
The weak is strong today;
And sleekest broadcloth counts no more
Than homespun frock of gray.

Today let pomp and vain pretence
My stubborn right abide;
I set a plain man's common sense
Against the pedant's pride.
Today shall simple manhood try
The strength of gold and land;
The wide world has not wealth to buy
The power in my right hand!

While there's a grief to seek redress,
Or balance to adjust,
Where weighs our living manhood less Than Mammon's vilest dust—
While there's a right to need my vote,
A wrong to sweep away,
Up! clouted knee and ragged coat!
A man's a man today!

When you are angry go to your knees rather than to your enemy. It may save a fight, and teach you sense.

An Emergency Call

DESTRUCTION BY FIRE AT WESTMINSTER COLLEGE, UTAH

Friends of Westminster, of whom there are many, should rally at once to the emergency need of that only Christian college in the Mormon state of Utah.

A Pressing Problem before the heavily burdened president is that of providing a new heating plant. The old one was destroyed by fire on October 22d, students in dormitories being left without heat.

The Need Is Urgent. There are only about 2,000 Presbyterians in all Utah—only five or six self-supporting churches. Help must come from Presbyterians throughout the land. That help is needed without delay. The college financial resources were already overtaxed.

THIS IS A SPECIAL CALL, AN EMERGENCY CALL.

PRAYER MEETING

NOVEMBER 16.

TRUE NATIONAL PROSPERITY.
Isaiah 58:8-12.

We all wish for a return of good times, and for a full tide of national prosperity. We may not all want to go about the securing of this in the right way, but we are all ready for the ease and comfort and satisfaction of real prosperity. When times are hard and close, and incomes are uncertain, and prices for the necessities of life are high, we sigh over it and feel anxious for the return of prosperity.

But prosperity, of a real and general and lasting sort, can be had only in conformity with the established laws of God. We can not all be selfish and grasping and idle and unenterprising, and wicked and wasteful, and still have general and abounding prosperity. God has laid down certain rules to which we must conform if we wish for good and satisfactory and happy conditions to prevail.

Our own country is the richest and most prosperous country in the world today, but it is very far from being in an ideal condition. We have vast wealth in natural resources and in financial acquisitions, but there is not general satisfaction among the people, nor is there a general gratitude and obedience to God. Great numbers of men are unemployed and many are in distress because of this fact. Work is not undertaken because wages are so high, and great strikes are ordered because wages are not increased. Instead of a general patience and forbearance and considerateness, multitudes of employers and employes are willful and determined to have their own way, without regard for the general welfare.

This will not do. We are not in the way to secure the best good to the whole country while this disposition is so general. Unless men love God well enough to obey and serve him, and love their fellow-men well enough to be patient and considerate, they cannot attain to general prosperity and real welfare.

Other countries are worse off. The war left many lands impoverished and the people starving. Oppression and cruelty prevail in some countries today and famine and cold and general destitution are so great in many regions that there is terrible distress and suffering as the lot of multitudes. How can our world attain to settled conditions, and to national and world-wide prosperity?

There is no way except by conformity to the laws of God. There must be the observance, for instance, of these directions laid down by God through the words of his prophet Isaiah in time of national distress that had come to the Jewish people.

God's blessing is absolutely essential to a nation's welfare. If a nation is willful and wicked and godless, evil conditions are sure to prevail. There must be true religion. But true religion is more than the holding of religious services, and engaging in fasting and prayer. There must be the practice of the duties which God has defined, as governing the dealings of men with their fellow-men in the fear and love of God.

There must be the putting away of the "I," and by this is meant all unjust and oppressive dealings and overreaching. There must be general kindness and justice and fair-dealing. There must be a true, thoughtful and religious life, instead of vanity and selfishness and personal pride and self-seeking.

If people will live in accordance with the laws of God, in truly religious, law-abiding, industrious and enterprising life, they can attain to wide-spread and abiding and abounding prosperity.

What we want here, in our own land and nation is an emphasis on true religion, the service of our fellow-men, and a general following of the ways laid down in the laws of Almighty God.

THE WIDOW'S MITE.

BY ANNIE JOHNSON FLINT.

God reckons values not as men;
Vast was the widow's "mite,"
While all the rich men's lavish "much"
Was little in his sight.

We talk complacently of "mites,"
Whose thoughts and gifts are small;
But we forget the widow's mite
Was just the widow's all!
—Sunday School Times.

THANKFULNESS IS A PROFITABLE VIRTUE.

Whatever may be our experiences, God is always good. His goodness is as manifest to the discerning eye in the discipline of sorrow and pain as in the affluence of pleasures and possessions. The call to thanksgiving is a call to earnest reflection on God's constant relation to us and to wide and deeper appreciation of his un-failing goodness.

By thankfulness the soul is greated in capacity of moral insight and feeling. As one grows in faith by trusting, and in love by loving, so he grows in thankfulness by the exercise of his soul in grateful thoughts and emotions. "It is good to give thanks unto the Lord."—Dr. Philip S. Moxom.

The sound of a pure, rich toned church bell is indeed pleasing to the strangers in your community, as they are impressed with your hospitality in inviting everybody to join with you in worship. It also reminds every one of their obligation and responsibility and insures promptness in attendance.

Many churches were unable to purchase bells during the war period, but as they are now obtainable every congregation should equip their church with a good bell. A large number of churches are arranging to have a bell installed for use at Christmas time, which will be in keeping with the spirit of the season.

The C. S. Bell Company located at Hillsboro, Ohio, "pioneers in the manufacture of church bells," put out a very attractive and interesting booklet about bells which can be had for the asking. Those interested in the history of Bell manufacture should write for this booklet.

GENERAL NEWS

CHINA REFUSES JAPANESE PROPOSALS.

In a two-thousand word note the Chinese Government has replied to the latest proposals of the Japanese Government concerning the Shantung situation. It states that the Japanese proposals are not acceptable. The Japanese memorandum to China of Oct. 19th, the note declares, shows an apparent misunderstanding and misinterpretation of the text of the Chinese note of Oct. 5th, thereby necessitating a further statement by the Chinese Government "covering past facts and an unchanged viewpoint on the part of China."

"The summary of the Japanese Government's proposed basis of settlement," the memorandum continues, "is altogether too remote from the hopes and expectations of the Chinese Government and people, who therefore are obliged to await patiently an opportunity suitable to Japan for a reconsideration of her position."

"The Chinese memorandum of Oct. 5th points out the difference in views between China and Japan regarding the principles underlying the Japanese proposals and the contents and terms thereof. If the Japanese Government understood these differences, she would very surely have proposed a more substantial and more just project, which would universally be recognized as fair."

"It is most regrettable, however, that the Japanese Government has given no sign of concessions, while maintaining that China openly is unwilling to proceed with negotiations."

"Indeed, China desires a fair settlement in the interest of her nationals and the foreign powers, but thus far Japan has not presented its avowed concrete and fair project, and hence China can not define her attitude one way or the other, finding the proposals of the second Japanese memorandum to be even more difficult to accept."

IRISH SITUATION DEADLOCKED.

Negotiations on the Irish question temporarily are in abeyance, while the British Government is addressing itself to the difficult business of bringing Ulster into the conference between representatives of the British Cabinet and Sinn Fein Ireland, as originally was proposed by Prime Minister David Lloyd George.

Sir James Craig, the Ulster Premier, at Mr. Lloyd George's request, met the Prime Minister and Austen Chamberlin, Government leader in the House of Commons, and they were in conference in Mr. Lloyd George's official Downing Street residence practically all of last Saturday.

FORMER EMPEROR TO BE EXILED.

It now is reported that former Emperor Charles of Austria-Hungary and his wife, Zita, will be exiled in Funchal, chief city on the Island of Madeira.

Although the Allied Council of Ambassadors, which has the responsibility of selecting a place of exile, has not received final approval of this plan from the Portuguese Government, arrangements are being made at Funchal for the arrival of the exiles. Moreover, the council has abandoned consideration of all other possible places.

A report from Constantinople, dated Nov. 5, states that the British cruiser Cardiff left the port of Constantinople Friday for the mouth of the Danube, where she will take on board former Emperor Charles of Austria-Hungary and his wife and proceed to Gibraltar.

AMERICAN LEGION REVIEWED BY COMMANDERS OF WORLD WAR.

Under a brilliant autumn sky and through crowds so dense that they repeatedly surged through police lines, the American Legion, at their convention at Kansas City, passed in review before distinguished military and naval leaders of France, Great Britain, Italy and Belgium and ranking officers of the United States army, navy and marine corps.

The distinguished visitors—Marshal Foch, of France; Admiral Sir John Beatty, of Great Britain; General Armando Vittorio Diaz, of Italy; Lieutenant General Baron

Jacques, of Belgium, and the American representatives of national defense, General John J. Pershing, Rear Admiral Hugh Rodman and Major General John A. Lejeune, commanding the marine corps, marched with their "buddies" of the Legion from Convention Hall, where the parade was formed, to the reviewing stand at Eighteenth Street and Grand Avenue, ten blocks.

Then they turned into the reviewing stand, where they stood while the Legion thousands passed by.

* * *

The convention came to a close last Wednesday with the election of officers for the coming year.

The convention elected Hanford MacNider, of Iowa, Commander, and George L. Berry, of Rogersville, Tenn.; H. Nelson Jackson, of Burlington, Vermont, and Chas. Kendrick, of San Francisco, Calif., representing the army, and Raymond Brackett, of Marblehead, Mass., and J. A. McCormick, of Ft. Lyon, Colo., of the navy, as vice-commanders.

Rev. Earl Blackman, of Chanute, Kan., a minister of the Christian Church—Disciples of Christ—was elected National Chaplain.

LOSES $18,000,000 BY NOT PAYING $5,000,000.

Default by the Chinese Republic of the $5,500,000 loan made by the Continental and Commercial Trust and Savings Bank of Chicago, due Nov. 1st, resulted in abandonment of a proposed loan to China for $18,000,000.

An American banker, representing the Chinese consortium, issued the following statement in connection with China's failure to meet her obligations to the Chicago institution.

"The American group recently received word that it would be agreeable to the Peking Government to receive proposals for a loan aggregating, say, $18,000,000, the proceeds to be utilized to meet two maturities of the government, each for $5,000,000, and falling due respectively Nov. 1st and Dec. 1st.

"In response to the request made from Peking, and in order to put the government in funds to avoid any possible default, the American group submitted proposals for a loan for the amount named and for the purposes stated. The government having failed, however, to accept these proposals, the matter has been dropped."

HOW RUSSIA LOOKS TODAY.

An American investigator has this to say regarding conditions in Russian cities:

"Russia gives to a foreigner the impression of being a great nation which is attempting to live on a peanut stand basis.

"There is magnitude to nothing but the population; 120,000,000 persons are dependent upon the supplies afforded by push-cart dealers.

"In Moscow, Petrograd, Samara and other cities trade conditions are the same. Basket peddlers, street corner stands and small, woe-begone shops, with empty cartons and fruit scattered over their shelves to make them appear to be full, provide all the food that is available.

"Bread, potatoes, onions, meat, sugar, sunflower seed, red pop are offered by these dealers, who have come into existence since the embargo was lifted on trade in foods. One sees few full loaves of bread in these shops. The bread is sold by the pound and most customers can not afford an entire loaf.

"Occasionally a tin of American salmon or American condensed milk is seen in a shop window or on a market wagon. But such luxuries speedily are gobbled up by customers who happen to be ruble millionaires. Comb honey also appears spasmodically in the larger shops. It is 35,000 rubles for less than a pound, and disappears rapidly.

"Most of the merchants are persons who have been forced to open stands as a means of livelihood. Half of them are women. Frequently everything from diamond bracelets to potatoes is offered for sale on the same stand. Nearly all dealers buy and sell all sorts of commodities."

GOVERNMENT CUTS $94,000,000 FROM TAX LIST.

The Administration expects to effect an aggregate reduction in Government expenditures for the fiscal year of 1922 of $430,000,000 instead of its previous estimated reduction of $350,000,000, President Harding informed

Congress through a letter to Speaker Frederick H. Gillett, made public last week.

On the basis of the latest estimates received from the various departments and establishments, the President said, the total of expenditures for the next fiscal year now stands at $3,940,000,000, a reduction of $94,000,000 from the estimate of $4,034,000,000 submitted to Congress Aug. 10th.

The President's estimates were submitted in connection with the transmission of supplemental and deficiency estimates of appropriations amounting to nearly $18,000,000, which, he said, were taken into consideration in arriving at the expenditures total for next year.

AS POLITICS IS PLAYED IN KENTUCKY.

Twenty-five hundred billies, clubs and canes that had been bought for use on election day were seized by police last Friday and turned over to the "Citizens' Fair Elections Committee," appointed by the Mayor of Louisville, Ky., and of which Judge Robert W. Bingham is chairman.

In the presence of both Republican and Democratic political leaders the clubs were turned in at the Louisville free public warehouse under supervision of Judge Bingham and other members of the committee.

YEAR'S WHEAT CROP ONE OF THE GREATEST IN HISTORY.

Total wheat production this year of the twenty-nine leading wheat-growing countries of the world, excluding Russia, reached 2,852,825,000 bushels, or about 190,000,000 bushels more than in 1920, according to latest available estimates reported by the Department of Agriculture. For next year's crop the department reported generally favorable conditions throughout the Northern Hemisphere for winter wheat sowing.

Seeding was said to be nearly completed in Canada, and all but the Far West section of the United States, where it has been seriously delayed by drought, and a similar condition was reported for Central Europe, where favorable conditions in all countries except France, which is suffering from drought, should tend to increase acreage, it was said.

Favorable growing conditions and increased acreage were said to promise a large crop for Australia. In Argentina spring planting was said to have been delayed by insufficient moisture, with the result that the 1921-1922 acreage would be a million acres short of the 14,077,000 acres planted last season. Favorable sowing conditions and prospects for a normal acreage in India and South Africa were reported, while the condition of the wheat crop in China was said to be generally disappointing, with prospects of being below average in volume.

UNITED STATES BUILDING SUPER-SUBMARINES.

A new type of submarine motive plant, comprising a combination of gas and electric propulsion, will be installed in three American submarines of the V type, two of which have been begun at the Portsmouth Navy Yard.

Naval engineers are said to be watching construction with great interest because of their expectation of improved operation of submersible warcraft, due to the new installation. A cruising radius of 10,000 miles is said to be one possibility.

The latest submarines are to be 2,250-ton boats, 300 feet long and equipped with electric engines of 6,500 horsepower. They are designed for a surface speed of 21 knots an hour, and a submerged speed of from 9 to 10 knots. The power plant will combine the latest engineering developments resulting from experiments conducted on the naval collier Jupiter, now the aircraft carrier Langley.

GOOD ADVICE.

The meeting of the Investment Bankers' Association at New Orleans heard some pertinent advice from two speakers, who dealt with the problem of protecting the small investor from becoming the prey of swindlers. Stress was laid upon the awakening interest of the banks to this need, and the efforts being made to consult their local banks regarding the good faith of the enterprises under consideration.

If the public could be induced to follow this advise incalculable sums would be saved from "blue-sky" and "get-rich-quick" concerns. The interest of the investment bankers is especially to be enlisted, and it may be hoped the suggestion that the association name a committee to cope with the situation will be adopted. A thorough investigation of the field and judicious publicity, educating the general public with the same zeal that those who prey upon the small investors exhibit, would save individuals enormous losses and at the same time promote intelligent and profitable investment.

Milk-wagon drivers to the number of 10,000 went on a "strike" in New York City, last week.

"It costs $2 less to ship a ton of newsprint paper from Germany to New York City than to ship a ton of the same paper from Niagara Falls across the state of New York," R. S. Kellogg, of New York, secretary of the News Print Service Bureau, told the Salesman's Association of the Paper Industry in session at Chicago, last week.

Navigation of the Volga River has been closed for the winter, owing to ice and low water. This will block steps taken to bring relief to starving villages far from railways or wagon roads that are passable.

William N. Haskell, director of work in Russia for the American Relief Administration, has agreed to extend first aid to adults, and will supply 30,000 supplementary rations for bedridden patients in famine regions, it is announced.

Assurance that the claims of survivors of Lusitania victims will be taken up with the German Government soon after the formal exchanges of ratification of the peace treaty are completed was given by Charles E. Hughes, Secretary of State, to a delegation representing the claimants.

Secretary Hughes is said to have taken the position that he regards the claims of the survivors as a lien against the German Government, but he indicated that there are many points to be settled before adjustment of these claims can be made. It is likely that a settlement may be made eventually from funds in the possession of the Alien Property Custodian.

Representatives of a German syndicate have offered to rebuild twelve villages in the Somme district with German labor and material, the reconstruction to be considered as a charge against the reparations account under the Loucheur-Rathenau agreement.

The Germans, accompanied by members of the French Labor Federation, had just returned from an extensive survey of that part of the Somme district which had suffered the greatest devastation.

They informed M. Loucheur that 2,500 workers were ready to reconstruct the twelve villages within a year. The list of these villages includes Belloy-en-Santerre, Ablaincourt, Fay and Vermandovillers, which frequently were mentioned in the official communiques during the British offensive in 1916.

Dan R. Hanna, son of the late Mark Hanna, of Cleveland, died last week.

Organizations interested in the enforcement of prohibition sent a petition last week to President Harding asking that he "demand" executive officers and recommend legislative officers to speed up and intensify the agencies of enforcement."

The petition declared that a recent tour of the Northern states had not shown a reaction "among the more than three-fourths of the American people" who had approved prohibition."

The minimum wage for Berlin actors has been set by the actors' union at 2,000 marks a month, effective the first of the year, or at the present rate of exchange, $12. It represents an increase of 600 marks and applies on all contracts now in force with actors of two years' service.

A German mark, which was normally worth about twenty-four cents, is now worth about a half cent.

HOME AND FARM

THE ANGLER'S SONG.

As inward love breeds outward talk,
The hound some praise, and some the hawk;

Some, better pleased with private sport,
Use tennis, some a mistress court;
But these delights I neither wish,
Nor envy, while I freely fish.

But yet, though while I fish I fast,
I make good fortune my repast;
And thereunto my friend invite,
In whom I more than that delight;
Who is more welcome to my dish
Than to my angle was my fish.

THE PUMPKIN.

The golden ball of savory goodness, the pumpkin, is fully ripe and ready for pies, puddings and cakes. "Peter, Peter, Pumpkin Eater, had a wife and couldn't keep her," so goes the nursery rhyme, and methinks that from the various inquiries about pie the reason for Peter's fault-finding was that his wife couldn't make good pie of the pumpkin variety.

There are several methods of preparing the pumpkin, such as follow: Cut a slice from the top of the pumpkin and scoop out the seeds. Replace the top and place in a moderate oven and bake for one and one-half hours. This method is particularly desirable, if the housewife has a range with a coal fire.

Or the pumpkin may be pared and then cut into small blocks. Place in a steamer and steam until tender. Or you may place the pumpkin, prepared as for steaming, in a saucepan and add water to one-half the depth of the pumpkin. Cover closely and cook until tender, then drain well.

If you decide upon the first method you will need only to scrape the cooked pulp from the shell and it will be ready for use. If you select either the second or third method, the pumpkin will need to be mashed.

A New Pumpkin Pie.—Line a deep pie plate with plain pastry. Now place in a mixing bowl:

One and one-half cup of prepared pumpkin, two-thirds cup of sugar, one cup of milk, yolks of two eggs, three tablespoons of melted butter, Beat to mix and then add:

Two-thirds cup of seedless raisins, cut in bits; one-half cup of finely chopped nuts, one-half cup of finely chopped preserved ginger, one-eighth teaspoon of allspice.

Turn into the prepared pie plate and then bake in a slow oven until the custard is set, usually about forty-five minutes. Dust the top of pie with cinnamon and confectioners' sugar and then return to the oven to glaze pie.

Old Pumpkin Pie.—Line a deep pie plate with pastry and then place in a bowl: One cup of milk, two-thirds cup of sugar, yolks of two eggs, two tablespoons of melted butter, one-half teaspoon of cinnamon, one teaspoon of ginger, pinch of allspice.

Beat with egg beater to mix and then add one and one-half cups of prepared pumpkin and bake for forty-five minutes in a slow oven.

Pumpkin Pudding.—Soak stale bread in plenty of cold water and when soft turn in a piece of cheese cloth and squeeze very dry. Rub through a sieve and measure, then place in a mixing bowl:

Two cups of prepared bread, one and one-half cups of pumpkin, two-thirds cup of sugar, one teaspoon of ginger, one teaspoon of cinnamon, one-half teaspoon of allspice, one-quarter teaspoon of cloves, grated rind of one-half orange, one cup of finely chopped nuts, one cup of seeded raisins, three tablespoons of melted butter, two well-beaten eggs, one cup of milk, six tablespoons of flour.

Beat to blend thoroughly and then turn in a buttered mold and bake in a slow oven for forty minutes. Serve with vanilla sauce.

Scalloped Pumpkin.—This dish makes a splendid change when used as a vegetable. Place in a mixing bowl:

One and three-quarters cups of prepared pumpkin, one teaspoon of salt, one-half teaspoon of pepper, one large grated onion, one-half cup of finely minced green tips of celery, two well-beaten eggs, one cup of coarse bread crumbs, two tablespoons of melted butter, one-quarter cup of milk.

Turn in well-greased baking dish and sprinkle crumbs on top, then sprinkle with two tablespoonfuls of grated cheese. Bake in moderate oven for thirty-five minutes.

Pumpkin Custard.—Place in a mixing bowl:

One and one-quarter cups of prepared pumpkin, one and one-quarter cups of milk, one-half cup of sugar, one-half teaspoon of cinnamon, one-half teaspoon of nutmeg, one teaspoon ginger, three well-beaten eggs.

Beat hard to mix and then turn in well-buttered custard cups and set the cups in a baking pan, and fill the baking pan with cold water to about two-thirds of depth of custard cup. Bake in a slow oven until firm in the center. This usually requires about forty-five minutes.

Pumpkin Pudding.—Place in a mixing bowl: One cup of well-drained pumpkin, one-half cup of molasses, one-half cup of brown sugar, one teaspoon of ginger, one-half teaspoon of cinnamon, one-half teaspoon of salt, one-half teaspoon of nutmeg, one cup of milk, yolks of two eggs. Beat with egg beater to blend and then add: One and one-half cup of coarse bread crumbs, one cup of sifted flour, one tablespoon of baking powder.

Beat to mix and then turn in well-greased mold and place in a deep saucepan. Have the water to reach two-thirds of the depth of the mold, and then boil for one hour. Serve with vanilla sauce.

Pumpkin Pancake.—This New England dish will add variety to the pancake menu, as it is really worth trying. Soak stale bread in cold water, and then turn into piece of cheese cloth and squeeze dry. Rub through a sieve and then measure. Now place in a mixing bowl:

Two cups of flour, one teaspoon of salt, four teaspoons of baking powder, one and one-quarter cups of milk, two well-beaten eggs, two tablespoons of melted butter, one and one-half cups of prepared stale bread, one and one-quarter cups of prepared pumpkin.

Beat to a smooth batter and then bake on hot, well-greased griddle. Serve with syrup or honey and nicely browned strips of bacon or the regulation fresh sausage.

Heat your plates before putting hot pies on them when first taken from the oven, says an exchange. The hot pies on cold plates cause a sweat that makes a soggy under crust.

Bread-and-butter sandwiches are very dainty and attractive when prepared as follows: Cream the butter well before using, then cut the crust from the end of the loaf of day-old bread and butter the slice on the loaf, then cut very thin. Cut in half and fold. Spread the top with raspberry jam. Lay on a plate covered with a napkin.

MUSIC VS. FOOD.

In speaking of the needs of a poverty-stricken family of our acquaintance, a friend once said to me, in shocked and disapproving tones, "And they have a piano! Think of it, a piano! And those seven children have not enough to eat, and are always needing help. I think that family deserves no help and no sympathy. A piano, of all things!"

"Fortunate children!" I replied, "Perhaps the piano makes them forget the lack of food and coal and keeps them off the streets. I must call and see that piano," which I did, forthwith.

I could scarcely conceal my astonishment at the transformation in this erstwhile home of poverty and uncleanness.

The piano, which was the only object worthy the name of a piece of furniture, shone from recent polishing, and floor and every object within range of vision had been scrubbed and rubbed to make it a proper associate for the piano.

"Sure," said the mother, beaming with pride and blissfully unconscious of the tales concerning the family extravagance, "'tis a grand thing for the children. They don't never go out nights now, and," impressively, "you just ought to hear Mary play,—never had a lesson and plays everything, by ear. And it's the same with Ellen. She plays grand. Oh, they all take turns. It's too bad the girls ain't here to play for you, and the way they keep the house clean! You see their friends come to see them now."

I tried to look my grief at missing the musical (?) treat, expressed my admiration for the piano, my interest in the welfare of the family, and departed rejoicing. My theory has been vindicated.

Music, in that home, as in every other, is as much a necessity as food and clothing. Why expect the poor to be satisfied with food alone while their souls starve for the things that make life worth-while, and, in many cases, barely endurable.

Many complain that the working man is receiving high wages and "wasting" his money on a piano, a victrola, or other musical instrument, and in paying for music lessons for his children.—Ex.

HOW BIG IS A HOUSE?

The lecturer was describing and advocating modern, humane and intelligent methods of dealing with young children. As he paused for an instant, a grim-faced woman rose up. "Will you answer me one plain question?" she challenged him. "This shilly-shallying with children is all right at times, but there are times when nothing but a good spanking will do. What do you do when a child stamps his foot and says 'I won't do it'?"

The lecturer waited. The questioner added nothing to her question.

"Do you call that a plain question?" he asked in an incredulous tone, as though he could not believe his ears.

"I certainly do," she said with satisfaction.

"Well, Madame," said the lecturer, "I will answer that plain question if you will answer one of mine. How big is a house?"

The woman stared. "That's not a plain question. What sort of a house?"

"Aha!" said the lecturer, "You can't answer me till I have told you what sort of a house? Well, I can't answer you till you tell me what sort of a child."

"I don't see what that's got to do with it," said the woman, but somewhat taken aback.

"Well, here's a case. A little child of three, very nervous, sensitive, recently over an illness, has been on a long, hot railway journey. At the end, exhausted from lack of sleep, excited to the point of distraction by the noise, and a thousand fears he can not explain, with a beginning of stomach trouble from the irregular meals, is told by some one who does not understand little children to carry a satchel much too heavy for him. Perhaps you would expect a three-year-old to say, under such circumstances, 'I'm sorry, but I'm not feeling very well and it is really quite beyond my strength.' But I don't blame him a bit for stamping his foot and screaming. And certainly he does not deserve the same treatment as a loutish boy of fourteen who refuses to obey a reasonable request. And yet you expect some answer that will be the same for both cases."

Every child is different from every other child, and only his mother is in a position to know how to take him. All sets of circumstances are different from all others and only those who know all about the case have any chance of guessing what is the right thing to do. You must do that most difficult of all things, think, and think hard, before you know what is the right thing to do. But before you begin to think, just remember that if a child stamps his foot and says, "I won't" to you, it is because you have brought him up wrong. When you see a dog that habitually snarls and shows his teeth, you do not say "What a disagreeable nature that dog has." You say, "Heavens! what a brutal master the poor creature must have had."—Ex.

THE NEEDS OF THE HOUR.

BY DOLLY GOODWILL.

We need less criticism and more commendation, more charity and less fault-finding. In country and village life there is need of less idle talk and more serious thinking, more quiet reading by peaceful fireside and gentle speech at home. I am brought in touch with a plain family, and, judging from appearances, I believe they are poor. Their two old nags are boney, and the outfit reminds one of the vehicle used by "Cripps," a queer "poor white" man described by Harriet Beecher Stowe in her old-time story of "Dread—A Tale of the Great Dismal Swamp." This poor man's harness is "pieced out" with ropes and chains in lieu of leather. But what matter? They are a pair of loving parents who are "chummy" with their children. Said children are respectful and dear.

It is common in rural places for heedless people to make light, thoughtless remarks of others, and these stories fly like the proverbial thistle-down, which can not be gathered and is blown here and there. A good priest rebuked a tattling woman of his parish for her idle talk and pointed a moral here, and bade her go gather the thistle-down and be made an object lesson of the same, much to her lasting benefit.

It is pleasant to note the cheerful talk at tea tables in homes of intelligent people. I often dine with a dear family who are ideal. The parents led the conversation, and children are "drawn out" to cultivate their conversational powers. Only yesterday they talked of Cincinnatus, of antique virtue and simple manners. When honors came to him and he was chosen consul and later dictator, he was found plowing on his small farm. Later he returned to his little home on the Tiber, simple-hearted and great. Then they talked of beloved great men, especially of A. Bronson Alcott and his wonderful family at "Orchard Home," near historic Concord. They talked of the divine call to preach the Gospel that came to him when he was a peddler, and he joyfully obeyed the summons, and, like the apostles of old, became a "fisher of men."

CLEVER FINANCE.

A dry-goods merchant in a small town in the South was standing one day at the door of his shop when a little girl came up to him.

"I am Mabel Smith," she said, "and mother says will you give her change for half a dollar. She will send the half dollar on Monday."

THE CITY MOUSE IN THE COUNTRY.

A city urchin was on his visit to the country. When the train stopped, the farmer lifted him into the wagon and they jogged through beautiful green rolling pastures, which extended as far as the eye could see.

The little fellow was much excited. "Say," he said, "they must need a lot o' cops here."

"Why?" inquired the farmer.

"Because there's so much grass to keep off of."

Mistook His Own.—A Rangely Lakes guide one day, while working on a log drive, fell into the water. At last, dizzy and nearly exhausted from his struggle, he managed to grasp a big log and hold on to it. The current was so strong and swift that it swept his body under the log until his feet stuck out on the other side.

Just as a comrade, who had run to his assistance, grasped him by the shoulders, he caught sight of his own feet protruding on the other side of the log.

"I can hold on a bit longer, Jim!" he gasped. "Save the poor fellow that's in head first, if you can."

"Does yo' suppose," asked his listener, "dat dat's where dey gits de condensed milk from?"

Thanksgiving Proclamation

THAT season has come when, alike in pursuance of a devout people's time-honored custom and in grateful recognition of favoring national fortunes, it is proper that the President should summon the nation to a day of devotion, of thanksgiving for blessings bestowed, and of prayer for guidance in modes of life that may deserve continuance of Divine favor.

Foremost among our blessings is the return of peace, and the approach to normal ways again. The year has brought us again into relations of amity with all nations, after a long period of struggle and turbulence. In thankfulness therefor, we may well unite in the hope that Providence will vouchsafe approval to the things we have done, the aims which have guided us, the aspirations which have inspired us.

We shall be prospered as we shall deserve prosperity, seeking not alone for the material things, but for those of the spirit as well; earnestly trying to help others; asking, before all else, the privilege of service. As we render thanks anew for the exaltation which came to us, we may fittingly petition that moderation and wisdom shall be granted to rest upon all who are in authority, in the tasks they must discharge. Their hands will be steadied, their purposes strengthened, in answer to our prayers.

Ours has been a favored nation in the bounty which God has bestowed upon us. The great trial of humanity, though, indeed, we bore our part as well as we were able, left us comparatively little scarred. It is for us to recognize that we have been thus favored, and when we gather at our altars to offer up thanks, we will do well to pledge, in humility and all sincerity, our purpose to prove deserving.

We have been raised up and preserved in national power and consequence as part of a plan whose wisdom we can not question. Thus believing, we can do no less than hold our nation the willing instrument of the Providence which has so wonderfully favored us. Opportunity for very great service awaits us if we shall prove equal to it. Let our prayers be raised for direction in the right paths. Under God, our responsibility is great; to our own first, to all men afterward, to all mankind in God's own justice.

Now, therefore, I, Warren G. Harding, President of the United States, hereby designate Thursday, the twenty-fourth day of November, to be observed by the people as a day of thanksgiving, devotion and prayer, urging that at their hearthsides and their altars they will give thanks for all that has been rendered unto them, and will pray for a continuance of the Divine fortune which has been showered so generously upon this nation.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused to be affixed the seal of the United States of America.

Done at the Capital of the United States of America, this thirty-first day of October, in the year of our Lord, nineteen hundred and twenty-one, and of the independence of the United States, the one hundred and forty-sixth.

(Signed) WARREN G. HARDING.

By the President:
CHARLES E. HUGHES, Secretary of State.

OUR EXCHANGES

THANKSGIVING AND CONSECRATION.

In proportion as we realize the occasion for thanksgiving will we feel an urge to dedicate ourselves afresh to God, rejoicing that we can be co-workers with him in the task of making our nation what it ought to be—socially, politically and industrially.—Presbyterian

A SAFE GOVERNMENT.

As we engage in thanksgiving we should not forget that a civil government is to protect well-doers and punish evil-doers of every class, high or low, rich or poor. It is for our law-givers now to recognize God as King and to take as our standard of righteousness the Law of God given to us in his Word.—Presbyterian Banner.

TRUST IN THE LORD.

In one of his letters to Sir W. Robertson Nicoll, the late Principal Denney said: "There is a whole crowd of ministers going in for 'social' reform, mainly because they have no Gospel; and because, like a certain class of politicians, they think this is the way to secure a following. How to say this with out throwing cold water on Christian zeal for improving conditions in which people live, or without seeming to be heartless or indifferent to the wrongs of the poor, may be difficult; but it is just as needful to say 'Put not your trust in Pavliament' as 'Put not your trust in princes'."—Presbyterian Witness.

A PUBLIC REMINDER.

Alone among all the nations of the earth, America publicly and officially recognizes the goodness of God, on a day solemnly appointed by the Government itself. It is for us, as a people, an eloquent reminder of the piety of the fathers, whose inheritance has become ours.—Christian Observer.

A THANKSGIVING MESSAGE.

Thanksgiving Day is one of the outstanding days in American life. It has a special and peculiar message. There are other days that tell of our birth as a nation or fix our thoughts on the natal day of some of our great men. In the future there may be a victory day that shall remind us of the great war, of the bravery of our men in battle, of the sacrifice and service of those who remained at home, and of the thousands of courageous women who administered to the wounded and the dying behind the lines. But Thanksgiving day breathes a different spirit. It is the spirit of God dwelling in the heart and life of this whole nation." Along with all of this we must not forget that humiliation and penitence are interwoven with well expressed national gratitude.—Christian World.

FAITH AND ACTION.

The reason there is an aversion to religious controversy in our day is because convictions do not stir men's bosoms as they did even a half century ago. Having no soul-stirring convictions there is little or no call for courage. This state of things can not long continue if Protestantism is to come to its own and wield the influence and power it manifested when it was born. In many parts it has lost its first love because it has lost the faith it once loved. No church can be strong that has not a strong and virile faith.—Lutheran.

GIRLS! GIRLS!

Headline in Newspapers: "Girl carpenter drives nail like lightning." The meaning probably is she never hits twice in the same place.—Buffalo Express.

WHY QUESTION HIS DEITY?

To us it is not in the least surprising that those who do not believe in the divinity and deity of our Lord Jesus Christ, and in the inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, should be howling for no more conferences on fundamentals.

More than three-fourths of Baptists are Fundamentalists in the strict sense of the word? Orthodox Baptists, now known as Fundamentalists, have been misrepresented over and over. The program they would emphasize is the program of our Lord Jesus Christ as laid down in his Word, accepting him in all of his deity without question and his revealed Word as our only rule of faith and practice. The fundamentals movement is not a movement to split the denomination, as has been charged, but it is a movement to cement the denomination as one, and has for its basis the unadulterated Word of God.—Baptist Banner.

AN ARKANSAS TIP.

One thing we notice, you poll tax and dog tax are the same. Moral: Don't disgrace your dog.—Searcy Citizen.

NATIONAL THANKSGIVING.

The arrangement for the celebration of the Armistice on Thanksgiving Day should contribute to the interest and significance of what has become a national institution. To those who are able to realize, even in a small measure, the unspeakable calamity from which we were saved by the victory of the Allies in the great war, November 11 will continue to be one of the great dates in the history of our empire.—Presbyterian Witness.

A DAY OF REMEMBRANCE.

"The day of thanksgiving is a day of remembrance; but it may be also, and in some points it should be, a day of forgetting—a day in which we forget our losses and our disappointments, while we think of the loving-kindnesses of the Lord."—Nashville Christian Advocate.

RATIONAL AND REASONABLE.

A vital lesson for us to learn is the practical value of praise. Heartfelt praise has its roots in a sense of the blessings which God is lavishing upon us, as well as in a realization of our privileges in enjoying him, apart from all his gifts. We are enjoined throughout the Word of God to be thankful, to bless the Lord at all times, to praise him with all our powers, to rejoice and be glad in him who hath redeemed us. This, like all other scriptural injunctions, rests upon the most rational and reasonable basis.—Intelligencer.

NATIONAL THANKSGIVING.

Each recurring Thanksgiving Day summons us as a people to return thanks to God for his loving-kindness and tender mercies; to praise him publicly, unitedly, and with national voice and utterance, as the author and source of all our blessings, the giver of every good and every perfect gift.

As individuals we should praise him and thank him every moment of our lives; as families whenever we assemble around the family altar; as congregations in our every service of the sanctuary. As a nation we have this one annual, officially appointed day, and, as a nation, in our accustomed places of worship, we should make national expression of our humility, our repentance, and our gratitude to Almighty God.

Much have we to thank God for, as a people. During all the years of our national existence God has given us his protection and has assured to us advancing prosperity. He has given us favor among the nations of the world. Today our nation is the greatest and wealthiest and most influential nation in the world. We have a place among the nations acknowledged by all to be second to none.

We have tried to be a peaceful people, avoiding all wars of conquest and offense. We have been compelled into some wars of defense, and in none of them has our flag trailed in the dust. We have hated war and would put a complete end to all war if we could do so. We have tried to cultivate the arts of peace, and have tried to realize that we have a duty to teach the world to live in peace.

God has granted us prosperity in material ways. We have a rich and fertile land. It produces rich harvests of grain and fruit, as food for ourselves and for many in other parts of the earth. We have great mines of precious metals, mighty forests, vast lakes and great rivers. We have reason for gratitude to God for his material blessings. And we have been able to send food by the shipload, worth many millions of dollars, to keep from starvation many in distressed countries during the last year, so that we have been a helper to multitudes, in Armenia and Syria, in Belgium and Russia.

We have religious freedom and general education, so that by means of churches and schools and widely-diffused literature, we have been able to withstand some of the worst evils of ignorance and superstition, of bigotry and persecution, of vice and crime. The Gospel has been freely crime. The Gospel has been freely preached and may have believed and obeyed the Lord.

We have good laws and many of our people are disposed to make them still better. Some of the worst forms of vice and crime are being overcome. Great masses of our people are anxious to lift the nation to higher levels. Abounding are the forms for social betterment.

Wicked forces are fighting hard, but the stars in their courses, in God's good grace and providence, are fighting on the side of righteousness. Let us not be discouraged. Let us stand for God and he will build us up as a nation.

We thank God for the great Armament Limitation Conference, called by our nation, sitting in the Capital City of our nation today. We thank God for the widespread desire to put an end to war. We shall thank God for any advance made toward the great consummation made in our day. Some day perfect triumph of Peace and Holiness will come, and our praise and thanksgiving shall then be perfect. May God hasten the day.

THE BOYS FOR CHRIST.

If our churches are to have their membership and their official positions well filled with men, in the future, they must pay special attention to the boys of today, seeking their conversion, and their training in the life and work of the Church of Christ.

Rev. Harold I. Donnelly, graduate of Wooster University and of Princeton Seminary, experienced in religious education and specializing in boys' work, has been appointed director of boys' work on the educational staff of the Presbyterian Board of Publication and Sabbath School Work, Philadelphia, Pa. There should be special interest in boys' work in every church, and this appointment by the Board is a suggestion that each church should have some member of its own body in charge of its own special work for its own boys.

This does not mean that there should be any relaxation in the efforts that have been employed in the past in seeking the Christian welfare and nurture of the boys. All that parents, Sabbath-school teachers and pastors have been doing in the past, and are doing today, should be done with added interest and efficiency in the future. These are the divine and established agencies, and these are to be constantly and earnestly employed. But if any new methods may be employed, or any new, organized plans used to increase the Church's efficiency, we may be sure that they will be heartily welcomed.

Measures have been inaugurated by members of the Masonic order in the United States, to care for the boys of their families and their young friends. The desire is to shield and divert them from evil influences and the foundation of bad habits, and see that they are encouraged and helped to grow up as good and upright men. An auxiliary order, named for the illustrious De Molay, has been instituted for the boys, and many of them, all over the land, are being gathered into its ranks. The Masonic leaders realize that their work should not simply be for the sick, the aged, and the orphans, but that they owe a great duty to the boys, the very future of the Order depending upon the upright character of the coming generation.

In a very special and emphatic way Christian people and all the forces of the Church, should be concerned in seeking the salvation and the religious welfare of the boys. God has always called attention to this. There has always existed a covenant in reference to children and children's children, and it must not be forgotten. We are not doing our duty, in any generation, if we fail to rear up a godly generation to follow us, and to maintain the life and institutions of the Church. If we fail here we make a terrible failure. Nothing can compensate for it. The children must be taught the truths, made acquainted with Christ, and brought into and trained in the life and work of the Church.

If Godliness is to prevail in the earth, the Church of today must see to providing Christian leadership for tomorrow. There must not be haphazard methods, which mean criminal neglect, and positive disaster.

It was said of Abraham by the Lord: "I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord." This is the very thing that is needed today. Abraham's name is connected with Isaac and Jacob and the long generations of national and spiritual Israel. He was called the "Father of the Faithful," not only of those who held to the "faith," but of those who were faithful to their trust and who passed the faith down to succeeding generations. Let us, in our own day and place, be full of the faith, and faithful to pass the faith on to those who shall come after us.

UNITARIAN CONTENTION.

It is hard for people who believe in the Bible to understand the contention going on in Unitarian churches, over the question whether it is necessary for one to believe in the existence of God in order to be a good Unitarian.

The discussion started at the Western Unitarian Conference in May, when a speaker took the ground that theism, while philosophically tenable, is not religiously necessary, and that the future belongs to humanism. Theism is belief in the existence of God. Naturally there was objection to the assertion that belief in God is not a necessary part of religion. Others, however, accepted and defended the proposition. It was asserted as a sort of compromise doctrine that a "pragmatic and humanistic idea of God" suits the younger generation of educated Americans better than the old idea of a God "infinite, eternal and unchangeable." One speaker whose words helped on the the compromise said: "Whatever men believe regarding God, whether he be perfect and superior in an imperfect world or whether he be in and working through the imperfect world, it is perfectly evident that there is a vast purpose which is working itself out in this world." This seems to be an intimation that Unitarians may believe either in an infinite, uncreated, unchangeable God, or in an evolved and still evolving God.

The Congregationalist sees a serious side to the discussion. It says: "Dr. George Leon Walker used to tell the story of an incident at a Conference of Unitarians where a paper had been read, in which the writer stoutly affirmed theism as the central thing in religion. At its close, a member of the Conference arose, and with considerable heat inquired, 'Has it come to this, that to be a good Unitarian one must believe in God?' It concludes: "We may be pardoned for suggesting in this connection that from an orthodox point of view a belief in Jesus Christ that is not limited to a belief in his humanity only is a great sheet-anchor for those who would obtain, retain and enlarge their belief in the one and only one true God, infinite, eternal, unchangeable in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness and truth."

PROHIBITION LAW AND ORDER.

The efforts that are being made by some persons and papers and organizations to hinder the enforcement of prohibition are immoral and rebellious, and should be recognized and branded by all good people as the work of traitors. Of course every one knew that there would be hard work involved in enforcing prohibition, as moneyed interests and depraved appetites would oppose it. But perhaps no one anticipated the open rebellion, the brazen effrontery, the hypocritical trickery, and the persistent criminal proceedings that have characterized the liquor interests and their allies ever since the prohibition laws went into force.

There have been determined efforts to circumvent the officers of the law, by concealment, by falsehood, by fraud, by every sort of deception, by bribery of every weak and temptable official, and by a colossal and continued attack of every sort, in public and in private, to break down the law. Whisky papers, sold out to or run in the interest of liquor, fought the enactment of prohibition and then fought the enforcement of prohibition. They argued against it; they ridiculed it; they encouraged the lawless element to break the law, and, at every indication of lawlessness, urged the impossibility of enforcement, insisted upon the repeal of the law, and spread a continual and diabolical propaganda for the encouragement of lawlessness. While most of the papers of the country have been on the side of law and order, some others, and among them some daily papers in the larger cities, have been on the side of immorality and traitorhood and Satanic vileness, day after day, throughout the whole campaign.

Such conduct is criminal and contemptible beyond the power of words to describe, and included in this is the course of a few United States Senators in withstanding the passage of additional enforcement acts, by cowardly filibustering against the overwhelming judgment of the respectable members of the Senate.

The fight for law and order is not over. It is a time for all good men and women to pledge anew their faith in their consecrated efforts to the accomplishment of what we know to be right. It is not in the heart and spirit of loyal Americans to be defeated by a lot of traitors and rebels and criminals. Prohibition is here to stay and to be enforced.

It is a time for the deep-seated sentiment of good people to assert itself in antagonism to the weakness and faithlessness of some officials who have failed to do their duty; against the vicious and bribable papers that have been bought up by brewers to help propaganda among the uninformed and evil-minded; against the criminal agencies that are breaking laws, and trampling them under foot. It is a time to encourage every official, and every organization, and every worker on the right side, of law and order.

Let every good person speak out against such lawlessness. Let every father and mother instruct in their own homes; every teacher and Sabbath-school worker in their own places of influence; and every minister in his pulpit. The law-abiding and useful people of this country do not intend to let criminals change the laws and corrupt the manners of the nation. They demand of Congress, of the courts, and of prohibition enforcement officials, that they shall do their duty and serve the cause of righteousness.

GOD'S WAY AND THE DEVIL'S WAY.

Speedy success in evil-doing leads evil-doers to think that they are very brilliant and smart. It seems so slow and plodding to do good and useful things that they think it is not worth the time and effort of really bright people. It takes a long time to raise a tree, and the patient toiler may care for it for years, while the reckless destroyer may cut it down with a few destructive strokes. The artist may work ploddingly for weeks in making the beautiful art window which the hoodlum may ruin with the hurling of a boulder. Parents and teachers may plead and pray and teach and toil, in the rearing and shaping of the child's mind and heart, and the Satanic corrupter may defile and ruin the object of their hope and love in one vicious and criminal interview. It takes long to train one in the ways of Sabbath observance and divine worship and religious obedience to the laws of God and holiness, while the brusque and bestial methods of the world may play the part of Satan and undo that work, as a delicate vase is shattered by the rude dash of a ruffian. The talent is all on the side of God and his people. Satan and his minions applaud themselves on the swift and crushing success of their destruction. But in the long run eternal and irremediable destruction will come to the workers of iniquity.

"THE CHRIST OF THE ANDES."

We have noticed the fact that Canada and the United States, with three thousand miles of border separating them, have no forts or ships to maintain their rights against each other, and that a Peace Monument was recently erected in a border city testifying to this brotherly and Christian national agreement. This fact is of special interest in view of the present Disarmament Conference. It is a fact to be remembered on Thanksgiving Day, with petitions that the whole world may have peace.

Another monument illustrating the peaceable settlement of national difficulties is "The Christ of the Andes" on the border separating Argentine and Chili. These nations were about to fight over their boundary line, but thought better of it and agreed to submit the quarrel to Queen Victoria of England for arbitration. When the arbitrators reported, both nations accepted the report. Whilst the question was pending, a young Argentine sculptor had cast a colossal statue of the Christ out of the metal of cannon, taken during the Argentine's war of independence from Spain. The statue is so large that full-grown men standing by it look like pygmies. The inscription on its base reads:

"Sooner shall these mountains themselves crumble to dust, ere the Chileans and the Argentines will break the peace, which here, at the feet of Christ, their Redeemer, they have pledged to keep forever."

On the day the Treaty of Peace was signed, women, under the leadership of Señora de Costa of Buenos Ayres, asked to have the statue placed on the highest accessible peak of the Andes, to mark the event as a permanent memorial. This was done at a cost of $100,000. It stands today, and will continue to stand as a memorial not only of that treaty, but of the fact that there are better ways of settling international quarrels than by war. Edwin Markham has voiced its message in these lines:

Amid volcanoes hushed with snows,
Up where the wide-winged condor goes,
Christ, reaching out his sacred hand,
Sheds his blest peace upon the lands.

There once of old, wild battles roared,
And brother-blood was on the sword,
Now all the fields are rich with grain,
And only roses redden the plain.

Torn were those lands with feuds and hates,
On mountain walls and at the gates;
Then through the clamor of arms was heard
A whisper of the Master's word:

"Fling down your swords! Be friends again!
Ye are not wolf-packs; ye are men.
Let brother-counsel be the Law,
Not serpent-fang, nor tiger-claw."

Chile and Argentina heard;
The great hopes in their spirit stirred;
The red swords from their clenched fists fell,
And heaven shone out where once was hell!

They hurled their cannons into flame,
And out the forge the strong Christ came.
'Twas thus they molded in happy fire
The tall Christ of their hearts' desire.

Oh, Christ! who hushed the cruel wars,
Under the far Andean stars,
Lift now your strong nail-wounded hands
Over all peoples and all lands;
Stretch out those comrade-hands to be
A shelter over land and sea.

A SCHOOL OF MISSIONS.

A commendable readiness and desire to study the subject of Foreign Missions is apparent throughout the whole Church, and in a great many local churches classes are being formed for this purpose.

There has been more or less of this in many churches for many years. The Women's Missionary Society members have been interested in this, and they have encouraged the formation of many Young People's Societies and Children's Bands, and through these organizations there has been the development of much interest and the spread of missionary information.

It is a matter for great satisfaction that so much has been done in this direction. Our missionary magazines have given much stimulus and much information. The Missionary Boards and Societies have prepared and published a great mass of valuable and attractive literature, in the shape of books and pamphlets and leaflets and maps. The pastors have worked steadily, and the first prayer meeting of each month has generally been employed as a missionary meeting.

But it is now desired that there shall be a regular School of Missions in each and every church. Every member of every church should be a member of such a school. The Foreign Missionary work is a tremendous enterprise, and no one should be ignorant of the great things that are being done. If the proper means are taken, thousands of these schools can be organized in the churches, with a great quickening and growth of missionary interest and activity.

Let every pastor, or some one else, see that this is undertaken at once if it has not already been inaugurated.

The Foreign Missionary Board is anxious for this, of course, and will give all possible assistance in the work. To every such class, as soon as reported to the Board, all needed help will be sent. The Board is at 156 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

There are class-books or text-books for the year. There are instructions for holding the meetings. There are methods for stimulating the interest in the Sabbath school and among the members of every department of the life of the Church. There are stereopticon lectures for use in the churches. There are suggestions as to the methods of study of the work, field by field. There are calls to the missionary intercession, and missionaries are named for prayer for each day of the year.

Let each church, by all means, have its School of Missions.

Armistice Day was one of the most impressive days in the history of our nation. It marked the burial in Arlington Heights Cemetery of Washington City of "The Unknown Soldier," in honoring whom the whole nation sought to honor the whole body of its soldiers who laid down their lives in the defense of the flag. Probably there was never a more distinguished funeral in our land, the representatives of nearly every nation of the world participating, and laying the emblems of national respect and appreciation on the casket, while every department of our Government was there in full force. President Harding made a forceful and eloquent address, worthy the attention of the world, concluding with the Lord's Prayer, in which the assembly joined. It was a great occasion.

In all the cities of our nation exercises of deep solemnity marked the observance of Armistice Day. The soldiers of the last war, and of all preceding wars, were honored, as they marched in long processions, and stately exercises of eloquent speech and stirring music marked the heartfelt emotion of the nation.

Great hopes and expectations rise in view of the Disarmament Conference, which is in session now at Washington. It is the deep, conscientious conviction of thoughtful and good people that war ought to cease. There can be devised adequate measures for the settlement of national difficulties, as surely as for the settlement of personal difficulties, without resort to force or bloodshed. The Conference is expected to accomplish something that will meet the needs of the world.

As President Harding closed his great address at Arlington with uplifted hand and the deeply-reverent use of the Lord's Prayer, and as the Conference, the next morning, was opened with an earnest prayer by Rev. Mr. Abernathy, all foreign delegates to the Conference must have realized something of the religious conditions in which the work of this world-wide meeting is expected to be carried on.

The men and firms that are in the business of profiteering in war equipment will do all in their power to hinder and prevent disarmament. The people who carry the burdens of war in staggering taxes, and who furnish the victims of war in the persons of their sons, are the ones who wish the wastes and burdens and agonies of war to cease. But they will lose out in this coming conference unless they watch and pray, and know what is being done day by day.

The address made by President Harding at the funeral service of the "Unknown Soldier" passes into literature as one of the classics, and the words, "There must be, there shall be, a commanding voice of a conscious civilization against armed warfare," must be great in their influence to promote and secure peace.

The whole Nation is responding this week, as it should, to the annual roll-call of the Red Cross, and the renewal of pledges to the support of this great and beneficent organization. We would not know how to carry on some lines of helpful work were it not for the ministrations of this great institution.

The drinkers of beer are chuckling over the apparent success of their game in having the manufacture and sale of this intoxicating liquor permitted under the pretense of its use for "medical purposes." Every one knows it is not medicine, and that the only call for it is from guzzlers who want alcoholic drink and who are using every method, underhand, hypocritical, and law defying, for the gratification of appetite. It used to be that such words as "hypocrite" were used by the ungodly to express their opposition to religious people. This use of the word is almost forgotten now in face of the fact that hypocrisy and deceit and fraud are the settled and concerted tactics of the liquor element of today. Prohibition does not make them so; it simply reveals them.

Nine-tenths of all the talk about the necessity for self-defense is pure cowardice or bluster. There is no sense in men being permitted to carry concealed weapons in their pockets. It was formerly the fashion, and some men said they had to do it, and that was the day for many sudden fights and murders. Since this carrying revolvers has been stopped by law the murders have mostly ceased. Nations do not need great armies and navies any more than blustering and timorous men need guns in their pockets.

One of the ways in which hatred of prohibition is manifested is to say it is a "joke." It is very far from being a "joke" ordinarily to those who say so. Fines and confiscation of their illegally possessed property amount to immense sums. Those who are led, by avarice or appetite, to become criminals, in their rebellious violations of this good law, are in constant fear of detection, arrest and punishment. To these skulking criminals the law is no "joke," however much they try by sneers to bring it into disrepute. It is all a part of their disreputable opposition to law and order. There is to be increased stringency of law enforcement, and the jocularity of these anarchists is sure to diminish.

It has been decided by the United States Senate to come to a vote on November 18th on the "Anti-beer" bill. It seems sure that the Senate will vote on the side of good faith and good morals as soon as it has the opportunity. It would be well for every one to write and urge his Senators to stand for righteousness in this matter, and to do it at once.

THANKSGIVING HYMN.

BY ALICE T. DUNLAP.

God of our nation, thee we seek,
In humble, contrite prayer;
Be thou enthroned in every heart,
Teach us thy name to fear.

Our Pilgrim Fathers sought these shores
In freedom here to dwell,
And worship thee, their sovereign Lord,
And of thy glories tell.

And thou in all their years of toil,
Did'st show thy smiling face,
And in their stern vicissitudes
Sustained them by thy grace.

And thou hast graciously pursued
Their paths with tender care;
Rich, their own heritage, thus fought
With toil and blood and prayer.

God of our nation! Thee we praise!
Oh, thou our ruler be,
That from our land shall emanate
Thy light o'er every sea.

GREAT BIBLE CHAPTERS.

THE HARDENING OF PHARAOH'S HEART.

(Exodus 4; 21; 7: 3; 14: 4; 9: 12; 5: 1, 2.)

BY REV. JOHN Y. EWART, D.D.

Here are a series of passages which have given rise to a great deal of controversy between the friends and the enemies of the Bible. We read of God hardening Pharaoh's heart and of Pharaoh hardening his own heart.

Dr. R. A. Torrey states the cause succinctly:

"From reading these passages it does seem at the first glance as if there were some ground for criticism of God's action in this matter, or of the Bible account of it. But when we study carefully exactly what the Bible says, and exactly what God is reported as saying, and the circumstances under which he said it, the difficulty all disappears. For God to take a man who really desires to know and do his will, harden his heart and thus incline him not to do his will, would indeed be an action on God's part that it would be difficult or impossible to justify. But when we read God's utterances on this subject in their setting, we find this is not at all what God did with Pharaoh. Pharaoh was not a man who wished to obey God. The whole account begin not with God's hardening Pharaoh's heart, but with Pharaoh hardening his own heart." (Difficulties in the Bible, p 42.)

Listen also to Dr. M. W. Jacobus in Standard Bible Dictionary:

"We are not to think of this hardening as a capricious or arbitrary proceeding on God's part. It was rather a step in his sovereign process of judgment on those who had already incurred the divine displeasure by first hardening their own hearts. There is no instance in the Bible of God hardening the heart of an innocent man simply to arbitrarily punish him."

The heart is the term used in Scripture to designate the center and core of our spiritual nature. It is used interchangeably with the mind, the soul, and is singled out by the biblical writers as worthy of special care, because, according to our care or neglect of our spiritual nature will be decided rightly or wrongly the great questions of life and destiny. "As a man thinketh in his heart so is he" (Prov. 23: 7); "Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life." (Prov. 4: 23.)

One life issues in happiness, another in misery. One lives a truly successful life, another life is a total failure. One man develops in himself a noble character, becomes a real blessing to others through his goodness of heart, his beneficent deeds, his real usefulness to society. Another man gives way to vicious habits, becomes immoral, a public burden, a nuisance. Whence this difference? The answer is found in the keeping of the heart or its neglect.

By nature the human heart is evil. Out of its soil, if left to itself, will grow the weeds and thorns of sinful imaginations, and these will flower out in evil deeds. Read the unlovely list of the "works of the flesh" in Gal. 5: 19-21.

A new power must be invited to take possession of the citadel of the soul, if a change for the better is ever made. New seed must be sown in that soil if a different crop is to be expected. Welcome God's Holy Spirit into the heart and life, and then the more beautiful fruits of the Spirit, "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, self-control," will flourish abundantly. (Gal. 5: 22, 23.)

Remember, dear friend, that God will one day judge us for the thoughts of our hearts. "In that day when God shall judge the secrets of men by Jesus Christ." (Rom. 3: 16.) The secret things, the deeds done in the dark, which nobody saw but God, all these will be brought to light in the day of judgment.

The Chicago Postoffice is so constructed that inspectors can take notice of everything that is done by any employe in the great building without his knowing that he is being watched. A registered letter can be traced from the time it enters the office, through the hands of different clerks, until it reaches the mail-bag. By this system of espionage the Government is able to protect itself against fraud as well as to protect its honest servants from suspicion. Every honest clerk will welcome such inspection; only the dishonest will tear it or object to it.

But God's eye sees even deeper than the postoffice inspector. He observes not only our thoughts but also our acts, and according to our thoughts will we be judged at last.

An astronomer was making observation of the heavens one day, and as the dusk drew on he swung the great instrument into place for the night. But as he did so he noticed that there came into the field of vision an orchard and two boys stealing apples from it. A third boy was on guard to warn his companions if any one approached. Little did these three boys think that they were clearly seen miles away by that astronomer. But God sees us every moment. This will be a comfort to us if we are doing right. It should be a warning to us if we are doing wrong. Remember, too, that evil in the heart, if harbored, grows rapidly and mightily. The little streamlet of sinful imagination soon is joined by others and a habit is formed. Evil is cumulative. It advances with tremendous power until it completely controls the soul and rushes it to destruction. The Niagara River is easy to cross in some parts of its course. But as it gathers momentum and approaches the Falls, it would be folly for a small boat to attempt to cross it. That boat and its occupants would be swept to destruction over the great precipice into the whirlpool below.

The time to check evil in the heart is in youth, before it has gathered the momentum of habit. Nip in the bud your tendencies to sin. Drive every foul bird of impure suggestion out at once without giving it time to make a nest for itself in the chambers of your soul.

To conquer Satan we need the strength of him who "laid hold on the dragon, that old serpent, and bound him." He is able and he alone is able to keep you from falling. Jesus Christ is on the side of every tempted soul that trusts him. He is "touched with the feeling of our infirmities." "He remembers that we are dust." Commit your soul then, dear friend, for time and eternity, with all its precious interests, to this Almighty and all-loving one!

"I need thy presence every passing hour;
What but thy grace can foil the tempter's power?"

Who like thyself my guide and stay can be?

Through cloud and sunshine, Oh, abide with me!"

"EVERY CHURCH MEMBER STUDYING THE BIBLE."

BY REV. NEWMAN H. BURDICK.

One very important thing is to so organize the membership of the churches as to make them more effective in the great aggressive campaign of the church at home and abroad. The moral and spiritual basis of that program is in the Bible. The success of that program, the effectiveness of all true church organization, depends, therefore, on its human side, upon the degree of familiarity with the Bible which the membership of the church possesses. There is an ignorance of the Bible, even among many devout church members, that is quite astonishing, and that handicaps seriously the work the leaders of the church are trying to get it to do. This is one argument urging every church member to renewal of interest in Bible study.

Another extremely important phase of the church's task is democratization, which is but bringing about a full recognition of human brotherhood. The essential basis of democratization is to be found primarily in the Scripture. Upon no other basis can this ideal stand. But if the membership of the church, who are to do the greater part of the active work necessary to this full recognition of human brotherhood, are ignorant of the Scripture teachings concerning it, how can the task be accomplished?

Again, whether it be of her choice or not, America occupies a new and highly influential place in internationalism. From this time forth her word at the council tables of the world will be weighty. What is the character of her leadership here to be? It rests largely with the church of America to say; not that they are to mix directly in world politics; but that they may mold and train the men who will represent the nation. If the membership of the church can be saturated with a knowledge of the Bible, particularly as it concerns the welfare of the nations, we shall have no cause for shame at America's doing in the shaping of human destiny.

The evangelistic note is to be sounded clearly and loudly. The time has come when the membership, as well as the ordained leaders of the church, must interest themselves far more actively in winning recruits to Jesus Christ. The so-called "lay" church member must include personal soul winning in his Christian activities, and he must make it perennial instead of periodic. But any man will make sorry work of this thing unless he has a good working knowledge of the Bible; a knowledge which it is safe to say a good many church members do not possess.

So we realize the necessity of every church member giving a greatly increased attention to the study of the Bible. And it would all be common-place enough, no doubt. Yet what else can be said? There is a regrettable ignorance of the Bible amongst church members which halts and lames much church endeavor and is the ultimate cause of a good deal of wet-blanketing of enthusiasm. It is a hopeful sign of the times that a concentration of attention is to be paid to this need of Bible study. It is an earnest of the success and of the final completion of the task set for the Church to do in these days now at hand.

THE "NIGHTINGALE PSALM."

BY LILLIAN F. LEWIS.

Leading my large adult Sabbath-school class recently on the lesson of the twenty-third Psalm, I wondered what new things could be said about that incomparable lyric, which has been so repeatedly and exhaustively reviewed, and decided to test the point by asking each member of the class to present the thought of strongest personal appeal to her in its priceless message. All responded, and some offered ideas original, or at least out of the usual, so far as my knowledge goes.

One of these was the picture of our Lord as her shepherd assures her his tender, protecting, providing, faithful care; would cover her every need; and that every detail of her life would receive his unremitting attention. It promised she should not want and taught her not to fear.

Another spoke of the phrase, "restoresh my soul" as a direct Gospel message in which the shadow of the cross preceding the valley of the shadow of death, or that of difficulties, disappointments, tribulations and physical suffering; hence its pledge here as her sufficiency.

The reiterated words: "He leadeth me" particularly comforted the next witness, who considered it held a closer, kindlier meaning than guidance, and suggested compassion and companionship as well as direction.

Another reasoned that, as he had prepared a table for her in the presence of her enemies, she felt, despite foes within and foes without, to assail or threaten in the Christian warfare against the world and the flesh, she would be strengthened, sustained, assisted by one who "remembered her frame;" that love and grace amply provided for daily supply and security.

After several more had discussed certain portions of this psalm called by Luther, "the little Bible," the last to testify pertinently remarked that she had never divided it in sections, since to her thought it was the seamless robe of the Master, significantly beautiful and designed as a whole. So to her the psalm, to change the figure, was a solitaire rather than a cluster of diamonds.

All heartily agreed with my view that the use of the name Jehovah instead of Lord as substituted in the Revised Versions and lesson text, was not an acceptable choice.

Perhaps the coreallary of this reported experiment is worth emphasizing, namely, that the teacher was convinced she had previously done too much talking herself and had not sought enough contributory help from the class.

THANKSGIVING AND MEMORY.

BY REV. G. B. F. HALLOCK, D.D.

If you were going to preach a Thanksgiving Day sermon what text would you choose? You might preach on the subject, Gratitude Proclaimed, and use this text: "And he departed and began to publish in Decapolis how great things Jesus had done for him; and all men did marvel." (Mark 5: 20). You might use the topic, Remembering the Past, taking as your Scripture, Duet. 5: 15, 32, 33. Remembering the past is the foundation for Thanksgiving. Only those who do not forget are really thankful. Some one has asked what is the chief requisite for making a pessimist, and he answered, "A poor memory." It is true when you hear a man complaining that everything is wrong, that nothing is going right, that everything is against him—it is true and safe to say that that man has a good "forgetory" rather than a good memory. A pad, a pencil and about ten minutes of time would cause the sun to shine through even our darkest clouds. Your sermon might be on The Greatest Thanksgiving Dinner, with the text, "But the father said to his servants, Bring forth the best robe and put it on him," etc. (Luke 15: 11-24.) Harvest Home is a good theme: "They that sow in tears shall reap in joy." (Psa. 26: 5.) Benefits of Thanksgiving is another: "It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord." (Psa. 92: 1.) In a church service how appropriate it would be to use this text, "We have thought of thy loving-kindness, O God, in the midst of thy temple." (Psa. 48: 49.) A good patriotic theme would be America the Beautiful, with the text, "This is the land that shall fall unto you for an inheritance." (Numbers 34: 2.)

Thanksgiving Day observance is a beautiful custom. Being thankful, feeling thankful, and expressing thankfulness are very important. If Christians praised God more the world would doubt him less. Rev. Samuel Chadwick, formerly president of the Wesleyan Conference of Great Britain, tells of a boy who had recently made a confession of Christ. He went to the class meeting. His mother, a godly woman, was very anxious about how he got on, and eagerly questioned him on his return home as to the meeting, and who spoke. After giving her the information, she asked, "And did you speak, my boy?" "No," he replied. "Well, why didn't you?" "Well, mother," he said, "one got up and told of the trials and troubles he had, and another followed him and did the same, and so it went on. I tried to think of my trials and troubles and I couldn't remember any, and so I didn't speak."

No wonder. People who think in that way just have grumbling Thanksgivings. They do harm. They let all their testimony be tinged with sobs. They discourage and dishearten others and dishonor God.

It would be a good thing for many Christians if they would get pencil and pad and take a few minutes, or hours, to record their blessings. What a change it would make in their look and attitude.

I have read of passengers in a train. The train was so crowded that many were standing in the aisles and even on the platform. They took this opportunity to express themselves in no very patient tone in regard to the railway company. Some declared they had been standing for three hours. At a station others came aboard, and one was an invalid who was being carried in. As the passengers made way for him one repeated his complaint. "Yes, we've been standing here three hours." The invalid looked at him, and quietly said, "You are fortunate." They were tired, it's true, but the rebuke so honestly and gently given did its work, and there was a great change in the looks and tones of the passengers.

At this Thanksgiving season count your blessings. Think and then thank.

When we pass the cripple who sells his pencils upon the corner, are we thankful for the sound pair of legs that the Lord has given us? When we read of terrible suffering from hunger in some foreign country, are we thankful for the abundance and variety of food that meets our needs, and does gratitude move us to give of our abundance to those who lack?

The gratitude which sees blessings everywhere for which to be thankful must come up as incense before God. Happy, indeed, are the lives through which gratitude runs as the scarlet cord runs through the cordage of the English navy. There are people who find cause for gratitude in everything that befalls them. Even their seeming misfortunes call for gratitude, because through them they have learned new lessons of God's goodness and of the kindness of their fellow-men.

It may be a low note, but you can always thank God that at least things are no worse. That is what folks sometimes say: "Thank God that things are no worse." That doesn't seem to be especially inspiring; yet when we observe, sometimes by contrast, how much worse our condition might really be, there appears to be some sense in the suggestion. An old legend of the king and his prime minister carries with it this thought. Thus it runs:

"From the time of the old revolution,
When we threw off the yoke of the king,
Has descended this phrase to remember,
To remember to say and to sing:

"'Twas King George's Prime Minister said it
To the king who had questioned in heat,
What he meant by appointing Thanksgiving
In such times of ill-luck and defeat.
'What the cause of your day of Thanksgiving,
'Tell one, pray?' cried the king in his ire,
Said the minister, 'This is the reason—
That things are no worse, O my sire!'

"And whatever of care or of sadness
Our life and our duties may bring,
There is always the cause for Thanksgiving
Which the minister told to the king.
'Tis a lesson to sing and remember;
It can comfort and warm like a fire,
Can cheer us when days are the darkest—
'That things are no worse, O my sire!'
Rochester, N.Y.

THANKFULNESS.

BY LILLIAN F. LEWIS.

Thankful in ways that no words can enumerate,
 Thankful for gifts and for blessings untold;
 Thankful for blessings and light that illuminate,
 Thankful for mercies that never grow old;
 Thankful for efforts and fruits that remunerate,
 Thankful for meanings the seasons unfold;
 Thankful for life, for its hope and endurance,
 Thankful for faith and its deathless assurance—
 This is thanksgiving for harvests of gold,

THE POWER OF SACRED SONG.

BY REV. D. L. CHAPIN.

"The morning stars in choral concert sang,
 The rolling deep, with hallelujahs rang;
 Adoring angels from their orbs rejoice,
 The voice of music was creation's voice."
 Praising, praying, preaching make an earthly trinity, a threefold cord not easily broken. St. Paul said, "And now abideth faith, hope and charity, these three, but the greatest of these is charity, or love."
 Praising, praying and preaching, these three, if the greatest of these is preaching, then praying and praising are conjoined as faith and hope are to charity or love.

As one who has preached for 39 years, we wish to inquire if in those churches that have not had a single addition in an entire year, the praying, the praising and the preaching, been what they should be?
 Music is one of those gifts which an all-wise, benevolent God has strewn in our path as a light not to force us in our way to eternal salvation, but to show us the way of life.

How many multitudes of ministers have had successful pastorates, largely because a faithful choir has stood by them with Bible anthems and sacred song, and thus greatly as well as grandly aided them in winning souls to Christ. Right after an earnest and tender appeal to the impenitent, a sweet and cultivated voice sings:
 "I'm praying for you." And as the words are repeated, the heart is melted and newly molded in the sacred form of the new life.

We know of a midweek service, called the prayer meeting, which was a power in the community, because members of the choir were as certain to be there as the leader of the meeting. New members of the church not only took seats in the sanctuary on the Sabbath, but at once started in attendance at the Wednesday evening meeting. If the cross of Christ draws, why should not everything that goes with it draw?

Often truth unwelcome and resisted is no longer rejected when placed in verse and song. We have read of one who, in a secular concert, closed his eyes to shut out all extraneous sights and sounds, that the spell which came over him might be undisturbed. If all this is true in secular music, should it not be far more so in sacred song?

What a wonderful choral service those exiled Jews had as they returned from Babylon. "And they had 245 singing men and singing women." Carried away captive from the land they loved, held and crushed in bondage for seventy solid years, how their hearts throbbed with joy and their voices chanted God's praises for their final deliverance.

Rev. T. D. Talmage, D.D., once said,
 "A truth in words is not half so mighty as a truth in song. Luther's sermons are forgotten, but the Judgment hymn he composed is resounding yet all through Christendom." And our new President began his administration with saying, "Prayer is a dominant factor for a successful life."
 How delightful it is to know that during President McKinley's administration, on Sabbath evenings, after dinner, there would often be gatherings of a few friends in the Blue Room, and hymn-books would be brought in, and all would join in singing hymns accompanied by the piano. How wonderful was the influence of sacred song upon the mind of the martyred President, as he was often heard humming the tune of a hymn after he returned from church.

Nature and Revelation are wondrously harmonious. Only let every Christian be a worker in Christ's vineyard, and it would not be long until the Gospel's joyful sound would be everywhere heard in song and prayer and proclamation, until praise to God would echo and reverberate around the world.

God sent his singers upon earth,
 With songs of sadness and of mirth,
 That they might touch the hearts of men,
 And bring them back to heaven again."
 Kingston, O.

SOCIAL PROPRIETIES.

BY REV. CHRISTOPHER G. HAZARD, D.D.

The general revision of conventional standards of conduct now going on has made the question of social proprieties a perplexing one for parents and teachers.
 Authority feels more than ever called upon to assert itself in rules for the young and their relationships, but is more than ever hesitant. The flood of change now let loose upon society can not be altogether stemmed, yet it can not be allowed to sweep away all the barriers that wise experience has set up for the restraint of social intercourse; we must not have anarchy in social customs; but who is wise enough to set bounds for this new sea, or to say to this new generation, "Thus far, but no farther?" The consideration of a few governing principles will help us to judge present situations, preserve old rulings, and make such new decisions as will stand in the supreme court of final outcome.

Since all things are related to God, so that concerning everything an account must be rendered to him; God is related to all things, and has requirement for them.
 The purpose of creation and providence is the glory of God; the manifestation of him. This purpose is fulfilled as such manifestation takes place. So that the test of goodness and rightness is the degree of expression given to God in the matter.

That life and action may express divine character, God as made known to us under what laws we are made, what the divine requirements are, how his will and spirit may be expressed. There are such things as proprieties of character and conduct in all cases. There are certain proprieties that virtues always use in expressing themselves. There are expressions of good character that are as ordained and invariable as the shape and color of a flower. Social standards are like a dissolving picture, soon forgotten in another view, as changeable as a fashion, but while our ideas of the proprieties of life vary, God's do not. Sunlight has never changed. Electricity has been always as ready as now to respond to respect for the conditions of its expression. Invisible laws, natural in physics and chemistry, are constantly operative and ready to operate. It is so with moral and spiritual laws in the realm of society; the air is full of divine thoughts, that seek expression not only in stars and flowers, but also in all being and living. The standard of truth is ever ready to measure all and judge all. It is a standard that measures and judges by outcomes, by fruits. The doer of the Word of God will find that Word proving itself to him and himself approving it by the evidently good and beautiful issues of his action. As the lovely picture upon the screen is all in the rays of light that stream across the auditorium, so are lovely lives and histories all in the beams of truth that make the Scriptures radiant. As these heavenly light-beams are reflected, like light from a screen, from our recipient souls, our manifestation of God is beautifully displayed.

 We but appropriate and exemplify divine ideas.

Here is our guide in the dissolving of doubts, the settlement of questions. Since no one has ever invented a divine law, and since no item of life is overlooked in the divine plan, there is always an expression that fits for every true and good quality of character. We ask, therefore, what does the thing in question express? Are manly virtues expressed by "fast" and "loose" customs and manners? Is it truly liberal and large to despise the Church and its noble history of divine and human service? Does a cigarette in the mouth of a young girl or an older woman indicate an expression of feminine refinement and charm? Does indiscriminate and African dancing tend upward? Is not a small stake at a card-party as bad in principle and influence as a large stake among professional gamblers? Does bad language grace or disgrace the mouth that utters it?
 Are midnight motor rides unchaperoned, and dotted with stops at road houses, calculated to enrich character? Etc., etc.

What spirit do our new social fashions express? Is it a lawless spirit? There are no superfluous words in the dictionary; every word is current in action.
 What do our actions speak? The deference that we have paid and still pay to the social conventions of the past proves their worth. Why adopt attempted substitutes for tested divine laws? Let us have any expression that will express goodness, be it old or new, but from all other expression may we depart, though we leave the world behind us!

SYNOD OF NEW JERSEY.

BY REV. JOHN F. PATTERSON, D.D., S. C.

Synod met in Olivet Church of Atlantic
 City Oct. 17-19. Rev. Raymond Hilliard
 Gage, D.D., was elected moderator. The cause of synodical home missions took front rank in the synod. The goal was set at $130,000, but the churches raised $152,000, of which, according to synod's plan, two-thirds went to work in the synod, and one-third to the Home Board, and, in addition, the Board received all over the goal, making a total to the Board of $65,000, the largest amount ever received from this synod, and excelled only by the Synod of Pennsylvania. At the popular meeting on Tuesday night addresses were delivered by Rev. Dr. H. B. Master on Ministerial Relief and Sustentation; Rev. Dr. John
 A. Marquis on Home Missions; and Rev.
 Dr. Stanley White on Foreign Missions. A special committee was appointed, with power to arrange the docket for the centennial meeting of the synod next year, the place of meetings being left to this committee.

WASHINGTON CITY LETTER.

BY REV. W. F. EAGLESON, D.D.

The Synod of Baltimore met in the West Church, Wilmington, Del., where Dr. U. F. Smiley has been pastor for years. Rev. J. D. Blake, of New Castle Presbytery, was elected moderator. Dr. E. D. Warfield, president of Wilson College, and the oldest president in years of service in the United States, gave, from his rich experience, testimony on the "Influence of Education on the Young." The speakers from beyond the bounds of the synod were Dr. H. C. Swearingen, Dr. L. S. Mudge, Dr. M. H. Anderson, Dr. Stanley White, Dr. C. H. McDonald, Dr. John McDowell and Dr. D. G. Wylie. An appropriate address was given by each of these. A large number of the ministers of Washington City attended the synod.

The ministers of Washington City were pleased to have as their guests, during the last week, Dr. Louis B. Crane, of Elizabeth, N. J.; Dr. George B. Stewart, of Auburn, N. Y.; and Elder Thomas D. McCluskey, of Pittsburgh, on their way to the meeting of the Executive Commission of the Assembly, at Atlantic City. They were given an automobile trip about Washington, visiting particularly the Presbyterian churches of the city.

The Second Church (U. S.) of Alexandria, Va., Rev. Dr. John Lee Allison, pastor, is working with increased interest. Mrs. Armstrong, a returned missionary from Brazil, delivered an address to the Woman's Auxiliary last week.

The Session, last month, received twenty colored men and women, and with fifty-five in the Sabbath school, they have a good mission. A lot has been secured, on which they will soon build and organize a new church. The pastor, Rev. Dr. Allison, spoke, on Nov. 11, in the Billy Sunday Tabernacle, Norfolk, Va., and on last Sabbath he preached at Quantico, Va., to the marines.

The conduct of a funeral is particularly a function of the church. And when the state conducts it, in a devout and worshipful way, the church can gladly join. The Government honored the many heroes of unknown name by a solemn burial of "an unknown soldier," whose body was brought from France. From among the many unknown who fell in battle, four coffins were taken. Sergeant Edward Younger, of Chicago, walked into the chapel containing the coffins, and placed a bunch of white roses on one of the caskets in France. This one was placed in a metal casket, made in the United States, and bore on its top the words: "An unknown soldier who gave his life in the great war." This was placed aboard Admiral Dewey's flagship Olympia, and departed with great honor to the United States. This ship was welcomed at our shore by a flotilla of destroyers and ten hydroplanes, and escorted to the navy yards at Washington. In the rotunda of the Capitol soldiers guarded the casket. The rotunda was a profusion of flowers from President, Vice-President, Cabinet, the houses of Congress, every state in the Union and many nations. Of all these, perhaps none was more appropriate for the unknown than that from King George of England, bearing the words:

"As unknown, yet well known;
As dying, and behold we live."

A very beautiful floral tribute came from India. Four abreast, people marched past the catafalque, lining up for blocks distant. The funeral procession was most unusual. Ten escorts of a military character led the way, followed by the clergy. Then came the caisson bearing the unknown soldier, with body bearers and honorary pallbearers. Then came General Pershing and the President. Admirals and other officers followed. After these came the Vice-President; Chief Justice, ex-President Taft; ex-President Wilson, with Mrs. Wilson. In order then came the Supreme Court, General Miles, army officers, the Cabinet, Governors of states, the Senate in columns of eight, the House of Representatives in columns of eight, holders of honor medals, and lastly forty-four patriotic organizations. But who was this unknown young man? What church gave him a Testament? Who was his mother? "And Saul said unto Abner, Abner, whose son is this young man? And Abner said, As thy soul liveth, O king, I can not tell." At the grave at Arlington, with the mast and anchor of the Maine and her unknown dead only five hundred feet away, with the sky-line to the northeast marked by the Washington Monument and the dome of the Capitol, this unknown, now "well known," was laid to rest amidst the earth brought from France, where he fell. The funeral oration was wonderful. It was Christian. An amplifier magnified the voice to reach the uncountable host; phone and amplifiers made the voice heard by multitudes in New York and San Francisco; we are told. As we heard the voice of the President pleading for a warless world, as he closed his address with the Lord's Prayer, the multitude bowed their heads and repeated with him the sacred words. We wondered if they did likewise in New York and in San Francisco. The day is coming when "all the ends of the earth shall hear."

The Church will gladly join with the President in his conclusions. After describing the deadliness of war's weapons, he said: "Surely no one in authority, with human attributes and a full appraisal of the patriotic loyalty of his countrymen, could ask the manhood of kingdom, empire or republic to make such sacrifice until all reason had failed. There must be, there shall be, the commanding voice of a conscious civilization against armed warfare."

FROM THE WESTERN OFFICE.

BY REV. B. P. FULLERTON, D.D.

Dr. W. R. King, secretary of the Home Board, whose chief function is promotion of the work of the Board in the churches, by giving information upon the fields occupied by the Board, and the needs that these fields create, and how the Board is to secure and supply these needs, and all other such things as go in the promotion of any great enterprise, is now in Texas heading one of three teams for this work. Dr. Montgomery heads another team, and Dr. Warren H. Wilson another team. They are supported by other representatives of the Board, the New Era Movement and local men. One team spent one Sabbath, Oct. 30, in El Paso, Tex., and from this team I have a report. The pastor of the First Church, Rev. Dr. Poe, writes: "The team was here yesterday, consisting of Montgomery, Crouch and Overstreet. Every man spoke in every church. Twelve addresses in all were delivered, not including greetings in the Mexican Church. We had a great day. Consider the effort successful. Much information that the pastor takes for granted, that his people know, and that they don't know, was given. Interest in home missions was kindled afresh, and incidentally the team got a vision of city home missions, which at least one of them knew little about. It worked both ways." Dr. Poe is right. No secretary goes out on a promotion or other campaign without receiving more than he contributes. I have now been in a secretarial position something over fifteen years, and I do not at this time recall a single instance where I did not receive valuable information.

Dr. King writes that his team is having a great time, and, in his judgment, great good is being accomplished. When Texas has been covered as well as three teams can cover it in a little more than two weeks, after a week's rest, two teams will undertake the same work in the Synod of Oklahoma.

While the team was in El Paso the new church, known as Bethany Presbyterian Church, was dedicated free from debt at a cost of $10,000. While the name is Bethany, it is situated at what is known in El Paso as the Five Points District. A large field of opportunity is opened before it, and with the new church there is great hope that a great work will be done.

Another interesting bit of news comes out of this visit of the team in El Paso. Rev. Jose Venecia has been pastor of the Mexican Church in El Paso for some years, and recently a splendid building was dedicated for the use of this church. It is the first unit of a group of buildings to be used in the work among Spanish-speaking people in that border city. The night the team was at the church there were twenty-five decisions for Christ made, and this story comes out of it: "For years Mr. Venecia's mother has been opposed to his being in the ministry, and as a matter of fact never heard him preach until last night." The writer adds: "He got into action in good form, and as a result twenty-five decisions were made, and one of them was his mother." That, it seems to me, justifies the Board, if nothing else had been done for all the money invested in our Spanish work in El Paso. Of course Mr. Venecia has his difficulties. Not all Spanish-speaking people are as true as Mr. Venecia and some of them get into his field and sow tares; but this good man goes on with a growing faith and an intenser devotion to the kingdom of God.

The Synod of Missouri discovered, at its meeting last month, that it was indebted, on account of its home mission work, to the extent of something like $30,000 for the year ending March 31, 1921, and for the six months ending Sept. 30, 1922, and immediately determined to wipe out this indebtedness and put itself in the column of synods that pay into the treasury of the Home Board as much money as they take out for home missionary work, and designated Nov. 13 to 20 as Home Mission Week, when, in addition to its New Era quota, this $30,000 would be provided. Prior to the synod meeting, the Presbytery of St. Louis, which is more largely responsible for the deficit than any other presbytery, had determined to use the week beginning Nov. 13 as Church Election Week in the presbytery, because there are at least three mission points in this city that now can not house their Sabbath schools, and have difficulty in housing the congregations that attend their services. The effort is to raise $50,000, which will be used as a sort of revolving fund to aid churches that are building. In view of this, the presbytery felt it was better to carry out this program, and then make strenuous efforts during the remaining months of the calendar year to bring up the offerings to home missions, and if it is found at the end of the calendar year that the presbytery is still behind, no doubt a special effort will be made in January to wipe out the deficit incurred in promoting its home mission work. There is no greater home missionary field west of the Mississippi River, in my judgment, than in St. Louis. Here are gathered all sorts of people, all sorts of churches, and all sorts of enterprises. Many of them are antagonistic to the kingdom of God, and all of them need the modifying influence and guidance of the Church of Jesus Christ. And yet, with all the efforts the churches are making at the present time, they are by no means overtaking the task.

REV. R. W. EDWARDS OF FLORIDA.

Rev. Rees W. Edwards was presbyterial evangelist and superintendent of missions for the Presbytery of Florida, for ten years, and did a great and successful work. He was appointed to convene the Synod of Florida for organization on Oct. 11, but died on Oct. 10. Resolutions of deepest respect and appreciation and affection were passed by the synod, presented by Rev. Dr. Joseph P. Calhoun, the chairman of the Home Mission Committee, as follows:

(1) That synod record its sense of loss and unfeigned sorrow in the decease of Rev. R. W. Edwards, our faithful, efficient, and self-sacrificing superintendent of missions. For ten years Rev. Edwards has labored with a zeal and passion for the welfare of our weak and struggling churches that has endeared him to all who love our Zion. A minister in every mission church at a living salary was Mr. Edwards' effort, hope and prayer. For this he toiled, made long journeys, exhausted his physical energies and counted not even life itself as dear. His last work was for one of our feeble churches and then he returned to his home, in a few short hours to go up to receive his glorious reward from the head of the Church. Our loss is his eternal gain. It is only his mortal body that is being laid away in the cemetery today. His glorified spirit has ascended upon the ever brightening path of immortality. Our dear brother has been called to a wider sphere. He entered into the joy and boundless activities of the eternal kingdom.

(2) That a copy of this memorial minute be sent to the bereaved family, to our church papers, and to the daily press.

(3) That the remainder of this hour be devoted to a memorial service as a token of the synod's appreciation of the life and work of our dear brother and co-worker in the Lord.

PITTSBURGH LETTER.

BY REV. S. J. FISHER, D.D.

The Rescue Mission, which has for several years been supported by our presbytery, with some assistance from the United Presbyterians, is at present a subject of consideration by the trustees of presbytery as to its future. It was recently removed from its location on Market Street to a new location on Seventh Avenue, much finer as to accommodations. But it is more expensive in every way, and at present is costing the presbytery about $15,000 annually. If ante-prohibition conditions had continued, and the considerable number of men and women submerged by liquor and vice was still as great, the purpose and usefulness of the mission would effectually appeal to the Church. But prohibition has changed many things, and the actual number for whom such a mission should be opened has been greatly diminished. Today the mission is more of a haven or stopping place for the unemployed. This is a class for which the city should provide, and considerable is done by the Salvation Army. The direct religious opportunity has been greatly narrowed. Superintendent P. W. Snyder is giving this subject much thought, for the needs of presbytery's missions are so large that none of the resources of our treasury should be uselessly applied.

Rev. Leon Stewart, pastor of the Fourth Church, has been in one of our hospitals for a minor throat operation.

Rev. George S. Watson, pastor of the Boonville Church, Kentucky, and who is supported and regarded as its pastor in the mountains of that state, preached in the Third Church of this city last Sabbath, and gave a very interesting account of the work in that region. In the eight years of his pastorate there he has been instrumental in organizing seven churches, besides participating in the development of schools, Red Cross, and other work. God has signally blessed him in his ministrations in a region so isolated and uninfluenced by modern progress and changes. Slowly these people, almost entirely of native-born American stock, so long untouched by railroad or modern advantages, are being led to the light.

In Mr. Watson's address mention was made of two facts of life among these mountains of Kentucky and Tennessee which are suggestive of work among the Negroes. A description of the class and ideas of many preachers with which the educated Presbyterian comes in contact or opposition, may be duplicated by that of thousands of illiterate and ill-taught Negro preachers, who constitute a hostile force which our Presbyterian Negro ministers have to meet and endure. The "hardshell" preachers among the whites, with their sneers at education, and derision of all culture, and with their boastings of direct inspiration, even when they can not read the Bible, are no more intense in their ridicule of and antagonism to such ministers as Mr. Watson, than are the colored illiterate and unmoral, if not immoral, "hardshell" preachers who attack the Presbyterian colored ministers. That a region should exist where piety rests on ignorance, and the Bible is no foundation for religious teaching, is one of the amazing and quickening facts of our national life.

The other fact mentioned by Mr. Watson was most encouraging, concerning the usefulness and persistent value of the small churches, which do not appear likely to soon, if ever, reach entire self-support. In the thinly populated and extremely diversified localities, steep hillsides, and narrow brooks, and the poorest of roads, in those ravines, the membership of a church is often so limited in numbers and wealth that self-support is a very distant consummation. And yet from these small churches, Mr. Watson told us, are coming the candidates for the ministry, the larger supply of our waning ministry. He showed that in his presbytery there was a candidate for the ministry for every five hundred members, while in the Presbytery of Pittsburgh the proportion was one to every four thousand, and I am not sure that Mr. Watson was not misled into considering several candidates as belonging to our presbytery by the proximity of the theological seminary.

We who realize the reasons for the slow growth of the colored churches in rural regions would not suggest less zeal or mission effort, but we must and do realize that a small church among that people often is the birthplace and training ground of consecrated and able preachers of the Gospel at last.

A reception was given by the Session, on the evening of Nov. 10, in the chapel of the Third Church, to Mr. Watson and his wife and little boy, and participated in by Assistant Pastor Thomas C. Peers, Jr., and Rev. Mr. Connolly, with music not only by the choir, but by Mrs. Watson, whose musical genius and culture has been of use in that land of deep valleys, rude homes, great trees, and the silence unbroken by train or mill.

As the Freedmen's Board has been severely stricken in the last few days by the burning of Barber Memorial Seminary at Anniston, Ala., one of its finest and most useful schools for girls, fortunately with no loss of life, Secretary Gaston was obliged to hasten to aid the president of the seminary in arranging for everything that might enable it, Phoenix-like, to rise from its ashes, vigorous, beautiful and alive. It fell to my lot to take the secretary's place at Atlantic City, for consultation with the Executive Commission in arranging for the budgets of all the boards and agencies for the year beginning next May. Out of the routine consultation two facts of public present interest arose, one being the request to the Executive Commission, in view of the present apparent likelihood that the collections for this year may not reach the budget planned, that a day of prayer shall be fixed by the Commission, for every church, to arouse interest and devotion and such self-sacrifice as shall not permit the contributions for Christ's great work to be lessened because of the financial depression.

The other was the very earnest and convincing declaration of Moderator Swearingen, whose conviction was contagiously eloquent and reassuring, that our great Church, having arranged through the Boards for the immediate liquidation of the Interchurch debt, will hold the obligation to the Boards as sacred, and will set itself to work to repay to the Boards these advanced moneys, either in the five-year limit, or before. It was hoped that in future conferences, which are to be held in different parts of the country with the Moderator and secretaries, parts, at least, of Dr. Swearingen's remarks on this high, conscientious and loyal plane will be often repeated.

As I write, the moonlight touches the in-rolling waves on the near-by shore. Far out, near the horizon, the tiny lights of a coast-wise steamer sparkle with mystery and romance, and in the great hall at Washington rests, flag-covered, and whispering of loyalty and unheralded sacrifice by an unknown soldier in lands beyond this ocean.

CLEVELAND LETTER.

BY REV. GEORGE A. MACKINTOSH, D.D.

The Church of the Covenant has resumed its Wednesday evening forums. Mr. Richard Feiss, a clothing manufacturer of the city, spoke on Wednesday evening on "The Problem of Continuous Employment." Dr. P. F. Sutphen, one of the pastors, is delivering a series of sermons at the vesper service, on "Civilization." The topics are "The Evolution of Civilization," "Modern Civilization Fighting to Survive," "Progression and Retrogression" and the "World's Hope." There was held in this church a mass meeting in the interests of Berea College of Kentucky last Friday evening. The speakers were President W. J. Hutchins, a member of Cleveland Presbytery, and Rev. Dr. Jonathan Day, of New York City.

The Old Stone Church, Rev. A. B. Meldrum, D.D., pastor, welcomed sixteen new members at the November communion. A half-hour service for prayer only was held in this church on Armistice Day, praying for the reduction of armaments and the establishment of international understanding and co-operation in the spirit of Jesus Christ, as the only basis of enduring peace.

The annual Christian Endeavor Convention for the city has just held a three days' session in this church. The speakers were all Presbyterian pastors: Dr. A. B. Meldrum, Dr. Charles D. Darling and Rev. A. H. Limonze. The music was furnished by the Welsh Presbyterian Church choir.

Phillips Avenue Church, Rev. W. P. Thomas, pastor, is holding two weeks of evangelistic services in which the pastor is assisted by Dr. W. F. Dickens-Lewis, Rev. A. H. Limonze and Rev. George Gerlach.

Rev. Alexander Vinton, D.D., was recently installed pastor of the Noble Road Church. The ministers who participated were Rev. A. P. Higley, D.D., Rev. Charles D. Darling, Ph.D., Rev. W. F. Dickens-Lewis, D.D., and Rev. W. C. Mickey, D.D.

Lakewood Church, Rev. A. J. Wright, pastor, has heard in the last two Sabbath evenings, Mr. Benjamin Karr, editorial writer in a Cleveland daily, and Miss Boyer, a missionary in Africa. All of the Presbyterian Sabbath schools of the city will send six visitors each to spend the whole of Sabbath, Nov. 27, with the Lakewood Sabbath School, inspecting its work and attending a conference in the afternoon. Rev. James A. Verbung, state superintendent of Sabbath School Work under our Sabbath School Board, will be one of the speakers.

Rev. W. F. Dickens-Lewis, pastor of the Cleveland Heights Church, is giving a series of historical sermons on Wycliff, Luther, Calvin, Knox and Savonarola.

Most of our pastors spoke, Sabbath morning, commending the Community Chest Fund that is being raised this week. The goal is $3,763,545, to be given to ten different institutions during 1922. Last year $4,500,000 was raised, $500,000 of which is still on hand to be used for the new year. The cost of administration is only one-half of one per cent. It has successfully solved the problem of combining all the important groups and religious faiths in the city in one campaign appeal.

NEW YORK LETTER.

BY REV. CLARENCE G. REYNOLDS, D.D.

The great cosmopolitan city that never stops, day or night, stood still for the first time in its life, in all probability, on Armistice Day, while for two minutes all was quiet in honor of the Unknown Soldier and his brothers who died in the war. As the people in Madison Square Garden and out beyond for a considerable distance heard every word and sound from Arlington Cemetery, they were almost awe struck, and many joined with the President in repeating the Lord's Prayer. Over at the Fox Hills Hospital, Staten Island, where your correspondent is chaplain, patients and officers and nurses, in so far as possible, stood for two minutes at attention at noon. There is not any one in that hospital, loyal as all are, who has the least desire for any more war. It is to those who suffered and are still suffering that the hope of permanent peace comes as a burst of sunshine from heaven. Peace sermons were preached all over New York last Sabbath.

The Red Cross drive is on for new members and the people are responding. The Red Cross, like the Y. M. C. A., has been criticized, but a fine work is being carried on, nevertheless, in behalf of the wounded and sick soldiers. We know whereof we speak, for we see the good work every day in the hospital.

Ministers of all denominations were on Monday, Nov. 7, given opportunity to see the motion picture, entitled "The Makers of Men," by Rev. James K. Shields, superintendent of the New Jersey Anti-Saloon League. The pictures illustrated clearly that life is worth living, provided a man worships God and not Mammon. Mr. Shields has another motion picture, entitled "The Stream of Life," which is even more valuable for the consideration of the young than the last picture.

Methodists of New York celebrated last Sabbath, in the old John Street Church, the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of Francis Asbury's first Sabbath and first sermon in New York, including his subsequent record of forty-five years of service rendered to America and American Methodism. During his American career he preached seventeen thousand sermons and ordained four thousand preachers.

Last Sabbath morning, Rev. Dr. J. Oscar Boyd, who is just leaving the pastorate of the Church of the Redeemer, Paterson, N. J., that he may become the representative of the American Bible Society in Egypt, preached in the Fourth Presbyterian Church, Rev. Dr. E. W. Work, pastor. In the evening the letter carriers and postal clerks of New York City were addressed by Dr. Work, Dr. Bowlby and others.

This is the annual Week of Prayer of the Y. M. C. A., and the local organizations are observing the week. Hon. William Jennings Bryan will address a meeting in Carnegie Hall, Nov. 25, under the auspices of the old

Tent Evangel Committee of New York. Mrs. Charles M. Alexander, widow of the singer, will give a brief address. There will be a choir of three hundred voices. An overflow meeting will be held in Calvary Baptist Church, across the street from Carnegie Hall. At the Classon Avenue Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, last Sabbath, the pastor, Rev. Dr. R. M. Huston, preached on "Will the Golden Rule Work?" At the Central Congregational Church, Brooklyn, of which Dr. S. Parks Cadman is pastor, Rev. Samuel Zwemer spoke in the morning on "The Will of God for the Moslem World," and on Monday evening Dr. Zwemer spoke at a meeting under the auspices of the World's Sunday-school Association on "The Call of Childhood in Moslem Lands."

Monday evening last, in the parlors of the Fourth Presbyterian Church, the New York Alumni Association of the College of Wooster, Ohio, held its annual reunion. The president of the college, Dr. Wishart, was present with a strong address, and others spoke briefly. The endeavor is being made to secure as much money as possible in New York and vicinity from alumni and other friends of the college. There are at least one hundred alumni in New York and almost as many more within easy reach of New York. Dr. Wishart preached last Sabbath at Vassar College.

CHICAGO LETTER.

BY REV. E. N. WARE, D.D.

Mr. Charles E. Schenck, for many years a worker in the Illinois Sabbath-school Association with the beloved Jacobs, has entered upon a term of like service with the Illinois Synod under the supervision of the Home Mission Committee, holding Sabbath-school conferences. Mr. Schenck brings to this work a ripe knowledge of methods and an extensive knowledge of the workers throughout the synod. He has already entered upon his service in the southern part of synod.

Austin Church, Rev. Robert Clements, D.D., pastor, has just closed a week of jubilee celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the church. Millard Avenue Church, Rev. E. W. Symonds, pastor, enters next week upon a series of services celebrating the twenty-fifth anniversary of the organization of Millard Avenue. Former pastors will take part, and Dr. George L. Robinson, of McCormick Seminary, who came to the aid of the church at the time of its enlargement and building of the present house of worship, gave an address at the opening of the week's activities. Millard is now in the midst of a foreign population and is ministering to its constituency with grace and fervor.

Chicago Presbytery devoted the greater part of its meeting of Nov. 7th to the consideration of foreign missions, as presented by Dr. Cleland B. McAfee, of McCormick Seminary, chairman of Presbytery's Committee. An illustrated demonstration of foreign missions was given by Mr. A. Gordon Bradt, son of Dr. C. E. Bradt, superintendent of the Central District of Foreign Mission Board. A description was given of the School of Missions, which Dr. Hepburn had conducted in the Buena Memorial Church, of which he is pastor. News was presented, fresh from the mission fields, by missionaries home on furloughs: Dr. Campbell, of Siam; Strahler of India; Allison of Guatemala, Brown of Manila and Mr. W. D. Boone, a student in McCormick Seminary, from China. It was a great day for missions. So impressed were the presbyters with the day's exercises that a resolution of thanks and appreciation was extended to Dr. McAfee "for the superb manner in which he has presented his report on foreign missions and has arranged for the illustrative and stimulating features accompanying the report."

A resolution was passed unanimously to be forwarded to President Harding in which he is told that presbytery "welcomes with peculiar eagerness the conference, beginning on Nov. 11th, because it seems to the presbytery a possible step toward a goal of human brotherhood and peace," pledging also that "presbytery will pray daily during this conference for guidance of the President and his advisers and for other members of the conference."

Resolutions were also adopted on recommendation of the Temperance Committee assuring our representatives in Congress of our steadfast loyalty for the enforcement of our statute law, and asking them to further strengthen the laws to carry out the purpose of the Eighteenth Amendment. The Board of Temperance and Moral Welfare was most cordially indorsed for its progressive policy.

Armistice Day was observed by holding a prayer meeting in Orchestra Hall at 11 a. m., at which Bishop Anderson, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, presided. Dr. John Timothy Stone, of our Fourth Church, Father Siedenburg and Rabbi Stolz participated. Raymond Robbins gave an address on "Disarmament or Bankruptcy—Which?" The service was held under the auspices of The World Friendship Information Bureau.

MICHIGAN LETTER.

BY REV. WILLIAM BRYANT, D.D.

Dr. James Morrison Barkley was the honored guest at a reception tendered by his brethren at Fort Street Presbyterian Church on Friday evening, Nov. 11. The occasion was the thirty-fifth anniversary of Dr. Barkley's coming to Detroit as pastor of Forest Avenue Presbyterian Church, then a new organization. After a pastorate of nearly thirty years, Dr. Barkley was made pastor emeritus, in which position he remained until about a year ago, when Forest Avenue and Redeemer churches formed a merger. But, as pastor emeritus and as president of the Board of Trustees of Alma College, and most of all as the beloved minister without definite pastoral charge, Dr. Barkley has always been greatly in demand for preaching appointments in the leading churches of Detroit, needing supplies for longer or shorter periods of time. This happy condition is not likely to end while Dr. Barkley preserves his remarkable vigor of mind and body. The Church at large knows him as a former Moderator of the General Assembly. His brethren did not need any such attraction to cause them to attend the reception of Nov. 11, originated, as we suppose, by Dr. M. C. Morgan, pastor of Fort Street Church. This gathering also gave opportunity for a prayer meeting for the Armament Conference at Washington.

On Sabbath, Nov. 13, and the next day, Memorial Presbyterian Church of Bay City celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of its organization as a Sabbath school and the thirtieth of its organization as a church. It derives its name of "Memorial," not for any particular person, but in honor of the Reunion of the Old and New School Churches. In the succession of pastors there appear the names of Rev. Perry V. Jemness, D.D., now of Denver; Dr. David Burchard Gregg, formerly of Baltimore; and your correspondent. The present pastor, who is doing an excellent work, is Rev. Henry Kreulen. Among those who are scheduled to have a part in the services are Rev. J. Roy Van Wyck, D.D., Rev. A. T. Tomshany, Rev. H. A. Simpson, and those now or formerly connected with the church.

The Big Rapids Presbyterian Church, which was unfortunate enough some time ago to lose its building by fire, has now adopted plans for its new building. The architect is the same as the one who erected the handsome churches at Alma, Cairo and Ionia. Rev. C. L. Attig is the pastor.

Sometimes a minister with beautiful theories tells us how to build up an evening congregation, which is one of the problems that most of our churches are trying to solve. It was not theory, but a rich experience, that enabled Dr. M. E. Anderson, pastor of Immanuel Church of Detroit, to encourage us all as he told us how he had succeeded in transforming an evening congregation of possibly seventy-five into a congregation of about eight hundred, with conversions at practically every service. The beauty of it all is that this change had been wrought, not by what some might call modern methods, but by preaching plain gospel sermons, intensely evangelistic in tone, supplemented, it is true, by a gospel chorus, singing gospel songs. When a church, not exceptionally well located, or with anything unusually attractive as to its building, receives over five hundred new members on confession of faith during the year, and at the same time reaches a most satisfactory financial condition, we are all interested. Naturally there are expenses as to music and publicity, but when the plate offering is more than double in the evening what it is in the morning, the cost does not figure very strongly. Dr. Anderson preaches with intense conviction as to a Savior for the lost, never compromising to please modern notions. Nor does he try to make it too easy to accept the divine requirements. His paper was intended to open the way for a symposium, but we were, as a rule, wise enough to omit the discussion, and do some quiet heart-searching as to why the evening service has been so largely declared to be hopeless.

On Sabbath, Nov. 6, Rev. Thomas G. Sykes, D.D., entered upon his work as pastor of the church of Mount Clemens.

DECIDING FOR THE MINISTRY.

The Yellow Creek Church, in Steubenville Presbytery, closed a successful evangelistic service on Sabbath night, Nov. 6. This is one of the many meetings now going on in Steubenville Presbytery under the Rochester plan.

The pastor, Rev. R. L. Ryall, was assisted by Rev. W. Wilson, of Columbus, one of the General Assembly's evangelists. The attendance was large and the interest excellent. As a result, thirty were added to the church roll, twenty-four being on examination, and seven were baptized.

The closing meeting was one of unusual interest, when the evangelist asked if there was one young man ready to offer himself for the ministry. After showing what it might mean, that it would not be a life of ease or luxury, and that such a one might have to give up home and friends to go to a foreign field, the evangelist asked if there was one ready to place himself in God's hands to be so used if it was his will, to raise his hand and come forward. And to the glory of God five young men came forward. Words can not describe the feeling that came over that congregation of four hundred people. The young men were asked to kneel in front of the pulpit, and Rev. James S. Cotton, who was in attendance, led in prayer, followed by the pastor, then by Mr. Wilson, asking God to accept the offering and hear the vows taken. Robert Ryall, son of the pastor, was one of the five to offer himself. The spiritual life of the entire congregation was quickened.

HOW ONE CHURCH CAME TO BE.

BY REV. J. MONT TRAVIS.

In August, 1919, Mr. W. H. Schureman, the veteran Sabbath-school missionary of the Presbytery of Denver, discovered that the Sedalia community, thirty miles out of Denver, had no religious services. Mr. C. F. Helwig, an elder in the Littleton Church, twenty miles away, became interested, and on Sept. 7 he, with the help of Mr. Schureman, organized a Sabbath school with fifteen members.

Mr. W. K. Ramsey, a student, consented to preach to the little company gathered for Sabbath school each Sabbath, and under the devoted supervision of Mr. Helwig, the interest grew so rapidly that in June of 1920 a petition, with thirty signers, was presented to the presbytery, asking for a church organization, and on Sept. 21 the organization was formed by the presbytery.

The community began at once to plan for a church building, which would be an honor to the town; but the people were very limited in financial means and the prospect for an adequate building was far from being bright.

About this time Mrs. C. D. Abbott, a former member of the Littleton Church, now living in California, sent to her church, at Littleton, a gift of $250, consecrated with prayer, and asked that it be used for some special need. Littleton was planning for a new building of its own, but generously set this gift aside for the Sedalia Community Church. Then the Home Mission Committee and the Church Extension Board of the presbytery took a hand in the project and things began to happen in rapid succession. By January, 1921, definite plans were made for a building of very moderate cost. The men of the community became deeply interested. One man donated a building site in just the right location, and followed that with a substantial cash contribution. The Board of Church Erection made a grant of $2,000, and local friends, encouraged by the presbytery's Church Extension Board, loaned money to begin building operations at once. Men did the digging and hauling of material, and women prepared lunches for the men who worked, and on Aug. 6, 1921, just two years from the discovery by the missionary, the cornerstone of the Sedalia Community Presbyterian Church was laid in the presence of the entire population of the community, and amid great rejoicing.

In the meantime, Rev. John Knox Hall, of Denver, was secured as the temporary pastor of the church, and served for fourteen months. The work of construction went forward with great rapidity.

The dedication of the church, Oct. 23, was a great day for the whole country side. The building was filled to its capacity. When the building committee made its report, it was found that there was a deficit of $1,500; but that instead of the $6,000 building first planned, they had a building worth $10,000. The people, who had already given to the limit, promptly subscribed another thousand, and the Central Church of Denver assumed the other $500, and the building was dedicated free of debt. At the communion service, held at 11 o'clock, seven new members were received. At the close of the dedication service twelve persons confessed Christ.

Addresses were made by Rev. W. H. Wray Boyle, D.D., of the Central Church of Denver, and president of the Church Extension Board; Rev. Howard I. Kerr, D.D., executive secretary of the presbytery; Rev. J. Mont Travis, Stated Clerk and chairman of the Committee on Home Missions, and Elders O. A. Erdman, chairman of the Committee on Church Extension, and Judge H. C. Riddle.

OMAHA BETTER.

BY REV. W. H. JORDAN.

The service at the First Church, Omaha, Neb., Oct. 2, was of more than usual interest, it being the occasion of the dedication of a table presented by Mr. and Mrs. Edward Updike, and a baptismal font, presented by Elder and Mrs. Robert Demster.

After Mr. Updike's presentation speech, Elder N. H. Loomis, on behalf of the congregation, accepted the beautiful gift. Elder Robert Demster's presentation speech was followed by that of Elder Warren Switzler accepting the gift in behalf of the church.

The font is of Italian marble, and is placed just beneath the bronze tablet which bears the names of one hundred and twenty-eight who went from this congregation to the world war. The tablet was unveiled with appropriate services in January last.

After the dedicatory services the pastor, Dr. E. H. Jenks, baptized thirty-seven children and several adults. It was a great day for all. The First Church was host to the Synod of Nebraska, which was the largest ever held, on account of the Gipsy Smith campaign. Most of the evening sessions were omitted to attend the auditorium meetings. The Gipsy gave an address before the synod.

The four weeks' Gipsy Smith campaign closed Nov. 13. Most of the services were largely attended. Thousands of cards were signed, but probably less than one-fourth represent actual conversions. The evangelist, Gipsy Smith, gives a great gospel message, Calvinistic to the core. More than sixty churches united in the campaign. Great good has been accomplished, and now much depends upon the follow-up work. It was to be regretted that there was no place for an inquiry room or opportunity to deal with those who went forward or signed cards. The best time to deal with a man who professes interest is right then. A sheep-raiser once said that the life of a lamb depended upon its getting milk immediately, and that in lambing time he was with the flock the whole night long.

The Omaha Bible Institute, which omitted its evening classes during the Gipsy Smith campaign, began its classes Nov. 13, meeting Monday and Tuesday evenings. It is hoped that a permanent headquarters may be found soon. Mr. Jordan, who is at the head of the institute, is minister at the Third Presbyterian Church. On Nov. 16 he began a series of noon addresses at the Y. W. C. A. on themes relating to the Birth of Christ, leading up to the Christmas season: The Desire of All Nations; His Birth Foretold; Preparation of the World for Christ; Mary, the Mother of Jesus; The Song of the Angels; and the Visit of the Wise Men. He will also teach the International Sabbath-school Lesson at the Y. W. C. A. Saturdays, 12:15 to 1 p. m.

Rev. James Marquis Wilson, D.D., who has been an Omaha pastor for many years, will be inaugurated, Nov. 30, as president of Omaha Theological Seminary, services being held in the First Presbyterian Church. Moderator Rev. Henry C. Swearingen will deliver the address. Dr. A. B. Marshall, of Clarinda, Ia., president of the Board, will preside. Dr. Wilson, who has already served the seminary a year, will give the inaugural address. The program will be preceded by a banquet. The Seminary Board will meet at 2 p. m.

SUFFERING PRESBYTERIANS.

The World Alliance of Reformed Churches, holding the Presbyterian System, which includes all the Presbyterian and Reformed churches in America, issued an earnest appeal for aid for the oppressed and suffering Presbyterian and Reformed churches of Europe, and to that end suggested that Sabbath, Oct. 30, be observed in the churches as a day of prayer, especially for the suffering brethren of the Presbyterian faith, that a suitable sermon be preached and that money be gathered and sent to denominational treasurers of European funds. Many churches followed this suggestion.

A clothing drive is also suggested for November and December, in which new clothing, slightly worn clothing, underclothing, shoes, sheeting for hospitals and orphanages, etc., be gathered, with sufficient money to defray the expense of shipping, which amounts to about fifteen cents per pound.

A committee of six, appointed from the various denominations, is in charge of the movement, James I. Good, 3260 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., being the chairman. A tract, giving fuller details of the needs of the churches in Europe, was prepared to be sent to Presbyterian and Reformed ministers.

ARKANSAS LETTER.

BY REV. C. E. HAYES, D.D.

The Chidester Church has just passed through a very fine series of evangelistic meetings, conducted by the pastor, Rev. Otis C. Epperson, and Evangelist Richard W. Lewis, D.D., of Chattanooga, Tenn. The meeting closed Nov. 3rd. Dr. Lewis preached forty-nine sermons. There were thirty-six professions of faith in Christ and seventeen additions to our church. The whole town and surrounding country felt the good effect of the meeting. The new church building was used for the first time. The pastor reports the work of the church in excellent condition.

Evangelist Lewis is now in the midst of a very fine meeting at Huntington. The other churches in the town are co-operating most heartily. I opened the meeting for Dr. Lewis on Nov. 6th, and he came and took charge on the 7th, and will continue until the 20th.

Upon invitation of the church session at Mansfield, I visited there on Nov. 7th, and held a meeting in the theater. A majority of the membership was in attendance. Two members were received by letter. A committee was instructed to purchase lots on which a new building, in the very near future, will be erected. Something over a year ago, this church sold its property, with the idea, on the part of a few, of disbanding and going into other churches. During these months they have become very much dissatisfied, and none of them could find suitable church homes. They are now a unit in taking hold of the work and going on with it on a larger scale than in former years.

The church at Benton, Rev. H. Heinecke, pastor, is diligently at work preparing for the coming of Evangelist Lewis, the latter part of November. The Benton Church is one of our best in this section of the State.

Plans are now being drawn for a modern five-room manse at Dumas. It is proposed to put about $2800 into the lot and building. Rev. E. T. Preston is the stated supply.

Under the ministry of Rev. H. W. W. Allen, the Brinkley Church has received during the past year twenty-five members, eighteen of them being on confession. Mr. Allen belongs to the Congregational Church. For some reason, the regular order was not followed in calling this good man, and because of that he has been somewhat embarrassed in his work.

I spent Friday evening, Nov. 4th, in Fort Smith. Dr. Lewis had an hour or more to talk over future plans of work. Dr. Galloway is the pastor of the church. I desire to call special attention to the voting ballots prepared by the National New Era Committee. These ballots can be had for the asking. Several of our pastors have used them successfully. In Fort Smith the voting was a great success, for every member was requested to indicate on the ballot just what he or she thought the work of the Church should be during the coming year. The result of this voting has made the interest in the Fort Smith Church intense.

The church at Clarksville, Rev. E. Hefner, D.D., pastor, is making good progress in completing their new building and in other lines of church work. On Nov. 2nd at a prayer service, forty men and thirty-eight women were present. New members are being received every month.

I will attend the New Era meeting at Atlantic City, N. J., Nov. 15th and 16th. Am planning to be back at my desk on the 18th, and visit Dumas in the morning, and Tillar in the evening, of the 20th.

PHILADELPHIA NEWS.

BY REV. W. P. FULTON, D.D.

The Presbytery of Philadelphia met, Nov. 7, in Chambers-Wylie Church. The overture on eligibility of women to the deaconship was answered in the affirmative; the overture on commissioners in the negative. Presbytery arranged for the installation of Rev. A. Gordon MacLennan as pastor of the Bethany Church on Nov. 10, and for the installation of Rev. George F. Ellison as pastor of the Reeve Memorial Church on Nov. 17. Calls were presented from the North Church for Rev. Edward B. Shaw, Presbytery of Marion, Ohio, and from the Southwestern Church for Rev. Ralph E. Wallis, of West Jersey Presbytery. These calls were approved by presbytery and held awaiting the reception of these brethren into presbytery. Secretary John S. Conning, of the Home Mission Board, spoke on Jewish Evangelization, and Secretary Charles Scanlon on the subject of Temperance. Presbytery arranged for the celebration of the thirtieth anniversary of the organization of the Committee on City Missions and Church Extension at the January meeting of presbytery, and designated Sabbath, Jan. 15, as "City Mission Sabbath," when all the pastors will be requested to preach on some phase of city missions and Sabbath schools, and Endeavor Societies will be requested to conduct appropriate exercises relating to city evangelization. The committee, which is composed of nine ministers and fifteen elders, will give a dinner to the pastors and one elder from each church on Jan. 5.

In connection with the report to presbytery on the Minutes of the General Assembly, reference was made to the expenses of the General Assembly and its committees for the year ending March 31, 1921, as printed in the Minutes (pp. 380-383), as being $164,723.43. Because of the growing increase in the expenses of the General Assembly, its committees and its boards and agencies, presbytery unanimously voted to appoint the moderator, Rev. John A. MacCallum, D.D., and its Stated Clerk, Rev. William P. Fulton, D.D., as a committee to bring in a report to presbytery of the expenses of the General Assembly and its administrative agencies.

The Welfare Federation of Philadelphia, representing one hundred and twenty-five welfare agencies, consisting of hospitals, social centers, homes for aged, blind, helpless, family and child welfare agencies, Red Cross, etc., will present its annual financial appeal to the citizens of Philadelphia from Nov. 14 to 18. It is hoped, through this single drive, to raise sufficient funds to maintain all these welfare agencies.

The Executive Commission of the General Assembly, together with representatives of the boards and agencies and other committees, met in Atlantic City, Nov. 10 to 14. A considerable number of representatives of the Assembly's agencies was present from all over the Church. It is hoped good results were accomplished by this conference.

Armistice Day was observed as a holiday in Philadelphia, many churches being open for religious services. A number of ministers preached on phases of the "Limitation of Armament Conference" last Sabbath.

MISSION WORK

THE ENTRANCE OF THE WORD.

Although the people of Italy are as hungry for the open Word as Russia, China, or the Near East are for bread, there are those who refuse it for fear of the priests, or because of misconstrued apprehension. The returned emigrants from the United States, who have appreciated its worth here, when equipped with the Bible, have little difficulty in giving it out to their relatives and more immediate friends; but unless this is done quietly, they receive rebuffs of all descriptions. With "I can't read" as the principal reply, there are others that are illustrative of the difficulties which attend the entrance of the Word. Here are some of the replies received from Italian people, who are still Roman Catholics, or who have been driven by Catholicism to a rejection of all religion:

"We workmen have no use to read the Bible."

"No; that is a Protestant book. We know where your Protestant business started. Some king of England wanted three wives and the Pope wouldn't let him."

"No, I am a Catholic."

"You Protestants are persecuting the Catholics in Ireland, and starving them in prison. And you want us to take your Bible-book! Get!"

"We are tired of you. You are of England and Germany."

"Away with your book! You are a deceiver."

"Gospel! What Gospel? Don't talk to us about God. Bring us bread and work."

"Take your books and light a fire with them, and put yourself on it."

"You better bring us bread for our little ones instead of those books!"

"That book of yours is the foulest of all books. It is written by those imposters, the priests."

"You talk about Jesus, faugh! I no longer believe in anything. The priests have sickened me."

"What Gospel? What Jesus? He does not think of us, and we do not think of him."

"See! You tell me that God is, and that Christ came down to this earth; but until I see them, I will not believe that."

"We want a red book—red inside and out!"

"What God? If there were a God, I, a poor woman, would not be here with two children, whose father was killed in the war. If God really exists, he had ought to make himself seen, and I would talk with him. So much misery! So many people ruined! I do not believe any longer in anything."

"Oh, your books about God! I have never yet been able to see him, and I would just like to do so some time. Say, you man-from-that-America, have you ever seen him?"

"You call it the Gospel of Christ, heigh? Give us the Gospel of Mazzini, or Marx, or Lenin! That is what we would willingly take."

"Sho, that is the priest's book! We want no more priests."

"Go away! Away! No more saints! No more religion!"

"Not for us, that book. We are workmen. Everybody must work."

"We want Lenin's book! We want the Red Flag!"

"When the revolution comes, we shall drive all of you people out—all of you, priests and all. You have troubled the earth long enough with this God of yours, and made us live and die in misery!"

"Such misery! So many people ruined! And your kind are at the bottom of it."

"Can you convince me that the God you talk about really exists? For my part, I can't believe what I can't see."

"Oh, this vile business! These books from that America! They keep catching us everywhere!"

These are but specimens of some of the negative replies, every one as reported by the colporteurs. All of the replies are not like them, and in fact, those of this description are in the minority. As a rule the people are only eager to receive anything and everything that is brought from "that America." But at the same time there are those who, in these days of stress and turmoil, reject the Bible, and rebuff the would-be giver, all because they want to find some one or something that is censurable, and attribute their "trouble times" almost insanely, to the Word of which they have so long been deprived.

A MISSIONARY TO THE INDIANS.

BY REV. H. P. CARSON, D.D.

Rev. Andrew F. Johnson, of Pine Ridge, S. D., missionary to the Sioux Indians in all that region the past twenty-nine years, after he had graduated from Princeton Seminary and offered himself to go as a missionary to Africa, has wrought a remarkable work, and into it he has put the best years of his life, so far.

He found heathenism rank there then, and the Indians saying they did not want Christianity. They were then hostile to the white man, for it was soon after the Indian uprising under Chief Sitting Bull. He was once shot at just as he was leaving the church of Wounded Knee, the only church organization there at that time, and located near the scene of the battle of Wounded Knee, the last during that uprising. But he never carried a rifle, as did other men, for self-defense. Today he has ten church organizations on the Pine Ridge Reservation, besides a mission at the agency, and the total church membership is 332. All of Sitting Bull's connection there have become church members, and Mr. Johnson fraternizes with them daily.

Each church has a house of worship and a manse, most of them built of logs which he himself cut down and hauled with his own team. In doing this building he has traveled eighty-five miles by team on Monday to do the carpenter work, lived in a tent and prepared his own meals, till time to drive back for the next Sabbath's services. One of the churches is one hundred and ten miles from his home at the agency. He loaded trees twenty-four inches in diameter on his own wagon and hauled them ten miles to the government sawmill to get boards for buildings for use in divine worship. Moreover, he has secured titles from the Government for those houses of worship and manses. He now has three Indian ministers to help him in the care of these churches, but he himself supplies the preaching to six of them, besides his care of the mission at the agency. All honor to such a self-denying, courageous, devoted soldier of the cross!

THE STUDENT VOLUNTEER MOVEMENT IN 1921.

BY ROBERT F. WILDER.

In the early days of this movement, President James McCosh, of Princeton, wrote of its Student Volunteers, "Has any such offering of living young men and women been presented in our age, in our country, in any age, or in any country, since the day of Pentecost?"

When those words were penned the movement had not demonstrated its right to exist. Dr. McCosh's statement was in the nature of a prophesy. What would he say if he were living now? In 1920 more Student Volunteers sailed to foreign fields, sent out by the various church missionary societies of North America, than went out during any previous year in the history of the movement. The exact number is 595, which is 26 per cent more than the record of the preceding year and 50 per cent more than the average for each of the last ten years. They were appointed by seventy-four different missionary societies. The total number of Student Volunteers who have sailed from Canada and the United States since the movement began is 8,742. Their distribution by fields is as follows: Africa, 942; Arabia, 31; Central America, 63; China, 2,709; India, Burma, Ceylon, 1,708; Japan, Korea, 1,062; Latin and Greek countries of Europe, 43; Mexico, 212; Oceania, 75; Persia, 88; Philippines, 226; Siam, Straits, 107; South America, 624; Western Asia, 289; West Indies, 248; other countries, 202.

The question is often asked as to the qualifications for spiritual leadership of the Volunteers of today. The following facts bring us to believe that the present Volunteers are not less able or devoted than their predecessors. Of those graduated in 1921 from North American colleges, three to ten have served on the cabinets of the Student Christian organizations in their respective colleges; one in ten has been president of a college Christian association; eight in ten of the women and five in ten of the men have taught in Sabbath schools; three in ten have had experience in city missions or social settlements; three in ten of the men have been in charge of churches for a least a summer.

The Student Volunteer Movement has made and is still making a real contribution to missionary education. During the past year 271 institutions reported 781 classes in mission study, and 19,269 men and women were enrolled in these classes. Two hundred and thirty colleges report that they have promoted the individual reading of missionary literature. Missionary education is now very widely adopted by the churches, but the plan of such voluntary study originated with the Student Volunteer Movement, the pioneer in its leadership being D. W. Lyon. When he sailed for China he was succeeded by Harlan P. Beach, who after ten years of service for the Student Volunteer Movement became professor in Yale University in the first chair of missions in a great university in North America. He was followed by J. Lovell Murray, who has served as educational secretary of the Student Volunteer Movement during the past fifteen years.

After the success of mission study was demonstrated in the colleges, the Student Volunteer Movement was urged to extend its advantages to the churches, but the leaders of the movement felt and still feel that its efforts should be limited to work among students. During all these past years a stream of young men and women have poured out from the colleges with a passion for mission study and to their influence is due in no small measure the growth of missionary education in the churches, both in young people's societies and in Women's Missionary Societies.

The Student Volunteer Movement is a source of strength to the Christian Church in its emphasis on giving to missions. Last year students contributed to home and foreign missions, through the regular agencies of the Church, $240,550, as against $135,919 during the preceding year. This does not include the gifts of faculty members. Such giving is due in no small degree to the work of the movement in the colleges. As a result, thousands of students are being trained in habits of systematic and proportionate giving. One of the largest contributors to foreign missions in America was influenced in his habits of giving by a traveling secretary of the Student Volunteer Movement. Many similar cases could be named.

The extent of the movement's contribution to the spiritual life of the colleges and universities can not be estimated. Today students are not provincial in their thinking as formerly. There is a world consciousness now in the colleges. The movement has had no small part in creating this interest in world affairs. It is due largely to the addresses of traveling secretaries of the Student Volunteer Movement and to mission study and discussion groups, also to the striking posters and text books the movement has produced and to the conferences it holds. There is today in the colleges a spirit of unselfishness and international sympathy which is a counteracting influence to the spirit of materialism and narrow parochialism. The study of the triumphs of the Gospel in mission lands serves as a powerful apologetic for Christianity. The study of comparative religion demonstrates the uniqueness of Christ. The challenge of the watchword of the movement, "The evangelization of the world in this generation," stimulates the faith of Christian students. As was well said at the Des Moines Convention last year, the watchword "has called out the latent energies of the students . . . as has no other challenge ever presented to them." The movement has also made for the spirit of co-operation and the working together for a common end, and a deeper reliance upon God.

It would be difficult to exaggerate the influence of the groups of devoted volunteers to be found in student centers. They are generators of spiritual power as well as of missionary zeal. Year by year the traveling secretaries of the movement carry into the colleges the call of Christ for heroic service in the most neglected lands.

The Student Volunteer Movement is expected to cultivate one thousand institutions of higher learning each year. For this work it employs at present sixteen men and women secretaries. During the past academic year no less than ten thousand students came under the influence of the thirty-seven Student Volunteer Union Conferences which were held in the United States and Canada. It is necessary to give missionary information and influence constantly as the call of the Boards for recruits is constantly increasing and the student population is continually changing. This year over two thousand new missionaries are called for by the mission Boards. The Student Volunteer Movement is the recognized interdenominational recruiting agency for the foreign Boards; accordingly all the Boards turn to it for help.

The question is often raised as to how the results attending the work of the movement can be explained. Those who have thought most on the subject are united in their conviction that the greatest single factor is the prayers of those earnest followers of Christ who have faithfully interceded with the Lord of the harvest that he will send forth laborers into his harvest. The demand for Student Volunteers for the non-Christian world can only be met by young men and women who respond to that call because the spirit of the living God moves on their hearts and makes clear what the Lord would have them do. It is a super-human task that is laid upon them. "Pray ye therefore the Lord of the harvest."

CINCINNATI PRESBYTERIAL.

The regular monthly executive meeting of the Women's Missionary Society of Cincinnati Presbytery was held in the First Church, Tuesday, Nov. 8, at 10 a. m. Mrs. J. Shane Nicholls, the president, presided. The treasurer, Mrs. E. M. Martin, asked that the auxiliaries send in as much money as possible by Dec. 10 so that she can make a large quarterly payment to the Board on that date. The Young People's secretary, Miss Blanche Tudor, reported that the Young People's Institute was a great success, 130 being registered. Mrs. Worcester, the secretary for Overseas Work, asked that all articles for the Overseas Work be at 420 Main Street before Nov. 15, as on that day and Nov. 18 the boxes would be packed for shipment. Volunteers are needed to assist in this packing. Mrs. Blinn, the secretary for Missionary Education, has her department well organized, and Mrs. Riesner, who is especially interested in the Stewardship branch of this work, gave a very fine talk. Mrs. H. A. Wilson, the Social-Service secretary, told of the plans for the holidays at the Italian Mission. It is proposed to have a community dinner Thanksgiving Day at the mission and gifts of food or money will be greatly appreciated.

On Dec. 2 a bazaar will be given by the Italian women at the mission. A spaghetti supper will be served. The women of the presbytery are urged to support this bazaar in every way possible. Dec. 8 will be Presbyterian Day in Cincinnati. There will be separate meetings for men and women during the day and a mass meeting for both at night. The Moderator of the General Assembly will be here, as will other well-known Presbyterians. Let us make it a great day. Mrs. W. E. Lewis led in the devotional exercises. Prayers were offered for those who will sit in the Disarmament Conference. At this time of great crisis in the affairs of the world let us spend much time on our knees before the throne of grace.

Mrs. A. W. Massman, Publicity Sec'y.

COLORED Y. M. C. A. CONFERENCE.

A national conference of the Colored Men's Department of the Young Men's Christian Associations of North America will be held at Cincinnati, O., Dec. 1 to 4. Leading men of both races will participate as speakers.

The time is ripe and the call impelling for a more thorough consideration of the outstanding needs of the colored men and boys of America and of their relationship to their country and the world at large.

Underlying the program for the conference in all its features is a deep spiritual purpose. It will be emphasized that only through a quickening of Christian effort can the problems in hand be effectively dealt with. This keynote will be struck at the very beginning of the conference in an opening address by Dr. John R. Mott, general secretary of the International Committee, who will speak on "Christian Brotherhood, the Hope of the World."

The list of speakers also includes Dr. W. W. Alexander, of Atlanta, director of the Inter-Racial Commission; Dr. R. R. Moton, principal of Tuskegee Institute; Dr. George E. Haynes, formerly director of Negro Economics in the United States Bureau of Labor, and various other religious and educational leaders.

Inquiries concerning the conference may be directed to Dr. J. E. Moorland, senior secretary of the Colored Men's Department, 347 Madison Avenue, New York City.

EAST TENNESSEE NOTES.

BY REV. ROBERT I. GAMON, D.D.

Six members were received at Rockford Nov. 6 by Rev. E. W. Hall, pastor.

The West Emory Church has taken on new life this year, under the leadership of Rev. W. J. Shelton. During the past month twenty-six members have been welcomed. Three young people have volunteered for life service.

New Providence has decided to redecorate the interior of the church auditorium and to make other improvements on the outside. This church occupies a very important place in the life of the students of Maryville College as well as of the town folks. Its membership is over 600. The pastor, Rev. W. E. Graham, is in Washington City for a few days and expects to attend some of the sessions of the great conference on the limitation of armaments.

The Erwin Church has commenced a six weeks' school of missions, with an enrollment of ninety. A Sabbath-school-attendance contest has just been closed, with the Watauga Avenue school of Johnson City. Both schools were helped.

Rev. D. C. Johnson, pastor at Graysville, is conducting evangelistic meetings at Bakewell, formerly called Retro. The outlook is bright. The church building was recently purchased by the people, assisted by Chattanooga Presbytery. A new roof and improvements inside make it a comfortable place for services.

Park City Church, Knoxville, has been greatly revived by the special meetings conducted by Rev. Will Bartlett.

The Program for Home Missions will be used on the Sabbath near Thanksgiving Day by some of our schools. Supplies may be obtained at Dr. Mack's office in Nashville or from the Board rooms in New York.

Dr. H. C. Wilson, of the Knoxville Second Church, will attend the New Era Conference in Atlantic City next week, representing the synod.

The local union of Christian Endeavor Societies of Knoxville is composed largely of Presbyterians. They hold a monthly rally. Dr. H. C. Wilson delivered the address at the November meeting.

THE THANKSGIVING HABIT.

The habit of expression serves many purposes. Thankfulness is the Christian's mode of expressing his love and appreciation. Parents spend years in cultivating the habit of expressing gratitude in their children. There is a queer twist in human nature that resists such expression. We, children of the Father, must cultivate the habit of thankful expression. Perhaps, it would be wise for us Christians to set aside a brief period of each day for meditation and thanksgiving. There are two things we are told to do always, viz: to pray and to give thanks. Just as faith is a habit of our lives, so, too, are prayer and thankfulness.

FALSE GRATITUDE.

What is false gratitude to God? Gratitude is false when, having received bountiful, undeserved spiritual and material gifts from God, people thank God for them with their tongue, and use them only for their own advantage, not sharing them with their neighbors; when they obtain them and conceal them in their treasures, chests, libraries; thus depriving many of their brethren of spiritual enlightenment; or of food, drink, clothing, dwelling. Such gratitude is false and impious. It means thanking God with the tongue, and meanwhile showing extreme ingratitude indeed.—John Sergieff.

THANKSGIVING.

An old legion tells that every morning the Angel of Petitions and the Angel of Thanksgiving spread their wings and speed to the earth to carry back to the throne of heaven the petitions and thanksgivings of mankind. The legend says that the Angel of Petitions nightly returns loaded with prayers for blessings and for help, but that the Angel of Thanksgiving returns often almost empty handed.

The legend teaches the great truth we are constantly seeking new blessings and forgetting to count the blessings we have.

On this Thanksgiving day it well becomes all to render praise to God for his infinite benefaction and one by one to enumerate the blessings with which our country and we individually have been crowned.

Today we may well unite in a swelling song of praise such as will require many Angels of Thanksgiving to carry back to the heavenly land.

HARVEST THANKSGIVING DAY.

One of the most peculiar Thanksgiving days in the world is found in Jamaica, and is called Harvest Thanksgiving Day. It is essentially a holiday for the children, and how they do celebrate it! It is a red-letter day for them. Why? Well, for this reason: The children of that island do not have so much as we do in this country; for new clothes, new hats, new toys, and new everything they depend entirely upon the crops that their fathers plant. How they do watch the crops, the rain, the heat rising and all! They know that what they are to get is dependent upon the weather. Then when it is announced that the sugar, ginger, bananas, coffee and whatever their fathers may be raising is coming along nicely, how eagerly they plan for the Harvest Thanksgiving Day. Merrymaking and feasts are held, and those that go to church devoutly praise God for his goodness. They all believe that the merrymaking and feasting are just as much parts of the thanksgiving celebration as the religious sober seriousness; so they plan for the best, make themselves look their best and have the best time of the whole year.

FOR GIVING OF THANKS.

O give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever.—Psa. 107: 1.

Life without thankfulness is devoid of love and passion. Hope without thankfulness is lacking in fine perception. Faith without thankfulness lacks strength and fortitude. Every virtue divorced from thankfulness is maimed and limps along the spiritual road.—J. H. Jowett.

NEW PUBLICATIONS

Baptism Into the Name of the Lord Jesus. By Rev. W. A. Cutler, Milwaukee, Wis. Published by him. Cloth. $1.00.

This is a very carefully prepared and thoughtful presentation of the subject of Christian baptism. The author has given much attention to the subject, and of course he realizes and emphasizes that sprinkling or pouring, and not immersion, is the proper form. But it is to the spiritual meaning and significance of baptism that most attention is given. It means a confession of Christ as Lord and Savior. It is meant to honor him. It is intended to be a profession of faith in him as the only possible Savior, and an expression of belief that his Holy Spirit alone can cleanse the soul from sin. The book is full of loyalty to Jesus whose name is above every name.

The Infinite Artist. By Frederick F. Shannon. Cloth. $1.25. The Macmillan Company, New York.

The author is a member of Chicago Presbytery and pastor of Central Church, in which he is the successor of Dr. Gunsaulus and Dr. Hillis. He has prepared several volumes of sermons. This is one in the series, and it takes its name from the title of the initial sermon. Dr. Shannon is a preacher of attractiveness and ability and his sermons are readable and pleasing.

Peloubet's Select Notes for 1922. Edited by Amos R. Wells. Cloth. $2.00. W. A. Wilde Company, Boston.

The 1922 volume of Peloubet's Select Notes on the International Uniform Sabbath-school Lessons is the 48th annual publication of this popular commentary. It has stood the test of almost half a century, and to many the world over it has become indispensable. The lessons for 1922 take up for nine months the history of the later leaders and prophets of Israel and Judah, while the last three months are devoted to the Life of Christ as given by Luke. Dr. Amos R. Wells, who succeeded Dr. Peloubet upon his death, was for twenty years associated with him in editing the volume, so that in its method, breadth and fullness in the treatment of the lessons, it remains the same. Its suggestions to teachers, its maps and pictures are comprehensive and thorough, and all this material is presented in a form which can be easily and profitably utilized. Great study and pains are put into its mechanical appearance, for it is illustrated by over 150 pictures and maps.

What Japan Thinks. Edited by K. K. Kawakami. Cloth. $2.00. The Macmillan Company, New York.

This is a volume of essays, prepared by various Japanese writers and officials, and in it we get various expressions on a rather varied number of subjects. It is of great interest to read what these men say as to their own country, and its place among the other nations of the world. The writers are deeply and warmly patriotic, and are concerned to have their country maintain a position which shall command the respect and the confidence of all civilized nations. We read what is thought best in preserving the strength and influence of the Japanese nation, and what seems to be expedient in view of the great questions that are being considered by the world today. We are glad to have the opportunity of reading these papers. One realizes that the Japanese have a certain timidity in claiming a position as one of the world's great powers, and yet feel that they must do this with a show of real assurance.

When I Was a Girl in Switzerland. By S. Louise Patterson. Cloth. $1.25. Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company, Boston.

This is one of the attractive and instructive books that young girls and many other people will like and be profited by. Switzerland is a country that stands well among all the people of the world. A daughter of this beautiful land who has long made her home in the United States, where she is well known, tells entertainingly of her early life at home and at school, with much about the country itself and its customs. One understands from this book why the Swiss are the remarkably high type of people that we know them to be.

When I Was a Boy in Norway. By D. J. O. Hall. Cloth. $1.25. Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Company, Boston.

This book is one of many that are calculated to instruct and interest young people by making them acquainted with life and customs in foreign lands. Norway is a most interesting and wonderful land in many ways and the author has done a real service in writing this really valuable and charming book. The author is a man of ability and distinction in our country, who calls Norway his native land, and who loves it still. He tells of his own early life and experiences in his native land, and he knows the art of telling stories in a way to make people love to listen. All who read this book will find it exceedingly attractive.

From Tenderfoot to Golden Eaglet. By Amy E. Blanchard. Cloth. $1.75. W. A. Wilde Company, Boston.

This is a real Girl Scout story, as indicated by its title, and one does not need to be a Girl Scout to enjoy it, as it is full of the healthful and hearty life of the outdoors. It is full of good cheer and charm. One learns from it much about this fine organization for girls, and comes to have a desire to be one of that worth-while organization.

The Valley of Gold. By David Howarth. Cloth. $1.75. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York.

This is a story from the On' Appelle valley of the great Saskatchewan region in Canada, where the gold in the valley is wheat and oats, and where the threshers are the miners. The story is one of rivalry between two opposing threshing crews, and passion and violence mark the course that is taken. A love story winds its way through the scenes. The writer is new in the field of literature, but he shows himself a master in the art, after the general style of his fellow-countryman, Ralph Connor. As it is his own country of which he writes, we find a strength and assurance that come from a full and general knowledge of the conditions. The story is one of a painful interest, in some of its tense situations, but there is a very delightful element in it which pleases the reader.

The Isolation Plan. By William H. Blymyer. Cloth. $2.00. The Cornhill Publishing Company, Boston.

While we are all thinking of and discussing disarmament as a means of putting an end to war, the author puts forth his idea of a proper punishment for outlaw nations, in isolating any that refuse to submit or comply. The nations can agree to simultaneously cease their military and naval activities and institute compulsory arbitration. It would not be necessary to go to war against any such nations as refuse. All that would be necessary would be to agree to withdraw any dealings with such nations, in any financial or business operations. They would soon come to their senses, through bankruptcy or starvation. This book presents excellent and sensible suggestions. The author is an authority on international law and for many years has been developing the plan which is presented in this volume.

American Boy's Book of Wild Animals. By Dan Beard. Cloth. $3.0. J. B. Lippincott Company, Philadelphia.

The very name of this book suggests and insures that it will be fascinating to boys. It is one of the famous "Woodcraft Series," meant especially for Boy Scouts, and, hence, for all who have keen senses and good tastes. The book is filled with descriptions of places and animals, of adventures and incidents, and bears and wild cats and deer and opossum and all sorts of wild things dash and scamper through the stories and over the pages. The author is National Scout Commissioner for the Boy Scouts of America and it may be set down as certain that what he writes for the boys will be for their good and will bear the stamp of truth. He has spent much of his life in the open and is as well acquainted with outdoor life and with the life and habits of wild animals as any one well can be. It is a great pleasure to find such a book.

The Mantle of Elijah. By Damon Dalrymple. Cloth. $1.50. George H. Doran Company, New York.

The writer, who chooses to conceal his personality under an assumed name, undertakes to give some striking and forceful counsel to the young preachers of the day. If Elisha wears the mantle of Elijah, he should be a prophet, and should do the work of a prophet. The main thought and purpose of the volume is good and is worthy of attentive consideration by all to whom it is addressed.

The Beggar's Vision. By Brookes More. Richly Illustrated. Cloth. $2.00. The Cornhill Publishing Company, Boston.

This is a book of remarkable poetry and of still more remarkable pictures, each of the many full-page photographs being a startling work of art. As one reads its pages he is led on, stirred and deeply aroused by the beauty of the words and the spirit of the message.

The Truce of God. By Mary Roberts Rinehart. Cloth. $1.50. George H. Doran Company, New York.

This is a very attractive book that comes in well for the Christmas season, and is full of the Christmas spirit. It tells the story of a French monarch, estranged from his queen, but reunited and reconciled in the touching circumstances of the birth of a little son. The book is beautifully printed and embellished, as is proper, in carrying the story of this gifted writer.

In Blessed Cyrus. By Laura E. Richards. Cloth. $2.00. D. Appleton and Company, New York.

The reader will find that Cyrus is not a great national leader and commander, but a rural village, where the ordinary happenings are of so safe and stereotyped a character that any unusual occurrences cause an actual upheaval of the very life of the community. Two very unusual occurrences are recorded, with exhibitions of excitement and distress. One is the visit of a real actress, with very modern manners and customs and appearances, and the other is an outbreak of small-pox. An expert writer, as the author of this story, can describe these things in a way to promote lively interest throughout the limits of the volume, from cover to cover. It is an amusement and recreation to read the story.

Mr. Eastman seeks in this little volume to help Presbyterians to realize what their part is or ought to be in some of the great tasks of the Christian forces in America. He has been obliged of necessity to select a few of these tasks and to present each of them in as suggestive a way as possible. And the reader will surely agree that he has done his work exceedingly well.

OREGON.

The Presbytery of Southern Oregon met on Oct. 11 at Rogue River. Rev. Aaron Wolfe was elected Moderator; Rev. J. K. Howard, of Jacksonville, Permanent Clerk; and Joseph W. Angell, of Phoenix, Stated Clerk and Treasurer. In response to a call to become student Y. M. C. A. secretary at Oregon Agricultural College, Rev. E. W. Warrington was released from Roseburg, where he will be succeeded by Rev. L. B. Quick, who has been pastor of Calvary Church of Portland. Rev. H. G. Hanson, recently pastor at Grant's Pass, was released to take charge at Moro, Ore. Rev. C. C. Hulet, of the Presbytery of Seattle, was received, to become Sabbath-school missionary in Southern Oregon. A permanent Committee on Evangelism was appointed, consisting of Rev. C. F. Koehler, of Ashland; Rev. Joseph W. Angell, of Phoenix, and Rev. J. K. Howard, of Jacksonville. Plans for "pastoral exchange" and special meetings in several churches were started. The overture on women as deacons was answered in the affirmative, and that on commissioners in the negative. Lakeview is a thriving county-seat town, with a nearly new and adequate church building, and a fine opportunity for work, but for which it will be hard to provide immediately, in view of the recent action of the Home Board curtailing new contracts. The Ashland Church is completing a new addition to its building, to cost, with other changes, about $6,500.—J. W. Angell, S. C.

CALIFORNIA.

In the First Church of Long Beach, Nov. 6, the pastor, Rev. George M. Rourke, D.D., welcomed thirty-nine new members. The pastor preached on "Is Disarmament Practical?" At the close of the sermon, Hon. Frank F. Merriam read a resolution, which was unanimously adopted by a rising vote of the fifteen hundred persons present, and sent to the Disarmament Conference, expressing desire for the success of the Conference.

The sixth annual Bible Conference was held in the Glendale Church Oct. 5-9. The speakers were Mrs. Frances Neth, Rev. F. W. Farr, D.D., Rev. W. E. Blackstone, D.D., Rev. George B. Davis, D.D., and Rev. J. R. Pratt, D.D., with Rev. Cortland Myers, D.D., of Tremont Temple, Boston, speaking each evening. The interest and attendance was greater than at any preceding conference. At the October communion forty-four new members were received, making two hundred received since April 1. A new building site has been secured, and the officials of the congregation have nearly completed a canvass for $150,000 to erect a new church building. The pastor, Rev. W. E. Edmonds, has been on this field for ten years, and holds a high place in the esteem of the entire congregation and community.

A WARNING TO THE NATION.

During the high price period of abounding prosperity in 1919 the total value of our manufactured products was in round number $62,000,000,000, of agricultural products $24,000,000,000, and of mineral products about $4,600,000,000, or about $90,600,000,000.

With such a stupendous output at profitable prices it was possible for the country to carry the heavy taxation required to meet the expenses of the National Government.

But under the false teachings of political economists and narrow-minded financiers, prosperity has broken down to a point where the total value of agricultural and manufactured and mineral products will this year not exceed $50,000,000,000. Possibly the figures will drop to $45,000,000,000 or half of the value of the output of 1919.

But more than that; on the output of 1919 there was a wide margin of profit; on the output of 1921 there is a dead loss. Farmers are selling their output at less than actual cost of production, and we think it safe to say that the entire manufacturing interests of the country will in the aggregate not yield a dollar of profit during 1921. The profits made by some manufacturing interests will probably, we think, be entirely offset by the gigantic losses in others.

In 1919, with large profits, the enormous taxation expenses could be borne without serious trouble.

In 1921 low prices, without any profits, will yield very little revenue.

And yet the Government must collect under the present taxation plan $5,000,000,000 a year for its expenses, while state, county and city taxes are likewise enormously burdensome.

The business of the country can not possibly stand such a drain under low prices. Present prices mean stagnation, poverty, unemployment and little or no profit to the vast majority of the agricultural and industrial interests of the country and to a very large proportion of the general mercantile trade. Counting all taxation, state, county, city and national, we will this year have to collect between 15 and 20 per cent of the total output of all the country's agricultural, manufacturing and mining interests. Continued much longer that would mean bankruptcy of all producing interests and ultimate national repudiation of obligations.

There is only one way to escape this inevitable outcome and that is by higher prices and larger profits, and these can only come through enlarged credit from all financial institutions, from that of the small country bank to that of the greatest dominant power of the country, the Federal Reserve System.

Continued low prices will lead to national and state confiscation of property or repudiation of obligations.

We can not continue to collect 15 to 20 cially when this output is on an unprofitable basis to start with, without going straight down the toboggan to inevitable ruin.

The nation has followed the political economists, so-called, and the financial influences which have been fighting for low prices, until the nation is beginning to realize that it has been blinded by false teachings and led by blind teachers and is headed for the abyss unless a change is made very quickly.

Unless the Administration, the Treasury Department, the Federal Reserve System, and our bankers and political economists generally right-about face, and do it quickly, the nation will have to pay within the next few years a tremendous penalty for blunders of finance immeasurable in their evil consequences. Fortunately there are indications that these facts are at last driven home into the Federal Reserve System and financiers generally.—From Manufacturers Record, Baltimore, Md.

PUMPKIN PIE.

BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Through sun and shower the pumpkin grew,
When the days were long and the skies were blue.

And it felt quite vain when its giant size
Was such that it carried away the prize

At the county fair when the people came;
And it wore a ticket and bore a name.

Alas, for the pumpkin's pride! One day
A boy and his mother took it away.

It was pared and sliced, and pounded and stewed,
And the way it was treated was harsh and rude.

It was sprinkled with sugar and seasoned with spice;

The boy and his mother pronounced it nice.

It was served in a paste, it was baked and browned,
And at last on a pantry shelf was found.

And on Thursday, John and Mary and Mabel
Will see it on amty's laden table.

For the pumpkin grew 'neath a summer sky
Just to turn at Thanksgiving into pie.

"Miss November" And the Pink Silk Dress

By MARY McCRAE CULTER

(Copyright, 1921, by Monfort & Co.)

CHAPTER I.

"The day is cold and dark and dreary:
It rains, and the wind is never weary;
The vine still clings to the mold'ring wall

But at every gust the dead leaves fall;
And the day is dark and dreary."

Miss Nancy Oliva Varden repeated the gloomy words gloomily to herself as she stood at a window of the Dean's office in Harwood Hall and watched the November rain as it swirled around the college buildings, beat the leaves from the live-oak trees besides the drive, and bent the heads of the late-blooming chrysanthemums to the earth. Across the narrow campus street, a laughing chattering group of students—some with umbrellas, some unprotected—raced from the Library building to Science hall, their lively spirits all unquenched by the beating shower, their voices merry with the gladness of sunny souls that had not as yet been eclipsed by the shadows of life.

Nancy Varden watched the familiar scene with unappreciative eyes, barely taking time to wonder how any one could be so frivolous, so utterly unconcerned, on such a forbidding day. After they were all gone, after the electric bells had clanged their "tardy" warning, after drive and pavement resounded only with the splash of the rain, the girl's thoughts returned to her own gloomy self, and she took up the murmur which the little interlude had interrupted:

"My life is cold and dark and dreary:
It rains, and the wind is never weary:
My thoughts still cling to the mold'ring past,
But the hopes of youth fall thick in the blast,
And the days are dark and dreary."

It was characteristic of Nancy Varden that her quotation of Longfellow's beautiful poem stopped abruptly with that second stanza, leaving the third one with its message of hope and cheer, unthought of and unremembered. She was barely thirty years of age, but as she stood there in her sombre grey suit, her hair drawn smoothly back into the primest of old-fashioned coiffures, her eyes dark with the carefully-nurtured gloom of her heart, her face shadowed with discontent and ambitionless apathy, she well merited the name with which the merry college girls had dubbed her and by which she was known all over the campus, a name coined from her own signature "N. O. Varden,"—"Miss November."

It was a common matter of wonder to the lively students, that Dean Burton could abide such a gloomy personage in the narrow confines of his private office year after year, when he might easily obtain the services of a more congenial spirit; and sometimes the same thought obtruded upon the mind of the good dean himself.

Old Doctor Varden had been one of the staunchest friends of the college during early, struggling years, had labored for its welfare, had taught in its class-rooms, had given liberally toward its endowment, and had been one of its bright and shining lights until death had promoted him to the great university. His office had been next to that of his beloved friend dean Burton, and their relationships had been most cordial and intimate so long as they were permitted to work together. Nancy was the good professor's only child, and had been his sole joy and comfort after the early death of her mother. Her graduation from his dearly-beloved college had been one of the epochs in the old professor's life—her diploma, one of his proudest possessions. He had installed her at once as his private secretary that he might have the pleasure of her constant presence and participation in his labors, had made her his confidante, had absorbed her time and her attention so utterly that youth with its pleasures and its frivolities had been swept aside, until the girl had become the unemotional, intellectual business woman so necessary to his plans and interests. When the old professor had been suddenly called to cease from his labors, Dean Burton had kindly proffered the bewildered Nancy the position of private secretary to himself, more because of gratitude to her father than because of pity for her forlorn self, and for five years she had efficiently performed every task given into her hands. She knew every detail of college business: was familiar with the standing of every student; could coldly and conscientiously make out credentials for departing ones, and with equal coldness and indifference outline courses for newcomers. She carried a "master key" which unlocked every room and every desk in all of the college offices, and was even trusted with the signing of important papers and messages in the Dean's name—so much had she become a part in the machinery of the institution. She was trusted, she was respected by every one, but no one thought of loving her. Who could love an icicle? For a year after her father's death she had dressed in conventional mourning robes. At the end of that time she had changed to the somber grey that had been her unvarying costume for business, for college affairs, for church services, and for what few social functions she had reluctantly attended. No wonder, then, that the students had named her "Miss November," for college students rarely err in their selections of nicknames, especially for those unfortunates who fail to win their sincere respect and approval.

Thus Nancy Varden's grey life had come up to the grey November day on which we find her; and it bade fair to go on unchanged to its gloomy end; for, as one frivolous girl had expressed it, "Miss November would be just miserable if she couldn't be gloomy."

Nancy at length turned from her contemplation of the dark out-of-doors with an appropriate sigh, switched on her desk lamp, and resumed the copying of college records which was the business in hand. Dean Burton was laid aside with a good, so that she had the office to herself, a fact which unconsciously to herself, enhanced the dreariness of the day.

She went methodically on with her labors until after the last bell had jangled release to the busy students, and until the janitor came to put the office into order for the next day; then she carefully arranged her papers, closed her desk, covered her typewriter, donned her grey storm-coat and hat, and silently departed for her own home.

"The Varden House" was a big old-fashioned mansion of colonial type set back from the street beneath the shelter of two huge pines that had been planted by Professor Varden in the early days of his coming to Belmont. The building had once been very attractive and stately in its coat of shining white, surrounded by shrubbery and draped with never-fading vines, but that was years ago. Time and indifference had turned its snowy whiteness to dull grey, had left its shrubbery and vines unpruned, and had made it an appropriate setting for its mistress, "Miss November." It was such a familiar scene, however, that Nancy did not even sense the change nor notice its shabbiness as she walked up to its entrance and closed its heavy oaken door behind her.

Inside, however, there was a subtle sense of homeliness—the warmth of a well-kept fire, the smell of something appetizing that Mammy Lou was preparing for her beloved mistress' dinner. For a brief space the dreariness of the rainy day was shut out as Mammy Lou bustled out into the hall to greet "her Honey Chile."

"La! la!" she ejaculated with upraised hands. "Yo' pore Honey Chile! Yo' plum soaked froo an' froo. Yo' bettah hustle right upstaiah an' git dem drippy clo'es off'n you, or you'll be plum daid on mah han's. Dis sho'ah am a scrumptious day foh catchin' chills an' fevah. Hurry now, Honey Chile, foh suppah 'most nigh to eatin' time. Dar's somepin mos' special good, too."

"All right, Mammy Lou," responded Nancy in a tone that would have surprised dean and students alike. "I'll be down in just no time."

She hastened up to her room, put off her business suit of grey and donned an equally grey house-dress that had a bare touch of white lace at throat and wrists, put on fresh stockings and slippers, and hurried down to the warmth of the blazing fire which Mammy Lou had built in the livingroom fireplace.

As she sat in her big easy-chair before the fire, she was an nearly happy as Nancy Varden ever was known to be. Before she had time to lapse into the greyness of her November day, Mammy Lou called her out into the little breakfast-room where all of her solitary meals were served, and seated her in state at the table which she had delighted to spread for the mistress whom she had loved from babyhood up to the present time.

"Jes' a-lissen to dat rain a-pourin' itse'f down. 'Pears lak it t'ought it was behin' time, an's tryin' to cotch up wif itse'f. Yo' shuah yo' plum dry, Honey Chile?"

"Yes, Mammy Lou, I am really 'plum dry' and warm as toast, thanks to your nice bright fire. And such a supper! Why, it looks as if you had prepared for company." Miss Varden gazed over the daintily spread table with satisfaction. She had not realized that she had been both cold and hungry for several hours, or sense the fact that because of this physical discomfort her mental self had been reduced to the grey despondency in which we glimpsed her at the first of this story.

Now, warmed, freshly-clad, with a bountiful supper before her, and with Mammy Lou's cheerful presence hovering about her, life all at once took on a different hue. If she had bethought herself of Longfellow's unfinished poem, she would certainly have quoted the remaining stanza:

"Be still, sad heart, and cease repining.
Behind the clouds is the sun still shining.
Thy fate is the common fate of all,
Into each life some rain must fall
Some days must be dark and dreary."

But Mammy Lou's comical stories concerning the butcher boy and the neighbor's poodle; the antics of children passing to and from school; a joke she had read in the paper; coupled with the throaty laughter of the old negress, effectually banished even the memory of the grey day and the grey rain and the wet pavements and the sodden leaves, and sent Miss Varden's mental calendar ahead to spring days and budding flowers. Such is the magic alchemy of a cheerful spirit, a mind at ease, a heart content.

The mistress of the house went back to her cheerful fireside ten years younger at heart than when she had left it half an hour previous; while Mammy Lou, seeing the change, went happily about her evening work, chanting loudly:

"I gotta Hahp, an' you gotta hahp!—
All God's chillen gotta hahp!
When we git to hebben we'll take ouah hahps
An' play all ovah God's hebben—
Hebben Play-all-ovah-God's-hebben!"
(To be continued.)

WHY SHE WAS HAPPY.

The small girl of the family was busy over the flower beds. She pulled the weeds and grass out carefully, so that not a flower root was disturbed. She dug and watered and trimmed, and all the while she hummed a happy tune to herself. A passing neighbor looked and listened for a moment, then said:

"You must like your work, Bessie. You seem very happy over it."

Quickly the child looked up with a laugh. "I'm doing it for mother, and I'm always happy when I'm doing things for folks, aren't you?"

Her reply was the key that will unlock the door of happiness for any one who will use it.

THE CRIPPLE'S THANKSGIVING.

"With salt and potatoes and meal for bread, We needn't be hungry today," she said.

"Though I can not stir from this queer old chair,

I look at the cupboard and know they're there;

And mother has left this lunch by me; How thankful I am for it all!" said she.

"With coal for the stove and quilt for the bed,

We needn't be chilly today," she said;

"For as long as my arms and back don't tire I can reach very well to feed the fire;

And mother'll be home to an early tea;

How thankful I am for it all!" said she.

"There's only one thing I really dread,

And that is the pain in my back," she said.

"But it's better, a great deal better, I know, Than it was at the first, three months ago;

And the doctor is ever so kind to me; How thankful I am for it all!" said she.

"And by and by, when the winter is dead, He thinks I'll be almost well," she said;

"And I'll have some crutches and walk, and then

I can get the dinners for mother again; And, oh, how glad and happy we'll be.

How thankful I am for it all!" said she.

A STORY OF OLD FURNITURE.

Susan Winslow looked very pretty indeed in her chintz gown, and snow-white cap, as she swept and dusted and put in order the rooms behind the shop in which she and her sister, two years younger, kept house for their father.

Their mother had been dead two years, and Susan had put aside her school books, and taken charge of the little home. Many and varied were her duties—for at the time our story opens spinning, candle-making, soap-making, quilting, and scores of other things, were a part of every good housekeeper's work. Indeed, so busy was pretty Susan, that she had not time to perceive what others had often noticed.

Only last Sabbath at the meeting house, where she sang in the choir, she wondered why a strange young man in the Doby pew had looked at her so persistently.

At dinner that day, her father told them the stranger, Joseph Brodie, was a cousin of the Doby's that he was very wealthy, and was thinking of going into business with Mr. Doby, and they would likely see him often.

But today, Susan's thoughts were all centered on the old bureau, to which, with the mahogany table, the tip-top stand, and old family portraits she had lately taken a great dislike, because Nancy Collins had told her, they were so old-fashioned, and made the room too crowded. Nancy also said her father was well-to-do, and should furnish his home, as was befitting his station. Impulsive Susan had told her father what Nancy had said, but was met with such stern disapproval, she had not dared venture again.

"Susan, Susan, guess what Patience Doby told me at school today," said Martha, hardly waiting 'till her father finished the lengthy Grace, which was always observed in this home. But Susan was looking at Martha's crumpled dress, which she had ironed stiff, only that morning—

"She told me," hurried on Martha, "that her cousin from the city said he had traveled much, but he had never seen a fairer maiden than Merchant Winslow's eldest daughter; he said her hair was like burnished gold and—"

"Tut, tut," said their father, as he took a second helping of Susan's good boiled dinner. "You are a chatter-box, Martha. Let us have no more of such foolishness."

For the first time since she kept her father's house, the dinner dishes stood that day one full hour unwashed, while Susan gazed at herself in her mother's Chippendale mirror, and wondered if the dark-eyed stranger really thought her fair. Could it be possible he really admired her hair; the hair her kinsfolk all called red, and teased her about so unmercifully—

* * *

"The Elders will come forward and remain after the congregation is dismissed," was the announcement after the sermon at the meeting house the next Sabbath.

Josiah Winslow was an Elder, highly respected and deferred to by the community, and his young daughters watched him with pride as he left the family pew, and took his place with the other Elders at the left of the minister.

They walked slowly homeward with Patience Doby, whose father was also an Elder.

"I know what church business they are discussing," said Patience, "Joseph Brodie would like Presbytery to meet in our meeting house in October."

"And pray," said Martha, "what concern is it of Joseph Brodie's?"

"He is a Ruling Elder in the City Church, and has authority," said Patience, her eyes on Susan's blushing face.

At dinner that day their father told them they would entertain several delegates at the October meeting of Presbytery, among whom would be Joseph Brodie.

"And why him," said the irrepressible Martha. "Why does he not go to his cousin's?"

"I do not know," said her father. "It was so arranged, but I count it an honor to entertain so exemplary a young man."

* * *

On the Monday preceding the first Sabbath in October great preparations commenced in the Winslow home. Bedding was aired. Windows and furniture polished, and Martha, much against her will, was kept home from school to scour the brass and irons and warming pans.

On Friday Susan had the great outdoor oven ready for the good things to be baked in it, when her father came in hastily from the store. "I must make the next boat, as I have just had word that I must come to the city at once on urgent business. Put my clean linen into the carpet bag quickly." "But, father," said the bewildered Susan, "will you be home for the big meeting?"

"I am afraid I will not, I have told the apprentice what to do in the store—and you must get your Aunt Betsy to stay with you. She will help you entertain our guests."

On Saturday morning all was in readiness for the guests, who were to arrive that evening, but Susan's face wore a frown, as she surveyed the spotless parlor. Then a daring idea came into her head.

"Martha, Martha!" she called. Martha was in the pantry looking at the loaded shelves.

"Martha, if you will help me, and do what I want you to do, I will give you my coral beads."

Martha had long coveted the coral, and very willingly agreed.

"Help me push this bureau into the room back of the store."

"Oh, Susan," began Martha, but Susan reminded her, she was hired to help.

"Now this ugly chest," said Susan.

"You will catch it Susan, when father comes home."

"He will not know it," said Susan, "unless you tell."

"I dare you to send Grandfather Winslow's portrait to the attic," said Martha, as she saw Susan looking at it with a calculating eye. Of course, red-headed Susan would not take a dare. "I like the portrait, but not the frame," said she, and soon Martha was tugging the heavy walnut framed, hand-painted portrait, up the steep attic stairs.

The mahogany table groaned under its weight of good things at the late dinner on the following day. Aunt Betsy was presiding at the head of the hospitable board. Mr. Joseph Brodie seemingly deep in a discussion of presbyterial business with a brother Elder, yet conscious of every movement of the graceful maiden who waited upon the table.

It was Martha who heard the sound of horses' hoofs going toward their stable. "Oh it is father," she cried, and sure enough he soon appeared, mud splashed and weary. He told them he had purchased a horse in the city, and expected to reach home before the Sabbath, but was obliged to go many miles out of the way—to avoid an unsafe bridge.

"Do you think he noticed the room?" said Martha as soon as the girls were alone.

"It did not escape his eyes," said Susan. "I took note of that."

Very quietly at three o'clock the next morning the girls put everything back in its accustomed place—and waited anxiously to be called to account, but their father seemed to have forgotten the occurrence, and never mentioned it.

Ten years later, Susan, now the happy wife of Joseph Brodie, was waiting her husband's return from the notary's where her father's will was to be read. Her youngest child was only a few week's old, and her heart was full of love and pride as she watched the two older, as they played about the room.

Presently her husband's step was heard, and she rose to meet him. He drew her to him (the lover still).

"Your father was worth a goodly sum, Susan, though he was a plain man, and loved plain living."

"Do you know what Mrs. Moore said to me yesterday, Joseph, when she called to see our little daughter. She said our father's family was surely of much distinction in England, else we would not have so much beautiful mahogany, and other rare furniture."

"It seems queer, wife," said Joseph, "but the will gives all the old furniture to Martha. The money and land is divided equally between you."

"All the furniture to Martha!" said Susan.

"We do not need it," said her husband looking at their beautifully appointed home. "We do not need it, but I would like it for the children's sake."

"Can you account for this item in your father's will, Susan?" said her husband, his black eyes looking teasingly into her blue ones—but Susan for once had no answer.

A THANKSGIVING PARTY.

BY HELEN M. RICHARDSON.

Thanksgiving Day I had some friends
To dinner, five in all.
I spread my table in the yard;
My guests were very small.

Miss Chickadee quite early came,
Dressed all in black and gray.
A woodpecker flew to her side,
Red-capped, with neck-band gay.

Pert Mr. Nuthatch next arrived,
A gymnast of renown.
He could do stunts on any tree
With head or up, or down.

Miss Sparrow then came, smartly dressed
In pretty mottled brown;
And last of all a squirrel gray
From home in squirrel town.

When all my friends had found a place
At my Thanksgiving board,
They made a very charming sight,
And I could well afford

To give them all that they could eat,
For I knew in the spring
They'd be my unpaid foresters,
And gaily work and sing. —Ex.

A THANKSGIVING DINNER.

"Morning paper, sir? 'Public Ledger,' only five cents." An old gentleman who was about to enter a second-class restaurant stopped and looked at the lad. "It is late in the day to purchase morning papers," he said. "You have only one left, I see; couldn't you fall a cent on it?"

"That I could, sir," was the cheerful answer. "I've been going ever since 6 o'clock, and I am ready to have a Thanksgiving dinner now. Were you going in here?"

The old gentleman hesitated and put his hand in his pocket. "I don't know, lad," he answered.

"He is as poor as can be," Nat thought, as he took a hasty survey of the rusty coat and well-worn hat. "I reckon he can't even afford a decent dinner on Thanksgiving day."

"See here, sir," Nat said, as he laid a detaining hand on the old man's arm, "come in and have dinner with me. I'm going to treat myself and there's nobody to share it with me."

The old gentleman looked startled, and examined the boy closely. "Why, lad, you are poor," he said, "and I can not take advantage of your kindness."

Nat raised himself on tip-toe, snatched off his dirty little cap, and thrust his hand into his jacket pocket. "Hear that money jingle? Why, I cleared fifty cents this morning and as much more yesterday. You don't call that being poor, do you? Some of the fellows even call me Nathaniel Brown, the millionaire."

The old gentleman smiled encouragingly. "But you don't spend it all, do you? There is little good derived from money thoughtlessly squandered."

The boy's face fairly shone. "Well, sir, there's one boy in our set that has a kick against me, and he calls me Nat Brown, the miser. But," growing confidential and drawing nearer, "I'm saving it for mother and sister Betty. When we get enough ahead they are coming to the city to live; then I shall have my own home."

"You are, indeed, better off than I thought, Nathaniel," the gentleman said. "Go in and have dinner, lad, and enjoy it as you deserve."

"I want you to come in too, sir. Never mind about the cost; I'll attend to that. Thanksgiving comes but once a year, and mother would say, 'Share your blessings with the needy, Natty, boy.'"

"Come in, sir, do come," Nat continued, as the old gentleman hesitated and was about to turn away.

"Well, I will since you so much wish it, but never mind about luxuries, boy; a cup of hot coffee would satisfy me." "A sup of coffee for a Thanksgiving dinner! Why, what kind of fare is that? Here, waiter, pie enough for two, a round slice of ham, dish of potatoes and a pot of coffee, smoking hot." "Anything else you would like, sir?" But the old gentleman shook his head, and looked approvingly at the boy over the rim of his steel-bowed glasses.

"This is something like a dinner, now, ain't it," Nathaniel declared fifteen minutes later, while in the midst of enjoying a hearty meal. "Folks that ain't used to such a living knows how to appreciate it, don't they? I reckon I ain't knowed such a treat since last Christmas, when I went out to see mother. Do you live all alone, sir?"

The old gentleman sighed and gave a silent assent.

"He's old and poor, and nobody cares for him," thought Nat. Here, sir, you take most of this pie and I'll finish up the potatoes. Does the coffee suit your taste? Wasn't it lucky that we got here together? Not much sport eating alone on a day like this, is it? Would mind telling me your name, sir?" The old gentleman took a pencil from his vest pocket and wrote Henry Turner, 1018 Diamond Street. "Drop in lad, and see me," he said. "Thank you, sir." The gentleman put his hand in his pocket. I'll pay for my share of this feast, lad."

Nathaniel eagerly remonstrated. "It was my treat, sir," he said. "Here, waiter, I want to settle my account. This gentleman is my guest." And while Nat squared his bill the old gentleman quietly arose and left the restaurant.

The week which followed Thanksgiving was a busy one for Nat, but he did not forget the old gentleman and his resolution to call upon him soon. One day Nat sold out earlier than usual and hastened his steps toward Diamond Street. "No mistake here," he said, "with the name on the door, Henry Turner, agent." Nat modestly stepped into the office to find his old friend busily engaged in counting greenbacks, while two or three gentlemen stood by waiting his leisure. A pair of kindly eyes looked over the glasses and motioned Nat to a seat.

"Well, lad," he said, an hour later, when they found themselves alone. Nat thrust his hands into his ragged pockets and looked bewildered. "I—I thought"

"You thought what?"

"I thought you was poor, sir!"

"So I am, boy, for I have no one to make a home for me. Gold and silver are poor substitutes for love and tenderness. You have a good mother; send for her to come and make a home where I may spend my declining years."

Nathaniel Brown no longer cries daily papers, but is a pupil in the public school, while Mrs. Brown, in the home which Henry Turner provided, makes her benefactor so comfortable in the many little ways known to women that he says he no longer realizes the weight of his three score years.

"But," he is fond of saying, "I never expect to taste another dinner quite so good as that which Nathaniel provided out of his well-earned savings."

THANKSGIVING AND THE CHILDREN.

Encourage the children to help in the Thanksgiving preparations. The little ones love to be busy, and will work cheerfully if they are shown how. Let them pare the apples and stone the raisins, and they will feel a proprietorship in the feast. Midday dinners are best where the children participate, and leave plenty of time afterward for the games, which even the Pilgrim Fathers did not disdain.

The day should close with merry-making and fun, but the deeper lessons that it brings must not be forgotten. Gratitude is not a characteristic of childhood, which accepts what is done for it as a right, but even the very little ones can be told in simple language the meaning of the day, and that true thankfulness should prompt us to share our blessings with others. The blessedness of giving is in itself a wonderful education.—Annetta Talliday-Antona.

IS YOUR TABLE FULL.

How many dining-room chairs have you?

Then be sure you have them all full on Thanksgiving Day. But don't let that limit your hospitality. There are other chairs in your house that will answer the purpose, no doubt. Sit on a kitchen chair yourself and you will enjoy the feast the more.

There are some people who see in this year's Thanksgiving Day every excuse not to have any guests at all. They think that there is nothing to be thankful for and with food prices as they are and servants so scarce the task of setting a bountiful table on Thanksgiving seems like too much of an undertaking. Then there are others who feel somehow that Thanksgiving Day is just the one when their hospitality should go farthest.

During the war there were soldiers, far from their own homes, to be invited. But there are lots of homeless folk besides the soldiers this Thanksgiving who would appreciate a Thanksgiving dinner invitation. In any town where there are industries there is a large temporary population—men and women—whom you perhaps know, at least by sight, perhaps from seeing them at your own church on Sabbath, or in other ways.—Ex.

THANKFULNESS.

At this time of the year the minds of young people unavoidably turn to Thanksgiving, but it may be in a different way from which older people think of the day. To some, Thanksgiving means only a holiday rather than a holy day. With the holiday is associated a good time, a big dinner, a day of sport, recreation or meeting friends in one way or another. With the thought of a holy day is associated the thought of thankfulness and joy unspeakable. Indeed the person who is thankful is thoughtful, for these words are closely associated in meaning and derivation.

It will be impossible to enumerate the many things for which we should be thankful, but we must not forget in our enthusiasm of youth how we have been peculiarly and abundantly blessed.

LULU'S TRUE ANSWER.

"Mary had eight eggs," said the teacher. After using four for her cake, what part was left?"

Lulu waved her hand frantically.

"What is it, Lulu?" asked the teacher.

"Eggshells," she answered promptly.

CONTENT.

He that hath so many causes of joy, and so great, is very much in love with sorrow and peevishness who loses all these pleasures, and chooses to sit down upon his little handful of thorns. Enjoy the blessings of this day, if God sends them; and the evils of it bear patiently and sweetly; for this day only is ours, we are dead to yesterday, and we are not yet born to the morrow. But if we look abroad, and bring into one day's thought the evil of many, certain and uncertain, what will be and what will never be, our load will be as intolerable as it is unreasonable.

A MODERN SIR WALTER RALEIGH.

Most people have read the story of Sir Walter Raleigh, who threw down his coat for Queen Elizabeth to walk on. An exchange tells the story of a little boy born in a slum, in the poorest quarter of Liverpool, where there is a society which attends to the slum kiddies. Little ones without boots, with clothes past repair, come for help. They are given a meal, a hot bath, their old, dilapidated garments destroyed and a new set of warm, clean clothes provided.

One winter evening a number of children were in the corridor, waiting their turn for the bath. As one entered the bath room, the others would move forward toward the door. One little girl hesitated to move forward; and the ragged boy soon discovered the reason. The unheated corridor has a cold cement floor and the kiddies were mostly barefooted. When they had stood for a little while on one spot the place became warm. So the girl hesitated to move from her own warmed spot and thus risk losing her place in the line.

The boy threw his little ragged cap on the floor and turning to the girl said: "There, stand on that, you'll find it warmer."

He was finer than Sir Walter Raleigh—for Raleigh could buy another coat.

It takes one little girl or boy,
Two hands to work and play,
And just one loving little heart
To make Thanksgiving Day.

PUBLISHERS' NOTES

Many subscribers pay their subscriptions at this season, and some are interested in securing new subscribers, and make inquiry as to terms, commissions, etc.

We do not give the paper for less than the price to subscribers, new or old, but we do give to any old subscriber a commission for securing new subscribers. We give this commission in money, $1 for each new subscriber, or in books or other articles at what is practically the wholesale price, being about half the regular retail price.

Among the books which have proved popular with our readers are a number of practical discussions of Christian doctrine and stories. Some of them have appeared in the paper and afterwards been issued in book form.

We will send to any subscriber who sends a new subscription, at the price, $2.50, any two of the following books:

Victorious Manhood. By Dr. Howard Agnew Johnston.

A Seed Thought. By Leigh Younge. An interesting and useful story.

Golden Grain. Another good story by Leigh Younge.

Lesson IX—November 27.

PAUL'S VOYAGE AND SHIPWRECK.

Acts 27:30-44.

30. And as the shipmen were about to flee out of the ship, when they had let down the boat into the sea, under color as though they would have cast anchors out of the foreship,

31. Paul said to the centurion and to the soldiers, Except these abide in the ship, ye can not be saved.

32. Then the soldiers cut off the ropes of the boat, and let her fall off.

33. And while the day was coming on, Paul besought them all to take meat, saying, This day is the fourteenth day that ye have tarried and continued fasting, having taken nothing.

34. Wherefore I pray you to take some meat: for this is for your health: for there shall not be an hair fall from the head of any of you.

35. And when he had thus spoken, he took bread, and gave thanks to God in presence of them all: and when he had broken it, he began to eat.

36. Then were they all of good cheer, and they also took some meat.

37. And we were in all in the ship two hundred threescore and sixteen souls.

38. And when they had eaten enough, they lightened the ship, and cast out the wheat into the sea.

39. And when it was day, they knew not the land: but they discovered a certain creek with a shore, into the which they were minded, if it were possible, to thrust in the ship.

40. And when they had taken up the anchors, they committed themselves unto the sea, and loosed the rudder bands, and hoisted up the mainsail to the wind, and made toward shore.

41. And falling into a place where two seas met, they ran the ship aground; and the forepart stuck fast, and remained unmovable, but the hinder part was broken with the violence of the waves.

42. And the soldiers' counsel was to kill the prisoners, lest any of them should swim out, and escape.

43. But the centurion, willing to save Paul, kept them from their purpose; and commanded that they which could swim should cast themselves first into the sea, and get to land:

44. And the rest, some on boards, and some on broken pieces of the ship. And so it came to pass, that they escaped all safe to land.

Golden Text: "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day" (II Tim. 1:12).

Catechism—Q. 49. Which is the Second Commandment? A. The Second Commandment is, Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth: thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them: for I the Lord thy God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me; and showing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments.

INTRODUCTORY.

We have been following the experiences of Paul before the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem, and before Felix, Festus and Agrippa at Caesarea, and have seen how he appealed from his unjust treatment to Caesar, and how it was arranged that he should be sent to Rome to receive the judgment of the emperor. In our lesson today, covering the whole of the twenty-seventh chapter, we see him on his long and perilous sea-voyage, ending up with the shipwreck, and the escape of all who were on the ship. We first find him delivered by Festus to Julius the Centurion, and starting in a ship. The ship first touched at Sidon, then sailed near Cyprus, and then stopped at Myra, a city of Lycia. Here the centurion found a ship of Alexandria that was sailing for Italy and he there transferred Paul. After slow sailing against rough winds and seas for many days, they came in this new ship to a place called Fair Havens. Here Paul told them they should not try to go any further, as it was stormy weather, and late in the season. But the ship authorities thought they knew more about it than Paul did and started out to reach Crete to winter in. A great storm broke and beat them about for two weeks, in which time all gave themselves up for lost, but Paul was encouraged by God, and gave assurances to the captain and cen-turion that they would all come through safely. It is a great description of a storm at sea we have here. At last they drive up close to land, and for fear of being dashed upon the rocks the anchors are thrown out to hold in the bottom of the sea until the storm should abate.

EXPOSITORY.

30-32. Here is an exhibition of selfishness and treacherousness and cowardice on the part of the sailors, who should have been willing to stay by the ship and manage it, so as to preserve the lives of the passengers. But, no, they were intent on saving themselves, and, so, pretending that they were attending to the anchors, they got together at the fore part of the ship, and commenced to get out the life-boat and let it down, that they might get away in it safely. But Paul was wide awake, and caught them at it, and reported it, so that the soldiers made a rush, cut the ropes, dropped the boat into the sea, and kept the sailors on oarboard. What difference did it make? If God had promised to save them all, could he not have done it even if the sailors had all run away? Think about it. If God gives us promises he expects us to observe all the conditions, whether it is being saved from a shipwreck, or in having our souls saved for all eternity.

33-36. Comparative safety having been reached, Paul insisted that they should all eat. In the tremendous storm they had all been overcome by fear, for one thing. It may have been, too, that it was impossible to get at the food and distribute it during the great commotion. It may have been, too, that they were too sea-sick for food to be taken. But now it was possible to eat, and Paul insists that they shall all eat. He gives them anew assurances of their personal safety, has the food distributed, and then gives thanks to God, as a religious leader, and shows his faith and gratitude to God as he leads the people to take food. It might be said that if God had promised to preserve them all he would do so even if they did not eat. But if God gives us promises he expects us to observe all the conditions, and, if we would be strong and well, we must eat. This is all a lesson in God's good providence. So the people ate and were encouraged. Paul showed himself a good friend and leader. Christianity cares for the bodies as well as for the souls of men.

37. The full and exact count is given. It shows that not one was lost. The very hairs of our heads are numbered. The full number of all on board is given and every one is saved. God is never short in his mercies. He does all that he promises to do, if we will let him do it.

38. After they had eaten, and had no further immediate use for the wheat, they lightened up the ship by throwing into the sea everything that was not immediately needed for preserving life.

39-44. Now they make the final effort to reach the land. They did not know what the name of the land was, but they saw by the light of the morning, that they might reach it. They could not stay out there in the sea much longer. The wind was blowing toward the land. So they ran up the sails for the wind to blow against. They cut the anchors loose and let them drop into the water and stay there. They loosed the rudder bands, so that they could guide the ship as well as they could by all. Some could swim and they were com-their last venture and were driven toward a little bay which they saw, and which they hoped to be able to reach. The wind drove them on. The ship struck aground, and began to go to pieces. The soldiers wanted to kill the prisoners, so that they might not escape, and they have the blame of it. But the centurion would not permit this, having particular regard for Paul, and so it was that the lives of all were preserved. God fulfilled his promise. He may be depended on. From the fury of the elements, and from the worse fury of still more savage men, God delivered Paul, and he is still delivering those who trust in him. Out through the waves the two hundred and seventy-six went from the ship to the land. God took care of them all. Some could swim and they were compelled to swim. Some made use of boards, and some got hold of broken pieces of the ship, but in some way, and by some means, each and all were saved, and reached land safely. There they found it was the island of Melita. So God takes care of all his people who put their trust in him, and after all the storms of life he will bring his people to heaven, their eternal home.

THE FIRST THANKSGIVING.

It was years and years ago,
Mid the winter's ice and snow,
That our sturdy old forefathers kept the first Thanksgiving Day;
What though hearts were sorely tried!
What though half of them had died!
"Let us make a feast together and give thanks to God," said they.

How the wilderness stretched round,
Without limit, without bound;
Filled with beasts of prey and savages who lurked to do them harm!
How the gray waves lashed with foam
Tossed between them and their home!
Stout of heart, they never faltered, safe in God's protecting arm,

And they labored and contested
Till from forest gloom they wrested Game and fowl in great abundance fit to grace the festive board.
And the snarling sea they plundered,
While its breakers roared and thundered,
For the fish to flank the wild fowl and the harvest's gathered board.

Then they sang with souls uplifted
Till the gloomy skies seemed rifted,
And heaven's glory shone upon them, filling all their hearts with cheer.
Let us read Time's yellow pages
For this story of the ages,
And like them in grateful praises sing the harvest of the year! —Ex.

TRY THANKSGIVING.

BY JANE BENNET HEILMAN.

Barbara was a plain, working girl in a rich family. She had come to the city from a comfortable farm home, where she had been taught thrifty habits and cleanly household duties. She had found a church home in the city, and, for weeks, slipped into the evening services, never missing the Young People's meeting.

One evening at a church social, the pastor's wife found Barbara sitting in a quiet spot, free from observation, where she could see the throng of happy people as they walked and talked.

"Why, Barbara," she said, "what are you doing here by yourself?"

Barbara turned a troubled face to the lady and replied: "Oh I am just thinking this may be my last look on earthly things. I go into the hospital tomorrow. The doctor tells me it is a dangerous operation, and that I may not come out alive from under the knife. I have written home, and now come here to be in church the last place. Though this is not a prayer-meeting, it is the house of God."

A long while the pastor's wife and the young woman talked in the quiet corner—of the wonderful power of God to hear and answer prayer—of his willingness to respond to the cry of his children, even before they ask sometimes; and when the time came for Barbara to leave, the pastor's wife said, "Go in peace, Barbara; daily I shall ask God for your life if it is his will, and for Christian fortitude and submission for your own heart."

The next day, Barbara entered the hospital, pale and calm, as goes the trusting heart who leans on the promises and the promiser. A few hours later, she lay in the white bed, quiet and still hovering between life and death, the surgeon and nurse watching in the shaded light for the first indication of life.

"I think she will live," at last said the surgeon, "It is remarkable, but I think she will live."

A few days of feverish suffering, then Barbara was allowed to see callers, and she had not a few. The Young People's Society sent her lovely flowers regularly, when they missed her from the meetings and learned where she was. A whispered word here and there sent the church ladies to the hospital, and, not even for a day, was Barbara allowed to feel that she was forgotten, though she possessed not many acquaintances in the big city church.

Barbara saw the power of loving consecration and giving of self in a changed light even to her faithful nature. She read it in the services of her nurses and the kind surgeon, it was plain to her in the daily fresh flowers, she saw it in the visits of the church people and in the attention of her lady, whose carriage stood before the hospital every day.

Barbara had heard the medical missionary talk in her church and heard her say there would be no hospitals and no missionaries if there were no Jesus; and so she meditated in the long hours while she lay upon her bed in the beautiful ward. She saw it all, as she afterwards said, just what thankfulness for the love of Jesus will actuate his followers to do.

Barbara arose from her illness a wiser young woman. She awoke to newness of life indeed. Her lady's carriage stood before the hospital one day for its last visit. When it drove away, Barbara sat on the back seat and the silent tears fell fast as she thanked God for her life.

One morning, a few weeks later, the pastor was in the study talking with a gentleman, when, hearing a low knock on the door, he opened it to find Barbara standing there with a tiny roll of money in her hand. "No, I can not come in, thank you pastor; I just want to hand you this. My bill at the hospital was much less than I expected. Everybody was so kind and God was so good that I must make this thank-offering to him," and she was gone.

When he was alone, the pastor began to look at the money he held in his hand, put on his hat and went home. When he saw his wife, he said, "There is a thank-offering; you may count it." She smoothed out the bills and saw three twenty-dollar bills and four ten-dollar bills. One hundred dollars!

Then the pastor told of Barbara's visit to the study, what she said, and why she wanted to give a thank-offering to God. "And to think, only yesterday, our missionary committee agreed to pray for the rich; and here our Father has made us ashamed in less than a week, and not with the rich," said the pastor's wife.

After three days, the pastor visited Barbara, thinking that, perhaps, in the joyous excitement of getting well, she had been led to imprudence, and said that if she had reconsidered the matter, it was not too late; but Barbara knew what she was doing. She was sure that God had spared her life, and though the money had been laid aside for her burial, should it be necessary, it must now go to the work of God.

With such really sanctified thanksgiving, there would never be any debt or deficit heard of in connection with any of our boards!

BETTY'S THANKSGIVING WISH.

She held the wishbone tight with me,
And pulled and won esultingly.
"Now, Betty, wish," I said, "for when You get the biggest half, why, then
The wish you wish will all come true.
Now wish, dear, as we told you to."
Then Betty looked with longing eyes
At all the dishes, nuts, and pies,
And, holding up the bit of bone,
She said, with triumph in her tone:
"All right. I wish tomorrow, then,
Would be Thanksgiving Day again."

PRAYER MEETING, NOV. 27.

Expanded Topic: Christian Progress Among the Immigrants. Isaiah 48:1-7.

As one of the departments of Home Missions we are called on to give special attention to what is being done, and what is possible to be done, for the religious welfare of the immigrants who are coming to make their homes in our country. We should be interested, as patriots, in their welfare, for they are to be our fellow-citizens, and, by their life and conduct, are to raise or lower the standards of morality, and of public safety in the land. As Christians we are to be deeply concerned, of course, in seeking their spiritual salvation and well-being.

All of this may be said to proceed from a selfish interest, as well as from a philanthropic and religious motive. For if these newcomers are immoral, irreligious and unsanitary in their lives, they will introduce dangers wherever they may locate and our own conditions will be under the menace which they introduce.

We are trying very hard in this country to raise the standards of life, in education and morals and religion, and it is possible for these standards to be greatly lowered by the incoming of millions of immigrants who have but little interest in the better side of things.

The new regulations as to immigration very considerably limit the number of those who are permitted to come, and thus, for a year or two, at least, we may be better able to assimilate the incoming population from other lands.

It is not from any feeling of narrowness, or bigotry, or selfish conceit, that we view the incomers. We are, all of us, late comers; a few score or hundreds of years measure off the time that most of us have been able to count this land as the home of ourselves and our ancestors. But many of the early settlers, and many of our ancestors, came here with high ideals, and it is not right, after these years of struggle and endeavor to make this a good and safe land, that we should surrender to those who would introduce lower and baser customs and thoughts and purposes of life. Let us keep on lifting. Let us help those who are ready to be helped, and let us exclude those whose presence in large numbers would be a menace.

We are glad for all the efforts to Americanize and evangelize those who are coming. It is a patriotic duty. It is a Christian duty. It is a work of humaneness and kindness. It must not be neglected. We must suffer as a nation if it is neglected, and the immigrants must suffer if they are not thus cared for.

Many of the immigrants come with merely sordid and material ideas. They want to better themselves in a material way. They want to escape the hard conditions of their previous life. But, even so, this is not so bad, as far as it goes, and, perhaps, these people are not to be altogether blamed if it does not go much farther. The very fact that they wish to better their conditions in any way, is an intimation that they may be ready for what is better in some ways of which they have never known before.

If we are interested in foreign missions, and we should be, trying to give the Gospel of Jesus Christ to all the people of the world, we have an excellent opportunity to do a part of this work on our shores. Some of those who come here will stay for only a time and will go back to their old homes. If they have been won for Christ and his service, they will go back to tell about the Gospel to their old friends, and to win them to him and his salvation. But if they do remain in our country permanently, we may call our work for them a very important part of home missions. The more surely these immigrants are led to be good Christians, the more surely will they be good citizens. Thus our work is for God, and for home, and for our native land.

MY THANKS.

BY LOUISE M. OGLEVEE.

This world is such a pleasant place,
I'm thankful every day
That God has let me come to it,
Some happy years to stay.

So many blessings he has sent
To make earth glad and fair,
And, best of all, he gives to me
Each day his loving care.

He gives me home and friends and food,
The Sabbath school I love—
Oh, I can't tell you half the things
He sends me from above.

So I am glad that once a year
We all can stop and say,
A whole day full of praise and thanks
Upon Thanksgiving Day. —Ex.

GODLINESS AND CONTENTMENT.

St. Paul said, "I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be content." There is no source of unhappiness worse than a complaining spirit. No matter what some people have, they complain because of something that is denied them. They have no contentment because they have no proper appreciation of their blessings. They cannot give thanks for what they have, because they want something else.

PRAISE OUR GOD.

We are rich in spiritual blessings. We have the open Bible, and the clear pathway to God in prayer. We have our churches, and our pastors to bring to us the message of truth from the Word of God. We have a Savior who can save unto the uttermost all who come unto God by him. We have a superintending Providence that watches over us. We have the Holy Spirit who is our Comforter, and the divine promise, "I will not leave you comfortless," from the Savior himself. We have the promise of eternal life with God in heaven. How we ought to thank God for these blessings!

THANKSGIVING IN ACTION.

The best outlet for thankfulness is to try to make others happy. Selfishness has no songs for this day, but he who follows the Christ will love for his fellow-men, as the best way to live for and to praise his God. We may not only on this Thanksgiving Day scatter the sunshine of joy and gladness, but make every day of the year full of abounding blessedness.—Rev. Edwin Whittier Caswell.

God of all comfort, thou!
Hear us and bless us now,
Our solace be;
Let every tear be dried,
Each heart be sanctified,
No throb of love denied—
We look to thee!

Largest School Makes Wonderful Offer to Ambitious Students

An opportunity that will be eagerly seized by ambitious music lovers, both young and old, is being extended this month by the largest school of its kind in America, the U. S. School of Music of New York City.

By an entirely new and amazingly simple and easy method for teaching music—a system originated by this institution—more than 250,000 pupils have been successfully trained in their own homes to play the Piano, the Violin, Mandolin, Banjo, Organ, Cornet, Harp, Sight Singing, Guitar, Cello, Clarinet, Trombone, Piccolo, Flute, Ukulele, Saxophone, Harmony and Composition, Voice and Speech Culture, Drums and Traps, etc.

At a recent meeting of the board of directors the school decided to accept a limited number of new pupils to whom full courses of instruction will be given without charge in order to further advertise this new system for teaching music by mail.

All those who apply at once will be enrolled. Instruction will be given them at practically no cost—the sum charged amounting merely to about the cost of sheet music, postage, etc. The school is located at 225 Fifth Avenue, New York City, and any one interested can obtain full particulars simply by addressing a postal to the President, Mr. D. F. Kemp, Dept. 3711.

Used for more than forty years. The benefit derived from it is unquestionable.

FOR more than a generation we have been receiving grateful testimony to the virtues of this thoroughly tested and proven treatment. It stops violent coughing, and difficult breathing, assuring restful sleep because the antiseptic vapor carries healing with every breath. Booklet 48 tells why the diseases for which Cresolene is recommended yield to this simple and dependable treatment.

PRAYER MEETING

NOVEMBER 23.

CAUSES OF THANKSGIVING.
Joel 2:21-27.

We must not forget that God, wonderfully revealed to us in the Holy Scriptures as our Creator, and still more wonderfully revealed to us as our Savior, in the person of Jesus Christ, is the God of Providence. In these three great departments he is good and gracious, and we are to adore him and love him and serve him day by day.

We must be careful not to accept the daily blessings of our lives as a mere matter of course. If we are in the right frame of heart and mind we will realize that every good gift is from above, coming to us from the right hand of God, and expressions of his tender interest in our welfare. God is behind and above all the laws and processes that we call "Nature," and it is he who causes all the events in our natural, daily life, as he provides for those whom he has called into existence.

It is a beautiful and happy thing to live in the sense of constant dependence upon God for all the blessings of life. We realize that he is not far from us and that we are not far from him. He remembers us and loves us and cares for us and provides for all our returning wants. Each day God's loving kindnesses and tender mercies crown our lives. Each night we lie down under his protection. Each morning we rise under his care. He is our God and he takes care of us.

It is an awful thing to live without the sense of God's personal love and goodness to us. Some persons claim to be actual atheists, theoretical atheists, denying that there is any God. They do not find any place for him in their lives, and they are so blind and so wicked that they say there is no God. There are some others who do not permit themselves to do so wicked a thing as to deny God's existence, but they are practically the same kind of persons as those who do. They live and talk and think just as if there were no God, and so are what we may call practical atheists. God is not in their thoughts; in any of them, or in all of them. God has no place in their lives.

The Christian is entirely different from all of these. He knows that God is in everything; around, and about and above and within his own life. He adores him as his Creator, and he trusts him as his Savior, and he is grateful to him as the one who is his provider and benefactor, doing good for him all the good that comes in his daily life.

Our President has called all the members of our nation to observe Thanksgiving Day in rendering thanks to God for his goodness. Our Governors join in this, as Presidents and Governors have been doing for many years. In this they are following the teaching of the Holy Scriptures, in which we find many a call to think of God as the author and supplier of the blessings of our daily life, and as the giver of every good and every perfect gift.

The prophet Joel in the passage before us speaks of God as the one who makes the trees yield their fruits, and the fields to produce their harvests, by sending the and the sunshine, and thus making the grain and the fruits to come abundantly to the people. He calls the people to consider that it is God, their personal friend and benefactor, who does all this, and he says that because he does it they are to know him and acknowledge him, and never be ashamed of him.

Each day should be a Thanksgiving day, in fact, although we only observe one day a year in a national way. We are to be loyal and patriotic each day in the year, although we have only one Fourth of July as a national celebration each year. God is the same every day of the year, and we should be grateful and loving and obedient every day of every year of our lives.

We should be grateful for the unnumbered material blessings of our lives, but especially should we be glad and grateful for the central and supreme manifestation of divine love, in the unspeakable gift, the Lord Jesus Christ.

THANKFUL TO GOD FOR ALL THINGS.

This is one of the tests of Christian character. It is not very difficult to be thankful for all these blessings we have enumerated, but it is difficult to be thankful for all things. To do that you need to look below the surface and see life as it touches eternity. A sorrow, for instance, enters your life. One of your precious flock is called home. "You long for the touch of a vanished hand and the sound of a voice that is stilled." It is much easier to be resentful to the Father than thankful, and that because you have not tried to view life from the other side nor from an unselfish viewpoint. "Thankful for all things." Aye, even for sickness and suffering and pain. Perhaps we were never nearer God than in the day of our trouble, and that alone is reason sufficient to call pain our friend. "Thankful for all things." Aye, even for adversity, for some failure of earthly plans, for a decreasing income. One of the sayings current among early Christians, most of whom were poor people, ran: "Godliness with contentment is great gain." Let us be thankful for sunshine and shadow, blessings given and blessings withheld, pleasure and pain. Thankful on this day to the Father for all things. Thankful that he did not give what he knew was not good.

THANKSGIVING.

"How sharper than a serpent's tooth to have a thankless child," said Shakspeare in referring to an earthly parent and an earthly child. No matter how much such a child may have to be thankful for, a child of God has far more for which he should give thanks.

There is no duty oftener enjoined in the Scriptures than that of giving thanks. But it should be considered a privilege rather than a duty. It should afford us pleasure and happiness.

PREAMBLE IN VERSE TO THE AMERICAN CONSTITUTION.

"These verses are an effort to put the Preamble of the Constitution into verse suitable for singing," says Sophia W. Browser, in a letter to the New York Herald:

We, people of this great United States,
In singleness of heart and loyalty,
In order that more perfect evermore
The union of the several states may be,
Do now ordain with heart and hand
This Constitution of our land.

In order to establish justice true,
And to insure for all tranquility,
In order to provide a sure defense,
A wholesome soundness, and stability.
We now ordain with heart and hand
This Constitution of our land.

In order to promote the general good,
Secure the blessings born of liberty,
And, not alone for us who frame these laws,
But for all those who after us shall be,
We now ordain with heart and hand
This Constitution of our land.

SELECT READINGS

Let not his praises grow
On prosperous heights alone;
But in the vales below
Let his great love be known.
Let no distress
Curb and control
My winged soul
And praise suppress.

—Richard Baxter.

The greatest blessings that come to us sometimes seem the smallest.

There is no enjoyment of blessings for which we have no gratitude.

The soil of the thankful heart brings forth the flowers of holiness.

A blessing is doubly blessed which is received with a thankful heart.

"Those who complain most, are most to be complained of."—Matthew Henry.

In our weakness how glorious to know that our God is almighty.

On Thanksgiving Day we should "strike a balance" to see if our blessings have not been greater than our disappointments.

"When all my hopes are gone,
'Tis well my hands must still keep toiling on for others' sake;
For strength to bear is found in duty done,
And he is blest who makes the joy of others heal his own heartache."

"Count your many blessings." This is the arithmetic of the thankful heart. It is easy to count our trials, but it is not worth while.

There is light in the densest darkness, and love in the keenest pain. Men have stood upon the graves of their dead and reached the hand of God.

The numberless mercies of God ought to keep us praising God. The poet sang:
"When will the growing numbers end?"
There can be no end to praise for there is no limit to the mercies of God.

Praise is contagious. A sunny spirit sets others locking for sunshine. one joyful singer starts a chorus of happy song.
A grateful soul warms the grouch out of the growler.

The ministry of the grateful soul is to the needy ones. The heavenly joy is at that shrine where we offer the incense of loving service to those who sit within the shadow weeping o'er the dead. To sing a song of hope is to walk in the footsteps of Jesus, and to taste the joy of the cross.

Confute with candor, where you can confute,
Reason and arrogance but poorly suit.
Yourself may fall before some abler pen,
Infallibility is not for men.
With modest diffidence new schemes
indite,
Be not too positive, though in the right.
—Thomas Campbell

It is noble to oblige. That man is great who forgets his sorrows and needs in the sorrows and needs of others. "How is your soul? some one asked of Wilberforce. The man replied, "I am so occupied with the cares of the oppressed that I do not have time to consider it."

Two things this old world needs—tenderness and cheer. All about us are hearts hungry for sympathy, for kindness.
Then everywhere are weary and discouraged ones, needing the uplift of hope to make them brave and strong enough to go forward to meet the future. We could do nothing better with our life than to consecrate it to a ministry of tenderness and encouragement. This is one of heaven's paths to happiness, for the merciful shall obtain mercy.—J. R. Miller.

There are false gods many. If in the honesty of your heart you were now to sit down and name your god what would it be, money, pleasure, popularity, appetite, dress; what would it be? A man should punctuate himself with many an interrogation point.

"Ere thou risest from thy bed,
Speak to God whose wings were spread
O'er thee in the helpless night—
Lo, he wakes thee now with light!
Lift thy burden and thy care
In the mighty arms of prayer."

Christianity is the greatest adventure ever set on foot. It has set itself to create the world anew. Christianity is a romance. It appeals to all who can give themselves away. Christianity is a mighty effort to build the City of God on earth; and it wants those who will labor on with their tools in one hand and their weapons in another in defiant and holy glee.—H.
Scott Holland.

THANKSGIVING

Gratitude to God for the blessings He has bestowed upon us during the past year—for the blessings of abundant harvests, civil order, the dawn of permanent peace, the growing Kingdom—is best expressed in contributing to the greater efficiency of those agencies through which God operates in the bestowal of these blessings. Among these agencies is Hanover College, from which has gone out for nearly a century a steady stream of persons and ideals leavening American society with the principles of the Kingdom of Christ.

GENERAL NEWS

AMERICA HONORS HER DEAD.

On Armistice Day, an unknown soldier, typical of the thousands who died for their flags, was buried with full military honors.

The unknown hero, recipient of the highest decorations in the gift of the allied governments, was laid to rest in Arlington Cemetery, while the President, Government officials, representatives of foreign governments and citizens throughout the entire United States, paused for two minutes of silent prayer.

ARMAMENT CONFERENCE RECEIVES UNEXPECTED PROPOSALS.

At the formal opening of the Armament Conference last Saturday, after a short address by President Harding, Secretary of State Hughes laid the United States proposal before the conference.

Secretary Hughes' proposals in brief are: A ten-year naval holiday and the United States. Great Britain and Japan shall scrap sixty-six capital ships, aggregating 1,878,043 tons.

Within three months after the conclusion of an agreement the United States would have 18 capital ships, Great Britain 22 and Japan 10. The tonnage of the three nations respectively, under such a plan, would be 500,650, 604,450 and 299,700.

Ships twenty years old might be replaced under the plan, and the replacement scheme is 500,000 tons for the United States, 500,000 tons for Great Britain and 300,000 for Japan. No replacement ships could exceed 35,000 tons.

The United States would scrap 30 capital ships, aggregating 843,740 tons; Great Britain, 19, aggregating 583,375 tons, and Japan, 17, aggregating 448,928 tons.

The figures include old ships to be scrapped, ships building or for which material has been assembled.

It is on this line that the conference will commence its discussion.

Comment by foreign diplomats and the foreign press generally was favorable to the proposal as a basis, though by many the belief was expressed that it is overbold.

THE WAR IS OVER.

Ratification of the German-American peace treaty were exchanged Nov. 11th, at the Berlin Foreign Office between Ellis Loring Dresel, Karl Wirth, Chancellor and Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Article III. of the peace treaty with Germany provides that the treaty "shall take effect immediately on the exchange of ratifications."

GOVERNMENT TO WAGE WAR ON MAIL ROBBERS.

President Harding and his Cabinet have ordered the marines to guard United States mails against bandits.

As many "Devil Dogs" as are needed for the service will be riding on every train and mail truck which carries valuable mail and stationed at every point where valuable mail is handled. They have instructions to shoot to kill.

Orders were telegraphed by Postmaster-General Will H. Hays and Major Le Jeune, commandant of the Marine Corps, instructing detachments of marines to report at once to Postmasters and Mail Superintendents at thirteen large cities, where the bulk of valuable mail is handled. They will be equipped for warfare and will guard the mails until a permanent force of more than 1,000 former service men who saw active fighting in the World War can be organized to take their places.

Coincident with the announcement of plans to wage military warfare against mail bandits, Postmaster-General Hays ordered the suspension of three leading officials in the New York City postoffice. They are charged with dereliction of duty in connection with the robbery of $1,000,000 worth of registered mail recently in the New York financial district.

GREAT SUMS TO BE SPENT FOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Recent sales of municipal bonds in thirteen states have totaled $60,000,000, and in addition $34,000,000 of the securities has been offered for sale, according to figures made public by the National Unemployment Conference.

In addition $10,000,000 in state bonds have been sold and a like amount offered for sale. These figures, it was explained in a statement, were compiled in connection with the studies made of the possibility of hastening public works as a measure of relief for the unemployment situation.

"The largest state bond sale," the statement said, "was Illinois, of $5,000,000 for highways. Michigan offered $4,000,000 bonds, also for highways, and $3,000,000 of these had been sold when figures were compiled, Oct. 31st. The state of Michigan also is offering $10,000,000 in bonds for the soldiers' bonus. Connecticut recently disposed of $2,000,000 in bonds. The rate of the state bonds was 4 per cent for Illinois, 5 per cent for Connecticut, 5.5 for the soldiers' bonus of Michigan, and 5.75 for that state's highway bonds.

"A wider variation of rate was shown in the municipal bonds. These ranged from 4 per cent as in the Chicago issue of $1,500,000 for park improvements, to 7 per cent for the $1,000,000 in school bonds being offered at Hibbing, Minn., but the majority were six per cent bonds.

BASE FOR ARCTIC PARTY ESTABLISHED.

Vilhjalmur Stefansson, Arctic explorer, has announced that a party he had sent from Nome, Alaska, to Wrangel Island, one hundred miles north of Siberia, to establish a base for what he said would be a huge British exploring party into the North, had arrived safely at its destination.

In making the announcement, Mr. Stefansson said the safe arrival of the party on Wrangel Island had made it possible for him to discuss certain of the plans under consideration.

There are six men in the Wrangel Island party, he explained, all of whom were picked for the expedition because of heroism or especial initiative shown on previous expedition with him. The party left Nome secretly last September. "I financed and sent the expedition into the North," Mr. Stefansson said.

The work of the six men will be confined entirely, he stated, to arranging the base for the big British party, which, he stated, will be formed in Canada or England in March. Beyond saying that it is planned to make the British party one of the most extensive exploring expeditions that ever went into the North, Mr. Stefansson refused to divulge details.

VOTING IN KENTUCKY.

Election day in Kentucky was far from peaceful. Fighting at the polls cost eleven lives in addition to the wounding of twelve persons.

Eight persons are dead and five wounded following a fight precipitated soon after the polls opened at the Clayhole voting precinct on Troublesome Creek, Breathitt County.

At Auburn George W. Pottinger, vice-president of the Bank of Auburn, was shot in the leg by Deputy Sheriff Barclay Dial in a fight resulting from an election dispute. He was not wounded seriously.

In Louisville Patrolman Bennett Gardner, during a quarrel with Harry Ross, fired several shots. One shot struck and seriously wounded Ross and another struck Mrs. Lillian Collins, sixty-four years old.

At Ravenna one man is dead and two are wounded seriously as a result of an altercation at a voting place.

P. F. Wolfmarger, Republican candidate for Sheriff at Estell County, was shot five times by Floyd Winkler, thirty-five years old. Wolfmarger's son Jeff saw the shooting, following which he shot and killed Winkler, and a bystander was hit above the heart by a stray bullet and is in a serious condition.

It is President Harding's policy to develop Alaska, the Senate Committee on Territories, was informed last week, by Secretary Albert B. Fall, of the Interior Department, and Senator Harry S. New, of Indiana, Republican, Chairman of the committee, during hearings on bills to consolidate Government activities in that territory.

"I am not violating any confidence," Secretary Fall said, "when I say that it is the President's policy to open up Alaska, and that he intends to direct all possible effort to that end."

Premier Lloyd George's speech at the annual Lord Mayor's dinner at Guild Hall, brimmed with optimism.

Hailing the world recovery from the depression following the war, declaring that the nations of the world are settling down to business, acclaiming the Washington conference as the greatest event in history, and asserting that a settlement of the Irish question which will keep Ireland within the empire is nearer than ever, the Premier aroused great enthusiasm.

"We are now at the most critical stage of the negotiations," he declared, "and all parties must give and take."

President Harding has asked the American public to give liberal support to the annual campaign of the Red Cross for relief contributions which begins on Armistice Day and continues for two weeks.

The call of the Red Cross, the President said in a formal statement, should be regarded as "the call of the country and humanity." He set aside Nov. 13 as "Red Cross Sunday," and requested that churches throughout the land devote that day to emphasizing "the gospel of service."

Nikolai Lenine, Soviet Premier, made the fourth anniversary of the Soviet Republic the occasion of an article in an anniversary number issued by the Pravda, in which he predicts the world chase for gold will result in wars between America and Japan or America and England by 1925 or 1928.

From the number of times Bolsheviki agitators have made this prediction, it is apparent that they wish it were true.

Recommendation that the United States Railroad Labor Board be changed from its present form of three representatives each from the carriers, employes and public, to a board of five persons representing the public, was among the changes in the administration of the railroads considered by the National Industrial Traffic League, representing many shippers of the country.

Other changes suggested were that in disputes where shippers were affected the shippers should be heard; that no decisions should be given to the board without consultation with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that certificates of convenience and necessity be not required where a railroad operates in one State only.

The Legislative Committee of the League, which drafted the proposed changes, also recommended that the power of States over railroads be preserved, subject only to the right of the Interstate Commerce Commission to remove unjust discriminations upon specific complaints.

The much-revised tax revision bill finally was passed by Senate last week. It still must run the gantlet of the Senate and House conferees before it reaches the President.

The vote was thirty-eight to twenty-four, three Republicans—La Follette, Moses and Norris—voting against the bill, and one Democrat, Broussard, supporting it.

As now drawn the bill is estimated by Treasury experts to yield $3,250,000,000 for the fiscal year ending next June 30th, or $200,000,000 less than the existing law.

If all of the changes proposed become effective, however, the measure ultimately will reduce the nation's tax bill by $750,000,000 a year.

President Harding is being urged to issue a blanket order suspending all naval construction in the United States while the conference on limitation of armaments is in session.

The Attorney-General is to render an opinion as to whether the President has authority to stop work which is being done by act of Congress.

Retail food prices decreased between Sept. 15th and Oct. 15th, in nine of the eleven principal cities from which reports were received, the Department of Labor announced.

In Milwaukee there was a decrease of 3 per cent; in Chicago, Detroit and Indianapolis, a decrease of 2 per cent; in Peoria and St. Louis, a decrease of 1 per cent; in Bridgeport and Minneapolis, a decrease of four-tenths of 1 per cent; in Newark, a decrease of one-tenth of 1 per cent. In Columbus there was no changes during the month. For the year period, Oct. 15, 1920, to Oct. 15, 1921, there was a decrease of 26 per cent in Mobile, 25 per cent in Detroit; 24 per cent in Minneapolis and St. Louis; 23 per cent in Chicago, Indianapolis, Milwaukee and Peoria, 22 per cent in Bridgeport and Newark, and 21 per cent in Columbus.

The Bolshevik prisons in Russia have been ordered to be opened for release of thousands of persons, in celebration of the anniversary of the revolution, but according to a wireless message from Moscow, hundreds of important political prisoners, for whose release or commutation of sentence Russians abroad had hoped for, do not come under the amnesty.

While the absolute release of certain classes or great reduction in their sentences have been arranged, the decree announced that this is not applicable in the case of "those sentenced for participation in White Guard plots, espionage, open armed revolts, or in the case of the leaders of anti-Soviet political parties.

Temporary lease of power plant No. 2, of the Muscle Shoals, Ala., project to the Alabama Power Company, was announced by Secretary John W. Weeks.

The lease was made in order that the Alabama company might supply power principally to mills in Georgia, Alabama and the Carolinas, which have been forced to close down because of drouth in those states.

Although plant No. 2 is a part of Muscle Shoals project for which the Secretary is negotiating with Henry Ford for permanent disposal by the Government, it was said, the report submitted by an investigating board strongly recommended its immediate leasing to the Alabama Power Company.

Steps to halt the release of imported liquor from custom houses and bonded warehouses pending scrutiny and proper approval of withdrawal permits are under consideration by Commissioner Roy Haynes and prohibition and customs officials.

Action is to be taken, officials say, to prevent imported liquor being withdrawn upon forged permits or irregular papers. Prohibition headquarters, it is stated, has detected eight forged Pennsylvania permits on which approximately 2,000 cases of imported whisky, gin, champagne and cordials recently were released at New York.

"There does not exist any military or naval agreement, understanding or arrangement of any sort between England and Japan not rising from the terms of the Anglo-Japanese treaty," said Prime Minister David Lloyd George, in the House of Commons, last week. This statement was made in answer to a question whether, in view of the impending Washington conference, he would state if any supplemental arrangement existed.

Wine supposedly made for sacramental purposes, and valued at more than $500,000, was seized when fourteen Federal prohibition agents descended upon a winery in East Third Street, New York, confiscated 5,556 barrels of the fermented liquor and arrested six men for alleged violation of the Volstead act.

Premier Hara was stabbed to death last Friday at a railroad station in Tokyo. Premier Hara was one of the most prominent men in the public life of Japan's capital, and his death, it is said, may mean a political crisis in the Orient.

Births recorded in the "birth registration area" during 1920 totaled 1,508,874, the Public Health Service announced, exceeding deaths by 672,720.

The birth rate showed a relative increase of 7.6 per cent over 1919.

The registration area now includes twenty-three states, comprising 58 per cent of the national population.

of the proposed railroad strike, feel that there remains an uncertainty in the situation which will continue to be a depressing factor for a considerable length of time. While it has relieved the strain of nervous tension, yet the evil and uncertainties remain and can not help but retard business progress.

William E. (Pussyfoot) Johnson, of the Anti-Saloon League, is being received with honors usually accorded to royalty, dispatches from India say.

President Harding received the honorary degree of Doctor of Law from William and Mary College Oct. 19th, at exercises of installation of Dr. J. A. C. Chandler as President of the institution.

In cap and gown Mr. Harding, in an address, appealed for increased patriotic attention to the national educational system and praised the part played in American history by the institution, which is the second oldest college of the country and among whose graduates are three Presidents of the United States.

New Yorkers who often pretend to be indifferent to the city's wonders, have been stirred by the daring plan, announced last week, to extend Manhattan Island six miles down the bay by building mammoth sea walls from both sides of the Battery and filling in the intervening space with earth.

A company has been incorporated to carry out the project, and T. Kennard Thompson, an engineer, has prepared the plans. The Broadway Association, composed of merchants along the famous thoroughfare, has indorsed the idea.

If the plan is carried out its proponents say that six square miles would be tacked onto the most valuable piece of land on earth; that twelve miles of needed docks would be added to the port's facilities; that transit would be improved, and that the tax on all real estate might be reduced 1 per cent.

The plan already has been outlined to the War Department, Mr. Thompson says, and no objections have been raised, since the proposed extension still would leave on either side of the island the same clearness for navigation that now exists on the Hudson and East River sides.

The work could be completed, its advocates say, in five years.

THANKSGIVING.

Thanksgiving should be a day of gladness and of good cheer. The thought of going home to Thanksgiving makes the heart glow in anticipation of happy reunions. The Thanksgiving dinner may be a "harvest feast," displaying in variety the products of the farm; an object lesson, teaching us to recognize the good hand of our God who has abundantly blessed our labor.

MENU.

Salsify Soup
Smothered Chicken—Gooseberries
Fricatelli—Jellied Apples
Brown Bread—White Bread
Cream Salad
Sweet Pickles—Sour Pickles
Potatoes—Onions—Squash
Pudding—Pie
Fruit—Nuts
Coffee

Salsify Soup.—Wash and quickly scrape eight or ten large roots and keep them under cold water until ready to slice. Slice them crosswise into enough boiling water to cover, and add a small piece of nice salt codfish. When tender, take out the fish, put into the kettle a quart of milk, a rounded tablespoonful of butter, thicken with a tablespoonful of cornstarch dissolved in half a teaspoonful of sweet cream. Add a dash of pepper and serve with oyster crackers, crisp from the oven.

* * *

Smothered Chicken.—Dress and joint two large spring chickens, cut the breast crosswise into three sections, or two if the fowl is small. Place pieces in layers in a deep baking pan, reserving the gizzard, neck and back, and season each layer with salt and pepper. Sift over the top a thin layer of flour, cover with sliced canned tomatoes, dot with bits of butter (using at least two-thirds of a teacupful), pour into the pan a quart of boiling water, set in the oven, cover closely and bake. When tender, uncover and brown. Boil the gizzards, back and neck pieces, strain the liquor thicken with browned flour, and just before setting it upon the table drop in a heaped teaspoonful of butter. Serve with canned green gooseberries.

* * *

Fricatelli.—Soak one and three-quarters pounds of pickled pork over night in cold water, chop it very fine and season liberally with pepper. Add two small onions chopped, half as much in quantity of bread soaked in milk until soft, and the yolks of two eggs. With floured hands shape into round or oblong patties and fry brown on both sides in a spider with a very little fat. Arrange on a platter and garnish with tiny pickled cucumbers, and serve with jellied apples.

* * *

Jellied Apples.—Butter a large earthen or granite pudding dish, fill it with layers of thinly-sliced tart apples, sprinkling each layer with a tablespoonful of sugar and a dash of cinnamon. Pour in a pint of cold water, cover with a well-buttered plate that will press a little upon the apples. Set the dish into another containing boiling water and bake three hours in a moderate oven. When cold it will tuck from the dish like jelly. This can be made the day before it is to be served.

* * *

Brown Bread.—At night, to a quart of warm water add half a teacupful of sugar, a yeast cake dissolved in warm water, and a very little salt. With entire wheat flour, make a batter so stiff that it will hold a tablespoon upright in the center. Fill baking tins half full, set on the reservoir nearly full of hot water, cover, and in the morning it will be risen double and ready to bake. The water in the reservoir should not be so hot as to scald the bottom of the pans.

* * *

Cream Salad.—Chop finely a head of cabbage and sprinkle lightly with salt. Mix well together a tablespoonful each of cornstarch, sugar and butter, add a beaten egg, half a teacupful each of cream and vinegar, and cook in a double boiler until smooth and creamy. Pour this dressing over the cabbage, mix with a silver fork and dust a little pepper over the top. Serve any time within twenty-four hours.

* * *

Sweet Pickled Grapes.—Pack in a jar small clusters of ripe grapes, taking care that no grape is loosened from its stem. Fill the jar with cold, sweetened sugar (three pounds of sugar to a quart of vinegar). Add spices, tied in a cheesecloth bag, if liked.

* * *

Potatoes Baked.—Pare rather large potatoes and bake them a nice brown. The bottom of the oven or grate upon which they are baked should be spick-span clean.

* * *

Onions Boiled.—Cut a slice from each end, drop into briskly boiling water, cook fifteen minutes, skim out, drain, and when perfectly cold peel and boil tender, but not so as to break. Arrange on a platter, in the center of each put a bit of butter, and serve hot.

* * *

Squash Steamed.—Cut a hard-shelled winter squash into several sections, put in a steamer shell side uppermost. When tender, remove the soft part with a spoon, season with salt, pepper and butter, and cream if very dry. Arrange in a mound, flatten the top and place on it a piece of butter.

* * *

Peach Compote.—Carefully, with a spoon, remove the fruit from canned peaches, and arrange them in a glass dish. To the juice add sugar and boil to the consistency of honey and pour over the fruit. Beat the whites of two eggs with a teacupful of powdered sugar, spread over the top, and dry but not brown by placing in the oven with the doors open.

* * *

White House Pudding.—Soak two teacupfuls of fine, dry breadcrumbs in a quart of milk. Rub a tablespoonful of butter into a teacupful of sugar, stir this to a cream with the beaten yolks of five eggs, and mix with the bread crumbs and milk. Add a scant tablespoonful of lemon, rose of vanilla extract. Fill a pudding dish (it should not be more than two-thirds full) and bake until well set. Without removing entirely from the oven, cover the top with strawberry, plum, or any conserve, spread over a meringue made of the whites of the eggs and sugar, and brown. To be served cold.

* * *

Pumpkin Pie.—To each teacupful of sifted pumpkin add a beaten egg, scant teacupful of sugar, pinch of salt, two-thirds teaspoonful of ginger and a pint of milk. Pour into a large, deep pie tin, dot with bits of butter, dust over cinnamon and bake in a quick oven until nicely browned.

* * *

Place in the center of the table a pretty dish of red and golden apples tastefully arranged. In the absence of silver nut-picks, horseshoe nails will do excellent service. With the nuts serve salt as a hygienic accompaniment as well as appetizer.

A most interesting feature of "Thanksgiving Day" is a side table on which are exhibited, as far as may be, all the products grown upon the farm during the year. Children will be especially interested in gathering and arranging. A bouquet of green or ripened wheat, oats, rye, with specimens of the grain, a white, red and yellow ear of corn, turnip, carrot, cabbage, etc., an apple of every kind, quince, grapes, winter pears, nuts, etc. Such a display will tend to silence the cry of "hard times" and incite to devout thanksgiving.—Ex.

POT ROAST WITH YORKSHIRE PUDDING.

Select a three-pound cut of meat, a Boston roast, cut from the brisket, or thick part of the shin of beef. Wipe the meat and tie securely into shape. Melt a piece of suet in an iron cooking kettle, and when melted add the meat and brown nicely. Add one-half cup of boiling water and cover closely, and cook very slowly. Turn and shake the meat occasionally. When tender, about one-half hour before serving, make the desired amount of gravy, and then turn the kettle into another saucepan. Now add one-half cup of melted suet. Do not remove the meat, and while the suet is heating place in a mixing bowl, one and one-quarter cup of milk, one teaspoon of salt, one-half teaspoon of white pepper, pinch of thyme, one egg, one and three-quarters cup of flour, two level teaspoons of baking powder.

Beat to a smooth mixture, and then turn into the kettle and pour all around the meat. Close the kettle and place in a moderate oven for one-half hour. Remove the lid after ten minutes and bake, and then keep the gravy hot.

To serve, lift the meat and loosen the pudding from the sides and turn from the kettle. Serve with gravy.

DON'T BLAME COFFEE.

If the flavor of your coffee isn't right, or if it is muddy or too weak, don't blame the brand of coffee that you use. That is, don't blame it until you have made perfectly sure that your method of making coffee is what it should be. Good coffee must be made in a clean coffee pot. It is not enough to rinse out the coffee pot every day. Every few days it should be washed very thoroughly in hot soapsuds and water, and then allowed to dry in the open air, preferably in the sunlight. If you use an electric percolator, or other type of coffee pot that can not be put right into the dishpan, an excellent plan is to wash it in the usual way, then fill it with water to which you add a teaspoonful or more of borax, and let it boil for five or ten minutes. Then rinse it thoroughly and let it dry in the open. The point is to rid it perfectly of the taint of coffee which, in the course of time, becomes stale in the coffee pot and ruins the flavor of any new coffee infusion you may make.

Don't blame the coffee if you start making breakfast coffee three quarters of an hour before breakfast; fifteen minutes is to be the maximum. Don't blame the coffee if you serve it with skim milk or with just ordinary milk. For some reason coffee served in this way never tastes right. If you must use plain milk, boil it. Evaporated milk is a boon to many coffee drinkers, as it has the richness of cream and is much less expensive. A little can that may be bought for five or six cents may be kept easily from two or three days if it is poured out of the tin on opening, and this will be sufficient for three persons for breakfast two days.

A very easily prepared dainty is hot-buttered scones, spread with gooseberry jam or orange marmalade. Place in a bowl four cups of sifted flour, one teaspoon of salt, three level teaspoons of baking powder, two level tablespoons of sugar.

Sift to mix, and then rub half a cup of good shortening into the prepared flour. Now place one cup of milk and one egg in a small bowl and beat well to mix. Use one cup of this mixture to form a dough. Knead until smooth, and then divide into five pieces, and form each piece round and as large as a small tea plate. Cut in four wedge or pie-shape pieces, and brush with egg and milk mixture left in the small bowl, and sprinkle lightly with granulated sugar. Place on a greased baking sheet and bake for twenty minutes in a hot oven. Split and butter lightly. Lay on a napkin and send to the table.

These scones are delicious, especially when served with the sweet dairy butter, and then spread with the orange marmalade. If spread with gooseberry jam, they are especially good.

Roger W. Babson, the famous statistician, author of the widely read book, "Foundations of Prosperity," has said:

"The great need at the present time is not for more railroads, or for more steamships or more factories or more cities, but for more character.

"To develop the character, we must start in the home, school and church when the children are young."

In his book on "Human Behavior in Relation to the Study of Educational, Social and Ethical Problems," Dr. Stewart Paton comments upon the mental peculiarity of the Anglo-Saxon which leads him to make the greatest effort to provide generously for the pauper, the insane, and the criminal, while he does little to find out and eliminate the causes which produce them.

In this country we are spending approximately $3,500,000 a day upon our criminal classes—and at the same time leaving 4,000,000 of our little ones to their own devices during their most impressionable years, when they should be receiving kindergarten training in industry, honesty, fair play, and self-control.

"Alcohol first impairs the most delicate part of the mental machinery—that which has been most recently and fragilely built up in the evolution of character; the moral part."

AUTOMOBILES, JEWELRY AND ART.

The Internal Revenue Bureau, reports that the total outlay on automobiles the past year was $1,675,760,800, as against $2,008,665,080 in 1920, and on jewelry $486,078,100, as against $517,372,140 in 1920.

In the field of art the curtailment was heavy, the amount spent for pianos and musical instruments dropped from $273,582,420 in 1920, to $231,358,620 in 1921, and the national bill for sculpture, paintings and statuary falling off from $15,431,330 in 1920, to $11,163,370 in 1921.

SINGING IN THE HOME.

BY ELISE U. EATON.

Those who were fortunate enough to see the all-star performance of Hartley Manners' "Out There," which was given for the benefit of the Red Cross during the world war, will never forget the effect produced upon the audience in the hospital scene when "aunted Annie" (Laurette Taylor) sang "Rock-a-bye-baby" to a few wounded soldiers; until one by one, they ceased tossing and turning and fell asleep.

There is a human sympathy and a spiritual uplift induced by the singing of beautiful melodies, and the craving for music is part of the heritage of every normal person. Why is it then, that present day parents are so neglectful of this educative force, so careless of the necessity for laying the foundations of artistic appreciation in the impressionable years? Why do so few mothers and fathers nowadays sing either to or with their children the songs which combine fine sentiment and really good music to offset the current atrocities which masquerade as melody? What has become of the parents who used to sing the nursery songs and other good melodies to their babies, and follow them with a wider range of music as the children grew older and needed it? Where are the grandmothers who knew all the fine old hymns and ballads and were not afraid to let their voices be heard by admiring youth? Where, oh, where are the modern children who are brought up on anything but ragtime or jazz?

As a nation we are losing the power of expressing ourselves in song, and the younger generation is losing all the joy and cultural value of being brought up in households where music is as much a daily habit as speech, and father, mother and children sing separately or en masse as regularly as they eat and sleep.

Nothing can take the place of the child of the living human voice as a musical medium. In no other way than by listening and trying to copy can he so easily be taught to sing himself. There is no fund of memories in later years which will yield him such rich treasure as those connected with the music of his childhood, provided it has been made by mother, father, and the rest of the family.

Whatever the reason for the disappearance of singing in the home, be it lack of time, fancied lack of ability, the prevalence of the "record" or the family exodus to the "movie" every evening, the songless condition of the modern household is a national menace and should be remedied without delay if we want to do what we can to bring back to the world some of the old grace and charm and peace of the days that are gone.

If every mother and father would resolve to spend ten minutes a day singing with and to their children, preferably the songs of their own childhood, I venture to predict that in a few years there would be a marked change in the too often insolent, modern attitude of many children towards their elders, and that we should not hear so much as we now do of the bad manners of young people. Music still hath its charms, and a mother's music is a charm which ought to surround a child's life from babyhood, be a delightful and living memory in later years and an inspiration to do likewise, when the time comes, for the new generation.—Ex.

PUMPKIN PIE.

BY TED ROBINSON.

The skies they are ashen and sober; the leaves they are crispen and sere. As Poe has remarked, 'tis October—and 1921 is the year. To Poe, 'twas a season of sorrow, a season to weep and to sigh—the trouble that guy used to borrow! But Poe didn't know Pumpkin Pie!

The skies may have got somewhat duller, and some of the leaves have been shed; but the woods are a riot of color, the forests are golden and red, and there 'mid the stalks lie the pumpkins, those globes that are gorgeous with gold! Why weep that the weather is chilly? Why mourn for the summertime's doom? There's nothing so perfectly silly as greeting the autumn with gloom. Forget we the frosts that annoy us, forget we the hue of the skies—let's think of the season as joyous, the season of sweet Pumpkin Pies!

Oh, slice for me generous slices! Of each varied sort I am fond. There's some like 'em darkened with spices, while some like 'em soothing and blonde. But pies are like women, dear brothers—there may be a difference in worth, and some may be sweeter than others, but all are the cream of the earth. Don't make it too spicy, like mustard; don't go to the other extreme, and make it too much like mere custard—and all Pumpkin Pie is a dream!

The Spaniard with chili is smitten; French pastry was made for the Frank; plum pudding's the prize of the Briton—but pie is the joy of the Yank. And apple pie, peach pie or plum pie may hold us from springtime till fall—but then comes the pie that is some pie—the Pumpkin is king of them all.

But listen, ye ladies who make it, to the plea of a pie-loving man. Whatever you do, never bake it in a shallow, inadequate pan! Two inches is fair—three is better. The price of the fruit isn't steep; and if you would make me your debtor, you'll build your pie more than nose-deep! Oh, be neither niggard nor sloven! And bake it full time—but just stop, when you, as you open the oven, can see a brown film o'er the top. We'll eat it with forks, at the table, in view of politeness' demands—but too! when it's cold, and we're able to pick up a wedge in our hands! To just hold our breath lest we smother, and bite in clear up to our eyes! O nectar—O rapture—O mother! O acme of food—Pumpkin Pies!—Ex.

HIS ONLY COURSE.

A certain Virginian was well known as a delightful raconteur. This gift made him not only a welcome guest, but a valuable member of his own home circle, for it is related that at a dinner party which he was giving to some friends his old darky butler whispered to him in a perfectly audible undertone:

"Sub, yo' must tell another story. The second course won't be ready for five minutes yet."

A WELL-TRAINED HORSE.

A man who wanted a horse for general use explained to a dealer that he wished to buy a nice, quiet, good-looking animal that could be driven by his wife and that would not object to being hitched up to a lawn mower.

After listening attentively for some moments, the dealer, with the utmost gravity, finally inquired:

"And would you like him to wait at the table, sir?"

IMPORTANT IF TRUE.

An American who has spent much time in London tells a story to illustrate what he calls the condescending attitude of the British public toward art and artists and its equally marked reverence for birth.

A relative of Swinburne's was showing some ladies miniatures of the poet's titled relatives. One of the ladies, after studying a miniature of Lord Ashburnham, turned to her daughter and said:

"My dear, I had no idea Swinburne was so well connected. Remind me, when next we are at Mudie's to buy his works."

Fifty-Fifty—A man from the East had on one occasion partaken of a celebrated brand of sausage made in the West, and was so pleased with its flavor that he endeavored to find out the trade secret of its composition. To the repeated requests of the Easterner for information the manufacturer finally said, with an affection of matter-of-factness:

"It's very simple. The chief ingredients are rabbit and horse."

"Rabbit and horse!" repeated the other, in amazement. "You don't mean to tell that you use horse meat in the preparation of this sausage?"

"Yes, but not exclusively," said the manufacturer, with a grin. "It's fifty-fifty—one horse and one rabbit."

True Politeness.—Dickie's father was shocked to see his son kick his little playmate.

"Why did you kick John?" he asked, severely.

"I am tired of playing with him. I want him to go home," was Dickie's answer.

"Then why didn't you ask him to go home?"

"Oh"—it was Dickie's turn to be shocked—"why, daddy, that wouldn't be polite!"

The book has been written on the assumption that the week-day church school movement is more than an experiment; therefore, the author evaluates the movement in its entirety, as well as in its various forms in different communities.

"The literature on this subject is growing, and fortunate is the man who does not let the movement get too far ahead of his thinking."—Michigan Christian Advocate.

OUR EXCHANGES

A GOOD AVERAGE.

While ministers of the Gospel who tower above their fellows are much less numerous than they were a generation ago, the rank and file, the general average, stands much higher than it did. The most worthy are they who care least for the applause of men.—The Lutheran.

WAR AND PEACE.

If the world will resolve not to have another war until the recent one is paid for a long peace will be assured.—Greenville Piedmont.

CHURCH ATTENDANCES.

Surveys of church attendance in Pittsburgh and in Duluth showed in both cities large attendance of men and wage-earners, too! In Duluth, 47 per cent of church audiences were found to be males and 81 per cent were wage-earners. The Duluth Herald comments on it by declaring that people are more than ever allied to religious influences, including working people. It is, indeed, the church's great opportunity for evangelism.—Eastern Methodist.

RAILROAD RATES.

Railroad rates must come down. That is absolutely inevitable. But unless the railroads are given the power to control their employes and to make their rate of wages fit the present conditions and the lower freight and passenger rates that must be given to the country, they will encounter great difficulties in carrying out a lowering of rates.—Manufacturers' Record.

A PRESCRIPTION.

The way to get religion into politics is to get religion into politicians. As a panacea for the civic ills of the times we offer to our politicians the old-time Methodist "mourner's bench."—Methodist Protestant.

EXPENSIVE MUSIC

"Daddy," pleaded the sweet young thing, "can't I have an automobile? You can buy one for a song?" "Yes," said her parent, "and I know what that song will be—"Over the Hill to the Poorhouse."—Country Gentleman.

SIMILAR.

"Did you ever hear anything so perfectly wonderful?" exclaimed the daughter of the house, as the phonograph ground out the last notes of the latest thing in jazz. "No," replied her father, "I can't say I have, although I once heard a collision between a truck-load of empty milk cans and a freight car with live chickens."—Judge.

A GLOOMY OUTLOOK.

Without some reduction in the burden of armaments, it will be exceedingly difficult for the world to recover from its present distress. If another protracted conflict between great powers comes within the next few years, it is quite likely that the whole structure of civilization will go to smash.—Times-Star.

PROHIBITION AND UNEMPLOYMENT.

It is highly unreasonable to point to prohibition as one of the causes of the existing unemployment. Great Britain, the drinker's paradise, has a larger proportion of unemployment than dry America. The sober fact is that prohibition is greatly mitigating the distress which always follows unemployment.—Christian Advocate.

THE MINISTER'S ASSISTANT.

Most ministers would consider themselves fortunate to have an assistant who would visit periodically all the families of the congregation, keep the members informed on the general work of the Church at home and in the foreign field, plead the claims of worthy causes, uphold the hands of the minister and bring messages of comfort and cheer to his people. Only the larger and wealthier congregations, however, are able to provide such a helpmate for their pastors. The great majority of our ministers have no pastoral assistance apart from the voluntary help of men and women whose time is necessarily very fully occupied in their daily work.

It is such a situation that the Church paper offers its services, not as an occasional helper on special occasions, but as a weekly visitor to all the homes of the congregation. The influence of such an agency in the moulding of the life of the home and in arousing and maintaining interest in the great enterprises of the Church is beyond calculation.—Presbyterian Witness.

Thanksgiving at BLACKBURN COLLEGE

Carlinville, Ill.

We have so much to be thankful for at Blackburn just now that it is hard to even begin enumerating.

First of all though is the wonderful spirit that pervades the student body. There are no finer young people anywhere. It surely is a great pleasure to work with and for them.

Then there is the large number of friends who share in making this work possible.

And we must add also the progress made for a larger future. The Central Heating plant is just being completed. This was necessary before another building could be erected.

We trust that before the year has passed we shall have cause to be thankful for a new dormitory. Who will build it?

CEASING FROM WAR.

The Conference for the Limitation of Armaments, which met at Washington City on Nov. 11, has gone about its work in a way to really surprise the people of the world, and greatly to the gratification of all sensible and well-disposed persons. The Conference, with delegates from the leading countries, after being opened with an exceedingly straightforward and practical address by President Harding, and an earnest prayer by Mr. Abernathy, pastor of the First Baptist Church of Washington City, elected Hon. C. E. Hughes as chairman and listened to a paper from him in which he laid down the wishes of the United States in the matter of the Conference.

The proposition was as plain and positive as could well be, for the immediate limitation of the navies of these countries, to what is necessary for police purposes, and in proportion to the present relative strength of these countries and their present navies. The other nations at once expressed their readiness to agree to this, and word has already been sent to Great Britain which suspends the work on great ships which are being built. Of course, many details must be studied out and agreed to, but it is a most gratifying thing to know that the great nations are really ready to get together on a plan which will lift the heavy burden of naval construction from the necks of the people; and, further along, all great martial burdens; and finally, all wars; and leave the world agree to do its legitimate work for the relief and comfort and well-being of all the people, in educational, sanitary, social, religious and ameliorating accomplishments.

President Harding said that the work before the Conference was that of preparing to do away with oppressive armaments, and, finally, with war itself. This is not, at all, an impossible thing. Men are not all regenerate, but this does not make impossible the doing away with some of the worst crimes. Men are not all regenerate in our own country, but, all the same, dueling is outlawed, and the carrying of concealed weapons, and difficulties are settled by courts instead of on the streets with bare fists or deadly weapons. It is just as feasible for nations to do away with war as it is for the people of a civilized country to get along without dueling.

There is a common-sense and Christian way for countries to deal with one another in these matters. Any good woman, or minister of the Gospel, or upright judge, could lay down, in a few sentences, the great principles underlying a possible world peace, and a peaceful conducting of the world. They would be in emphasis of the great teachings of Christ's Golden Rule, applied to nations, as we try to apply them to individuals. It is not impracticable for this Conference to agree on such principles.

Let there be prayer unceasingly that the minds and hearts of all these delegates to the Conference may be disposed to do what is really right and just and good, and that the whole world may be disposed to accept their suggestions and findings.

THE HERALD AND PRESBYTER

A GOOD SUGGESTION.

Following the President's Thanksgiving Proclamation, the Governors of the various states have issued their individual proclamations and each of them has added some good and wholesome suggestions. For instance, Governor McCray, of Indiana, closes his proclamation with the following words:

"Let the day be marked as being free from frivolity and riotous pleasures, and let it be observed with the full realization of the sacredness of the purpose for which it was first instituted." The tendency to make the day one simply for sport and frivolous amusement is too common, instead of using it for religious purposes.

FIXING THE BUDGET.

The Executive Commission of the General Assembly met on Nov. 10th in Atlantic City, N. J. Dr. Swearingen, as Moderator of the Assembly, presided and Dr. L. S. Mudge, as Stated Clerk of the Assembly, was Secretary. The meeting was attended by almost every member and was in session for about a week.

Arrangements were made for a new and improved Narrative blank for use next spring. There is room for improvement and it will be heartily welcomed.

The Commission recommended the General Assembly to make a rule as to receiving invitations from localities desiring to entertain the Assembly, so that all such invitations shall be sent in at least a month before the meeting, in order that expenses may be calculated.

The Stewardship enrollment period was changed from spring to fall and the time for the Every Member Canvass was fixed for Sabbath, March 12th.

A number of other matters were decided, among them being arrangements for making the Board of Church Erection the "building agency of the Church," other boards and agencies operating through this board in all their programs of building.

The principal matter was fixing the Budget to be presented to the General Assembly of 1922. The total is fixed at $14,500,000, of which the Woman's Board of Foreign Missions is to be $1,200,000; Woman's Board of Home Missions $1,000,000, and Woman's Missions for Freedmen, $185,000. For the Board of Foreign Missions, $3,443,000; the Board of Home Missions, $1,790,000, and self-supporting synods, $2,228,745; Education, $1,570,110; Publication and Sabbath School Work, $628,000; Church Erection, $558,000; Ministerial Relief and Sustentation, $1,000,000; Freedmen, $256,280; Temperance and Moral Welfare, $70,000; Evangelism, $75,000; Men's Work, $50,000; Sabbath Observance, $25,000; U. S. A. Chaplains, $6,000; Vacancy and Supply, $12,000; Bible Society, $50,000; Interchurch and New Era debts, $352,865.

It was agreed that out of all funds received from any source by any board or agency, creditable on the Budget, except the three Woman's Boards, two per cent shall be paid by the boards for the Interchurch debt, and one per cent for the New Era debt. It was also decided to raise $22,000 for the Publicity Department. The question will doubtless arise, as it should, over the appropriating of any amount raised for these Boards, to pay the Interchurch debt. It is one thing to put this debt on the Budget, for special offerings; it is another thing to take any part of the money raised for missions and appropriate it to this debt, and without doubt there will be warm discussion over this point before the Assembly.

It is necessary to pay this debt in some way, and the only way will be by a special contribution for this purpose, and not by the diversion of any amounts from the treasuries of the Mission Boards. Cloaking this debt under the name of certificates of indebtedness makes no difference in fact or in principle. Let the debt be paid, but let it be paid in a right way.

NOT BIBLE STUDY.

It is a crime to obtain money under false pretenses. So it is to obtain an audience under pretense of Bible study and then do nothing but criticize and deny the Bible.

We have received an article cut from a daily paper giving account of a great movement to arouse interest in Bible study, under way in an eastern city, where an open forum for the discussion of the Bible has been established. Details are given as to methods of advertising and promises as to the teaching to be furnished. Then comes the report of one meeting. We are told that "the subject selected for discussion was the mystical vision of Jacob's ladder, as told in Genesis xxviii. The chairman introduced the theme with a brief statement as to how the story came to be handed down and what its probable meaning was to the men who incorporated it into the original document from which, in part, the book of Genesis was compiled. He then explained the Freudian theory of dreams."

From this brief statement we learn that the teacher held the documentary theory as to Genesis, and denied inspiration, and regarded the vision as only an ordinary dream. There is nothing profitable in this method of dealing with the Word of God. It is not Bible study, but rationalistic speculation.

CHURCH UNION IN CANADA.

Several times during the last four or five years the union of Presbyterian, Methodist and Congregational Churches in Canada has seemed practically accomplished. At other times it has seemed to halt. The last Canadian Presbyterian Assembly voted to "take such steps as may be deemed best to consummate organic union with the above-named Churches as expeditiously as possible," and that a representative committee be appointed with instructions to confer with the negotiating Churches; and to carry out the policy of this Assembly.

This committee has held meetings, but from reports in the Presbyterian Witness, the official organ of the Canadian Church, is working towards co-operation rather than organic union. The Witness says: "The General Assembly did not intend to overlook the minority in our membership which is opposed to the measure, as the fact that anti-unionists were appointed on the committee as well as unionists clearly shows, and the much-discussed phrase, 'as expeditiously as possible,' required that the advancement which the Church had decided on was to be made with full recognition of the difficulties raised by this factor in the situation. The committee agreed that the only way to carry out the General Assembly's instructions in the spirit in which they were given, was to explore the whole field of the legislation required for the consummation of union." It also says: "Whatever differences may have found expression on the floor of the Assembly regarding Church Union, there was no difference on the question of co-operation. The committee was instructed to push co-operation to the limit."

Our impression is that the real obstacle to union is the conviction that the minorities in the three denominations would refuse to go into it and that it would result in four denominations instead of three..

TWO WAYS OF LIVING.

Well were it for all young people to learn from God's Word, in early life, in happy belief and experience, "the way of the transgressor is hard," but that the ways of true religion are "ways of pleasantness and all her paths are peace." The other night four young girls started out in a crowded automobile, with four young men, two of whom were married, and after a corousal at a roadhouse, all started back for a reckless ride, only to be dashed down a hillside at a curve in the road, from which three were taken up dead and the other five were sent to the hospital. They called it having a good time. They did not want to be bound by the rules of respectable life and good behavior. It was irksome to them to have respect to the laws of God. So they have reaped of their own sowing and have been filled with the fruit of their own ways. Such occurrences are reported frequently from all parts of the land. To be moral and religious, God-fearing and believing, seems to many young people today to be a dull and a prosy way of life. But it is a safe way, and a happy way, and a respectable way, and it leads on to happy, eternal experiences.

MODERN HEALTH CRUSADE.

A new knighthood, in which the membership is already six million and is still growing, has arisen in America. This is the Modern Health Crusade and its members are children who are following health habits which fortify them against the attacks of disease.

It was less than four years ago that a small group of public school children, not at all enthusiastic over the old-fashioned course of hygiene, were enrolled in the Crusade. As valiant knights they set forth in quest of better health. Each day they performed a certain number of health chores to win their war against the dragons of disease. The name, "Modern Health Crusade," appealed to their imaginations. It was all part of a really interesting game and the idea spread rapidly. Today more than six million school children, as pages, squires, knights and knight bannerets of this new order of chivalry, are battling for a healthier world. The new order has spread to Canada, France, Belgium, Italy, Czecho-Slovakia, Serbia, Japan, Alaska and the Virgin Islands. Everywhere it is welcomed with enthusiasm, not only by instructors and pupils, but by parents as well.

The chief purpose of the Crusade is to cause the children to form health habits. These are summed up in the eleven chores which every Crusader is required to perform in order to win advancement. These chores include such widely varied habits as bathing, washing the hands before meals, brushing the teeth, breathing deeply, sleeping with windows open, playing outdoors, eating slowly and eating wholesome food, such as vegetables and fruit, and drinking plenty of water and milk. In order to impress unforgettably upon the young Crusaders the necessity of performing these chores, pageants and plays are presented in the larger schools, while tiny theaters and marionette shows impress these lessons dramatically upon pupils in small communities.

All of this is part of the country-wide campaign of education conducted by the National Tuberculosis Association, with its 1,200 affiliated organizations. By raising the standard of health among children they are fortifying the coming generation against the disease which was responsible for 132,000 deaths from this disease in this country alone last year. In the fifteen years since the National Tuberculosis Association began its work, the death rate from this disease has been reduced from 300 in every 100,000 population to 120 per 100,000 population. In spite of this, however, there are still a million active cases of tuberculosis in the United States and an equal number of persons who have the disease in a latent or quiescent form. Funds to carry on the campaign of education are provided by the sale of Tuberculosis Christmas Seals. The Fourteenth Annual Christmas Seal Sale will be held in December of this year and every dollar's worth of Seals purchased is a blow aimed directly at tuberculosis.

THE OUTLAWING OF BEER.

The passage of the anti-beer bill by the United States Senate, by a vote of 56 to 22, on Nov. 18, is a victory for law enforcement and blasts the hopes of the brewers for the return of beer, even under the hypocritical and specious claim of its use for medical purposes. It should have passed the Senate last summer when it came from the House, and would have done so, by a more than two-thirds vote, had it not been for the vicious, filibustering tactics of a handful of Senators, who have worked to overthrow prohibition and law enforcement. The beer contingent of the nation felt highly elated by the announcement of Attorney General Palmer last spring, just before he went out of office, that beer could be used for medicine. This same element was highly pleased by the rules recently laid down by the Treasury Department for the distribution and sale of "medicinal beer." Neither of these announcements should ever have been made. They were in the interest of lawlessness, and the anti-prohibition crowd thought that the day of the brewery and beer drinking had come back. But the cause of Prohibition was never so bright as it is today, and enforcement officials are prosecuting offenders with more zeal than ever. Some people have been reared in the delusion that there is some medicinal virtue in whisky and wine, and physicians are permitted to prescribe these things in limited quantities under very stringent regulations. Law breakers will be found and punished, and although private dwellings may not be entered without search warrants, these can be had when necessary, and automobiles and other places may be summarily searched. And now let all good citizens encourage officers of the law to be vigilant against offenders.

The Conference at Washington has started off with encouraging manifestations, but it is entirely too early for Christian people to conclude that everything is settled in the right way. Now is the time to keep on praying that God will properly dispose the minds and hearts of the delegates, and to impress upon the delegates the fact that actual results are desired and expected. Those delegates, if so minded, can agree on plans that will save the world immensely economically, vitally, morally and socially, and they should do so.

The proposition of Mr. Henry Ford to buy up all the discarded war vessels of all the navies of the world, and convert the material into automobiles and trucks and other useful machinery, is like the fulfillment of the prophecy as to beating spears into plowshares.

Better than using metal and oak for offensive naval warfare, and better than wastefully sinking the ships in the ocean's depths, is it to use this valuable material for purposes of agriculture and the arts of peace. We should practice peace and economy both, for the welfare of the world.

A Protestant Episcopal Conference in Memphis gave special attention to evangelism and work for colored people. The color line does not seem to bother them. Bishop Beatty, in addressing the assembly, said: "We need to do more soul-saving work. The Methodists and Baptists are far ahead of us in this matter, and we have had to take their dust until we are nearly suffocated."

Historians, professors of political economy and others raise the question whether our present civilization is safe and will last. Greece, Rome, Spain have perished. Are England and America to go the same road? Professor Flinders Petrie and others have suggested that there is a "parabola of peoples," that after eighteen hundred years a race comes to its height and then rapidly falls. Some count on education as the braces which will insure against decline. Others say that the power of education is overestimated. Professor Wm. McDougall says: "We must have regard to moral and intellectual achievements of kinds less easily appreciated than the airplane and the big gun, the submarine and the poison-gas. It is true that we have obtained a wonderful command over the physical energies of the world; but if we have not, individually and collectively as nations, the wisdom, the patience, the self-control, to direct these immense energies conformably to high moral ideals, our tampering with them will but hasten our end, will but plunge us the more rapidly down the slope of destruction."

The Herald of Gospel Liberty, the able organ of the "Christian Church," thinks the time has come for a better understanding between the Christian Church and the Disciples Church, and that the two should get together. Both claim to be The Christian Church. Both make a specialty of Church Union. They are so near alike in doctrine that only denominational experts can tell them apart. If they can not unite, they can not expect other denominations to unite with them.

When one begins to guess as to the age of the universe, or of our earth, he might as well guess high enough and then multiply by two or ten. A Glasgow scientist announced at a meeting of the British Association that the earth is eight billion years old, and that the modest figure of twenty million years, held by Darwin himself, is wrong. This scientist's "discovery" was made as follows. He "assumed" the sea originally was fresh water. "The next step was to find out how salty was the land, and then how long it would take the oceans to absorb the salt of the land." There are other scientists who say that this scientific discoverer is a humbug.

THE CHANGED SHADOW.

(Amos 5: 8.)

BY MARGARET H. BARNETT.

'Tis sometimes said of that bright constellation
Which gleams on high, amid night's starry hosts,
The Pleiades, that one from out the number
Of seven brilliant sister stars is lost.

And so, some one from out each dear home circle
Has gone, lost for awhile to human sight;
But they are safe, within his tender keeping.
Who made and guides the radiant hosts of light.

He who of old the seven stars created,
And guides them on their long, mysterious way,
Has turned death's gloomy shadow into morning
Into the morn of an eternal day.

THE FIGHT VICTORIOUS.

BY REV. JOHN Y. EWART, D.D.

Let no Christian be a laggard in the race because there is hard work to do and heavy burdens to be borne. Look to the goal, the victory, rather. "Looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith; who for the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God." (Heb. 12: 2.)

I am helped myself, as a believer, by the very invigorating expositions of the Epistles of James, Peter and John given by Dr. William Hiram Foulkes, of New York, to those who attended the recent sessions of the Synod of Colorado held in Denver. Dr. Foulkes gave us the pith and marrow of Gospel truth, and we will all go in the strength of the meat he set before us many days, I can assure him.

I am led to think of the encouragements the Christian has to push on vigorously and valiantly in the footsteps of the Master, and never to yield an inch to the foe. "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life" (Rev. 2: 10), says our enthroned Lord.

Think, dear friend, of that heartening promise Jesus gave to his disciples when alone with them, that the gates of hell should not prevail against his Church. (Matt. 16: 18.)

Terrific are the onslaughts of the wily and mighty foe. Often seems unequal the contest, but when we are braced by the promises of the Book, and led on to victory by the Rider on the White Horse, who goes forth conquering and to conquer, new courage will strengthen our hearts for the fray.

A wonderful inspiration to fidelity and zeal come to us from Isa. 55: 10:

"For as the rain cometh down and the snow from heaven, and returneth not thither, but watereth the earth, and maketh it bring forth and bud, that it may give seed to the sower and bread to the eater; so shall my Word be that goeth forth out of my mouth; it shall not return unto me void, but it shall accomplish that which I please, and it shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it." (Isa. 55: 10, 11.)

Take courage, weary worker, be you minister, elder, worker in the vineyard in whatever capacity. Even as the seed that had been centuries encased alongside an Egyptian mummy, when brought into contact with the soil became fruitful once more, so your prayers, your labors when vitalized by the Holy Spirit's energizing power will be renewed miraculously for effective service in human hearts and lives.

Another strong Scripture is Ezek. 47, the vision of the holy waters. The prophet sees water issuing out from the door of the temple eastward. At first the waters reached to his ankles. A little farther down the stream they reached to his knees, then to his loins, and soon the stream was a river he could not ford.

"And by the river upon the bank thereof, on this side and on that side, shall grow all trees for meat, whose leaf shall not fade, neither shall the fruit thereof be consumed: it shall bring forth new fruit, according to months, because their waters issued out of the sanctuary: and the fruit thereof for medicine. And everything shall live whither the river cometh."

Thus flows on down the centuries the Church of the living God, ever widening and deepening in gracious influence upon the millions of mankind. The Church is the parent of ideas and of institutions, of conscience and of culture. She has carried the Gospel of Christ and the cross into the remotest parts of the earth. She has leavened communities with Gospel truth. The high ideals she has held before men and everywhere have taught the world to be just and generous, loving and giving and in every sense Christlike. Every human interest has taken on a richer and more wholesome life, whithersoever the river of Christian truth and grace has come.

Coming down to the individual, the Church has exerted an elevating, strengthening and sweetening influence upon personal character.

I have read a very interesting story which will illustrate the influence of the Church. A boy lived in a mere hamlet in a state well to the west of New York. The district school and the near-by church with its semi-occasional preaching and irregular Sabbath school were the only community enterprises to influence his life. His house was without anything that might be called a library, except that the Bible is a whole library in itself, and in this house it was both read and studied. His parents were church members, and the family had a Sabbath habit. It was to read the Church paper. When the boy was small the mother, regularly every Sabbath afternoon, read to him all the stories in the children's department, and, later, the stories intended for other folks. As he became a little older he developed a desire to write some for the section devoted to stories from the children. How it thrilled him to see his own name in print! Still later he found much satisfaction in hunting out items about ministers who were known to the family.

This boy formed the Church paper habit. That weekly publication was his mentor and guide. It caused him to think. It helped solve many of the problems that arose from his thinking. It gave him ideals of life. It stiffened and fixed his purpose. Week after week the Church paper came to be his most reliable friend. It stirred him up to attempt and secure a good education, for which his parents were not able to pay. On two or three occasions, when help from some wise counsellor was much needed, a letter to the editor brought him a kindly and helpful reply. Today he is an active Christian worker, using his business success in helping the community where he lives, and in extending the Gospel to the uttermost parts of the earth.

The Church is a mighty engine of gracious power. One of its agencies is Christian literature. Let the Church paper and other pure and stimulating reading matter be introduced into every Christian home. Let no Christian family think that it can afford to do without such a quiet yet powerful means of usefulness. In far too many professedly Christian homes the Church paper is not found, it is lamentable to say. Other publications are regularly subscribed for. But the lack of the denominational weekly from a home leaves a gap which no other influence can fill so well. Its information about the local Church and the Church universal, its instructive editorials, its wide outlook and elevating uplook are absolutely necessary, it seems to me, to the intelligent, aggressive Christianity which the whole Church and the whole world need today.

SUPERNATURAL SELECTION.

BY REV. CHRISTOPHER G. HAZARD, D.D.

It is interesting to trace the progress of scientific thought as it pursues its way over the fields of knowledge offered to us in the natural world and now so largely developed and applied in this marvelous age. The works of God are honorable and glorious, sought out of all those that have pleasure therein. The scientific theories that now constitute so large a part of the wisdom of men, and that are so flattering and acceptable that their assumptions are generally granted, are commanding the modern mind to a great degree, and even the modern religious mind is bowing down to them. Materialistic and theistic evolution have each their multitudes of enthusiastic disciples among the wise and great of earth, the one ending logically in self worship and the other in an unsanctified and unauthorized worship of God, but neither recognizing that Christ of God and Foundation of a new creation who is revealed to us in the Scriptures and attested to us by the fruits of Christian history. The world is growing too intelligent to grant faith to authority, while it is not intelligent enough to discover and accept that great and only Authority, Jesus Christ. It must have sight of the invisible, while it despises the revelation of the unseen. It will go to the bounds of things natural, but dismiss as unscientific that supernatural realm out of which nature came and which rests its scientific demonstration upon the testimony and observation of history.

But, whatever may become of natural selection in the final adjustments of thought, supernatural selection stands out like a promontory upon the coast line of progress. Whatever place evolution may at last take in the settlement of scientific problems, involution will be its associate. God is as transcendent as he is immanent. The first truth that an inquirer must come up against is this: "Ye must be born again." Nothing is profitable with God but a new creature. Spirit must come in upon the case. Not only man, but the whole groaning and travailing creation must be reborn from above. Science must be born anew. Thought must become spiritual. Heaven and earth must be united by the ladder of the Son of Man, who was in heaven when he was here because he lived in communion with the Father, and who became an avenue between heaven and earth, between God and man, a means of spiritual fellowship with the divine.

Faith shares ever more abundantly the consciousness of Christ and thus lives more and more unto God and in God. Let God in Christ be the soul's environment and we will grant Herbert Spencer's definition of life, his statement that life consists in harmony with environment. That God made the heavens is of greater interest than all the details of astronomical science. God is still doing all the Bible things; that is the interest of history. Believers in development by natural selection must make room for supernatural selection. Christ is still engaged in subduing all things to God. If any man has hopes of a course of degradation, let him consider how rarely Rescue Missions rescue any one; yet, if any degraded and sinful man is tempted to despair, let him remember the gracious words that gave a dying thief a passport to Paradise. God has not chosen many of the noble, wise and great of the world, but God has chosen the weak, the base, the foolish and the nonentities among men, that his being and his gracious salvation may be clearly revealed. And God has chosen to save all who call upon him through Christ. It is greatly corrective to see how scientific the spiritual world is and how scientific that Christianity is that has always been composed of twice-born people and led by the outstanding, twice-born leaders of twice-born progress: and blessed is the man whom God chooses and causes to approach unto him, that he may dwell in God's courts.

OUTGROWN.

BY W. H. MORSE, M.D.

They lay there on the mantel, a pair of children's shoes, partially worn. The Italian woman saw me looking at them, and spoke, quickly:

"Ah, the shoes!" she said. "Those are my husband's. Eh, Milo?"

"Yes, sure!" Milo said. "Mine. I wore them when was just young. And ah, of them I was proud. My mother bought them in Napoli, and I—strutted!"

"Tell why you keep them there," the woman said.

"Ah, just plain to remind me by them what I have outgrown," he replied.

I knew what was coming, for both Milo and his wife are most zealous Protestants.

"Just to remind me of what I have outgrown—in Jesus," he said reverently. "Understand?" he added. "I was given when very young by that same mother that which I was to believe, to wear, to be proud of. So I was. But sure, I outgrew."

He laughed.

"Birtie and I look at the shoes," he said, "and think of when we thought the Pope's government the government of God, and he the concentration of the church. And the church? Oh, my! it was the incarnation of religion, as Christ was the incarnation of divinity. The divine truth incarnate in the church, it could not err. To accuse it of error was to accuse God himself. See! I could not put on that belief now! What a wonderful thing was the church! I was taught that it was an organized political and social body as palpable as France. The Pope was at the head of a potential state—before 1870. When he made a concordat with another state, it was not in the least synallagmatic, as we called it, or as you would say, equal in its two parts, because the other ruler was bound to conform to it, and the Pope only made a graceful concession, a scrap of paper, revocable by him at any time.

I outgrew that idea, and I hope Washington will never try it on, for it would not fit."

He spoke next of the mass.

"It was a close fit," he said, "pinched some, but I thought it was all right. The host, consecrated and offered again, was Christ himself offered again. The priest was more than a man, more than an angel. He controlled the authority of God himself. I could not, dared not, question. I had to believe in priests and the Pope, all times; yes, from Peter down. Yes, I was taught, Peter was the first Pope, and held the office twenty-five years, one month, and nine days—nine thousand, one hundred and sixty-four days. He was infallible, and so were all the Popes. I had to believe it. I could not see that the real triumph of infallibility is Jesuitism. Infallible, absolutely sovereign, and absolutely perfect, it was an unpardonable crime to do as I have found that Paul did in withstanding Peter to his face, in saying any light word of priest or Pope. I was not permitted to even think of Peter as a Jew, for he was something, somebody, far above the human. If I had known then that Peter was not the first apostle to come to Jesus, that he fled and denied his Lord, and that after the crucifixion it was James, and not he, who was the head of the church, I would not have dared to have said so, for it would have been such a crime. The shoes did not fit, but I did not know it. My mother would grease them up with melted tallow, so they would not hurt my feet; and she would have me go to the priest to learn the catechism, so that on exposure of the slush and mud of atheism and Protestantism, myself would not get—chilblains."

"Birtie," he said to his wife, "get your stays."

The woman produced from a closet two pieces of thin board, about six inches long and an inch wide.

"These," she said, "I wore when as a little girl I had to go to the Sisters looking prim, to recite. Oh-h, they hurt, but I had to wear them."

"Artificial get-up," Milo said dryly. "Tell him what they taught the prim small maid."

"Oh, all about the Virgin Mary," the woman said.

"Artificial get-up to learn artificial stuff!" Milo exclaimed.

"But, like his baby shoes. I have outgrown the stays and—that stuff," the wife added. "Mary was a good woman, but to worship her as mother of God, is for me to dress up with these stays on!"

THE ONLY GUARANTEE OF PEACE.

BY REV. H. C. SWEARINGEN, D.D.

The only guarantee of peace is the frank application of the principles of Christianity.

The Washington conference had a most auspicious opening, much more so than many dared expect. The proposals made at the first meeting show the sincerity of America, and are full of promise of a better day. It now remains for the Church to support the commissioners from all lands by developing and maintaining a Christian sentiment that rings true in every note. Drastic reduction of armament when achieved will not remove the causes of war and until these fires of strife have been utterly quenched by the prevalence of Christian principles, there can be no true or enduring peace.

The motives behind the conference are mixed, which does not mean that any of them are bad, only that some are better than others.

One of the controlling considerations is economic. Had business revived after the war, and if nations were now being borne forward on a wave of commercial prosperity, probably we should have heard nothing about disarmament. We simply can not stand the expense of further preparations for war. This may not be the best motive, but even the Church can not afford to disregard it, if it turn our feet into a safe path. It was an empty stomach that started the prodigal son homeward.

Another fact that pleads for world peace is our disillusionment about what war can do. It accomplished some things, but it did not insure peace; it did not make democracy safe; it deepened racial antagonisms; it stiffened opposing national purposes; it showed that a nation which sets the world on fire can not be punished adequately. Indemnities hurt the country receiving them more than the country that pays them. Another cause for the recent wave of sentiment in favor of peace is that threatened destructiveness of new wars has smitten the imagination of the world with terror. The words of the President on Armistice Day cut like a knife. The dead mechanism of modern warfare is revolting, and the prospects of whole armies and of entire communities destroyed by poison gas is too horrible to contemplate.

The Church, however, must not be lulled into silence because the above considerations appear to be producing results. Changed conditions may render any one of them less effective, and even all of them less important in the face of national ambitions.

The only certain guarantee of peace is the frank application of the principles of Christianity. The Church has scarcely begun to make this application. It has permitted false ideals of national greatness, of national dignity, of national well-being to prevail. Except in its amenities and its external courtesies, diplomacy has been the dark domain of paganism. Diplomacy has been a clever game sometimes with the destiny of helpless peoples as stakes, a barter, often with the liberties of millions as the stock in trade.

All this must change. Christianity must have witness born to it in the field where the interest of nations meet and clash. War prevails because there is no other institution for composing international differences; and there are no such institutions because there has been no sufficient Christian opinion to support them. When the people of these nations—the Christian people—once get it into their consciences that the primary and elemental ideas of Christianity are to have sway in international affairs; that the nations are a great family; that the real good of one is the good of all; that fair dealing and justice and good will and sincere brotherliness must control if the earth is not to be denched with blood and surrendered to unspeakable material and moral waste,—then the voice of the Most High will get a hearing in the chancellories of the world and startled cabinets will hear him say: 'Yet have I set my King upon my holy hill of Zion; now, therefore be wise, O ye Kings; be instructed, ye judges of the earth. Serve the Lord with fear and rejoice with trembling.'

FROM THE WESTERN OFFICE.

BY REV. B. P. FULLERTON, D.D.

In my last letter I referred to the conversion of Rev. Mr. Venicia's mother. Dr. Montgomery has returned and has given me a little fuller account of this interesting event. In the first place, his mother objected most seriously to her son entering the ministry and especially the Protestant ministry, and up to the evening to which I referred in my last letter, she had never heard her son preach, so bitter was her opposition to his course. So far as I know he had never argued the case with her, but prayed for her and treated her as a dutiful son should treat his mother. What induced her to attend services on that particular evening, I do not know. She was there, and that fact evidently stirred her son in an unusual way, and the effect of his sermon was most powerful on the whole congregation, and his mother, with tears streaming down her cheeks, put up her hand as a signal that she wanted the prayers of the church. They were given and then she made her public confession of her faith in Jesus Christ.

This case is well known, but how many hundreds of people have been blessed by the ministry of these men who represent the Presbyterian Church in the five States of California, Arizona, New Mexico, Colorado and Texas, preaching as they do the Gospel of Jesus Christ in the Spanish tongue.

I have had occasion to say that our need in the Spanish work is better buildings. We have only one building that is in any way adequate to our needs and that is the building in El Paso, where Mr. Venicia is doing this conspicuous work. We have a poor building in San Antonio, and our minister there, Rev. Mr. Lopez, says that the only way he can take more people into his church is to turn out some that he has, as he can not accommodate the people who want to come into his church and who are eager to know more of Jesus Christ and his Gospel. These Spanish-speaking Americans have been accustomed to large cathedrals and impressive school buildings, and from their youth have been taught to believe in a certain type of religious service as being the only approved type. These services have been conducted in great cathedrals, and now we are hoping to draw them away from this instruction and these buildings to an entirely new approach in religion, and to a modest unimpressive building somewhere on a side street, and wonder that our progress in making them Christian is so slow. If there are a million and a half Spanish-speaking people now in America, that is to say, almost one-tenth of the whole population of Mexico, why shall we not give more attention to them while they are here at our door? They and their children will become citizens and the type of citizen they become will depend very largely upon the culture which we as Protestants give them, and the friendship which we show to them.

Letters are coming from all over Texas where the teams provided for by Dr. King have been, saying that the series of conferences have done great good in giving information as well as help in the great cause of America's evangelization. One church reports the organization of mission study classes, in which were enrolled the first night, 167 members. That will mean at least two hundred or three hundred people will become interested in the cause of Missions, both at home and abroad, as these mission study classes study both problems here and there. Dr. King conducted his last conference on Nov. 14th, and will, no doubt, give a good report of what was done by his team, as he headed the team in the more thickly populated sections of the state around Dallas; Dr. Montgomery's team making centers in El Paso, San Antonio, Austin and Houston, and everywhere interest was created.

One thing impressed itself on the minds of the representatives of the Board, and that is that Texas is rapidly becoming an urban state, and villages, towns and cities are rapidly developing. While they are not large enough, perhaps, at this time, to call for the same treatment as our great centers of population, they have features which challenge the interest of us all.

A plan of publicity for all our benevolent work has been worked out in Minnesota, where a forenoon meeting is held with three addresses on three of the boards, afternoon addresses on three more and evening addresses on three more, taking in all the Boards and Men's Work, and the program is such that they work on week days as well as on Sabbaths. The purpose is publicity, pure and simple, on the theory that before you can get action that will be worth while, there must be information, and the men who are foremost in this movement are expressing, what some of us have known all the time—their wonder that the people at large know so little about what the Church is undertaking in its benevolent enterprises. The people are busy these days and are not disposed to hunt up information, and it is up to the pastor, and those who will co-operate with him, to bring to all the people the facts that now are in possession of only a few of the people.

I am giving these illustrations in the hope that other synods, both aid-receiving and self-supporting, may undertake a synodically wide policy of giving.

CHICAGO LETTER.

BY REV. E. N. WARE, D.D.

The inauguration of Dr. Herbert M. Moore as President of Lake Forest University, was a most auspicious occasion. More than a hundred guests, college presidents, professors, representatives of faculties, Synod of Illinois, in addition to a large number of friendly visitors gathered in Lake Forest, Nov. 3-6, to witness the induction into office of Dr. Moore, president of his own Alma Mater. The evening of the 3rd was given over to the social side of the occasion when the guests and delegates were banqueted. The inauguration proper took place on the morning of the 4th, when Dr. James G. K. McClure, president of McCormick Theological Seminary, formerly pastor of the Lake Forest Church and president pro tem. at one time of Lake Forest University, delivered the historical address. Mr. J. H. S. Lee, president of the Board of Trustees, presided at the induction and President Moore responded. Other speakers of the morning were Dr. John H. Finley, of the New York Times, who spoke on the influence of education on world affairs; and Prof. J. W. Jenks, of New York University, who spoke on: "The Teachings of Jesus as Factors in International Politics." The inauguration was linked with the series of lectures given on the Bross Foundation. Principal Robert Bruce Taylor, of Queen's University of Kingston, Ontario, closed with an address on "Personal Religion and Public Morals." Dr. Moore has, in the months in which he has already served Lake Forest, made a place for himself. He is greatly desirous that Lake Forest might again take its rightful place in the affections and interests of the Presbytery of Chicago, and that it might be spoken of as one of its institutions. That is where it is historically and that is where it should be vitally.

Dr. John H. Boyd, professor of homiletics in McCormick Seminary finds that his health will not permit of his retaining his position with the seminary and has offered his resignation. He is now in the Presbyterian Hospital under treatment. He hopes soon to be able to make his residence in Evanston, where he was a beloved pastor for many years, and eventually to go back to Portland, Oregon. His going from McCormick is greatly regretted by all, for Dr. Boyd was fast making a large place for himself in the hearts of both faculty and students.

Chicago Presbytery met for the Annual Day of Prayer in the Second Church on Nov. 14th. The program was varied, including the needs of both men and institutions of the presbytery. The leaders were Drs. John Timothy Stone, Howard Agnew Johnston, Ralph D. Kearns, the moderator, Norman B. Barr, and Professor Cleland B. McAfee, who closed the day with the communion service.

The old landmark of reform institutions, the Washington Home on West Madison Street, has been sold. It has kept open door for refuge for inebriates since 1863. Here hundreds of physical wrecks have been cared for and turned out real men. During the days before prohibition this home cared for a weekly average of 77 patients. With the coming of prohibition the average dropped to 12 or 15 per week, and now the house has been sold and the institution died a natural death.

Armistice Day was observed with appropriate services in Chicago. A prayer meeting was arranged for by the World Friendship League at Orchestra Hall at 11 A. M. It was a community mass meeting and was attended by hundreds. Bishop Anderson, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, presided. Dr. Van Nuys, of the Fourth Church, Bishop Nicholson, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Father Seidenburg and Rabbi Joseph Stoltz took part in the devotional service, and Raymond Robbins delivered the principal address on "Disarmament or Bankruptcy; Which?" A fine spirit of fellowship and devotion prevailed.

NEW YORK LETTER.

BY REV. CLARENCE G. REYNOLDS, D.D.

Thanksgiving services will be held in most of the Presbyterian Churches of New York City. At the Brick Church last Sabbath afternoon, Mr. Merrill preached on "What the World Needs Most—Work." The number of the unemployed is not greatly reduced, particularly among the higher-grade men who seek office positions.

The West End Presbyterian Church, Rev. Dr. A. E. Keigwin, pastor, will send out one thousand Thanksgiving baskets to the needy.

Friday evening of this week the big attraction will be the lecture on the Bible by William Jennings Bryan. There is a big demand for seats in Carnegie Hall.

Monday evening the New York Bible Society will have addresses by Rev. Dr. Masse, of Brooklyn, upon "From the Heart of God to the Heart of Man," and by President Blanchard, of Wheaton College, Illinois. Dr. Blanchard preached last Sabbath in the Gospel Tabernacle Church, founded by the late Rev. A. B. Simpson.

Rev. Dr. Arthur J. Smith, General Secretary of the Evangelistic Committee of New York City, is conducting a series of evangelistic meetings in the College Point Reformed Church, and has been greatly blessed in his preaching.

A three-day Bible Conference, emphasizing evangelism, has been held this week in the Baptist Temple, Brooklyn. Two Presbyterian pastors of New York City, Drs. Robert Watson, of the Second Church, and Dr. John McNeill, of the Fort Washington Church, were among the speakers. Both pastors are much in demand, hither and thither.

The thirty-third anniversary of the Lord's Day Alliance of the U. S. A. was celebrated Monday, Nov. 12, by an all-day meeting in the Madison Avenue Baptist Church. For the morning service the various Ministerial Associations adjourned their meetings and attended in a body. The spiritual, social, moral, physical, industrial and economic aspects of the American Christian Sabbath and the American Sunday were discussed. The general secretary of the alliance, Rev. Dr. H. L. Bowlby, and Dr. John H. Willey, of the Board of Managers, gave some plain facts about the blue-law propaganda which started a year ago in the camp of the enemies of the Christian Sabbath. Among the speakers were Walter E. Ellis, president of the New Jersey Letter Carriers' Association; Dr. A. L. Moore, of the New Jersey Legislature; Dr. Alexander Alison, Dr. H. H. McQuilkin, chairman of the Presbyterian Sabbath Observance Committee; Frederick A. Wallis, Dr. David J. Burrell, Rev. H. E. Blair, Korea; Mrs. Robert D. Hull, of the Woman's Sabbath Alliance, and Rev. Dr. F. W. Johnson. At the meeting Sabbath evening, Nov. 13, in the Fourth Presbyterian Church, Senator W. M. Calder and representatives of the letter carriers and post-office clerks' associations made addresses.

Central Presbyterian Church, Rev. Dr. Dwight W. Wylie, pastor, is sending Christmas remembrances to the nearly two dozen missionaries, Home and Foreign, supported by the church. A memorial service for the late Rev. James B. Cochran was held in the Central Church Nov. 16, the speakers being Rev. Dr. Wilton Merle Smith, former pastor of the church, and Rev. F. S. Niles, one of the church's missionaries, at home on furlough from China.

The sixth annual Sailors' Day service was held in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine on Sabbath afternoon, Nov. 13, there being a capacity crowd. Among the organizations participating in the service were the Seamen's Church Institute, American Seamen's Friend Society, the New York Port Society and Marine Branches of the Y. M. C. A. Bishop Charles E. Woodcock, of Kentucky, preached the sermon.

Dr. John Dill Robertson, Health Commissioner of Chicago, speaking Sabbath evening, Nov. 13, in the Central Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, Rev. Dr. John F. Carson, pastor, said: "The members of the medical profession are becoming the saloonkeepers of America." Since beer has been taken out of the hands of prescribing physicians by the recent vote of the United States Senate, the physicians will be relieved of responsibility in the matter.

MICHIGAN LETTER.

BY REV. WILLIAM BRYANT, D.D.

In the report to Synod of Michigan last October, the chairman of the Home Mission Committee mentioned the fact, which really needed no apology, that the expenses of administration, which now amount to about 22 per cent of the receipts, were only 14.7 per cent in 1903. No one expects to secure competent men at the salaries paid eighteen years ago. Year after year Dr. David Howell of blessed memory would only accept $1,200 as his salary, and when in 1907 he felt obliged to have assistance in the work, the salary of his assistant was placed at the munificent sum of $1,000. During the first ten months of this assistant's labors he traveled over 15,000 miles, and visited 117 churches. To save Home Mission work needless expense in traveling expenses he mapped out routes, which sometimes kept him weeks and even months away from home. No wonder expenses were low for a few years, too low to do justice to the worker as well as to the work. In 1908 the Home Mission Committee paid the salary of the student-pastor at the University of Michigan, which was another injustice to the work. But if, as the chairman stated, the administration expenses in 1911 were as high as 59 per cent, and in 1915 48 per cent, it is a wonder so little was said about it. There was no Superintendent of Home Missions. Your correspondent looked after Detroit Presbytery. Rev. J. M. Rogers confined his work to the Upper Peninsula. Rev. E. H. Bradford had charge of Flint and Saginaw Presbyteries, and Rev. George B. Crawford had charge of the rest of Michigan. Detroit expenses were not included in the budget, but cared for by its Church Extension Committee. This makes it somewhat puzzling to understand the 59 per cent referred to. It was a startling item of news to many of us.

It is the most natural as well as the most Christian thing that all of our churches should most earnestly pray for the "Armament Conference" in Washington. Detroit observed the occasion not only on Sabbath, November 13th, by special sermons as well as prayers; but the ministers of the various denominations met on the following morning to listen to Dr. C. B. Emmerson speak on, "These shall not die in vain." At a mass meeting held in Arcadia Hall resolutions were passed in favor of disarmament, and especially urging the four American delegates to use their utmost personal opinions on the subject. Rightly or wrongly there is a widespread impression that at least some of the four favor a big navy for America, rather than any cutting down of the building program.

Detroit acts a good deal like a Methodist city religiously just as present, for we are welcoming the most influential Methodist gathering of many years. All of the bishops, all of the district superintendents and a great army of leaders are to assemble here to plan great things for the Kingdom. They come from Canada, as well as from various parts of our own land. Dr. M. C. Pearson, Executive Secretary of the Detroit Council of Churches, with characteristic heartiness, devotes large space in the daily papers to welcoming these Methodist brethren. If Presbyterians could only learn to advertise their plans as extensively as do Methodists, they might still be regarded as the leaders in evangelical ranks today, instead of too often watching the procession go by.

The Baptists also have caught the vision of larger publicity. The papers are full of their "Biggest in the History of the Church" Institute to be held at the same time. Twenty different subjects, all discussed by national specialists, are on the program. It deals with every phase of Christian activity at home and abroad. Classes every afternoon and popular meetings every evening offer opportunity for intensive as well as extensive study. It is not envy, but real regret that makes some of us wonder why Presbyterianism, for so many years strongly in the lead in all aggressive religious movements in Detroit, seems to have turned all its forces into individual and local directions, instead of a statemanship grasp of the whole situation. Here we have a city of a million people, half of them foreigners, and as far as Presbyterianism is concerned, all we are even attempting is a lamentably weak effort to look after a handful of Italians housed in a plant expensive enough to care for half a dozen promising openings, towards which we close our eyes and feign to be asleep.

OREGON NOTES.

BY REV. WALLACE HOWE LEE, LL.D.

On Tuesday, Oct. 25, 1921, Brownsville celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of the dedication of the present church edifice with a home-coming of the pastors and members of other days, and friends of twenty-five years ago and since. It was an old-fashioned all-day gathering with a grand country dinner in the church at noon, and again at night. Rev. J. E. Snyder, now of Corvallis, was pastor when the building was erected, and he was present on this occasion with messages and kindly cheer. This church is one of the oldest in Oregon, having been founded by Rev. Dr. Geary, and the church is intimately associated with the lives of the earliest Presbyterian ministers of Oregon, as Rev. H. H. Spalding, who came out with Marcus Whitman, and Rev. Robert Robe, who was one of the three who organized Presbyterianism in the Oregon Territory, an early pastor, and who remained so for thirty years. His widow still survives, and was present. This church has sent out several young men into church work, among them Rev. Harry S. Templeton, of Bellingham, Wash.; Rev. James Thomson, Spokane, Wash.; Rev. George T. Pratt, Wendling, Ore.; Rev. John Thomson, Harrington, Wash.; Delos Foster, secretary of the Y. M. C. A. in the Philippine Islands; Lloyd Carrick, now in a theological seminary. The first three were back on this occasion, and helped greatly in the success of the meetings. Rev. Wallace H. Lee, Dean of Albany College, was also present to represent his father, who preached the dedicatory sermon twenty-five years ago, and who has since passed away. In the afternoon service there were forty-eight persons present who were present twenty-five years ago at the dedication, speaking well for the stability of the church and community.

An interesting experiment and variation in Home Missions is being worked by our pastor at Woodburn, Rev. R. W. Achor. Owing to the retrenchment of the Home Mission Board in this presbytery, the Woodburn Church has consented to a morning service only from their pastor, and he has been caring for two other fields, Gervais and Fairfield. Recently Mr. Achor, with our Sabbath-school missionary, Mr. Large, organized a Sabbath school in a country schoolhouse a few miles away with thirty members, and has added that point to the list. Then three miles east is a Congregational church, known as Bethel Church, which has asked for help from us, and so Mr. Achor goes there as often as he is able. Presbytery has given Mr. Achor a student in our synodical college at Albany, Mr. Clive Saiz, as an assistant, who goes every Sabbath to one or another of these points, and holds services. Mr. Saiz is a student for the ministry. At the Bethel Church recently Dean Wallace H. Lee, of Albany College, administered the communion in the morning, and preached morning and evening, and

Mr. Achor received ten members in the evening, baptizing seven of them.

The Lebanon Church has received twenty-seven new members in the past three months, Rev. John J. Canoles, minister.

Rev. F. S. Thomas, of Toledo, Wash., has been asked to supply Dallas Presbyterian Church for the coming year. This completes the list of churches in presbytery. All are now supplied.

PITTSBURGH LETTER.

BY REV. S. J. FISHER, D.D.

At our Ministerial Association on Nov. 14, Rev. A. I. Good, of Africa, gave us most interesting incidents of missionary work, repeating the story of the great progress, and the firmness of disciples under persecution. One speaker, commenting on the long and careful probation through which each convert must pass to membership, remarked with a sigh that he should not dare subject his applicants to such a test. Missions at home and abroad act as great exhortations, and present religion in the needed light.

The pastor of the Swissvale Church, Rev. W. O. Yates, utilizes his experiences for five years as a missionary in Siam to interest Women's Missionary Societies in these cities.

Secretary Gaston, of the Freedmen's Board, has returned from the ashes of Barber Memorial Seminary at Anniston, Ala. Great is the loss and severe the interruption of the schooling of this large number of fine colored girls, our motto is "Sursum Corda," and for the sake of the race we must rise and build. We believe God wishes this, and his people will come to our help and provide a way. In the meantime President Scherer and his wife will remain at Anniston and give their personal attention to the rebuilding and its problems. And also, in the meantime, we appeal to every Christian to help in this rebuilding of our only school in Alabama for colored girls.

The officers and members of the Carrick Church, on Brownsville Road, one of our suburbs, will celebrate, by a series of meetings extending from Nov. 27 to Dec. 4, the ninetieth anniversary of the organization of that church. On Sabbath, Nov. 27, Rev. Drs. J. M. Duff and A. H. Jolly will preach. On Monday, Young People's night, President J. C. Acheson, of the Pennsylvania College for Women, will speak on "Christian Education." On Thursday, the history of the church, illustrated by living pictures, will be given by Mrs. John M. Phillips, with social and entertainment exercises on other evenings, and closing with an address on the morning of Dec. 4 by Superintendent P. W. Snyder, D.D., and in the evening with a sermon by Rev. C. E. Luding, on "The Next Decade."

On the evening of Nov. 16, Rev. C. Carson Bransby was installed pastor of the Homewood Church. The recent pastor, Rev. P. W. Snyder, D.D., now Superintendent of Missions in the presbytery, presided; Rev. W. A. Jones, D.D., preached; Rev. Duncan Cameron offered the prayer of installation. Your correspondent gave the charge to the pastor, and the charge to the people was given by Rev. Dr. P. W. Snyder. The musical program was in fine harmony, and the services were carefully adapted to the occasion. Mr. Bransby is called to enter upon a field wherein others have most faithfully labored, where lingers the influence of devout and able pastors.

The celebration of the one hundred and twenty-fifth anniversary of the Monongahela City Church, on Nov. 9, was made most interesting by the presence of Rev. W. O. Campbell, D.D., who, beginning his pastorate over that church fifty-one years ago, served it for fifteen years. He was presented with a bouquet of fifty yellow chrysanthemums. The present pastor, Rev. W. F. McKee, D.D., was similarly honored with fifteen white chrysanthemums, one for each of his pastoral years. Mrs. Alonzo Linn read a history of the beginnings of Presbyterianism in this region, giving events connected with the first pastor, Rev. Dr. Samuel Ralston.

For forty-five years Prof. Henry Woods, D.D., of Washington and Jefferson College, carried on the pastorate of the East Buffalo Church, in the neighborhood of Washington, Pa. On Nov. 10 a tablet to his memory, and that of the members of the Session serving with him, was dedicated. Addresses were made by James P. Eagleson, Esq., Washington; John N. McDowell, clerk of the Session; Rev. Drs. W. E. Slemmons, Matthew Rutherford, of Washington, Pa., and Prof. R. B. English, who succeeded Dr. Woods in the Chair of Latin in the college, and the benediction was pronounced by Rev. C. L. McKee, so long the efficient Superintendent of Missions in Washington Presbytery.

During the nine months' leave of absence granted Rev. Dr. Samuel Semple, pastor of the First Church, Titusville, Pa., the pulpit will be supplied by Rev. W. G. B. Edgar.

The action of the Roman Catholic Archbishop in New York City, in asking the police to prohibit the holding of a popular meeting of a set of social reformers, is causing, and should cause, a considerable questioning as to such ecclesiastical interference. And, further, it should be followed by an explanation or apology by the police authorities. However much it is assumed that Mayor Hylan and his official associates are influenced by loyalty to the Roman Catholic Church, it is an incident that reflects no more credit upon the dignitaries of that Church than did the action of the mob, unresisted by the cathedral authorities, upon a club in that city displaying the flags of the Allies. When an official of that Church attempts in this manner to repress a meeting which he regards as unwise, there is an indication either of unwise judgment or insolence.

A recent comment in my letter concerning the advertisements inserted by Roman Catholics in our secular papers brought me a note written, presumably, by a Roman Catholic resident of Chicago, who regards my attitude toward his "Holy Mother Church" as caused by "ignorance or envy." It is possible the writer of this critical note is ignorant of the Reformation and the great results of Protestantism, which even learned Roman Catholics have recognized. Thus Lord Acton, who died unrebuked, never hesitated to assail the claims of the Vatican.

A pleasanter subject is the remarkably appropriate sentiment attached to the memorial wreath sent by King George, of Great Britain, to be placed upon the bier of the "Unknown Soldier" at Arlington. "As unknown, and yet well known: As dying, and behold we live." All literature could give no more admirably appropriate expression. Across the centuries the great martyr and hero of the faith, unknown to the pagan world, forgotten by Rome, sank to an unmarked grave, probably outside the city walls, but he is forever known. He was dying; but does he not live?

From Canada, for the same loving recognition, came a wreath of maple leaves, and with it the sentence from "Pilgrim's Progress": "But that which put glory of grace in all that he did was that he did it out of pure love to his country." Again Christian literature gives the finest sentiments and the noblest thoughts. Little did that unknown soldier imagine that some day, far across the seas, a hundred millions of people and more would recall his sacrifice and turn to God's Word and one of the most devoted of Christ's disciples, and the truths his teachings beautified, to express the meaning of that sacrifice, and lift it into the light of heaven's purposes and values.

STUEBENVILLE EVANGELISM.

Encouraging reports have come for October, the second month, of the Steubenville Presbyterian Evangelistic Campaign. The meetings are successful in proportion as pastor and people have made preparation before the evangelist comes upon the field.

At New Cumberland prayer meetings were conducted for two weeks preceding the meetings. As a result Evangelist Wilson found an excellent spirit already existing when he came. The literature supplied by the Presbytery was freely used, and every home received notice of the meetings. Evangelist Wilson presented his messages earnestly and effectively. On the closing Sabbath the Lord's Supper was administered, and two congregations gathered around one common table of the Lord. A number of persons have been received into each church, and there is a most excellent spirit of co-operation as a result of the meetings.

Rev. E. G. Morris and his congregation at Island Creek had also made preparation for the coming of Mr. Wilson. Some of the results of the meeting were twenty-one accessions to the church; and the placing of a copy of "Day after Day" (Dr. Chapman's book on family worship) in each home by the session. The church's quota for the budget was $115; the offerings amounted to $165.

Unionport is a small congregation without a pastor. Yet the meetings by Evangelist Warnoch were successful. The services resulted in a real revival.

At Lima the new pastor arrived on the field while Evangelist Bailey was conducting the meetings. The Methodist congregation co-operated, and the interest was excellent. There will be several accessions to the church.

At Bethesda Rev. Mr. Travers and his people had made very thorough preparation for the coming of Evangelist Bailey. Mr. Travers says: "The results surpassed my fondest expectations, and I believe those of Bailey. The interest was excellent. Twenty-one members were received; all but one being on profession. We send our quota, $150, to the treasurer next week." K. J. Steward.

AUBURN SEMINARY.

President Stewart of Auburn Theological Seminary announces that while their School of Religious Education was organized primarily to give training to young men and women who expect to make leadership in church and Sabbath-school work and social service a life-work, it is welcoming every opportunity to be of service to churches that can not employ salaried helpers of that kind. It is conducting evening classes in which many volunteer helpers in churches of Auburn and vicinity are enrolled. It now proposes to extend opportunities to those who are at a distance. It is offering a special short course of study which will occupy the whole time of students for five weeks, from Jan. 18, to Feb. 24, 1922. An arrangement has been made by which a payment of fifty dollars will provide room, board, and all tuition charges. This offers to churches an opportunity to secure trained leadership from their own membership by encouraging one or more of their young people to take the course, and, if need be, of meeting part or the whole of the cost.

SYNOD OF NEBRASKA.

BY REV. JULIUS F. SCHWARZ, S. C.

The synod met in the First Church of Omaha, Oct. 18. The retiring Moderator, Dr. Thomas K. Hunter preached the opening sermon. Rev. Edwin Hart Jenks, D.D., the pastor-host, was unanimously chosen as moderator. Rev. Wilton Merle-Smith, D.D.; Rev. George P. Horst, D.D.; Rev. Harold McA. Robinson, D.D.; Rev. Edwin A. Wilson; Rev. Charles E. Bradt, D.D.; Rev. George C. Mahy, D.D.; Rev. Harry W. Barr; Rev. James A. Laurie, D.D., and Miss Maude M. Aldrich presented the work of the Boards. Rev. J. W. Boyer, Professor of the Bible Chair at Hastings College, conducted the Bible hour each morning. A memorial service was held in connection with the report of the Committee on Necrology which was given by Dr. B. M. Long, a tribute to Rev. Albert B. Byram was given by Rev. Edgar C. Lucas, D.D.; Rev. Dean R. Leland, D.D., spoke of Rev. William W. Lawrence, D.D., and Rev. J. M. Wilson, D.D., spoke of Elder Phelps of the North Church of Omaha, an elder for 60 years.

The presence of the Evangelist Gipsy Smith was greatly appreciated, and the Synod attended the Evangelistic meetings, two evenings, in a body.

Reports showed a gain along all lines. The total of benevolences for the last year amount to $165,420, and for miscellaneous purposes $563,755. The total membership is 28,571.

Some of the resolutions that are of general interest are as follows: That our churches be advised to employ only properly accredited evangelists.

With reference to the National Prohibition the synod resolved: That we will not support any candidate for Congress next year, who is not avowedly opposed to any change in the Volstead Act that would allow the return of light wine and beer, or that would, in any other way weaken that law; and, furthermore, we will oppose the nomination and election of any other candidate for public office who is not right on the prohibition question." Synod approved limitation of armaments.

Rev. Benjamin Markley Nyce, D.D., was appointed Chairman of the Committee on Christian Education. Plans are being made for holding Evangelistic meetings in the churches throughout the synod. Rev. S. S. Hilscher, D.D., is Chairman of Synod's Committee on Evangelism. The next meeting will be held in the First Church in Norfolk.

KENTUCKY LETTER.

BY REV. JAMES F. PRICE, D.D.

Rev. J. F. Claycomb had fine services at Kuttawa the first Sabbath in November. He received two members into the church that day.

Rev. J. F. Claycomb has accepted a call to the Providence group and will take charge of that work the first of December.

Rev. L. F. Goodwin is assisting Rev. J. A. Callan in a meeting at Smith's Grove. The prospects are fine for a good meeting.

James T. Smith recently made a tour through Edmonson County. He hopes soon to establish a new mission at Chyroc. He recently held services at Pine Grove Church. They are soliciting funds at this church building.

Rev. J. R. Crawford is holding services at the Kentucky Avenue Church, Paducah, Ky., preparatory to special services to begin Nov. 27.

The writer is now in a meeting at Morgantown, Ky. Morgantown is the county seat of Butler County. We have a good manse there. Butler County is really Presbyterian territory. What we need is a man stationed at Morgantown on a living salary. Let him preach at Morgantown, and at outstations around. There are six or eight places where he could easily establish work. We shall lose ground if we do not soon get a good man to live on this field and cultivate it.

IDAHO LETTER.

BY REV. J. H. BARTON, D.D.

A meeting was recently held in Boise for the purpose of organizing a Home Mission Council for the state, the same to be auxiliary to the National Home Mission Council. Eight denominations were represented: Methodist Episcopal, Congregationalist, Christian, Presbyterian, United Presbyterian, Episcopal, Lutheran and Free Methodist. Rev. J. H. Baird was elected president and Rev. L. G. Wright secretary. A committee was appointed to draft a constitution and report at a meeting to be called by the president. It is hoped that this organization will be the means of promoting comity among the denominations resulting in greater efficiency and a saving in both men and money.

Rev. A. B. Irwin, D.D., who has been serving the Gooding Church as Stated Supply, closed his work there the last Sabbath in October and the field is now vacant. It is hoped that a minister can be soon secured and the work carried forward vigorously.

The Bellevue Church, after being vacant nearly a year, has secured as supply Mr. H. M. Shirk, a licentiate. Mr. Shirk has had considerable experience in Christian work, having served several churches as stated supply, and good results are anticipated.

Our work in Idaho is suffering as a result of the financial stringency. We hoped that when the crops had been harvested we would see a decided improvement, but in this we were disappointed. Financial conditions have never before been so bad. This is especially true in farming communities. Crops are unusually good this season, but prices of hay and grain will not cover the cost of production. Many of the farmers have nothing for their summer's work and are in debt besides. Under these circumstances the churches find it very difficult to meet their obligations for either local support or benevolences. Some are vacant because they are not able to provide a pastor's salary.

This is a very truthful expression. The paper is a veritable companion to me; by your grace and a little money, you have been with me for many years and now, since I am almost entirely deaf, my companionship is largely through the printed page. The Herald and Presbyter is greatly appreciated, especially as to its safety and saneness as a unit, and the depth and richness of its component parts. I want to continue in the companionship. Enclosed find the money order and accept my word as that of a friend. E. W. B.

MISSION WORK

MISSION WORK IN PORTO RICO.

BY REV. ARTHUR JAMES.

Is not the Catholic Church looking after the spiritual needs of the Porto Rican people? This question, though it does not bother the missionary on the field, besets him on all sides the moment he sets foot in the homeland.

In the first place the Roman Catholic Church itself only claims to reach fifty per cent of the population. Without discounting this claim there are left 650,000 people for the Protestant churches to evangelize. Taking into consideration the loose requirements for membership in the Catholic Church the evangelical forces have easily one million of the million and three hundred thousand people to work among. If after four centuries of exclusive control of this island people the Catholic Church have no greater numerical results than this, surely the Protestant Churches have ample reason for the occupation of the territory.

Churches and other religious organizations are not to be judged merely by the number of adherents. Some of the smaller organizations have the greatest spiritual results. Is, then, the type of Catholicism practised in Porto Rico meeting the spiritual needs of the Porto Rican people? It is not a difficult matter to get an unbiased reply to this paper. Professor Ross in his "South of Panama," tells of seeing "The Butcher Shop of the Holy Spirit," and of an advertisement for the "Wine of the Last Supper," and of half-caste priests in the Andes whose annual fees from the ignorant Indian would make the stipends of our metropolitan pastors pale into insignificance. Twenty years of American occupation of Porto Rico has not changed this state of things a great deal.

On Dec. 17, 1919, some astronomical quack predicted the end of the world by a curious arrangement of the heavenly bodies. The priests of Porto Rico seized on this prediction as a means to stimulate interest in their Church. For a week before the 17th they worked night and day giving special masses and hearing confessions and, of course, collecting the fees connected with this kind of work. When the day passed without any disturbance the devout were informed that their faithfulness had been rewarded and, as a thanksgiving they should join in a special pilgrimage to the nearest shrine. This they did to the financial benefit of the priests of the particular shrine chosen.

Lack of conviction does not form a part of any criticism of our Catholic fellow-citizens of the States. Indeed, we Protestants may learn much from their faithfulness to their Church and their observance of ceremonial obligations. The reverse is true in Porto Rico. The Protestant is eulogized by the Catholic for his loyalty to his Church, and this same Catholic will bewail the lack of interest and lack of conviction of his fellow Catholic. Through her interest in the public school the missionary's wife became intimately acquainted with Terest, a Catholic girl. The acquaintance developed to such an extent that the priest of the town forbade the girl under the pain of penance to visit the missionary's home. As soon as she could get to the Manse, Teresa had to tell her friends of the prohibition. For this act at the next confession she was sentenced to say the Lord's prayer twenty times. Not at all dismayed, and far from contrition, she rattled off her "Padre nuestros" next day during the school recess. Apparently she is as good a Catholic as before and her visits to her Protestant friends are perhaps more frequent than ever.

It has been suggested that the Catholic Church recognizes this shallow tendency among its followers in Latin countries. Certainly some of the requirements are not nearly so rigorous for the Porto Rican Catholics as they are for their northern co-religionists. With the other Latin-American Catholics the Porto Ricans were relieved from fasting, and from abstinence from meat on Friday, by special dispensation of the Pope centuries ago, and the Latin-American carries this privilege with him wherever he goes.

The anti-social nature of the Catholic system is better seen in Porto Rico than perhaps in any place under the American flag. To the native it is the greatest supporter of the caste system that dominates the island. This is not only seen in the indifferent and antagonistic attitude of the Catholic Church to the temperance and social purity campaigns, but is seen even in the administration of the sacraments. The seats in the Catholic churches in Porto Rico are so arranged that the wealthy and socially prominent have the best positions while the poor are crowded on the benches at the back of the church. The large number of people in Porto Rico living together without civil or religious sanction, is charged by most people to the prohibitory marriage fees of the Catholic clergy in Spanish days. In the matter of funerals the priest will mumble a few formularies for the country peon who can only pay a few cents; for those a little higher in the social scale he will walk down the steps of the church with the procession; for the rich families, however, he and his assistants, in their finest regalia, will go to the graveyard with the cortege.

There are, of course, many other reasons for the existence of Protestant Missions in Porto Rico than the shortcomings of the Catholic Church. To the missionary, the dense ignorance, the immorality, the sickness, the high mortality rate, together with these facts about the dominant religion of the island, indicate a sin-sick people and the need of a robust faith. It is the missionary's privilege to offer these spiritually-impoorished folk the open Bible and the Living Christ. It is his joy to see the Gospel of Jesus Christ dispel the dark superstition that has for centuries passed as religion, and to see in its place a simple trust in the infinite Savior.

ILLINOIS SYNODICAL.

The Presbyterian women of Illinois at their recent Synodical meeting voted unanimously to form a joint Home and Foreign Society with one president. The spirit throughout the whole meeting was sweet and gracious, and as an expression of appreciation and gratitude to Mrs. A. G. Beebe, of Chicago, for her years of splendid service as president of the Home Mission work, the women presented her with a crescent brooch, with a pearl to represent each presbytery in the state. The new president of the joint society, Mrs. B. H. Pinnell, of Kansas, Ill., is especially adapted to take up this new work, having served for several years as president of the Foreign Society.

DEATH OF MRS UNDERWOOD.

Mrs Lillias Norton Underwood, widow of Rev. Dr. Horace G. Underwood, of Korea, died on Oct. 29, and her death is a serious loss. Dr. Underwood, who recently died, had been the leading influence in missions in Korea, going there in 1884. Mrs. Underwood was appointed by the Board in 1888, and was an able and useful worker in the mission both before and since her husband's death. She was deeply evangelistic and deplored the entrance of modernistic views into the Korean mission work, and did all she could to withstand the influence, knowing that it was destructive of the very life and power of the Gospel. She had been in feeble health for some time, but her death is very greatly lamented.

Enclosed find check for my subscription. Thank you kindly. Appreciate your fine paper. It's spiritual standard and scholastic note appeals to me. F. E. S.

Please find enclosed M. O. for $2.50 for which renew my subscription to your paper for another year. I have been a reader of your paper for many years when it was just the "Presbyter." I suppose it has been sixty years, and I would not like to do without it. It always has the true ring.

All the Walnut Hills evangelical churches will hold a union service on Thanksgiving morning in the Orpheum Theater.

President W. J. Hutchins, of Berea College, a member of Cleveland Presbytery, preached last Sabbath morning in the Walnut Hills Congregational Church.

ST. LOUIS AND VICINITY.

Church Extension Week, Nov. 13-20, in the St. Louis Presbytery, was carried out understandingly in the churches. Many of the ministers who exchanged pulpits said, at a meeting of the Presbytery, Monday, that they found in the various congregations a better appreciation of the movement than ever before. The raising of the $50,000 as a revolving fund, to be paid in 1922, is generally approved. Attractive booklets, with illustrations showing the churches which have been benefitted by Church Extension funds in the past, and the other inadequate buildings which need assistance now, were distributed in the pews, on the opening Sabbath. Rev. R. Calvin Dobson, Executive Secretary of Church Extension, filled the pulpit of the Second Church. The pastoral exchange on that morning was general, with the sermon theme, "City Evangelism." A conference of Presbyterian laymen was held on Thursday evening, at the First Church, not for pledges, but for the better dissemination of information.

Roy C. Linberg, a member of the First Church, was received under the care of the presbytery last week, as a candidate for the ministry. The presbytery voted to change its hour of meeting, for the monthly adjourned sessions, to 7:30 in the evening, with a view to bringing out the elders, many of whom can not come at the morning hour. The meetings will henceforth be held in the Second Church. Rev. W. A. Murdoch, who is supplying the Southampton Church, was received into the presbytery, from the Free Church of Scotland.

A general meeting of ministers and elders (including all Presbyterian communions) will be held on the day of Dr. Swearingen's visit, Dec. 13th.

Rev. David Reiter gave an address before the St. Louis Christian Endeavor Union, at its meeting, Tuesday of last week, at the Curby Memorial Church.

First Church is one of four neighboring churches in which divisional meetings have been held, in the last week, of the Missouri State Sabbath-school Association, whose main sessions are in the Third Baptist Church. Never was better co-operation seen than in the thorough preliminary preparation for the entertainment of delegates. It was desired to open private homes for the visitors, with payment of $1 for night's lodging and breakfast. Each congregation of the city took up this matter, with a definite quota, and thus the more than 1,000 delegates were entertained, without resorting much to hotels, which are now overcrowded. Gov. Hyde was one of the speakers.

Miss Edna S. Cole, who is the Second Church's missionary in Siam, is spending several days with this church. She addressed the Woman's Missionary Society on Thursday, and the Sabbath-school on Nov. 13th, as well as the midweek service, last Wednesday. She told in a simple, convincing way, of the need of these Buddhist people for the Christian religion, although they are physically prosperous.

A dinner for fathers and sons at McCausland Avenue Church, last Friday evening, was attended by more than 100. Addresses were made by popular speakers on civic subjects.

Four of the Presbyterian pastors gave addresses, among others, at the thirty-fifth annual day of praise and prayer, at Boyle Memorial Center, last Friday. These were Rev. R. M. Davis, D.D.; Rev. W. B. Lampe, D.D.; Rev. William Crowe, D.D.; and Rev. W. F. McMillin, D.D. Besides these, the Boyle Center pastor, Rev. Paul E. Nelson, spoke, and there was a testimony meeting by the veteran city missionary, Mrs. Sue Owns.

A Mission Study class, to continue on Tuesday mornings for six weeks, has been started by the Women's Missionary Society at the Second Church. Mrs. William M. C. Bryan is the leader.

OHIO.

The First Church of Canton has just celebrated the one hundredth anniversary of its organization. It has had a vigorous and useful life. Never has it been more prosperous and aggressive than now. On the first page of this paper are the pictures of the pastors and elders, a group of earnest and devote Presbyterian men. During the pastorate of Mr. Wilson nearly 200 members have been received—less than a year, and the entire membership is about eleven hundred.

The church building at Forest has been redecorated in its auditorium, Sabbath-school room and basement. A new, indirect lighting system, and a new furnace have been secured. At the recent communion five members were received. Rev. James S. Freeman is pastor.

Rev. Edward B. Shaw of Belle Center, has been called to the North Church of Philadelphia, Pa., and will assume his duties there Dec. 1. In the two and a half years of his pastorate the net increase to his membership has been eighty-five. Gifts to local expenses, double; to benevolences, fourfold. The church is in the best condition in its history and is one of the most attractive fields in Marion Presbytery.

KENTUCKY.

Rev. E. N. Hart, of Prestonburg, Ky., has accepted a call to Marion, Ky., and goes, greatly to the grief of his people. He has done a great work at Prestonburg during the past five years, finding only twenty members, a dilapidated building, and, on his first Sabbath, a congregation of twelve and a Sabbath school of thirteen. The membership now is 127, the Sabbath school 200, and the building is in excellent and attractive condition. The hope is that he may duplicate in the needy field at Marion what he has done in the church he now leaves. The Clerk of Session, E. E. Clark, writes most appreciatively of him and his work.

Kentucky Avenue Church, Paducah, Rev. J. Russell Crawford, pastor, is engaged in evangelistic services, beginning Nov. 21st. During the evenings of this week Mr. Crawford is being assisted by the local pastors of Paducah; one each evening.

INDIANA.

The Fourth Church of Indianapolis is arranging to celebrate the seventieth anniversary of its organization the latter part of November. The church has an excellent building and a growing membership. Although it has never been a large church and it has always been a good and useful church, with a cultured and devoted people. Dr. E. H. Kistler is pastor.

Walnut Street Church, Evansville, is celebrating the centennial of its organization this week. Dr. John Q. Adams, of Auburn Theological Seminary, the oldest surviving pastor, will preach the sermon on Sabbath morning, Nov. 27th, and take part in the exercises of the week. Dr. E. P. Whallon is the only survivor of the Committee, consisting of Rev. Messrs. Martin, Jones, Morey and McCarer, that installed Dr. Adams in 1879. Dr. S. N. Wilson, Dr. Otis A. Smith, Dr. C. N. Nickerson and Dr. J. W. Kennedy have also been pastors. Rev. L. G. Whitcomb is the present pastor.

Beech Grove Church, twelve miles east of Salem; the Walnut Ridge Church, ten miles north-west, and the Delaney Church, twelve miles north, make up a rural home mission field in Washington County, Indiana, New Albany Presbytery. Fortunately most the farmers own their homes and there are few tenants. Rev. Claire S. Adams, of Knoxville, Tenn., recently assisted in evangelistic meetings at Beech Grove and Walnut Ridge. So far this year there have been fifty-seven accessions to these churches. It is a difficult and trying field to serve, the churches so distant from each other, and each with its own peculiar problems quite unlike that of the others. But there is an exceptional opportunity for service. Rev. H. B. Gebhart, of Salem, is pastor, and is doing a faithful and good work. The churches are well organized, and have good buildings.

The Brotherhood of the First Church of Vincennes, Rev. Dr. A. Kistler, pastor, enjoyed a largely attended banquet at the church on the evening of Nov. 14, with a fine address by Rev. Dr. W. J. Johnson on "The Greatest Blot on our National Government." Mr. E. N. Haskins, President of the Brotherhood, preside.

Rev. B. H. Rankin, of Aurora, has accepted a call to Attica and begins his new work Dec. 1.

Rev. Dr. John Robertson, one-time minister of the City Temple, Glasgow, Scotland, held evangelistic services at the Presbyterian Church at Elwood, Rev. H. C. Cornuelle, pastor, Nov. 13-20. Large congregations and good interest marked the services. Dr. Robertson preached on "Jesus as John Saw him."

Rev. Matthew F. Smith, D.D., was installed as pastor of the First Church of Indianapolis last Sabbath evening, by a committee of Indianapolis Presbytery, consisting of Rev. Dr. M. L. Haines, Rev. Dr. E. H. Kistler, D.D., and Rev. F. W. Backmeyer. Dr. Smith has been successfully at work here for several weeks.

Union Thanksgiving services will be held in the Fourth Presbyterian Church, Indianapolis, Thursday at 10 A.M.

In the city of 5,000 population over 3,000 were in the various Sabbath schools. The cornerstone was laid in 1903, and the Sabbath school portion has been occupied since 1906. By great effort and sacrifice the building has been completed, as an adequate church home in this headquarters of Mormonism. The dedication occurred on the fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the church. Rev. Josiah Welch, the first pastor, assisted by Dr. Sheldon Jackson and Dr. George S. Broadman organized the church Nov. 12th, 1871, with eleven members. Rev. Dr. R. G. McNeice was the second pastor, from 1877 to 1897. During his pastorate the membership grew from 68 to 300. Dr. W. M. ## ROOSEVELT'S NINE POINTS ON CHURCH-GOING.

1. In this actual world, a churchless community, a community where men have abandoned and scoffed at or ignored their religious needs, is a community on the rapid down grade.

2. Church work and church attendance mean the cultivation of the habit of feeling some responsibility for others.

3. There are enough holidays for most of us. Sabbaths differ from other holidays in the fact that there are fifty-two of them every year. Therefore on Sabbaths go to church.

4. Yes, I know all the excuses. I know that one can worship the Creator in a grove of trees, or by a running brook, or in a man's own house just as well as in church. But I also know as a matter of cold fact the average man does not thus worship.

5. He may not hear a good sermon at church. He will hear a sermon by a good man who, with his good wife, is engaged all the week in making hard lives a little easier.

6. He will listen to and take part in reading some beautiful passages from the Bible. And if he is not familiar with the Bible, he has suffered a loss.

7. He will take part in singing some good hymns.

8. He will meet and nod or speak to good, quiet neighbors. He will come away feeling a little more charitably toward all the world, even toward those excessively foolish young men who regard church-going as a soft performance.

9. I advocate a man's joining in church work for the sake of showing his faith by his works.

A SLOVAK REMONSTRANCE.

A communication from Slovakia occasioned by some utterances in the recent Pan-Presbyterian Council at Pittsburgh, has been received by Rev. Wm. Regnemer, and translated by Rev. Frank Uherka, editor of the Slovak Presbyterian, at Ambridge, Pa. The writer is Rev. Fedor Ruppeldt, a prominent Slovak Lutheran pastor, who had a course of study in Scotland, and is acquainted with many Scottish divines. He takes strong exceptions to misleading maps, especially in the pamphlet "Struggles and Trials," which he can only regard as an illustration of Magyar propaganda. The evident intention was to color extensive regions with red, to indicate Magyar territory, and make the colors of Slovak, Russian and Rumanian populations relatively insignificant, disintegrated remnants, inhabitants of forests and mountains. He is indignant at such an untruthful representation. It is true that some parts of Slovakia are mountainous; but he scorns the description, "uninhabited" as applied to them. Mr. Ruppeldt's own father was born in one of these uninhabited districts. Magyars possess regions not mountainous, fertile plains, yet instances occur of intervals between their villages, of twenty to twenty-five kilometers. Moreover, in the "uninhabited" mountain districts are villages, thickly settled, cultivated by Slovaks or Russians or Rumanians. Hundreds of Slovak villages are there, and the letter intimates that among them are thousands of Slovak Calvinist, who should have their own classis or presbytery. He says that one might as well assert that the Rocky Mountains are uninhabited, no English spoken there, and that they do not and should not belong to America! These misrepresentations also ignore the existence of Slovak colonies, some of which he names, in Magyar regions, and that twenty to thirty thousand Slovaks are in some of the lowlands of central Hungary. Even in Budapest, according to an old Magyar census, there were forty thousand Slovaks. He warmly protests against such a propaganda for Magyar interests in connection with an international religious assemblage. Pittsburgh, Pa. Chas E. Edwards.

It is with pleasure I send this check to renew my subscription once more to your paper. It seems to me I would not enjoy life without my church paper. It keeps me from feeling that I am not an "old fogey," too antiquated for these loose, fast times, when ballast is woefully needed, lest we lose our balance and go under. Your editorials are positive and to the point—your answers to all inquiries firm and clear. You sit steady all times, and best of all never depart from the faith of your fathers in your teaching. MORRISON—Mr. James A. Morrison, of Sweet Springs, Mo., died at his home on Oct. 25. He had been a reader of the Herald and Presbyter for over fifty years, and was an earnest Christian man. He is survived by his wife.

HANNA—Lena Scott Hanna, of Sterling, Kan., was born in Ireland. She was the daughter of Hugh and Mary Barber Hanna. Being a child of the Covenant, she early claimed the fellowship of Jesus Christ. Her sister, Mary J. Hanna, because of an accident, became a life-long invalid, and for two one years, until the death of the invalid sister, M Lena gave her most tender and skillful care. Of those who were admitted to the inner circle of the home could know the faith, courage, sympathy and hope that radiated from these quiet and chaste lives. Early taught in the Holy Scriptures, the hearts and minds were well stored with the precious treasure. After the death of the sister, Miss Lena gradually failed in strength, but not in courage. Her ready cheer so covered her illness that her most intimate friends did not know the seriousness of her condition. Her death occurred at the Sterling Hospital, Oct. 21. A funeral service was held at her home in Sterling, Kan., on Wednesday, Oct. 20, conducted by Rev. Edwin S. Evans, of Arlington, Kan., assisted by Rev. W. P. McGary, of Sterling. The text used on this occasion was one selected from the Bible: "Unto him that loveth us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood and hath made us kings and priests unto God his Father; to him be glory and dominion forever; and ever; Amen." As a Sabbath-school teacher Miss Lena has exerted a wide and helpful influence. Many who have studied the Word under her leadership will join with nephews, nieces and intimate friends to cherish her memory and delight in her reward. E. S. E.

The Presbytery of Chicago Approves

A recent meeting of the Presbytery of Chicago adopted the following resolution as certified by its Permanent Clerk, Rev. E. N. Ware, D.D. The Chairman of the Committee is Rev. Duncan C. Milner, D.D. The resolution reads as follows:

"Resolved, that we heartily approve the work of our BOARD OF TEMPERANCE AND MORAL WELFARE, which is zealously carrying out its progressive plans for the education of our citizens, not only as to the evils of the drink habit and traffic, but also its war against other forms of vice, that not only peril the morals of young people but are seriously threatening the sanctity of family life."

THE TWO SIDES OF IT.

There was a girl who always said
Her fate was very hard;
From the one thing she wanted most
She always was debarred.
There always was a cloudy spot
Somewhere within her sky;
Nothing was ever quite just right,
She used to say, and sigh.

And yet her sister, strange to say,
Whose lot was quite the same,
Found something pleasant for herself
In every day that came.
Or course things tangled up sometimes
For just a little while;
But nothing ever stayed all wrong,
She used to say, and smile.

So one girl sighed and one girl smiled
Through all their lives together,
It didn't come from luck or fate,
From clear or cloudy weather.
The reason lay within their hearts
And colored all outside;
One chose to hope and one to mope,
And so they smiled and sighed.

CHAPTER II.

Two blocks down street from the Varden home, Professor Phineas Darker sat in the livingroom of "Mrs Martin's Boarding House," waiting for the sound of the electric gong announcing dinner. While he waited, he occupied himself with the evening paper, glancing over its pages casually and with a bored expression as he noted the customary glaring headlines announcing murders, robberies, divorce cases, automobile accidents, strikes, and other items of supposed public interest. He was about to throw it down in disgust as unworthy of the attention of so cultured and superior a man as himself, when his eye chanced to light upon a paragraph announcing a lecture by a noted English savant, which was to be given that very evening in one of the downtown theatres.

"Why!" he ejaculated to himself. "Why! I would not miss that lecture for anything. It is just what I need to hear in connection with that next lesson on economics. I must hear it—I simply must! What good fortune that I saw the notice in time! But—" the memory of a pile of student theses on a subject connected with that same economics course suddenly presented itself to him. Every one of those papers must be read and graded before the next recitation in that subject, and this evening was the only free time he had in which to do it. How could he manage to hear that very necessary lecture, and yet examine those very tiresome, but equally necessary papers? A bright thought came to him. Miss Varden, the Dean's secretary, had acted as reader of student papers for various burdened professors at various other times.

He himself had never, previously, felt the need of such assistance; but now that the desire to attend the evening's lecture was strong upon him, he decided to request the help which she had rendered so willingly to others. He did not stop to realize that her work for the other professors had been done during regular working hours, nor consider that the request he had concluded to make was going to be a decided imposition. Professor Darker had considered only himself for so many years, that no thought of inconveniencing the college secretary intruded itself upon his consciousness. Therefore, as soon as his dinner was dispatched, he changed his ordinary garb for his Sunday best, as befitting one who expected to meet a great man, gathered up his pile of theses and betook himself to the old Varden mansion.

Mammy Lou looked at the caller suspiciously when she answered the door bell, frowning as she noted the big pile of papers he carried and guessing that her "Honey Chile" was going to be robbed of her expected leisure. It was with a reluctant grunt that she acknowledged that her mistress was at home, and ushered the intruder into the cheerful fire-lit livingroom.

Miss Varden greeted her unexpected caller most graciously, although she wondered in her heart why this man, with whom she had a bare speaking acquaintance, had come to her home.

The professor had laid his pile of papers beside his hat on the hall table, so the girl had no idea he was there for assistance, else she might not have been so cordial in her welcome. She had known Professor Darker by reputation and by sight during the entire ten years in which he had been connected with Belmont College, hearing him spoken of by the Dean, as "a master of economics"; by the younger men of the faculty, as "the old man"; by the irreverent students, as "Finney Darker." But she had never more than passed a "good morning" with him when they chanced to meet in the halls.

Ensnconced in a big easy chair before the glowing fire, the professor looked about him with pleased and appreciative eyes while his hostess "made" conversation as best she could until he should condescend to inform her why she was honored by his unexpected presence. The living room of the Varden home was a spacious apartment which had served also as a study for old Professor Varden for many years. There were great cases of choice books adorned here and there by busts of noted authors. The pictures on the walls were carefully-chosen copies of some of the world's most famous paintings. An old-fashioned square piano stood at one side of the long room. There were easy chairs, and an inviting couch; an ample study-table with its shaded lamp; and over all, the dancing firelight spread its cheerful glow, shining upon the polish of the rare antique furniture, but kindly casting softening shadows upon the well-worn rugs and faded curtains. It was a charming room, a "home-y" room, a most inviting room to a man of scholarly mind; and as the professor mentally compared it with his cramped quarters and the public living room at Mrs. Martin's, the wish entered his heart that he might call such a place as this his home. He was so pleased with his surroundings, so comfortable in the big easy-chair before the fire, so entertained by the conversation of his young hostess, that he almost forgot both his errand and the lecture that lay beyond it. The chiming of the half-hour from the clock above the mantel recalled both things to his mind, and in sudden haste, because of the lateness of the hour, he broke in upon what Miss Varden was saying:

"O—ah!—yes quite true! quite true! Ah! Miss-Miss-Varden, I believe you act as reader for some of the college teachers, do you not?"

"Why," hesitated the girl, surprised by sudden interruption, "I have done a little of that work when the professors were ill, or were called away; but, as you know, the Dean keeps me very busy with the regular office routine. It is only now and then—by special arrangement with him—that I have been able to accommodate some of the teachers in that way."

"Yes, yes. I understand. Very commendable of you, I am sure. I—ah!—I rarely—indeed, I never hitherto have trusted any such work with any one, for I believe a teacher can better understand his own students than any disinterested person can do; but, well, this evening there is a very important meeting which I wish to attend—a very important meeting, indeed—so I have taken the liberty of bringing over a few theses on economics which must be read and graded before the next recitation, and I shall be very much obliged—yes, very greatly obliged—if you will do them for me. You can hand them to me tomorrow after chapel services. That will be sufficiently early.

And now I must be going—I really must hasten—if I would get down to the Colonial in time to hear the great Dr. Van Dusen."

He rose as he spoke, and almost before his hostess had recovered from her surprise, had bowed himself away.

Mammy Lou closed the front door behind him with unusual vigor, then as she turned to go back to the kitchen, discovered the pile of papers which the caller had left upon the hall table. She went to the door of the livingroom and said:

"Honey Chile, dat ole man done lef' a heap ob he papahs heah on de table. Do you s'pose I bettah hollah aftah him to come back an' git 'em?"

"No," Miss Varden answered wearily, "he left them for me to read for him. Will you please bring them in here, Mammy Lou?"

"Whaffor he lef' dem wif you? Why doan't he read foh hese'f? Don't he know you plum tiahed out aftah yo' wo'k all day? Whaffor a big stout man lak him want to shove he's wuk onto a pore tiahed lil gal lak you?"

"That is all right, Mammy Lou," the girl assured her. "This is the sort of work I am expected to do, so don't worry any more about it but just let me get busy."

"Yes," grumbled Mammy Lou as she poked up the fire with vigorous thrusts, "Dat sho' am what youah paid to do, foh jes' eight houahs in a day. Youah nebber paid to wuk all night too. What dat fool man thinkin' 'bout, any way?"

But Miss Varden, after one dismayed groan at sight of the pile of fifty theses, set desperately to work and was oblivious to Mammy Lou's grumblings.

As for Professor Darker, he carried the memory of that cheerful livingroom with him through the chilly streets, even through the profundities of the great man's lecture, and back to his cheerless boarding-house. The memory stayed with him through following days until the desire to return for another visit was so strong upon him that he invented the excuse that "he would like to consult some of the books which Dr. Varden had once mentioned to him." "No, he would not take the liberty of carrying them home to read—something might happen to them—and he knew his dear departed friend had cherished them greatly. No, if Miss Varden would be so kind as to tolerate his presence for a brief time, he would just sit there by his dear friend's table to examine the precious volumes."

Thus it gradually came about that the pompous professor became a frequent visitor at the Varden home, so much so, that Miss Nancy became accustomed to seeing him seated there in her father's chair, poring over her father's books, until it almost seemed as if the dear old times had returned again and her days of solitary loneliness were over.

And the professor, leaning back in his comfortable chair to digest some profound exegesis, began to look approvingly at the quiet, dignified woman across the hearth from him and to connect her with the other elements of his physical and mental satisfaction.

Gradually, a daring thought crept into his mind and grew and grew until the professor was fairly carried away with it. Why not secure all these good and desirable things—all the abundant property which old Dr. Varden had accumulated—for his own daily and constant and life-long enjoyment, by making Miss Varden his wife? To be sure he was much older than she—nearly, if not twice as old—so far as years counted. But was she not old beyond her years? Had she not associated so closely and entirely with her lamented father as to have absorbed his ideas and become practically a generation ahead of herself? No doubt she had never received an offer of marriage from any man, and therefore would feel duly and highly honored if given the opportunity to become his wife.

Mammy Lou, hovering ever about her "Honey Chile," making frequent visits into the livingroom "to fix de fiah," to consult her mistress on trivial household duties, to bring a letter or a book or the evening paper, watched the intruding professor with hawklike, resentful eyes, noted his increasing proprietary air, his critical study of the woman across the hearth from him, his growing expression of smug satisfaction, and seeing, grew sullenly jealous and angry.

"Ole Bumblebee!" she exclaimed to herself shaking her fist at his retreating figure one evening. "Mebbe you tink yo' smaht enuff to catch my Honey Chile an' steal all de sweetness out'n huh life. Mebbe yo' t'ink yo' git all dis house an' all dem books foh yo' own. Mebbe yo' call'late dat Mammy Lou gwine to slave 'roun' foh you all-de res' ob you'ah days. Mebbe, yes? Well. Mammy Lou tell yo' right now, you's gwine to be flambusticated—dat's what yo' are."

CHUMS.

"He lives across the street from us,
An' ain't as big as me;
His mother takes in washin' 'cause
They're poor as they can be,
But every night he brings his slate
And then I do his sums,
And help him get his lessons straight
'Cause him and me is chums."

BABY'S CHARMS.

BY ELIZABETH MOODY.

(Aged Ten.)

A baby's voice's like music—
As it falls upon my ear—
A snatch of baby music
Wonderful to hear!

Its smile is like the sunshine
Which shines upon the flowers,
Or like the glistening dewdrops
Hanging from the bowers.

Its rosy lips upheld
For just a single kiss,
Are to my lonely heart
A bit of heavenly bliss.

Its chubby arms cling tightly
Around my neck, and lo!
They're chained fast to my heart—
And I'll never let them go!

A PRICKLY PREACHER.

Tom, Tom! You are the most careless boy I ever knew. Now you have upset grandma's work-basket, and the spools have run everywhere. No, you needn't come back. I'll pick it up for you!" And Marian gathered up and replaced the contents of the basket, which Tom had upset in his hasty passage through the room.

"I'd say you were a brick, Marian, if you hadn't scolded me so!" exclaimed Tom, as he rushed through the front door to join some boys who were waiting to go fishing.

"Sister, I can't get this sum right. Won't you help me?" asked little Nellie, coming into the room with her slate.

"You must be dreadful stupid, not to understand such a simple thing as that," Marian answered, as she took the slate impatiently out of the child's hand. "Now, if I have to stop and fuss with your old arithmetic, I sha'n't have any time to practice my music!"

"Never mind," said Nellie, meekly.

"Oh, you needn't go away. I suppose I can spare the time somehow." And very clearly, though in a disagreeable manner, Marian explained the puzzling example, so Nellie found out where her mistake had been.

"Marian!" cried her mother from the kitchen, "I'm afraid Tom forgot to stop at the grocer's and order the peaches. Did you remind him again before he went?"

"No'm! I thought he ought to remember for once without being reminded all the time," Marian answered pettishly. "I suppose I have got to go and order them."

"You need not if you are busy," her mother answered. "I can manage to wait for them till this afternoon, when Tom comes home."

"No, that isn't worth while; I'll go." And Marian put on her hat and executed the errand.

It was a warm morning, and when Marian returned, heated from her walk, she went out on the porch to cool off.

A green, prickly chestnut-bur had fallen from the tree in front of the house, and grandpa pushed it mediately about with his cane.

"It's too bad that anything with as good a heart as a chestnut-bur should have such a prickly, sharp covering, isn't it?" he said.

"Yes; I'd rather go without the chestnuts than hurt my hands opening such a prickly bur," answered Marian, fanning herself slowly with her broad-brimmed hat.

"Yet it's only on the outside that it is sharp," said grandfather. "It has a velvet lining to its prickly exterior, and there are no sweeter nuts than the brown, polished beauties that nestle in their soft hiding-place. That chestnut-bur makes me think of some one I know."

"Who?" asked Marian, with interest.

"A little friend of mine, who has the kindest heart possible. She is always ready to do a kindness for any one, and she never refuses to grant a favor; but she always is so ungracious about her kind deeds, and says so many sharp, irritating things, that one is tempted to forget the warm heart underneath and remember only the prickly-bur. If she would do her kind deeds in a kindly way, they would be doubly appreciated."

Marian blushed. "I suppose you mean me, grandfather," she said, after a little pause. "I didn't think it mattered much if I did grumble a little, as long as I always do what I am asked."

"It makes one feel sometimes as if it was hardly worth while to get the fingers pricked for the sake of the nut," grandfather answered. "Let this prickly preacher preach you a sermon, dear, and teach you to do deeds kindly."

THE BARN PARTY.

Down in the barn the light from several lanterns shone from the big, open doors. A half dozen boys and girls came down the lane.

"Oh, look! The others are there first," cried Grace, pointing to shadowy figures moving within.

"Because we had to wait for Patty," laughed one of the boys. "If she doesn't work faster than she did getting ready, we'll put her out," and he tweaked the offender's long braid.

Patty laughed back good-naturedly. "I hurried so, I couldn't find a thing," she declared. "Come on I'll show you I can run now," and she dashed for the open doors. It was a breathless lot of workers that joined those already on the scene. They were not allowed a minute's rest.

"Here you are," cried the largest boy in the barn. "Take a pan in your lap and rub two ears of corn together like this," and he made the loosened grains rattle into his pan. "It's easy and it's fun. Get to work, and see who can have the most shelled cobs in his pile at the end of the job."

That sent them all flying for pans and ears of corn out of the big bushel hampers nearby.

Almost any sort of job is easy and good fun when it is done in company with a lot of other willing workers. It was all the more fun because of the loving, helpful thought that lay back of it.

Patty had discovered that Aunt Margaret Barnes had a chance to buy a lot of corn on the cob—enough to feed her hens for months. But Aunt Margaret's hard-working old hands were so stiff and bent with rheumatism that she had said, in telling Patty about it:

"It's a wonderful bargain, but I don't know how I'll ever get it shelled, after all. It's going to be hard on my stiff fingers."

Then Patty had said, as quick as a flash:

"Indeed you'll not shell it yourself. I'll get the boys and girls together and we'll make a party of it. Pay? Now, Aunt Margaret! Who ever heard of being paid to come to a party?"

Patty won the race, with the biggest pile of cobs. But they all won the grateful thanks of the old friend, through Patty's clever idea of the barn party.

POOR MARY!

Mary had a lovely face
With nature's blush aglow,
But Mary painted both her cheeks
And nature had to go.

Mary had two lovely ears
As shapely as could be,
But Mary hid them with her hair
So none could ever see.

Mary had a little frock,
The latest style, no doubt,
And when she got inside of it
She was over half-way out.

CARRYING ON.

"Are you coming, Pen Harman?" asked Zelma Freer.

Pen's steady, smiling eyes seemed to be trying to draw her friend's attention from her wistful lips. "Not I," she replied. "Chemistry."

"But, Pen, a trip like this is worth a chemistry lesson ten times over."

Pen's eyes lowered to a little tintype on her desk, a cheap photograph of a girl in a poor, ill-fitting dress with the big sleeves of the eighties. Yet, poor though the photograph was, it showed the eagerness in the dark eyes, the firmness in the sweet mouth. "You see," Pen said, "I can't fail Helen."

"Who is Helen?" Zelma inquired. I've often wondered. Why, she must be old enough to be your grandmother—almost!"

"She was my aunt, mother's youngest sister, who died when she was eighteen. She was a pioneer's daughter. If you want to know what that means, you should hear mother tell of her childhood in the Far West—of the blizzards in winter and the droughts in summer; of the bare plains without a tree for shelter; of the failure of the crops year after year; of the hard—oh, heartbreakingly hard!—lives of the women, who had no pleasures, no conveniences, nothing except endless work. Mother married and escaped, but Helen remained, and all the time she dreamed about college. She did not want an education for itself; she wanted it so that she might go back and teach the children of the settlement—children who were starving for an education, as she was.

"She got her chance at last,—father helped give it to her—but she never went to college. She died while she was still in the preparatory school; her hard life had exhausted her vitality. She did not know how to spare herself when her chance arrived, and when pneumonia came she had no strength to resist it.

"I can't quite tell you how I feel, I know she was not the only girl like that. But it's girl's like her and women like grandmother that have made life so different for you and me. And somehow—I feel it always—I can't fail Helen. I've got to carry on her life. I've got to make mine worth while to pay a little for her sacrifice. Do you see?"

"Yes, I see," Zelma replied gravely.

Soul's vow, not airy voice;
Sound heart, not sounding string;
Pure love, not piercing noise.
In God's ear sweetly sing.

Francis Roberts.

We can show our gratitude to God in a beautiful way by showing kindness to his needy children.

To be thankful is to be thoughtful, thoughtful, or mindful of benefits received. It is the thoughtless who are the thankful. It is the thoughtful who are the thankful.

The violin and the piano can not make good music unless they are tuned to the same pitch. One can not live in harmony with God, unless he has God's pitch. Godliness is harmony, spiritual harmony.

That life is most holy in which there is least of petition and desire, and most of waiting upon God; that in which petition most often passes into thanksgiving.—F. W. Robertson.

The prayer that begins with thankfulness, even while in sorrow and sore need, will always end in thankfulness and triumph and praise.—Alexander Maclaren.

They are not dead who live
In hearts they leave behind.
In those whom they have blessed
They live a life again,
And shall live through the years
Eternal life, and grow
Each day more beautiful,
As time declares their good,
Forgets the rest, and proves
Their immortality.

The path of power is not only in doing what God commands, but in using the instruments which he has ordained.

Let candidates for heaven bless the Lord. There is no place there for such as have not learned this art. Praise him so far as you know him; and he will make known to you more of his glory.—George Bowen.

Some men have wonderful absorbing powers. They take any number of favors and never remember one of them. If this be so as between man and man, what wonder that the charge should heighten in solemnity and gravity in its religious application.

If the home does not train the child to know God and to serve him, the chances are all against the child's ever knowing him, or serving him.

You do not know how much good you may do, and how greatly you may glorify God, if you praise him in your dark times.—C. H. Spurgeon.

One of the blessings of Bible history is the figures of gigantic moral heroes who tread its pages, and light up its story. There were giants in those days and they wrought mightily for God.

He who would lead his people to a choice of God must first himself wholly, and unreservedly choose God. Men will follow an example very much more readily than they will heed a precept.

He who does God's work must live close to God. There is a sign seen often in our large cities: "Rooms to let with power." It depends upon where a man lives whether he has power or not. When a man lives with God, in vital communion with him, he has the assurance of power. He has a room with power. He is close to the dynamo and the connection is easy.

IT DOES NOT PAY.

To "have a good time" at the expense of an uneasy conscience the next morning.

To lose our temper at the expense of losing a friend.

To cheat a corporation at the expense of robbing our own souls.

To have an enemy if we can have a friend.

To sow wild oats if we have to buy our own crop.

To spend the last half of life in remorse or regret for the first half.

To be discourteous, irreverent, cynical, cruel, or vulgar.

To give God the husks instead of the heart.

OPTIMISM.

Optimism is worth a great deal in helping people to be comfortable in life. Why should we think of the evils and discomforts and not of the pleasanter things that may be in store for us for present or future enjoyment? A Chinese boy was shivering in one thin garment. A missionary asked him if he was not cold. He replied, "Yes, I am cold, but it is only three months till spring." Shall the Chinese boy be more optimistic than we?—Presbyterian of the South.

THE CALL OF HOME.

Of all the days in the year, Thanksgiving is supremely in the home day. It is the day to be glad and grateful in the homes of our own making. Better still, it is the day to return in gladness and gratitude to the homes of our childhood, the dear homes where mother and father wait to welcome us as they did when we were children indeed. Of the two—the new home that a new love of our proud efforts have secured us, and the old where the blessing of life itself was given us, and where, one by one, so many other blessings have been granted us—the claim of the old home seems to be incomparably the stronger on such a day. There comes a time in the life of almost every one of us when return to it is no longer possible, a time when the dear, familiar house is strange with silence and emptiness—when it is a mere blind, dumb thing from which the soul has fled. So, while we yet can—if we yet can—let us spend Thanksgiving in the home that still lives with the life of those who love us.

THANKSGIVING CONUNDRUMS.

When is a turkey like some after-dinner speakers? When is it stuffed with chestnuts.

When is a boy like a turkey? When he's a gobler.

What part of a turkey fits into a sentence? The claws.

Where are the turkey's bones after Thanksgiving? In the soup.

What part of a turkey does the farmer like? The crop.

What part goes with the army? The drumsticks.

Lesson X—December 4.

PAUL IN MELITA AND IN ROME.

(Acts 28:1-16.)

1. And when they were escaped, then they knew that the island was called Melita.

2. And the barbarous people shewed us no little kindness: for they kindled a fire, and received us every one, because of the present rain, and because of the cold.

3. And when Paul had gathered a bundle of sticks, and laid them on the fire, there came a viper out of the heat, and fastened on his hand.

4. And when the barbarians saw the venomous beast hang on his hand, they said among themselves, No doubt this man is a murderer, whom, though he hath escaped the sea, yet vengeance suffereth not to live.

5. And he shook off the beast into the fire, and felt no harm.

6. Howbeit they looked when he should have swollen, or fallen down dead suddenly: but after they had looked a great while, and saw no harm come to him, they changed their minds, and said that he was a god.

7. In the same quarters were possessions of the chief man of the island, whose name was Publius: who received us, and lodged us three days courteously.

8. And it came to pass, that the father of Publius lay sick of a fever and of a bloody flux: to whom Paul entered in and prayed, and laid his hands on him, and healed him.

9. So when this was done, others also, which had diseases in the island, came, and were healed:

10. Who also honored us with many honors; and when we departed, they laded us with such things as were necessary.

11. And after three months we departed in a ship of Alexandria, which had wintered in the isle, whose sign was Castor and Pollux.

12. And landing at Syracuse, we tarried there three days.

13. And from thence we fetched a compass, and came to Rhegium: and after one day the south wind blew, and we came the next day to Puteoli:

14. Where we found brethren, and were desired to tarry with them seven days: and so we went toward Rome.

15. And from thence, when the brethren heard of us, they came to meet us as far as Appii Forum, and the three taverns: whom when Paul saw, he thanked God, and took courage.

16. And when we came to Rome, the centurion delivered the prisoners to the captain of the guard: but Paul was suffered to dwell by himself with a soldier that kept him.

Golden Text: "I am ready to preach the Gospel to you that are at Rome also. For I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ: for it is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth" (Rom. 1:15, 16).

Catechism—Q. 50. What is required in the Second Commandment, A. The Second Commandment requireth the receiving, observing, and keeping pure and entire, all such religious worship and ordinances as God hath appointed in his Word.

INTRODUCTORY.

In our last lesson we had a description of the great storm and the incidents of the shipwreck, from which, although the vessel was totally destroyed, all those on board were providentially rescued, so that they all came safely to land. They had not known what country they were approaching, but they came to the shore safely and reached solid land.

EXPOSITORY.

1. On landing they discovered that they were on the Island of Melita, or as it is now called, Malta. God's promise to Paul, which Paul had repeated to his fellow voyagers, was that they should be cast "upon a certain island." As they found out that they were now upon an island, just as Paul had foretold, they must have realized anew, as they had many times before, that Paul was no ordinary man, but that he was indeed a man of God, able to know the future and able to help and direct in the important matters of life.

2. The islanders were "barbarians," in the sense that they were not Romans and could not speak the language of the Roman people, but they were kind and sympathetic and hospitable. The people from the ship were cold and wet. They had been tossed about in the storm for weeks and were in a sad and suffering condition. These people, instead of being cruel and savage, treated them with kindness, built a great fire, and did what they could to make them comfortable. It appeared to be still raining and the winter's cold was coming on. In return for this kindness they were to receive still greater favors. Paul was to bring to them the power and truth of the Gospel. Wherever the Gospel goes the world receives great blessings. It is well to welcome the Gospel and its proclamations with material support, for it will bring blessings of eternal and temporal richness.

3, 6. This incident was calculated to impress the islanders with the thought of Paul's extraordinary character. He was busily engaged in gathering up wood for the fire, just as the other men were, working with his hands and doing his best to relieve the discomfort in a natural way, although he possessed miraculous powers from God. Laying the wood on the fire a viper, warmed by the heat, flung itself out and fastened on his hand. Usually the poison is so intense that death is certain and very soon in coming. The islanders saw the viper and expected to see Paul fall dead suddenly, or, at least, suffer greatly. They thought that he must be a murderer, who, though he had escaped the storm and the sea, was doomed by justice to die. But when they saw Paul shake off the venomous reptile into the fire, and suffer no harm, they changed their minds and concluded that he was a god. He was neither, but a man of God, who was being providentially preserved for God's own work. These islanders made a mistake. We can not be sure that because a man has material prosperity that he is good, nor, because he has distress that he is wicked. That was the mistake that was made by the friends of Job.

7, 10. Paul's stay was a great benefaction to the people of Melita. We read of his courteous treatment by Publius, the chief man of the island. Then we read of the sickness of the father of Publius, and his recovery under the healing powers of Paul. It was well for Publius to make friends, with his wealth, for he seemed a friend who could do for him what all the money in the world, of itself, could not do. And Paul's treatment of this sick man opened up the way to the hearts and the confidence of all the people, so that all the sick people of the island, learning of the power of the great apostle, came to him and were healed. A great door of usefulness opened before Paul and he was ready to enter in, and be useful in the name of Jesus Christ. The people were grateful and appreciative, and when the time came for Paul and his companions to sail on another ship for Rome, they put on board the ship such things as they needed. Paul had much evil treatment at the hands of bitter persecutors, but he had many warm and loving friends, wherever he went he drew the people to him by his gracious words, and his holy example, and his power to do them good.

11, 14. Three months were spent in Melita, until the winter had passed and the weather was safe for sailing the sea. The little sailing vessels were not adapted for travel in the winter as our large steamships are. The ship on which they traveled had wintered at Melita, but in the spring it started. Their first stop was at Syracuse, where they stayed three days. They then sailed to Rhegium, and after one day went on to Puteoli, near Naples, and the best place to disembark for their future progress on to Rome. There they stayed for seven days, and then started to go directly to Rome.

15. The friends at Rome knew that he was coming, and started on toward Puteoli to meet him. At the place known as the Appii Forum, or market of Appius, and the Three Taverns, they met, and Paul had his welcome from the Christian people of Rome. It was a glad and happy meeting. Paul's heart was warmed. When he saw them he thanked God and took courage. He never forgot God, or that he was the one who was watching over him and caring for him. From that place he went on in company not only with Luke and the Centurion and the others who had come all the way with him, but with those who had come out from Rome to meet and welcome him.

16. So they came into the great City of Rome. Even here Paul was treated with courtesy and deference. He was still under guard, but the Centurion knew that Paul could be trusted, and so no restrictions were put upon him, except those that were compulsory. Paul was in Rome, the center of the Roman Empire, the center of the world's civilization. From this place he could look out over all the world and minister to the Church of God, by epistles and other communications. We do not know that Peter was ever in Rome, and do not believe that he was, although it is claimed by the Papacy that he was, but we know that Paul was there, and that he did much there for the advancement of the Kingdom and Church of Jesus Christ. Paul's persecution had brought him to this point of vantage, and God had made all things work together for his good. So let us trust in him that he will guard and lead us on if we are his.

HOW NED SUCCEEDED.

Some boys, you know, will try to find

A good excuse for shirking—

Not so with Ned, the doctor's son,

He was almost always working.

He ran on errands, till his feet

Were truly sore and aching,

But still he whistled, smiled and sang,

A deal of comfort making.

'Twas, "Ned, do this," and "Ned, do that,"

(But still there was no whining)

Till dear Aunt Sarah said she feared

His health would be declining.

"O, exercise is good for boys,"

Said grandma, wise and loving,

"And I have noticed every day

His appetite's improving."

So Ned worked on, in school and out,

De-vel-o-ping his powers;

He came out leader in his class,

And carried off the flowers.

A LITTLE GIRL'S PRAYER.

By L. P. Mc Aroy.

Among the loveliest things that the missionaries are doing is taking poor, homeless, sad little children into their homes and helping them to grow up to be strong, happy, good men and women. In one of these homes in India was a sweet little girl, six years old. One day two new little girls were brought in. They had been whipped and hurt and treated unkindly and never had known what it was to have any one love them and take care of them, so they were as dirty and unlovely and cross as they could be.

The little six-year-old girl who lived there wanted to be kind and loving to them, but it was just as hard for her as it would be for you if two very dirty, unpleasant little children suddenly came to live in your home. But as she was a very wise little girl and she knew about a dear Friend who could help her, and her teacher heard her praying aloud, off in a corner all by herself. This was her prayer, "Help me to love the two new little girls just as if they were nice."

Perhaps the next time you have to be with some one whom you do not like, you can think about that prayer, and I am sure that it will help you just as it must have helped the little girl in India.

THE THANKSGIVING SEASON.

Thanksgiving season comes at "the dying of the year," when frost has stricken flower and tree and land is preparing for a winter of bleakness and cold.

Every season of life brings its experiences. The loyal Christian soon begins to understand that there never is a time when God may not be praised. In the midst of disappointment, sorrow or temptation he knows there are joys even then to be harvested. Sometimes the future's bitter trials are quite overshadowed by the coming of a sudden blessing which God long has been preparing. For that blessing the Christian is quick to thank God, and from his newly stimulated faith in God's love, he gains strength against the future's testing.

"GOING HALVES" WITH THE HEATHEN.

"The tousle-headed newsboy, in the line of giving to a famine fund, could barely reach up to the long shelf to push his contribution under the window.

"Is'n't that a pretty big lot for you to give, sonny?" said the man who had bought papers of him often enough to know him.

"Give nothin'!" said the small youngster growing red with bashfulness or some other feeling. 'Tain't giving, this kind ain't."

"Oh!" said the man enlightened, 'Sort of an investment, eh? Well, that's a good business. Glad you are starting out early to save.'

"Taint savin,' returned the boy, honestly fidgeting to be off about his business. Making out the cards took some minutes, necessarily.

"Not saving and not giving,' laughed the man, blotting the card and handing it over with a pleasant if puzzled smile. 'Then I'd like to know what you do call it?'

"Look here, Mister,' the boy broke out indignantly, pocketing his envelope with the card in it. 'When your pal is havin' bad luck wid his papers and you hands him somepin for his supper, yer don't call it givin', do yer? It's goin' halves. Well lots of bad luck folks is going to get supper out'n this! Givin' nothin.' We're just goin' halves; everybody is!'

"Oh, yes, I see!" said the man at the window, thoughtfully holding out his hand to 'next' but looking after the boy who was going toward the door with a long look of something akin to admiration."

EFFRAIOR TOPIC: Thy Will Be Done. VI. With My Plans. Matthew 6:7-15.

Another consecration meeting finds us with this same petition from the Lord's prayer, as the text for our study. We have thought on preceding consecration meetings of God's will as touching and affecting our Strength, our Pleasures, our Mind, and Time and our Money. Now we think of submitting our Plans in life to the guiding, controlling and good-will of God. We have found, on previous evenings, that it was well, in all the passing days of life to submit ourselves to the holy influence and will of the heavenly Father. We shall find, in considering our present subject, that it is well to think of all our future days in the light of God's guidance, and to make all our plans with the sincere desire of doing just what the Lord wishes us to do.

From our human standpoint our future earthly life is full of uncertainty. We know not what a day may bring forth. In the Epistle of James we read: "Go to now, ye that say, today or tomorrow we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain: whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow. For what is your life? It is even a vapor, that appeareth for a little time, and then vanished away. For that ye ought to say, "If the Lord will, we shall live, and do this, or that."

This would be a good text for our present subject. It impresses the fact that in all our plannings for the future, we are to remember that we are subject to the will and control of God. We can not make our own plans and be sure that we shall carry them out. We do not control. We are very weak. We are in God's hands. God alone can control. God alone can speak with certainty as to the future, because he alone knows what will be, and he alone can bring about his plans with absolute certainty and power.

It is said of God, by the Prophet Isaiah: "He shall not fail, nor be discouraged." We are often discouraged because we do not know that we are to succeed, and so, when things look dark we fear that we are to fail. We can not see into the future. But God can see the end as plainly as the beginning. He knows that he will succeed in whatever he plans and purposes to do. Consequently he knows that he will not fail, and of course, he can not be discouraged.

It is for us, if we are wise, to ask God always to direct and to keep us in our plans and our efforts. Let us learn to say: "If the Lord is willing we shall do this." It is only as he makes it possible, that we shall accomplish what we start out to do. It is only as he prospers us that we shall succeed. The Psalmist says: "Except the Lord build the house they labor in vain that build it; except the Lord keep the city the watchman waketh but in vain." God is the only really great and mighty one in the universe, and it is only as we have his blessing and help and grace that we can succeed in what we do.

The way to avoid disappointment and disasters in our life and work is to seek to do only what the Lord wishes us to do. If we can always do the Lord's will we shall always succeed. If we go on in a self-willed course we will be always failing; we will take up things in which we are sure to be disappointed; we will leave untouched duties in which we might achieve beautiful success and have hearty satisfaction.

Let us make our plans with respect to the will of God. Let us make God's will the will and plan of our life. Then in all that God permits us to carry through we will have the satisfaction of knowing that it is our Heavenly Father's loving and wise will for us. Wherein we suffer loss and pain and grief we will have the comfort of knowing that it was God's will for us, his children, and that it must be for our good. Thus every disappointment will be seen to be God's appointment, and a part of his plan for making all things work together for our good.

Father, we thank thee

Walked eight miles daily to attend college—

Was this young man in earnest about getting a college education?

He entered college last fall, expecting to pay expenses from the sale of some cotton he had raised. But there was no market for the cotton. Then, giving a note for his tuition, he abandoned his room in the dormitory and all winter walked daily the four miles between his country home and the college town.

Would you not like to help such a boy? There are many who have similar struggles and many who are compelled to abandon or seriously delay the completion of a college course for lack of funds.

We can put you in touch with such cases.

PRAYER MEETING

NOVEMBER 30.
THE CHRISTIAN AND HIS BIBLE.
II Timothy 3:14-17.

Happy are they who are reared in a Christian home, whose atmosphere is full of the spiritual influences that arise from the knowledge and love of the Holy Scriptures, the Word of God. The truth of the Scriptures comes into the life, and becomes a very part of the being. The child grows up acquainted with the great things of God, and of his salvation through Jesus Christ. The law of God is familiar, and is loved and obeyed without question. The promises and warnings of God are known and heeded, and under their influences the life grows and develops into an obedient attitude of repentance toward God, and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ.

The Christian accepts the Bible as the very Word of God. He believes in its sacred origin, as divinely inspired by God, written by holy men as they were moved by the Holy Spirit. The Bible is not only a great book; it is the greatest book that was ever on the earth. It is not only a good book; it is the best book that was ever in the hands of men. It is not only an important book; it is the one, only really important book that was ever produced. It is for our instruction in matters of which we can know nothing except as we learn them from God on its holy pages.

The Bible is the book of divine inspiration, so that those who wrote it were enabled to write the will of God, truly and safely, and to tell the exact truth in regard to the practical matters which they discussed in the various books. But it is, we may say also, the book of divine revelation, in which God has seen fit to reveal truths about himself, and about Christ, and about the way of salvation, and about the future life, that we could not know in any other way.

The Christian, knowing all this about the Bible, will value it very highly as a sacred treasure of incompatible worth. There is no way of computing its value. There is no way of measuring the proportions of its excellence. We are rich in having it as our gift from God. A great possession is it. A great and sacred treasure is it, which we value the more highly as we come to estimate properly its infinite worth. It is a delight to every good mind, and a joy to every disposed heart.

The Christian, knowing this about the Bible, and esteeming it for its wonderful value, will not only love it, but will use it practically and actually, for the good that will come to him from God, through its pages. He will read it as a message from his Heavenly Father. He will not be content to have a copy of it for his table. He will read it, day by day, and every day. He will search in it for hidden treasure. He will study it. He will become acquainted with its teaching. He will learn from it what God would teach him.

He will pray over it. He will ask God to teach him what he shall learn from it. He will pray that God will give him light to know its truth. He will pray: "Open thou my eyes that I may behold wonderful things out of thy law." He will make

An Idea Originated by a Cleveland Church Society is Spreading Like Wild Fire

HOW IT HAPPENED

SOME one conceived the idea that Candy Mints would be easy to sell, and every one seemed to agree, so a committee was appointed to call on Strong, Cobb & Company, Cleveland, O., a large manufacturing concern, who were the first in the country to make Mints.

The outcome of this interview resulted in the Company agreeing to get up a special package called "22 Mints," which contained 320 5-cent rolls that cost $9.00 and sell for $16.00, making $7.00 profit. Four Flavors, Peppermint, Wintergreen, Cinnamon and Clove. Packed 80 packages to a box, four boxes to a case.

The sale has proven so easy and successful, and so much enthusiasm has been created by one telling another, that the Company is now filling orders for "22 Mints" from all parts of the country. Here are extracts from some of the letters received.

HOW IT WORKS.

Miss Mary E. Orr, 207 Garrard Ave., Covington, Ky., says: "Enclosed find money order for $9.00. Please send as soon as possible one case of '22 Mints.' I am ordering these for our Young Woman's Society of our church. We have already sold two cases."

Dr. E. L. Chapman, D. O., 1017 Jackson St., Anderson, Ind., says: "Our girls are delighted with the '22 Mints.' They sell fine."

Miss Lillian Caldwell, Freedom School, Alliance, O., says: "Enclosed find order for three cases of '22 Mints.' Please rush this order, as we are having many calls for more candy."

Mrs. Jessie Mevender, Sturgeon Bay, Wis., says: "Please send another order of Mints. Only had the other case a week, and they are nearly all gone."

Mrs. L. F. Johnson, Corresponding Secretary W. C. T. U., Erie, Pa., says: "The Mints sold like hot cakes and are fine. Have recommended same to others."

Your society can do the same. Send $9.00 now for a case of "22 Mints" and they will be sent prepaid express or parcel post.

his Bible a light to his feet and a lamp unto his paths. He will try to use the Bible as God would have him use it.

He will allow the Bible to lead him to Christ and to salvation. This is what it is for. If one fail to find Christ as his Savior by means of it, it is as though he had received nothing from it, but had thrown all its precious truths away. For, although the Bible is all full of truth, it is of supreme value because it tells us of Christ and how to be saved by him.

Perchance some soul you aid today, tomorrow

May with the angels sing;
Some one may go straight from your earthly table

SALVATION AND SERVICES.

BY HOMERA HOMER DIXON.

We are "saved to serve." Christ told Paul that the "purpose" of the glorious revelation he had received was that he should be a minister and witness of these things unto the nations "to whom now I send thee, to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness unto light, and from the power of Satan unto God." If we live in the glorious sunshine and rejoice in the full blaze of the Gospel day, and do not take the light and life and healing of Christ to others, we are missing the purpose of our salvation!

GENERAL NEWS

THE ARMAMENT AND EASTERN CONFERENCE.

The sweeping American proposal for reduction of naval armament became the accepted fundamental policy of the Armament Conference by the unanimous assent of the five great powers.

Seconding the bold lead of the United States, the accredited spokesmen of Great Britain, Japan, Italy and France, one after another declared the readiness of their governments to accept the American proposal in spirit and in principle, but with the reservation of a right to suggest modifications of detail.

The problem of these details, which may yet occupy the prolonged attention of the conference and involve the success or failure of the whole plan, was referred for preliminary examination to a committee of five technical naval advisers, one from each of the big five powers. Within this committee, first of all, Great Britain will ask for a further reduction of the limit proposed on submarine tonnage, Japan will endeavor to prove her right to a greater ratio of naval strength than has been suggested for her and France and Italy will request that their naval questions be considered along with those of the three stronger naval powers embraced in the American plan.

Thus the diplomacy of the American delegation has won its first victory in the conference, but still finds itself confronted with questions of admitted importance and delicacy, whose solution is requisite to attainment of the purposes for which the nations were called into consultation. While the technical advisers wrestle with the armament problem and the delegates themselves continue in formal conversations on the American plan, the other big subject of the conference—the far Eastern situation was given its formal consideration at an executive meeting of the delegations of all the nine interested nations.

At the session last Wednesday, China paved the way for a solution of territorial questions, or rather offered a basis for discussion, by the presentation of a detailed statement setting forth her interests and attitude with respect to the problems in the Pacific and Far East. Briefly summarized, the Chinese statement pleads for application of the policy of the open door in all parts of the Chinese Republic without exception, observance of the territorial integrity and the political and administrative independence of the Chinese Republic, the abolition of secret treaties affecting China, and respect to China's rights as a neutral in future wars to which she is not a party. No mention is made of Shantung, though it is certain that disposition of this province is to be a matter for future discussion.

Many of the suggestions contained in the Chinese statement are known to be in accord with the views of the United States. An official spokesman of the British delegation, while declining to enter into a detailed comment on the statement, said it was obvious that Great Britain could accept several of the suggestions without qualification.

* * *

In the two committees of the Armament Congress, matters are beginning to take shape. The outstanding features of the week are the "5-5-3" ratio of naval strength which Japan wishes altered, and Japan's acceptance of China's proposals.

* * *

The "5-5-3" ratio of naval strength for the United States, Great Britain and Japan, advanced by the American arms delegates as a means to perpetuate the present relative standing of the three Powers, is coming under increasing pressure.

In the main, proposed modifications apparently center about the contention that the "5-5-3" formula, which is based upon tonnage alone, does not reflect present proportionate strength properly when such other elements as speed, cruising radius and armament are considered, ship for ship.

Thus far there has been every indication that the American group would "stand pat" for its proposal of maintaining the existing ratio, but it is declared that the national viewpoints of the other Powers as to what constitutes a fair basis of comparison will have due recognition as the negotiations proceed.

The result may be a more thorough review of the exact status of the present naval establishments of the three Powers, which, the Japanese hold, will show Japan's right to an increase over the "5-5-3" proportion, but which, American experts declare, will be more likely to establish that Great Britain and the United States each is entitled to almost a two-to-one advantage over Japan.

* * *

Settlement of the questions involving the Pacific and Far East was brought closer to the realm of actuality by a statement from the Japanese delegation, submitted to the Committee on Pacific and Far Eastern questions by Baron Admiral Kato in the absence of Baron Shidehara, Japanese Ambassador to the United States, who is ill.

This statement commits Japan to the principle of the "open door and equal opportunity" in China without condition or reservation.

She also renounces all claims of special rights and privileges in her trade relations with China, and pledges itself to join with the other Powers in bringing about the abolition of extra-territoriality in that country in a manner fair and satisfactory to all parties.

Not a single counter-proposal to the ten points enunciated in the Chinese statement of principles last Wednesday is contained in the Japanese avowal. On its face it is a gesture in common with the other Powers toward an amicable solution of the Chinese problem, the most intricate of the Far Eastern issues that must be solved before the international conference can realize the success hoped for.

The superdreadnaught West Virginia, newest addition to the American Navy, and scheduled to grace the scrap pile within a few months under the reduction program, was launched successfully last week at the plant of the Newport News Shipbuilding and Dry Dock Company.

With the return to a peace status, Ellis Loring Dresel, of Boston, was nominated last week by President Harding to be Charge d'Affaires to Germany. Mr. Dresel has been American Commissioner to Germany and now is in Berlin.

The nomination of Mr. Dresel was said in official circles to mean that probably no Ambassador would be sent by the United States to Berlin, for a time at least. Although officials said the decision to intrust American representation in the German capital to a Charge d'Affaires was reported independently of any proposals from the German Government, it is considered to be probable that Germany likewise will be so represented in Washington for some time.

Mr. Dresel's presence in Berlin will enable prompt resumption of diplomatic relations as soon as the Senate acts on his nomination. This is expected to be only a matter of several days.

Roy Gardner, mail bandit, who escaped under the fire of a score of guards from the Federal Penitentiary at McNeil Island, Washington, where he was serving a fifty-year term for Pacific Coast robberies, was captured single-handed at Phoenix, Ariz., by Herman Inderlied when he attempted to hold up the mail car on an Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway train at the Santa Fe Station.

Inderlied was unarmed at the time.

An announcement by Henry Ford that he was willing to buy all warships and use the material in making agricultural implements called forth the announcement that if he wishes to purchase warships and convert them into automobiles and plowshares, he need not wait for the world to disarm if he is sincere in his purpose.

American naval officials are ready now to put Mr. Ford to the test on his offer to buy up the navies of the world. He can begin right away, as the American navy has seven or eight antiquated battleships which it is ready to sell for junk. They are replete with materials that Mr. Ford may convert into agricultural implements and get a start in his new enterprise before the arms limitation agreement is reached.

Naval officials gave assurance, too, that if the Powers agree to scrap large parts of their naval forces, any serious offer to purchase ships to be junked would have careful consideration.

Alexander M. Howat, for twenty years a figure in labor controversies in Kansas coal fields, now stands automatically and permanently expelled from the United Mine Workers of America, with reinstatement possible only through action by the Executive Board of the International Union.

Howat and August Dorchy, the deposed Vice President, are in jail at Columbus, Kan., serving sentences of six months each for having violated the State Industrial Court law by calling strikes in an industry regarded as essential to the public welfare.

In an effort to make early Christmas shopping a fact the Consumers' League has embarked on its annual campaign against the last-minute crowding of stores.

In the last six years the last-minute rush of shoppers was greatly alleviated, until 1918, when the campaign was crowned with unprecedented success, with a sharp reduction in night work in the stores, Miss Annette Mann, Executive Secretary of the league, stated.

Since 1918 there has been a decided backsliding, with the result that the stores were jammed to the doors on the last days, last Christmas being the worst of recent years. It is to prevent and even worse overcrowding this year that the campaign is being undertaken, Miss Mann said.

Two men have been shot during the past six days by marines guarding mails sent from Chicago, Arthur S. Brauer, Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, announced.

One of them was shot at Sioux City, Iowa, and the other at Gerard, Ill. Both were train riders. Neither was hurt seriously.

Twelve persons were killed, thirty or more injured and heavy property damage was caused by two cyclones which struck in widely separated parts of Arkansas, early last Friday.

Steps to give to men greater opportunities to obtain college educations were taken by the Association of Urban Universities, in annual conference last week.

Dr. Adolf Busse, director of evening sessions in Hunter College, College of the City of New York, asserted that evening students were capable of advancing much more rapidly than were day students.

A resolution adopted unanimously urged universities in large cities to offer in night hours the same curricula that were offered in day classes, and to confer the same degrees for the work. Another called on members of the association to use their influence with city educational authorities to organize night high schools offering the same courses as did day institutions.

HOME AND FARM

COOKING FOR TWO.

For the housekeeper with the small family, the canned tomato puree will make sufficient for two separate menus. Open the can of tomato puree and place one-half in the ice-box. To the remainder add, one and one-half cups of cold water, one onion, grated, pinch of allspice, two tablespoons of flour, one teaspoon of salt, one-quarter teaspoon of pepper.

Stir to dissolve the flour and then bring to a boil. Cook slowly for ten minutes and then strain into two cups and sprinkle with a little finely chopped parsley, and serve with crackers.

* * *

Braised Neck of Lamb.—Have the butcher cut two thick slices from the neck of lamb. Wipe with a damp cloth and then pat with flour and brown very quickly in a skillet containing four tablespoons of melted fat. Now lift to a deep saucepan and add four tablespoons of flour to the fat in the pan. Cook until very dark mahogany color and then stir constantly and add one and one-half cups of cold water. Stir to blend and bring to boil. Cook for five minutes and then pour over the meat, and add four small onions, one medium-sized carrot, cut in quarters. Cover and bring to boil and then place on simmering burner and cook one and one-half hours.

To serve, reheat and then lift the meat on a slice of toast and pour over the gravy. Lay vegetables on top of meat and sprinkle with finely chopped parsley.

* * *

Goulash for Two.—Purchase one-half pound of lean beef, one quarter pound of veal, two ounces of salt pork.

Chop the salt pork fine and then place in a deep saucepan and cook gently until a very delicate brown. Now add the meat, cut in inch pieces and rolled in flour. Cook until a golden brown and then add three tablespoons of flour and stir well to blend. Now add four small onions and one small carrot cut in dice, the tomato puree left from day before and one and one-half cups of cold water.

Bring to a boil and cook for five minutes. Place on the simmering burner and cook one and one-quarter hours. Fill into individual casseroles, and sprinkle with bread crumbs and grated cheese and then place in a hot oven to brown. This may be browned under the gas flame in the broiler and then heated in the oven. There will be plenty left for luncheon for the housewife the next day.

* * *

Braised Steak.—Have the butcher cut one pound of rump or round steak one inch thick. Now punch holes in the steak with the point of a knife, and pat into both sides of the meat one-fourth cup of flour. Heat four tablespoons of shortening in a skillet until smoking hot and then add the steak and brown on both sides quickly, and then add one and one-half cups of cold water, two-thirds cup of sliced onions, one teaspoon of Worcestershire sauce. Cover slowly and bring to a boil. Place on the simmering burner and cook one and one-fourth hours. Serve garnished with parsley.

Mocha Pudding.—Soak two level tablespoons of gelatin in one-half cup of black coffee for one-half hour and then turn in a saucepan and add, three-fourths cup of powdered sugar, three-fourths cup of black coffee. Heat slowly to the boiling point and then strain in a bowl. Let cool; just as it is beginning to set whip with a Dover-style egg-beater, and just as it becomes thick fold in one cup of whipped cream, one teaspoon of vanilla, one-half teaspoon of mocha flavoring.

Line the mold with waxed paper and then separate fifteen lady-fingers and cut in half. Line the bottom of the mold with the lady-fingers, then spread with mocha filling, having the filling about one inch thick. Then place a layer of lady-fingers and repeat until the mold is full. Chill in the ice box for one-half day. Turn from the mold and brush the waxed paper with boiling water. Remove and then cut in inch slices and serve with vanilla custard sauce. Thin oblongs of sponge cake may be used to replace the lady-fingers.

A real secret about French fried potatoes.—boil large potatoes in their skins until nearly tender and then lift and let cool. Peel when needed and cut in thick strips for the French fried. Cook until golden brown in deep fat, heated until smoking hot.

Grassmowing Play. Its gay old-fashioned little song, beginning,

'Peter, Peter, quickly go
To the fields the grass to mow' shows the baby how many workers contribute to his well being. It can not fail to interest a child when he knows the cow must be fed to furnish the milk he so much likes, the butter churned and his rolls baked from the soft white flour the miller has ground. This train of thought naturally leads him on to a contemplation of the great source of all supply, the giver of all good. And as the child sings these quaint little verses happily, with their appreciative climax, he is learning to express loving gratitude:

"Thanks to all are gladly said,
Baker, thank you for the bread.
Thanks dear mother shall not miss,
Given with a loving kiss."

Furthermore, if a child grows up realizing how his life is interwoven with those about him he will be safe-guarded against selfishness, and if he is taught to think about work and play in their relationship to each other, over emphasizing either will be prevented. Roosevelt in writing to one of his sons, commended him for having excelled in college athletics, but reminded him that it was not praiseworthy to exert himself to the limit of his strength for a trivial end. He was to keep his powers at their highest, then give himself utterly when a worthwhile occasion arose. Even young children can be taught to keep an idea of balance, and will be richer and happier for the knowledge.

The broader the education of the parents, the more they will have to pass on to their children. Once open your child's eyes to the ways by which he is provided with food, clothing, transportation, heat, light and other comforts, and if he has a normal eager mind, he will as he grows older find means of supplementing what you have taught him. When you have given him the inestimable advantage of a fair beginning, he will see and understand the evidences of cause and effect in his life. For instance late bedtime is pleasant in the evening, but detrimental to school work; eating vegetables may be a trial, but I have seen four year olds devour them with increasing willingness, in order to have "rosy cheeks and straight, strong legs."

But perhaps the greatest advantage we give our children in showing them the relationship of incidents and circumstances in their lives, is the habit of appreciation. Then naturally follows gratitude to the Heavenly Father. Why should every good thing be taken for granted? Saying "Thank you" is more than an amenity. They will be better members of society for having learned to express gratitude, with the knowledge of a reason for "Giving Thanks," in the understanding gained of

"The Life of all life,
The Light of all light,
The Love of all love,
The Good of all good—God."
Froebel.

POSITIVE VERSUS NEGATIVE.

BY HENRIETTA W. BROWN.

We all recall the old alleged incident of the mother who told her child not to put beans up his nose during her absence,—how the child received the suggestion as a new play, and how the mother, upon her return, found that "the worst had happened." This illustrates the negative mother.

The positive mother employs a different method. In leading her child over a muddy street, she says, "Let us step on all the high places," and they both reach the other side dryshod.

The negative mother or teacher is so full of "don'ts" that she herself and the little ones under her become mystified and discouraged. It is like constantly knocking down blocks before anything has been built.

The positive educator constructs. A bit of honest praise for something well done builds up within the heart of a child love for the one who praises, discernment and love of the right, confidence in the good that he can do, and a great desire to do another good thing. Such movements of recognition please even the grownups, and how much more are children helped! The mother says, "My child was generous today in sharing his toys with his visiting cousin," and the child glows with joy at the words, pondering over them. Thus his character is being formed and on the side of good.

Why should mothers and teachers ever fall into the fruitless, negative way, when the good fruit is all on the positive side of the fence.

If we are tired or worried, we can not inspire our children. We ourselves must first seek inspiration and the calm and poise which it brings.

Froebel says:

"If you would bind your little one to you, Bind your own soul to all that is high and true,
And let its light shine clear through all you do!"

Some people always meet us with a tale of woe, and continue to talk negatives. We come away fagged. Others talk about the beautiful, seeing good all about us. We are then able to give something constructive to those we meet, especially to the children, who will surely grow through our recognition and nature of every little impulse of good springing up within them.

If we look for good in our little ones we will surely find it. Yet we must look searchingly with those wiser eyes of Love, for alas! the negative things are far too easy to see.

So let us try for one day to emphasize the good in those about us, to recognize every good attempt in our children, however small, and we will find ourselves on the true highway of peace.—Ex.

ROYAL RESPONSE TO UTAH'S APPEAL

Friends reveal themselves in emergencies. When word went out that fire destroyed the boiler house at Utah's Westminster College on Oct. 22, it was discovered that scores of persons from ocean to ocean were definitely concerned that the work of the college should not be seriously interrupted.

Gifts poured in from Utah and the nation until the sum was ample to restore the burned structure. Fortunately the boilers were not injured. Without serious delay a new steel smoke stack was erected, a new building was constructed and the college work goes steadily on.

The President and the Board of Trustees express their deep gratitude to all who had a part in helping Westminster in a day of trouble. Thanksgiving Day will be real to the college this year. The future of this Utah work will be all the brighter because its leaders know that the college has an ever enlarging company of friends at its back. President H. W. Reherd, D.D., Westminster College, Salt Lake City, Utah.

WIT AND WISDOM

Delegates to the arms conference and the long train of dignitaries and sub-dignitaries which accompany them are beginning to show the effects of the grind.

Not the grind of work, although that is enough, but the grind of the continuous performance of luncheons, dinners, receptions and late suppers which have been going on since last week.

Many prominent international digestions already have begun to call for "a holiday." Many snappy and close-fitting uniforms are getting closer and less snappy. The telephone girls who jingle the bell and warble "good morning" say the responses are becoming less diplomatic.

It all means that the conference is working full hours and playing overtime, and it begins to look as though there might have to be a limitation of entertainment with a replacement program to be agreed upon later.—Associated Press Dispatch.

Kansas paper: We wish to apologize for the manner in which we disgraced the beautiful wedding last week. Through an error of the typesetter we were made to say "the roses were punk." What we should have said was "the noses were pink."—Boston Transcript.

A Nice Choice of Words.—Young James and the still younger William were engaged in a violent disagreement, during which blows had been exchanged, when their father appeared.

"Why, boys," he said, in a pained parental tone, "what does this mean?"

"I don't care," sobbed William, a little conscious of superior virtue. "He started it! He said—he said that I was a liar!"

"Why, James! What a thing to say about your little brother!"

James hung his head. "Well—I didn't say exactly that, father," he explained. And, in answer to a further question, "I just said that he didn't remind me any of George Washington."

Wooster Day—Sunday, Dec. 11th

The time has come for all Presbyterians in Ohio to show their interest in a practical way in their college at Wooster. All pastors and church sessions in the State are asked to observe "Wooster Day," December 11th, by previously putting up the Wooster poster and distributing the Wooster literature to their congregations, then on "Wooster Day" distributing the pledge cards and urging their people to make liberal individual subscriptions to Wooster's Endowment Fund.

The subscriptions are on a four-year annual-payment basis, making it possible for people to subscribe in larger amounts. Unless subscriptions to the amount of $750,000 are received by next June, our great Synodical College at Wooster will lose the $250,000 offered it by the Rockefeller Fund. The college is prospering as never before under the inspirational leadership of President Wishart, and its abandonment at this time by the Presbyterian Churches of Ohio is unbelievable. Ask your pastor and elders about "Wooster Day." Your church should be on the honor roll.

THE ARMAMENT CONFERENCE.

Unless the hopes inspired by the opening of the conference are dashed in the ensuing proceeding, November 12, 1921, may rank with August 4, 1914, and November 11, 1918, as date of infinite importance to the English-speaking world and as a turning point in human history.—London Times.

* * *

The President of the United States has a conviction that it is possible to inaugurate a new diplomacy and to change the nature even of the relations that peoples have with each other. His conviction is shared by the American people. They represent a force that is almost irresistible.—Pars Figaro.

* * *

The way to resume is to resume—that was the sound money war cry in 1878 when the resumption of specie payments was the overshadowing topic of the day. The way to disarm is to disarm, said Mr. Hughes to the astonished conference, and the whole world rejoices and applauds.—N. Y. Times.

* * *

Whatever may be the ultimate outcome of the arms conference in Washington, the United States will have nothing to explain. The purpose back of the drastic proposals of Secretary Hughes can not be misunderstood.—Harrisburg Telegraph.

WHY?

Why need a brilliant and influential speaker antagonize an audience by slamming at their inherited faith, or by the intimation that people who differ from him are devoid of first-class intellectual ability?—Congregationalist.

MORAL REFORMS.

Moral reforms are good to the extent that they are made effective. They are all repressive, damming up the currents of human nature. Nevertheless moral reforms are worth while. Whatever the laws can do to protect society from the harmful exhibitions of wickedness should be done.

It is possible, however, for the Church of Christ to estimate too highly the value of moral reforms. Jesus was not a moral reformer. He was called Jesus because he came to save his people from their sins. Moral reforms have nothing to do with sin as such, but only with certain manifestations of it. They leave sin precisely where they found it, deep-seated and impregnable in the human heart; as much opposed to God as ever, the worst enemies of Jesus were those who needed no moral reforms—they were the exponents of a high and unimpeachable morality. His most fruitful labors were among those who were noted for their lack of a high moral standard. The publicans and harlots entered the kingdom of God before the Pharisees who were the Puritans of that day. Thus it was abundantly demonstrated in the beginning of the Christian era that morality was an entirely different thing from religion. That religion will produce morality, but it is far from true that morality will produce religion. It does not even have a tendency to produce religion. It is
